Hinton's classic novel The Outsiders, Greasers and Socs are rival gangs, engaged in a tragic conflict that constantly causes death and trauma for both social groups. Soc gang members come from affluent families and live in the city's wealthy West Side, while Greasers grow up in dysfunctional homes and live on the poorer East Side. Socs are clean-cut teenagers, who wear madras shirts, have tight haircuts, and drive expensive and flashy cars like Mustangs and Corvairs. Instead, Greasers are rough-looking teenagers, who wear leather jackets and have long, slick hair. Because socs come from rich and well-dressed families, they have a better reputation than Greasers and enjoy their privileged status. Socs usually escape the crimes they commit and are portrayed as entitled and superficial teenagers. Unlike Greasers, Socs are childless and solitary individuals, who care more about maintaining appearance than being authentic and sincere people. Greasers don't enjoy the same privileges as the Socs, and authorities blame them for most of the problems in the city. Greasers are also more emotional than the Socs and appreciate friendship over appearance and status. Despite their many differences, Greasers and Socs have some things in common. Both social groups engage in the act of erasing, committing crimes, and experiencing adolescent turce. They also suffer from stereotypes and are outsiders in their communities. The Socs did not live up to their community's expectations, and the Greasers felt abandoned by their community. Members of both gangs deal with significant problems in life and have to overcome certain obstacles. Teenagers in both gangs also experience identity issues, withstand trauma, and deal with peer pressure. Last Updated by eNotes Editorial on December 10, 2020 While they come from socio-economic classes different, both Socs and Greasers suffer from adolescent tumult, among which are the desire to accept as individuals as well as having a common identity, disillusionment in adults and society in general, and to reconcile their individual perspectives with others. Besides, they both hate stereotypes. Unfortunately, both groups have members who, as Jay Dally writes, bring their innocence/youth/idealism to the extreme that all this turns into a dangerous and detrimental trait. Each group is pessimistic and optimistic. Cherry Valance saw kindness in Pony and attempted to reconcile the conflict between the groups, but, unfortunately, he was killed. Others who maintain a positive attitude are Soda and Darry, who are different from Johnny and Dally because they survive without losing their good, their gold. This gold was achieved through their sacrifice and solitude towards Ponyboy. But, Ponyboy admits that, as Frost writes, No gold can stay and he reaches at the end of his manhood. Approved by the eNotes Editorial Team At the beginning of ponyboy's novel focuses on how different Greasers and Socs are. for example, the biggest difference is the socioeconomic status and all the implications that come with it. Greasers tend to be poor. They live in poorer parts of town, they don't wear expensive clothes, they're rough around the edges, they're associated with engaging in more criminal activities and driving cars they can work and repair. On the other hand, the Socs have everything money can buy. They live in better parts of the city, they have fancy clothes and cars, they commit crimes, but get away with the influence that comes with their money. They drink a lot, but mostly because they are bored and have everything they possibly want. However, as stated earlier, they have some similarities. Both groups engage in criminal activity, both groups also deal with the problem. At the beginning of the novel, Cherry shows this when she says, Things are rough all over. Approved by the editorial team eNotes Novel results, after Dallas, Ponyboy and Johnny rescue children from a burning house on the bad side of the city, shows that judgments made about various groups can be overcome with individual actions. Greasers, being poor and known for their delinquency and disruptive behavior, prove that their ringleaders are affectionate, courageous and of good moral character when they risk their lives to help strangers. Cherry, one of the Socs, is a character who manages to make overtures to help bridge the gap between the two groups, but this happens mainly because Dallas and Ponyboy are attracted to him. He and Ponyboy discuss the fact that the stars in the sky are visible from both sides of the city where they live, drawing attention to their similarities. The title of the novel itself implies one made up of outsiders, in fact, both parties were removed from society due to the various socioeconomic and cultural factors that set them Approved by the Editorial Team of eNotes In addition to the monetary differences between socs and lubricants, there is also the issue of appearance as a result of the background - lubricants are called that way due to the state of their oily hair. And while it is true that fashion back then was adding oil to a person's hair, the lubricant dos seemed to be the result mainly of poor care and lack of cleanliness. On the contrary, the soc, having come from a more affluent background, has all the benefits of wealth: net, neat personal appearance, latest fashion, slick cars, etc. They are the social elite of the novel, while lubricants are considered poorer second-class citizens. Depending on which soc or lubricant we are talking about, there are also individual differences in the character consisting of each class or group. For example, even in lubricants we have sensitive boys and tough boys, just as socs have a variety of personalities, too. Approved by the Editorial Team of eNotes The Socials and the Greasers differs in many ways. There are some that are obvious and others that are not. First, there's the money problem. Social is the rich kids of the West Side. Lubricants are generally poor and live on the East Side of the city. Then, there is the way they are perceived by the public. Lubricants are seen as irregular and unlawful. They are seen as if they are dirty because of their long, oily hair. Social is seen as good children who don't get in trouble. They're well-dressed and drive nice cars. Next, lubricants like to go to the movies or hang out with their friends. For them their gang is family. They are known for petty theft and causing other minor disturbances. They also like to smoke, drink, and some like to fight. Social likes to throw parties. They play football or cheerleaders. They also drink, but are not seen next door by the community. Finally, the lubricant is very emotional. They feel almost hard. Socially cool until it doesn't feel anything. Approved by the Editorial Team of eNotes The Greasers is a group of boys who live in poor parts of the city, while the Socs are gangs that come from wealthy areas of the city. After the film drives in, Ponyboy discusses with Cherry Valence about the difference between Greasers and Socs. Based on the meeting of the two Soc girls, Pony thinks that they are very similar because they are all teenagers with similar interests, unless they like the Beatles and think Elvis Presley is out, and we think he's a Beatles rank, and that Elvis is tuff. But that seems to be the only difference for me (Chap 3). Cherry points out that the Socs and Greasers have a different set of values. Soc aloof, cold and shows no feeling, whereas with emotion Greasers High. Approved by eNotes Editorial Team group Tim Shepherd Shepherd Organized gangs, while Ponyboy is more like a bunch of people just hanging out together. Ponyboy explains the difference between the two, saying: the difference between the gang (Tim Shepherd) and us - they (have) a leader and (are) organized; We're just friends who (stay together) everyone (is) his own leader. Tim Shepherd enjoys being a ruckman... the rest of his group (is) the same way... young veil - which will grow into an old veil. They knowingly ridiculed their identities as part of a gang, enjoyed fights and engaged in minor crimes. There are advantages to their persona, and they exist outside accepted social norms. The Ponyboy gang is more like family; they keep the door policy open and exist primarily as a means of supporting each other when family life or other forces become abusive. It is true that people in the group like to fight as well, but for them it has to do with young energy as it does with competition with other gangs. Ponyboy gang members follow a strict code of honor and justice, but Darry, who is their unheralded leader, aspires to achieve better things for his life and the lives of his brothers. Like Ponyboy said, he's better than the two of us... He went somewhere... And I'm going to be like him... I won't live in a bad neighborhood all my life (Chapter 9). Approved by the Chapter 2 eNotes Editorial Team presents several ways for Socs and Greasers to differ, to add common variations described in Chapter 1. Lubricants are poor and have gangs, and the Socs are rich and have social clubs. They hang out in different places - Ponyboy says that the Socs go to The Way Out and to Rusty's, and greasers go to The Dingo and to Jay's. Aside from these details, the main idea of Chapter is that, despite their differences, there is much in the same about both groups. Both the Socs and Greasers got into trouble, and they fought, and although it was easy to stereotyping, both groups consisted of unique individuals. Cherry described his situation succinctly when he said, All Socs are not like that... That's like saying all you greasers like Dally Winston. Cherry also noted that individuals in both groups face difficulties in their lives. He summed it up with observation, I'll bet you think the Socs have made him, rich kids... I'm going to tell you something... and it might come as a surprise. We have a problem you've never even heard of... difficult things throughout (Chapter 2).
