

anything like organised attack, they would be insignificant in every way, while they can be easily coerced either from the Jadrân highlands or from the Upper Kurram.

The Zaimukhts, on the other hand, are stalwart highlanders; physically fine-looking, powerful men, comparing in this respect very favourably with the Turis adjoining. Sunis in creed and Sâmîl in politics, there is no great love lost between them and either Turis or Bangash, but their relations with both are peaceful, compared to the quarrel between their own two chief sections. These number about 2,000 fighting men each; and afford a good instance of a tribal feud, which, beginning about the possession of a village commanding a small stream, has lasted for forty years—so bitterly that, to a great extent, it has prevented the development of what is naturally a fertile country. Roughly speaking, a triangle drawn between the towns of Hangu, along the Miranzai Valley to Thal, and thence by the Kurram to Ibrahimzai, with the Zawaghar hills for a base, would include the whole of the Zaimukht country. The hills along the base of the triangle, which separates them from the Orakzais, rises in places to a height exceeding 9,000 feet, and up among the higher glens in the centre is a collection of hamlets called Zawo, the chief stronghold of the tribe, by them considered impregnable; until, to punish them for their raids on our lines of communications already referred to, General Tytler went there in 1879, and occupied not only Zawo, but the ridge above, destroying the settlements of one section. The principal Zaimukht villages, often pleasantly situated among terraced fields, lie up among the precipitous and rocky spurs—the peaks and ridges that are thrown off this part of the Sufed Koh Range, are as a rule here somewhat barren of timber, save a few stunted oak and wild olive. In the glens and valleys water is plentiful, and but for the feuds of the people, the country would possess great possibilities for cultivation and development.

Before going on to the more powerful mountaineers who hold the upper slopes of the range, the petty settlement of Chamkannies, dropped in amongst them, deserves a passing word of notice—a people described by Bellew as originating in a heretical sect of Persian Islamites, driven out of their own country by constant persecution on account of their peculiar religious ceremonies and immoral proceedings. One of the stories against them is not altogether without a savour of the “Love Feast” of more modern sects in England; and consisted in putting out the lights at a stage of the religious performances, in which both sexes joined indiscriminately, and which was the signal for possible improprieties. The Persians called it Chiragh-kush,¹ and the Pathâns Or-mur;² but the Chamkannies, however, have turned over a new leaf, and become orthodox Muhammadans.

Those settled in the western part of the Kurmâna Valley are sometimes associated with the Orakzais, albeit the “lamp extinguishers” are in every way a distinct race, little colonies of them occurring from the Peshawar Valley to Kâbul and down to Kanigoram in the Waziri country.

East of the Zaimukhts, and along the southern slopes of the Sufed Koh as far as the Kohât Pass Afridis, and between the Lower Miranzai on the south and the Bâra River watershed on the north, is the Orakzai country—sometimes spoken of as Tirah, though the name belongs properly to a more restricted area—the home of one of the most numerous, powerful, fanatical, and, in some respects, inaccessible of our immediate Border tribes, or rather group of tribes: for though usually referred to as one, it must be understood in an ethnographical and not a political sense. Their six main divisions are split up into many parties, are variously Gâr and Sâmil in politics; and their intertribal warfare, which has often furiously raged between the Tirah Sayuds and Sunnis, formed the subject of a special report to Government by Cavagnari. Some sections in a great measure are dependent on

¹ “Lamp extinguisher.”

² “Fire extinguisher.”

British territory; others but slightly so; and reprisals are not easy. One, the Daulatzai, has committed many acts of hostility; and against the Bizoti and Rubia Khel clans special expeditions have been undertaken, while some of the most numerous have so far never given any serious trouble. Any relations with them as a body would hardly be possible, and probably nothing, unless it were lust of plunder or hatred of the infidel, would unite together the different elements that go to make up a fighting strength estimated at over 25,000 men. As a body, though not such fine men as the Afridis, they are robust, wiry-looking mountaineers; and though opinions differ as to their martial qualities, they admittedly shoot very straight. It is more than doubtful if by descent they are Pathâns; but if not better, they are probably not much worse than their neighbours in the Pathân qualities of deceit, avarice, and cruelty. Macgregor says "there is no doubt that, like other Pathâns, they would not shrink from any falsehood, however atrocious, to gain an end. Money could buy their services for the foulest deed; cruelty of the most revolting kind would mark their actions to a wounded or helpless foe, as much as cowardice would stamp them against determined resistance." On the other hand it must not be forgotten that they have been embittered by centuries of bitter religious feuds and the influence of fanatical teachers; they have never had a Government of any decent sort, its place being supplied by superstition; and they do not understand our theory of tolerance or non-interference. They are certainly not worse than the Afridi—to whom these crimes are second nature, but who under a tight hand is transformed into a soldier ranking with the best in our native army. What we call "wonderful forbearance," to these people is a mere excuse for further misbehaviour, while prompt punishment has a magical effect in pulling up the worst conducted. What they would understand, and in time appreciate, would be a strong government; and once brought under this, we should transform a troublesome set of neighbours, torn by crushing feuds, into a prosperous people—another reserve of stalwart highlanders to draw upon.

Tirah, in its restricted sense, includes the main Bâra River Valley above Torabela; the Orakzai, or southern branch of the same river, above Hissar; the Khanki River Valley, above Sidurra, and the Kurmâna, above Khazina. When it is understood that all these rise pretty near to one another, and the first two flow past Peshawur into the Kâbul River, the third into the Kohat *toi*¹ near Hangu, and the fourth into the Kurram near Ibrahimzai; that this comprises an area of about 700 square miles, with an altitude, for the most part, between 5,000 and 6000 feet,—its situation and advantages will be more easily realized. The first of these, including the valleys of Raigal and Maidân, is occupied by Afridis; the other three, and the smaller ones that open into them, by Orakzais, many of whose tribes and clans vary their quarters every summer and winter, coming down with their flocks into the low hills, and often into British territory, during the latter season. All are more or less shut in by wild and precipitous hills, the crests often covered with magnificent oak and pine forests; especially is this the case on our immediate border. The Zawaghar and the Sammanoghar, which bound the Khanki Valley on the Miranzai side, rise over 9,000 and 7,000 feet respectively. The Muzzeoghar, which separates this from the Southern Bâra, is over 8000 feet and rises 5000 directly above the Khanki River below it. To say that they are difficult of access is to use a somewhat weak figure of speech. The Ublân Pass—a strong position six miles from Kohât, and the scene of one or two affairs against the Bizoti clan—is over 4000 feet high, while below, the Southern Bâra sweeps round the base of Mulloghar, a spur 7,000 feet high, almost directly opposite. A situation it would hardly be necessary to have three hundred Spartans to make a Thermopylæ of. There are two or three passes or paths further on, practicable for very little beyond laden oxen, but when crossed, the real difficulties of advance would only be beginning: for the main valleys are split up into a succession of rich, fertile basins; by bold, rugged spurs, which here and there form “waists,” affording splendid natural defences and proportionately formidable obstacles to the passage of troops. On the opposite side the approaches are through the Afridi territory.

An Orakzai.

¹ "Stream."

Higher up, these valleys broaden out and become extensive, almost open highlands; the Kurmârna Valley is estimated as a basin of nearly 200 square miles; frequently terraced into a succession of fields, and dotted with hamlets and towers. Well wooded, abundantly watered, producing in plenty apples, pears, grapes, and most fruits, a variety of vegetables and excellent timber. And if to a poorly-clothed Orakzai it seems cold in winter, the summer climate is described as delicious. Nevertheless, as far as the British Government is concerned, the valleys of Tirah might be as those in the kingdom of Amhara, from which Rasselas found it so difficult to escape, though we have more excuse for knowing something of the inside, than the Prince of Abyssinia had for surveying mankind "from China to Peru." Not so long ago the Quartermaster-General of India excused want of information, on the ground that "though the furthest point is not more than eighty miles from the cantonments of Peshawar or Kohât, though the inhabitants are constantly to be met with in our territory, its tribes form one of the largest sections of our frontier neighbours, and its politics one of the most important items of frontier business—nothing of any value has yet been recorded regarding it." This is perhaps not quite literal. Captain Tucker ventured into Lower Tirah in 1872, for which he was severely censured; a native, Agha Abbâs, has written an account of it; and one surveyor, disguised as a native, and associated with Pathân Shikaris,¹ reached points from which he could overlook it, and was able to map a part of Maidân. Another attempt to reach points from which the Bâra Valley could be overlooked failed, and though British officers have surveyed all round it, the inside is to them still a terra incognita. Definite information cannot therefore be said to have been yet advanced very far in the matter of these Highlands or Highlanders.

¹ Hunters.

CHAPTER XIX.

A PATHÂN SURPRISE.

IN "Piffer"¹ parlance "the tribes were out," and this in a frontier station always meant some additional excitement. Although the sentries had been doubled—no officer's verandah was without one or two, and patrol parties moved promiscuously about with buckshot cartridges handy—there was always the off chance of a wily Pathân getting a snap shot at any one going home from mess. The walls of Kohât Fort were the subject of constant attention on the part of certain tribesmen, who seemed to spend their evenings in long range practising at any exposed part, and must have remained with a perpetual bead drawn on the opposite embrasures, in the hopes of eventually catching an unwary passer by. Outside of the cantonment limits no road was safe without an escort, and travellers had to keep a pretty smart look-out when passing outlying hills. The trouble was mainly with the Orakzais, some of whose clans had taken to frequent raiding on the country adjoining their border. The adjacent villages were pretty constantly fired on, and although the raiders bolted as soon as they were attacked in turn, it was seldom before one or two of the villagers had been killed or wounded. Unprotected cattle were, as a matter of course, promptly carried off into the hills. Becoming bolder the raiders had recently succeeded in surprising some police outposts; one or two policemen had been cut down, others carried off and detained. A small force sent out under the Deputy Commissioner's orders to retaliate, had, owing to some unfortunate misunderstanding, advanced too far into the hills, got involved in the steep ground among the Ublân spurs, and had to come back unsuccessfully, having lost one officer and some dozen men killed, besides many wounded. The most unsatisfactory feature of the whole business was that the leading offenders belonged to a most insignificant clan; though holding a position of such natural strength, successful operations against them must necessarily be on an extensive scale. In fact, the Bizotis fancied themselves absolutely secure, and traded upon the supposition. At the same time, to take out an army against a handful of professional cattle-lifters and thieves seemed a veritable breaking of a fly on the wheel. The Ublân Pass affair was too serious to be overlooked, and they were strictly blockaded, but this was a small punishment to a clan with no trade to lose, who sowed a rice crop in their lower valleys, and went away to Tirah till it ripened; who could run down from their summer hill station in twenty-four hours for a fight, and disperse to the four winds again in half that time. Their winter settlements, though really only an hour's ride from Kohât, were on the other side of a formidable range of hills, approached by a horse-shoe shaped pass, in which all the nails represented positions for riflemen, and the centre lowest point to be crossed, a lip 4,000 feet high. On this stood the Kotâl or watch towers, from which the Bizotis could watch the doings of the garrison, pretty nearly as effectually as Kohât is supposed to do for the tribes generally. A decent look-out on this tower, with the assistance of a goodly supply of spies in the bazaar, kept the villages of their valley nearly as well informed of the garrison doings as the commandant himself. The rest of the Orakzais professed the part of good-natured friends ; they were ready to ride with the hounds, but not to assist in catching the hare, and resisted all the efforts made to induce them to coerce the refractory Bizotis. An expedition requires much more than a good reason, it needs the sanction of Government to the probable expenditure of a lot of money, and the possible loss of many lives—it might easily cost a lot of lives—to rush the Ublân Kotâl. Still it was evidently necessary to adopt some more active and potent measures than the blockade, and as it was already February, anything to be done must be done promptly. Delay would have meant indefinite postponement. The Deputy Commissioner and the commanding officer, therefore, determined to try, and cast about to frame a scheme to surprise the Bizotis ; and so well did they keep the secret, that, until the whole train was laid, it was not suspected even by the garrison.

¹ A word compounded from the initial letters of the old Punjâb Irregular Frontier Force.

It was arranged that on a certain day a force should move out from Peshawar, a part towards the Aka Khel country, and so attract the attention of the tribes to possibilities in that direction ; the remainder into the Kohât Pass, and create some little diversion there. At the same time the pass Afridis were brought into Kohât to discuss business, which they found necessitated their remaining a few days to settle ; so that if suspicion was aroused, it was all in the direction of the Afridis and the pass. Finally the commanders of regiments in Kohât received confidential instructions, and one night, towards the end of February, they all came to dine at the garrison mess, and play a little quiet rubber after dinner. Just before midnight the officer commanding the artillery was directed to proceed to the fort and get the mountain battery ready for service ; half an hour later the men were to be warned. At the same time two regiments of native infantry were paraded, and at one o'clock, a third—all without a single bugle sound. Meanwhile, a regiment of Punjâb cavalry had quietly formed a cordon round the town, and prevented any one entering or leaving it; and police pickets had taken up and stopped all the points by which a footman might enter the hills. At 1 A.M. the Deputy Commissioner and the commandant, with a body of picked men, and certain chiefs of the friendly clans, followed by a mountain battery, two regiments of infantry and some dozen of mule loads of ammunition, made straight for the pass. According to the programme, the friendly chiefs were to be put forward to square the sentries while the police rushed in and seized them; but so little was anything suspected, and so confident the Bizotis of the strength of their position, that they had entirely neglected this precaution, and the watch had actually gone into Kohât for a spree. Quiet possession of the Kotâl was therefore taken, the troops brought up in the dark to the crest of the ridge, and by dawn had moved down on one of the principal Bizoti villages. The friendly chiefs, who had been let go a quarter of an hour ahead to warn the villagers against resistance, seemed to think it was but fair to do a turn for their own people, and were energetic in spreading the alarm, so that by the time the troops arrived at the first big village, the women and cattle were streaming out of one end, and the fighting men had opened fire at the other. It was, however, taken at a rush, the leaders of the offending faction being the first to fall. The surprise was complete, but to have attempted a further advance would have been to risk a heavy loss of life with no proportionate gain. The lesson had been sufficiently sharp and severe; a large number of cattle and live-stock captured, the whole of the village, with the exception of the mosque, was completely destroyed, and the Bizotis, who fought bravely enough, had lost pretty heavily in killed and wounded. The mountain guns were therefore brought into action, and under cover of their fire the force returned, and were in Kohât again within twelve hours, with the loss of three men killed.

Nothing probably could have more effectually disabused these troublesome neighbours of their fancied security against punishment; it was to them a genuine "Pathân surprise," and there is no doubt all the tribes round envied such a stroke of luck, and appreciated it more than if a big expedition had been successfully undertaken against them. The effect, at any rate, was equally great. By the end of March, their *jirgahs*¹ had come in and agreed to pay a fine of Rs. 1,200, to give nine of their principal headmen as hostages for future good behaviour, and had laid down their swords at the feet of the Deputy Commissioner, a young man whose name was Cavagnari. The tribes were quiet again.

¹ Tribal Councils.

CHAPTER XX.

KOHÂT AND THE FRONTIER FORCE.

A PICTURESQUE town among water-courses and wheat fields, orchards and shallow pebbly streams, with ranges of blue hills for a background. To the east the rugged mountains of the equally rugged Jawâki Afridis. Rising steep up, almost close behind the Kctâl, over which the pass leads through the Gallai Afridi country to Peshawur, and the steeper Ublân pass to the still more lofty peaks of Mulloghar. Westward the Orakzai hills and the rich Miranzai Valley, seldom without a breeze to temper the fierce heats of summer, at times so sharp and biting as to have made the hangu, famous as the very coldest breeze along the Border. More to the south rises Mir Khwaili covered with wild olive, and the range round which the Toi river works through a fertile strip of cultivation towards the Indus. The foreground dotted with mulberry groves and gardens, or a group of walnuts and Indian fig-trees, marks some more than usually famous shrine, like Haji Bahâdur, to which the Border Pathân resorts when he wishes to take an exceptionally sacred oath, one more binding than any court could ever extract from him. Such is Kohât—an oasis in a district, bare, barren, and stony more than most.

Alongside the town is the Fort, practically within rifle-shot of the Border line, the exact range of spots where any careless member of the garrison might for a moment expose himself, well known to the tribesmen, who have had opportunities for the most extended practice. Not far from this, the cantonments with two or three regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, one mountain and one garrison battery, a total force probably amounting to 3,500 men, belonging entirely to the Frontier force, the "Piffers" as they are called in the Punjâb. Trim little houses, with trim, but very little gardens, for there is not much scope for gardening where sentries have to patrol nightly, keeping a watchful eye on the flower pots, and anything as big as a gooseberry bush may afford shelter to a trans-border scoundrel, intent on plunder. A little church, an assembly room, convertible for either ball or theatricals, a library, racket-courts, tennis-courts, cricket-ground, polo and racecourse, also convertible. All within a ring fence, so that society can take its exercise, or its afternoon tea, enjoy its band or its last novel from Mudie's; cultivate Terpsichore or Melpomene, without going beyond the range of the mess; that garrison mess whose hospitable doors are open to every one duty or pleasure carries in its direction. It is not the fortune of every one to be a resident, but the veriest wayfarer is not permitted to be a stranger. No strangers are possible within the gates of the Kohât garrison. And Kohât is only a sample of every one manned by the Piffers, from Hoti-Marlân to Râjanpore. If hospitality is a reputed characteristic of the Border people, it is the first and most scrupulously observed regulation of the Border garrisons.

But the garrison will do more than entertain the traveller, they will furnish him with an escort, and surround him with the best of sentries. And in many parts he is liable to want both badly, for ruffians on the other side of the line allow no traditions of hospitality to interfere with business. They may not take his life—it is not profitable to kill a sahib—there is more fuss about the one English Kâfir than the ninety and nine self-righteous Pathâns; but they will not willingly leave any of his property that is movable, while as artists in negotiating this form of exchange, they are probably facile princeps. To steal the horses of the Commissioner, the camels from the camp of the Lieutenant-Governor under the noses of the guard—or the rifles out of the racks in the Peshawar barracks, is merely routine business, nearly as easy as driving off cattle from the villages, or abducting the trader's only son—the apple of some fat Hindu's eye, a wretch who prefers to pay up on a receipt of the first bit clipt from the boy's ear, to waiting for any of the remaining pieces. To take however, the revolver from under the colonel's pillow; to gut the district officer's tent of its entire contents, leaving for manners a square bit of carpet cut out neatly round his bed; or cut a hole in the tent of the sleeping police officer, and carry off his, and his wife's, only clothes, from among the drowsy constables, are forms of practical joking requiring a proficient hand. But to carry off an entire tent, pitched in the middle of the Kohât cantonment bristling as it does with sentries, who shoot at sight, was a master-stroke performed not so long ago.

The sentries of the force moreover are not as other sentries. Instead of conspicuously walking up and down, in heavy boots, with a glittering bayonet, a sort of friendly beacon for the Border thief to skirmish by, the Piffer sentries are probably lying perdu behind a wall, watching for a chance, or in small parties carefully stalking lively spots where a marauder might be flushed. They are pretty certain to be dead shots, their weapons not unlikely to be loaded with buckshot in place of bullets, and to act on the famous principle of a word and a blow; to challenge and shoot, but to shoot first. There may be no addition to the guard-room, but "two budmashes (scoundrels) were shot last night, and a third got away badly hit," is a not improbable morning report. If challenged in the dusk on the Border, it is always well to speak quick, and at one time the Peshawur tradition held it to be the safest thing to fall down flat, and then shout "friend." The average Piffer sentry is far more discerning than to shoot a sahib, but the guest may possibly get a tip, "not to let his servants stray too far about the place to-night, as a couple of patrol parties are starting at dark to cruise about in search of suspected raiders, thought likely to visit the lines." The raider for his part would "snipe" the sentry who came at all in his way, with a light heart, and so the latter takes the best means he can to get first shot.

What the sentry does to protect the unit, the Piffers as a body do for the Border, or a good part of it. With the exception of Peshawur and Quetta, they garrison India's most important outposts, are the advance guard of its army. In every sense they are a Border force, recruited almost entirely from Border people. Sikhs, Gurkhas, Punjâbi Muhammadans, Afghâns, a few Biloches, and a large proportion from the Pathân tribes on the other side of the line. The Queen's Own Corps of Guides, for instance, a splendid body of both infantry and cavalry, with permanent headquarters at Hoti Mardân, in the Peshawur Valley, includes among its ranks picked trans-border men from all parts, familiar with most of the country and the passes, between the Indus and Kâbul. Tribes against whom we have, at one time or other, had to undertake expeditions, and with whose fellow clansmen we might at any time have a burst again.

In countries where patriotism is exalted as a primary virtue, the policy of enlisting men, whose duties might involve the carrying of fire and sword into their fatherland; who might have to march against their own kith and kin, or watch their own village being fired, would be doubted. The Pathân Piffer, if he has read Dr. Johnson, would probably agree in considering patriotism that declined this, "the last refuge of a scoundrel." Perhaps also he has an opinion in the matter of being "faithful to his salt," or a strong sense of military honour, but in the Frontier force, the policy has always been found to work admirably. He will march anywhere, fight any one against whom he is led, and it has been found, when he goes home again he carries with him good feeling to the Government, whose power and resources he has come to know, and exercises a good influence in its favour among his own people. Over and over again these men have actually marched against their own clansmen, and their own homes. Not only against fathers and brothers but even against the still more potent religious appeals from the local Ghâzis. On one occasion in the Miranzai campaign a native officer, whose father was on the hill to be attacked, urged his commanding officer to get blood spilt between the troops and the Ghâzis before nightfall, so as to stop any feeling of sympathy that might arise.

A Distinguished Guides-man; killed trying to save Wygram Battye in Afghânistân.

That before he enters our service, he may have raided our villages, stolen our horses, shot our sentries, or fought stubbornly against us, does not make him any the less valuable when he comes over to our side. Contrariwise, on the plan of setting a thief to catch a thief, or turning a poacher inside out to make a game-keeper, a desperate foe sometimes makes a most useful Border soldier. Not only does the Piffer officer feel that joy in meeting a foeman worthy of his steel, he sees in him a possibly fine recruit. While the fight raged fiercest at 'Ali Musjid, a band of horsemen in the Amir's service came under the full fire of the Guides infantry, and suffered so heavily that they had to retreat. But there came back one Pathân, and shouted defiance while he took the fire of half a regiment. Somehow he was not hit, but he was promptly marked by the eye of the colonel, who took the first opportunity to enlist, and turn him into as good a Guide as the best. Mr. Rudyard Kipling makes a capital ballad out of another Guide recruit, whose father, a well-known Border outlaw, lifted the colonel's mare, but spared the life of the son, who pursued him to his lair, from whence the Borderer sent back his own son to be a trooper in the regiment, to swear on the bread and salt, to guard the boy with his life, and to harry the old man's hold if such should be the need.

One thing he does not give up, but brings with him to his regiment, keeps through his service, must have leave to look after, will resign promotion to gratify, and looks forward to retiring to thoroughly enjoy—and that is—his cherished feud. If he has not got one when he joins, he may inherit one, which may become just as binding, though it concerns people he has not seen for years, and hardly knew when he left home. In India, the white man wants leave to get married, he is sick, he needs a change, or to avoid a bad station ; very much less frequently, to go home and enjoy a fortune. The black man has lost his mother, or any more convenient relation, has a lawsuit, or a boil as per margin. For the Pathân soldier there is only one class of "urgent private affairs," but for this he must have leave. "Six months, O Father of the regiment," or, "three months at least." Then "O friend of Allah, for God's sake let me have six weeks, for my business is pressing and I cannot possibly manage it in less." Every one knows for what purpose he goes, it is the only reason where refusal of leave would justify desertion. He will do nothing rash within the Border, there will be nothing too rash for him as soon as he is on the other side, and if he does not come back, he has probably met with misfortune, in the shape of a too skilful enemy. There is an old story of a very bad blood-feud between two men, Mauladin Khân and Isa Khân, uncle and nephew, both in the same regiment, who could never be allowed leave at the same time. For years they campaigned together, both were equally ready to fight the enemies of the Queen, and behaved perfectly, but so bitter was the feud, if both were allowed to go home, only one, it was certain, would come back. After a while there came new officers, and both unfortunately did get leave. Isa Khân alone came back. He did not mention that before starting he had got three days off parade and walked from Bannu to Dera Ismail Khân and back, some 170 miles, to beg a flask of powder from his former officer, a crack shot ; but he confided on his return, that he never should have been able to settle his affair, had it not been for Norman sahib's "straight shooting powder."

Among the low hills of the Kuki Khels, is a small tower which commands the surrounding country for some little distance. The residence of an ex-Guides-man, a man who would have rejoiced Ouida. Of great strength, keen eye and iron will ; who had shared in the sharp fighting of 1857 against the mutineers ; fought with our troops, against the combined tribes at Ambeyla and the second Black Mountain expedition; accompanied the Forsyth Mission to Kashgâr; but finally cut his name to carry out a feud. The path was open to him to high honour and distinction, but he stood out, and to an inquiring officer, he said, "I never knew what real happiness was, until I had taken this tower, and could send a bullet after my enemy whenever he ventured to show his face." Unless that enemy is dead, the ex-Guides-man probably watches for him still. From the regimental records of the Piffers could be extracted volumes of such stories, records of the most gallant deeds performed by the men whom the law as we understand it would have undoubtedly hanged for murder. We hold "one murder makes a villain, millions a hero;" the Pathân is not casuist enough to see the difference. For him it is not numbers, but fancied obligation, that "sanctifies the crime." One more, quite modern instance, which gives characteristically enough, murder from the Pathân soldier's point of view, must suffice.

"Riding from Bannu," says the narrator, "just before reaching the outpost in which was my camp for the day, I overtook a particularly good-looking, upstanding Pathân, from his smartness and salute evidently a soldier, but with no uniform, and a manner that looked an unmistakable grievance. A handsome, almost a pleasant-faced man, who evidently seemed to have something to say, so I asked him of his welfare, and in return he told me his story. 'The other day,' he said, 'I was a Jemadar, in the 1st Punjab Infantry, a regiment that to me was everything. I have served in it for fifteen years; I was with it all through the Afghân campaign, and along all this frontier. There has never been anything against me. I liked my officers, and looked to be made Subadar. Recently some urgent family business'—he alluded to the family business in so delicate a way, it might have related to the birth of a baby, instead of the death of an enemy—'compelled me to take leave and go home to Abazai. I got four months' leave, had the best of rifles, and made every arrangement, but the man I wanted had gone, and would not come back till he knew my leave was up. It was therefore impossible for me to return, and I did not send any letter to my adjutant, because I thought every day the man would come back. Well, sahib, I waited and waited, but he did not come for nearly three weeks. The very day he did,—here his eye glistened just a little—'I managed to shoot him, and started back to my regiment next morning. And now, surely no one had ever such hard luck, they have cut my name and broken my service, because I was absent without leave. I am sorry about the leave, but it was not my fault that the man did not come to Abazai sooner. And, sahib, can you tell me where is the General just now? I am on my way to find him. He is a good man and a just. Knows the Pathân people, and is certain to see me righted as soon as he hears my case. * * * And here, sahib, are your tents. Salâm-a-laikum. May it be well with you.'"

Besides the garrisons of Abbotabad, Kohât, Bannu, Dera Ismail, Dera Ghâzi, Hoti Mardân, and Râjanpore, the first five of which are also the head-quarters of civil districts, and the last two, of civil sub-divisions, there is a line of small forts or outposts, which are also garrisoned by the Frontier Force, and the Frontier Militia. On the Hazâra, Peshawur, and Kohât borders, these are comparatively few, and held in considerable strength; along the Bannu and Derajât borders, they are smaller but more frequent, often ten or twelve miles apart, so as to command one or more passes; and the Piffers are associated with the militia, or the outposts are held entirely by the latter. In Border slang the militia-man is a "Catch-'em-alive-O," in appearance he is not very different from those wild moss-troopers already described. In practice he is a tribesman and a raider, employed to restrain his fellow tribesmen and raiders from pursuing their trade within our limits, only furnished with better weapons of which he is proud in proportion, though as his name implies, he is not to kill, but to catch the offender, and bring him in alive for the law to deal with. His inclination would of course naturally be to utilize his superior talents and weapons to prosecute little wars or feuds of his own, but this disposition has been sternly, and in the main successfully repressed, so far as our territory is concerned. He is not a soldier in that he is not trained as one, but he has a very intimate knowledge of the country and of the movements of his friends on the other side, with whom he manages to spend not a little of his time, and he furnishes capital material out of which soldiers could be made.

Excluding these, and the tribal levies, the Frontier Force is approximately some 15,000 strong¹ commanded by a brigadier general, up to a few years ago under the immediate orders of the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjâb, but now directly under the Commander-in-Chief. Every regiment keeps up its own carriage, organizes its own transports and commissariat, and is ready to start for active service at a moment's notice. An emergency that necessitated a council of war in Kohât or similar garrison, would within a few hours see infantry, cavalry, and artillery marching out prepared for a campaign. There is probably no more mobile force possessed by any power, no soldier of whom that power might be more proud.

The progress of events that have necessarily to some extent modified the organization of the force, will probably entail some further changes in the not distant future. Though it still retains its distinctive character, it has by passing under the orders of the Commander-in-Chief, become essentially a part of the Indian army. With the extension of the Quetta position and a more or less general moving forward, it can hardly remain a local and also a Border force. Râjanpore and Dera

¹ The Frontier Force at present consists of four regiments of Punjâb Cavalry ; the Corps of Guides, Cavalry, Infantry, to which screw guns are to be added ; four Mountain Batteries ; one Garrison Battery ; four regiments of Sikh Infantry ; five regiments of Punjâb Infantry ; two Battalions of Gurkhas.

Ghâzi Khân are no longer Border stations, the outposts have moved a couple of hundred miles to the west of them. The Piffers have already as many men on detachment at Khur, Rakhni, Kingri, and Kot-Muhammad Khân, as remain at regimental head-quarters; while beyond again, in the Bori Valley and Peshin, are stations garrisoned by Bengal regiments. Higher up, Dera Ismail Khân may shortly find it necessary, to detach a part of its garrison to Apazai and the Zhob Valley; or that at Bannu find a way through the Tochi to the Jadrân Highlands.

It would, at the same time, be a misfortune if these changes in any way involved sacrificing the distinctive character of the force, because apart from its special value, it appears essentially the best organization, to which additional militia and tribal levies could be gradually attached. The day has entirely passed for considering it in any sense an irregular force, but there is no reason why to its splendid regiments should not be affiliated irregular ones of excellent militia. For the organization of special tribal levies, there can surely be found no agency more suitable than the men who have graduated as its officers, and acquired the most intimate acquaintance with the Border people. A moderate estimate places the fighting men of these tribes at 160,000 Pathâns, and 150,000 Biloches, for the Punjâb alone; without taking account of the Sind Border or Bilochistân proper; and whether as regulars, militia or levies, there is no doubt of the value of the material.

Whatever the precise figures may be, the field for recruiting is undoubtedly immense, the extension of the Frontier Force merely a question of policy and of funds; and should future changes develop either in this direction, or in change of location, it is certain to take a foremost place in any comprehensive scheme of Frontier defence. With equal safety, it may be predicted, that the Piffers may be looked to supply, in the future as in the past, leaders capable of directing the most important operations in connection with that defence.

CHAPTER XXI.

AFRIDIS AND THE KOHÂT PASS.

WHAT is true of the Orakzais and their country to a great extent applies to the adjoining Afridis, the next great group of tribes occupying the Sufed Koh Range, and our neighbours for upwards of ninety miles along the Border in the Kohât and Peshawur districts. A still finer race, they are equally numerous—certainly over, 26,000 fighting men—more than most others important, inasmuch as they hold possession of the Kohât and Khaiber Passes, and, for the purposes of defence, their positions are nearly inaccessible. Classed among the most lawless and savage of Pathâns, but, at the same time, the bravest, most open in manner, and most treacherous, the Afridi is perhaps the Pathân whose manliness and manner most strongly prejudice Englishmen in his favour. The frontier highlander of whom we hear oftenest, who is the hero of so many characteristic stories, and about whom it is very difficult to write, save in a series of contradictions, is in appearance a lithe muscular man, with a rather fair complexion, high nose and cheek bones, frequently associated with a not unhandsome face; a self-possessed, independent, and almost courteous manner; as Macgregor—himself a distinguished kinsman of Rob Roy, and no bad judge—describes him, “a fine, tall, athletic highlander, whose springy steps, even in traversing the dusty streets of Peshawur, at once denotes his mountain origin ;" but, as the same authority continues, "a ruthless, cowardly robber—a cold-blooded treacherous murderer ; brought up from his earliest childhood amid scenes of appalling treachery and merciless revenge, nothing has changed him ; as he has lived—a shameless, cruel savage—so he dies. And it would seem that, notwithstanding his long intercourse with us, and the fact that large numbers have been and are in our service, and must have learnt in some way what faith, justice, and mercy mean, yet the Afridi is no better than in the days of his father." Both estimates are perhaps somewhat extreme. He is not so tall and fine as some of the Khattaks and Yusafzais ; and in Peshawur he might almost pass for a righteous man. Hospitality is one of his virtues, and more than most things wins his heart. Stories are told of his sacrificing his life for his guest, and equally of his plots to take that guest's life so soon as the latter is outside his lands, or has passed beyond the shelter of his roof. Not a few of his feuds are about women, yet he is credited with small regard for the sanctity of marriage rights. "Frequent cases," writes Mackeson, "occur of an Afridi in good circumstances marrying first a good-looking girl, but as times get harder exchanging her for one of fewer personal attractions and so much cash." Nothing but blood can wash out an insinuation about his honour, but his "women are willingly offered to the embraces of those who can afford to pay for the indulgence."

Eminently a "professing" Muhammadan, and strict observer of the precepts of the Korân, he has really little religion of any sort, and has small reverence even for the Mullahs. "As to the Orakzais," says the Khattak poet Khushhâl—

They are altogether from orthodoxy astray.
No call of Mu'azzin is to be heard in Tirah,
And the Afridis, than those erring ones more heretical still,
Neither say prayers over the dead, nor Mullahs have they,
Nor alms, nor offerings, nor the fear of God in their hearts."

The confiding priests who ventured into Afridi land fared so badly it was never popular with the Muhammadan clergy, and is somewhat a dangerous place still. Among unfaithful Pathâns, the "faithlessness" of an Afridi is notorious. Nothing is perhaps so dear to a fanatical Pathân as a plentiful supply of ziyâdrats, or sacred shrines to martyrs and saints; a heap of stones raised over a ghâzi who has murdered an English kâfir will serve the Pathân purpose equally as well as a Westminster Abbey or a City Temple. But Afridi land is strangely deficient in this respect. At one time, according to Bellew, there was not such a thing as a ziyârat in the whole country; and he tells a good story of the way the Afridi managed to remedy this. Through very shame the tribes had been driven by their more orthodox neighbours to entice a zealous Mullah from Peshawur to come and minister to them. Once installed, the priest naturally wanted some place to set up his altar—his *Beth-el*¹—dilating on the necessity for the establishment of ziyâdrats, and the advantages to be derived from the contributions and offerings pilgrims would bring who came to worship. This was enough for the Afridi, avaricious at any time, here was a fresh prospect of gain opened out. What was easier than to have a ziyârat; and who more suitable as a martyr for the faith than the venerable priest? So the Mullah was forthwith sacrificed, and the first ziyârat in Tirah was raised over his remains.

On another occasion a Mullah was caught copying the Korân. "You tell us these books come from God, and here you are making them yourself. It is not good for a Mullah to tell lies," so the indignant Afridis made another ziyârat for him.

As in morals and religion, their politics and pleasures are hardly less anomalous. The most democratic and disunited people among themselves, uncontrolled, and often uncontrollable even by their own chiefs, all the clans have uniformly joined in hostility to us whenever opportunity offered; still more so to everything connected with Kâbul, whose Amirs, instead of levying tribute, have always had to pay toll. In punishing one contumacious tribe, an expedition has invariably had to consider the possibility of combined action by all, should retribution be pushed too far. Their extra-tribal feuds are almost as uncommon as their internal ones are innumerable. That is, the Afridis do not care to waste their energies in fighting with their neighbours, but reserve the luxury for home consumption. Among themselves, feuds occupy a great part of their lives, possibly for the same reason that an Irishman at a fair, or an English navvy on Saturday night, is not really happy until he has broken a head, or given or received a black eye: so a feud to an Afridi is the one pleasure that makes life tolerable. It has been described, as to him the salt of life. He does not need the plea of difference between Gâr and Sâmil, Sunni and Sayud. It may be about Zan, Zar, or Zamin,—woman, money, or land, or water,—but, like Sir Lucius O'Trigger, any excuse will serve to begin; and, once begun, it is never spoiled by explanation, interrupted save by pressing business, nor terminated as long as any male representative remains on either side. Just as the Englishman, who, when he finds time hanging heavily, is credited with proposing to go and shoot something, the Afridi's one idea of sport is to shoot some one. Having no business in hand, he will take up his position, rifle in hand, and wait patiently behind a rock for hours, till he can put a bullet through a neighbour; and the patience with which he will wait with a bead drawn on the spot that neighbour must pass, would, if it were not murderous, be almost meritorious. Not to mention the disputes between clans it is common to find one half a village, or one half a family, carrying on a skirmish with the other half, taking advantage of any shelter or any artifice; keeping up a guerilla warfare until several casualties have occurred on either side, their ammunition is exhausted, harvest operations, or a marriage between the factions necessitates a truce. We call this "cold-blooded, treacherous murder"; the Afridis considers it superior to pigeon shooting or fox-hunting. The women, who are in every sense the real hewers of wood and drawers of water, are of course too much occupied—in the fields, no-less than at the hearths—to take any prominent part in the quarrels; but they are deadly shots with stones, and can make excellent defence at a pinch. Whether, in addition to other objections, the Afridi looks upon us, with our judicial and criminal regulations, as likely to spoil sport; or whether, as is more probable, our frontier procedure is altogether too gentle and wanting in savour for him: in his own mountains he has certainly been uniformly hostile to us, and not slow to take advantage of opportunity to show it. The little we know about him or his country has been information gained at the point of the bayonet; and, again to quote Macgregor “though we have been intimately connected with the tribes for so many years, no Englishman has entered Afridi land as a friend,” Per contra, he has uniformly shown himself most ready to enlist in our army. It is estimated that not less than 3,000 to 4,000 Afridis are now serving in our army or those of native chiefs; and, considering the short period of service, a very considerable proportion of their total fighting strength must have passed through the ranks. Moreover, the Afridi has gained a greater reputation for fidelity as a soldier than in any other way. It is, it may be argued,—considering his normal relations with his own kith and kin,—not saying much that he should cheerfully fight with us against them: and he would no doubt be quite ready to help us to conquer his native country. But in many campaigns he has shown all the qualities of a good soldier—perhaps a little more ready to plunder than to fight, and maybe a trifle home-sick in the hot weather: but a very different man from the “savage” whose safe-conduct would hardly run in his own hills, and who has not got the honour possessed by a Waziri robber.

¹ "The place of God."

Antithesis applies not merely to the Afridis themselves, but in a measure to their country. Strong as are the natural positions they hold among the spurs and defiles of the Sufed Koh and the bare rugged inhospitable ranges of the Khaiber; difficult of approach the passes, which might have to be forced, and unanimous as the clans may be to defend them at the signal of a common danger, the people are so dependent on the plains, their position—secure though it may sound—is really their weakest point, and makes it easy to shut them up in their own hills. Peshawur, the great field for their plundering operations, is also the market for their produce and the source of supply for their many domestic wants. Exclusion from Peshawur is to many clans a severe form of punishment; and an effectual blockade that will cut them off from the outer world, would probably bring them to terms sooner than an expedition.

It is unnecessary to discuss the origin of the Afridis. Bellew identifies both the name and the position with one of the peoples referred to by Herodotus, and thinks they and their allies occupied a much greater extent of country than at present, but were pressed up into the hills in the general struggle for territory. They come admittedly of a mixed stock, and though what has just been said of them applies ethnologically to the whole, they are divided into several distinct communities. Broadly speaking, of the eight chief clans, or Khels, into which they are divided, six are usually spoken of as Khaiber Afridis. The Aka Khels have no connection with these, and are entirely south of the Bâra river, in the Peshawur Valley; while the Adam Khels, the most numerous of any clan are again distinct, inhabiting the hills between Peshawur and Kohât, the great wedge of country driven into our border almost up to the Indus, and across which lies the road between two important frontier cantonments.

This, the Kohât pass, has not of course either the military or political importance of the Khaiber, but it is of considerable strategic value. From Kohât to Peshawur by this pass, is thirty-seven miles, of which ten only are in independent country. By Khushalgarh, where the Indus is still unbridged, to Peshawur by railway, is 200 miles, by road suitable for marching with all arms, 150 miles. Two clans of the Adam Khels are the keepers of the pass, and however good may be the arrangements for keeping it open, there is no disputing the fact that the whole arrangements, in regard to a most important section of our main frontier line of communications is in the hands of a lawless and uncertain tribe, who have in the past, and may at any time in the future, give infinite trouble; who, if they could not absolutely close it against us, could occupy the attention of a large force, at a critical time, when it is possible such a force could be ill spared. Further, although we pay a considerable subsidy every year, we are even now not allowed to make a road, or to remove the boulders that obstruct the path. Here and there a cultivator runs a plough across, and a great rock that blocks the way at one point, is a standing joke. The Afridi chuckles and swaggers about the lakh of rupees the Government would give to have it moved. The whole history of our proceedings in regard to this pass is a striking instance of the unfortunate infirmity of purpose, that, under the guise of tender feeling for the proud spirit of independence, accepts any excuse for avoiding decisive measures. The pass might be compared to the "direful spring" of innumerable woes, not only to our frontier troops, but still more to the Afridis themselves—the cause of most of our complications with the Adam Khels. From the expedition in 1850 against the Gallais, to the occupation of the Jowâki country in 1877-78,—which alone was the cause of much more suffering to them than absolute annexation could have been—there is a long record of troubles arising out of it. Over and over again the question of a road, to be made practicable for wheeled traffic has been taken up only to be dropped again. In 1878, it formed one of the terms laid down by Lord Lytton at the commencement of operations, and could have been carried out while we occupied the country, but was put aside to avoid "breaking the spirit of the tribe;" who, by the way, had just requested their losses during the expedition should be taken into account, in adjusting the fine to be levied. At present the total amount paid in the shape of pass allowances to the Adam Khels and a few of the Orakzais amounts to some Rs. 12,000 a year; an insignificant sum, but perhaps a fair guarantee, in the absence of any better offer, for the good conduct of a poor clan. There were rumours of their intentions to close it during the last Afghân war, and again, in 1883, on the occasion of the enhancement of the salt tax, but these came to nothing; and it has never since been closed, except by ourselves to settle some local tribal dispute, or it has been impassable from bad weather. But, in spite of Afridi promises to do something to improve it, the whole length, through their lands remains in a state of nature. They will do nothing themselves nor permit us to divert the track out of the bed of the nullah, where for miles it is impossible for anything on wheels. Nor has any real attempt been made to coerce them. All negotiations attempted by the local officers have come to nought, because the tribesmen well know there is only weakness and vacillation at the back; while every failure only tends to make matters worse. The Afridis affect to believe that the Government cannot, or dare not interfere with them, and though they pocket the subsidy, will do nothing whatever for it.

It may be unhesitatingly admitted there is no inducement, from a financial point of view, for us to occupy any part of the Afridi country; but there are other considerations that seem to make it very undesirable to leave such a position, in the middle of our territory, almost on the banks of the Indus, and within striking distance of Peshawur and Kohât, unoccupied. There may perhaps be a difference of opinion as to the actual occupation of territory, but there is no doubt about the need for the road, and that we should be contented with the state of things on this part of our Border is certainly not a subject for congratulation.

CHAPTER XXII.

AN AFRIDI FEUD.

A LITTLE more than a mile to the left of the fort of Jamrûd, before entering the Khaiber, is an insignificant cluster of detached towers and buildings, known as the village of Jam, belonging to the Akakhel Afridis. Rûd is simply the Pashtu for river, and here the stony and generally dry bed of this one forms the Khaiber defile. The village is by the river; there is a tank with no water, but a pavilion in it, enjoying a sort of tradition, that Jamshid, the famous wine-bibbing Persian king, used to sit there—and during a reign of 700 years, which Firdausi credits him with, he certainly might have found plenty of time—for quaffing his cup of Zahar-i-khush, or the “bewitching poison.” And there is a little streamlet that waters the village lands, from which the fort is permitted to take its share of a very scanty supply. Otherwise there is nothing noticeable about it. The surroundings are dreary in the extreme, and the bare rocks and stones look as if they could heat up to a temperature that would have made the Inferno seem chilly, and, if the people had anything worth fighting for, it might be a share in that stream, which indeed seems to be very much the opinion of the residents of Jam. If it had occurred to any member of the Viceroy’s staff, dashing past on a recent visit, to stop and visit Jam, he would probably have had an Afridi guard of Jezailechis told off to go with him, who would have scattered about ahead, and on either side, looking carefully behind walls and round corners, as though they expected to flush a brother lying perdu with a rifle, and it behoved them to do their best in the interests of sport. He would have been perfectly safe, however, for the residents of Jam were just then at peace, and in any case would have had no quarrel with him. But he might have carried back some curious particulars regarding the domestic life of village communities thereabouts; and though they perhaps might not have provided an exactly suitable commentary on Lord Dufferin's congratulatory address to the chiefs, regarding the peace and prosperity prevailing on the frontier, they would have furnished him with an excellent instance of a characteristic Afridi feud.

It began long ago—so long ago, no one could quite remember how it was started, but all agreed it had lasted generations; and somehow the water-course always came in. This, a little channel about eighteen inches wide and half as deep, ran meandering all through Jam, or rather through the three scattered hamlets that constituted the village. Four or five hundred yards apart they might be called north, south, and east divisions of Jam, and their chronic condition be said to be that of open war on one another, varied by an occasional truce to enable the ordinary business of life to be carried on. About three years ago the northern had killed a man of the southern division, and the eastern had killed a northerner so that if south and east could only arrange a settlement matters were fairly even. But then came the question of improving the channel to supply the fort, and the division of the remaining water upset everything again. All three divisions found it necessary to throw up earthworks, so as to approach the stream and obtain water under cover. Amir Khân, a pensioned Subadâr of a native regiment, and a man of light and leading in North Jam, constructed a regular shelter trench—sangar—and swore he would have the life of Khaista Khân, the chief person in South Jam, and every morning sat down with his rifle and waited for a chance. He succeeded in shooting two Southerners, and after many days of patient waiting, he caught Khaista Khân in an unguarded moment and broke his thigh with a long shot. The latter now hobbles round on crutches, and, if the member of the staff understood Pushtu, Khaista would have been happy to explain the circumstances in detail, more especially what happened next. This was merely that Khaista's party, with the assistance of Akbar Khân, a prominent citizen of East Jam, went one dark night and dug a trench outflanking Amir Khân's,—who had unaccountably neglected to protect himself by a traverse,—and then waited for him. In the grey dawn Amir Khân took his pipe and his rifle, and sat down in his trench to watch for any Southerner rash enough to expose himself for an early drink. Hardly had he lit his pipe and adjusted the sights on his neighbour's wall, when—"ping, ping"—he was bowled over by a couple of Snider bullets, and, as Khaista Khân remarked, went where he could not take his rifle. After this triumph there was a lull; it was, moreover, necessary to commence the season's ploughing operations—and the Aka Khels are not the people to allow pleasure to interfere with business. A truce was declared for six months, which, at the time of His Excellency's Peshawur visit, had about two months to run; though preparations for the renewal of hostilities were by no means being overlooked. Amin Khân, the brother of the unlucky Subadâr, boasted of having two field-pieces of long range up in Tirah, which were to be brought down, and from the tower of North Jam to deal destruction to the perfidious Khaista; while the latter was reputed to have a "cannon of sorts" already in position in his court-yard: and all three divisions possess many excellent shots, not a few trained in British service, and have well loopholed walls.

This, however, may be said to be almost a family affair, and it must not be supposed that similar amenities are not extended to other villages. A few miles on the opposite side of the road from Jamrûd Fort towards the Khaiber is a village of the Kuki Khel Afridis, that might be called after its owner Rahimdil Khân, with which Jam in general, and North Jam in particular, has established a very pretty quarrel. The last phase of this began about a woman. A Jam lady was robbed of her jewels by, it was reported, a man of Rahimdil's village. Thereupon her friends took her there, and said, your people have stolen our woman's jewels—you must take her also, she is no use to us without them; and, in spite of disclaimers, left her. The Rahimdil folk did not want her either, so took her back next night and left her outside Jam. The following night Jam returned the compliment, and so on—the unfortunate woman spending alternate nights outside each village, until she was made away with by one side or the other. Now both professed extreme indignation, because, though to kill a few men may be a desirable thing to do, it is almost discreditable to an Afridi to kill a woman—a reflection on his character that justifies anything; amply sufficient to justify a Jam man killing a Rahimdil one, and a Rahimdil man doing the same for a Jam. Once fairly started, it was evident a big thing might be made of it, big enough to induce Rahimdil Khân¹ himself—a native officer of high rank, highly honoured and twice decorated in the British service, who had been in London and Paris and seen much of the world—to take six months leave and go down to the barren desolate hills of his native village, and see that the whole thing was put on a proper footing. He apparently still retained some of the salt of his youth, and, in spite of all temptations to serve with other nations, considered there was no place like home, an Afridi home, for a really good feud.

¹ The suppression of Rahimdil's real name is the only departure from literal fact in this account.

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE KHAIBER AND THE KHAIBERIS.

THE best known and most famous road from India to Kâbul—the Khaiber—has been more than any intimately associated with former invasions of India from Afghânistân. With expeditions, past and present, Mughal or English, to that country—though to our troops probably most associated with heat, cholera, fever, and flies, and consequently more detested, by both British and Native, than any other bit of trans-border country. Has for centuries been a trade highway from the markets of Central Asia, Bukhâra, and Kâbul, and still, in spite of Amirs and transit dues, sees strings of camels starting almost daily for Khorasân, Persia, Turkistân, and even Russia itself. Is the route about which engineers have reported, specialists have written the most excellent confidential memorandums, and a good many others, not specialists, are responsible for a great deal that is far from excellent—and it may perhaps be considered too familiar to justify any lengthened notice. More particularly as the specialists are always, in a strictly confidential way, already so much better informed : while to some of the “others” nothing could probably be more distasteful than any accurate information that does not fit in with their own particular theory. Nevertheless, the notions on which certain of these theories are built—especially for the home market—are probably based on delusions as many and as startling as about most things Indian. Not merely among certain excursionists,—who barely realize the difference between Jamrud and Jagdalak; whose idea of a scientific frontier is associated with a defensive line of bricks and mortar, like the Great Wall of China, and who, having rushed out to 'Ali Musjid or Lundi Khâna and failed to find it, return feeling qualified to expose one more Tory fraud—but even among those better informed, the students of large scale maps, but who still associate the “dreadful Khaiber” with the disasters of 1842 and many of our misfortunes ever since. Men to whom all the tribes for over 200 miles are Khaiberis; who are thoroughly satisfied that success is only to the nation, as to the man, who knows how to wait; and whose doubts probably do not extend beyond the question of letting the Russian Army fill the Pass, and then stopping both ends, or—like Macaulay's Romans, who kept the bridge in the brave days of old—of taking up a position at the mouth, and disposing of them in detail as they come out.

It may, perhaps, be doubted if the advocates of this Fabian policy fully realize that there are three parallel routes between Kâbul and Peshawur perfectly practicable, and all protected on their southern flank by the Safed Koh Range: the first by the Khurd Kâbul Pass, the Tezin Valley, Pesh Bolak, and the Bazâr Valley; the second by Butkhak, the Lataband Pass, Jagdalak, Gandamak, Jelâlâbâd, Dhaka, and the Khaiber, both debouching near Jamrud; the third by the Lataband, Lughmân, Jelâlâbâd, Dhaka, the Shilmân Valley, and the Tartara Hill debouching by Shahgai—which latter can be varied again from the Shilmân Valley by crossing the Kâbul River at the Shamilo ferry and debouching by Fort Michni, and probably by other roads through the Mohmand Hills, which, though sufficiently steep and rugged, are by no means impassable. That when Nâdir Shâh found the Pass closed against him by Afridis and Shinwâris, the Orakzais led him by a road through Tirah. That it is quite possible to advance on Jelâlâbâd by the Kunar route from Chitrâl, instead of from Kâbul at all, while, there are several well-known ways of reaching Chitrâl, both from the north and south; and, moreover, there are at least a couple of routes from Badâkhshân, through Kâfiristân, by which it is possible to operate on the north flank. To assume, therefore, that, in the event of troubles arising, it will be safe to sit down at Peshawur, and "wait till the clouds roll by," can only be compared to the method of the ostrich, who imagines he is safe when he has hid his head in the sand. It would be obviously a mistake to be found waiting in the wrong place.

The route through the actual Khaiber defile has been compared to a passage between two combs placed with their teeth pointing inwards—the teeth, which correspond to the spurs of the ranges on either side, being prevented from quite meeting by two insignificant streams flowing, respectively, towards Kâbul and Peshawur, the shingly beds of which constitute the only possible road. Assuming the combs to be old and broken ones, the comparison will do very well; according as the teeth are sound and approach each other, is the width of the defile, the intervals between them representing the drainage from the hills north and south, while here and there a larger gap forms a small glen in which may be found a village, or a practicable road into the Afridi or Mullagori country. In other places these spurs are so steep and precipitous, as to be impracticable from the Pass on one side or the other, occasionally on both. Thus at Kadam, the real gate—some three miles from Jamrud—the hills begin to close in, and the Pass is only some 450 feet wide; a little further and it narrows to 250 feet. Then a few teeth have been knocked out; but approaching the spring and mosque of 'Ali, —the "Lion of God,"—it has diminished to forty feet, with slaty perpendicular cliffs 1,300 feet high on either side, and a fort, called after the mosque below, stands on an isolated hill commanding the road. Another six or seven miles and the Latabeg Valley has opened to a mile and a half wide, only to close a little beyond, to less than ten feet between quite perpendicular walls of rock. Over the Landi Khâna Pass, called the Kotal,—probably the most difficult part of the road—it rises by a steep ascent between steep cliffs less than 150 feet apart, and down again till the valley of the Kâbul River is reached at Dhaka. Over thirty miles of comb that, in good hands, would be calculated to intercept most living things.

But the Khaiber defile is only one of the obstacles on this route. There are several more combs, though the teeth may be occasionally set further apart, that have between them a series of small plains—barren and stony ones generally, though even here there is more cultivation than might be supposed; and in halting places—named like Haft-Chahi, the “Seven Wells;” Hazarnao, the “Thousand Canals;” and many others named after springs and gardens—there is evidence that the people associate them with things pleasant. At Jelâlâbâd—ninety miles from Peshawur—the cross ranges of hills are, for a change, replaced by a well-watered fertile stretch of country, a score of miles long by a dozen wide, dotted with towers, villages, and trees; and where the Kâbul River—that has all along had to struggle through mere cracks—becomes a broad clear stream 100 yards wide. Thence the route lies through a thoroughly unattractive country again, over long stony ridges, across rocky river-beds, varied with an occasional fine valley like Fathâbad, or an oasis like Nimlah, to Gandamak, which, by way of comparison with what is beyond again, is a land flowing with milk and honey: for on by Jagdalak and the Lataband Pass or Tezin and the Khurd Kâbul, is a wild waste of bare hills, surrounded by still more lofty and forbidding mountains: the teeth become more closely set together; the road narrower; the stony ridges change to bleak heights from 7,000 to 8,000 feet high the river-beds, deep valleys, or narrow defiles, like the fatal Jagdalak, almost devoid of verdure, and into whose gloomy ravines the winter sun can hardly penetrate—these are the outworks that have to be negotiated before the gardens and orchards, the bazaars and forts of Kâbul, can be approached.

Any description of the Khaiber route—about 170 miles from our Peshawur frontier to Kâbul—naturally sounds formidable; and though it is admittedly difficult, too much should not be counted on this. The road was immensely improved by our Engineer officers during the operations in Afghânistân, and the feasibility of constructing a railway through to Kâbul was abundantly established. Such a line would not present the difficulties, or equal the cost of what has been accomplished in the direction of Kandahâr; and its importance is at least equally great. When it is taken into consideration what it cost us in the way of transport to keep the present line of communication intact, the 15,000 men that during the last war had to be detailed for the duty, the endless posts and forts and commissariat yards, and when it is fully realized what a foreign occupation of Kâbul would mean for India, the railway will probably be in a fair way to be accepted, as probably the most pressing of our present frontier requirements; and the question is of such vital importance as to demand some separate consideration. As an outer defence of the approach to India, there is no doubt that in the hands of scientific defenders the Khaiber could be made practically as unassailable as the Fortress of Gibraltar. But it is not in our hands, and until it is, its defence is by no means that simple business which is too often assumed.

Of the tribes who inhabit the country along this route—working back from Kâbul—the valleys and defiles about Tezin Jagdalak, and Gundamak, almost to Jelâlâbâd, are held by Ghilzais, the Bâbakar Khels, Jabbâr Khels, and others of the powerful Suliamân clan. Ever notorious highwaymen, they were specially distinguished for their unremitting attacks upon Sale's disorganized army and defenceless camp-followers during the retreat from Kâbul. They were the persistent opponents of Pollock's army of vengeance, the implacable foes of every invader; and yet, under good management, are undoubtedly capable of being converted into most useful allies. Jabbâr, the founder of the clan of that name,—a man of weight in his day, founder of many Ghilzai institutions,—lies buried in a miserably cold, bleak spot between Khurd-Kâbul and the Haft-Kotal, or "Seven Passes"—a place still the lurking-place of robbers and of wolves—a byword of evil report even among Kâbulis. Opposite Jelâlâbâd, and up the northern slope of the Sufed Koh, a broad strip of country is held by the Khugiânîs, a tribe closely related to the Jâgis and Turis on the other side of the range—the former at one time including both the latter, and, with a number of the Khostwâls, were not improbably originally Turks who came in with Chengiz and Timur, but by long separation formed into distinct tribes. The Khugiânîs are estimated as mustering 5,000 families, the men manly and warlike, always a thorn in the side of the Governors of Jelâlâbâd, but engaged mainly as tillers and shepherds, and seldom leaving their home; their rugged slopes, though under snow for three months of the year, yielding abundance of excellent fruits in due season. Two sections of one clan are credited with a feud which began about the merest trifle when Jehangir reigned at Delhi, cost a thousand lives, and was only put an end to by both parties submitting to the Kâbul ruler, whose subjects they are still.

East of them, the whole northern slope of the Sufed Koh is known as Nangrahâ, a word which several authorities would trace back to Nangnahâr, "nine canals,"—a pear-shaped country between the crest of the ridge and the Kâbul road, with its base near Jelâlâbâd and its stalk at Lundi Kotal, occupied by the Shinwâris, a powerful tribe of some 10,000 or 12,000 fighting-men; and if among a people who, like Cacus, would have stolen the cattle from Hercules, there can be said to be any degree, their habits are possibly not quite as predatory as their neighbours. Nominally, they also profess to be tillers, and they cultivate a certain amount of rice and fruits, especially figs and almonds, and they export silk and wool, but their most congenial occupation was, and is, pillage. They attacked our forces at Pesh Bolâk, in 1841; they carried off a good share of plunder after the disaster of 1842, for which they were subsequently punished by a force under Monteith; and during our later campaign in Afghânistân, they caused considerable annoyance along our line of communications, necessitating several punitive expeditions. They have little more regard for the property of the present Amir, unless it be sufficiently safe-guarded. Of the four chief clans, the worst are the Sangu Khels, short, thick-set men of a proverbially fierce and headlong courage, who have always enjoyed the most sinister reputation, and are said to be nearly as good with the stones of their native hills as with the bullets of more lethal weapons. At the other end, the Alisherzais, who inhabit the Loargai valley round about Lundi-Kotal, generally known as the Loargai Shinwâris, are largely engaged in the carrying-trade between Peshawur and Kâbul, are exceedingly well-behaved and give no trouble whatever.

To the north, down the Kâbul River from Jellâlâbâd, including a strip of land along the right bank, the river itself, until it reaches our border, and the network of hills and valleys east of Lâlpura, are all within the lands of the various clans of Mohmands, a great and important tribe to be noticed anon. Occupying a little corner, between the Kâbul River and Jamrûd or near it, and between the Shilmân Valley on the west and our Border on the east, are the Mullagoris. Put down as original settlers from the Mohmands, whose vassals they still practically are, they are not now classed as either fish, flesh, or good red herring. Neither Mohmands, Afridis, nor Shinwâris will acknowledge them, and the latter say they are descended from an illegitimate child found in a graveyard, who grew up to know something, and originated the name. Besides being despised by the Shinwâris, they have a chronic feud with the Afridis, and were it not for a little backing from the Mohmands would soon get the worst of it. The whole tribe is excessively poor; nominally they sell ropes, mats, and sandals made out of the dwarf palm: but this mainly is an excuse for opportunities of robbing the Peshawur cantonments. Numerically they are utterly insignificant, barely mustering 400 fighting men; but their principal merit is in possessing the Tâtâra Mountain, nearly 7,000 feet high, which represents a possible sanitarium for Peshawur of much value, and is strategically a position of importance, as it would command the approaches to the Khaiber, Tâtâra, and Abkhâna routes; form a useful point for checking Lâlpura and the Shinwâris; and give a good hold on the Khuki Khel Afridis and the Mullagoris themselves, who ought in some way, best known to political officers, to be brought as soon as possible to see the advantage of selling mats to a cantonment established there.

Almost the whole of the Khaiber defile is in the hands of the half-dozen clans of Afridis already referred to, collectively spoken of as the Khaiber Afridis; the most influential being probably the Zakha Khels,—though the Kukis, Malikdin, and Qumba Khels are also powerful clans, composed of fine men, well armed, in many cases with English or Kabul-made rifles,—who have furnished us with many good soldiers. In our earlier Afghân campaigns, they fully maintained their ancient fame as bold and faithless robbers; but from the time the Punjâb was annexed, up to the second Afghân war their behaviour has always been, for Afridis, fairly good. They have never ceased from marauding excursions whenever opportunity offered, and though now and then minor expeditions have had to be undertaken against one clan or the other, we have never had against us any formidable tribal combination, or regular stand-up fight, as against Mohmands or Yusafzais—a circumstance doubtless partly due to the ultra-democratic nature of the Afridi constitution, and partly to so many of them being dependent on Peshawur in winter. In 1878 some of the clans took sides with us, and others played into the hands of the Amir, necessitating a couple of expeditions into the Bazâr Valley, which is one of the alternative routes referred to, but where the clansmen are least dependent on Peshawur.

Under the treaty of Gandamak, the control of the Khaiber and Michni Passes, with all relations with the connected tribes, were retained by the British Government, and on the retirement of our troops arrangements were proposed; a complete jirgah of all the Khaiber tribes called at Peshawur, and in February, 1881, they affixed their seals to an agreement under which their independence was recognized, provided they maintained exclusive political relations with us. The tribes were to furnish a corps of *Jezailchis*¹ for the protection of the Pass, to be paid by our Government under whose political officers they would be. The tribes to abstain from all raids on British territory, and to undertake to be jointly responsible for maintaining order in the Khaiber in consideration of certain subsidies to be paid by Government, which, per contra was to take all tolls on caravans using the Pass. The subsidies are divided proportionately among the six Afridi clans, and a very small sum is also given to the Loargai Shinwâries. The whole, with some trifling allowance to head men, only amounts to between 80,000 and 90,000 rupees a year, and the tolls realized are fully three-fourths of this; so that, as far as it goes, the arrangement is an economical and an excellent one. There have been some trifling difficulties raised occasionally by the more turbulent spirits—a body of Zakha Khels attempting on one occasion to raid a caravan, but they were promptly stopped by the Jezailchis and several of their number shot down; and individual Border outlaws like the notorious Kamal Khân, have been guilty of local outrages but altogether the tribes have loyally kept to their bond. On fixed days an escort takes charge of travellers and caravans at Jamrûd, and hands them over to the Amir's representatives at Lundi Khâna, receiving in return the charge of convoys for Peshawur; and the political officer, to whose tact not a little of the success is due, is able to report the Khaiber now as safe as the Grand Trunk Road.

A Khaiber Pass Afridi.

¹ Irregular riflemen.

Beyond Lundi Khâna the traders may be secured against highway robbery; but there are complaints that even the Shinwâris and Ghilzais were less exacting than the Amir's dues, by which, and the high duties imposed by Russia on exports to Bukhâra and Samrkand, the trade is much hampered—so much so, that it is said to be cheaper to send goods to Bombay and Moscow than by the Khaiber and the Hindu Kush. This may not be literally true, and it was even hoped that after Abdur Rahmân had established himself as a strong ruler, trade would revive; after the war of 1878-80 such, undoubtedly, was the case, but any expansion was summarily checked, and the trade has since been falling off. Between 1887 and 1889 the total exports and imports of the Western Border fell from an annual value of 121 lakhs of rupees to 95 lakhs, any increase due to the extension of railways in the Kandahâr direction being more than covered by the diminished trade through the Khaiber. Nor is this to be wondered at; from the Khaiber to Kâbul the Amir's dues are Rs. 21 per camel load of merchandise, with further dues at various points, if the journey is continued on to the Oxus. By the Ghazni route a camel load of piece-goods is mulct of Rs. 26 and one piece out of every forty. The Border trader may therefore say with Maréchal Villars—"Defend me from my friends, I can account for my enemies myself."

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE KÂBUL POSITION.

WITHOUT going deeply into vexed strategical questions, it is perhaps not too much to say that if ever an invasion of India is attempted from the north-west, one of the first objects of each contending army will be the possession of Kâbul. The great triangle comprised in the Panjsher, Ghorband, and Paghmân Valleys, with the command of some of the most important passes over the Hindu Kush towards Turkistân and the Oxus, over the Koh-i-Bâba to Bamian and Balkh, or by the Unai Pass to the Helmand and Girishk, forms probably the strongest natural position in the whole of Afghânistân. The city itself is the historical capital of the country, and there is a well-known proverb that he who holds Kâbul holds Afghânistân. Similarly the Khaiber is equally the historic route for many of the most successful advances on India. Whatever, therefore, may be the fate of Kâbul in the earlier phases of the great campaign of the future—

“When the big guns speak to the Khaiber peak,”

it will undoubtedly form, of all the cities now ruled by Abdur Rahmân, the most important factor for offence or defence: and it will carry with it a proportionately valuable prestige.

Its importance has, of course, long ago been fully recognised by Russia, and for some time, at any rate since the Penjdeh affair, the deduction has been tolerably obvious, that, in the event of any movement against Afghânistân or India, Russia's objective is more likely to be Kâbul than Kandahâr. Assuming that Russia has already by railway extension linked her garrisons in the Caucasus and Central Asia proper, and can concentrate troops pretty well anywhere between Kizil-Arvat and Samrkand, and that a fairly good line will be completed to Sarakhs, the latter place is still upwards of 200 miles from Herât. Herât is again 370 miles from Kandahâr, itself distant 70 more from our outpost at Chaman, or 640 in all. The route along this line is through a country held by certain of the most warlike and independent of the Afghân tribes; it has but scanty supplies, and it lies open to flank attacks by way of Persia, Bilochistân, and Kâbul. Any force advancing by it must also count upon meeting a powerful army in an almost impregnable position at the end of it. On the other hand, from their base at Jam, near Samrkand, to Kilif on the Oxus, is 230 miles through the Bukhâra khanates, quasi-independent, but for the purposes of an advance practically Russian. From Kilif as a base, viâ Mazâr-i-Sharif and either Walishân or Bajgah, and the Unai Pass, to Kâbul is 460 miles, while Kâbul is only 170 miles from Peshawur and India. In this connection it must be noted that a survey for a line of railway from Samrkand to Kilif has been ordered, and that the rails are being also laid from Charjui to Kerki along the left bank of the Oxus. An advance in this direction would, consequently, be from excellent bases in the Oxus valley through a country with a fair capacity for food-supply, which could be largely supplemented from the fertile valleys of the Zerâfshân and Ferghâna. Transport could be drawn from Bukhâra, Khokand, and the trans-Oxus country generally; while, Mazâr-i-Sharif once cleared by a successful engagement, there would be no risk whatever of a flank attack—for a rapid movement upon Herât would naturally be coincident with the invasion of Afghân-Turkistân. The physical difficulties on the Kâbul route would undoubtedly be greater than those on the Kandahâr side; but the distance from the Russian base would be much less, and the Afghân resistance to her arms, would have to be measured mainly by the assistance that could be given from India in good time.

It is undoubtedly true that the Kâbul position could not be taken by any possible coup de main. Even with our admittedly imperfect system of intelligence regarding Russian movements on the Afghân border, no important advance in the direction of Kâbul could be made without due notice reaching us in time to enable assistance to be sent to the Amir. A request for that assistance might, however, and probably would be, delayed; and though the Afghân power of defence, combined with the enormous natural advantages offered by the Hindu Kush, would enable Abdur Rahmân to hold the northern passes for some time against any force Russia could hurriedly push forward, we should hardly be able to effectually assist him in maintaining his hold on Afghân-Turkistân and the Cis-Oxus territories unless the Khaiber communications had been very greatly improved.

But all this is supposing matters stand as they are. Should party faction, supineness, or more exhibitions of "masterly inactivity," result in a repetition of the many blunders of the past, and some fresh Penjdeh lead to a Russian occupation of Herât without a shot being fired by England in return, it is hard to say what new development might not succeed. Certainly the annexation of Balkh and Afghân-Turkistân would follow in the natural order of things. There is known to be a road, though at present a very indifferent one, along the valley of the Harirud to Daulatyâr and Chehl Burj, which latter place is only 268 miles from Kâbul. If this road were made practicable for all arms, and good communications established between Herât and Mazâr-i-Sharif, the long-coveted frontier of the Hindu Kush would be practically realised. Russia would by that time have her railway extensions southward from the main line well advanced, and she would be within striking distance of Kâbul. At this stage, though the need for an efficient system of railway communication between India and Kâbul would have become more imperative, it would be somewhat late to set about its commencement. Whether we had then to go as allies of Afghânistân or the reverse, we should be compelled to go and to hold Kabul at all risks. Its possession would mean the influence of 50,000 fighting men for or against us. It would mean more, for the occupation of Kâbul by the enemy would involve a loss of prestige that would affect us throughout India; we should have against us not merely the Afghâns—certain to ally themselves with the side that appeared successful—but the bulk of the fighting tribes between them and India, if not indeed many within our own border. Our power in that direction for offensive measures would be nil: we should only be able to act on the defensive, and to wait and see from which direction the next attack would be delivered.

To reverse the picture: the possibilities of the position for defence are exceptional. The resources of the country are naturally great; the valleys round Kâbul are capable of furnishing a large amount of excellent supplies, and so is the Jellâlâbâd district; and with a railway even to the latter place the whole of the best part of the northern Punjâb could be directly drawn upon for grass and fodder, men, material and supplies of every kind. It would in fact be much easier to maintain a couple of army corps, or 50,000 men in Kâbul, than half the number in Kandahâr. The importance of a line of railway through the Khaiber to Jellâlâbâd and eventually onward to Kâbul will hardly be disputed; how momentous its importance might become, is best realized by those who have most closely studied the position.

There is nothing either as regards the magnitude of the cost, or the engineering difficulties in construction, that need be considered as exceptionally formidable. There are at least two, if not three feasible routes through the hills to the west of Peshawur. (1) From Jamrud, to which point a railway was actually sanctioned and commenced, through the steep cliffs of the Khaiber proper, knocking out a few more of the rocky teeth here and there, and over or by partially tunnelling the Lundi Kotal or pass, to Lundi-Khâna. (2) Peshawur, by the plains to Shahgai, through the Mullagori country by Murdadân, the saddle at Kambayla, and skirting the Tatâra peak by Spol and the Jazeri pass; or from Yakubi following the Kâbul river to the Shulmân valley, whence either alternative would work through the Loargi plain to Lundi Khâna. The latter for part of the length would involve gradients of 1 in 50, and possibly occasional bits as steep as 1 in 33, with perhaps 3,000 to 4,000 yards of tunnelling, along a distance approximating forty miles from Peshawur. (3) A third, and possibly better alternative, turning the actual Khaiber pass altogether, would be from Fort Michni, our outpost north of Peshawur, following the Kâbul river all the way to Dhaka. The distance in this case would approximate to forty-five miles or less, and the difference of levels between Michni and Dhaka is known to be little more than 300 feet. The river no doubt occasionally runs in very narrow deep ravines, in places not more than sixty or eighty feet wide; the sides are generally steep, occasional places rejoicing in perpendicular spurs that would have to be negotiated by more or less of cutting. By thus following the Kâbul river the steep gradients needed to climb up and down the passes to the south would be avoided; on the other hand this route would be somewhat more liable to attack or interruptions by the Mohmands on the opposite bank, who are outside our present jurisdiction; while as already noticed, under the Gandamak treaty, the tribal arrangements of the Mullagori country and the Michni passes, are equally with the Khaiber, entirely in our hands, and the railway arrangements would involve no risk of political or tribal difficulties. So this, by no means the least important part of a railway to Kâbul, could be at once begun quite independently of any existing treaty arrangements with the Amir.

From Lundi-Khâna, or Dhaka, to Jellâlâbâd, and for some distance beyond, there are no serious physical obstructions to prevent a railway from being rapidly constructed, with the single exception of a short bit between Barikâb and 'Ali-Bughân, which would require more careful aligning and more time to construct. Beyond Jellâlâbâd the location of the line as far as Gandamak, would not be difficult. A formidable, but short cutting would be needed through the Daronta gorge, while a certain amount of rock cutting, though nothing insurmountable, by Katz-i-Aziz, would bring it up to the Adrak-Badrak Kotal, not very far from Jagdalak, or to within fifty miles of Kâbul. A three days' march, with what might be made a second Chaman in the fertile Jellâlâbâd valley as a base.

Further again, difficulties undoubtedly become more formidable, and it is a question if from Jellâlâbâd, a better alignment would not be by the Lughmân Valley, and again by the Kâbul river. There is every reason to believe that a perfectly practicable route could be obtained in this direction, which in former times was used for the movement of formidable armies, and is now only avoided by trading caravans on account of the want of proper escort.

There is no reason why such a railway to Kâbul should be exceptionally costly. For the greater part of its length the outlay would not exceed that on ordinary Indian or Russian frontier lines, and on even the most expensive lengths should not be nearly so great as similar ones on the Hurnai railway to Quetta. What difficulties there are, are mainly political. Would it be possible to obtain the Amir's consent, and having his support, to carry out the work without encountering the serious opposition of the tribesmen, is really the problem for solution.

Situated as Kâbul is, the centre of trade with a great part of

Central Asia, the majority of the people, the kâfila traders and the merchants at both ends of the Khaiber route, are fully alive to the railway advantages. There can be no doubt of its importance to the Indian traders, and to English trade with Central Asia via Afghânistân, now diminishing as fast as that of Russia is expanding. As far as the tribesmen are concerned, there is no reason why the benefits that have come home in so substantial a manner to the Bilochi, Marri, Kâkar, or Kandahâri between Sibi and Chaman should not in a short time be equally appreciated by the Afridi, Shinwâri, or Ghilzai between Jamrud and the Koh-i-Damâh. All are particularly fond of rupees, and would soon discover that it was better to earn these by some form of labour in connection with the railway than by risking their heads for insignificant loot from the Amir's kâfilas. The Amir, though generally jealous to the degree of anything savouring of interference with his kingdom, is a shrewd man and not blind to his own interests, political and commercial. So far as his light goes, though his short-sighted policy in the matter of prohibitive customs duties—is even more than Russian competition—fast killing such trade with India remains. A railway to Kâbul would be as much to his benefit as ours: it would immensely strengthen his position against any Russian encroachment and his hold on the tribes most difficult to manage. Last year,¹ while the troubles with Ishâk Khân were still unsettled, the suggestion that an Indian division should be sent to Jellâlâbâd was the Amir's own: it is to India that he evidently looks for assistance against all his enemies. Although the motto of the Indian Government in dealing with him is necessarily festinante, there is no reason why the strongest pressure should not be brought to bear upon him to lower his transit duties, and by affording more facilities for communication to develop a great extended trade. By failing to do this his own subjects are equal sufferers, while a railway would, in the form of greatly increased trade, bring to his treasury not only considerable additional receipts, and enable him to develop many of the mechanical industries for which he has a taste; but in the event of certain by no means improbable contingencies, the successful defence of his Cis-Oxus provinces might to a great extent depend on his capital being linked in with the railway system of India. If he objects to intrusion into his territories he may be encouraged to make the line himself beyond the Khaiber, and be left to enjoy the pleasure of personal ownership when it is finished. It is quite possible that, with a little careful handling, he might be brought to recognise these advantages, or at any rate to accept them as a necessity of the situation. Meanwhile nothing should be permitted to delay the construction of the portion of the line either through, or turning the Khaiber, and in having ready a complete scheme for the remainder, which events might at any time compel us to carry out not merely without the Amir's consent, but in spite of his opposition.

¹ 1888.

CHAPTER XXV.

THE PESHAWUR VALLEY OF THE PAST.

The Buddhist Prince Siddhârtha, from Yusafzai.

HOWEVER interesting the attempt might be, it is, for the present purpose, unnecessary to go back in any detail to the ancient history of the Peshawur Valley. A valley colonized by the first Aryan patriarchs, the Gandhâra of the early Hindu, the Pushkalavati of the Vishnu Purâna; that boasted a populous city in Alexander's day, and under his successors became the centre of an important Græco-Bactrian kingdom. That figures in Sanskrit, Chinese, Greek, and Arabic literature; was described by Strabo, Ptolemy, and Arrian in the first and second centuries; whose Buddhist Stupas were famous when the valley was visited by Fa-Hian in the fifth, Sung-yun in the sixth, and Hwen-thsang in the seventh; was the subject of long notices by the Arab geographers, Masaudi, and Abu Rihan in the tenth and eleventh; and by the Mughal Bârber in the sixteenth. Where the Chandrâvans, or Lunar race of tradition were succeeded—by how many intermediate stages we do not know—by the people who held it against Alexander, and whom he calls Asaceni; where, on the rocks, the great Buddhist king Asoka cut his edicts over 2,000 years ago, in mystic characters, a puzzle to Hindu, Muhammadan, and Sikh, not altogether deciphered yet. And where since then successive dynasties have flourished, through a series of Brahmins like Pushpamitra, Græco-Bactrians like Eucratides or Menander, Scythians like Kadphises or Kanerki, Buddhists again, and again Hindus, Muhammadans, Sikhs, down to the present excellent one of the British Deputy Commissioners.

But to arrive at any clear idea of the relations of the tribes that are now located in the valley, or that wonderful semicircle of hills round it, some short notice of their past connection and how they got there seems desirable. The first appearance upon the scene of the Pathâns was towards the close of the seventh or beginning of the eighth century, then described as forcing a Hindu Râjah of Lahore to cede to them the Kobistân, or hills west of the Indus and south of the Kâbul River, in which localities they may probably represent a part of the original stock of Bangash, Orakzais, Afridis, and Shiuwâris already noticed. These, most likely aggressive Afghâns from Ghor, joined with Gakkars from the Salt Range, were to hold their lands conditionally on their guarding the frontier. The Peshawur Valley and hills beyond were then occupied with tribes affiliated with India. Those of Swât are credited with sending a contingent to the assistance of the Chittore

Rajputs early in the ninth century ; when Peshawur is bracketed with Lahore and Kangra under one Anunga, a chief of Delhi. But the invasions of the Ghaznavis, Subaktagin, and Mahmud, not merely proved a deathblow to the power of the Hindus in northern India ; they changed the whole aspect of affairs in the valley. After the final defeat of Jaipal at Naushera in 1001, and Anung Pal at Peshawur in 1008, Mahmud dealt out summary punishment to the tribes who had in any way assisted the enemy—possibly Pathân, but probably in few cases Muhammadan—insisted on their wholesale conversion to the faith of Islâm, and proceeded to harry the country generally. In his subsequent invasions he made Peshawur the place of arms for his army, which valley and surrounding hills consequently received his special attention in this respect. However civilized and populous it may have been before, his continuous invasions left it, as Bellew says, a deserted wilderness the haunt of the tiger and rhinoceros, only occasionally visited for the sake of pasture by the shepherd tribes accustomed to roam about the neighbouring countries. “By these it was gradually repopled and cultivated in scattered spots, till, in time, other tribes of cultivators came in and settled over the plain, much as they are at the present time. The country, however, has never properly recovered its former condition of prosperity. Wretched mud hovels stand on the ruins of former towns and cities, the buildings of which are still in many places traceable by the remains of massive stone walls.” Mahmud slipped his dogs of war in the eleventh century, and such was the effects of the “havoc” they created, that Bârber in the sixteenth recounts the pleasure taken by his followers in hunting the rhinoceros there.

One of the first of these tribes of the fresh settlers was the Dalazâk, doubtful Pathâns to start with, and who by intermarriage and adoption of many of the customs of the “unconverted,” speedily lost any national characteristics they may have had. To the Afghân of to-day they are little better than Kâfirs,¹ but while Ghaznavi gave place to Ghor, and Ghor to Mughal, the Dalazâks seem to have held possession of the entire Valley. Meanwhile two important Pathân divisions—the Khakhai and Ghoria Khel, so called from two brothers, whilom credited with settling at Kandahâr—had increased and multiplied, and the former, accompanied by the Usmân Khel and Mudammadzai tribes belonging to other divisions, sought fresh fields, and established themselves at Kâbul. When Timour invaded India in 1397, the Khakhai had acquired considerable importance, and became numerous enough to divide into clans called Yusafzais, Gigiânis, and Turkilânis. At Kâbul they waxed fat and kicked, and were even then notorious for their turbulence and feuds, and for a preference for their neighbour's cattle. First useful to Ulugh Beg, Timour's grandson, to establish himself as ruler at Kâbul in 1470, he eventually found them more than he could manage, so took the first opportunity to entrap and slay some seventy of their head-men, sparing the remainder on condition the whole tribe cleared out of Kâbul. They did so, and moved on first to Bâsâul, Jelâlâbâd, then called Adinapura, and Laghmân. Shortly after the Yusafzais, Muhammadzais, and Gigiânis advanced another stage, and came through by the Târtâra route to the Peshawur plain, and begged from the Dalazâks permission to occupy lands in the Doâba. Having thus gained a footing, they commenced their old habits of cattle-lifting, charging their Dalazâk neighbours with the same offence. Breaches of faith soon brought about a war; a great battle was fought on the Swât River, in which the Dalazâks were routed with great slaughter and many fled across the Indus, leaving the aggressors to divide the spoil. The Gigiânis took as their portion the fertile, well-wooded Doâba—the “land of two waters”—between the Kâbul and Swât Rivers; to the Muhammadzais, or Muhamandzais, was assigned Hastnagar, “the country of the eight cities," a strip about thirteen miles wide, west of the Swât River; and to the Yusafzais, and their great offshoot the Mandanrs, the remainder of the country north of the Kâbul River, an open plain or maira broken with ravines and studded with mounds that mark the habitations of bygone peoples. The Usmân Khels shortly after obtained a place in the hills about the Swât River; the Turkolânîs remaining partly in Laghmân, and partly effecting a settlement in Bâjaur, ousting a chief who, like the ruler of Swât, called himself Sultân. The descendants of all five divisions may be said to retain pretty much the positions their forbears then appropriated in this summary way.

¹ Infidels.

Not very long after, the Yusufzais extended their conquest to Swât. Advancing to the foot of the hills, they surprised the Swâtis by a ruse, and obtained possession of the lower valley. Towards the end of the fifteenth century they added Buneyr and Chamlah, and about the end of the sixteenth separated into two great divisions; the first known by the general name Yusafzai, and the second Mandanzai after Yusaf's nephew—the former finally locating themselves mainly in Dir, Swât, Buneyr, and the Upper Indus hills; the latter in the Yusafzai plain and the valleys between Buneyr and the Indus. Roughly speaking, and excepting one little corner, the whole country, both within and without the existing border, from the Swât River to the Indus, came into the possession of one tribe or other of the great Yusafzai family, and except among themselves, the name of the superior division still covers the whole. The aboriginal Swâtis, once a powerful nation, that Elphinstone thinks extended from the Jhelam to Jelâlâbâd, were forced eastwards over the Indus, where they took possession of the bit of country adjoining the Hazâra Valley, now occupied by their descendants. Those who remained were either reduced to servitude, or subsequently emigrated under the leadership of a famous saint, and the Swâti tribe have now no connection with the country or the inhabitants of the Swât Valley. The small corner above excepted, includes the southern slope of the Mâhâban Mountain in the south-east of the Peshawur Valley and a bit of Hazâra, and is the home of the Jaduns or Gaduns, a people quite distinct from the Yusafzais, who had a little, though somewhat doubtful, history to themselves.

By and by, the Ghoria Khels, comprising the divisions known as the Mohmands, Khalils, and Daudzais, followed their friends from Afghânistân, and took possession of Bâsâul, Jelâlâbad, and Laghmân; the Mohmands beginning to occupy the hills between Lâlpura and Peshawur, where they or their kinsmen are still. In 1504 Bârber acquired the sovereignty of Kâbul and Ghazni, and in the following year made an extensive frontier tour, coming by the Khaiber Pass to Peshawur, going along the whole Border, returning by the Sakhi Sarwar Pass and the Bori Valley to Ghazni. At this period the Pathân settlers are described as pretty well established in Laghmân, Kuner, Peshawur, Swât, and Bâjaur; though some of the original occupants still struggled for independence under their hereditary chiefs. During the next twenty-five years the Mughal Bârber undertook many forays—for most of them could not be called anything else—to punish the hill Pathâns, or to protect his own subjects, dispersing the men, carrying off the women and cattle; but, as a rule, the tribes were even then fully able to hold their own. Guided by the Dalazâks, he marched against Bâjaur, carried the fortress of the original Sultân by escalade, using the new matchlocks, “which greatly astonished the enemy”; the net result being to extend the power of the Tarklânis. Discretion, in the case of the “troublesome Yusafzais,” suggested diplomacy; he forbore an invasion, but added a Malik’s¹ daughter to his harem.

Both his sons—the restless Kamrân and the patient Hamâyun—figure in the history of the valley—the former as a fugitive with the Ghoria Khels at Pashut on the Kuner River; the latter as following him there, and hunting him from tribe to tribe, chastising those who sheltered him, but making no particular impression. In fact, no sooner had Hamâyûn gone, than, about 1554, the three tribes of Ghorîa Khel—the Daudzais, Khalils, and Mohmands—entered the plain of Peshawur, drove out the balance of the Dalazâks, and established themselves in their existing holdings—the Daudzais, from Michni eastwards between the Adizai branches of the Swât and the Budni stream, about as far as Akbarpura; the Khalils from Michni, southwards along the base of the Khaiber range to Peshawur and round east to Jalozi; and in the hills about Michni Fort, one clan of Mohmands established themselves, and another powerful colony across the Bâra River, among the intricate valleys and ravines of the extreme south-west corner right up to the Afridi Hills—a rich, well irrigated, and productive corner, but one that has probably become most famous in the criminal annals as a specially criminal district. The balance of the Dalazâks were finally driven across the Indus, and all that remains of the tribes now are one or two villages on the west, and a few more on the east in Hazâra.

¹ Tribal chiefs.

The south-east of Peshawur, from Naushera to the Indus, by Attock round the Akora Hills to Kohât, and the whole south and east of the Kohât district, is held by the Khattaks, one of the finest tribes on our whole frontier, but located almost entirely within, rather than across, the Border. Their original home was probably the northern slopes of the Sulaimâns, and they also moved gradually eastward about the thirteenth century, by Bannu and Kohât, until, about the close of the fifteenth, they had divided the most of the latter with the Bangash; later again, about the middle of the sixteenth; they appeared in the Peshawur Valley—the plain from Khairabad to Naushera being granted to them by Akbar for services rendered by Malik Akor, at that time chief of the whole tribe. They made further progress under Akbar's immediate successors, have encroached from time to time somewhat on their Mohmand, Khalil, and Mandanr neighbours, and under a less settled Government would probably soon extend still further into the valley. In the case of many of these tribes history not merely repeats itself, it becomes monotonous. The Khattaks, like the rest, increased, and have since divided into two divisions; the first making their head-quarters at Akora on the Kâbul River, the other at Teri in south-west Kohât.

Excluding the Khattaks, the settlement of the Ghoria Khels may be said to have practically completed the location of the tribes that fringe the Peshawur border. Though there have been minor changes, modifications, and developments, no subsequent immigration seems to have taken place. And, though during the last three centuries they figure in history more frequently than those along other parts of our Border, their position relative to the ruling powers within it has not changed very much. Their subjugation was determined on by Akbar, but his control was at best never more than partial. He lost one famous general—Bir Bal—who was killed by the Yusafzais, and his force cut up. Even distinguished leaders like Todar Mal and Raja Mân Sing had to content themselves by taking up positions in the valley and keeping the tribes out of it. Under succeeding Mughals they were still more independent, and after some years of struggle, Aurangzebe is found agreeing to terms that were all in favour of the Pathâns. The earlier Durrânîs brought them more under control, and, by inter-marriages, into occasional alliances; yet the hold of Kâbul has since been less than nominal. With the beginning of this century came the Sikhs, who under Runjeet Sing reduced the valley to subjection, and the surrounding hills to obedience. Where previous rulers employed whips, the Sikhs substituted scorpions. They employed not merely the “only remedy” the Pathân understands,—force,—but their force was brutal. When a resisting village or tribe fell into their hands, their measures were as severe, and their cruelty as indiscriminate, as the Russians are credited with dealing out to the unfortunate Turkomâns. There is probably no name more hated by the Pathân than Hari Sing, who lives in their memories as their most tyrannical oppressor, yet withal admired for his bravery and skill. His name is the bogie by which Pathân mothers frighten unruly children ; and old grey-beards are described as " loving to point out hills over which they were chased like sheep by the lion." But in spite of all the harrying, the fines, and the punishment, the tribes have maintained their own local institutions, their customs, their freedom, and their position in the hills ; and they have probably suffered far less from all the invasions put together, than from their own petty wars, and their own bitter and unceasing feuds.

The Great Renunciation—Buddhist Sculpture from Yusafzai

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE PESHAWUR PATHÂN OF THE PRESENT.

Peshawur Aftâba and Chilmchi.

THERE are in many ways, wide differences between the various tribes and divisions of Border Pathâns, even at present, located round the Peshawur Valley, and it is perhaps dangerous to attempt generalizations that cannot apply to all. Still, however much they may differ in detail, there is a decided family likeness; and before passing to notice rival houses, it may be worth while to consider a few leading characteristics, common to all these Eastern Capulets and Montagues. The manner in which the tribes established themselves round the valley has been examined ; from the time they did so, in spite of the troubles that have swept over them, they cannot be said to have been subject to any man. For some centuries at least they have acknowledged no law outside the custom of their tribe, and in the rugged fastnesses of the frontier ranges, have led a wild, free, active, albeit lawless, life, and acquired a spirit of independence rare in India, and not common in any oriental country. The style of the tribesman is a little after the manner of Rob Roy. "My foot is on my native heath," and "Am I not a Pathân?" Even when he leaves his native heath behind, he takes his manner with him. He will come down, a stalwart manly-looking ruffian, with frank and open manners, rather Jewish features, long hair plentifully oiled, under a high turban, with a loose tunic, blue for choice—the better to hide the dirt—worn very long—he wears his clothes very long in both senses—baggy drawers, a lungi or sash across his shoulders, grass sandals, a sheepskin coat with the hair inside, thickly populated, a long heavy knife, and a rifle, if he is allowed to carry either. He is certain to be filthy, and he may be ragged, but he will saunter into a Viceregal durbar as proud as Lucifer, and with an air of unconcern a diplomatist might envy. Not in the least like any other Indian subject, he is not always subordinate, even to his own chief. At best the chief is but an equal perhaps a delegate, for tribal purposes, with a little brief authority, but in no other respects superior to the humblest radical of them all. This inordinate pride is one of his marked characteristics, and the "Am I not a Pathân?" embodies all he is most proud of. He will glory in robbery, is rather vain of a successfully conducted murder, will admit being avaricious, not deny being faithless, distrustful, envious, resentful, and vindictive; or he will boast perpetually of his descent, powers in arms, or independence; but the being a Pathân more than covers all the one and caps all the other.

To honour, in the Western sense, he does not attach much importance, but he has a code of his own which he strictly observes, and refers to proudly, under the name of Nang-i-Pukhtāna. This code imposes upon him the necessity of recognizing the right of asylum, even in the case of his bitterest foe who comes as a suppliant; the necessity for revenge by retaliation, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, or a life for a life; and, almost the most obligatory of all, open-handed hospitality to all who may demand it. There are differences of opinion as to the genuineness of this hospitality. There is often not much to give, the little may be of a simple kind, and sometimes given to avoid the ridicule and scorn attaching to the suspicion of being considered a miser, a name of infinite scorn. But those who know the tribesman best, most readily credit him with the virtue of good fellowship, and of sociability among his own people. Festive gatherings are frequent, the men—for the women have their separate opportunities for bits of scandal—delight to meet at the shrine of a saint, or the village guest-house, make a noise and be happy; while a tribal Malik will entertain as recklessly as the old-fashioned Irish landlord, or the Bengal planter, and will get deeply into debt to do it. Nevertheless the over-zealous traveller would do well to bear in mind the Abbot's maxim—" Who suppes with the Deville should have a long spoone."

Bracketed with hospitality, the Pathân puts courage as the first of virtues; the two have often to do duty for all the others. He is undoubtedly brave to rashness, sets no value upon life, either his own or any one else's. Trained from youth to feats of strength, endowed with wonderful powers of endurance, he commands the admiration of most Englishmen. There is a sort of charm about the better sort, that inclines many people to forget his treacherous nature, and even his "vice is sometimes by action dignified." Equally certain is it his courage is too often of a coarse and brutal kind. He will meet his enemy, and kill him or be killed, without flinching, but he prefers to shoot him from behind, or stab him while asleep, and will not meet him on equal terms, if it is possible to take him at a disadvantage. Moreover, though said to be born for war, he is notoriously impulsive, and best in attack. If that fails he is easily disheartened and difficult to bring up again. He will fight splendidly in his own hills, though a flank attack upsets him, and a suspicion of being cut off causes a precipitate retreat.

Peshawur Cooking Bowl and "Long Spoons."

He is predatory to the last degree. There is not much need to discriminate between tribes here, and it is no libel to say that pillage and theft are to many the business of life. The mother's prayer is that her son may grow up a successful thief; not perhaps so shocking as it seems, for it is only another form of petition for daily bread. Another story from the nursery, is of a child who stabbed his tutor, the latter being implored not to mind it, as it was the poor child's first attempt ; a parable which suggests Punch's picture of the Sheffielder on his knees, the bull pup pinning his cheek, and the child encouraging his father to " bide it " if he can, as it would be the making of the pup. A successful use of the knife is part of a liberal Pathân education. " Give or I take," with a knife at the victim's throat, is a comparatively modest request. " Your money or your life " is the formula of the highwayman in the West ; the Pathân will take the life first, and the plundered who is let off with the loss of his purse only, may consider himself extremely lucky.

His superstition is unlimited—the women worse than the men. The Mullahs, the Pirs, the disciples, the vagabond " seekers after wisdom," are to him all so many St. Peters, who hold the keys of heaven, and any jargon that sounds like an Arabic verse is infinitely more terrible than the whistle of an enemy's bullet ; the " air drawn daggers " have for him more terrors than the assassin's knife. He has the firmest belief in miracles, charms, and omens ; will never pass a shrine without stopping to salaam ; can hardly say a sentence without an " Inshalla," or cut a throat without a prayer ; but he will not allow the creed of the Prophet, or the ordinances of his religion to stand in the way of his business, his desires, or his passions. " At one moment a saint and the next a devil " is a common proverb about him. He is not a believer in woman's rights. As often as not he purchases his wife, or employs an agent to select her ; but once acquired, she is so much property in which his honour is invested, and he becomes more suspicious of her than of anything else. To see her speak to a stranger man sets him alight, and is sufficient ground for mistrust ; a chance gossip might probably cost her life, and be ample grounds for a feud against the man. Therefore, elopements are common, every young blood is bound to establish his reputation by an intrigue, and rumour credits the wives with exceptional willingness to risk having their throats cut.

There is no doubt the Pathân is extremely avaricious and grasping, and gold, the saint-seducing gold, weighs—as does it not elsewhere?—heavy in the scale against patriotism, honour, fidelity or friendship; but he has sometimes been condemned in what appear too sweeping terms; the whole being sampled by the worst. The worst is, however, undoubtedly very bad indeed. If he is to be tested by the standard of a Peshawur judge, or official who has mainly to do with the criminal classes, it would be almost impossible to paint his picture in colours dark enough. The story of “crime on the Peshawur Frontier” has been told in a recent work by a distinguished officer of wide experience. An appalling record of five years’ experience as a Border Commissioner and Judge, Mr. Elsmie speaks of it as a greater mental strain than all the rest of a long Indian service together. “Crime,” he says, “of the worst conceivable kind is a matter of almost daily occurrence; murder in all its phases, unblushing assassination in broad daylight, before a crowd of witnesses; the carefully planned secret murder of the sleeping victim at dead of night, murder by robbers, by rioters, by poisoners, by boys, and by women sword in hand. Blood always crying for blood, revenge looked on as a virtue, the heritage of retribution passed on as a solemn duty from father to son.” Murder, as a business—and it is perhaps hardly more difficult to find men who, for a consideration, will carry it out, in any of the above forms, than to obtain a porter to carry a parcel. The Peshawur District is approximately about a thirty-second part of the Punjâb; but it accounts for about a third of the murders of the whole; the police report one in every 4,500 of the entire population, or in every 3,000 Pathâns as murdered annually. The necessity for revenging feuds, wrongs at the hands of the seducer, jealousies in regard to women and girls, and still more, of boys, the objects of unnatural lust, account for much of the bloodshed. “It would seem,” says Mr. Elsmie, “that the spirit of murder is latent in the heart of nearly every man in the valley.” There is almost a worse feature. Public opinion is mostly in favour of screening the murderer. The discovery of the offender is almost impossible, if the influential men do not wish it, and they seldom do, while wilfully false accusations against innocent persons, supported by fabricated evidence of the most astounding and circumstantial character, are often concocted to divert suspicion from the real criminals, or wreak vengeance upon old enemies. Justice is almost as much baffled by false accusations established in this way, as by the difficulties in bringing home real crime. In most villages it is almost impossible to do so with any certainty at all, and "it is but seldom the police have been able to bring offenders to justice." Special regulations have been found necessary, frontier officers invested with summary powers, and recently, tribal councils empowered to deal with some of their own crime, which, in a rough way, they are often capable of doing effectually.

It is unnecessary to refer further to the records of crime. Grant that it is equal or more degraded than the Newgate Calendar—so probably are the dark stories of other Oriental countries. Or that the city of Peshawur may rival Constantinople or Port Said; as startling chronicles come occasionally from the West, and few cities or peoples could afford to be judged by their police reports. It may also be urged that the position of the valley encourages a great immigration of lawless spirits, in addition to its own indigenous scoundrels. Outlaws who have made life too hot in their own country, and find British protection convenient, and where at the same time, temptation is offered to adventurous criminals of all kinds, in the form of a certain asylum when needed, with tribes all round who will have to give it, no matter how red-handed the seeker comes. It is, however, improbable that the average tribesman beyond the Border is any better or worse than his brothers or cousins within it, and it may fairly be hoped that both have, as a people, many more good points than they are likely to have developed by examination of the class that mainly come into our courts.

It is more true of this Border Pathân than of most men, that he lives in a state of war by nature. Life for him has no charms without it; his surroundings during all these centuries have made it a necessity of his existence; his hand has been literally against every man; he is seen at his best when raiding or plundering. Trained from his youth to add to the narrow resources of his bare hill sides, by the plunder of the more fertile valleys and plains, nothing will prevent him doing so, but the knowledge that his neighbours are too strong for him, or too much on the alert. Naturally he hates all government which introduces law and order, or binds him over to keep the peace with his neighbour. He looks upon such restrictions as an interference with his most sacred rights, the depriving him of legitimate pillage, and the best part of his revenues. For years the plains of Hastnagar and Yusafzai were the hunting grounds of bands from Swât, who chased the Hindu trader, and put him to ransom. Their mountain fastnesses the rendezvous for any one hostile to our Government. They are so still. For a long time the Mohmands are recorded as averaging twenty-five formidable raids a year, to try and force the British to buy off depredations, by paying blackmail. It was mainly suspicion and dislike to the Swât canal project that brought down the Utmân Khels one night, to knock the tents over the sleeping coolies, catch them like birds in a net, and hack them to pieces through the canvas. The recent construction of a border police tower on the high road to Kohât was a grievous wrong in the eyes of the Aka Khels, because it would stop their ancient right to highway robbery along that length, and they did their best to prevent it, by carrying off the masons. But just as the extension of civilization is closing the happy hunting grounds of the red man in the Wild West, so the enforcing of law and order up to the very edge of the Border hills, while it brings substantial benefit to the people within that border, has possibly made life harder for the tribes beyond it; has indirectly increased the Peshawur criminal list. Gradually being deprived of all opportunities of war, the Border Pathân, may, like Othello, complain that his occupation is gone! Whether he is likely to be, or is, satisfied with the altered condition of things, and whether it would not be worth while to find him some congenial occupation, is a problem well worthy of consideration.

CHAPTER XXVII.

FITZHARDY'S MURDERER—A DOMESTIC BORDERER.

PERHAPS it is as well to disarm suspicion, and, like Bottom, to start by disclaiming any attempt to affright the gentle reader. In spite of the title, nothing is going to happen to Fitzhardy; and his faithful Pathân henchman, known to all familiars as "the Murderer," would have waited behind any reader's chair as harmlessly, and almost as well, as a London footman; and, lion as he undoubtedly was, have roared you "as 'twere any nightingale." He had a salute for all his master's guests, inquired in the best Pashtu if they were well, strong and in good case; and, as they departed, commended them to be in God's care. Unfortunately he had come to the regiment originally with the brand of Cain upon him, a fine, tall, clean-limbed, well-set-up, tough old Yusafzai Pathân, from the Ranizai country up by the Swât River, with a straight nose, dark hair, and a complexion almost fair. His manner was frank enough, and he made no secret of his reason for enlisting. An unavoidable business engagement had compelled him to kill a couple of his countrymen, whose clansmen waited for him, and made return to his paternal hills impossible. He had, therefore, taken the Queen's rupee, and, with a heart as light as his name, Khushhal¹ Khân fell to soldiering in a native regiment.

¹ "The happy-conditioned."

As chance fell out, he became attached to Fitzhardy as orderly, and the two saw much service in different parts of the country, including an occasional brush with his own people along the Border, but he never developed any further sign of abnormal bloodthirstiness, save on one occasion when the old Adam came out. Like a good many other soldier officers, Fitz, as the regiment called him, did not suffer from a superfluity of dollars, and was occasionally despondent about ways and means; a circumstance that did not escape the notice of his faithful orderly, who one day asked if there was nothing the Sahib could think of by way of mending matters. Had the Sahib no expectations from his family, no one likely to give him any money? The Sahib could think of no one but an old aunt who might leave him her money when she died—a prospect, however, that seemed very distant. Khushhal looked carefully round to see that the coast was clear, shut all the doors, and, with a gleam in his eye, and his hand searching for a knife, whispered, "Sahib, I'll go home and kill her. They may perhaps catch and hang me, but any how you will be sure of the money." The offer was perfectly genuine, and the Murderer was greatly disappointed to find his officer had so little spirit of enterprise as to decline it.

By and by, finances improved. Fitz got a civil appointment and blossomed into a District officer—a reason quite sufficient to induce Khushhal to "cut his name" also, and join the new concern as general manager of Fitz's bungalow at Pindabâd, and every thing pertaining to it. A master stroke that marked a tide in Khushhal's affairs, and led him on to fortune and to fame. He took absolute possession of all domestic affairs, regulated Fitz's household, engaged his servants, managed his camp, and eventually did it so completely, that his fame passed into a proverb, as "Fitz's Murderer." To speak of the Murderer's Fitz, would perhaps have more accurately described their relationship. The great feature of the management was based on the very equitable law of contracts. The Murderer contracted for everything. He had a monthly contract for the supply of matches, for blacking, for lamp oil, for tooth picks. However, all was on a sliding scale. When Fitz was a captain, matches cost him eight annas a month; it was inconsistent with his dignity as major to use less than twelve annas a month, while the Murderer held no lieutenant-colonel could light his pipe effectually for less than one rupee a month. His ponies were fed and groomed by contract. His tents were carried in the same way. If he was not clothed, he was at least mended by contract; the Murderer tying up little holes in his stockings with bits of string on regular monthly terms. He was fed, and at times almost well fed, by contract; but the arrangements were conducted on the most thorough-going Pathân principles. Sometimes they ran rather long in the direction of tough salt beef; at others the supplies were on an almost extravagant scale, and Kushhal stood by urging master to try "just one more slice" of a particularly succulent joint. This chance, unduly neglected, the menu would revert to salt beef once more. The story of the Great Beef Contract was almost as famous in Pindabâd as Mark Twain's. A long course of salt beef in various disguises, through a series of deadly hot days, induced a remonstrance even from Fitz, and resulted in a day or two's respite and change to elderly chickens; but all too soon there followed more instalments of junk. Fitz had to explain that the flesh of the cow had become altogether hateful to him. "Sahib come here. Look at these casks!" said the Murderer, pointing to a corner of the verandah, "I have bought a whole cow, which has been salted, and which has to be eaten. What can I do?" Obviously there was nothing for Fitz but to work steadily through, hoping for better times when the contract was next revised.

Of course Fitz never married. That could not have been brought within the four corners of any contract. But the Murderer came in radiant one day, having bought a girl, a bargain, for twenty-five rupees. His matrimonial bliss, however, was of short duration. There was a row one day; a sound of great wailing. The small wife had been caught talking to the gardener, and was being corrected. Fortunately the flirtation was in British territory or . . . he sold the little baggage next day, and made, as the old ruffian informed Fitz, sixteen rupees on the transaction.

Occasionally, it occurred to Fitz, that the grim Pathân heathen might like some leave, and the suggestion was put to him in various forms. But no, it was not convenient to go home, and Khushhal was not like some grumblers. He knew a good place when he had one, and was not going to desert so kind a master. Finally, Fitz went on furlough himself, and took long leave, having some sort of lingering idea, that perhaps this old man of the sea might be induced to visit his mountain home, where peradventure his friends might persuade him to stop. If there is persuasion in an Enfield bullet, or a Pathân knife, they probably would. Fitz had a two years' holiday with no salt beef, and submitted to buying his matches casually at the street corners; but eventually the time came round when he had to return. The first man to meet him when he landed, was Khushhal Khân. The staunch old Murderer had come to Bombay, and he had brought a *Nazar*¹ for the Sahib, because, he said, he had learnt in India, that it is never good to come empty handed into the presence of a superior. At Watson's Hotel he spread out the presents for Fitz; a second-hand Continental Bradshaw, which he thought the Sahib might find pleasant reading, and a thing like a fiddle-stick or plectrum, made out of the wood that grew on Adam Khân's grave, which as every Yusafzai knows, will enable any one to play perfectly on the fiddle, though he did not say Fitz's performance on the instrument was not perfect. The third gift was a remarkably mongrel pup, for the keep of which he proposed to enter into a contract at once; and the fourth was an old Letts's Diary, which he felt sure the Sahib would find useful to keep his accounts in. With these he wished the Sahib, Salam-a-laikum. Ma khware ye. "May evil not come nigh him."

¹ The present with which it is Eastern etiquette to approach a superior.

They had many an adventure and many a contract after that, Fitz and his old Murderer; and the latter was perfectly deaf to all suggestions that involved any break up of the arrangements. Fitz once went so far as to offer to pension him. "Sahib," he said, "if I had not left my regiment to take your service, I should now have been Subadar Major. You know I cannot go back to Ranizai. Why should I take pension while I can work on full pay and allowances? You are a good master, Sahib, and I'll never leave you. Never."

CHAPTER XXVIII.

PATHÂN WIVES.

BEFORE Max O'Rell undertook to educate them, our Gallic neighbours affected to suppose that John Bull bought and sold his womankind in the market of Smithfield. Just so most Border Pathâns purchase their wives. Not that the practice is universal; the Pathân sometimes spends his money on feasts, ornaments for the bride, and fees to "go-betweens," or there is an exchange of presents, a sort of Eastern marriage settlement, and entertainments to satisfy the guardians as to his position, and that the bride is not going to absolute poverty. Some, in fact, like the Shirânis on the Dera Ismail Khân border, go so far as to give a dowry; but in a great many cases, and with most tribes, wives are literally bought and sold, exactly as so many cattle; quotations varying according to the circumstances of the purchaser and the youth and beauty of the purchased.

In England, according to the same excellent French authority, elopements are common. "A young girl goes out one fine morning to post a letter, and on her return informs her parents she is married." In Scotland it is an easier business still. "It is sufficient for the young people to say, 'I take you for my wife; I accept you for my husband;' and the thing is done." The Pathân, on the other hand, though he takes care to make it very easy to get out of the toils of matrimony, has a process for getting into them elaborate enough to furnish matter for another volume by the gifted author of Les Filles de John Bull.

The most Arcadian are the Waziris. For instance, when the Waziri youth wants a wife he gets some respectable old clansman to consult the girl's parents. If to them the connection seems desirable, they reply, "Bring us the hiri"—about 60 or 100 rupees. The admirer then deposes his father with his friends, who, taking with them a sheep or two for a feast, repair to the girl's house and pay up the stipulated amount over the roast mutton, a trifling sum being returned as luck-penny. The couple are then held to be engaged, and whenever Corydon goes to visit his Phyllis, he takes with him the wherewithal for the savoury dishes, which possibly Phyllis dresses, and Thyrsis, Damon and company eat. He is then expected to put two or three rupees into the dish, and the father, in return, to make him a small present—a scarf, a pair of shoes, or a cheap ring. The custom, with a fine touch of humour, is called "Binding the ass." When the wedding day arrives, the bridegroom's friends, men and women, go to the bride's village, and provide a feast, to which all parties are invited. Towards evening, the bridegroom's party arrives; and after a feigned attack on the village with sticks and stones, join in the rejoicings, which last all night. No sort of sleeping accommodation is thought of; "the hearth, with oily brands of pine an abundant fire, blackening the door-posts with perpetual soot," and even in winter they reckon no more of the cold than did the Shepherds of Virgil. Next morning the bride is carried off mounted on an ox or an ass, the bridegroom remaining behind for a day or two, to console her parents for their loss. After a fortnight's honeymoon she visits them, to take back the presents given by her family, which the bridegroom usually divides among his party. It is doubtful if the privileges of leap-year are understood in Waziri land, but occasionally the woman chooses, and she makes known her fancy by sending the village drummer to pin a handkerchief on the favoured one's cap with a hairpin. The drummer watches his opportunity and does this in a public place, when the swain has to marry the lady if he can pay her price to the father.

In Yusafzai, Cœlebs to a great extent employs a professional go-between to arrange his matrimonial affairs. The preliminary negotiations over, he and his confidential agent settle the matter of presents with papa, and quaff a cup of eau sacré together as a pledge of good faith. The engagement is then given out, and the hopeful Benedick may visit the family as often as he likes, taking presents each time for his fiancée, though he never sees her. That privilege does not indeed become his till the marriage ceremonies are over and the bride has been conducted to her new home by the "best-man" and his party, the bridesmaids being left to comfort the old people—an improvement on the Waziri arrangement. Even then Benedick has to entertain his guests for three days and two nights before he unveils his bride and sees her face for the first time. Such is the theory at any rate. Both look for wedding presents from their friends, on very much the same understanding as prevails about such matters in the West; only, not to return the compliment to friends under similar circumstances, would in Yusafzai probably lead to a serious feud. The bridegroom has to stand the "shot" on both sides, and the cost is sometimes heavy. A cheap marriage with a maid would probably run to Rs. 100, an average one probably Rs. 250, while a rich Yusafzai might have to spend several thousands to marry himself respectably. A single regular one is, therefore, as much as most can afford, and quite apart from the adage about "two women together making cold weather," for which there is an excellent if slightly broad Pushtu equivalent. A Khân must be well off who can afford to run to the full Muhammadan limit of four.

In many parts of the country there is naturally much less restraint. Women who in towns or large gatherings would not venture out unless covered from head to foot in the burka, a sort of large white cotton blouse with a little network in front of the hood that covers the head, and a pair of large ungainly white cotton boots, or rather leg coverings, go about in their own camps and villages unveiled, and bare-legged, with no other restraint, than the general opinion that it is indecorous to be seen associating with men. Intercourse between the sexes is therefore much more free, and matches are made up by mutual attraction, and the preliminary negotiations are at the best of the most nominal kind. This however does not exempt the lover from paying some price to the girl's parents. To elope with a girl is by many clans considered an outrage equal to murder, and to be punished with the same mercilessness.

Among most Border Pathâns, or among the Afghân people generally, the ceremonies do not vary materially. Sometimes the bridegroom has to stand treat to the lady's family, sometimes to the tribal Jirgah or Council, sometimes to the village. The "hospitable Pathân" does not like to throw away a chance of dining out at any one else's expense; but among the majority the transaction is essentially a business one, and in addition to all the feasting, a sum has to be paid down as purchase-money. Even tribes who look on all business as vulgar are not above trade in wives. The 60 rupees hiri of the Waziri is probably Rs. 100 with the adjoining Ghilzai. Rs. 30 to 100 is the quotation for Bannu; it is about the same among the Khattaks, and rises on the Kohât border to Rs. 100 or 200; in Miranzai, brides are still more expensive, the tariff ranging from Rs. 200 to 500. Along the Kohât, and part of the Peshawur Border, the trade in women is notorious. A hard working, useful Afridi wife can, according to Tucker, easily be procured for Rs. 150 to 200. One remarkable for beauty will run to a fancy price—Rs. 1,000, or even more. "The ordinary hill woman," he goes on to say, "has little in the way of good looks to recommend her. On the other hand she works like a donkey, cuts grass and wood, carries water, is accustomed to poor living, and does twice as much as the more delicately nurtured woman of the valley."

Mahsud Waziri Women.

Not only do the Trans-Border tribes sell their own relations, but the trade in wives brought from Swât, Bajaur, and other valleys—sometimes stolen, sometimes purchased—was, a few years ago, brought to the official notice of Government. On the Indian side the Border measures were taken to check it. The stolen women were taken from their purchasers and sent home again,—possibly to be made away with on their return by their dishonoured relatives. But the market is reputed still well-stocked with those sold, or for sale by their relatives, and the instances that come before the District Officer are many. To take one of Tucker's, a sketch of the life of a Trans-Border woman is more than enough to point a moral. Born a Ningrahâri on the slopes of the Safed Koh, her parents died when she was young, and her relatives sold her in marriage to a Zakha Khel Afridi, who was afterwards killed fighting against us in the Khaiber. Her father-in-law at once sold her with her little daughter to a Bazoti Orakzai for Rs. 100. He beat her so badly she ran away in a month or two, leaving her little daughter, and reached the Mani Khel country in Tirah, where she stopped three months, and was sold for Rs. 120 to a Bar Muhammad Khel Orakzai, residing in British territory, with whom she lived happily for three years, until the Bazoti found out where she was and came to claim her. The Bar Muhammad paid the claimant back his Rs. 100, and the case was settled—a fair sample of the possibilities fate may have in store for the "widowed wife and wedded maid" on the Border.

The effect of all this is, that though the woman may be well treated—and, of course, according to the standard she has been brought up to, she is more often than not well treated—she is mainly looked on as property. Maid, widow, or divorcee, she cannot marry without the consent of her male relations. The husband can divorce his wife without assigning any reason. The wife, even with the best of grounds, would have small chance of obtaining a divorce, were she rash enough to sue for it. Theoretically, the Pathân knife would flash to avenge even a look that threatened her with insult, though certainly not from the chivalrous feeling imagined by Burke. Actually, the purchased article is treated in the most casual manner. So long as the owner is satisfied, and she looks well enough, or works hard enough, he keeps her. If she fails to please, or falls out with the mother-in-law, or the sisters, cousins and aunts, or the times grow hard, he sells her with the other live-stock. That female dishonour can only be washed out in blood, is another theory; and adultery is supposed always to demand the blood of both the respondent and the co-respondent. Occasionally, indeed, the Pathân is young and ardent enough to prefer vengeance. Oftener he is sufficiently cautious to reflect that the market value of the erring one represents to him a considerable sum in rupees, and who so likely as the lover to make a liberal bid? So he foregoes the blood, and comes to terms with the co-respondent. So common is adultery with some tribes, the Southern Khattaks for instance that it is almost a rule for a woman to elope once. She is sold in the first instance to a selected husband, with whom she has to live till she meets the man she fancies, or who will run off with her. And so common is the subsequent money arrangement that the Pathân has invented a special and most expressive word for it—"sharmuna," which might be freely translated "blush-money." A son gets blush-money if his mother re-marries; a man seducing a widow or spinster, has, marriage or no marriage, to pay blush-money to her male next of kin; and a surprising number of husbands pocket their wrongs on the same terms. To draw on Tucker for one more specimen case—an atrocious one enough. An Afridi policeman was charged with adultery with a Trans-Border woman. Her relations killed her, and a claim for Rs. 300 blush-money lay against him. His relations, therefore, bought a poor Hîndustâni woman for Rs. 40, took her to their village and pretended she was married to one of themselves and had gone away with one of the opposite party. They then killed her and set up a counter-claim for blush-money; the two claims being held to cancel each other.

This is perhaps an extreme instance of the treatment of women, but there is no doubt that the wife-selling, the theory that the sex generally are only fit for playthings or slaves, and certain other Pathân vices combine to place them in a position extremely low and degraded. At the same time it must not be forgotten that the worst cases are those which come most often to notice, and the average of Pathân wives are married in their own villages, live among their own people; and it may be hoped that the current of their domestic joys glides just as smoothly as in other parts of the world.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE MOHMANDS.

By comparison it is pleasant to turn from the Pathân of the Peshawur Border to his surroundings. If his country is not altogether "divine," it is by no means without its charms. To leave the court and bazaar—the atmosphere of murder and evil reputation—and go up to the top of the Gor Khatri, the old caravanserai that tradition places on the side of Kanishka's great Vihara,⁵ where esoteric Buddhist monks instructed in the "Lesser Vehicle." The holy place of the Hindu *jogi*¹ converted into the residence of Afghân refugees, and from the top of which there is a view of the whole of that great picturesque amphitheatre, from the stony slopes of the Khattak range, by the banks and the marshes of the Kâbul and Swât rivers, the glens of Yusafzai, to the black peaks of Hazâra, with the snows of the Hindu-Kush and the Sufed Koh for a background. And it is tempting to dwell longer on the beauty of the valley itself, with its luxuriant fields and innumerable water-courses; its villages and hamlets half hid among mulberries and pomegranates, poplars, and willows; its orchards and gardens—for there are roses at the Bâra as fine as by Bendemeer's stream. A scene which from this point of view, might almost as easily pass for the "haunts of ancient peace," as one of continuous feuds.

¹ Druid (!) or mendicant priest.

But the scenery of the Peshawur Valley has been so often painted in glowing terms by enthusiastic artists; the halt within the Border has here been already somewhat too long; and it is necessary to pass to the people beyond it.

Crossing the Doâba, to the bare stony irregular hills that rise almost abruptly from the plain on the north-west between the Kâbul and Swât Rivers, is the country of the independent Mohmands: a tribe both numerous and important, and the only one on our immediate border that professes even a nominal allegiance to the Afghân Amir. These low, bare hills, the last outworks of the Hindu-Kush, rise until they reach the higher ranges which separate the Mohmands from Bajaur and the Utmân Khels on the north, and the Kuner Valley, which forms the western boundary. The little bit of Mullagori country and the Khaiber route to Kâbul, as far as Jelâlâbâd, being the boundary on the south. The aspect of the country generally is on all hands admittedly dreary in the extreme, but the most rugged and unfruitful, and, at the same time, the least accessible hills are those on the south-east bordering the Peshawur Valley; the best parts the Bâizâi Hills on the west, down from Bajaur to the Kâbul River, and the rich alluvial land along its banks from Jelâlâbâd to Lâlpura. In one way or other, by transit dues or by irrigation, the river is the principal source of Mohmand wealth. The three largest valleys approached from our border,—the Shilmân, Gandâo,—“Fetid water valley,”—and Pandiâli, covered by the respective forts of Michni, Shabkadr, and Abzai,—are for most of the year little more than dry, stony water-courses, changing to raging torrents in the rains, with barren slopes leading from the beds of shingle to the rocky spurs which flank them. Some of the glens opening out north towards Bajaur, and south to Lâlpura, are better; but dry ravines, alternating with rows of sterile rocky hills and crags, are the most striking characteristics of the country. There is little vegetation beyond coarse grass, scrub wood, and dwarf palm. In the summer the heat is said to be very great, and the lowlands are not then particularly healthy. There are two or three roads that have been improved by us, like those from Shahgai by the Shilmân Valley to Dhaka, and from Michni, by the Shâmilo ferry to the Shilmân; but, with few exceptions, the country is without roads, the rudest tracks leading straight up the hills and down again. Roads and water are the two great wants. In the hot weather the latter is everywhere scarce; even that for drinking has often to be brought long distances, from springs whose supply is uncertain, or from small tanks made to store the rain; the laborious task of carrying falling to the women.

The resources of such a country, as may be supposed, are few. The crops are mainly dependent on the rains; and if these fail, more or less distress is certain. The villages are small and are poor, the extent of cultivation round them limited; a little grass, firewood, charcoal, and dwarf-palm mats, added to a few cattle and some honey from the Bâizâi Hills, is all the people have to offer in the way of exports. All the manufactures of civilization they have to purchase. They do a certain amount of business as carriers; the Kachi clan depending almost entirely on the carrying trade between Peshawur and Kâbul, and the Lâlpura and Michni chiefs realising a good deal in the way of dues on rafts and goods floated down the Kâbul River. "Guide money," levied on *kâfilas*¹ from Bajaur or Kuner to Peshawur, is another source of revenue; and one or two clans are credited with a scandalous trade in women stolen from Swât, Bunejr or Bajaur, and sold to the Afridis and Orakzais. But even in ordinary times there is a surplus population that is unable to find support, and which is steadily emigrating, whenever opportunity offers, to the Peshawur district. Many of these have taken up land on the Swât Canal; and numbers would only be too glad to follow their example. In bad times, it is quite intelligible that the unfortunate Mohmand, with the drought in his own country, and the prospect of loot in his neighbours, should occasionally become a desperate man.

¹ Caravans.

In physique, though there are among them fine men, they are as a rule, inferior to many of the surrounding Pathâns; and though they have on occasions fought well against us, their courage is decidedly open to suspicion. They have plenty of pride and haughtiness, sufficient reputation for cruelty and treachery, and like other Pathâns, a good deal to say about their honour; the value of which may, perhaps, be best judged by the frontier proverb concerning them to the effect that "you have only to put a rupee in your eye, and you may look at any Mohmand, man or woman." They are on fairly good terms with their neighbours of Bajaur and Kuner; have usually avoided collisions with the Afridis, though between them and the Shinwâris a guerilla war has lasted for centuries; the belt of desert from Lundi Kotal to Pesh Bolak bearing witness to the destruction caused by raid and counter-raid. Private blood feuds are common, and the tariff for injuries runs somewhat low. In many other social and domestic customs they resemble the Yusafzais; but they have no hujras,—an institution which to the Pathân "Young-blood" corresponds to the English notion of a club,—the want of which, in a Pathân's opinion, is to stamp a tribe as little better than savages. They differ, moreover conspicuously in having a more aristocratic tribal constitution, in that they have hereditary chiefs or Khâns, drawn from the old families, who from ancient times have supplied leaders. The Khâns are appointed and are removable by the Amir of Kâbul: the most important being the Khân of Lâlpura in the east, and the Bâizâi Khân of Goshta in the west, who both enjoy *jagirs*¹ in Nangraha or the Jelâlâbâd district.

The whole tribe is divided into four principal divisions, of which the Bâizâi is by far the most numerous; but the Halimzai probably possesses the most influence, as they hold command of the important passes. The entire strength is put at 17,000 or 18,000 fighting men : but nothing like this number has been or probably ever could be brought into the field. So far, the tribesmen have never shown themselves very ready to enlist in our army, though there are a good many in the regiments of the Amir, and in the contingents of the local Khâns. Their relations with the British Government have never been altogether satisfactory. For many years after the Punjâb was annexed they gave more trouble than any other tribe. Up to 1864 their history is one of continuous conflict or raids, often on a formidable scale ; and the murder of British officers who ventured too far from our outposts. There were expeditions against them in 1851-52 and 1854, and between 1855 and 1860 they were charged with no less than 125 outrages on the Peshawur district, the object plunder or murder ; many being more or less serious. In 1863 the emissaries of the Akhund of Swât sent round the fiery cross, and brought 5,000 Mohmands into the field, but they were defeated with heavy loss. From that time, which corresponds with the lesson taught the tribes by the Ambeyla campaign, the record of Frontier Expeditions describes Mohmand history as a period of "comparative" peace ; though they murdered Major Macdonald at Michni in 1873, attempted to murder Captain Anderson at Shabkadr, attacked our Survey party in 1879, and on three occasions between 1878 and 1880 were in conflict with our troops ; the last time at Dhaka, where their force was nearly annihilated. Since the close of the last Afghân war the Shilmân Valley section, adjoining the Khaiber route, has been under exclusive political relations with us, and the tribe has been on better behaviour, though they threatened to give trouble in 1882 ; and there is little doubt that any future difficulty of ours, would be the Mohmand opportunity.

¹ Freeholds.

The branch of the family that settled in the south-west corner of the Peshawur Valley, when their progenitors finally ousted the Dalazâks, have now been so long separated from their country cousins of the hills, they have practically lost all touch. They hold very productive lands irrigated by the Bâra River; are reported excellent farmers, superior in this respect to the adjoining Khalils, who have also a share in the Bâra water; but the villages nearest the Afridi hills have ever been proverbially troublesome; and recently so far forgot their position within our border, they appealed to arms, rather than to the Deputy Commissioner. Their quarrel was with the Khalils, over that most fertile cause of disputes—water,—which developed into something like a pitched battle; eight being left dead on the field, and many more wounded. The final settlement, however, naturally finished in the court of the Divisional Judge, who sentenced one batch to be hanged, and a larger one to transportation for life.

Besides the four main divisions of the hill Mohmands, there are certain affiliated clans, of which two, mainly agricultural and numerically insignificant,—the Dawezai and Utmânzai, located between Bajaur on the north and the Utmânkhel on the east,—may be practically included among the Mohmands proper. The Mullagoris on the south have already been noticed; but on the west, the Safis—a tolerably numerous tribe—are a people entirely distinct. They occupy the hills north of Jelâlâbâd, and some of the valleys opening on to the Kuner River. Geographically the Safis come between the Mohmands and the country of Kâfiristân and probably, ethnographically and ethnologically, furnish a connecting link between two peoples otherwise almost diametrically opposed. In appearance often florid, with light eyes and hair, speaking a language only distantly related to the Pushtu of the Mohmands, whose dialect has much in common with that spoken in Kâbul, both they and the Delgâns of the Lughmân Valley are either directly descended from, or largely admixed with, the Kâfirs, and are comparatively recent converts to Islâm. In Bârber's time they were still called Kâfirs; in Nâdir's, Safis—a name which Masson suggests they may have acquired by becoming "pure," in comparison to the adjoining "impure" idolaters. Now, like many converts, they are fanatical Muhammadans; but they still retain many peculiar customs and vestiges of ancient arts. Their hills—which are little known, are reported as yielding lots of grapes, the chief products being wine, vinegar, and honey—for the Safis are great bee-keepers. The country, moreover, is the natural home of the Narcissus.

Politically, the position of this powerful Mohmand confederation in regard to our Border is another somewhat unsatisfactory feature. Their being nominal subjects of Afghânistân necessitates, at least in theory, a reference to that court for the redress of offences committed by the tribe; while even if the Amir wished to exercise his authority, the tribesmen are almost entirely beyond his influence. He cannot even collect his revenue. For the last few years they are credited with "settling down to peaceful intercourse with us on the Peshawur border." 'Cras credemus, hodie nihil.' If they should at any time become troublesome as regards our communications with Kâbul, we should, no doubt, be able to take such measures as would speedily bring them to their bearings; but, as already pointed out with regard to other tribes, there are times and seasons when it would become eminently inconvenient to have to do this.

CHAPTER XXX.

TRIBAL JIRGAHS.

EACH Pathân clan is a separate democracy, but a democracy in which the interest of the individual comes first, the welfare of those neighbours who compose his sept or his khail, second; and save in the presence of a common danger, or some question where combination is absolutely necessary, the general community runs a bad third. He is content, as an old Miân Khel said, with civil discord, is content with war's alarms, is content with blood, but is not, and never will be content with a master. His science of government would seem to mean that every man be a law unto himself, with the maximum of personal, rather than civic, or national, liberty. The "greatest happiness" of the average Khân is to dispense his own justice; his proud privilege to redress his own wrongs, to wreak his own vengeance—on the original offender if this can be done conveniently, if not, on brothers, cousins, or uncles, the next of kin, or even the offender's tribe. The Pathân Mrs. Grundy looks to him to do this, and across the Border Mrs. Grundy is also a power in the state. Her notion of what is scandalous is the only respect in which she differs from her Western relative. And after all, on either side of the Border, or on either side of the globe, is it not very much the surrounding society that establishes the custom? "Revenge," according to Bacon, "is a kind of wild justice ;" and it is not so very many years ago that Elphinstone described duelling as "only a generous and well-regulated mode of revenge." A Pathân without a blood feud, or neglecting to avenge it, would be to show himself just as wanting in good Pukhtunwali as, in their respective countries, it would now be for a French editor or a German student not to fight duels, or for an Irish patriot to pay his rent.

Nevertheless, necessity has forced the Pathân, like the rest of the world, to recognize the need for some form of government, some system that shall enforce even the rudest customary law, some tribal organization to fall back on at a pinch. And his tribal jirgah, or council of elders, does all this for him and more. Composed of Khâns, Mullahs and headmen, it combines his House of Lords, bench of Bishops and Legislative Assembly ; it discharges the functions of all the divisions of the Queen's Bench, Probate and Divorce, the Board of Trade and the War Office. It is at once his Convocation and his county court. In fact, it performs for him most offices, from those of the Senate to those of the Vestry. Tribal customs affecting village society, the parish politics of Border Little Pedlingtons, of course, furnish a lot of business ; so do matters concerning debts, deeds, mortgages and sales. And curiously enough, among the most lawless, as perhaps among the most civilized, the law is much more severe on offences against property than against the person. The Border ruffian has the greatest respect for legal documents of the kind—the most scrupulous regard for the tenure of land being often associated with the greatest risk to its owner's life. Just, for example, as his more fortunate Western representative is privileged to kick his wife to the verge of death, or ill treat his children, at a far cheaper rate than he can snare a partridge, or steal a pair of boots.

While the legal business of the jirgah is far the heaviest on the civil side, it has also considerable criminal jurisdiction. Life, even for an Afridi or a Yusafzai, is not always beer and skittles ; the luxury of reprisals, and the pleasure of personally killing one's enemies, must perforce be occasionally carried out by deputy, or entrusted to a tribunal. Where blood feuds are so common and so bitter that though they may be allowed to slumber for years, still remain a sacred heritage to be eventually taken up and continued as long as possible, many a man, whose ancestors have been violent, may find himself with more legacies on his hands than he can hope to carry out. The constant anxiety and watchfulness entailed by a lot of feuds, is an inheritance calculated to make life a burden; and, wearied out, the Pathân's only resource is to leave his country for service in India, or to get the most troublesome of his quarrels patched up by a jirgah. That he should so often prefer expatriation is only further evidence of Mrs. Grundy's power.

In the face of common danger, or in defence of the common faith, the jirgah proportionately enlarges its base. Rival parties, rival clans, and occasionally widely separated rival tribes, patch up their disputes, and selections from the smaller councils become the representative jirgah. Among the Afridis, perhaps the most disunited of all, the patching up is somewhat quaint. Each clansman takes a stone, and in turn placing it on his neighbour's, swears a solemn vow, that until the common cause be settled, and these stones removed, any feud between the parties shall be dormant—an oath generally religiously kept. The jirgah assembles on the bare ground, and having gone through its opening formula of prayer, to the effect that though events are with God, deliberation is still with man, settles the plan of the campaign, the number of men each branch of the tribe is to find, and the quota from each village, usually in proportion to its numerical strength. Each man takes the field with a sheep's skin full of flour and as much ammunition as he has been able to collect. And the period that these will last is very much the measure of the probable length of the campaign. Even the jirgah seems powerless for any extensive commissariat or transport arrangements. In matters of treaty, however, they show a much more decided power of holding together, and there is no more satisfactory instance than the Khaiber Pass agreement, made by the British Government with all the Afridi tribes concerned in 1881. On the Biloch border negotiations would naturally be with the tribal chief; but dealing with Pathâns, the jirgahs are the only bodies that Government can recognise, and though it is not always easy to be sure that the jirgah is really a representative one, the real leaders sometimes holding aloof and putting forward men of no importance or influence, agreements once entered into by a genuine tribal council are generally respected. With certain tribes, like the Buneyrwals, their word once given, offers probably a better security than many treaties with the more civilized nations.

Of late years the detective and judicial functions of the jirgah have been turned to account within our own Border, and in the Peshawur district now form part of the regular judicial system, the Deputy Commissioner being empowered to accept and award punishment on their decisions. Where our police would be utterly unable to fathom the dark mysteries of Border crime, and our executive fail to convict or punish perfectly well-known offenders, but against whom evidence is not forthcoming, the trial by jirgah—on the principle that no one makes so good a gamekeeper as an old poacher—has not unfrequently come in most happily. Crime has been detected, brought home, and punished, that could not have been satisfactorily dealt with in any other way.

Sometimes the process is peculiar. For it is only a Pathân mind that can take in the strange working of the Peshawur criminal; can follow up the reason, or trace the still more extraordinary course his vengeance, lust, or greed will take. And sometimes the finding of the jirgah would be calculated to astonish Her Majesty's judges. A recent instance of the latter is a fairly illustrative one. A man, notoriously of the worst character, was charged with the most brutal and aggravated murder. Every presumption, short of judicial proof, was against him, but no direct evidence being forthcoming—it is not always safe to give evidence against a ruffian of influence—the Deputy Commissioner, unable to convict, made him over to the tribal jirgah for trial. After due consideration, the jirgah to a man came forward and swore to th

"Sherdil," a Representative Khàn from the Bajàwar Valley.

prisoner's complete innocence, but recommended his deportation across the Border. The Deputy Commissioner had no choice but to accept the finding, and the man was subsequently sent out of the district. The jirgah followed, and the day he set foot out of British territory, slew him themselves. Their train of reasoning was probably somewhat as follows. If we bring him in guilty, the Deputy Commissioner can give him on our finding will be some seven years' imprisonment. This would not meet the case, but once beyond British jurisdiction, the summary process adopted would be much more satisfactory. A procedure clearly not judicial, but a rude notion of justice quite sufficient to satisfy a Pathân jirgah.

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE CHILDREN OF JOSEPH.

WITH all his republicanism, the Pathân, Hibernian in respects, is especially so in matters of lineage. Every p Border tribe prides itself on its descent from some—possibly imaginary—ancestor in the distant past. To speak of themselves as "Bani Israil," the children of Israel, is common, and the g beards are fond of carrying history back to "Ibrâhim, I'sák, Yákúb." However far fetched the idea of the connection may there is, as discussed at length by Bellew, a savour of Israel custom, and an often remarkable similarity of name surviving more especially among those to be now noticed. Amaz Moabites, Hittites, or Amazai, Muhibwal, Hotiwal, will be found on Mount Morah, the hill Pehor, the plain of Galilee (Jálála); valley of Sudhum; observing the "passover," offering sin thank-offerings, or driving off the scapegoat laden with the of the people. In venturing, therefore, upon a genealogical treatise always with the risk of dulness attending the recounting "lang pedigree"—no more historical value need be attached than would be to the undoubted belief of the people themselves and such historians as they possess.

Joseph—not the hero of that somewhat doubtful adventure Zulikha—but the grandson of that Khakhai, whose descend four centuries ago, drove the Dalazâks out of the Peshawur Valley, had at least one elder brother, named Omer, an exceedingly worthy man, who came to India, married a lady there, and died, leaving a disconsolate widow and one son, Mandanr. Joseph, as in duty bound, though much against the lady's inclination, married his brother's widow, and, either by her, or other wives, had five noted sons of his own, Uriah, 'Isa, Musa, Mali, and Ako. From whom, and Mandanr, are descended all the innumerable tribes of Yusafzai, distributed over the country, both within and without our Border from the Swât river to the Black Mountain, on the Hazâra side of the Indus. A tract, that conformably to Pathân custom, has been named after the tribes possessing it. Mandanr, according to the story, married a daughter of his stepfather, Joseph, by whom he had two sons, Usmân and Utmân, as well as some half dozen others by a slave girl called Razai. Three comparatively insignificant divisions, Alazai, Kamazai, and Akazai, are located beyond our Border, along the eastern slope of the Mahâbun Mountain, down to the right bank of the Indus. The Khudukhel section of the fourth, or Saddazais, occupies the western slope of the same mountain, between the Galuns and the Chamla Valley: the whole of the much more numerous remainder dwelling in the south-east corner of the Peshawur district, and the south-west corner of Hazâra. Their clans would now include the town of Swâbi on the west, and Harripur on the east of the Indus.

The descendants of Usmân are still more numerous and important. Primarily they split into two divisions, the Kamalzai and the Amazai, and each again into two more. Originally—and the remark applies to the whole Yusafzai Border—each division included, under the direction of a famous priest named Shaikh Mali, in its share a portion of hill and a portion of more favoured plain, the residents having to exchange lands with each other at intervals, but by degrees the custom became obsolete, more especially since British occupation. If those in the plains have lost their possession in the hills, they have, with the protection of the British Government, stuck to the more fertile lands; and for the descendants of Usmân, who have become firmly established in the "Mal Mandanr," or Yusafzai plain, the result has been a better share of good fortune than has fallen to most of the children of Joseph. The Kamalzai have among their chief towns, Toru, Mardân and Hoti, and the Amazai, Rustam and Chargholai in the fertile but significantly named valley of Sodom. A branch of the Amazai have given their name to the north-eastern slopes of the Mahâb Mountain beyond the Border; but though in social matters they still keep up their connection with their brethren in the plain they are politically in alliance with the adjoining Buneys, and have a tribal chief of their own at Charorai. The half dozen sons of a slave girl have done no more than found a single division named after their common mother, Razai, and that one of secondary importance, established mainly about the villages of Ismaila and Shiwa, &c., between the Amazai and the Utmanzai.

More or less, though it is only in an Administration Report that one would venture to use the optimist sense, all these Mandan clans within our Border have beaten their swords into ploughshares; or as Bellew describes it, "the cultivator who went to plough with a rifle over his shoulder and a sword at his side, watched his crops with armed patrols day and night, now casts seed into the ground far away from his village, and is troubled with no further anxiety." His children graze the cattle and play on mounds formerly used as pickets; while the old women of both sexes, "delight the youth untutored in the use of arms with thrilling recitations of the manly deeds of their fathers." It is true that the son of Joseph, with these advantages, is in many respects a fine fellow, a peaceful, well behaved, almost industrious Pathan and where he has the further benefits of canal water and an easy settlement, is becoming rich and well to do. The alarm drum may no longer rouse him up to do battle for his hearth or crops; but it is probably only a poetic imagination that credits him with so much pacific virtue. Although he roar you as gently as any sucking dove, Bottom is not quite so much translated as he looks.

Of Joseph's own sons, far the largest proportion of their posterity are entirely across the Border. "Uriah," who was called Bâdi, "the windy," on account of his villanous temper, fell out with his father's widow, and got cursed; the lady praying his progeny might never exceed thirteen souls, which tradition says they never did, the Badikhels dwelling in poverty till they became extinct. "'Isa" had twelve sons, of whom nine were killed in an affray with some cattle-lifting Mughals. From the other three are descended the Hassanzais, Akazais and Madakhels, settled on the spurs of the Mahâban and Dumah Mountains, on the right bank of the Indus, and, more extensively, in the Agror hills to the left of that river, where, with some others, they are now known as the Black Mountain tribes. In comparison with the other main Yusafzai divisions, they are small and unimportant, though for a long series of years they have caused more annoyance than many of our far more formidable frontier neighbours. The Hassanzais brought themselves into the front rank of frontier scoundrels, by the deliberate murder of two defenceless Customs officers, Messrs. Carn and Tapp, in 1851; an outrage that, like the recent Black Mountain one, took place within our Border. They are split up into some ten sub-divisions, aggregating altogether probably not 2,000 fighting men, the most troublesome of all the clans being the Khân Khels, a mere handful, but whose head is for the time being the practical leader of the whole of the 'Isazai. The Akazai division is not quite half as numerous as the Hassanzais, and has only taken to giving trouble to us within the last ten years, inspired not improbably in the first instance by the Khân of Agror.

As with so many other Yusafzai clans, not a little of the trouble is brought about by the fanatical colonies of religious adventurers, who, from early times, have been the cause of the most of the bloodshed and mischief in this direction, and who in the shape of the Pariari Sayuds, were again found associated with the two foregoing divisions in the outrage that cost us the lives of Major Battye and Captain Urmston. These Pariari Sayuds are an insignificant colony on the east face of the Black Mountain, north of Agror, and close to the fort of Trund, but their glen has always been a refuge for discontented settlers from all the surrounding tribes, both Pathân and Swâti, and they exercise considerable influence. There is no doubt that all these Black Mountain tribes, which, however much they may be spilt up among themselves, are identical in their ill-feeling against us, have, with the exception of the expeditions against the Hassanzais in 1868, and the recent one under General McQueen, enjoyed almost entire immunity from punishment; owing partly to their position being difficult of approach, and partly to their insignificance rendering them hardly worth the trouble of attacking. It might be said with equal certainty, that the most effectual method of dealing with them would be to summarily annex the whole Black Mountain and its tribes, right up to the Indus bank and open out a road along it from Derband, a route that on the published maps is still shown as a practically unknown country—an unfortunate bit of ignorance that cost General Galbraith's column the life of the gallant Major Beley.

But to continue the traditions of Joseph's family tree. "Moses" had one son, "Elias," from whom sprang the five important divisions called the Iliaszai. Four of which, the Salarzai, Gadaizai, Ashazai, and Nasozais, are located in Buneyr, and the Makhozai on the eastern slope of the Dosirra Mountain beyond "Mali" left four sons by two wives, of which two main divisions, the Daulatzais and the Nurazais, are also settled in Buneyr. A third the Chagarzai, is partly in Buneyr and the northern slopes of the Duma Mountain, on the right of the Indus, and partly on the western slope of the Black Mountain. So that with this last exception, it may be said that the Buneyrwals and their adjoining allies, are the modern representatives of Joseph's sons Musa and Mali. There is probably no finer race on the whole north-west frontier, and in their way, they are the pick of the family. With almost all the good points, and several of the failings strongly developed, they are peculiarly representative Pathâns, not the least marked characteristic, being the way they have always stood aloof from us.

Of Ako, the last son of Joseph, the descendants have proved the most numerous of all. To begin with, he had by two wives half a dozen sons, each of whom subsequently founded several important divisions. The chief of which are (1) the Khwazozai, that with half a dozen sub-divisions, holds a good part of the right of the Swât Valley, the country north of it, as far as Dir, and the mountains that separate the latter from Chitrâl. One clan, the Malizai, under its chief Gazân Khân, holds Dir and the Panjkora valley right up to the border land of Kafiristân and Kashkâr. (2) The Bazidzai, or Baizai, whose seven clans extend from the Lundkhwâr Valley in British territory above Mardan, by the left bank of the Swât, the northern slope of the Dosirra Mountain, and the highlands of Ghorband, round to the valleys draining into the Indus, by the Kohistân that separates Yusafzai from Gilgit; and (3), the Ranizai, whose clans occupy the western end of the Swât Valley adjoining the Utmân Khels.

These are the sons of Joseph, according to the Akun Darwaiza, their most learned priest, historian, and saint; and such their approximate distribution along the Border at the present time. Other Pathân tribes are here and there settled within the limits of their country, and of course large numbers of Hindus, Hindkis, Gujars, Kashmiris and other tribes, that, taken together, considerably outnumber the Yusafzais. These have either descended from the original inhabitants, or immigrated, and throughout the country form perfectly distinct little societies of their own, retaining most of their religious rites and national characteristics undisturbed. The Hindus particularly flourish, and even among the most bigoted of the Muhammadan population, transact the bulk of the mercantile business. There are again other tribes, like the Gaduns, Jaduns or Yaduns, in the eastern corner, and the Utmân Khels on the west, who though, in the former case especially, not even remotely related to the Yusafzais, are in other ways associated with them, and can for many purposes be most conveniently considered together.

A Border Gentleman, Rissaldar Muhammad Khân.

Bellew estimates the total Yusafzai population at close upon a quarter of a million, the larger half within our Border. Almost every man capable of bearing arms may be reckoned as a fighting man, and he puts the total strength at 30,000 without, and 43,000 within the Border, though of course the former are scattered over a vast extent of country. Eminently an agricultural, as opposed to a trading, people, living on the produce of their fields and flocks, they at the same time have always been famed for turbulence and reluctance to submit to any form of government. As shown above, though they are collectively bound to one another by a common descent, the various clans, or groups of clans, have formed distinct communities, governed by separate chiefs, with rival and opposing interests, which have developed continual feuds and jealousies. Of tribal combination, or regular government, they have none. Each son of Joseph that has been able, has set up for himself, exacts such revenue as he can from the mixed population, allows the cultivator to retain a third or fourth of the produce of his land, and recognises no master, or acknowledges no suzerain, unless it be a religious chief or Akhund. But in their relations with foreigners, individual feuds and jealousies would to a great extent be put aside, and it is not improbable that the entire community would act together against an invader.

CHAPTER XXXII.

SWÂT, PANJKORA, AND BAJÂWAR.

THE southern half of the Yusafzai country, which is under British rule, is practically the only portion accessible to Europeans. Information regarding the larger portion of that across the Border north of the Hazârno and Mahâban Mountains, is but uncertain and scanty. Probably the best obtainable on most points, is still that contained in the report by Dr. Bellew. Long residence in Mardân, and an exceptional knowledge of Pashtu, enabled him to command the best native sources; and his vivid and entertaining account, of a most interesting country and people, has become the recognised standard work. Physically, among all our Border lands, it is one of the most difficult of approach, consisting of a confused mass of lofty mountains, divided by deep, though fertile valleys, that alternately stretch, almost continuously—till, far beyond the Yusafzai country, they converge in the great central mountain knot, expressively described as the “roof of the world,” from whence spring so many famous Asiatic ranges. So that to move round, and to take it in rear, would be still more formidable than by direct assault.

This physical inaccessibility, and the hardly less unapproachable nature of its people, is all the more to be regretted, in that it is a country full of interest. Though not altogether a “Land of Promise," yet many of its valleys are flowing with milk and honey. For "corn and wine and oil," read, corn and honey and ghæe,¹ which are among its principal exports. Its hill tops are clothed with rich forests, giving place to a variety of excellent fruit-trees in its well watered valleys. Its climate is temperate even in summer, and its capabilities great. Many parts of it are known to be rich in ancient remains; the frequent ruins in Swât and Bajâwar indicate the former presence of Greek, Buddhist and Hindu, and innumerable inscribed tablets, in Greek and Pali—probably becoming fewer and less valuable every year—only await scientific investigation, to throw much light on the ancient history of this part of the world.

Although the people of various valleys may offer very striking differences—and in fact from their habit of mixing so little with the world outside their own circumscribed holdings, and constant intermarriage, the divergence between the clans is so great, they would hardly be credited as belonging to the same stock—there is a great natural similarity between the valleys themselves, and it will be unnecessary to do more than briefly notice one or two of those that occupy the most prominent position from the Border point of view. Of these the most important and extensive, the richest and most fertile, but most unhealthy, and perhaps most inaccessible, is the valley of Swât, or Suwât. The river from which the district takes its name, probably the Suastos of Arrian, debouches on British territory near the fort of Abazai, whence, up to the junction with the Panjkora—the ancient Garaois—it is a swift, deep torrent, rushing between precipitous banks; the surrounding hills impracticable for any except foot passengers, and not easy for them, being in the hands of the Utmân Khels. From the point of its meeting with the Panjkora, some seventy miles north-east, nearly to its source, is Swât proper. The main valley, intersected by ravines and glens draining the ranges on either side, is in places ten miles wide, in others the hills narrow to a few hundred yards apart, dividing it into natural sections, of which the principal are Ranizai, Swât Kuz or Lower Swât, and Bar or Upper Swât. Beyond, further north-east again, the country is known as the Kohistân of Swât, and is inhabited by an entirely different race, having more affinity with the people of Yasin, Gilgit, and Chitrâl, than with the Yusafzai. Ranges of lofty snow-clad mountains shut in Swât, which is approached only by a few negotiable passes. A formidable one, locally called the Larani, from what is probably the only feasible pass, separates it from the net work of valleys that make up the Panjkora; the Kohistân on the north-east rises from snow fields and extensive glaciers, to peaks of nearly 20,000 feet; on the south-east the Gorbând and Ilum oppose a great barrier between it and the valleys draining to the Indus, while the Mora range lies between it and British territory. The passes that afford the best entrance are over this last named. The easiest and most used from the Peshawur district through the Ranizai country is the Malakand, a fairly accessible one. Not quite so easy is the Mora approached from the Baizai country, and a still more difficult one is by Shahkot.

¹ Clarified butter.

Referring to the children of Joseph, it has already been said that, throughout Swât, the inhabitants belong to the great Akozai Division. Speaking generally, the Khwazozai sections are mainly on the north of the valley, the Ranizai occupy the west end, and the Baizai the left bank along a considerable length. The two latter have overflowed for some distance to the south of the Mora range, up to our Border by the Lundkhwâr valley, being there known as "Sâm" or lowlanders, in contradistinction to "Bar" or highlanders. But all the natural divisions of the Swât valley, down to each minor glen, are occupied by different clans, with as many factions as villages; and even in these often several factions, each, with its own quarrels and its own chief, not seldom at mortal feud with his neighbours.

The whole valley is highly cultivated, and densely populated, each glen or gorge has its village or hamlet, and the total population has been estimated at not far short of 100,000 souls. The fields are in terraces one above another, extensively irrigated by channels diverted from the river or the torrents flowing into it. The course of the river itself, working from side to side of the valley is marked by more numerous villages, groves of trees, and almost unbroken cultivation. The very burying grounds, usually especially sacred to Pathâns, are regularly ploughed up, and the dead buried in the fallow lands; hardly a single yard of tillable ground is neglected. Wheat and most grains, sugarcane, lucerne, tobacco, lots of vegetables, are extensively grown, and Upper Swât yields excellent fruits. In the hot weather, when a great portion of the valley can be irrigated, the lands everywhere near the river are a sheet of luxuriant rice, the steamy exhalations from which no doubt contribute largely to the unhealthiness of the valley. Picturesque it is in the extreme; the upper reaches of the mountains are well clothed with forests of pine or deodar; below lies a beautiful velvet-like turf, and again stretches of cultivation, dotted with houses—wretched hovels enough, but artistically half hidden among rich clusters of plane or poplar; and bright clear streams everywhere rushing down to the brisk noisy Swât, dashing over its boulder-strewn bed, like a Scotch salmon river. All the same, the notorious insalubrity of the valley is a very serious drawback to all this beauty. Completely shut in by the high ranges referred to, the winter is much milder than in the plains; there is little frost, and still less wind; almost without a breeze, it is the very reverse of a Pathân highland, while the hot weather is more oppressive and continuous. The storms that burst over the hills produce little more than an atmosphere of hot steam, which, combined with the malaria from the rice cultivation, seems to bring on fevers which affect the entire inhabitants, who all look more or less unhealthy. The men especially are weak, thin, and feeble, hardly resembling Pathâns in form or feature, and more like the Gujar of the Lower Punjâb. The women, on the other hand, seem curiously much less affected, for they are described as stout, strong, and buxom, and though by no means good looking, retain far more of the Pathân appearance. They have, moreover, entirely reversed the position of the sexes prevailing in ordinary Pathân communities. Not only do they go unveiled, and enjoy more liberty, but rule the men to a greater extent than is known among Pathâns elsewhere. The men of the Swât valley are, in fact, credited with living to a great extent under petticoat influence.

Swât, however, is only one of a series, that, parallel or nearly so, drain into the same river. Five of the principal of these unite to form the group known as Panjkora—"the five torrents"—which is also the name of the stream, that, having absorbed the drainage of Bajâwar and Talash, joins the Swât, as already noticed. All are more or less narrow, hill-bound, valleys, with many glens and gorges defiling into them, the whole sloping steeply from the north-east to the south-west. The description of Swât answers generally for all; villages with strips of terraced cultivation, a range of hills rising behind, a stream flowing past in front, which, as the snow melts, is frequently impassable; the country equally fertile, but with a finer peasantry and much better climate, a colder winter and a healthy summer. A country suggestive of plenty, where 90 lbs of wheat can be bought for one rupee, a fat sheep for three, and a buffalo for fifteen; where animal fat, being plentiful, is largely turned into soap—a commodity so foreign to Pathâns—it stamps the people with a civilization of their own. And unique in another respect, it is reputed exceptionally safe and hospitable to all travellers and traders who are enterprising enough to get there. Enterprising they must needs be, for it is almost without roads—the best being mere tracks winding along precipitous slopes, skirting the river banks, with very occasional passes across the hills possible only for foot passengers or draft cattle, and at times, from floods in the valleys or snow on the mountains, altogether impracticable. Nevertheless, there is a caravan route through both Swât and Panjkora to Chitrâl and Turkestân, reputed a three months' journey.

The chief of the group is the Yusafzai Ultima Thule, right up under the base of the Laori range, the valley or valleys of Dir, also the name of the principal town and residence of the Khân, who is the recognised head of the Malizai Division, and whose authority extends from the Swât boundary up to the passes leading west into Kunâr and Bajâwar, which mark the furthest limits of the Yusafzai. The town of Dir, which boasts a respectable fortress, is one of the principal marts of the country, and is the centre of exchange for produce brought by the Chitrâlis from the north, and by the Yusafzai and Khattak carriers from the south.

Omitting minor valleys, like the Talash, which, along side the Swât, is said to be exceptionally rich in grain, and the still less known tributary ones, like Biraul, or Barawal, reputed to be equally rich in iron; a route from Maidân, the most southern of the series, leads altogether out of the limits of Yusafzai, into Bajâwar, that, by comparison, is almost open country; the valley being in places as much as fifteen miles wide and some forty in length. Here again are great natural advantages. It does a fair trade in grain, especially wheat, and affords excellent grazing ground for large herds of cattle, but is chiefly known in connection with the supply of iron, which is largely exported to Peshawur. The iron is obtained mainly from black sand washed down by the streams, and mixed with charcoal, is fused into a consistent mass, which sells in Peshawur from three to six rupees per maund or 80 lbs. Fine forests of oak and pine abound in the neighbouring hills, and the climate is said to be like that of Kâbul. It has lately been the subject of a great deal of unpleasant attention on the part of the Amir, who evidently persists in endeavouring to establish his authority there; though heretofore it has been a distinctly independent State, only paying tribute to Kâbul when forced to do so. The ruling people are the Turkolânis, numbering probably 10,000 to 15,000 fighting men, whose immigration has been noticed, and whose Chief rejoiced in the title of "Bâz" or Bâdshâh. The "Bâz" possesses almost absolute power to break or bind, is independent of the jirgah and enjoys a large revenue, derived from a tax levied on the Hindkis, and a land rent from the Rudbâris, a mongrel race the most numerous in the valley, who probably represent the remnant of the aborigines subdued by the Turkolânis. This absolute government is in marked contrast to the custom of Yusafzai, otherwise the people resemble one another in many ways.

West of these again is the Kunâr river and Kâfîristân, with which latter people Bajâwar is generally at war, carrying off Kâfirs as slaves whenever opportunity offers. While east, between Bajâwar and our Border, are the hills of the Utmân Khels, who occupy the strip between the Mohmands and the Yusafzai. From our actual Border, up to the Koh-i-Mohr mountain, is called the Larmân or Damân, and the larger number of the clans are located in a series of valleys which radiate from this mountain. Everywhere the country is difficult in the extreme, there are few roads passable for horsemen, and the only means of crossing the Swât, which here rushes between steep cliffs a deep swift torrent, are a few rope bridges. As a tribe, the Utmân Khels are comparatively unimportant, probably under 5,000 fighting men. They are neither powerful nor influential, their country more like that of the Mohmands, cultivation being very inconsiderable, and the people eking out a scanty livelihood as labourers in the Peshawur district. They are, however, quite a distinct people, unconnected with any surrounding Pathâns, either Mohmands, Bajâuris, or Yusafzais, and claim to be descended from the five sons of Utmân Bâba, who came in with one of Mahmud's expeditions, and settled in the Peshawur valley about 997 A.D. During the first years of British occupation they did a great deal of raiding, sheltering outlaws, and mischief generally, and in 1852, were summarily punished by an expedition under Sir Colin Campbell. In 1876, when the Swât canal was being made, a gang of them came down and hacked to pieces a number of Pathân coolies, an outrage that remained unpunished till 1878, when certain of their villages were surprised by the "Guides" under Cavagnari, their ringleaders killed, and the fullest retribution exacted; since when the Utmân Khels have given no further trouble. They are a hardy set of mountain brigands, tall, stout, fair, sober, and hardworking—often naked from the waist up—a custom opposed to Pathân ideas—but not very civilized. They live in small groups of houses, rather than villages, stuck on the mountain sides, secure in their inaccessibility.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

BUNEYR AND THE BUNEYRWALS.

To look at a Frontier map, even one of the famous India Office "large maps," and find Yusafzai printed across a big space between Kâfiristân and Kashmir, does not convey much idea of that country, nor make clear that the Yusafzais of Swât are separated from their relations of Buneyr, and the valleys draining directly into the Indus, by so formidable a barrier. A range of mountains, seldom less than 20 miles wide, with peaks like the Ilum, over 9,000 feet, or the Dosirra, over 10,000 feet, though there are several passes more or less practicable. The family connection of the clans on both sides would probably bring them together in cases of emergency, but Buner and its neighbouring valleys may to all intents and purposes be considered a separate group, and the tribes, under the name of Buneyrwals.

Geographically, the position of the group is somewhat as follows. Commencing from opposite Torbela on the Indus, and from the boundary of our Border on the right bank, the Gadun country extends right up to the crest of the Mahâban Mountain, or rather that cluster of peaks and ranges which, rising 7,000 feet from the Indus, extend back as a great spur of the Mora, or Ilum. A thoroughly classic ground; the "Great Forest" of the early Aryans; the "Sinai" of Sanskrit, where Arjuna wrestled with God, and, like the Jewish Jacob, though defeated, still won his irresistible weapon, ground that if not identical with Alexander's Aornos, is probably not very distant; that was famous for its numerous monasteries (Mahâwana) when Hwen Thsang visited it in 630 A.D., and is studded with ruins to this day.

The Jaduns, or Gaduns, who now occupy the southern slope of this famous historical hill, are not Yusafzais at all, or even distantly connected with them. Their name is evidence of their Indian origin; but though not improbably the descendants of Rājputs, they have nevertheless thrown in their lot with their neighbours. Further to the west are the Khudu Khels, and immediately on the other side of the range is the Chamla Valley, the eastern end of which, adjoining the Indus, is known as the Amazai country. A spur of the Guru Mountain separates the Chamla Valley from the larger and more important one of Buner, or Buneyr, an irregular oval with the Barandu, a perennial stream running down the centre. Beyond, again, are three or four more narrow, deep, and winding valleys or gorges between as many ranges, with small tributaries to the Indus down the centre of each, of which the largest are the Puran, Chakesur, Kâna, and Ghorband—the latter called after the range at the head of it, and all exceedingly difficult of access.

The clans of the group collectively known as the Buneyrwals, numerous, and in some respects divergent, as they occasionally are, mostly, as already noticed, claim their descent from Joseph's sons, Musa and Mali. The Amazais and Khudu Khels are only distant connections, being descendants of Mandanr, though, for political purposes, all may be treated as more or less influenced by Buneyr. The characteristics of the climate of Swât would serve as a fairly accurate description of Buneyr, though the latter is rather more open, a trifle more healthy, and a thought less feverish in autumn. Perhaps equally fertile, it is richer in cattle, but poorer in grain, which to some extent is imported; while as regards the ranges that surround it, and the difficulties of communication with the outer world, the difference is only one of degree. In both cases, the direct approaches from British territory are the easiest. Among the best known is one from Ghazi Bala, at the head of the Lundkhwâr Valley, by Pali and Sherkhâna in Baizai, and Bâzdara—the “falcon country,” a name suggestive of difficulties—into the Salarzai district of Buneyr. Another in more general use by merchants, is by Rustam in the Sudum Valley, and the Malandri Pass into the Nurazai district of Buneyr. A third, still better known, is the Ambeyla—the “Rhinoceros” pass, according to the old Persian—the scene of the long and hard fighting in 1863, by way of the Chamla Valley. Finally, on the east, having crossed the Indus, Buneyr can, with still more difficulty, be entered by the defile of the Barandu River.

The people themselves are infinitely superior to the enfeebled men of Swât; in fact, there are in many ways few finer specimens of Pathâns than the Buneyrwals. Simple and temperate, they are content with the plain wholesome food, the produce of their own cattle and lands; courteous and hospitable to all who claim shelter, treachery to a stranger seeking refuge among them, being considered the deepest reproach that could fall upon the clansmen, and such a case is almost unknown. Upright in their dealings, with enemies as well as with strangers, they have always been adverse to us, and though probably not anxious to begin the war, they were among our most determined enemies during the Ambeyla campaign. They seem to avoid, as far as possible, intercourse with our officers, but to discourage robbery and outrage within our limits. Among the list of their misdeeds, there are hardly any of raiding, and though they harbour many outlaws, are seldom found participating in the depredations committed. Patriotic they certainly are, and in their way, which is a pastoral and agricultural one, industrious, though they hold all trade in the very lowest estimation; anything that savours of the shop or of trading is anathema to a Buneyrwal.

Therefore they are poor, but, for poor Pathâns, have an exceptional regard for the law of meum and tuum. Their word, once given through the council of the tribe, may, according to Warburton, be depended on with almost certainty. Lastly, they are "distinguished for their ignorance," and ignorance being the "mother of devotion," they are deeply religious; greatly under the influence of the most bigoted of Mullahs, Sayuds, Pirs, and the many varieties of the priestly class, which is probably the most powerful and prosperous section of the community; while, if there is any section whose heritage ought to be one of woe, it is this: for it is from the priests most of the offences come, throughout the whole of Yusafzai.

From the late Yusafzai Pope and kingmaker, the venerable and venerated Akhund of Swât, who at one time in his career and before the tribes had learnt the lesson taught them by the Ambeyla campaign, encouraged a system of marauding on our frontier, and undoubtedly incited his followers to deeds of depredation and violence, and finally, allying himself with fanatics he abhorred, and stigmatised as "Wahâbis," brought all his priestly influence to bear against us in the severest Frontier struggle we ever had; to the ill conditioned, evil intentioned, fanatics of Sittana and Malka, the remains of the organised bands of Mujahidins—the "warriors of the Faith" that Sayud Ahmad of Bareilly grafted on to the most turbulent and superstitious of the border races—the ill-feeling of adventurers, yclept saintly, has been at the bottom of most of the mischief in Yusafzai.

Such adventurers have often, for their own ends, beguiled the simple and credulous children of Joseph, have scattered distrust among the clans, fomented rebellion, and intrigued with Wahâbis and the disaffected Muhammadan population from one end of India to the other. From the days of the Mughal, to the present, colonies in the recesses of the mountains on the Peshawur and Hazâra border, calling themselves "nurseries of saints," but that are really "hot beds of fanatics," have provided veritable Caves of Adullam for all the malcontents on both sides of it. Among the Adullamites may occasionally be burning enthusiasts, who are too pious or too zealous to live quietly under a Government tolerating all creeds; but the larger number are either grossly ignorant or exceedingly crafty, and many are criminals of sorts, debtors, convicts, traitors, murderers, too guilty to find a refuge anywhere else.

The larger number of our complications with the tribes on this part of the Border have been due to the intrigues of these fanatics. The colony of Sittana was a chronic cause of disturbance from the Sikh times. They were to a great extent responsible for the misconduct of the Hassanzais in 1851, and an expedition became necessary against them in 1853. They tried to form a general coalition against us in 1857, and their constant outrages necessitated a second expedition in 1858, that drove them out of Sittana only to settle again in Malka on the northern slope of the Mahâban. Two years after they had regained their influence, and become worse than ever. "Disloyalty of all kinds flocked," as Hunter describes, "to the Apostles of Insurrection." Ultimately, in 1863, they forced upon us the Ambeyla campaign, where tribe after tribe was drawn in, until we had at one time nearly 60,000 of the Yusufzai clans and their allies in the field against us. There they learnt a severe lesson, but a lesson that also cost us much, both in money and men, some 900 of the latter being killed or wounded. The combination broken up, the tribes revenged themselves on the fanatics who had brought war into their valleys, more especially on the Hindustânis; but again in 1868 the priestly party were within a measurable distance of raising another tribal combination on the Black Mountain, which only prompt measures, undertaken at the most unfavourable season of the year, suppressed.

It would be tedious to trace their efforts at mischief since. but it is not too much to say that this class of men has, under the guise of religion, contributed more than anything else to keep alive the spirit of unrest, and continues to this day the most formidable element of danger on our Border, a danger that cannot be overlooked, though it is at times perhaps not sufficiently appreciated.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

A BORDER POPE.

BORN during the closing years of the last century, at Jabrai, a shepherd's hamlet in Upper Swât, of poor and obscure parents, probably Gujars—though his disciples have since discovered a religious origin even for them—Abdul Gafur, like other famous Eastern heroes, passed his early boyhood tending his father's sheep. And, just like the good little boys and early saints of the story books, his childhood is credited with a precocious development of those gifts and graces said to find such certain divine acceptance. He would not drink the milk of the cattle that trespassed on unlawful grounds. The single buffalo that "for years" generously supplied him with this nurture, he always led to pasture with a string, instead of whacking it with a cudgel, after the manner of Gujar boys generally, and finally took to muzzling the goats when driving them out, lest they took a sly nibble at the neighbours' pasture. A custom, so far removed from the average Gujar notion of the fitness of things, must have ensured him summary and regular mortification at his parents' hands. It is, therefore, quite intelligible that, at eighteen years of age, he had discovered the world was a wicked one, and resolved to sever himself from it, and devote his talents to a religious life.

No Samuel came to anoint him. No distinguished order of a powerful church was ready to welcome him as a convert, and make him into its champion. According to the custom of the country, he attached himself to a priest, and became a "seeker-after-wisdom." For some time, he wandered from ziârat to mosque, from Pir to Mullah, from Fakir to Saint, of whom not a few had a great reputation for sanctity, and having gone through a course of the four modes of religious devotion, he especially selected the Nakshbandia, a perfectly silent and motionless one, in which the devotee sits, his head bowed on his chest, and his eyes fixed on the ground. And, the better to ensure its undisturbed observance, he took up his abode at Beka, a bare, barren, lonely spot on the banks of the Indus, about ten miles above Attock. Here he built himself a camelthorn hut and, about the year the Western world was fighting the battle of Waterloo, settled down, a young man, hardly twenty years of age, to a life of the greatest austerity. For twelve years he remained shut off from the world, absorbed in study, meditation and worship; his food during this period of penance was the seed of a very inferior millet¹ growing wild in the rice-fields, moistened with water.

In after-years the water was replaced by buffalo's milk, but, till his death, at the age of eighty-three, his only food was of an equally simple kind, and his only dissipation, large quantities of strong tea, which he subsequently drank to keep him sufficiently awake to perform his religious exercises. The ascetic rigour of his life gradually brought people from far and near to solicit blessings or intercessory prayers. His fame dates from this period of marvellous self-restraint. It spread from the Indus to the Kurram, from the Kurram to Kâbul; the renown of "the Hermit of Beka" finally extending throughout Eastern Afghânistân, to distant parts of Persia.

Temptation, however, came to the hermit once too often, perhaps in the shape of secular ambition—or it might with equal fairness be said, in the shape of patriotism—for in 1827 he got mixed up between his neighbour the Khân of Hund, and the famous Wahâbi, Sayud Ahmad of Bareilly. The former, who had just joined his forces with the Sayud, proved traitor and betrayed the latter's plans to Runjeet Singh, being in his turn betrayed and slain. To Abdul Gafur, the result meant abandoning his retreat and flight; a serious blow to his prestige, that cost him years of wandering, unknown and uncared for, to make good. It was not till he established himself in British Yusafzai, and had added miracles to devotion, that his notoriety as a "Man of God" made him again a centre of attraction, and earned him the titles of "Saint" and Akhund.

¹ A mere weed, Panicum frumentaceum.

On at least two subsequent occasions the spirit of the patriot and the "warrior for the faith," proved too much for the asceticism of the saint. In 1835, when the Afghâns were at war with the Sikhs, and the Pathâns were rallying against their natural and hereditary enemies, he accepted an invitation from the Kâbul Amir, Dost Muhammad Khân, and joined the latter with a pious following, numerically considerable. But, ill-trained and worse armed, such a contingent could at best have been of little use against the disciplined Sikh army. The mere approach of Maharajah Runjeet Singh was sufficient to drive the Amir precipitately through the Khaibar, and scatter the rabble "champions of the faith" in all directions. The "warriors," "martyrs," and "seekers after wisdom" were noisy, but had small stomach to try conclusions with the Sikhs; and the Akhund had no choice, but to seek safety in Buneyr, and return to his life of unrest once more.

Again during the general tribal excitement that preceded the Ambeyla campaign in 1863, he was drawn into preaching a crescentade against us; for a while throwing in his lot even with the Wahâbi fanatics, whose tenets he had spent so much of his life in opposing. At this time he was close upon seventy years of age.

For the previous twenty he had mainly held himself aloof from the affairs of this world, preached peace, and counselled the tribes to avoid quarrels with the British Government. In 1847, he had used his best influence to prevent the people of Swât from assisting the rebellious Bazai villages punished by our troops. In 1849, he endeavoured to persuade the Palli people to discharge their gangs of highwaymen, and refrain from raiding. When the fugitive mutineers of the 55th Native Infantry, flying from Nicholson, entered Swât, he summarily deported them across the Indus, where they were cut up almost to a man; and all through the troublous times of 1857, his attitude was one of friendly support to our Government, which assuming the lowest motive, does credit to his sagacity and foresight. On one or two occasions he took measures to repress the colonies of Hindustâni fanatics whom he stigmatized as kâfirs, and several theories have been put forward as to the reasons which actuated him in so entirely changing his front. There is really no need to go far for a reason; the pressure brought to bear upon him was practically irresistible. The Buneyr and other tribal chiefs and people, the mullahs and the priestly classes, who for the moment had put aside their sectarian disputes, and even the women made passionate appeals to him to take up their cause. This, combined with the fear of seeing his influence, then immense, pass to some more sympathetic and compliant leader, furnish motive enough, for an action that after all was again more patriotic than personal.

He accepted defeat handsomely. The expedition over, he resumed his former attitude, and for the concluding years of his life seems to have tried to restrain the wild spirits of the Border, resisted all the requests from Kâbul to make cause with the Amir against us, and remained firm in his attitude of friendship, nominal and diplomatic, if not sincere, towards our Government, till his death in January 1877. Among his last acts, he condemned the Jawâki raiders who appealed to him, as thieves and rascals for plundering their co-religionists in Kohât, and excommunicated the authors of the Swât Canal outrage at Abazai.

A few years after his defeat by the Sikhs, his wanderings were more or less brought to a close by a grant of land at Saidu in Swât, which the Yusafzais gave him for his own and his disciples' support, and which he ever after made his home. There he lived surrounded by numerous disciples, visited by crowds of devotees who looked upon him as practising all the saintly virtues, and performing the most astounding miracles. Credited at once with the possession of the purse of Fortunatus, the lamp of Aladdin, the Nepenthe of the Egyptian physician, and the Elixir Vitæ for all mortal ills, hundreds of visitors were daily fed and clothed, their multitudinous desires all gratified, the distracted in mind and body soothed, and the sick cured of their ailments. No matter how numerous the pilgrims who waited at his threshold, funds were never wanting to supply their necessities, though in outward appearance he remained as poor as the humblest, took no taxes or tithes, and steadily refused all offerings brought to him. It was no more necessary for him than for Elijah to take thought for the morrow. His simple wants were easily supplied, and every morning, on rising from his prayers, a sum of money, sufficient for the day's needs, was found under the praying carpet. Whether the ravens or the disciples were the custodians of the saintly treasure chest is an immaterial detail.

The fame of the Hermit of Beka was almost obscurity, compared to the influence of the Akhund of Swât. His ascendancy over the Muhammadans of the Border and Eastern Afghânistân, was as great as that of Loyola in Rome, or Luther in Saxony; his edicts regarding religious customs and secular observances were as unquestioned as the Papal Bulls in Spain. When the chiefs of Swât recognized the possibility of British military operations extending to their valley, and the necessity for federation, it was to the Akhund they turned to select them a king. His selection was a Sayud of Sittana, who for some years carried on an organized Government, under the patronage of the Border Pope. Putting aside the incredulous stories about him as priest, his life seems to have been one of devotion, humility, abstinence, and charity; the doctrines he taught were as tolerant and liberal, as those of his Wahâbi opponents were intolerant and puritanical. Judged by the standard applied to other religious leaders, he used his influence, according to his lights, for good, supporting peace and morality, discouraging feuds, restraining the people from raiding and offences against their neighbours, and enforcing the precepts of Muhammadan law as far as ineradicable Pathân custom would permit him.

Celibacy he by no means regarded as the highest form of virtue, for he married a Yusafzai woman of the Akozai clan, by whom he had two sons and one daughter. The eldest of the former, Abdul Mannân, the Mian Gul, after his father's death, became involved in a struggle for supremacy in Swât with the Khân of Dir; and in 1883, aided by the Chief of Bajaur, and the virtue of his father's name, established himself for a brief while; when death cut short his chances of any wide-spread power, either spiritual or temporal. The younger son, Abdul Haq, still lives, an ascetic and a hermit, after the fashion of his father, but entirely without his father's influence, and outside his valley almost unknown. The Border Pontificate can be no more hereditary than plenary inspiration or apostolic succession; and no Border Pontiff has yet arisen who can successfully fill the chair of his eminence Abdul Gafur, the Akhund of Swât.

CHAPTER XXXV.

APOSTLES OF INSURRECTION.

CONSIDERING the Pathân's eminently material form of faith, his confidence in saints and shrines, prophets and priests, prayers and pilgrimages, it is not a little curious that religious reformers directly opposed to all this should from time to time have obtained such influence on the Border. It can hardly be put down to the virtue of toleration; for there are few more bitter feuds than have arisen between Sunni and Shiah Muhammadans, or Gâr and Sâmil politicians. There is certainly less difference between the orthodox believers in the Four Companions, and those who are the followers of 'Ali, than between the ritualistic Pathân and the puritanical Wahâbi, the latter very often a despised Hindustâni to boot. Yet in spite of the long record of mischief, and the troubles which this mischief has led to, colonies of these and other religious adventurers of all sorts have been sheltered, and, so long as they refrained from interfering with Pathân custom, have been protected, and even cherished. The complications due to their intrigues were as notorious three centuries ago as at present; but, except in the matter of trouble to us, the fanatics of Palosi and Maidan are as distinct from the surrounding clans as ever, and probably as little loved. To the tribesmen they have been as much an influence for evil, as Mephistopheles to Faust; perhaps for a somewhat similar reason, for they have held out a temptation to the Border Pathân that is most dear, the hope of robbery and plunder. It may be said, moreover, that all the dangerous heresies that have afflicted the posterity of Kais, have been drawn from Hindustân, and after they have taken root in a soil especially devoted to their rapid development, the produce has been returned with interest—in a crop of fanatical thorns in the side of the dominant power for the time being, whether Mughal, Sikh or English.

In the middle of the sixteenth century quite a bumper crop arose out of an apostle who called himself Pir Rokhan the “saint of enlightenment,” or Pir Tarik the “saint of darkness,” as he was more properly termed by the opposition. Bazid Answari, to give him his full designation, was the son of a learned, devout and orthodox Mullah in the Masaud Waziri capital of Kaniguram, where by the way a colony of intriguing Sayuds still flourishes. Brought up within the strict pale of the church, his early youth is said to have been “edifying;” but he went away, travelled, fell into evil company, consorted with Jogis and others, who taught the Mullah’s son too much. He learnt a little philosophy from the Sufis, adopted a good deal of the Hindu dogmas regarding transmigration of souls; grafted on this some startling theories of his own, and went home to promulgate heresies enough to turn his father’s beard grey. In fact the Mullah’s feelings were so outraged, that he prepared to close the argument—and Bazid’s career—with the usual knife. The latter came to the common conclusion there was no chance for a prophet in his own country, and so left it; and, after a life of adventure established himself on the Peshawur Border, adding to religious heresy, the preaching of sedition against the State. He put aside the Korân, the shrines, the miracles, or any set form of religion, and taught that divine manifestations were made in the persons of holy men, particularly in his own. The only way to heaven was through the intercession of the Pir Kâmil, “the perfect saint.” He had also inspiration or genius enough to see, that in order to succeed he must adapt his creed to the wild Border people; and he made his religious discipline proportionately lax and accommodating. All men who did not recognize his sect were considered as dead, and their goods were the property of the survivors, to be seized when or where the self-created heirs might find opportunity. This, joined to the further inducement of libertinism in the matter of women, and a sort of social communism in the matter of property, at any rate of other people's property, offered a form of Church Government that obviously commended itself greatly to the Afridis, Orakzais, and lawless clans of the Peshawur Valley. Eventually, though Bazid was strongly opposed by the Yusafzais and the even more famous champion of orthodoxy, Akhun Darwaiza, he was accepted at his own value by a large number of the tribesmen, was able to raise considerable forces, and enter upon an irregular warfare with the Mughal ruler. He and his following became to Akbar, what the Wahâbis were to the Sikhs, and the Hindustani fanatics to the British Government. They systematically plundered the high road from Peshawur to Kâbul, until communications were almost entirely cut off, in spite of operations undertaken against them by Mân Singh and others of Akbar's leading generals.

Finally the "perfect saint" was surprised in a night attack, and died not long after at Hastnagar; but five sons followed their father's steps and with their bands infested the Border, until they were gradually hunted down, and burned, drowned, or beheaded, which was the Mughal notion of a punitive expedition. The memory of two is perpetuated by a pair of most dangerous rocks, Kamaliya and Jalaliya, opposite the Attock ferry on the Indus. These rocks were so christened by Akbar, for being as troublesome and dangerous to his boats, as the two most notorious sons of Pir Tarik had been to his troops. Gradually the heresy died out, but a grandson named Ihdâd, flourished in Tirah at the head of a band of religious burglars and sanctified highwaymen for many years, harrying his neighbours with exceptional cruelty and success.

No sects made a stronger point of condemning sepulchral honours to holy men, prostration before shrines, encouragement to their keepers, and the kind of religious exercises which Pathâns most affect, than the Wahâbis, or Muhammadan Unitarians; and yet no more formidable apostle of insurrection ever appeared on the North-West Frontier in India, than Sayud Ahmad of Bareilly. The colonies which he planted still exist, and the strength of their fanaticism has just been made evident during the Black Mountain campaign by the two hundred who came on to certain death at Kot Kai. The career of this particular man is well known in connection with the State trial of his supporters in India, and has been sketched in powerful lines by Hunter in his Indian Musalmans. A horse-soldier under a Pindari freebooter, a student of Arabic under the learned doctors of Delhi, a passionate pilgrim to Mecca, a zealous reformer of the faith of Islâm, proclaiming his divine commission to extirpate the infidel world from the Sikhs to the Chinese, his really great success was among the mountains of the Yusafzai. The tribes cared little for his reforms: when it came to the point they would have none of them. They massacred his retinue, and very nearly made an end of "the just prophet, the defender of the faith" himself, when he essayed to reform their marriage customs. They preferred to go on selling their women, and keeping their miracles; but they responded with enthusiasm when he proclaimed a holy war against the rich Sikh towns of the Punjâb. The chance of plundering the Hindus was a delight not to be missed. Those who fell, had the apostle's assurance of heaven as martyrs for the faith; and, better still, those who returned would be laden with booty.

The *Jihad*¹ against the infidel Sikhs began in 1826. To raiding, the apostle's followers added burning and murder, and for a while carried all before them. In 1830 they reached their culminating point by capturing Peshawur. The Sikhs retaliated by expeditions that were exterminative rather than punitive. The villagers turned out and hunted back the fugitives into the mountains, destroying them like wild beasts. The history of the time is a record of the bitterest hatred. The traditions tell of massacre without mercy. Hunter quotes one instance in which the very land tenure, was a tenure by blood, certain village lands being held by the Hindu borderers on payment to the Sikh grantees of an annual hundred heads of the Hassan Khel. The decline of Sayud Ahmad's fame as an apostle came after his ill-advised effort to reform the Pathân marriage customs, which was really an attempt to provide wives for his own Hindustânis. Something like the Sicilian Vespers were repeated, the fiery cross was passed round the hills as the signal for the massacre of his agents, and in one hour,—the hour of evening prayer—they were murdered by the tribesmen almost to a man. In 1831 he was finally disposed of by the Sikh army under Sher Sing. He was slain and his followers for the time being almost exterminated. Out of some 1,600, not more than 300 are said to have left the field alive. The Sikhs made apostolic succession almost impossible.

¹ Holy war.

Nevertheless the colonies re-established by Sayud Ahmad's lieutenants, and recruited by the disaffected from India, and outlaws or individual Border ruffians, were left as a legacy to the British Government—perhaps one of the most troublesome legacies we took over with the Punjâb. Against the colonies at Sittana among the Utmanzais, at Malka on the slopes of the Mahâbun, at Zazkata in Buneyr, among the Black Mountain tribes on both sides of the Indus, there stands a long record of campaigns, a great expenditure of men and money, due mainly to their agency. Where they have not openly undertaken hostile operations against us, they have proved to be at the bottom of most of the tribal complications. Their nominal object a crescentade against English, Hindu or infidel Kâfirs of any sort, they seem never to lose an opportunity of inspiring ill-feeling, and to be always ready to join hands with any lawless Khân, or clan, that can be persuaded into taking the initiative. The colonies of Palosi and Maidân were founded after the Akhund of Swât used his influence to move them out of Buneyr; and from the Black Mountain Expedition of 1868 to the one of 1888 they have steadily practised their apostolic vocation of preaching sedition among the tribes, who have at length brought on themselves a just retribution for following their advice. Even of late years, though so much may not have been heard of them, they are known to have been active enough for mischief. During the last Buneyr difficulties in 1885 they were ready to join the Buneyrwals; and their missionaries were canvassing supporters in India for funds in anticipation of a disturbance. In the same year their leader, an old Maulvie of Maidân, had the effrontery to demand a contribution of 5,000 rupees from the Deputy Commissioner of Hazâra, and to threaten reprisals if it was not paid. The more closely the events which led up to the recent Black Mountain expedition are investigated, the larger the share of intrigue that seems to be traced home to Palosi and kindred colonies like the Parari Sayads. It was from among the latter that a proclaimed outlaw found the partisans who fired on our villages in 1884, raided on Bagrian, shot down peaceable villagers in 1888, and kidnapped others continuously till 1889. And it was from Palosi that another better known proclaimed outlaw, Hâshim 'Ali Khân, whose name has figured conspicuously in the frontier disturbances of late, originally drew the most dangerous section of his followers.

Whether the severe lesson which the tribesmen have had at the hands of General Sir John MacQueen, will induce them to once for all turn out these disturbers of the peace, remains to be seen, but it is probable nothing would contribute more to the establishment of a permanent peace than a convention for the summary extradition of all the insurrectionary apostles in future.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

BORDER ROMANCE—A PATHÂN ROMEO AND JULIET.

ALTHOUGH in a sense the Border Benedick includes a wife or two among the properties with which he has to set himself up, and to pay for at the ruling market rates; and though the position of Pathân womenkind may too often be somewhat inferior to that of the remaining live-stock—hewers of wood, and drawers of water, rather harder worked than the ordinary household donkeys—it must not be supposed that their menkind are by any means impervious to the arrows of the blind god, or that in Border hamlets, courts, camps, and groves, the warriors or saints, are not ruled by exactly the same little word so potent everywhere else. The character of the most ruffianly and murderous tribesman has at times quite another side. For the most part, a love for the song and the dance is a common characteristic. The famous Khattak dance is an institution familiar to even the most casual visitors. The huge blazing camp fire, the flashing swords, the circle of performers going round with weird movements, and dancing to the music of a wild chaunt. The Khattak pipes are as thrilling on the Punjâb Border as the slogan to any Highlander, only rather more piercing. Festive gatherings are more or less common all along it, and wherever they have not been prohibited by the Mullabs, music and dancing make up the best part of the amusement for both sexes. The performer on the flageolet (surna), the drum, and the guitar (rabâb), never fails to find a sympathetic audience, more especially if he adds a chaunt recounting the daring deeds of a warrior clansman, or trolls forth a love song, more or less anacreontic. The mirasi, or improvisatore, occasionally adds a little acting and burlesque, and if he varies this with a not uncommon spice of impropriety, fairly brings down the house.

To be able to play the guitar—for the rabâb has wire strings played with the hand or a short bow, and is more like a guitar than a fiddle—is no more discredit to a Pathân than it was to a Crusader, and the former will occasionally set himself down by the road, substitute the rabâb for the rifle, and do his best to vie with the mirasi in playing; accompanying himself by singing some favourite Pathân ballad in a very loud, but not by any means inharmonious voice. Similarly a gang of Pathân workmen will draw up together after a long day's tramp, and possibly a short meal, and troll out a wild chorus half the night.

Like the rest of the world, the Pathân has also his romance, in fact far more of it than most of his neighbours in Hindustân. Elphinstone doubts if there are any people in the East, except the Afghân and Pathân, that know anything of the sentiment of love, according to the Western idea of that passion. There are many Border courtships that are not done according to regulation, and much love-making managed without a go-between. An enterprising Khân does not always wait till the arrangements about the hiri, or marriage dowry are made up. If he does not mind fighting, he can get a sweetheart without her parents' consent, by stealing a lock of her hair, snatching off her veil, or mantilla, or the still simpler expedient of eloping with her. Nor is the Yusafzai always so dull as to observe the etiquette laid down for him of waiting till the marriage ceremonies are over before seeing his bride. He steals under cover of night to her house, and has a secret understanding with mamma, who contrives to leave the couple alone together and square papa, by whom the visit would be considered a deadly affront if he officially knew it. And these little kisses under the rose, "sports of the betrothed," as they are termed in Pushtu, no doubt compensate for any little delay in the remaining negotiations.

But besides the abduction and elopements, either with maid or matron, and the other dangers which so many Pathâns are ready to encounter in the cause of love—and in this Elphinstone's comparisons with the West seem very appropriate—there are lots of instances of what might be romantic attachments: where young couples fall in love, exchange pledges, have stern parents demanding solid assurance in the shape of land and beeves, and who have to separate, the one to work, and the other to wait, just for all the world like similar Western stories.

Their ballads, songs, and tales, moreover, mainly tell of love and war, occasionally in a very dramatic way. There is no Border Shakespeare, but the most popular of all the Border poems or tales might have been based on the story of Romeo and Juliet. Famous, more especially throughout the whole Yusafzai-country—it tells in good manly Pushtu the touching story of the loves of Adam Khân and Durkhâni—is perhaps the most representative specimen of Border folklore, and gives a particularly graphic account of one of the most pleasing phases of Border life.

The story, which has been noticed by many writers, from Elphinstone downwards, and translated from both Persian and Pushtu versions, but most completely by the late Major Plowden from the Pushtu edition compiled at Peshawur by Mulvi Ahmad of Tangi, goes back to the days when the Yusufzais of Swât used to leave their mountain fastnesses and come down at the end of every summer to the plains in the Peshawur Valley. Before the famous Shaikh Malli had divided out the hill and plain country among the different tribes; when bows and arrows were still the common weapons, and Bârber had not yet introduced them to matchlocks;

the Mithakhel sept of the Abakhel clan had then their summer home at Barikot on the banks of the Swât river, and among them Adam Khân, the son of Hasn Khân, was the most distinguished of the clansmen for his good looks, his grace and his prowess. Renowned as a hardy sportsman and a skilful musician—and none could equal his skill in playing the rabâb (the Pathân guitar)—the Romeo of the story was recognized as the chief of an admiring circle of friends. Durkhâni, the Juliet, was a daughter of Tâus Khân, a wealthy chief of the Khasi Khel sept of the same clan, and lived at Ghalagân, a village close by. She was no less famous as the most charming and accomplished of her sex. "Everywhere was the fame of her beauty, her amiability, and her talents noised abroad. Nowhere at that time was there her equal."

The first scene of the lovers' meeting is variously described as by the snow-fed waters of Swât, or by the spring at Bâzdarra—"The Hawk's Eyrie"—to which Durkhâni resorted for water when the clans descended to the plains for the winter, a huge isolated rock being riven in twain to enable them to meet. A still more favourite trysting-place was a blacksmith's shop on the road to the Malakand Pass, where Adam took his horse to be shod, and Durkhâni her spindle to be mended. "Their eyes met, and from that moment they loved." Similar easily devised pretexts sufficed for many meetings, and a tree is still pointed out, grown from the peg to which Adam used to tether his horse.

But between the Mithakhels and the Khasikhels was a long standing feud. An ancient quarrel, as bitter as any in Verona, and Durkhâni was by her parents betrothed to "Paris"—in the shape of Payâwai, a powerful chief of the Babuzai, a third sept of the clan. The mutual passion of the lovers remained a secret, and Durkhâni observed a life of such privacy, that even at festival times, when social restraint is a good deal relaxed, no one could get a view of her face. With difficulty she is persuaded to go to her cousin Basaki's wedding, though a long promised bridesmaid, and only goes on the condition that she may remain closely veiled in her mantilla, if such a word may be used as a translation for a garment which covers not merely the face but the figure. Vowed to keep herself secluded from the view of either man or woman, she sets out accompanied by her duenna, who throughout might be the counterpart of Juliet's nurse, for she never loses an opportunity of pouring into her mistress's willing ear the praises of her lover. The cousins "gladden their hearts by recalling the events of their childhood," but none can succeed in obtaining a glimpse of the fair one's face. Bards vie with one another in making verses in her honour, verses of "such sweetness as to make e'en the sad smile and the happy weep." "They sang quatrains and roundelays till they were quite exhausted, but in vain. Durkhâni unveiled not her face."

Pathân Woman in a "Burka" or Mantilla.

Anon comes Adam, with two of his henchmen, who commence a serenade outside the courtyard, the verses of which in some of the metrical versions make up a large part of the poem. Durkhâni, touched by the strains, inquires from the duenna as to the singer. "A green parroquet is he," says she—the parroquet being held a type of manly beauty, as the nightingale is of song—"apparelled in right proper garments, and his two friends are his wings. If thou desirest to see him, this is thy time. Soon will he fly away, and then thou wilt grieve, for his name is Adam Khân." One of the "wings" extols her raven tresses, the other "her dainty arms, that, like polished blade, have cut in twain Adam's heart;" while he sings of the beauty of her face, laments in most touching notes his unhappy case, and speaks of seeking exile in some distant land. Durkhâni, recognizing the voice, her resolution no longer avails against the pleadings of her heart, and despite the duenna's cautions, she, "inflamed with the wine of love," flings the veil from her face, and, rushing out of the chamber to meet her lover, falls fainting to the ground.

"Modesty and shame, nay, wisdom her forsook :
Forgotten are by her the precepts of the book."¹

Her kinsfolk upbraid her for this most unseemly conduct, accuse her of being bewitched, and proceed to fumigate her with wild rue, to avert from her the evil eye. "Good aunt," she replies, "have done, I am not bewitched, and since I have by the flame of love been burnt, scorch me not again with fire. If you would cure me, send me forth with Adam, that I may fly with him." The secret is out; from that time their love is a matter of notoriety.

Then, in the version as compiled by Maulvi Ahmad, comes what may not inappropriately be compared with the balcony scene. Durkhâni and her party have gone home to their winter quarters in Lower Bâzdarra, the lovers contriving to meet again en route at their favourite springs. To Tâus Khan's house, with much caution, comes at dusk the Yusafzia Romeo, with Mercutio and Benvolio (Miru and Balo), and by the aid of a ladder made of a cradle, scale her courtyard. Balo holds Adam's horse Majnun, "the love bewitched;" Miru keeps watch; the usual troublesome boy Peter (Bucha) is silenced by a gift of some silver, and under the close curtain of civil night, some very dramatic love-passages take place. Parting is such sweet sorrow, Durkhâni will not let her lover go, though "she reflects that if day dawns, and her father becomes aware of Adam's presence, he may say naught to her, but he will kill him, and her heart will break."

¹ Viz., The Korân.

"The walls are high and hard to climb,
And the place death, considering who thou art,
If any of my kinsmen find thee here," are lines that might almost have been stolen by the Pushtu bard.

Now comes the soft breeze of the morning—"Nasim-i-Sahâr." The nurse is uneasy, "the cocks begin to crow," but it is Adam that urges, "methinks it still is night, the birds have crowed too soon." They are still exchanging vows, when "the village priest chaunts the call to prayers," and Miru has to interfere, and the nurse, abusing the rashness and imprudence of Adam, to contrive a pretext to remove the watchman.

Adam's love-lorn condition becomes obvious to everybody. "He is madly in love with Durkhâni," says his father. "What makes my dear brother look so sad?" remarks his little sister. Durkhâni declares her heart is broken; Payâwai, the betrothed, who is away hunting, hears enough to bring him back hastily, and, filled with jealousy, he insists on hurrying on the marriage feast.

Durkhâni is forced to consent, but quoth she to him, "So in a dream have I learnt that in seven days time I must die, but if peradventure I survive, then I will be here for thee." Payâwai consents to so much grace, and thereon is called in the Friar Lawrence, Pir Salih, the trusted confidant and preceptor, who with the nurse arranges a plot to carry off the lady by force on the day fixed for her wedding with Payâwai. Adam, moreover, goes to a tribal chief, Mir Bâmi, and in approved Pathân form¹ throws himself upon him, a suppliant for assistance, which is given in the shape of three hundred armed men, and a promise of shelter. These, and one hundred of his own, Adam arranges as his supports, while Miru and he, at a given signal catch up Durkhâni and the duenna in the approved Lochinvar manner, are off at speed and in Mir Bâmi's house before Payâwai's forces are fairly aware of what has happened.

Events in the tragedy now proceed apace. Mir Bâmi is heavily bribed by Payâwai to give up Durkhâni—an act of treachery, from a Pathân point of view, of unpardonable baseness. So much so, that Mir Bâmi's son, Gujar Khân, the friend of Adam, attacks his, own father, and resolutely pursues him until he encompasses his death. Death alone was not even sufficient to wipe out the dishonour of betraying a refugee: the whole of the perfidious chief's clan were afterwards seized with leprosy, and gradually died out, nothing of it surviving but the disgrace, which has caused the very name of Mir, or Pir, Bâmi to become a synonym for an exceptionally treacherous man—a Border Judas.

Gujar Khân unites his forces with Adam, but both are drawn into an ambushade by Payâwai, and though the latter is beaten off, the Balo is killed, and Adam badly wounded. Durkhâni, meanwhile, spends her days and nights in tears waiting succour from Adam: her only solace the tending of two flowers in the garden, one named after herself, the other after her lover. On the day of the ambushade the flower named after Adam appears to droop and languish from sympathy, and while she is watching it, Payâwai enters with his drawn sword, wet, as he boasts, with the heart's blood of Adam.

¹ Claims the nanawatai (something akin to the Hindu Dharma) which no Pathân can refuse.

The trial is fatal. "Overwhelmed with grief and sorrow, Durkhâni sinks senseless to the ground," and dies, "her hands and apron filled with flowers." The news is carried to Adam in his village, where his wounds have been bound up, and his kinsfolk are trying to induce him to find consolation in the charms of a beautiful young maiden, named Gulneza, "the flower-loving one." The flower-loving one is not altogether coy, "but he will none of her." "Were all the fairest damsels in the world assembled together, they could not equal a single finger nail of Durkhâni," he says; and when he hears of her fate, he starts up, his wounds burst out again, and he gradually sinks from weakness, calling on his mistress's name.

Another version kills Adam first, and makes Durkhâni first learn of his fate from the trusty Miru, whom she recognizes disguised as a wandering minstrel, playing his master's guitar, and hearing the news, gradually pines away; even Payâwai at last repenting for having caused the death of two such true lovers.

There are other variations and other endings, but all agree that the pair were separately buried at their respective encampments, by the Kâbul river near Naushera, and afterwards found by a man whose scarf or lungi was lost in the grave, and who, searching for it, found both lovers together in one. Twice, owing to the bitter feud between the clans, were the bodies again separately buried, but twice was love again triumphant, and both are found united in one grave. Finally, the clansmen, persuaded by the holy priest, gave in to such persistence, and agreed to bury their feud in the same grave that formed the last resting-place of Adam Khân and Durkhâni, of whom it may as truly be said as of their prototypes,

"A pair of star-crossed lovers,
Whose misadventured piteous overthrow
Do with their deaths bury their parents' strife."

Near Mardân are two hillocks, Tâ-us-Derai, and Hasn-Derai, where the rival houses established their camps, and where tradition in the woods of Kâlah-pâni ? Do not its hills shoot straight up to the sky and the climbing them soon diminish our corpulence ? ”

Inscription round the lip of a Peshawur Wine-bowl.

Saqia bar khez o dar deh jam râ
 Khak bar sar kun gham-i-ayam râ
 Sâghar-i-mai bar kafum nah ta-z-sar
 Bar kasham yen dalq-i-arzaq farn râ.

Get up, O Saki (wine-cup bearer), and give (me) the cup ;
 Never mind for the cares of the world.
 (Literally, throw dust on the head of the days of grief)
 Hand me the wine flask in order
 That I may remove the blue heavens from my head.
 (Viz. That there may be nothing between me and God.)

Are not "its youths healthy and stout, active and agile, merry-eyed, white and red, and tall in stature withal ?" "The waters of the Kâbul river and the Bârah stream, are they not sweeter and

CHAPTER XXXVII.

PATHÂN POETRY.

SOMEWHERE between the rich and occasionally extravagantly voluptuous Persian and the simple verse of the ancient Arab may probably be placed the poetry of the Pathâns, in fact of Afghâns generally. Like the former it is tinged to some extent with the mystic doctrine of the Sufis; poetry abounding in harmonious numbers and richness of fancy, but that suggests merely pleasure to the profane while professing to chaunt the fervour of love divine: that deals in metaphor often of the most extravagant kind: enthusiasm that takes the form of religious allegory scarcely distinguishable from very earthly depravity—just as the khirkah or dervish's cloak of rags, thickly-wadded and lined with silk, a form of spiritual penance, hardly conceals exceedingly carnal joys. For the more far-fetched a sort of slang dictionary would be needed; by zephyrs are to be understood outbursts of grace; by wine is meant devotion; the tavern is an oratory, its keeper a spiritual guide; inebriation, religious abstraction. The warmest description of beauty denotes the perfection of the Deity: curls and tresses are the attributes of glory; the lips inscrutable mysteries of his essence; kisses and embraces the transports of devout piety. But in the main the love that tunes the reed of the Pathân has undoubtedly a great deal of the human in it; while, as might expected from a warlike race of hardy mountaineers, with few wants and little chance of obtaining more than the bare necessities of life, their similes are more simple, and there is a breath of patriotism and freedom pervading the whole.

If some of the writers were men who devoted themselves to lives of penance and religious abstraction, others again were warriors who wielded the sword still better than the pen, whose sentiments were naturally chivalrous, whose devotion to the fair sex was great, and whose odes were distinctly less Sufistic than erotic. Such at any rate are the songs that comend themselves to popular favour on the Border. The average Pathân accepts the 'Amal-i-jismani or "corporeal worship," without troubling himself to discover the 'Amal-i-ruhani or "spiritual adoration," if even the poet ever intended his writings to bear any such transcendental meaning.

For Europeans this national poetry was practically discovered by Ravery, and considerable selections from the best-known writers translated by him and subsequently by Plowden as text-books. Among these writers, perhaps the most popular are the two Mohmand Mullahs, 'Abd-ur-Rahmân and 'Abd-ul-Hamid, the Shaikh S'adi of the Pathâns who both flourished on the northern Peshawur Border about the beginning of the last century. Besides effusions of a religious character the former wrote a number of love odes, and two volumes of the latter bear the suggestive titles of Love's Fascination and a Collection of Pearls and Corals. Almost equally popular, and still better known, was the warrior-poet Khushhâl Khân the Khattak, the ancestor of the famous old Khan Sir Khwâjah Muhammad, chief of the Teri, or Southern Khattaks, who has been already referred to; for besides poetry and history he wrote on many subjects, and translated Bidpâi's excellent fables from the Persian. Poetry, no less than the profession of arms, seems to have run in the family. His eldest son Ashraf, under the name of Hijrai, "the exile," before he was betrayed into the hands of Aurangzbe, and 'Abd-ul-Qadir, another son—who with ten brothers and several children were slain in one day by an intriguing nephew, and buried in one grave—both inherited their father's tastes, as did a grandson, Kazim Khân, better known under his nom de plume of Shaida, "the lovelorn." Among a still earlier series was Mirza Khan Ansari, "the assistant of the Prophet," a descendant of the notorious "apostle of light," though he is sometimes claimed by the Yusafzais, who two and a half centuries ago lived and wrote in Tirah, where among the wild highlanders of the Mian Khel, his descendants still flourish. The Yusafzais, the Bangash, the Durrâni Afghâns, even the Afridis, similarly claim bards of more or less note, of whose efforts fragments have been preserved in one form or other.

Beauty, the theme on which the poets of all nations from Anacreon to Moore, or Firdausi to Tasso, are so eloquent, is to a Pathân a subject equally popular in Pushtu. Be it East or West, the ruling theme various very little; and though the Oriental standard of loveliness or the imagery of the Eastern may occasionally vary somewhat from those of the Occident, the Pushtu, like the Persian, is full of touches of nature with which the western world is at once made kin. Is the western lover sighing like a furnace, with a woeful ballad to his mistress' eyebrow? 'Abd-ul-Qadir declares: "Her glance 'tis a flame, her eyes are like firebrands that lovers' hearts kindle. She hath lighted the lamp of her beauty; and her adorer's hearts, like the moths, are oblations therein. Her eyes are lotuses, the pupils black bees, but their gaze is as free as the gazelle's. Her eyebrows are bows, her eyelashes the arrows, and to destroy her lover she raiseth them."

"Each of the eyelashes of the beloved," says 'Abd-ur-Rahmân, "pierceth me like the two-edged sword of 'Ali. . . . Her countenance is hidden by her curls, as the water of immortality is itself concealed in darkness."

"From thy curls, thy ruby lips, and thy face
Proceed the night, the sunset's glow, the dawn of day.
Is it the teeth in thy sweet mouth that shine so lustrously?
Or are those glittering dewdrops in the rosebud?"

Romeo is made to speak of stealing immortal blessing from Juliet's lips, but says a Khattak bard—

"No one is capable of explaining their sweetness,
The ambrosial nectar of Paradise is indigenous to her lips."

* * * * *

"A single moment lip to lip with the belov'd
And honey, milk, and conserves are alike forgot."

Conserves may not sound highly romantic, but perhaps is as much so as the modern slang has coined the expression "real jam." In a long ode of a different style Rahmân writes—

"The face of one's mistress, the sun, the moon, all three are the same;
Her figure, the cypress, and the fir, all three are the same;
Honey, sugar, her lips, all three are the same;
A garden, a paradise, her dwelling, all three are the same;
Of my true love bereft, fire, or the bare earth, to me are the same."

And again—

"This is the Adored one—that is the rival.
This is the rose—that is the thorn.

This is the beloved—that is the duenna.¹
This the treasure—that is the snake.

This is wisdom—that is love.
This is anguish—that the consoler.

This is separation—that is conjunction.
This is autumn—that the fresh spring.

This is devotion—that is sinfulness.
This is refulgence, but that is fire.

This is Rahmân—that is the Adored.
This is the sick—that is the physician."

The following, though hearty, perhaps hardly sounds so complimentary:—

"When I look on thy face, I am amazed at Allah's grace,
That He hath preserved thee safe from its ruddy glow."

¹ See the description of a duenna in Chap. XXXVI.

Beauty, says Pope, draws us by a single hair : Rahmân desires
 "no greater liberty than this, that I by the chain of my mistress' locks be bound," and some of the ideas in the following are distinctly novel as well as poetic :—

"How many, Joseph-like,¹ my love would from that pretty pit extract
 If for her dimpled chin she let her tresses down as rope.
 Could they but view her rosy lips the jewellers, I ween,
 For Yaman sapphires would abandon further search.
 Should my love in her beauty visit the grove,
 The rose of the garden all claim to its beauty would waive.
 Think not that even in Doomsday's dire confusion,
 Kamgar² will let go his grasp on her skirts."

"He jests at scars that never felt a wound," is, for a country of hills, not inaptly paraphrased by Rahman :—

"If thou fallest from the precipice of love thou wilt loose thy teeth, Oh thou who gnashest them at me by way of admonition."

Some of the verses by Khushhâl Khân and the Khattaks are suggestive of Moore :—

"Where thou reclineth, the place a parterre of flowers becometh.
 When in the mead thou roamest, the heart of the tulip is scarred.
 When the sable locks about thy fair face zephyr disheveleth,
 The fragrance of musk and amber is everywhere diffused.
 Since in thy tresses my heart is lost, show me thy face,
 For in night's gloom, with lighted lamp, do we not seek lost treasures?"

"My graceful mistress' beauteous form revealed :
 In every limb is kindled passion's flame.
 And when I view her languishing soft eyes,
 With wine of joy my goblet brimmeth o'er."

"Stung by the serpents³ of thy locks, the man recovers never.
 Fruitless to visit tombs and shrines, useless all magic arts.
 But pain and anguish and all grief hath fled :
 I have to-day within my grasp the cup of joy."

¹ The famous Eastern hero whose brothers "pitted him."

² The name of the author, which is generally introduced in the last line of the ode.

³ Serpents are in the East guardians of treasure.

The nectar of thy lips has Kawsur¹ put to shame,
The stream of life in Paradise, the spring of Mecca's shrine."

* * * * *

"The lucky man who once his foot within her threshold plants,
He will the gates and walls of Paradise forget.
The prospect of heaven to come, is bliss to monk and priest,
But in meeting thee, Khushhâl hath gained Paradise at once."

Sometimes the lady is coy, and Ashraf Khân complains:—

"Her promised kiss she ever makes a draft to pay to-morrow:
How with such promise can I my heart refresh?"

Khushhâl Khân, whom Raverty credits with fifty-seven sons, was evidently susceptible where the Afridi ladies were concerned:—

"Fair and pretty are the Adam Khel Afridi maids,
With large eyes, long drooping lashes, and arched eyebrows.
Honey lips, rosy cheeks, and moonlike faces theirs.
Small mouths like rosebuds, teeth regular and white.
Round heads, covered with dark curls, of amber redolent.
Their bodies soft and sleek, smooth and glossy like an egg.
Their feet diminutive, heels round, and hips prominent.
Thin-stomached, broad-chested, and small-waisted.
In stature straight as *alif*², and complexion fair.
Though like the falcons, I have wandered o'er the hills,
Many plump partridges have I my quarry made."

Thorns are, however, not unfrequently associated with the rose, and, quoth Rahmân:—

"Until a hundred thorns have pierced his heart,
How shall the Nightingale unto the rose gain pass?"³

And 'Abd-ul-Hamid puts a similar idea rather neatly:—

"As the rose, the more it is concealed, the more its perfume increaseth,
So the anguish of love from endurance becometh overpowering."

¹ The river of Paradise, from which all the others have their source.

² The first letter of the Arabic alphabet.

³ The attachment of the nightingale for his "sultana, the rose" is a constant Eastern idea—

"The maid for whom his melody,
His thousand songs are heard on high."—Byron's Giaour.

That in the good old days the Khattaks cheered themselves with the wine-cup is well known, and Khushhâl sings its praises in several odes :—

“From out the clear azure flask,
O cup-bearer, bring thou unto me
A full goblet of that potent wine,
The remedy for grief, the consoler in woe.
Tell me not of the riches of this world ;
They cannot compare with one cup of wine.

* * * * *

From the cup-bearer then take thou the glass,
For therein is much gladness and joy.”

The odes of this writer cover a wider field and offer more variety than most of the other Pathân bards. He is equally eloquent in the praises of “Spring that has made the country a garden of flowers,” whose breezes “have cheered the clansmen even more than the wine,” the time “when the maidens place nosegays in their bosoms and the youths in their turbans.” Still more does he delight in describing how those youths “have again made their bright swords rosy with their enemy’s gore, even as the tulip—the heart’s seared flower—blossoms in summer ;” how they have “dyed red the Valley of the Khaiber, and poured forth the tumult of war from Karrupah to Bajâwah.” “There is no deliverance in anything,” he says, “save the sword.” He glories in the deeds of his ancestors, “who had both the sword and the board, both courage and courtesy, whose companions were men of spirit who sported with their lives, who in all their dealings were true and went to their graves dyed with blood. Such heroes were they all.” For him there is no spot like home : it is “of all others the spot,” and he thanks Allah that his forbears selected it, “with its dark mountain ranges and the blue waters of the Indus.” “Who shall tell how beautiful it is in the spring after the rain,” what “heart-ravishing sport for falcon, hawk, and hound in the woods of Kâlah-pâni? Do not its hills shoot straight up to the sky and the climbing them soon diminish our corpulence?"

Inscription round the lip of a Peshawur Wine-bowl.

Saqla bar khez o dar deh`jam râ
 Khak bar sar kun gham-i-ayan râ
 Sâghar-i-mai bar kafum nah ta-x-sar
 Bar kasham yen dalq-i-arzaq farn râ.

Get up, O Saki (wine-cup bearer), and give (me) the cup;
 Never mind for the cares of the world.
 (Literally, throw dust on the head of the days of grief.)
 Hand me the wine flask in order
 That I may remove the blue heavens from my head.
 (Viz. That there may be nothing between me and God.)

Are not "its youths healthy and stout, active and agile, merry-eyed, white and red, and tall in stature withal?" "The waters of the Kâbul river and the Bârah stream, are they not sweeter and more delicious than sherbet in the mouth ? ” They are his Pharpar and Abner, and it is of them he thinks when an exile in the power of the Mughal, compelled to drink “ the waters of Hind, more vile than its horrid climate :—”

“ Gentle breeze of the morn, if thou Khairâbâd pass,
Should thy course be by Indus bank, by the Khattak Akora,
Convey thou my greetings and greetings, again and again,
Of my love and regard carry many and many expressions.
Cry out to the father of rivers¹ with sonorous voice :
But unto the little Landai² mildly whisper, and say
Perhaps I once more may drink a cup of thy waters.”

It is satisfactory to know that the gallant warrior-poet lived to get back and quaff many a cup of his favourite stream, and write many a song that still lives in the memory of the Border clansmen.

¹ The Indus.

² The Kâbul river.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE BLACK MOUNTAIN.

THE little strip of rugged mountain lying east of the Indus, and occupying the south-west corner formed by that river and the British district of Hazâra, is the last bit of country that need be referred to in connection with any, even the most unworthy, of the Yusafzai tribes. It has been recently invested with a specially melancholy interest by the wanton murder of Major Battye and Captain Urmston, and the punitive expedition that followed the outrage. Otherwise, neither its extent nor its population would warrant its being ranked as of any exceptional importance. The tribes are not numerous, nor particularly warlike, and most of them are miserably poor, but they, and the nests of fanatical hornets they shelter, have for long proved capable of inflicting an altogether disproportionate amount of annoyance. And just as in the interests of good cultivation it occasionally becomes necessary to smoke out or blow up the garden pests, it becomes, in the interests of good Government, occasionally needful to adopt measures that shall effectually prevent our villages from being burned, our villagers kidnapped, their cattle raided, and our officers from being murdered by pests of another sort.

A long narrow granite ridge, rounded rather than sharp, 25 to 30 miles long, having more of the characteristics of Murree or Thandiâna than Simla or Dalhousie, but an average height of 8,000 feet, with peaks at intervals rising to 10,000 feet; many large precipitous and rocky spurs projecting from the sides in all directions, in the narrow glens between which lie the tribal villages. Along these spurs, which at the top occasionally widen out into plateaus, affording room for the assembly of a considerable force, are the routes by which the mountain can be easiest ascended, or the villages commanded, and it was by these that our troops advanced in 1852, 1868, and 1889, when the very highest peaks were occupied. The lower slopes are covered with berbery and acacia, replaced by forests of the Himalayan silver fir (Abies webbiana) further up, whose dark and gloomy shade has earned for the mountain the title by which it is known to both Europeans and natives. Shade that, all the same, is varied with the light green of the oak, sycamore, and horse-chestnut, and by frequent open glades rejoicing in short rich grass. The whole, as a rule, well watered; springs are numerous along the slopes, and some of the streams flowing into the Indus attain a considerable size. A great deal of hill-side is of course rocky and stony, but many places in the season are fairly covered with Indian corn, a little wheat, barley, mustard and inferior grains, and quantities of fodder. A climate that in spring, summer, and autumn is excellent, but that in winter has occasionally snow enough to stop communication over the crest. All this, and more, is the Black Mountain, with possibilities for a far better sanitarium than Murree, and with very much about it, saving always "the spirit of man," that may be fairly described as "divine."

Certainly the dwellers on its slopes could not be brought under any such classification, though it need not be assumed they are all equally delinquents; and in some cases they might plead that their misdeeds have been the result of bad company—"villainous company." The tribes on the western face are the Hassanzais and Akazais, descendants of Isa, and the Chagarzais, descendants of Mali ; all Yusafzais. The Akazais are the weakest, but probably the best fighting men, and, with the Khân Khel section of the Hassanzais, have during recent years been by far the most troublesome. The Chagarzais are the most numerous, though less born to war than to trade and agriculture, their chief wealth being their cattle. Once they marched up the hill to the Crag-picket against us at Ambeyla, where their reception caused them to march down, and straight home again. The Hassanzais were the murderers of Messrs. Carne and Tapp, and all three tribes probably share with the Sayuds and their hangers-on the responsibility for the murder of Messrs. Battye and Urmston ; but none are credited with the manly and many fine qualities of their kindred on the west or Trans-Indus. On all other sides they are surrounded by tribes, who, except as neighbours, are widely removed from them in almost every way, who do not even belong to the same race. On the south is Tanâwal, the wildest bit of Hazâra, the appanage of our feudatory the chief of Amb, whose people, Tanaolis, are not Pathâns at all. In the adjoining sub-division of Agror, which is under the direct management of another feudatory Khân, the inhabitants are mainly Swâtis and Gujars. In Tikari, Nandihar, Deshi, the three valleys which next lie in succession on the east and, with the still larger one of Allâi, come between the Black Mountain and the Hazâra district, the people are all Swâtis. Not, as their name might seem to imply, connected with the Swât Valley, but, as already noticed in connection with the general tribal distribution of the Peshawur Valley, the remains of a once powerful and widely-distributed race, driven by the Dilazâks from the plain country into the hills, and subsequently hunted by the Yusafzais out of Swât and Bunejr—mainly eastward into Hazâra, and a few westward into Kâfiristân. In the valleys where they now predominate, the term covers an exceedingly heterogeneous people—a little dash of Greek on an ancient Aryan stock, with a liberal mixture of Hindu and Turk, Pathân and Gujar. Though they would in many cases now describe themselves Pathân, the latter would probably have to strain his vocabulary to find an expression sufficiently contemptuous to describe the Swâtis. They have little in common with the former save his vices rankly luxuriant, and the bigotry of Sunni Muhammadana. Inferior in physique, and without his courage, their instincts are nevertheless said to run naturally towards murder and avarice; and they are described by pretty well everybody all round as cowardly, deceptive, cruel, grasping, lazy. "Replacing the bold frank manner of the Pathân by the hang-dog look of the whipped cur." The Oswald Wycliffes, preferring a whole skin, but ready to commit any crime or to get any Bertram Risinghams who may be bold enough ruffians to do it for them. It is at the same time always dangerous to generalize in too sweeping a way regarding tribes by no means well known, and spread over so large an area, and the condemnation may be too sweeping. So far as we know them, in and adjoining Hazâra, or have met them in expeditions, they would not, save in the matter of treachery and deceit, be formidable as enemies. It is improbable, with their own internal quarrels and feuds with the adjoining Pathâns, that they would combine against us, unless it were to protect themselves from retaliation; and it would only be necessary to take up a strong and permanent position on the Black Mountain to ensure the submission of all the surrounding Swâtis.

Colonies of Sayuds, and others of the baneful order, occupy several of the glens on the mountain itself. In two on the eastern slope, extending from the highest peak, the Muchai, down to the Deshi fort of Trund, are the Pariari Sayuds. On the western face, among the Hussanzais, are the Sayuds of Tilli; one or two more are scattered through the Chagarzai county, and a rather formidable religious body, the Akhund Khels, holds the glens and spurs on the extreme north-west corner down to the river Indus. Numerically all are insignificant, but they could calculate on receiving more or less assistance from kindred colonies across the river. This was to some extent the case during the last expedition, and, had the operations not been prompt, and the force employed overwhelming, these colonies would probably have become centres to which the disaffected from the adjacent tribes, both Pathân and Swâti, would naturally gravitate.

All told, it is doubtful if the fighting-men on the Black Mountain, including all the Pathâns and the religious colonies, amount to more than 6,000 or 7,000 men, of which probably not half are armed with matchlocks, the rest having nothing better than swords, or spears. The Chagarzais might calculate on an extra 1,000 or 2,000 from the Trans-Indus sections of their tribe; and the adjoining Swâtis, Allaiwâis, Nandiharis, Tikariwâls, Deshiwâls, and Thakotis could possibly contribute 13,000 or 14,000 still more indifferently armed, but the extent to which they would be drawn in would necessarily be dependent on the policy declared.

The recent expedition under General Sir John McQueen was directed mainly against the Akazais, Hassanzais, Pariari-Sayuds and the Hindustâni Fanatics of Palosi. Undertaken, on a large scale, with a force vastly superior to anything the ill-armed and insignificant tribesmen were likely to be able to bring into the field—it was short, sharp, and in its way decisive enough. There was one advance, by a band of fanatics, brave to rashness, a handful of “warriors of the faith” charging regiments of breechloaders which cost us the life of the gallant Major Beley, and resulted in the practical extermination of what, had they been Englishmen, we should have termed a Forlorn Hope. After this there was nothing but a flying enemy, hiding behind rocks and trees, or skulking for a chance at parties advancing—possibly to burn his homesteads. As a lesson it may be hoped it was successful, but to judge from a standard of high policy, or of permanent results, it may fairly be doubted if it was worth the valuable lives and large outlay of money spent upon it. The offending tribes were severely punished, a considerable number of the fanatics were literally wiped out, a certain amount of crops or stores of grain destroyed or taken, perhaps not always belonging to the people actually concerned in the raids and outrages, and certain of the most notorious ringleaders were captured and their villages burnt. The troops marched up to the tops of the highest peaks, and encamped in the most difficult valleys, amply showing that the fancied inaccessible strongholds offered no security against our shells and our soldiers, and the seditious colonies had full opportunity of learning that their preachers and teachers of insurrection—scattering in all directions from the sacred training grounds of Maidân, were of no more value than their traditionary leather cannon. There was nothing for the tribesmen left but to come in and tender a submission, and promise to pay any fine inflicted, while their friends and neighbours fired upon our retiring rear guard, hurrying back to keep time to the necessities of a State despatch that should fit in with the opening of Parliament.

It is doubtful if the expedition stayed long enough to enable the mistakes in our maps to be corrected, or the notorious want of topographical information in the Intelligence Branch to be sufficiently supplemented, while it is certain a hurried withdrawal of our troops was liable to be misjudged and to leave any disaffected tribes more ready for future mischief than ever.

A more reasonable solution of the difficulty would surely have been to have given out from the first that our patience with the disorderly tribes was exhausted, and, seeing that during a long course of years they had shown it to be impossible to trust them as neighbours, we had decided once for all to move our Border line up to the Indus, and to bring the whole under regular Government as subjects. The Indus forms a natural boundary along the North and West, although the information regarding its course, or the facilities for running any road along its banks had, up to the date of the expedition, not been sufficient to enable it to be shown on any map.¹ From Derband the road is passable for horsemen for some distance; beyond Kotkai, in the Hassanzai country it is more difficult, as our troops found to their cost, while further up, spurs run straight down so steep that even mules cannot pass. A flying visit of a few hours was made by one detachment of troops to Thakot, but the long strip of Chagarzai country was not entered at all, and the opportunity for an examination lost. Regarding the country above Thakot we are still absolutely without information, till Major Biddulph takes up the parable of the upper Indus in his work on the Hindu Kush.

Looking at such maps as are available it would seem that the Allai Valley would make an excellent boundary to the North; it is conterminous with British territory in Hazâra, though separated by a range 11,000 to 12,000 feet high. This crossed, there is a long, rich, well-cultivated valley, some 12 miles wide, straight to the Indus, the Sirhan stream, which runs down its centre, joining the river opposite Barkot; while a vast range, upwards of 15,000 feet high, separates it from Kohistân on the North.

This, or any boundary that would have included the whole of the Black Mountain, would have insured a final settlement of a troublesome question at the smallest cost. The opposition would not have been greater than to our temporary occupation, while it would have brought with it the most permanently beneficial results; would have had an excellent effect on the whole of the Yuzafzai tribes; provided a splendid sanitarium for cantoning troops, well supplied with fuel and water, and afforded a magnificent strategic position, having the most formidable natural defence along its front, and which an easily constructed railway through the Hazâra Valley, would link in with all our communications behind. A few years of good government moreover ¹ That a river, within twenty miles of our outposts, should have to be indicated on the best maps by approximate dots, and which dots, on at least one important occasion, were found to have some miles of error, requires no further comment.

Kikâri Sayuds from the Black Mountain.

would go far to see a set of people now but little removed from savages, converted into a community as well-behaved and as prosperous as their neighbours in Hazâra; and might well have been hailed as the inauguration of a Border policy on thoroughly sound principles,

CHAPTER XXXIX.

A BIT OF "YAGHESTÂN."

MORE is probably known about many of the remote regions of Central Asia than concerning the countries adjacent to the river Indus within a short range of our own Border. This, of course, is in a great measure due to the exceptionally inaccessible nature of the higher Indus Valley; the immense mass of lofty mountains through which the river forces its way; the deep valleys, often approached by openings affording little more than a path alongside some torrent, rushing between overhanging rocks, dangerous to any but a skilled cragsman; with no roads, save the merest tracks; no bridges beyond those of plaited birch twigs, swaying with every gust of wind; and with no communications at all for many months of the year. Not a little, also, to the character of the fanatical and lawless tribes who inhabit the reaches immediately adjoining us, and who bar the way to traders and travellers alike. But among these mountains, and in these valleys, often very extensive and of great fertility, are communities, numerous and prosperous, that for many generations have remained little changed or influenced by the events passing around them, and have maintained their own customs, their own dialects, and, to a great extent, widely differing peculiarities of race and of creed.

The limits of the Black Mountain practically reach the limits of the Pathân to the left of the Indus, though on the right he extends much further up; and in the lateral valleys above Buneyr are more or less pure-blooded Yusafzais, who maintain their connections with Swât. Then come tribes with a good deal of mixed Pathân blood in their veins, and of Pushtu in their speech, often known as "Neemchas," or half breeds. Further, again, all trace of Afghân blood disappears, or is to be found only in scattered colonies. For a long distance, however, the creed is nominally Muhammadan, beginning with the fierce fanaticism of Palosa—the "Kila Mujahidin," a colony of "warriors of the faith," supported entirely by contributions from their sympathizers in Hindustân, who, until they were dispersed by the recent Black Mountain expedition, devoted their time to drill, giving the words of command in Arabic, firing salutes with cannon made of leather, and blustering about the destruction of the infidel power of the British,—but getting gradually diluted, till, among isolated spots in Kohistân, are found Muhammadans who shave their heads, worship rude sculptures of the horse, and are ignorant of a single word of the Korân.

In the comparatively small but fertile valleys of Tikari, Nandihar, and Deshi, the bulk of the people are Swâtis, Muhammadans by creed, classing themselves as Pathân, ethnologically more nearly connected with the people in the adjoining glens. The same is the case in Allâi, a larger and still finer valley, drained by one stream to the Indus, though about a fourth of this is possessed by Sayud or other religious fraternities. All are plentifully irrigated, and grow considerable quantities of rice and Indian corn. The eastern end of Allâi is described as possessing a succession of grass and forest-covered mountain slopes, dotted with fields of wheat and barley, and prosperous villages. The whole valley is perhaps capable of furnishing 7,000 fighting men, and the three former are credited with about 8,000, recognizing as leaders the Khâns of Trand and Batgram. On the opposite side of the river are the Ghorband and Kânra Valleys, the latter being almost entirely a Sayud colony. A range rising 15,000 feet separates Allâi from Kohistân, "the land of mountains," which interposes a thousand square miles of snowy peaks and rocky wastes between Khâgân, or the upper part of Hazâra, and the Indus; and extends again on the west of that river right away to Dir and Chitral. Among Afghâns the name is often used to describe the whole country westward to Kâbul, or districts inhabited by other races they have only partly displaced; just as Yaghestân, "the rebellious or independent country," is the general term for all the little hill republics, who acknowledge no suzerain or at any rate pay no attention to him. The main features of the Cis-Indus Kohistân are two valleys running east and west from Hazâra to the Indus, the Nila Naddi, and the Chicharga, separated from each other by a range that, by way of variety, has an elevation of nearly 17,000 feet. The two streams fall into the Indus near Jalkot and Palas respectively, and incidentally, it may be noted, a good road would be possible down either to the Indus from Hazâra by opening out one of the passes from Khâgân, or from Bhogarmang. At present the country is destitute of roads as we understand roads, and in winter the access is only by river, crossing and recrossing at intervals. Of trade there is some in timber but little of anything else, though Puttun on the Indus is reputed a large and flourishing place, with much fertile land, a population almost redundant, and may perhaps claim to be the capital of Kohistân, if such a collection of mountains can be said to possess a capital.

By the people themselves the country is often called Shinkari, "the land of the Shins," Muhammadans, but not Pathâns—probably the remains of a number of cognate tribes of Indian origin, forced by Moslem invaders to become Muhammadans. They are reported powerful, well built, clean-limbed, dark-complexioned, quick-eyed, sharp-featured people, brave but quiet, given to hospitality, nowhere particularly zealous for the faith of Islâm, and in many valleys retaining many Hindu customs, and still preferring their own particular idols. Some of the dialects, of which Biddulph, in an account full of interest, describes several, are founded on Sanskrit, with a pretty general admixture of Pushtu. They, along with tribes to the north and north-west, have, by certain authorities, been dragged in to help to build up the theory of the Dards and Dardistân; a title which, so far as they are concerned, is altogether misleading. There are a few people on the Indus, near Koli and Palus locally called Dards, but they are only an insignificant tribe among a great variety of distinct races, speaking different dialects, frequently different languages, and called by the most diverse names. And unless the word Dard is to stand for any people of probable Aryan extraction, it is quite inapplicable. In language, dress, habit, and probably race, these Indus Valley communities have most in common with the peoples of Gilgit, of Astor in Kashmir, or of Ladâk, as described by Cunningham.

Chilâs, another thousand square miles of still more mountainous country, on its southern side for some little distance conterminous with Hazâra, comes in between Kohistân, the Indus, and Kashmir. The Kashmir Maharajah is, in a sort of way acknowledged as suzerain by certain of the little communities, some of whom pay him a small annual tribute of goats or of gold dust, and one sends three hostages, or residents, changed every year, to Kashmir. The officials of that State do not, however, interfere, or even visit Chilâs, and any attempt of the Maharajah to exercise his authority would probably be resisted. Many are so difficult of access either from the river, Kashmir, Gilgit or Yassin, that a very little resistance would suffice to keep off a considerable force, and a former Sikh expedition sent from Kashmir against the Chilâs valley met with a disastrous defeat. The highest peaks in this literally "land of the mountain" rise in the case of Nanga Parbat, "the naked mountain," to over 16,700 feet. A magnificent peak, but a mere hill compared to Gilgit opposite, which within a small area boasts of twenty peaks from 20,000 to 24,000, and eight from 24,000 to 27,000 feet high. The balance of Chilâs however is to a great extent snow and rock, over 11,000 feet, succeeded by pine forests, down to 5,000 feet, and on the slopes below, in some half-dozen principal valleys, a crop of grass and wild vegetables—rhubarb, carrots, onions, &c.—that afford grazing for considerable herds of cattle, with occasional fields towards the Indus, more especially in the valleys round the village of Chilâs; but the general aspect of the country is like the old Sanskrit description of Parbat—bare and poorly wooded. Practically it is rainless, a single fall in the year being a good average, though there is a fair amount of irrigation from the mountain streams.

The people are more recent converts to Islâm than the Kohistânîs; some of their glens seem rather a favourite resort of Mullahs from Swât, and are consequently zealous and bigoted much beyond any of their neighbours. Others again have religious systems of their own, and in one case the tutelary deity is a rudely sculptured horse named the Taibans horse. They, or many of them, are Sunis, and any Shiahs who fell into their hands would be put to death without the alternative of slavery. They are not so absolutely cut off from communications as we are accustomed to think. There are roads from the upper Swât into the extensive Kandia valley; from Yassin to the Sazin and Tangir Valleys, both fertile and extensive, extending down to the Indus; and the road from Khâgân in Hazâra, by the Babusar Pass, is put at a seven days' journey to the Indus, and from the Kishen-Ganga Valley in Kashmir, by the Shoto Pass, as a five days' journey. The road, moreover, which under the present Resident, the Kashmir state has taken in hand, from the north of the Wular Lake near Srinagar, by the Rajdiangân Pass into the Skardo route, and from that again by the Kanuri Pass into the Astor Valley, and by Bunji on the Indus to Gilgit, some 170 miles, which is to be made a good military road, will do a good deal to open out better communications. At present the roads are only practicable for footmen, and are closed in winter, while it is doubtful if Chilâs can be reached by way of the Indus at all; and it is, therefore, not astonishing to find that this difficulty of access has contributed to keep the little communities almost as isolated as so many different nations. The distinctive character of this bit of Yaghestân is, in fact, the number of what are practically independent States, republics in miniature. Mr. Drew describes one called Thalich, which is probably well in the running, as the very smallest existing, consisting of only eleven houses. The system of government in these Liliputian commonwealths is, nevertheless, advanced enough to suit the most gifted faddist. Each village, according to Biddulph, elects its own representative or "Jushteros," according as the candidates are deemed brave, eloquent, and liberal, and enjoys Home Rule, irrespective of its neighbours. It has its own parliament, called "Sigas," which is quite public, all who please joining in the discussion, the "Jushteros" encouraging outsiders to give their advice, which, having heard, they seldom take. There is, moreover, already a system of Federation, a single Jushtero being deputed from each village parliament to the federal Sigas, which is also open to the public. The public, having relieved its mind, a loud whistle is given, after which only "Jushteros" are allowed to talk or to vote. The Sigas does not deal with criminal offences; these are usually left to the church, tempered by ancient custom. Murder is rare, but is regarded as a personal matter for the nearest relative to settle, though blood feuds are not permitted to stand over long. Slavery is a recognized institution in most of the republics. A still more singular custom exists in many valleys, and it is said to be among the most ancient of the institutions. The sexes are kept strictly apart all summer, from May till September. In the spring, the young man has to take his flocks to the mountain, and must wait till winter before he can permit "his fancy to lightly turn to thoughts of love." The old women are specially charged with the responsibility of seeing the rule observed, and any attempt to evade it is punished by fine.

Neither Kohistân nor Chilâs has ever given trouble to us as neighbours, nor are they likely to do so, unless dangerous fanatical colonies take root, or find shelter among them. The Allâiwals and sometimes Hazâra Gujars, have had occasional disputes with the Kohistânis, arising out of trespass into the Chor glen, a bit of good pasture in the south-east corner of Kohistân that lies temptingly near; and more recently with the Khaka Khel wood merchants for timber sent down the river; but the Kohistân jirgah has shown a willingness to settle all such matters with our officers. Both trade with us, mainly the produce of their flocks and herds, a little gold dust, and timber cut and floated down to Attock.

Any estimate of the fighting strength of communities like these would be obviously of the most uncertain kind and of small value. It is possible they might combine against a common foe, but to us any such combination could hardly be formidable, and their weapons are of the most primitive description. Their real strength is in their natural position, which we are not likely to want to interfere with. Their weakness, the fact that to a great extent they are a decadent race, liable to be either driven out or absorbed by more vigorous races like the Pathân, whose settlements will increase, and whose greater energy will ensure his gaining ground; while the little republics, with their "Jushteros" and village parliaments, are doomed to go downhill.

But from here again,—from Hazâra and the Indus, the Kohistân, or "land of mountains" which forms the western frontier of Kashmir, to the Kohistân, north of Kâbul, lies a series of lofty peaks and secluded valleys, occupied by communities, whose future is every year becoming of greater importance to India and its frontier defence. To the north of Chilâs, and the valleys already referred to of Buneyr, Swât, Dir, Bajâwar, and Kunâr, are a series of still less familiar states—Nager, Hunza, Gilgit, Yasin, Chitral, and others. And, further west, the unexplored and almost unknown country of Kafiristân. No mere congeries of robber tribes, but settled and extensive agricultural communities, with rulers who in many cases boast a long unbroken descent. Peoples of the most varying types. Traces of Hindu, Mongol, and Tartar alternating with Pathân, Aryan, and conjectural Greek ; or, according to a recent Russian authority on the look out for natural subjects for the Czar, "incontestably Slav." Of creeds, that include the worship of rock-cut figures of Buddha, customs of the most orthodox Brahmins, with others like the Shins, that hold everything connected with the cow as the most hopelessly unclean—secluded valleys where still lingers the influence of Zoroaster and the fire altars, or again vary between the primitive Aryan to the worship of the Lingum, the tree, or incantation pure and simple ; over all of which an easy-going Muhammadanism seems gradually spreading itself, which the Pirs and the fervid Mulahs from Swât and Buneyr are doing their best to extend. Tribes and castes differing in almost every characteristic from anything, not only on our more immediate Border, but from India generally ; speaking languages and dialects often not understood out of their particular valley, of which Biddulph gives glossaries of ten, and which require a skilled philologist to classify ; societies given to drinking wine and making merry, who lay down cellars of clarified butter, and do not consider it is ripe till it has acquired the deep red of a century's keeping ; with whom dancing is for both sexes the national amusement and polo the national game ; who still practise the ordeal of fire, and are so free from ordinary jealousy that custom requires a man given to hospitality to place his wife at his guest's disposal. Countries and peoples of the greatest possible ethnological as well as political interest, of whom fragments have been sketched in accounts by Messrs. Shaw, Drew, Leitner and Biddulph, but which remain to a great extent to be still described.

Northward of the whole again, the Hindu Kush forms the great watershed between the Indus and the Oxus, the passes over which are probably sufficiently difficult to deter any large army venturing there. But the more we learn about them the easier it appears to be for a small force to effect a passage in many places, and, having crossed, to rendezvous in some central valley, such as Chitrâl, the seat of the ruler of Kashkâr, as it is sometimes called, which is sufficiently large and fertile, and thence work southwards towards Gilgit or Jelâlâbâd. The mischief would be almost equally great if the intruders stayed there, and extended their influence to Kâbul or Kashmir or over the fanatical tribesmen along our Pathân border, a contingency it is obviously necessary to take measures to prevent.

For the same reason it is undesirable these countries should fall in any way under the control of Afghânistân. A dozen independent and rival states between Kashmir and Kâbul is at any rate more or less of a safeguard against treachery in either. Amir Abdur Rahman is known of late years to have been casting a covetous eye in this direction. Their internal quarrels, which in Kâfiristân are unceasing, not merely with their Muhammadan neighbours, but among various sections of the people, he has readily seized upon as an excuse for interference, and there is no doubt this has been supplemented by still more active intrigues. His expedition against Kâfiristân and Bajaur was stopped not so much by the sturdy resistance of the Bajauris, as by the Shinwari rebellion nearer home, and his promises to return at a more convenient season have caused a certain amount of uneasiness, for the Amir's convenient season is oft-times a bitter one.

It would be well therefore in the first place to let it be clearly understood that these communities are to be considered entirely outside the limit of Afghân influence; and in the next to take more active measures to ensure that British influence shall be established instead. To some extent this has been begun already by the Lockhart mission to Chitrâl, and by the establishment of a resident in Gilgit. It will be assisted by the opening of the Kashmir Gilgit road, and would be materially increased by the construction of the railway to Dhaka which would enable regiments to move at a short notice in Jelâlâbâd. The states are as a rule ready to welcome English officers, Kâfiristân more especially so—a country whose tendencies and sympathy have more in common with the Aryan stock than any single community along our entire north-western border.

If the Yaghestân states can retain their independence, well and good, if not British influence must be paramount, and the sooner direct measures are taken to accomplish this the better.

Pathan Fiddle (rabdt) and Knife (chhura).

CHAPTER XL.

THE HAZÂRA VALLEY.

WHAT Shakespeare makes Bolingbroke say of English feasts, would apply to any account of the Border that should finish with Hazâra, "the daintiest last, to make the end most sweet." And along the whole frontier, from Karâchi to Kashmir, there is nothing that, for the grandeur of its mountains, its plentiful streams, picturesque scenery, and charming variety, can touch the Hazâra Valley; and probably few can boast a more interesting diversity of people, more thriving villages, or where prosperity more obviously marks the security of British rule. A long tongue of territory, of thoroughly alpine character, with a ring fence of lofty mountains that separate it from the rich valleys of Kashmir, and the vast waste of rocky and snowy peaks that go to make up Kohistân; between the impetuous Jhelum with its feeders, and the more solemn and severe Indus. To the north are the distant snow-clad ranges of Chilâs, with the mighty Nanga Parbat as a central figure. To the east the high rounded Khâgân peaks, affording excellent grazing almost to their tops, and whose sides, where not clothed with grass, are covered with forests. A vista of mountains, that from the perpetual snow of "Moses's seat," run south by a series of lovely hills and charming little stations, known as the Gullies, to Murrec. Westward: beautiful wooded peaks, glens, and ranges, hardly less lofty, and not less attractive, separate it from the independent Swâti valleys that drain into the Indus, while the Black Mountain rises beyond the luxuriant glades of Agror. Cultivation covers every bit of level ground, from the prolific fields of Harripur and Pakhli, to the narrow strips industriously terraced out of the hill sides in the most distant glens; and everywhere, that cultivation is plentifully irrigated. Water, the one thing the Border so much wants, and the absence of which deprives so much of our mountain fringe of half its beauty, is here in every form. The deep blue silent lakes of Khâgân, the raging forces of the Indus and the Jhelum, the almost fiercer torrents of the narrow little Kunhâr, the minor tributary streams that run in all directions, and channels from which carry the water to every field, turn all the mills to grind the corn, husk the rice, or clean the cotton, and are what the Swâtis call the "female slaves" of the cultivator.

A wealth of wood and water, luxuriant grass and innumerable flowers, specked with thriving villages and prosperous homesteads: witness that, in Hazâra at any rate, the Empire is peace; while in the centre of the valley the practical embodiment of that Empire is marked by the station and cantonment of Abbottabad. The most favoured of the Border stations, Abbottabad seems to combine the views and the climate of the hills, with the freedom of the plains. Where English green lanes run through gardens filled with a profusion of tropical and temperate fruits and vegetables; where a wealth of superb English roses and English shrubs, flourish side by side with the most beautiful varieties of the cedar and the pine, the chestnut and the chenar. And where it may also be said—not in order to round off a sentence in an idyllic fashion, but as matter of history—English civilization and English administration have brought to a number of by no means the best types of Border races, a freedom from strife, and an amount of prosperity they could never have developed any other way. The district was taken over by the British, as a too turbulent bit of country for its Sikh Governor's taste, in exchange for a strip of territory on the southern frontier of Jammu, in 1847, and in 1848, almost for the first time in its history, was reported as "perfectly tranquil." The story of its prosperity and development since then, is written at length in the official records of the district, the Settlement Report of Major Wace, and the statistics of the Gazetteer; but still more obviously, over the whole face of the country itself. Twenty years of British rule saw the population increased fifty per cent., doubled the area of cultivation, more than doubled the value of the cattle and agricultural produce. Thirty years practically doubled the revenue, even with light assessments; increased the imports six-fold; and raised to important branches of trade, many commodities that in former times had no value at all. The day labourer, who of yore received his food or one anna a day, now earns not less than two in the villages, and four in the towns. The weaver who wove seven sheets for a rupee, and a fancy turban for fourteen annas, now gets a rupee for four sheets, and two rupees for the turban; and the printer who dyes it, eight annas instead of four. According to the statistical story, the labourer all round gets much more in the way of hire; he eats, drinks, and is merry, though even he has to pay something more for it. The whole stands as a striking example of what difference a good and strong Government has made, and might make elsewhere, for any bit of the Border.

Nor can it be said that the result is due to the superiority of the people; rather it is in spite of what in many respects are points in their disfavour, for, compared to other parts of the Border, the contrast in regard to them is markedly unfavourable. Notwithstanding their former character for turbulence and rebellion, they have neither the energy nor manly qualities of the Pathân or the Biloch, and though they are litigious enough, "the flinty and steel couch of war," is by no means the average Hazâra's idea of repose, nor does he yearn for honour and glory. He is quite willing to leave that to the Afridi or Yusafzai. His valley seems to have been the corner to which the less warlike races were gradually driven, and he is the modern representative of those races. Originally the valley was occupied by a mixed people of Indian or Aryan origin. When the inferior Pathân Dilazâks got pushed out of the Peshawur Valley, in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, they fled across the Indus to Hazâra. The Tanâolis followed suit in the seventeenth. Then the Jaduns, from the slopes of Mahâban, came and took possession of a strip for themselves. The Karlâgh Turks, who came with Timur, if not with Chengiz Khan, annexed a bit of the Pakhl plain. The Sayuds under Jalâl Bâba did the same in Khâgân, the Tarins lower down, and finally the Yusafzais crossed the Indus, pushed everybody back a bit, and took up the Black Mountain. When the variety that went to make up the original stock is considered, it must be admitted the population is likely to be a little mixed. Broadly, the present distribution is somewhat as follows North of Manserah the Swâtis hold pretty well the whole, about one-third of the district; descendants from tribes of Indian origin, like Gujars, Ghakkars, Dunds, and Karâls, with the admixture just referred to, the south and south-east; Jaduns in the Dor Valley in the centre; Tanâolis west in the semi-independent appanage of Amb; Swâtis and Gujars again in Agror and up to the Yusafzai of the Black Mountain, with Sayud families scattered through the whole.

The unsatisfactory nature of the Swâti has already been commented on. His deceit is a proverb. The story of his agricultural partnership with the devil, a legend, with many counterparts in many countries. How under the first contract, when the Swâti was to have all that grew above, and the devil all that grew below, the ground, he sowed Indian corn; and when at harvest time his partner complained of his share, the Swâti, protesting his desire to play fair, agreed to reverse the bargain. This arranged, the next season he sowed carrots, and got the better of his Satanic majesty again, who forthwith agreed to dissolve partnership. The Tanâ is reported to have once been warlike, but it cannot be said of him now; in respect of bad faith and other ill doings, he is on a level with the Swâti. The saying that "a Tanâoli's word is naught" sums up the opinion held about him. The Jadun, whatever his origin, has clearly deteriorated since he crossed the Indus, and is now far inferior to his Mahâban relative. The Dunds and Kurâls—both Hindu perverts to Islam—are credited with being faithless, crafty, and cowardly. Treachery among themselves covered their plot to attack Murree in 1857, and they are now suspected of a taint of Wahâbism. Far the best of the bunch are the Gujars and Gakkhars. Industrious cultivators, skilful husbandmen, with good physique, fair to middling as soldiers, and peaceable though not very courageous, citizens, although but for our rule they would probably barely hold their own.

In creed all are essentially Mussalmans—Hindus of all sorts, must be little more than five per cent.—but none are fanatical Muhammadans. The average physique is decidedly below the average of the Peshawur Valley, not to speak of the finer specimens of the Pathân highlanders. The Dunds and Kurâls are small; Jadus and Tanâolis not very robust; the Swâtis of Agror are feeble and enervated, though very fine men are found among the Swâtis of Khagân; and lots of the inhabitants of the valley have pleasing, not almost, classic features. The women are regarded much in the same light as among Pathâns generally; so much valuable property but as drudges rather than wives, especially among the Swâtis, though both they and the Utmânzai women have their share of good looks, and many of the Gujar race are decidedly pretty. The local proverb describes them as "the Swâti's toil, the Jadun's meanness, the Dilazâk's whore, the Turk's trance, and the Turin's Ho Rule"; and is curious as a summary of the tribal habits. The Swâti's wife is indicated as a field drudge; the Jadun's lady goes too often to the mill, and stays all night while the grain grinding, with fatal results to her virtue; the Dilazâks brought with them many ladies of too easy virtue; the tendency of the Turk is to laziness and indulgence; and the Turin is greatly under petticoat influence.

Any outline of the social habits and tribal customs of so

Dress of the Banâwî Fakirs, Hazâra.

diversely constituted a community would occupy an altogether disproportionate amount of space. They agree in the one peculiarity of being fairly submissive subjects. Anything like open violence is rare; the bullet and knife of the assassin are more generally replaced by the weapons of fraud or intrigue; and the bulk of the people seem to have a greater inclination towards patient toil, than for letting their neighbours' blood. All the same, that most beautiful of mountain glens—the Agror Valley, is a perfect hot-bed of intrigue, and always contains the elements of possible trouble. The Khān was removed under surveillance to Lahore in 1868, but subsequently restored to his authority, and for a time all went well. There is, however, unfortunately reason to suppose that the recent Agror intrigues with the Black Mountain tribes have been at the bottom of many of our troubles in that direction; and it is a matter always requiring to be carefully guarded against.

INDEX.

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
61
62
63
64
65
66
67
68
69
70
71
72
73
74
75
76
77
78
79
80
81
82
83
84
85
86
87
88
89
90
91
92
93
94
95
96
97
98
99
100

INDEX.

A.

ABBOTABÂD, cantonment of, 331
 Abdul Gafur, the Akhund of Swât, 280
 Abd-ul-Hamid, the Pathân Shaikh S'âdi, 303
 Abdul Haq, son of ditto, 285
 Abd-ur-Rahmân, a Pathân poet, 303
 Adam Khân and Durkhâni, 294
 Afghân, distinction between Pathân and, 102; likeness to Jews, 96; traditions, 96
 Afridi Pathâns, main divisions, 188
 Aka Khels, 188
 Adam Khels, 188—Jowâkis, 189, Gallais, 189
 Zakha Khels
 Kukis
 Malikdin Khels
 Qumba Khels
 } of the Khaiber, 202
 Afridis general characteristics of, 183; origin of, 188; country of, 187; feuds, 186; story of an Afridi feud, 191; small reverence for mullahs, 184; readily enlist, 187; jirgahs, 254
 Agror, sub-division of Hazâra, 313; intrigues in, 336
 Akbar, in the Peshawur valley, 221
 Akhund Darwâza of Peshawur, 135, 288
 Akhund Khels, a religious colony of, 314
Akhunds, Border Popes, 139; of Swât, 280
 Akra, ancient mounds of, 127
 Allai Valley, 313, 321
 Amb, chief of, 313
 Ambeya, pass into Buneyr, 276; campaign of the, 278
 Amir of Afghânistân, prohibitory duties imposed by, 205; power of defence against Russia, 208
 Apostles of insurrection, 286
 Ashraf, a Pathân poet, 303
Astânuddârs, holy place possessors, 136
 Authorities used in book, 9

B.

Babusar Pass, Hazâra border, 324
Badrâga, or "safe conduct," 146
 Bâhâdurkhel, salt beds of, 150
 Bain Pass, Dera Ismail district, 28
 Bâjaur, valley of, 271; iron of, 271; taken by Bârber, 219
 Bangash Pathâns, 143
 Bannu, civil district of, 126; importance of strategical position, 130; new military road to, 131; proposed railway to, 131; want of water supply for, 132
 Bannu, chief passes on border of—Shakdu, 104; Kaisor, 104; Tochi, 119; Barân, 119; Khas-ra, 119; Gumati, 132; Barganattu, 132
 Bannuchis, mongrel Pathâns, 129
 Barân Pass, Bannu district, 119
 Barawal, valley of, 271
 Barganattu Pass, Bannu district, 132
 Bârber, frontier tour of, 219; foray against hill tribes of, 219; in the Peshawur Valley, 216; marries a Pathân lady, 219
 Bâzdara Pass into Buneyr, 276
 Beka, the hermit of, 281
 Bellew, Dr., work on Yusufzai, 266
 Biloch division into tribes (tumdars), clans (paras), sections (pullis), &c., 54
 Biloches, early distribution of, 33; general description of, 23; original home of, 28; principal border tribes, 56; two great sections of, 30; raids and forays by, 50; romantic vendettas of, 50; traditions of, 27
 Bilochistân, former chronic rebellion in, 21; limits of, 18; our present position in, 6; physical characteristics of, 19; chief divisions of, 18—Gundâva, Jalâwan, Lus (Beyla), Makrân, Sarâwan
 Bir Bal the Mughal, killed by Yusufzais, 221
 Birmal Highlands, 120
 Bitanni Pathâns, account of, 94
 Black Mountain, the, 291, 311; a final settlement for, 317; tribes on, 262
 Blood-money, Pathân idea of, 114

Blush-money, a Pathān term, 213
 Border, cannot be defended by forts within, 11; close system on, condemned, 2; communications on the, 3; courtships on, 293; festive gatherings on, 292; importance of information regarding, 6; Andas, a, 299; must come more under British influence, 10; masterly inactivity in regard to, 1; militia, 180; outlaw, a, 177; romance, 292; Pathāns in a chronic state of war, 230; Pops, a, 280; serious want of topographical knowledge regarding, 6; tribes, strength of, 182; and characteristics of, 9; thieves, expertness of, 173; sentries, 174

Borderer, a domestic, 232

Bozdar Biloches, 57

Brahui ditto, 23; traditions of, 33

Bughti ditto, 57

Buneyr Valley, 274; passes into, 276

Buneyrwāl Pathāns, 276; difficulties with, in 1885, 291

Bucka, or mantilla, 240, 296

C.

Catch-em-alive-O's, 180

Chāchar Pass, Dera Ghāzi district, 48

Chamkannies, settlements of, 162; love feasts of, 162

Choplos, or Biloch raids, 61

Chilās, country of, 323

Chitral, State of, 327; routes to, 197

Colonies of fanatics, 261, 290, 321

Crime in the Peshawur Valley, 228

D.

Dalazāks, doubtful Pathāns, 216; driven across the Indus, 220

Dalu-Rai, an early tyrant, 44

Dards and Dardistan, 323

Darwesh Khel Waziri Pathāns, 106

Daudzais, sub-division of the Ghorla Khel Pathāns, 219

Dawar Valley, account of the, 118; entrances to the, 119

Dawaris, degraded Pathāns, 121; request for British protection, 133

Delgāns of the Lughmān Valley, 250

Dera Ghāzi Khān, civil district of, 46; hill streams of, 47; town founded, 55; principal passes on border of, 48; Suri, Zangi, Chāchar, Kahā, Raki, Sakhi Sarwar, Vidore, Sowāri, Shori, Mahoi, Sangarh, Kawan, 49

Dera Ismail Khān, civil district of, 75; principal passes on border of, 77, 78—Draband, Vahoa, Shaikh Haidar or Zao, Gumal, Tānk, Shuza, Bain, Peyzu, Chāchar, 191

Dir, valley of, 271

Drāband Pass, Dera Ismail district, 76

Dreshak Biloches, 56

Dumars, Kākar Pathāns, 59

Dumkis, Rind Biloches, 34

Dund tribe in Hazāra, 333

E.

Expeditions against the Bahlolzi Waziris, 108; the Black Mountain, 315; the Dawaris, 124; the Hindustāni fanatics, the Jowāki Afridis, 189; the Kābul-Khel Waziris, 106; the Mohmands, 249; the Omkzais, 168; the Shirānis, 58; the Takht tribes, 88; the Zaimukhts, 161

F.

Fakir, or mendicant friar, 138

Fends of the Pathān soldier, 177; story of an Afridi, 191

Frontier Force, composition of the, 175; likely to be modified, 181; strength of, 181

Frontier garrisons, the chief, 180

Frontier railway extension and military roads, 2

G.

Gambila or Tochi river, 119

Gandamak, treaty of, 141, 147, 203

Gār and Sāmīl, Pathān political divisions, 144

Ghilzais, origin of, 79; divisions of (see Powindahs), along the Khaiber route, 199

Ghorla Khel, an original division of Pathāns, 217

Ghorla Khel, sub-divisions of, 219—Mohmands, Khalils, Daudzais

Gigānis, original division of Pathāns, 217

Gilgit, state of, 327; new road to, 324; mountains of, 324

Guides, corps of, 175; a really happy man of, 178

Gujars and Gakkhars in Hazāra, 334

Gumal Pass, Dera Ismail district, 78, 91; opening of, 91; wants in connection with, 92

Gumati Pass, Bannu district, 132

Gundāra, a division of Bilochistān, 18

Gurchāni Biloches, 56

H.

Hamāyun in the Peshawur Valley, 219

Hamzazais, Kākar Pathāns, 61

Hangu breeze, 172
 Haripal, tribe of fakirs, 91
 Hassanzai Pathāns, murders by, 261
 Hazāra, civil district of, 330; past and present tribes of, 332
 Hindkis in Bajāwar, 272
 Hindu Kush, small States south of the range, 326; chief passes over, 323
 Hindustāni fanatics of Palosi, 315
 Honais, early Pathān family of, 154
Hujrahs, or Pathān village clubs, 150, 246
 Hunza, State of, 327

I.

Indus river banks, favourite resort of saints, 71; legend of diversion of, 43
 Indus Valley, characteristics of higher, 320
 Isots, Pathān tribe of, 91

J.

Jadrān highlands, 120; strategic value of position, 124
 Jadrāni Pathāns, 124, 160
 Jaduns or Gaduns, tribe of, 219, 275; in Hazāra, 333
 Jagdalak defile, 198
 Jāgi Pathāns of the Paiwar, 147
 Jalāwan, division of Bilochistān, 18
Jehad, or "religious war," against the Sikhs, 289
 Jelālābād, country surrounding, 198
 Jews, likeness to Afghāns, 96; to Pathāns, 258; similarity of names, 258
Jirgahs, or tribal councils, 252; notion of justice, 257
Jushteros, or village representatives, 325

K.

Kābul, a centre of trade, 211; approaches from India, 198; position, the, 206; resources of valleys round, 209; Russia's probable objective, 207
 Kābul Khel Waziri Pathāns, 106; characteristic agreement with, 116
Kaches, or small valleys, 104
Kāfilas, or caravans, 81
 Kāfiristān, country of, 327
 Kāhā Pass, Dera Ghazi district, 48
 Kā'sor Pass, Bannu district, 104
 Kākar Pathān, 59
 Kamāliya and Jalāliya, rocks at Attock, 238
 Kamrān, the son of Bārber, a fugitive, 219
 Kandahār, our position adjoining, 207
 Kanigurum, the capital of Waziristān, 103; a Mullah of, 287

Kārachi, port, 17; ancient name of, 44; development of, 17
 Kasrāni Biloches, 57
 Kawan Pass, Dera Ghāzi district, 48
 Kazim Khān, a Pathān poet, 304
 Khāgān, valley in Hazāra, 322
 Khaiber Pass, 195; routes forming, 196; description of defile, 197; diminished trade through, 205; historic route to India, 206; importance of possession, 209; tribes along, 199; agreement with jirgah of, 203
 Khakhai, original division of Pathāns, 217; split into Yusufzai, Gligānis, Turkilānis, 217
 Khalila, sub-division of the Ghorla Khel Pathāns, 219
 Kharoties, Powindah Pathāns, 83
 Khasora Pass, Bannu district, 119
 Khattak Pathāns, account of, 149; early settlements of, 154; hereditary Khāns among, 153; origin of name, 153; location of, 220; present distribution of, 157; quarrels of, 150; national dance, 151; pipes, 292
 Khattaks, chief divisions of Northern and Southern, 220; Kāka Khela, 152; Fakir Khela, 152; Sagris, 157
 Khelāt, Brahui Khāns of, 20; history of dynasties in, 20; British relations with Khāns of, 22
 Khetrān Pathāns, 58
 Khosa Biloches, 57
 Khost, valley of, 159
 Khostwal Pathāns, 159
 Khugiani Pathāns of the Khaiber, 200
 Khushhāl Khān, Khattak, a warrior poet, 156, 303; dying request of, 156
 Khwājah Muhammad Khān, Khattak, 157
Kirris, fixed camps, 81
 Kohāt, town and district of, 172; Pass of, 188; Pass allowances paid, 190; chief passes on Border, 165—Ublān, Kohāt, minor passes
 Kohistān, Cis-Indus, 322; capital of, 322; of Kashmir, 326; of Kābul, 326
 Kohistānis, 324
 Kohnok Hills, the, 120
 Kunār River, 272
 Kutāls, tribe in Hazāra, 334
 Kurmāra Valley, 165
 Kurram Valley, the, 141

L.

Laghāri Biloches, 57
 Larani Pass from the Swāt Valley, 268
 Lashāris, former great division of Biloches, 30
 Lataband Pass to Kābul, 198

Legend of, Bahāwal Hakk, 67; Chehal Tān, 69; Indus river saints, 65; Khwājah Khizr, 71; Mian Maluk Shāh, 68; Mians Mitho and Ratho, 69; Pir 'Adil, 73; Pir Murād, 67; Saidi Ahmad of Sakhi Sarwar, 70; the Saint of Drāband, 78; Saint of Kandahār, 73; Saint of Kohistān, 73; Rukn-ud-din, 67; Sadr-ud-din, 67; Saint of Terec, 70; Sassui and Panhu, 35; Shaikh Dana, 65; Shaikh Ismail Sarbanni, 64; Shaikh Mulhi-Kattal, 64; Shams-i-Tabrez, 66; Shaikh Bakhtiar Dunkar, 73; King Solomon, 87; the drowned Beauty, 42; the Indus diversion, 43; the toothache stone, 74; Usmān-i-Merwāndi or Lāl Shāh-Bāz, 69; Uddhero Lāl, 71; Yahya Bakhtiar, 65
 Lund Biloches, 57
 Lundi-Khāna, arrangements for traders at, 204
 Luni Pathāns, 58
 Lus, Beyla, division of Bilochistān, 18

M.

Mahoi Pass, Dera Ghāzi district, 49
 Mahsud Waziri Pathāns, 107; blood-money customs among the, 114
 Maidān Valley, the, 165
 Makrān, a division of Bilochistān, 18
 Malandri Pass into Buneyr, 276
 Malik Ako the Khattak, 155
 Mandu-Khels, Kākar Pathāns, 91
 Mangals, Pathāns of the Paiwar, 160
 Mangalais, early Pathān family, 154
 Mārris, doubtful Biloches, 57
 Marwat Pathāns, 128, 130
 Massacre of the Hindustāni fanatics, 290
 Maulvi, a Muhammadan D.D., 138
 Mazāri Biloches, 56
 Mian Gul, son of the Akhund, 285
 Miān Khels, Powindah Pathāns, 83
 Mians, Pathān Rural Deans, 138
 Michni Pass from Peshawur, 210
 Military roads to Bannu, 131; to Peshin, 48; to Gilgit, 324; from Bannu to Thal, need of, 132
 Miniature Republics, 325
 Mir Bāmi, a Border Judas, 299
 Mir Chākar, a Biloch hero, 31
 Miranzai Valley, the, 142
 Mirza Khān Ansāri, Pathān poet, 304
 Mohmand Pathāns, chief divisions of, 248; Bāizai, 248; Dawezai, 250; Utmānzai, 250; Halimzai, 248; Utmān Khels, 250
 Mohmands, account of, 245; blood-money customs, 114; constant raids by, 249; early locations of, 219; valleys adjoining our Border, 246
 Muhammadzais, original division of Pathāns, 217

Mullagori Pathāns of the Khaiber, 201
Mullahs, or Pathān priests, 188
 Multān as described by Sind historians, 44; famous saints of, 66
 Murder from the Pathān point of view, 179
 Musa Khel Pathāns, 58
 Muzzeoghar Range, 165

N.

Nager, State of, 327
Nakshbandia, sect of, 281
 Nandihar Valley, 313, 321
 Nanga Parbat mountain, 323
 Nangrahā, northern slope of the Sufed Koh, 200
Nao-gajās, or "nine-yarders," 136
 Nasars, Powindah Pathāns, 82
 Nasr the First, of Khelāt, 21
 Nasr the Second, 22
 North-West Frontier, our relations with, 1

O.

Orakzai Pathāns, main divisions of, 162; Daulatzai, 163; Bizoti, 163; trouble given by, 168; Rubia Khels, 163
 Orakzais, account of, 162; defective information regarding country, 166; raids of, 167

P.

Pachdā, physical character of tract, 47
 Palosi, fanatical colony of, 291, 321
 Panizai Kākar Pathāns, 60
 Panjkora Valley, 270
 Panni Pathāns of the Sangan Valley, 59
 Pariari Saynds, colony of, 314
 Passes to India, difficulty often exaggerated, 51
Pat, the, of Dera Ismail Khān, 75
 Pathān church and clergy list, 134; code of honour, 225; customs in common with Jews, 258; education of a, 227; fondness for music, 293; poetry, 302; pride, 224; Piffer and his way, 175; reverence for saints, 134; romance, 292; Romeo and Juliet, a, 294; martyr, a, 139; superstition, 227; wives, 237
 Pathān Saints: Akhund Darwāza of Peshawur, 135, 288; Akhund Musa of Jelālābād, 135; Bazid Answāri of Kaniguram, 287; Hazrat Lūt of Nangrahā, 135; Ihdād of Tirah, 288; Mian 'Ali of 'Ali Boghān, 135; Mehtar Lam of Laghman, 135; Rahimkai of Naushera, 132
 Pathāns, traditions of descent, 101; signification of name, 100; main divisions of, 101; first appearance in India of, 215; of the Peshawur Valley, 221

- Peshawur Valley, approaches to the, from Kâbul, 196 ; Buddhists in, 215 ; crime in, 228 ; history of, 214 ; place of arms for Bârber, 216 ; Pathâns in, 223 ; scenery of, 245 ; tribes now located in, 215 : under the Sikhs, 221
- Peshin, British position in, 13
- Peyzu Pass, Dera Ismail district, 78
- Piffers, frontier stations of the, 180 ; advance guard of the army, 175
- Pir Rokhan, Pir Tarik, Pir Kâmil, various names for a celebrated Pathân saint, 287
- Pirs*, or Pathân deans, 136
- Powindah merchants, 79 ; trade statistics, of, 86
- Powindah Pathâns, main divisions of, 82-85—Nasars, Sulaimân Khels, Miân Khels, Dautanis, Tokhis, Tarrakkis, Anders, Daulatzais, Kharoties
- R.
- Raki Pass, Dera Ghâzi district, 48
- Raigal Valley, 164
- Railway extension to Kâbul, 209
- Religious adventurers, colonies of, 261 ; mischief caused by, 277
- Rind, great Biloch division, 30 ; national hero of, 30
- Reri, ancient name of, 44
- Russian railway extension, 207 ; position on the Oxus, 207 ; occupation of Herât, consequence of any, 208 ; effects on India of an occupation of Kâbul, 209
- S.
- Safis, tribe north of Jelâlâbâd, 250
- Sahibzâdas*, sons of holy men, 138
- Saidu in Swât, residence of the Akhund, 284
- Sakhi Sarwar Pass, Dera Ghâzi district, 49 ; shrine of, 49 ; legends of, 70
- Sammanoghar Range, 165
- Sangarh Pass, Dera Ghâzi district, 49
- Sarangzai Kâkar Pathâns, 60
- Sarâwan, a division of Bilochistân, 18
- Sassui and Panhu, story of, 35
- Sayud Ahmad of Bareilly, 282, 289
- Sayuda*, or primates of the church, 136 ; colonies of, 313 ; of Pariari, 262, 314 ; of Tilli, 314
- Shâhbâz, a Khattak Khân, 156
- Shaikh*, a lay brother, 138
- Shaikh Haidar Pass, Dera Ismail district, 77
- Shaikh Mali apportions the Yusafzai country, 259
- Shakdu Pass, Bannu district, 104
- Shams*, fertile Biloch valleys, 51
- Shinkari, the land of the Shins, 322
- Shinwâris, Pathâns of Nangrahâ, 200
- Shinwâris, chief divisions of, 201—Sangu Khels, Alisherzais, Loargais
- Shirâni Pathâns, 88 ; customs among, 237
- Shitaks, a family of Pathâns, 154
- Shori Pass, Dera Ghâzi district, 49
- Shoto Pass from Kashmir, 324
- Shuza Pass, Dera Ismail district, 77
- Sigas*, or village parliaments, 325
- Sind, description of, 16 ; frontier of, 13 ; Border legends of, 35 ; Saints of, 63
- Sindis, the, 17
- Sittâna, colony of, 278
- Slavery in Yaghestân, 325
- Sohni, the drowned beauty, 42
- Solomon, legends of, 87
- Sowâri Pass, Dera Ghâzi district, 49
- Spin Tarins, Kâkar Pathâns, 59
- Sufed Koh Range, 142 ; tribes along the base of, 143
- Sufi poetry, 302
- Sulaimân Khels, Powindah Pathâns, 83 ; divisions of, 199 ; Bâbakar Khels, 199 ; Jabbâr Khels, 199
- Sulaimân Range, chief peaks of, 47 ; physical features of, 48 ; Saints of, 63
- Suri Pass, Dera Ghâzi district, 48
- Swât, valley of, 267 ; customs regarding theft in, 113 ; divisions of, 268 ; Kohitân of, 268 ; King of, 284 ; passes into, 268 ; roads from upper, 324 ; trade routes in, 270 ; tribes in, 268
- Swâtis, driven out of Swât, 218 ; deceit proverbial, 333 ; present location of, 313
- T.
- Takht-i-Sulaimân, 38
- Talash Valley, 271
- Talib-ul-ilm*, wisdom seekers, 139
- Tanâolis of Amb, 333 ; of Hazâra, 334
- Tanawâl in Hazâra, 313
- Tangi*, or waist, "a tight place," 104
- Tânk, town of, 76 ; pass in Dera Ismail district, 77, 94
- Târtâra Mountain, value of position, 202
- Tattah, saints of, 68
- Thakot, town on the Indus, 317
- Thal in the Kurram, 132
- Tikari, valley of, 213, 321
- Tirah, valleys of, 164 ; highlands of, 164 ; road taken by Nâdir through, 196
- Tochi Pass, Bannu district, 119
- Tribal levies, organization of, 182
- Tumandar*, or Biloch tribal chief, 30
- Turi, Pathâns of the Kurram, 145
- Turkolânis, present location of, 272

U.

- Ublân Pass, Kohât district, 165 ; surprise of, 167
 Urmân Pass from the Gumal, 94
 Usmân Khels, original division of Pathâns, 217
 Usteranas, Pathân tribe, 90
 Utmân Khel Pathâns, on the Swât River, 267 ; the sons of Utmân Bâba, 278

V.

- Vahoa Pass, Dera Ismail district, 77
 Vidore Pass, Dera Ghâzi district, 49

W.

- Wahâbis, 289
 Warden of the Marches, instituted by Akbar, 155
 Waziri Pathâns, main divisions of, 105
 Darwesh Khels, 100
 Utmanzais—Ahmadzais
 Mahsuds, 107
 Bahlolzais — Alizais — Shaman Khels
 Kâbul Khels, 106
 Lalais, 106
 Waziris, description of, 108 ; courtship, 238 ; criminal code of, 115 ; inveterate robbers, 105 ; marriage ceremonies of, 238 ; peculiar customs of, 109

Yusafzai Pathâns, chief divisions of—

- | | | | | | |
|--|-------------|---|----------------------------------|---|------------|
| Mandaur,
stepson, clans
of, 259, 260 | Usmân . . | { | Kainalzai, 259, 260 | { | Rustam |
| | | | Amazai, 259 . . . | | Chargholai |
| | | | Alazai, 259 | | |
| | | | Kamazai, 259 | | |
| | Utmân . . | { | Akazai, 259 | { | |
| | | | Saddazai—(Khudukhels, 259) | | |
| | | | Razai, 260 | | |
| | | | Uriah (Bâdi) the Badikhels, 261 | | |
| | Isazai, 261 | { | Hassanzai, 261, 312 (Khân Khels) | { | |
| | | | Akazai, 261, 312 | | |
| | | | Madakhels | | |
| | | | | | |
| | Musa . . | { | Iliaszi, 262 . | { | Salarzai |
| | | | | | Gadaizai |
| | | | | | Ashazai |
| | | | | | Nasozai |
| Yusaf . . | | { | | { | Makhozai |
| | | | | | |
| | | | | | |
| | | | | | |
| | Mali, 262 | { | Daulatzai | { | |
| | | | Nurazai | | |
| | | | Chagarzai, 312 | | |
| | | | | | |
| | Akozai, 263 | { | Khwazozai, 268 (Malizai) | { | |
| | | | Baizai, 268 | | |
| | | | Ranizai, 268 | | |
| | | | | | |

Waziristân, country of, 103

Wives. Pathân, 237 ; Waziri, 235 ; price of, 240

Women, Afridi, 187 ; buxom, of Swât, 270 ; frequent elopement of, 243 ; life of trans-Border, 242 ; in Hazâra, 334 ; Shirâni, 237 ; trade in, 242, 247

Y.

- Yaghestân, the independent country, 320
 Yâhiya, a Khattak Khân, 156
 Yasin, State of, 327
 Yusufzai, character of main valleys, 266
 country rich in ancient remains, 267 ; retaliatory justice, in, 112
 Yusufzais, children of Joseph, grandsons of Khakhai, 258 ; gradual advance of, 218 ; extend to Swât, 218 ; distribution of tribes, 259 ; numbers of, 264 ; relations to foreigners, 265 ; matrimonial negotiations in, 239 ; Bellew, best authority on, 266

Z.

- Zaimukht Pathâns, 161
 Zumâri Pathâns, 91
 Zangi Pass, Dera Ghâzi district, 48
 Zawaghar Range, 165
 Zhob Valley, 92

U.

- Ublân Pass, Kohât district, 165 ; surprise of, 167
 Urmân Pass from the Gumal, 94
 Usmân Khels, original division of Pathâns, 217
 Usterânas, Pathân tribe, 90
 Utmân Khel Pathâns, on the Swât River, 267 ; the sons of Utmân Bâba, 278

V.

- Vahon Pass, Dera Ismail district, 77
 Vidore Pass, Dera Ghâzi district, 40

W.

- Wahâbis, 289
 Warden of the Marches, instituted by Akbar, 155
 Waziri Pathâns, main divisions of, 105
 Darwesh Khels, 100
 Uzmanzais—Ahmadzais
 Mahsuds, 107
 Bahlolzais — Alizais — Shaman Khels
 Kabul Khels, 106
 Lakais, 106
 Waziris, description of, 108 ; courtship, 238 ; criminal code of, 115 ; inveterate robbers, 105 ; marriage ceremonies of, 238 ; peculiar customs of, 109

Yusafzai Pathâns, chief divisions of—

- | | | | |
|--|--------------------------------------|--|------------------------|
| | Usmân . . . | { Kamalzai, 259, 260 | |
| | Mandaur, stepson, clans of, 259, 260 | { Amazai, 259 . . . { Rustam
Alazai, 259 . . . { Chargholai | |
| | Utmân . . . | { Kamalzai, 259
Akazai, 259
Saddazai—(Khudukhels, 259) | |
| | Razai, 260 | | |
| | Uriah (Badi) the Badikhels, 261 | | |
| | Isazai, 261 | { Hassanzai, 261, 312 (Khân Khels)
Akazai, 261, 312
Madakhels | |
| | Musa . . . | { Iliaszai, 262 . . . { Salarzai
Gadnazai
Ashazai
Nasozai
Makhozai | { Buneyrwals |
| | Yusaf . . . | | |
| | Mali, 262 | { Daulatzai
Nerazai
Chagarzai, 312 | { Buneyrwals |
| | Akozai, 263 | { Khwazozai, 268 (Malizai)
Baizai, 268
Ranizai, 268 | |

Waziristân, country of, 103

Wives. Pathân, 237 ; Waziri, 235 ; price of, 240

Women, Afridi, 187 ; buxom, of Swât, 270 ; frequent elopement of, 243 ; life of trans-Border, 242 ; in Hazâra, 334 ; Shirâni, 237 ; trade in, 242, 247

Y.

- Yaghestân, the independent country, 320
 Yâhiya, a Khattak Khân, 156
 Yasin, State of, 327
 Yusufzai, character of main valleys, 266
 country rich in ancient remains, 267 ; retaliatory justice, in, 112
 Yusufzais, children of Joseph, grandsons of Khakhai, 258 ; gradual advance of, 218 ; extend to Swât, 218 ; distribution of tribes, 259 ; numbers of, 264 ; relations to foreigners, 265 ; matrimonial negotiations in, 239 ; Bellew, best authority on, 266

Z.

- Zaimukht Pathâns, 161
 Zimâri Pathâns, 91
 Zangi Pass, Dera Ghâzi district, 48
 Zawaghar Range, 165
 Zhob Valley, 92