May 23^d -

My present feelings scarcely authorize more than a grateful acknowledgment of Lord Belhaven's favour. I am as weak as you may easily imagine, after the exertion to move down stairs yesterday afternoon, when I remained until bed time. My Journey, was, for the first time, unattended by fainting - but a few unmanly spasms, obstructed themselves. This sudden warm weather turns our attention to the Country - and if convenient we shall remove hither next week - We depend much on its salutary influence, and no doubt it will have good effect. I shall almost feel as, jumping from the frigid arms of Entered into the genial bosom of Spring.

I have almost suffered that delightful season to pass me unobserved. For some time before my window, and a few friendly flowers sent to cheer the solitude of my seclusion. I have witnessed few other of its charms - and as no one than myself, greet with more pleasure the returning smile of this season, when health allows me to enjoy them, and gratitude breathes praise to the Creator of those bounties. I almost fear I sometimes betray an unseemly impatience - but when I appeal to my dear Mother on that account, she kindly excuses me, and flatters, by saying I'm tolerably tractable. - What then should I say of her patience all this time? how sufficiently applauded or
