"In light of our new reality in a post-pandemic world, the need of the hour is two-fold—to reinvent existing tech to adapt to the new norms of social distancing and reimagined physical boundaries, and to drive innovation in the creation of tech solutions that are required in the new normal," Venkata Machavarapu, Head of Engineering, India, and Site Director at Indeed India said in a statement.

Machavarapu points out that even as businesses work towards regaining momentum in the global economy, it is imperative to ensure that the existing workforce is ready to meet emerging demands of AI-powered solutions on their skills.

With shortage of people with AI skills, several companies are assisting their existing workforce to acquire skills in emerging technologies. Tech Mahindra has recently launched a UaaS or upskilling-as-a-service platform for organizations to impart new skills in 5G, internet of things, or IoT, augmented reality (AR) and virtual reality (VR).

The platform will use AI to provide personalized, interactive, on-demand and contextual training to employees. General Electric Co. last year shed roughly 78,000 employees, or more than a quarter of its workforce, as divestitures left the company with the same number of employees as it had in 1951.

The company ended 2019 with about 205,000 global workers, down from about 283,000 a year ago, according to GE's annual report filed on Monday. In the U.S., its workforce dropped to 70,000.

It is the lowest number of employees at GE since the post World War II boom. The company ended 1951 with an average workforce of about 210,000 and had more than 400,000 by 1969, according to a review of the company's annual reports.

The 2019 reduction is almost entirely explained by GE's decision to part with two units: the oil and gas division and the transportation business. The oil business had more than 65,000 employees, while the transportation unit had more than 9,000.
