When the Buffetts travel, we resemble some kind of misguided caravan, a cross between the Clampett family moving to Beverly Hills and Sesame Street on tour. Besides the human contingency and BSE (baby-support equipment) and favorite foods and fishing tackle and surfboards and computers and flight bags and guitars—and the list goes on. My Citation II jet was too small for such an undertaking. No, this trip would require a unique airplane, and I just happened to have one—a Grumman Albatross that I had bought after my recent crash. One of the reasons I bought her was to travel. I had fantasies of packing up the family in the big old romantic flying boat and heading for parts unknown.

So the following pages are another stab at completing a journal inspired by the trip that my wife planned for me to celebrate my fiftieth birthday, on December 26, 1996. I am glad to report that my first fifty years were, overall, a lot of fun. I just followed my instincts and kept my sense of humor.

There are towns and streets and seashores that are not just dots on a map.

They are part of what the aboriginal tribes in Australia call songlines. When I first read about the concept in Bruce Chatwin’s book Songlines, I knew that they existed. The simple and beautiful idea of a songline is the way to measure time.

Life is a journey that’s measured not in miles or years, but in experiences, and the route your life takes is built not of roads but of songs.
