Maria Pavlova/Vetta/Getty Images The the main geography types are physical, environmental and human geography. There are other sub-branches of geography such as political geography, historical geography and religious geography. Physical geography is about studying the Earth and its structure. Land forms, continents, oceans and tectonic movements are part of the physical geography. The formation of rocks, attrition, erosion forces, winds, ocean currents and rivers were examined as part of the physical geography. The environmental geography is particularly relevant to the study of the interaction of plants and animals with the Earth. Human geography has discussed how human societies develop with the help of natural resources. The evolution of these cultures and religious beliefs is related to the study. Economic, cultural and political geography are the sub-branches of human geography. Since the beginning of mankind, geography studies have captured people's imaginations. In ancient times, geography books praised tales of distant lands and dreamed of treasures. The ancient Greeks created grapho for geography and writing from ge roots to the land. These people experienced many adventures and needed a way to explain and communicate the differences between various lands. Today, researchers in the field of geography are still focusing on people and cultures (cultural geography) and planetary earth (physical geography). The characteristics of the earth are the domain of physical geographers, and their work includes research on climates, the formation of soil forms, plant and animal distribution. Working closely in relevant fields, the research of physical geographers and geologists often overlaps. Religions, languages and cities are some of the specialties of cultural (also known as human) geographers. Their research into the intricacies of human existence is the basis for our understanding of cultures. Cultural geographers want to know why various groups perform certain rituals, speak in different dialects, or organize their cities in a specific way. Geographers plan new communities, decide where to place new highways and set up evacuation plans. Computer mapping and data analysis Geographic Information Systems (GIS) is known as a new frontier in geography. Spatial data is collected in various subjects and installed on the computer. GIS users can willingly create an infinite number of spouses to draw parts of the data. Geography is also always something new in research: new nation states are created, natural disasters hit populated regions, the world's climate changes, and the internet zooms in on millions of people. It's important to know where countries and oceans are on the map, but geography is much more than answers to trivial questions. Having the ability to analyze geographically allows us to understand the world we live in.
