

How To Quell Wanderlust Between Trips

February 13, 2017 5:00 AM

By Randy Yagi

You just had one of the best vacations ever but now you're stuck at home with no travel plans in the near future. Yet as your travel itch becomes more difficult to scratch, what can you do to temporarily satisfy your wanderlust before you're able to go on another extended trip? You might be surprised just how many things you can see and do that are close to home. Here are just a few suggestions to help quell your wanderlust between trips.

Take A Day Trip

If visiting your city isn't enough or you've just run out of ideas, then perhaps a daytrip to a nearby destination can help solve your aching wanderlust. As an example, if you live in San Francisco, you could take a drive across the Golden Gate Bridge then visit one or more of the fabulous wineries in Napa or Sonoma County in the world renowned California Wine Country about an hour away. On the other hand, if you're the more adventurous sort, you can bring your bike along (or bike altogether) and treat yourself to a sip and cycle tour to any other the very bike friendly wineries, such as the breathtaking Castello di Amorosa in the Napa Valley and Sonoma County's Buena Vista Winery, the oldest commercial winery in California. Regardless of where you live, there are bound to be numerous new and interesting places to visit that are within a short distance from home. If you need more than a day, just plan on finding an interesting place to stay, whether it's a hotel, motel, B&B, campsite or vacation rental.