Dear member:

As many of you know, 2016 has marked a significant evolution of the RaceClean program as we vowed to respond to membership concerns and conduct many more anti-doping tests at grassroots events.

Well, June represented the midway point of this year's program, which means it's a great time to look at our progress. To date, we've conducted 107 tests - that's nearly five times what we had conducted by this time last year. Our target for testing in 2016 was set at 135 tests versus 45 in 2015, and if the first six months of the year are any indication, it looks like we'll well surpass our target.

Given we have significantly increased the amount of testing, you might be wondering if our efforts have resulted in positive tests. To date, we cannot report any positive tests - but it's really too soon to do so. After a test, it can take 6-8 weeks to get the results back. And if a test comes back positive after that 6-8 week period, the athlete has the option to challenge the sanction at an arbitration hearing in front of independent judges. It is not uncommon for athletes to challenge their sanctions, and when that happens, the adjudication process can take several months to over a year to complete in full. We cannot report any ADRVs until the adjudication process is complete. The adjudication process can be lengthy, but is in place to protect athletes by ensuring that all sanctions are fair and justified. If and when we can report any ADVRs from RaceClean testing, we will do so on the RaceClean webpage and in this update. On July 22, we'll choose five winners for some swag.

That's all for this month. For more information please visit the RaceClean webpage. If you have any questions or if there's anything specific you want to hear about in a future report, don't hesitate to contact me at jwhiteman@usacycling.org!
