WASHINGTON, D. C.

(654)

CONFIDENTIAL

MEMORANDUM

20 July 1943

From: The Chief of the Bureau of Ships.
To: The Naval Aide to the President, Room 2078.
SUBJECT: Battleship Vibration - Investigation Concerning, Additional Information.

References:

- (a) Telephone conversation between Lieut. Elsey, White House calling Comdr. Albert G. Mumma, BuShips of 19 July 1943.
- (b) The Chief of the Bureau of Ships memorandum of 6 May 1943.

1. The original trials of the USS IOWA were conducted with four-bladed propellers installed on the outboard shafts and five-bladed propellers installed on the inboard shafts. As described in reference (b) the vibratory conditions during this trial were satisfactory except in a narrow speed range from about 28 to 29-1/2 knots. The power distribution on this trial between inboard and outboard shafts was not most advantageous as the inboard shafts absorbed more power than the outboard shafts at the same revolutions.

2. At a later date three-bladed propellers were installed on all shafts which was expected to improve longitudinal vibratory conditions in the engine rooms as well as equalize the distribution of power between the inboard and outboard shafts. It was anticipated that approximately 70 per cent increase in vertical vibration would result from this change, due to impulses concentrated on three-blades instead of four or five and a slightly larger diameter for the three bladed propellers with a consequent reduction in the distance between the hull and the tips of the propeller blades. The major objective of proper distribution of power and improvement in longitudinal vibratory conditions in the engine rooms were realized. However, the reduction in tip clearance was responsible for increased vertical vibratory forces in larger magnitude than anticipated and resulted in amplitudes of vibration in turret number 3 and portions of the superstructure which were not considered acceptable.

3. As the overall gun platform had not been improved, the decision was made to redesign the inboard five-bladed propellers to achieve proper power distribution. The change involved a reduction in diameter, increase in tip clearance and a change in blade shape. The original four-bladed propellers were reinstalled on the outboard shafts and the redesigned five-bladed propellers were installed on the inboard shafts.

4. A recent trial has been held with this propeller combination which resulted in almost complete elimination of the longitudinal vibration and the reduction of the vertical vibratory conditions to such an extent that this class of vessel may now be considered most acceptable from a vibratory as well as other points of view.

NAVY DEPARTMENT
BUREAU OF SHIPS
WASHINGTON, D. C.

MEMORANDUM

May 6, 1943

From: The Chief of the Bureau of Ships.
To: The Naval Aide to the President, Room 2078.
SUBJECT: Battleship Vibration - Investigations Concerning.

Reference:

- (a) Telephone Conversation, Lt. Comdr. Mott, White House,
calling R. Ad. Cochrane, May 6, 1943, a.m.

1. In the summer of 1939 when the design of new, faster, and more powerful battleships was actively under way, it was visualized that these ships with approximately 4 to 6 times the horsepower of previous battleships might encounter vibration difficulties in a similar manner to that encountered in the NORMANDIE and the QUEEN MARY.

2. In view of the possibility of such vibration difficulties, a vibration research project was begun at the Experimental Model Basin at the Navy Yard, Washington, and vibration instruments and equipment were assembled in anticipation of tests on models and full-scale vessels. This project was transferred to the Taylor Model Basin and pursued there upon completion of that establishment.

3. Such vibration equipment was installed on the first trial trip of the NORTH CAROLINA and permitted immediate and accurate diagnosis of the vibration difficulties encountered in those vessels. Up to that time model tests had been quite limited due to inability to coordinate model and full-scale results due to scale effect factors and lack of similitude. Various combinations of propellers with different numbers of blades, including three, four, and five blades, were tried, and the final arrangement of four blades on the outboard shafts and three blades on the inboard shafts was ascertained to give minimum vibration throughout the operating speed range of the ship.

4. This full-scale information was applied to model tests in which vibratory forces were actually measured in the models and by means of newly developed analysis techniques were incorporated into the design of propellers for the battleships of the 57 to 60 Class. In this class, the original choice of propellers was proved to be correct in actual trials, although one additional combination of propellers was tried in the INDIANA in order to verify this fact. The ultimate number of propeller blades used in this class are four blades on the inboard shafts and either four or five blades on the outboard shafts.

5. In the original design of the IOWA, four- and five-bladed propellers were intended for use when the thrust bearings were located in the engine rooms. Vibratory results of the model investigation then actively proceeding at the Taylor Model Basin indicated that a great improvement in vibratory conditions could be achieved by installing the thrust bearings as far aft in the ship as possible. This was actually accomplished in the ship and three-bladed propellers were designed for use with this arrangement; however, the three-bladed propellers could not be completed in time for installation prior to launching, hence, the four- and five-bladed propellers were installed at that time.

6. In the hope that an additional docking could be avoided, and in the belief that the vibratory conditions would not be severe even with the propellers designed for the old original position of thrust bearings, the ship was tried with these propellers. Vibratory results were satisfactory except in a narrow speed range from about 28 to 29-1/2 knots. The power distribution on this trial between inboard and outboard shafts was not ~~more~~ advantageous as the inboard shafts absorbed more power than the outboard.

7. In order to fully benefit, however, from the change in the position of the thrust bearings, the decision has been made to install the three-bladed propellers, which is expected to radically improve the vibratory conditions as well as to equalize the distribution of power between the inboard and outboard shafts. This is also expected to give a very slight increase in the top speed of the vessel.
