Notes:

“Paul’s introduction of divine judgment in Romans 2 is abrupt and his assumption is that his readers recognize its reality... God’s judgment is a fact of human existence that must be reckoned with if people want to escape the realm of fantasy and live in the real world... If God does not judge a man ultimately, that means that his actions have no ultimate value, and the man whose actions lack ultimate value has little alternative but to view his life as being devoid of meaning and his existence as totally inconsequential... For if God regards what we do important enough to judge, He certainly must regard what we are as important enough to matter.”
