Everyone fortunate enough to be living out from underneath a rock has heard of the PlayStation 5, Sony's powerful next-generation game console that's capable of displaying stunning 4K graphics at an incredible 120 frames per second. Not only that, but the PS5 features hardware-accelerated ray tracing, 3D audio effects, a built-in 825GB SSD, and is even backward-compatible with your favorite PlayStation 4 games.

Not to mention, the PS5's new DualSense controllers have mind-blowing adaptive triggers that even allow you to feel resistance from within the game you're playing.

Basically, the PS5 is an incredible piece of hardware that opens new doors for immersive gaming - the best part? It could be yours, absolutely free.

Feel free to tell us about a game you're dying to play, a next-generation feature you're looking forward to, or just talk about your love for PlayStation. There is no right or wrong answer. This week marks the beginning of another console war between gaming giants Sony Corp. and Microsoft Corp. On Tuesday, Microsoft released its new Xboxes, while Sony will debut its new PlayStation 5 on Thursday.

It won't be much of war this time: PlayStation, the reigning market leader, is widely seen as having the advantage. Gamers typically buy new consoles to try out the latest new titles and updated versions of favorites. So, it's bad enough for Microsoft that PlayStation has such a lopsided advantage in this regard going into the holiday season.

Sony is launching its latest machine with a compelling lineup of showcase games that demonstrate the improved technical capabilities of its hardware; Microsoft has no exclusive games prepared for its premiere. But that's not the worst of it. Next year doesn't look any better. As incredible it may seem that Microsoft had no new games ready for its first console launch in seven years, it now looks like the disparity for 2021 will be just as bad.
