A bipartisan coalition of 40 state attorneys general has sent a letter urging Congress to pass the Senate’s Keeping Online Safe Act (KOSA), highlighting concerns about harmful online content, algorithmic amplification, and gaps in current federal law that they say leave consumers — especially children — vulnerable. In this episode, we unpack why AGs are aligning behind KOSA, what provisions they support (such as transparency requirements, safety standards, and age-appropriate protections), and how this push reflects broader state and federal interest in regulating online platforms.
