A collaborative design and development effort of the University of Michigan's Mobility Transformation Center (MTC) and the Michigan Department of Transportation (MDOT), the vehicle test environment dubbed Mcity had its grand opening today (Monday, July 20) in Ann Arbor. Housed on the school's North Campus, Mcity will offer an opportunity to safely test emerging vehicle technologies in a controlled space prior to being rolled out to the general public.

It's a fact: Exercise increases in a variety of city and suburban conditions, replete with construction obstacles, traffic lights, intersections and the other typical components of a road system, in addition to such encounters as graffiti-obscured road signs.

U-M Mobility Transformation Center

Opened in 2013 to examine the challenges and opportunities of building connected and automated systems, MTC has targeted 2021 as the year when such a network will be a reality on the streets of Ann Arbor. MTC Leadership Circle member companies, each of which has pledged to donate $1 million to Mcity over the next three years, include General Motors, Ford, Nissan, State Farm, Verizon Wireless and more. Combined, U-M and MDOT already have invested approximately $10 million.

The public will be able to see Mcity -- located at 2909 Baxter Road in Ann Arbor -- this Thursday, July 23, from 4-8 p.m. EDT. Learn more about Mcity in an article published today (Monday, July 20) to Michigan News. The story has quotes from Mcity director Peter Sweatman (also seen in this article's accompanying video) and MDOT director Kirk Steudle, as well as U-M president Mark Schlissel, who praised Mcity's collaborative aspects, both inside the university and with outside partners.
