When I took youth on mission for the first time, I thought I knew what I was doing. And while I do believe we did good things, learned much, and did little harm, I really didn’t have a clue. That was a summer in the early 90’s when I was a youth minister at an Episcopal parish in the suburbs of the Twin Cities in Minnesota. We had followed in the footsteps of another parish and their leadership to a program on the south side of Chicago, to work for a week in the HUD housing projects. I learned from the people ministering in the community, a Society of Friends (Quakers) community center and from the “grandmothers” living in the row houses we were painting. Sadly, we also learned just how far apart and different we were from each other as five people were killed when two gangs fired random shots across a playground. We never knew the victims, but I will never forget the words of one of the grandmothers. ‘Bullets have no names.’

Over the last twenty years I have learned so much about going on mission - from the people and places to which I have journeyed, from the young people and adults that have been willing to go with me, and through seeking and being open to what it is the Spirit wants me to learn and discover along the way. First and foremost, everyone who is involved in mission will learn, grow, and be transformed, if they are open to God’s shaping and molding. Mission is a formative experience. But, it is imperative that we who are leaders in these experiences are aware of the spiritual and formational development of all participants and create experiences where all may be nurtured. The preparation before and work after the in-field period are at least as important or more important than the time spent on mission. Learning about the culture and customs of the place you’re going, even if it is just the other side of town or the nursing home down the street, is as important as knowing one’s own norms. Knowledge of the realities of memory loss and Alzheimer’s before caroling in December is as significant as understanding the importance of greeting each person as they enter a room in Ecuador.

THE CONTINUUM OF MISSION

A person, no matter their age, can “do” mission based on where they are in their spiritual formation. I use a tool to help explain a continuum of mission. This begins with charity, the simple act of giving to another. Then it moves to service, the giving of time or talent to an initiative. Then to advocacy, giving voice to those who are voiceless. And finally to justice, working to change the systems that create the problems in the first place. If we look at the issue of hunger: Charity would be the writing of a check or the collection of food for a local food shelf. Service might be delivering those checks or canned goods, stocking the shelves, filling bags, or handing out food at that organization. Advocacy could include serving on the organizational structure of that food shelf, teaching about hunger in your area to your church community, sitting down in conversation with someone receiving that food and learning about their situation without judgment, or attending a rally and giving voice to what you have learned. Justice might look like creating job opportunities or working with the local government for just wages and more affordable housing. It might seem that there is a hierarchy to this continuum but there is not. All are necessary and needed until an issue is solved.

Invitations: Received and Offered

By Deacon Maureen-Elizabeth Hagen

Beloved of God—

As I write this column, 3,000 miles from home, I have been reflecting on the importance of invitation. I’m in New England because Archdeacon Aaron Perkins invited me to attend the Province I Deacons Conference: Deacons Calling the Beloved Community to Action. Soon I will help lead a retreat of the New York Deacons, thanks to their invitation. Invitations can be life-changing. An invitation to church led me to change my life 21 years ago. Others invited me to discern a calling to the diaconate. The Gospels tell of Jesus’ inviting others to come and see, to go and be. May we all strive to invite more people to experience God’s love in the world.

Speaking of invitation: I invite each of you to join other deacons at AED’s Triennial Gathering next June 6-9 in Providence, RI. The theme is fantastic. Our Presiding Bishop preaches and teaches. Eight deacon-led workshops focus on reconciling ministries. (See page 4 for more information.)

Now a quick recap:

• General Convention was outstanding. More than 100 deacons came as deputies, liturgical participants and volunteers. We effectively advocated for several pieces of legislation. Through deacons’ (and others’) efforts, 1000 people protested the separation of families at the Federal Detention Center at Hutto.

• Board member Juan Sandoval and I led a well-attended workshop at Nuevo Amanecer. (See page 14.) There was great interest in encouraging more Latinx deacons; AED’s Competencies for Deacons are now in Spanish. The Diocese of Rhode Island is striving to develop more Spanish-language resources.

• On the last evening at Nuevo Amanecer, I spoke with the Cuban Bishop. Readmitted to The Episcopal Church at General Convention, Obispa Griselda said Cuba has one deacon (Lis Martinez), but would like more. We hope to have an official AED visit to Cuba next fall.

• In September, AED’s Executive Committee met. We set up a Latino Ministries committee. One final invitation: We have several committees that could use members. If you’re interested in Fundraising, Finance, or Latino Ministries, please let Lori Mills-Curran or me know.

Yours in Christ,

Exercising our Liturgical Prerogatives

By Deacon Lori Mills-Curran

One of the most interesting parts of my job is meeting deacons all over the country, and their questions intrigue me. Recently, I was asked why it mattered if deacons retain their normal liturgical prerogatives. A deacon was serving in an important service in which the rector said “I will be the deacon today,” during some rushed liturgical instructions. The deacon felt uncomfortable, but was unable to articulate why. She had nothing to say that did not sound like cranky liturgical territoriality.

Deacons instinctively do not lightly relinquish their diaconal liturgical prerogatives. We know that these prerogatives are not incidental, not a mere matter of taste. We do not let them go without calling attention to the fact, either then or later, that to do so silences the symbol which the church has ordained us to be.

Deacons always read the Gospel, coming down from the altar to stand among the people of God, so they can hear the stories of how Christ has commissioned them all as servants of the world. Deacons have a special responsibility in intercession, to make sure it reflects the needs of the world, not just the parish sick list. Deacons always set the Eucharistic table, to teach the value of these liturgical actions, long before those hurried sacristy conversations. We always bid the congregation farewell, reminding them to go out and serve the Lord. If a deacon is in the congregation, a priest or bishop must yield these prerogatives. Michael Curry says so.

Diocesan Liturgical prerogatives are symbolic speech, which communicate, if we let them, something that the world is yearning to hear: that Episcopalians are a people which so values the missional task of God that we have set aside a whole order just to remind the people of God to go do it! Deacons know that the church has given us these prerogatives because we are ordained to remind the people of God that a call to diakonia – Christian service - is indelibly marked on your brow when you are baptized, along with the royal priesthood of all believers.

We need to be at the ready to calmly clarify the symbolic importance of our liturgical role, when in the press of liturgical affairs, this important message is silenced. The responsibility to do this teaching is more uniquely ours than that of any other order. But let’s not be cranky about it. We diminish our authority by doing so. It’s our job to carefully teach the value of these liturgical actions, long before those hurried sacristy conversations. Because it’s not about us and our egos. It’s about God’s mission.

The bishops of Province I, in an incredible show of support for their deacons, have donated monies to underwrite the costs of this event. Other bishops are pitching in, and our goal is to raise enough money from them to reduce the cost of this event to the greatest extent possible. Ask your bishop if a contribution has been made from your diocese! Housing options are being researched, as well.

Working for justice is great work - but if no one gives money or food, people will go hungry while we wait for justice to happen.

MISSION TRANSFORMED

Now, when I take people, and especially young people, on mission, I find opportunities to teach and talk about what they experience and how that might relate to their everyday life. Preparation is done before going on mission to learn about the people and places [to which] we will be going. Last year before taking our group caroling at the local dementia unit at a long-term care facility, we watched a movie about the impact of music on people with severe Alzheimer's. What a difference that made to the young people and their willingness to interact with the people we visited. While on a mission or outreach experience we will hold debrief sessions to talk about the day and how we both learned and deepened our time and how we saw God's presence in our day. Following our time on mission, we gather to pray and discuss how any of what we have experienced or learned might impact our life and the way we choose to live.

Mission and outreach are not just about going and doing, they’re about being called to live out our faith and learn about the faith of those we serve; growing and deepening our life in Christ by encountering the Christ is those we meet.

L. Sue von Rautenkranz serves as the Archdeacon for the Diocese of Washington, overseeing the discernment, formation, and deployment of deacons and a four-parish youth ministry collaboration in northwest DC. She has served on staff for several dioceses and parishes.
Sabbatical to Navajoland leads to new chapter

BY DEACON CATHRINE HALFORD

In 2016, when I had been ordained almost eight years, I decided that I would like to take a sabbatical - as many priests do but very few deacons. I wanted to go to a place where I could learn about a new culture, new language and traditions.

I spent September and October of 2017 in Utah, Arizona, and New Mexico - at The Episcopal Church in Navajoland, a mission area of our Church established to help preserve the culture, traditions, and language of the Navajo people - the Dine’- their name for themselves. What an incredible two months!

So, instead of driving about two hours east to the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians Reservation, I drove 20 hours west. Yes, I wanted to learn about a new group of people, but I also wanted our Church to be involved to a large degree - and that is the case out there.

History tells us that in the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries, the Spaniards sailed over to our part of the world and established settlements. As time went on, they moved north of Mexico into what is now the Western part of the U.S.

They became very interested in the land for planting, raising cattle, and for the many people living there to be used as labor. The Spaniards saw the Native Americans as pagans who needed to be introduced to the true church so their souls would be saved. The Roman Catholic Church was the introduction to Christianity for many Navajos and other Native Americans living in that area.

The connection between the Episcopal Church and the Navajo Nation began when a medical mission was built in Ft. Defiance, Arizona, in 1894; then one in Farmington, New Mexico, in 1922; and another in Bluff, Utah, in 1942. Schools were eventually built on the premises of the medical clinics as were churches. Eventually, those schools closed as did the boarding schools where many were sent - a disaster - and public schools were opened to the Navajos.

In 1978, The Episcopal Church founded the Area Mission known as The Episcopal Church in Navajoland in the middle of the 27,000 square miles of the Navajo Reservation in Arizona, New Mexico, and Utah - the Four Corners - with Colorado being the other corner but without being a part of the Reservation. This mission was carved out of the dioceses of those three states.

For 40 years, the Episcopal Church in Navajoland has strived to become a diocese. This area - these people - are poor with little money and other resources to put into these missions. The buildings on the grounds of these churches are over a hundred years old and not in very good shape.

However, in the last 15 years, many partnerships between churches from all over the country and these missions have been established and are trying to rehab the buildings for cottage industries and affordable housing, which would allow the churches to bring in more income, thus paving the way toward becoming economically independent, and thus, a diocese. Mission groups arrive throughout the spring and summer to keep the momentum of this work going.

There are few clergy in this mission area. Those who are present are not all Navajo (bilagaana-white people), but several have graduated from seminary this year. The dream is to have all Navajo clergy and a Navajo bishop.

Let me say that I had no idea what my job description would be once I arrived in Navajoland. Most sabbaticals involve research, meditation/quiet time perhaps in a monastery, or maybe a walking pilgrimage. That being said, I made it clear that I wanted “to work”.

My thoughts were that I would be involved in a large project. However, by the end of the two months, I had presided and preached at several services, helped with office work, supported clergy in the three mission areas, driven to a high school twenty-five miles away at 6:00 in the morning to purchase used computers, welcomed guests from Boston who were gathering information for a mission group, helped paint a room in a 100-year old building with a Colorado mission group, participated in the soap-making process and filled jars with honey (both cottage industries), practiced reading Navajo phonetically, delivered wood, watered plants in a greenhouse for a priest who was on a two-week vacation, made a pastoral care visit at a hospital in the middle of the night, and begun learning about Navajo healing. All of these events and activities added up to a picture bigger than I could have ever imagined. In addition, I could not be there for two months without taking in the incredible canyons and parks that are such a huge part of the beauty of God’s creation.

There is much spirit and energy in this land, but there is still much work to do in order to help heal the wounds of the past. Sustainable farming, expanding retreat opportunities, and working with the local government to build low-income housing along with the rehabilitation of a historic hospital into a women’s wellness center are among the efforts to help achieve this vision of healing and growth.

I believe that some of that spirit and energy about which I just mentioned comes from the Episcopal Church allowing the Navajo people to bring into the church’s liturgy some of their own traditions and prayers - which is not happening with other churches in that area.

After returning home, many people asked me about my time spent in The Episcopal Church in Navajoland. My answer was that I had one foot in Mississippi but one foot still in Navajoland. The connection was so strong that I asked and received the blessings of both Bishop

The Episcopal Tent has become a buzzing hub for worship, hospitality, and conversation at the Wild Goose Festival, held annually in the mountains of North Carolina, at the intersection of faith, justice, music, and art. AED co-sponsored the tent this year along with other organizations and dioceses.

This year, the Episcopal Tent offerings included daily Morning Prayer, Eucharist, and Compline; a meet-and-greet reception; a potluck dinner; workshops; support groups; virtual reality viewers (to experience life in a refugee camp), daily Beer & Hymns; and table displays by Episcopal organizations such as AED and Episcopal Migration Ministries.

Deacons Leeann Culbreath (Diocese of Georgia) and Genevieve Nelson (Diocese of Southern Virginia) participated in a deacon panel discussion with deacons from the Methodist and Lutheran churches, and they assisted with worship and hospitality. Culbreath serves on the Episcopal Tent planning team.

They encourage deacons to attend next year’s festival and to submit workshop proposals. The festival attracts young adults discerning calls to ministry, and it’s an excellent place to network and be revitalized for ministry.

Deep Calls to Deep: Deacon Preaching Fellows

BY DEACON DR. ROBIN HOLLIS

A cohort of deacons in the Diocese of Arizona is charting a new course as Preaching Fellows in the Virginia Theological Seminary (VTS) program “Deep Calls to Deep.”

Deep Calls to Deep is a year-long program for mid-career clergy. It is focused on nourishing passion for preaching through voice and embodiment work and through deepening a connection to the Holy Spirit. The majority of this program is generously funded by a Lilly Endowment grant and supported by VTS.

Our diocesan deacon cohort is the first Deacon Preaching Fellows Cohort in the program. VTS recognizes that all clergy, including deacons, have a preaching calling.

Preaching Guide and Mentor for the Arizona deacons is The Very Rev. Troy Mendez, Dean of Trinity Cathedral. Deacon Robin Hollis also serves as Peer Cohort convener and facilitator, having completed additional required program peer facilitator training. The program began with a residential week in June 2018, will be followed by meeting locally nine times (both in person and through Zoom), and conclude with a residential week in June 2019.

The program’s four aspirations for the Preaching Fellows are:
1. Spirituality – Feeding your Soul
2. Imagination – Expanding your Mind
4. Community – Building Relationships

The Very Rev. Troy Mendez shares, “This program is truly focused on the holistic development and spiritual growth of clergy as preachers and not just on tips and tricks. While there is some discussion of preaching resources and techniques, it’s more about finding your preaching voice through spirituality and imagination. As the peer cohort’s Preaching Guide, I am pleased to have the opportunity to work with these deacons on developing their preaching voice; definitely a learning experience for all of us.”

This program was first introduced to our diocese when Trinity Cathedral and the Deacon Formation Academy hosted The Rev. Mark Jefferson, who led a workshop on “Developing the Preaching Pew” in October 2017. Deacon participants at that workshop were inspired to come together to form an Arizona Diocese Peer Cohort and applied. There was competition for the number of diocesan peer cohorts who could participate in the 2018-2019 program. “It was a team effort and one that demonstrates the enthusiasm for and commitment to continued life-long learning and professional development,” says The Venerable Sarah Getts, Archdeacon and advocate for this peer cohort.

Following the completion of this Fellowship, these deacons will be looking to convene a “Deacon Preaching Support group.” Sharing his enthusiasm for this Preaching Fellowship, Deacon Chris Ledyard says, “There is the side benefit that we got to know each other beyond our formation groups. And [this fellowship] will deepen our group relationships through the meetings and sharing of our sermons and feedback with each other. We encourage others to consider forming a cohort and attending to further develop preaching skills which can [be] utilized beyond the pulpit only on Sundays.” Echoing his sentiment, Deacon Janetta Beaumont says, “Our cohort grew close as a community of support and trust during the first week of training. We look forward to deepening relationships as we move through the next year.”

For the 2018-2019 program, there are five peer cohorts from dioceses throughout The Episcopal Church. The residential weekend hosts both those concluding the program and those beginning the journey. Approximately 50 clergy overall are participating in the program.

For more about the program, contact The Rev. Dr. Robin Hollis at deacons@azdioce.org.

Detailed program information can be viewed on the VTS website at www.vts.edu/page/deep-calls-to-deep.

Robin Hollis is Director of Deacon Formation in the Diocese of Arizona. She serves as a deacon at St. James the Apostle Episcopal Church in Tempe, AZ and leads her own management consultancy focusing on youth-centered non-profits, workforce, and leadership development.
Before entering into discernment with my parish and my diocese over the question of my future in ordained ministry, I taught high school students. The most frequently asked question in my English classroom was not about themes in literature or strategies in persuasion. By far - the most frequent question I was asked by my students was, “Is this going to be on the test?” When I was in charge of creating the assessments in my classroom, I could answer this question definitively. Towards the end of my career standardized tests became the tests that mattered. I was never quite sure what these unknown test-makers would include. Designing instruction used to be simple. As assessments slipped out of the control of the teachers in the classroom - designing instruction became a game of informed guessing. Will what we think is important to teach our students really be on the test?

“The formation ministry of our diocese ...has become so much more than simply a school to raise up deacons for the diocese.”

It is certainly no revelation to any observer of Christianity in America that “being the Church” in the 21st century is a radically different proposition than it was just a generation ago. And with it, the work of the Deacon in the Episcopal Church is changing. Susanne Watson Epting captures this ongoing change in her 2015 book, Unexpected Consequences: The Diaconate Renewed, in the metaphor of waves sweeping over the church and through the diaconate. According to Epting we are now heading into “the seventh wave (from about 2005 to the present), one of integration, ...one in which we see many of these things coming together: engaging the diaconia of all believers, equipping the saints, interpreting the world, and advocating – not only in congregations, but on behalf of the diocese.” We are called on as Deacons not only “to interpret to the Church the needs, concerns, and hopes of the world” but “to make Christ and his redemptive love known, by ...word and example, to those among whom you live, and work, and worship.” Integrating this inward flow of information about the world to the Church and this outward flow of love to the world is a job for which there is no uniform description. If the future work of a Deacon must be left open to the movement of the Holy Spirit, then the preparation of Deacons needs to be a bit open-ended as well. How do we as a church engage in the “informed guessing” necessary to equip deacons for an exciting, if unknowable future in ministry?

Partially in response to this question, the Diocese of Central Pennsylvania has taken an in-depth look at the trends shaping ministry in our part of the church. This examination was facilitated by our new Bishop, The Rt. Rev. Audrey C. Scanlan, and her three-year plan to thoroughly understand the needs and desires of our church before making any major changes. The teaching/formation ministry of our diocese has benefited from these new perspectives. It has become so much more than simply a school to raise up deacons for the diocese. But in this process the way that we prepare deacons for servant leadership has gone through what for us is a radical change. Perhaps there are lessons in what we have done that have implications for the preparation of deacons across the church.

Stevenson School for Ministry

The Stevenson School for Ministry is dedicated to the lifelong learning and discernment processes of everyone. SSFM now includes:

• Vocational Formation for Lay Ministry
• Vocational Formation for the Ministry of Deacons
• Vocational Formation for the Ministry of locally-trained Priests
• Leadership Days - training for leaders in the diocese and our parishes under the title of the Academy for Missional Formation
• Support for clergy who are new to the diocese or who are newly ordained under the title of Vital and Effective Leadership Institute
• Anglican Studies Program offered for and through a nearby interdenominational seminary
• Resources and support for Youth Ministry
• Resources and support for Children's Ministry

Bringing all of these ministry/formation activities under one organizational function has led to certain economies of scale through sharing resources and sharing programs. But more importantly, in a small diocese such as ours it has allowed the pooling of knowledge and wisdom of a core group of people who are interested in education and formation instead of separating our available volunteers into silos with unique (and sometimes competing) interests and concerns. The vision was articulated best by our Bishop: “A part of the life of the diocese, the Stevenson School for Ministry is a diocesan-run school that can provide quality programming for all ages and stages in faith formation as well as solid vocational training. Such an all-encompassing approach is necessary for walking with God as faithful disciples in the 21st century. It is the vehicle by which we are equipping ourselves to participate in God’s mission.”

As we work to prepare ourselves, we also seek partners. The Diocese of Bethlehem, the Diocese of Pittsburgh, the Lower Susquehanna Synod of the ELCA, and the Lancaster Theological Seminary have all contributed to this vision and are recruiting students for the Stevenson School.

Deacon Formation: Focusing on Competencies

One of the most sweeping changes that the Stevenson School has implemented is a change in the way that we prepare Deacons. As we strive to prepare sixth- or seventh-wave deacons in Epting’s formulation, we chose to change our model from one that was based on academic performance to one that is based on competencies. To us, that means that we need to develop in participants the tools necessary to perform adequately the tasks of ministry as we anticipate them to be upon their ordination, but also to create an openness to tasks of ministry that are currently unimagined. We hold competencies then to be not only for current work and learning but that they should create a foundation for future growth and learning in ministry. Our work was founded upon insights gleaned from the Iona Report: The Diaconate in the Anglican Church of Canada and Competencies for Deacons 2017 by the Association of Episcopal Deacons.
The competency areas that we chose to include are:

- Diakonia and the Diaconate
- Human Awareness and Understanding
- Spirituality and Spiritual Practice
- Practical Training and Experience
- Church Polity and Diaconal Ministry in the Public Square
- Sacred Scripture
- Christian History and Tradition

Each of the competency areas were then detailed by adding specific competencies, objectives and related courses offered within the Stevenson School. Within the scope of this article it is not possible to share them all but an example from our first competency area will hopefully be instructive:

Competency: The deacon must show understanding of the biblical concept of diakonia and its relationship to the diaconate.

Objective: The candidate should be able to trace the origin of the diaconate from biblical and early church roots and its development in the Middle Ages, Reformation and the modern period.

Related SSFM Courses: The Deacon’s Path, The Message of Mission, Church History 1, Church History 2.

Competency: The deacon must identify and articulate a personal role and identity in diaconal ministry.

Objective: The candidate should be able to explain how a personal sense of call and practice of ministry relates to the office of deacon.

Related SSFM Courses: The Deacon’s Path, Deacons in Action

As a result of our redesign, our curriculum for the Deacon Track in the SSFM now consists of a minimum of 12 courses. Our Fall and Spring Sessions consist of an in-person orientation weekend for the course, followed by 10 weeks of online work, completed by a weekend reorientation session. Our Summer Sessions are more intensive with a single day in-person session, followed by 5 weeks of online work, completed by a one-day in-person session.

The SSFM courses required for the Deacon’s certificate include:

- The Holy Scriptures (2 courses)
- The History of the Christian Church (1 course)
- Christian Theology (1 course)
- Christian Ethics and Moral Theology (1 course)
- Christian Worship (1 course)
- Practice of Ministry (5 courses)
- Spirituality (1 course)

Other canonical areas of study that are required for ordination are also offered through the School such as the prevention of sexual misconduct, the Church’s teaching on racism, and Title IV in the Constitution and Canons of the Episcopal Church.

SSFM has also considered carefully the audiences that may be open to this sort of discernment and formation. In utilizing competencies as opposed to academic requirements we seek to honor the gifts and experiences each student brings to our programs and to seek to particularly serve the student who currently works a full-time job or who has full-time family commitments.

What, in fact, will be “on the test” when the Deacons that we are preparing today take their place in the ordained ministry of our church? We in the Diocese of Central Pennsylvania are happy to share more of our “informed guessing” with you and we hope that you will, likewise, share your wisdom with us.

For more information on the Stevenson School for Ministry please contact The Very Rev. Robyn J. Szoke-Coolidge, SSFM Dean at rszoke@diocesepca.org.

W. Michael Nailor, retired from teaching at the high school and college levels, was ordained in September. He completed studies at the Stevenson School for Ministry and now serves as secretary of its Board of Directors.

Bibles, BCP & Hymnals available at no charge

BY DEACON KEITH MCCOY

Among the many groups in the Exhibit Area during July’s General Convention was The Bible and Common Prayer Book Society of The Episcopal Church. Over two hundred years old, its mission is to provide bibles, hymnals and the Book of Common Prayer to worshipping communities, free of charge.

In chatting with the hosts at the booth, I found that the BCPBS was willing to provide these key items not just to parishes, but to any group meeting on a regular basis that needs these tools. That would include regular services in jails, mission start-ups, and other off-site gatherings of Episcopalians, confirmed or potential.

The process is simple. The minister responsible for the gatherings needs to send a request to the BCPBS asking for specific books in specific quantities. The request needs to be counter-signed by your bishop. BCPs are available in English and Spanish; plans for Mandarin are in the works.

Of course, if you can pay for your own BCPs and bibles, you should. This is for ministries which are operating on a shoestring and would benefit from having these books. For a deacon involved with a community outside the church walls, this is a valuable resource to enhance that ministry. They also accept financial donations, which are tax deductible.

David Bailey of The Episcopal Church in Navajoland and my Bishop Brian Seage of Mississippi, to go back at the end of May 2018 and live for a year on loan as a deacon in that mission area. Well, that's exactly what I'm doing, having arrived this past June with my little Dachshund, Pax. Just remember: when the Holy Spirit taps you on your back, you need to listen! Having just celebrated my tenth year of ordination, I have begun a new chapter in my life. My cup overflows, and I have much to give back - to these wonderful people out here, to my diocese of Mississippi and, hopefully, to the Band of Choctaws In Mississippi. While I miss my family and friends, I can’t think of a better place to be.

When not away, Catherine serves at St. Columb's Church in Ridgeland, Mississippi. She is also the Diocesan Co-Representative for Episcopal Relief & Development. For more information visit ecofnavajoland.org.

RESPONSE to Chapter XXXVII, from August 2018

What He Said
BY DEACON KEITH MCOY

There's the old story of the frog in the pot on the stove. If you put the frog in the pot when the water is hot, it will jump out. But if you put the amphibian into water that is room temperature and then turn up the heat, it will stay and get boiled, never noticing the gradual increase in warmth until it is too late.

There's a new frog in the pot at Holy Spirit, Melrose, and he recognizes the temperature is way too hot. The rector, the deacon, the secretary and the sexton have worked as a team for years. They have become comfortable with each other, there's a type of "shorthand" they use in discussing parish and people. Perhaps they've become a bit too familiar and cynical – especially the rector, who is snarky, at the least.

Into this walks the new organist-choirmaster. While officially part of the staff, he's not part of the "hive mind", not privy to the back stories, and at first just an observer of the inner workings of this group. He sees things with new eyes – and ears. And he is appalled at the way others are referred to. He has also thought through to the next step: if this is how they refer to people who aren't here, how do they refer to any of us when we step out of the room?

It does not serve God’s people to refer to them in negative terms. We call such bad behavior out when we hear it in the public sector from our leaders, and we should call it out when we hear in private among friends and colleagues. Referring to people in slang terminology by their conditions or lifestyles says that they are lesser beings in your mind, and tells your listeners to feel the same way.

But, how to combat this? One correspondent recommended going to the archdeacon for help, perhaps even asking the Venerable to intercede. Having an outside person come in might work (it may need to be someone higher up, though). Maybe a proposal to have sensitivity training for the parish staff, or at clergy conference, would get the offender into a position where he might recognize his behavior and repent.

Another correspondent suggested meeting the offender one on one, to explain how, as faith leaders, we need to hold ourselves to a higher standard. He should be careful not to cause harm to others through inconsiderate words and actions; that includes himself, should any of his colorful comments get loose in the parish and bounce back at him.

It's a short step from laughing at ourselves to laughing just at others near to us. The line between affection and disappointment is also a thin one. What was sardonic once upon a time could devolve into a constant and waspish belittlement of others, or a sense that "it’s us against the rabble". It becomes about dividing community rather than fostering it.

Jesus reminds us that what gets whispered in private will be shouted from the rooftops. In his case it was his words to his disciples, but we all know how hard it is to keep anything secret, once repeated. We always need to be careful of what we say, because we never know how far those words will travel once we let them loose.

NEW: Chapter XXXVIII
‘Til We Can Say Goodbye
BY DEACON KEITH MCOY

To the outside observer, St. John’s Episcopal Church in West Riverside seemed to function like a well-oiled machine. Even to many in the pews, it was always doing God’s work and a place of peace. It was only to the inner circle that the intermittent skirmishes between the priest and the deacon were a source of discussion and discomfort.

Ed Toowhit was a son of the parish, having done everything from acolyte to warden, and, in his later years, ordained to the diaconate with a ministry to the parish elderly and the shut-ins, to which he was completely committed.

In the other corner, Helen Huffer has been called as rector eleven years ago, and had led St. John's into a wider ministry and visibility in the community, not to mention bringing in new parishioners at a time when other congregations were apt to be struggling with attendance.

One would think that Ed and Helen’s ministries were complementary, and could co-exist easily. But, no, that was not the case. Ed was frequently the voice of those of his generation and others who felt that the parish leadership, and in particular the rector, was always going too far, too soon, and that Jesus was calling St. John’s to faithfulness. Helen and her supporters felt that the deacon and his coterie lived in the past, and that Jesus was calling St. John’s to interact with God’s creation.

Various flashpoints over the years had been over vestments, adding another deacon, planting a memorial garden, the Christmas pageant, the kitchen stove, and a variety of other, relatively minor issues. Matters would flare and subside, only to pop up in a different way weeks or months later.

On this particular Sunday, another set of services had just gone into the books. Church school was over. The coffee hour attendees had mainly dispersed, the Altar Guild had cleaned up, and the rector was headed towards her office. Then she heard the voice of her senior deacon from behind her.

“Hey, Helen, you got a minute?” asked Ed. Huffer’s spidey sense kicked in immediately, as Ed rarely initiated a conversation with her at the end of the Sunday gathering.

“Yes, Ed, what’s on your mind? Let’s step inside and sit down,” suggested the rector.

“Nah, this won’t take long. I’ve talked it over with my wife, and we’ve decided it’s time for me to retire from St. John’s. I thought you’d like to know.”

The rector fought down the impulse to shout “Hallelujah,” and simply responded, “Oh, I think we need to sit and talk about this, Ed. This is a major decision you’re talking about.”

The deacon frowned. “You know Missy and I always go to brunch after church. She’s out in the car waiting for me.”

The rector persisted. “Well, there’s a lot of details that will need to be worked out. For example, when are you thinking of retiring? Will you be staying on in the pews? The parish will want to have a celebration of your ministry. Things like that.”

Ed finished shrugging on his overcoat. “I’m leaving at the end of the month. Missy and I are going to sell the house to our grandson Eric and move to Quaker Gardens.”

“That’s in two weeks,” responded Helen, with as much equanimity as she could muster. “I don’t think we can pull together a dinner that quickly, and get your friends and fellow deacons here, too. Besides, are you really moving at the end of the month?”

But the deacon was already edging towards the exit. “The missus and I are going over to the assisted living place tomorrow to sign a contract. Then we have to start packing, because Eric wants to move in and fix the place up before he gets married next May,” Ed paused. “He’s getting married here. Can I still be the deacon for his wedding if I’m retired?”

Flummoxed by the second bombshell announcement in as many minutes, Huffer came back at him. “Ed, we really do need to discuss this. Have you told the bishop yet?”

“What do I need to tell him for? The diocese doesn’t pay me anything.”

“You’re in holy orders,” pointed out the rector. “You follow the direction of the canons, through your bishop and your rector. You swore to that when you were ordained.” The deacon pouted, but kept heading towards the parking lot.

“Let’s meet on Tuesday, when you get back from the hospital visits,” suggested Huffer.

“I’ll try,” replied Toowhit, “But I can’t skip the Kiwanis luncheon. I don’t want to break my attendance record.” And at that he was out the door.

The rector of St. John’s took a deep breath, and went into her office. She needed to compose herself before composing an email to the bishop and one to the wardens. “This will be like passing a kidney stone,” she thought. “Painful, but a relief in the end.”

What would you do? Please send responses with your take on this to kmccoy1@optonline.net. Comments received within a month will be taken into consideration when writing the response.
