If the Durants have any regrets upon finishing this great story, it is that their "fascination with each canto of man's epic" has held them too willingly, and at last they find themselves exhausted at the French Revolution. With the full realization that history does not end there, they have finally retired, leaving the unfinished story for those who will undoubtedly follow in their efforts to chart the course of man's mind.

"Rousseau and Revolution," which is in the most part devoted to the short span of 33 years begins appropriately with a prelude. Here the Durants trace the wanderings of a young Rousseau. In following the personage of Rousseau from 1712 to 1756, they find more than his simple confessions. What the Durants have found was "Europe...ready for a gospel that would exhault feeling above thought. It was tired of the restraints of customs, conventions, manners and laws. It had heard enough of reason, argument, and philosophy; all this riot of unmoored minds seemed to have left the world devoid of meaning, the soul empty of imagination and hope; secretly men and women were longing to believe again."

Thus the Durants find that while Voltaire was "being idolized on the stage of the academy (1778)" and Rousseau was being "berated and despised, hid in the obscurity of a Paris room" the age of Rousseau had in fact begun.

From these beginnings, the tale continues to center around Rousseau, the "passionate rebel-philosopher" and protagonist of a Romantic ideal of inner-directedness. The architect of social revolt, Rousseau was forced to contend with "the great rationalist" Voltaire for the mind of Europe. This same man, who saw fit to "condemn civilization as a disease, glorify the noble savage, and proclaim to the world with equal intensity his own love affairs and the natural Rights of Man," became the patron saint of not only the French Revolution but world-wide upheavals for the next two centuries.

Around the focal point of the Rousseau story, the Durants have written an unequalled work covering the European continent from war-torn Spain to the Italy "of Vivaldi and Tiepolo," of Casanova and Cagliostro" to Catherine the Great's Russia and Poland, "destroyed as a political entity, reborn as a romantic dream of nationalism."

It seems almost impossible to even summarize such a volume that has reached "burdensome length" of necessity.

With the conclusion of their "Story of Civilization" which has been the Durant's "daily chore and solace" for some forty odds years, they humbly apologize not to "sin again at such length." It is indeed certain that few men can see the product of their ten superlative volumes, as can the Durants. For them it is a singular honor, and one that well rewards their labors.

Last work of author's in volume

"Come Along With Me," the novel Shirley Jackson was writing at the time of her death in August 1965, has been published by Viking Press in a volume that also includes 16 of her short stories and three lectures. It is edited by Stanley Edgar Hyman, who was her husband. Only six chapters of the novel were completed -- three in final form and three in first draft -- before she died.

Miss Jackson read the first chapter of "Come Along With Me" when she visited the Syracuse campus in April 1965 as a participant in the Festival of the Arts.

Also included in the volume is a short story, "Janice," which she wrote while she was a student at Syracuse. In a preface to the book Hyman writes: "'Janice' must be one of the shortest short stories on record. Shirley Jackson wrote it as a sophomore at Syracuse University, and it was printed in 'Threshold,' the magazine published by her class in creative writing. My admiration for it led to our meeting. I suppose that I reprint it to some degree out of sentiment, although in its economy and power it is surely prophetic of her later mastery."

Hyman and Miss Jackson were married in 1940, the year they both graduated from Syracuse. He joined the staff of The New Yorker and she began writing professionally. In 1948 Miss Jackson's best known short story, "The Lottery," was published in The New Yorker. The story and a lecture, "Biography of a Story," based on reacion to the publication of 'The Lottery,' are also included in the Viking book.

'69 Camaro SS Sport Coupe, plus RS equipment

Ask the kid who owns one.

Some people have a hard time communicating with youth.

Not us.

We just bring on the 1969 Camaro, then tell it like it is.

It is: Restyled inside and out with a new grille, new bumpers, new parking lights, new instrument panel, new steering wheel, new striping, and new colors including Hugger Orange, which is wild.

It is: Full of new features including bigger outlets for the Astro Ventilation, a 210-hp standard V8, and a lock for the steering column, ignition and transmission lever.

It is: Available with a little device that automatically washes your headlights when you hold the windshield washer button in.

It is: Still wider and weightier than the rival sportster we're too polite to name.

You should drive a 1969 Camaro at your Chevrolet dealer's the first chance you get.

Even if you're 42.

Plan mourning demonstration

SDS seeks to destroy present systems

By MARK MASTERSON

Proponents of the "new left," Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), presented their views on American society before a group of about 25 students last night at DellPlain Hall lounge, in an attempt to measure the response of the student body to the SDS cause.

Bob Tompisky, who headed the duscussion on behalf of SDS, said the group so far has not been able to bring effective action against the University, which he said is part of the "whole oppressive system." The reason for this, he explained, is that the "new left" has not gained enough support at Syracuse University. "I hope we will be able to deal more effectively with the administration this year than last year. If we are successful in convincing enough people we will demonstrate," he said.

Tomposky stated that SDS would consider taking over the Administration Building again this year. Last year about 50 SDS followers occupied the building as a protest against Dow Chemical Company recruitment on campus. Tomposky said DSD petitioned Chancellor William P. Tolley for a hearing to present its views on the issue, but no one would listen until after the demonstration. "They don't give a damn about free speech," he added. When the Chancellor finally decided to listen, he continued , "he gave us a lot of ridiculous rhetoric and told us to come back any time for discussion."

The SDS leader said the University should not crack down on drug use on campus because it is harmless. SU should actively oppose the laws against marijuana and permit students to use drugs in their rooms, he continued. In not opposing drug use, SU is cooperating with the whole repressive system, he said.

Tomposkey admitted SDS seeks to disrupt and destroy the present social, political and economic order in America.

Today at 11 a.m. in front of Hendricks Chapel SDS will hold a "peaceful demonstration in mourning for the people who have been destroyed by napalm." Specifically, the demonstration is directed against the presence of Dow Chemical Company's recruitment program on campus.

the then class president decided, coinciding with the class's desires, that the money should be used to show that students are interested in serving others. So, the LTE scholarship fund was established, aimed at providing aid for students from "socially troubled areas and minority groups." The funds are raised from the student body by selling freshman beanies and the voluntary sacrifice of one meal.

Galindez, 18, graduated ninth in a class of approximately 165, from Rice, an all boys high school in Manhattan. He ran track for two and one-half years, but was forced to abandon the sport when he took a job in a supermarket. The youngest of three children, he has two older sisters. He resides in Manhattan with his mother, who is a seamstress. His father is deceased.

If it is possible, Galindez would like the annual "Aspira" convention to be held in Syracuse. He could show them a university that does care.

Chancellor

Two positions are still available on the Student Committee to Select a Chancellor. Applications should include answers to the following questions: What role do you see the committee playing in the selection process, and what characteristics do you envision in the new chancellor?

Applications should be returned to Cindy Bailey, 1003 Walnut Ave. For further information. call ext. 2634.

we mean it

when we say there's a real opportunity for you here

Before you decide what you are going to do with the new life your degree can open up for you, think about all the possible opportunities.

Don't just answer the usual questions about big company versus small company, service company versus product company, industry versus academe, or public versus private business.

Think about where you can do most of what you like best, where you can make the most meaningful change.

We think you can do it here if what you are interested in is making specific, measurable improvements in the world. We build electronic systems to communicate, gather and process data, defend the country, and study inner and outer space.

We expect that our systems approach will also help us solve some of the big problems in our day-to-day concerns like medicine, education, and city planning.

We need men and women with degrees in business administration, engineering, and liberal arts to help us realize the full potential of these systems.

We need individuals who know that formal education can never stop for system builders, who will take advantage of our many education opportunities, including prepaid tuition, in-plant graduate degree programs, and fellowships. Achievements in this atmosphere can be extremely satisfying, academically as well as personally and professionally.

successful militancy of the civil rights movement and the success of the long campaign to end the importation of Mexican contract workers–"the direct spark" to the California struggle.

Then, when workers in the grape industry, "a highly skilled, 12-month-a year operation," began the drive to increase wages from $1.20 an hour to $1.40 an hour, and the growers were not responding, "huelga," (strike) "became the worker's rallying cry," said the committee's 1967 report.

Cesar Chavez, leader of the National Farm Workers Association, became the leader in the strike that hit the largest ranches, those that employed thousands. Workers have consequently suffered a continuous financial crisis, but a number of concessions, such as union organization and some recognition, wage hikes and benefits have been made thus far.

One chance

FPP candidate Lane to speak here Monday

By JEAN HAVENS
Associate Editor

Mark Lane, U.S. vice-presidential candidate of the New York State Freedom and Peace Party and author of the controversial book "Rush to Judgement," will speak Monday at 4 p.m. in Maxwell Auditorium.

The candidacies of Lane and his presidential running-mate Dick Gregory have been fully endorsed by the Onondaga County Liberal Party and the party's candidate for Congress, Dale Tussing.

In a recent Los Angeles Free Press article, Lane stated: "I am a candidate. No one under thirty five is eligible to run for national office and so Greg and I stand in loco parentis. I would prefer to support some bearded youth and some pretty young thing for the ticket but the law will not allow it. So we are your candidates if you will have us."

"In some states," he continued, "another opposition candidate may appear on the ballot. Eldridge Cleaver may win his fight in the court (he is under 35) and be permitted a place on the ballot. He is a talented and incisive writer and I should not at all be displeased if you voted for him instead. For me, I am going to write in the name Dick Gregory."

In 1963, Lane, then a New York lawyer, was asked by the mother of Lee Harvey Oswald to represent her son's interests in the proceedings of the assassination-investigating Warren Commission. Turned down by the commission, he went ahead, researching independently, with the book "Rush to Judgment" as the result.

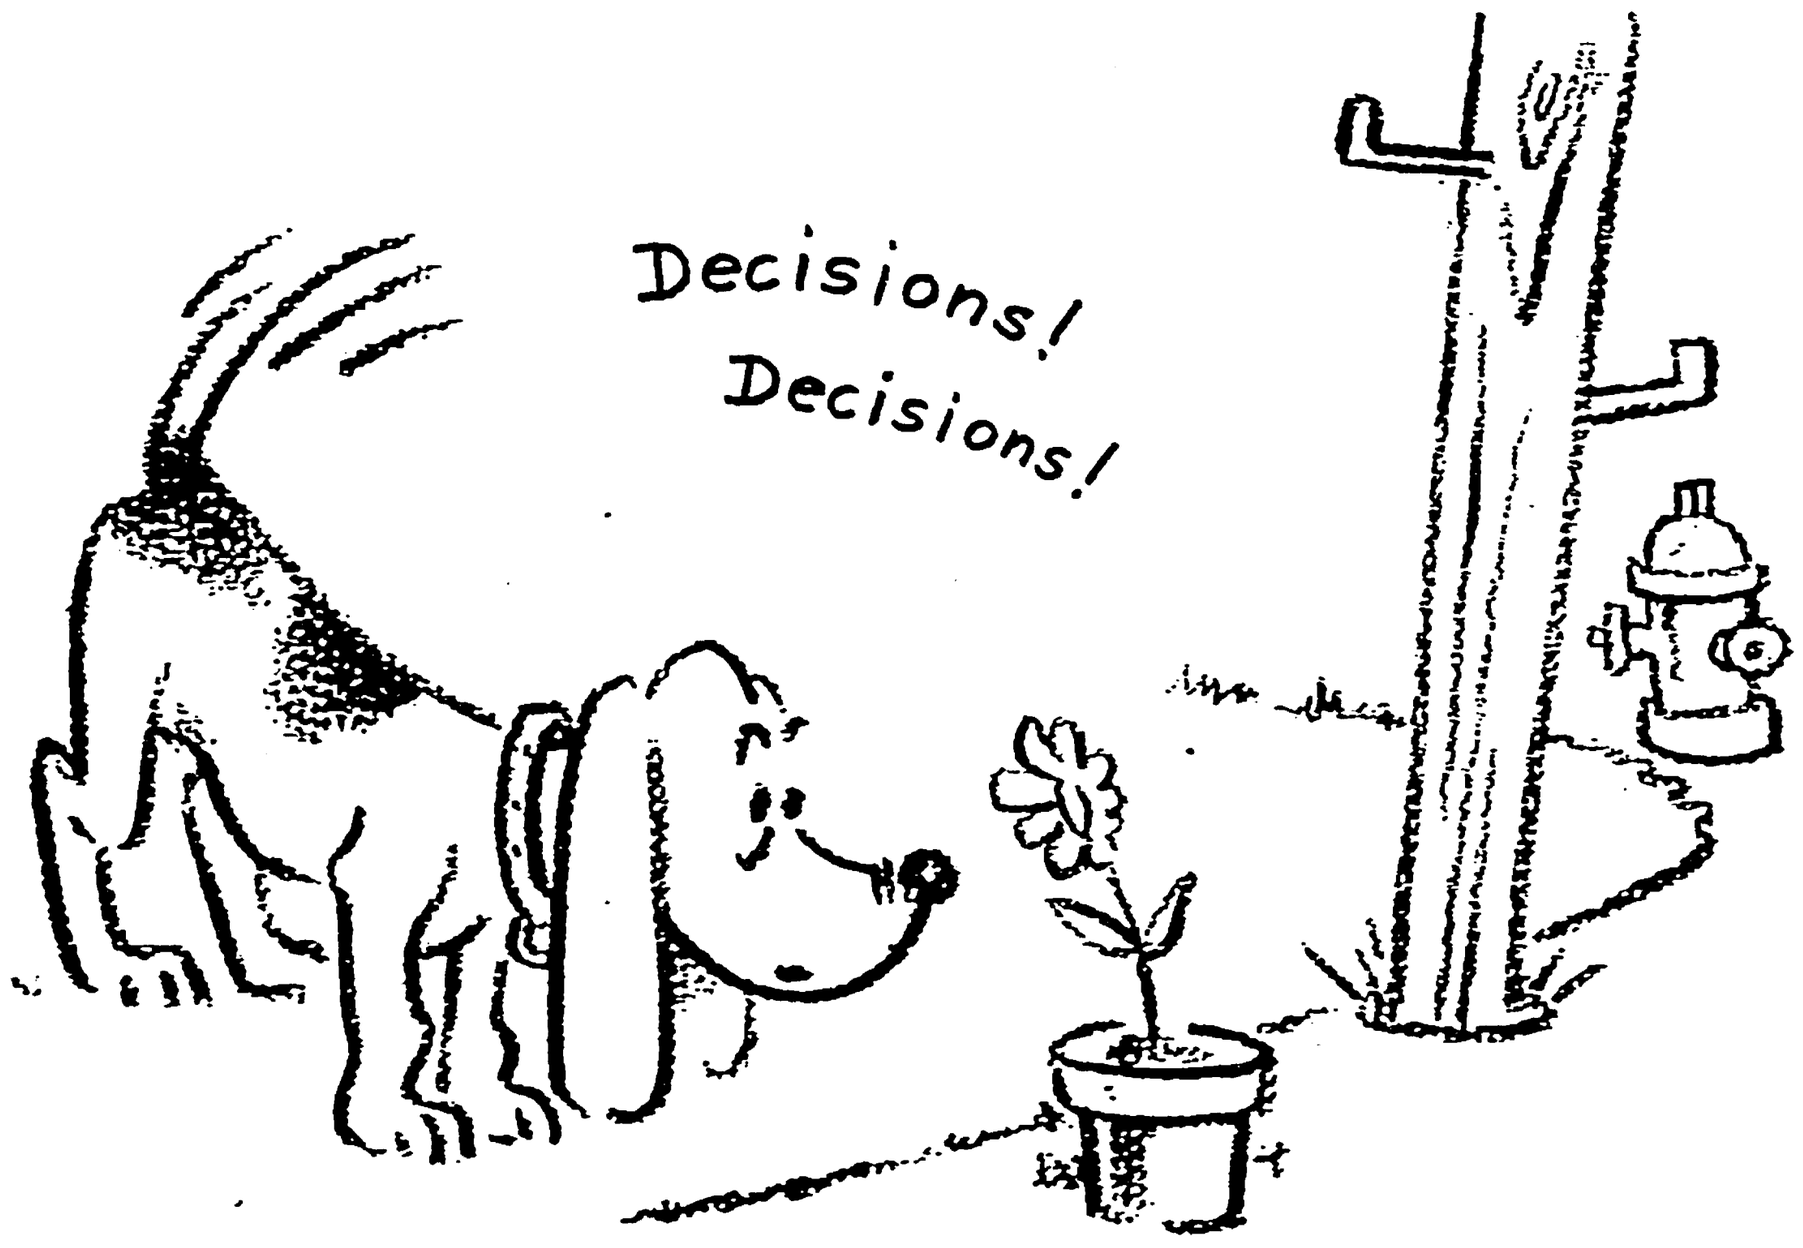
Newsweek magazine called the book "an impressive document" with "spare, dispassionate prose," and a "one-sided but exhaustive case for the defense." Lane has since written another book, "The War Prayer."

Recalling President Kennedy's assassination, Lane stated in his Free Press article: "Representative democracy ended in America on a November day in Dallas. An effort to restore it died in Chicago almost five years later when fascism, in its most obvious form, came to America.

"We had to wait almost five years for the storm troopers to take to the streets simply because they were not required earlier. Had McCarthy been nominated the American people would have had it within their power to dismantle the war machine.

"Not for nothing was John Kennedy killed, and not without a fight, no matter how much it revealed about the nature of the beast, could a path back to sanity be permitted to the American people."

"What can you do?" Lane continues, "You have perhaps one chance. Perhaps not even that. In the hope that you have, speak up now....If there is any salvation for this nation it is through the direct involvement of those who have been excluded from the controlled parties."



WAER's Debate Forum encourages controversy

In college, most whining for constructive rather than destructive criticism is a demand for unqualified praise, and insistence that no opinion is to be expressed or course proposed other than the one supported by the speaker.

It is a dreary approach to the issues of our times, and "one not taken on WAER's new Syracuse Debate Forum," heard Monday night at 6 p.m., according to host Paul F. Stavis. "I try to facilitate an atmosphere of rational conflict in my forensic style."

Shows cover the gamut of interests, from issues of police brutality to the recent dispute over the relocation of Parson's Cottage. One show explored the rationalization of "Humanae Vitae" with Rev. Charles Borgognoni defending the Pope's position on birth control.

Appearing Monday night will be Profs. Hodgson, Maxwell School, who specializes in study of the Soviet Union; Jensen, chairman of the Russian Studies Dept., and Popovic, of the Economics whose recent book, "Yugoslovia: The New Class in Crisis" created a well-known controversy. These men, along with Stavis, will discuss "Resolved: That the recent invasion of Czechoslovakia emphasizes the fact that detente between the U.S. and U.S.S.R. is impossible."

Some decisions are relatively unimportant. Where you put your engineering talent to work is not.

As you contemplate one of the most important decisions of your life, we invite you to consider a career at Pratt & Whitney Aircraft. Here, you will find wide-open opportunities for professional growth with a company that enjoys an enviable record of stability in the dynamic atmosphere of aerospace technology.

We select our engineers and scientists carefully. Motivate them well. Give them the equipment and facilities only a leader can provide. Offer them company-paid, graduate-education opportunities. Encourage them to push into fields that have not been explored before. Keep them reaching for a little bit more responsibility than they can manage. Reward them well when they do manage it.

And your decision is made easier, thanks to the wide range of talents required. Your degree can be a B.S., M.S., or Ph.D. in: MECHANICAL • AERONAUTICAL • ELECTRICAL • CHEMICAL • CIVIL • MARINE • INDUSTRIAL ENGINEERING • PHYSICS • CHEMISTRY • METALLURGY • MATERIALS SCIENCE • CERAMICS • MATHEMATICS • STATISTICS • COMPUTER SCIENCE • ENGINEERING SCIENCE • ENGINEERING MECHANICS.

Stage too small

National Ballet performance here proves to be a big disappointment

By MARC BALKIN

The National Ballet of Washington, D.C., appeared in Syracuse last Monday night, and despite some good displays of dancing, it was for the most part a disappointing evening.

The program was devoted entirely to a production of Coppelia, a ballet by Leo Delibes. the story concerns a dollmaker, Dr. Coppelius, and a young man, Franz, who is in love with one of the doctor's dolls. Of course, Franz has a girlfriend, Swanilda, who doesn't like the idea that Franz is digging this doll. The ballet describes how Swanilda, through some clever trickery (such as making Franz think that she is the doll), finally gets Franz back.

Andrea Vodehnal was cast as Swanilda, and although she seemed fairly stiff in the first act, she became more relaxed later on and put her talents to good use. In the part of Franz was Eugene Collins. He did not have much of a dancing part - he walked more than danced - but he shows promise of becoming a fine performer if he can rid himself of some of the sloppiness in his technique. Frederic Franklin played Dr. Coppelius, and although he danced rather well, I must say that the part should be performed by someone who looks older, or who actually is older. One excellent part was the dancing of the dolls in Act II. It seemed at times that these dancers outperformed the principals, and they also demonstrated the promise that this young company has. In the other scenes where the corps performed, the dancing was not especially good and was generally not coordinated. Most of the problems were caused, I think, from the fact that Lincoln Auditorium's state was too small for the dancers - they had little room to move. The lighting could have been better, too.

As a whole, the program was rewarding in some facets, but there were things which were annoying enough to make me wonder when a really top notch ballet company will come to Syracuse.

The performance was sponsored by Civic Morning Musicals. Their next offering will be Wednesday, when the Roger Wagner Chorale will appear in Lincoln Auditorium at 8:30 p.m.

Music dominates cultural events

Although the football team will be idle this weekend, there are still enough cultural events in Syracuse to provide a fairly wide choice of entertainment.

Friday night, the Syracuse Symphony will be giving the second concert in its series. Regine Crespin will be featured with Maestro Karl Kritz in a diversified program. Included on the concert are works by Goldmark, Berlioz, Ponchielli, and Wagner. The featured work is the Symphony No. 3 by Saint-Saens, the "Organ" Symphony. This magnificent work should delight you with its grand sonorities, since it is scored for extra-large orchestra, organ, and two pianos.

The Regent Theatre will continue its run of "The Merry Wives of Windsor," tonight and tomorrow. Curtain time at the Experimental Theatre is 8 p.m., and if you are undecided as to whether to go tonight or tomorrow, I suggest that you go tomorrow. The last show is usually the best, but make sure to get tickets in advance, as people were turned away last Saturday. In the main theatre, there will be an evening of dance given by the David Shields Ballet company. The one performance is on Saturday, beginning at 8 p.m.

Also on Saturday night, the Syracuse Friends of Chamber Music are featuring the renowned violin and piano team, Szymon Goldberg and Victor Babin. Babin is known for his appearances in the duo-piano team of Vronsky and Babin. Scheduled to take place in Crouse College Auditorium at 8:30 p.m., the artists will play a concert of sonatas. I highly recommend this concert for those of you who like fine chamber music.

Sunday will feature another concert and the opening of a first-run movie on campus. First, at 4 p.m. in Crouse College, pianist Frederick Marvin will present a recital. Admission is free in this Crouse Concert offering. Then, at 7 p.m. in the Regent Main Theatre, the premiere of "The Battle of Algiers" will take place. This story of the revolt of Algiers during the Second World War will be shown again at 9:30, and will run until October 26.

On Tuesday night, a rather unusual concert will be presented in Crouse Auditorium as a program of North Indian Music will be performed by Debabrata Chaudhury. The concert features the Indian sitar, accompanied by tabla and tambura. The program begins at 8:30 p.m.

Finally, the Roger Wagner Chorale will be in Syracuse on Wednesday evening, October 23. They will be at Lincoln Auditorium, and will present a program of choral music ranging from classic to pop. Once again, the concert starts at 8:30 p.m.

Alpha Delta Pi sponsors rush tea

An informal rush tea was held yesterday in the Alumni Lounge of the Women's Building for prospective members of SU's Alpha Tau chapter of Alpha Delta Pi sorority.

The chapter is currently going through recolonization. As of now, the chapter has only 15 active members, who will be given alumnae status after the new members are chosen.

Stressing "the unity of the sorority system and the deep feeling that each sorority has for the other," voluntary representatives from every house on campus were present at yesterday's tea.

Laura Morrison, Panhellenic representative of her own sorority, explained her reasons for attending. "I am not just a sister of my own sorority, but I feel that I am a sister of all the sororities here on campus. When one sorority , such as ADPi, is having difficulties, each sorority, through a deep feeling of friendship, is more than willing to help."

The girls who attended yesterday's tea will be given a short interview by one of Alpha Delta Pi's national field secretaries.

These interviews will not be interrogations, according to traveling field secretary Marty Weller. "These will just be friendly talks between us, in attempts to find girls who will discover the true meaning of sisterhood and sisterly love."

Recolonization is hoped to be settled before next weekend, in time for fall freshman open houses.

Donate blood next week

The white sheets you may be seeing around campus next week are not remnants of the KKK, but reminders for the Blood Drive. Hopefully, the sheets will have red crosses on them.

The drive will be in Shaw basement on Wednesday, Oct. 23, from 11 a.m. to 4:45 p.m. and Thursday, Oct. 24, from 10 a.m. to 3:45 p.m.

The donating process takes about an hour and donors must be at least 18 years of age and weigh 110 pounds.

This is the twentieth year the Red Cross has come on campus. Students, faculty and staff last year gave a little over 700 pints in the fall and spring drives. The Syracuse regional goal this year is 28,000 — 30,000 pints.

Making copies is only part of the story.

You can get the other part straight from the source. Talk to our representative and ask him about R&D looking ahead to major advances in education...in areas like color xerography and 3-D imaging...about refinements in combined xerography and EDP systems to process and graphically reproduce any theory or fact available...at any distance.

Ask anything imaginable and you'll discover you're probing a company that's involved with every phase of the information and education explosion.

We place great emphasis on individual initiative. Additional schooling aimed at advanced degrees. Brainstorming. A variety of short-term project groups. And benefits. In short, your career, not simply a job for you to fill.

So while you're looking us over for career opportunities, we'll be looking you over for career potential. Fair enough?

Why not make an appointment with your Placement Director. A half hour of your time could be the start of a great future in research, engineering, manufacturing, programming, accounting, finance, statistics or marketing/sales.

Orange cagers face rebuilding season

By DOUG GARR

Last year at this time the outlook was bright for basketball coach Fred Lewis. The Orange cagers, however, finished a disappointing 11-14. Now Roy Danforth takes the helm and the outlook is anything but bright, on paper anyway.

The SU basketball team will be hurt with the loss of lettermen Vaughn Haper, George Hicker and Richie Cornwall. Losses through graduation cannot be helped, but the Orangemen are also minus the services of Ernie Austin, Bob McDaniel and Wayne Ward. These experienced players will be ineligible for the opening tip-off because of academic difficulties.

Last year's frosh sensation, McDaniel, is out for a year, and Ernie Austin is going to miss the first semester. As far as when Wayne Ward will return, "Your guess is as good as mine," said Danforth.

Danforth refused to make any predictions as it is still to early in the season. "We've only had two practices so far," he said, "but everybody has shown lots of hustle and the attitude is tremendous." So far the squad has only worked on ball handling and condiditoning but Danforth said that the boys were already in pretty good shape, as many have been playing on their own.

At center, the Orange will probably go with letterman Dave Aldrich or sophomore Bill Smith. Bob Kouwe will be switched to forward with Bill Case. Danforth had planned to use junior college transfer Gerry McFadden at forward, but may use him as a guard. Senior Frank Hamblen is another player that Danforth will switch between the forward and back court positions. The depth is fair all around except that "We need cornermen," according to Danforth.

Coach Danforth anticipates strategy changes, among them using speed a little more. "We're going to run as much as we can this year and press a lot more," the coach said. "We also will have to work on penetrating a little more and concentrate on getting the ball inside."

This year's 25 game schedule includes the Far West Classic Tournament and a doubleheader with Kansas and Kansas State. The first half of the season should be the toughest, as 10 of the first 11 games are on the road. The one home game is against Penn State on December 18.

Danforth summed up the season when asked which would be the toughest game. "They're all going to be tough," he answered.

On the SU schedule this year, 7 teams have new coaches and three others have coaches that have been with their school only one year. "All the films we have of these teams won't do us any good now because it is certain that they will have lots of changes."

Although Danforth is optimistic in improving on last year's record, he said, "It would be foolish to say we would win twenty games." But if the squad exhibits the spirit in some of our ball games that they showed in this week's evening practices, they could surprise a lot of fans.

Voice from the bleachers

'Paper Lion' is an impossible dream

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

Sport has always been a popular subject for writers and filmmakers. The conflict is ready-made; the excitement is innate. Since most of the work itself has bordered on trash, however, sports literature has not been well received in highbrow circles.

George Plimpton, editor of the lietrary magazine Paris Review, has gone a long way toward changing the image within the last decade. Through series of articles in Sports Illustrated and three subsequent books that came out of them, he has made a name for himself in the literature of sport, and brought well-deserved recognition to others in the field.

Plimpton is the epitome of the bleacher fan, the idol of all the Walter Mittys of the 75 cent seats who close their eyes and visualize themselves running the whole show. For Plimpton, however, the impossible dream came true.

Plimpton's method is to match himself, the tired Park Avenue executive, against the best in professional sport. He started out easy, playing bridge against Harold Banderbilt, who invented the contract game. Moving up in difficulty, he pitched an inning against a team of major league all-stars in Yankee Stadium. That experience was turned into Out of My League, which became a minor best seller.

Not satisfied with giving up one of the longest homers in Stadium history, the frail Plimpton pushed on into the boxing ring, and went three rounds with Archie Moore. Most recently, he played golf with Arnold Palmer.

The crowning achievement of his career, though, was his stint as a rookie quarterback with the Detroit Lions. The book he wrote about his experiences, Paper Lion, was on the best seller list for almost a year. The movie version opened Wednesday night at the Loew's Theater on Salina Street, and in one of the most enjoyable and informative sports flicks ever made.

The film follows Plimpton briefly through his earlier exploits, but concentrates on the Lion's preseason training camp. There is plenty of wide-screen color film shot by Steve Sabol, the official National Football League photographer, showing exactly how the pros get into shape. He also takes his camera through the first preseason game, which is the climax of the movie.

Director Alex March also goes behind the scenes, into the locker rooms, dormitory and bars, to get the character of today's professional. The results may be surprising to some. The Lions appear as cold- blooded businessmen at one moment, fraternity house clowns in the next. They are under enormous pressure, and yet find themselves as men earning their livelihood by playing a boy's game. The training camp, with its workouts, fines and spartan atmosphere, comes off as coach Joe Schmitt's answer to Staiag 17.

George Plimpton is such a public figure by now that Alan Alda, the Broadway actor who plays him in the film, must face inevitable comparison. The reaction here is that Alda is a little too stiff and unrefined for the role. After playing baseball, football and golf, it is anybody's guess why Plimpton could not play Plimpton.

Stealing the show, however, are the members of the Lion team and staff, who play themselves. Defensive tackle Alex Karras, a cherubic man who smokes cigars, and John Gordy, an offensive guard who removes his teeth before a game, both All-Pros, are standouts.

Frank Gifford appears in the film briefly, as himself. Some sports flicks fans may remember the 1954 "epic" All-American, starring Tony Curtis. Gifford was in that one, too. Frank's acting hasn't improved in 15 years, but the quality of the films he is in has improved immeasurably.

DO Chickens set for Wolves; Orange campus in a frenzy

The waiting is almost over. Tomorrow at 1 p.m. on the Women's Building field, the Daily Orange Chickens will meet the WAER Wolves in one of college football's oldest and bitterest rivalries.

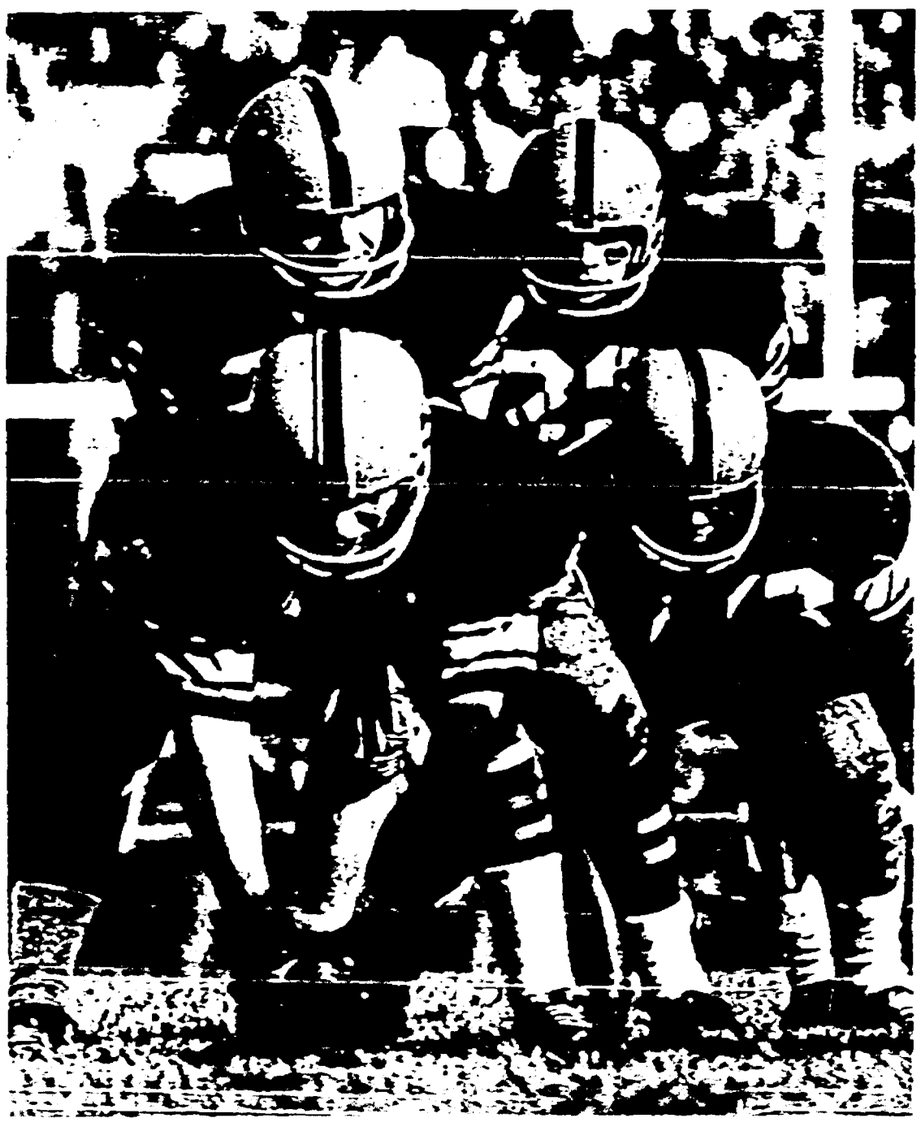
The contest will be the only gridiron action in Tolley Town this weekend, and an overflow crowd is assured. Originally, the Syracuse-Penn State game was scheduled for this date also, but the athletic departments of both schools felt that attendance at the Orange-Lion affair would suffer because of the competition. Consequently, Syracuse will battle State on Dec. 7.

Mike Greenstein, crafty player-coach of the Chickens, will put his squad through a light workout this afternoon in final preparation for the annual spectacle.

"I'll tell you one thing," said Greenstein, "this squad has a tremendous amount of spirit and morale. I've never had a group that was hungry to play football."

Chicken end Doug Garr seems to be echoing his coach's thoughts when he says, "I hope there is a lot of available space in the infirmary, because the Wolves will need it when we get through with them."

Garr also had liberal praise for his teammates. "Ham Biggar is really quite a guy," said Doug. "He runs the team real well, and his passing really helps us move. And Ira Silverman is no slouch, either. He came to school in real good shape (5 ft. 7 in., 200) and adds good depth to the squad."



Biggar and Garr are the two main cogs in the Chickens' pro style passing attack. Other leading recievers include Ed Agranowitz, Gil Gillespie, Evan Richert and Greenstein.

Mammoth center Mike Weber spearheads the DO line that blends speed with quickness. Weber will be aided by Larry Center, Bob Gallagher and Abe Wagner.

With the expressed written consent of both squads, all proceeds from the game will be donated to the University Union Building Fund. General admission is $2.50, and students $1.00. The first 5,000 fans will be admitted free of charge.

The halftime entertainment will be provided by the DO band, known world wide as the "Marching Chickens."

The players of both squads will also be vying for the coveted Chadwick Cup, which annually goes to the game's top player.

WILLIAM J. VANDEN HEUVEL

Kennedy aide to speak about Democratic party

William J. Vanden Heuvel, New York attorney and aide to the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, will speak at Syracuse University at 8 p.m. tonight in Hendricks Chapel.

His topic will be "The Democratic Party and the Issues of 1968." His visit is sponsored by the Public Affairs and Citizenship Program of the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs.

Vanden Heuvel is a partner in the law firm of Stroock & Stroock & Lavan. He left his practice temporarily in 1963 to become a special assistant to the Attorney General, Robert F. Kennedy. He later worked as an aide to Kennedy in the Senator's campaign for the presidential nomination.

He served as a member of the Temporary State Commission to prepare for the Constitutional Convention in New York and was chairman of the Platform Committee for the 1966 Democratic Convention. He was a delegate-at-large to the Constitutional Convention.

Vanden Heuvel is a graduate of Cornell University and the Cornell Law School. He was a special assistant to William J. Donovan, U.S. Ambassador to Thailand, in 1953. In 1958 he was Special Counsel to the Governor of New York, Averell Harriman. He was the Democratic nominee for Congress in 1960 in the 17th District.

Since 1960 he has been president of the International Rescue Committee, a voluntary non-sectarian American agency concerned with relief, rehabilitation and resettlement of refugees.

Vanden Heuvel came to Syracuse once previously, in March 1967. In a speech to students and faculty members, he attacked the Johnson Administration's foreign policy, warning of further escalation of the war in Vietnam.

At that time, he predicted President Johnson and Vice President Humphrey would be re-elected in 1968, that the Republican party offered no alternative, and that Johnson therefore had to be convinced that he was pursuing the "wrong foreign policy."

Vanden Heuvel's lecture tonight is open to the public without charge.

Pinebrook planners create fresh vistas

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Campus News Editor

Pinebrook '68 participants feel they fulfilled the purpose of the past weekend's conference by, as one professor said, "coming up with more ideas than I've heard in any of two dozen faculty meetings."

However, the conference's success can only be measured on campus, according to Chuck Hicks, president of Student Government. "Pinebrook is just a setting we use to get ourselves started. Nothing has been done yet but now we will see if it will be successful," continued the president.

Previously, topics discussed at Pinebrook have mainly dealt with the social aspects of Syracuse University, while this year's conference was concerned only with academics.

Jeff Portnoy, vice president of Student Government gave the welcoming address at the conference on Friday night. He said, "The education we receive must be worth the tuition we pay. The administrators have lead us to greatness now they must meet the demands of a changing world and encourage redevelopment."

After a speech by Hicks, the conference broke up into discussions groups, where questions were raised and ideas formed.

Dr. Frank P. Piskor, vice president for academic affairs and dean of faculties, gave the keynote address. He spoke of the vacuum left by the churches and the commitment to social relevance that a university has.

"The analysis of an idea does not come about through an emotional outburst but by recognizing you can communicate personal emotions through the English language," continued Piskor.

Later that evening, Donald P. Ely, director of the SU Center for Instructional Communications, gave a slide presentation showing innovations in teaching through the use of audio-visual aids.

The next formal address was given Saturday morning by Dr. Thomas F. Green, professor of education and director of the Educational Policy Research Center. He presented what he feels are the five laws of academics and compared them to corporations in the United States.

"A university can't operate without students," stated Green. "They provide the humus which permits the institution to operate with an intricate set of external things."

A general discussion was conducted that afternoon after reports by group leaders on the progress of individual committees. During the session, several of the same ideas were presented by different committees.

Later, the same groups were set up to forumlate plans under

Black Awareness show set for this weekend

Three local organizations will sponsor a "Black Awareness Panorama" Friday, Saturday and Sunday, beginning at 7:30 p.m. each day "to bring together the black youth of the community and African students so they may acquaint themselves with their rich cultural background."

Pan-African Students, Society of Afro-American Students and Urban League Youth Community, the sponsoring organizations, are attempting to initate the "working of Africans, Afro-Americans and the black community together."

Benjamin H. Wright, who has served with the U.S. Department of State in Liberia as a political and economic reporting officer, will be the keynote speaker at the Panorama, to be held in Kittredge Auditorium.

According to organizers of the program, Wright has been active in a number of human rights endeavors, including having a large role in organizing the conference on Black Power in Newark in July 1967.

His keynote address is entitled, "Who are we as Black Americans?"

"We seek to bring about a greater understanding and pride in black citizens about Africa, and in so doing destroy the myths and replace them with a sense of pride and dignity in black accomplishments," said program officials.

Each evening of the Panorama will be divided into two sections, one from 7:30 to 8:30 p.m. and the second from 9:00 to 10:30.

Gripes of wrath enumerated here by leader of striking grape pickers

By BOB STRUGATZ

Few labor rebellions in the history of the United States have reached the monumental proportions which the California grape strike is approaching.

The strike was initiated in 1965, making it almost four years old. Cesar Chavez, leader of the National Farm Workers Association in Delano, is its leading figure. In February 1968, Chavez went on a 25-day hunger strike protesting abuse of farm workers.

At the Chapel House yesterday, this disturbing situation was brought to Syracuse by Uenuciano Olijuin, a member of the United Farm Workers Urbanizing Committee. This committee grew out of the 1965 strike and most of its members are of Phillipino or Mexican descent.

Olijuin stated that there has been an attempt to unionize farm workers since 1880. He went on to say that major opponents of this unionization are the "huge, corporate farms," and consequently all the farm workers are subject to them.

The major objectives of farm workers are: 1. to be allowed secret balloting on the property of the farm's owner of the farm in order to determine whether or not workers are in favor of being unionized 2. higher wages and 3. more sanitary conditions under which to work. They're finding these aims difficult to achieve since they are not covered by the National Labor Relations Act, and because only 9% of these huge farms employ 70% of the workers.

Another injustice which Olijuin pointed out was inflicted some 20 years ago and is just being felt now. During World War II, a

The spirit of Pinebrook

Pinebrook is where crisp mountain air and the spirit of goodwill mix to produce a conference on the ills of education at Syracuse.

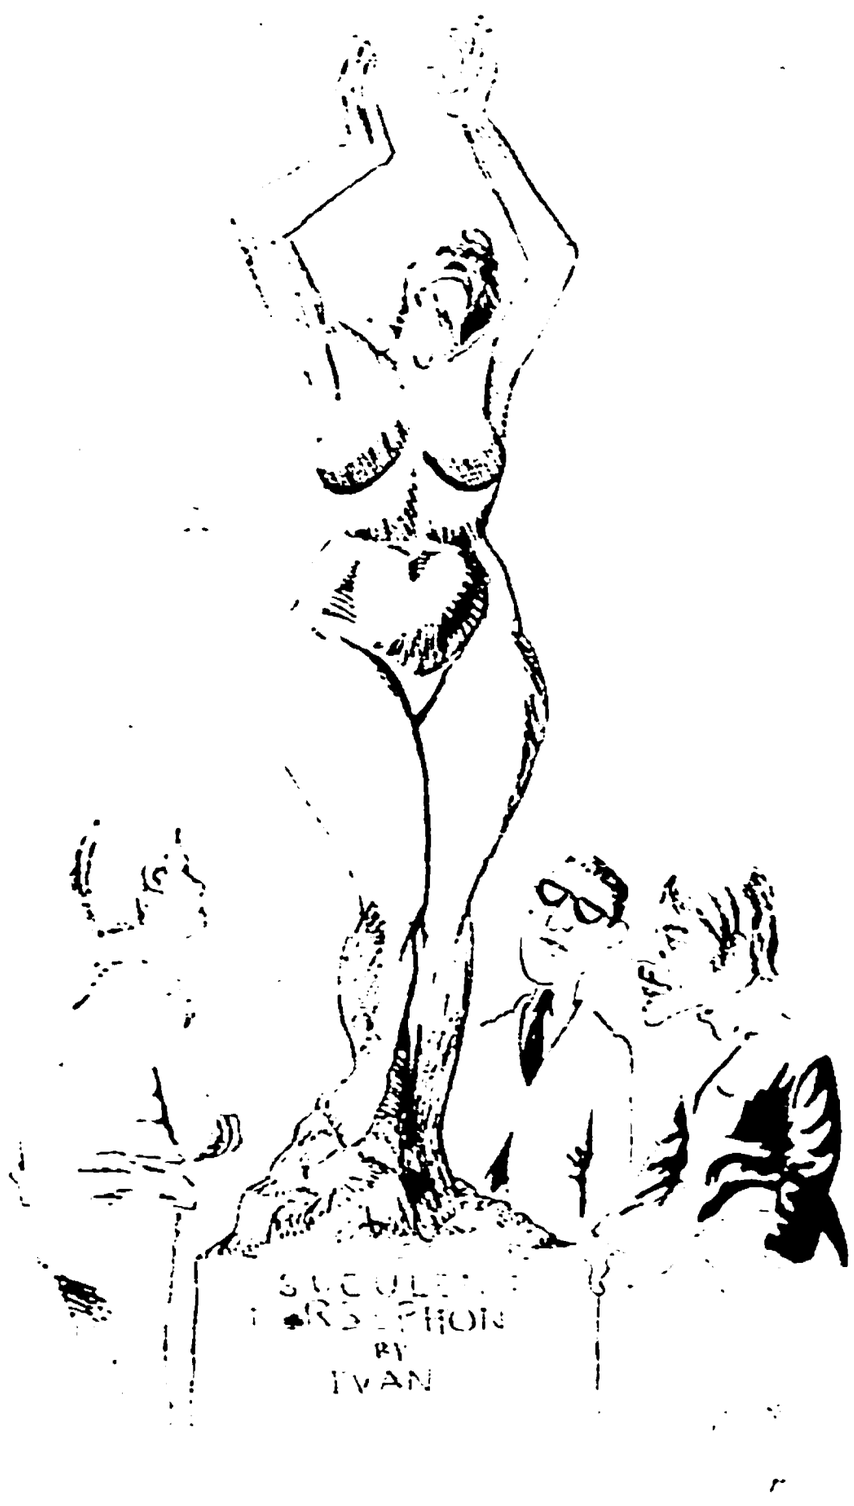
It is where the red leaves falling from the Maple trees indicate even Mother Nature is concerned with change and a new order of things.

It is a place where you can canoe on Saranac Lake in the afternoon as the Indians must have done and where you can see how to use a classroom computer in the evening.

Pinebrook is a remarkably optimistic place where there are no locks on the doors. Administrators, faculty and students gather to level with one another on the problems besetting them and they do so assuming they can solve those problems. There are moments of embarrassment in this process (there are no locks on the doors of the bathrooms either) but the ideas produced warrant the risk.

All volunteer services

We see on the front page of the Sunday New York Times, "Pentagon Orders a Study Of All-Volunteer Force," that Clark Clifford has been reading DO editorials.



There is one further argument we would like the Secretary of Defense to consider. The United States has increased its standing army from 2.4 to 3.5 million men due to the war in Vietnam. More precisely, President Johnson has increased the standing armed forces to 3.5 billion men and this is another argument in favor of all volunteer armed services.

If a President pursues policies that drag the United States into unannounced war, the President can continue those policies without the approval of Congress even if they require additional men for the armed forces. Higher draft calls go out by executive decree and the men needed to bear arms are produced to continue the policy.

If the U.S. had all volunteer armed forces, the President would not be able to wage war without the approval of Congress since approval would be needed to pass draft legislation.

In cases of national emergency an established draft would be no better than all volunteer services since it is three or four months before raw recruits become trained men.

The adoption of all volunteer armed forces would help reassert the balance of power on vital issues of foreign policy, a balance that is now heavily tipped in favor of the President.

Agenda for . . .

Grad activists

By Jacques Læbel

...so let's assume--just for the sake of argument--that criticising recent attempts at graduate student activism, as vulnerable as such attempts may be to criticism, is dastardly and unAmerican. What then is the alternative? Praising organizations like the potentially significant but so far floundering Graduate Student Organization where praise has not yet been earned? Or perhaps just saying nothing about the role of the graduate student on the S.U. campus until he does something well worthy of banner headlines and unquestioned praise.

I think not. Instead, as a sop to the vocal minority who espouse an "if you have nothing nice to say then say nothing" policy toward criticism of graduate activities I have come up with a partial list of ways in which the individual graduate student can contribute to the ultimate elevation of his kind from second to first class student status.

1. Become active in the organization of graduate students within your degree granting program or, if none exists, form one. No matter how active a central Grad Student Org. becomes graduate study at a large university is a federation and the relative activity level of the various branches is a good indicator of the overall impact of graduate interests on university policies and procedures. An active Graduate Zoology or Solid State Organization (Club, Society, whatever) will do more for the general respectand power of all graduate students than one quasi-representative zoologist on an all university graduate board.

2. Be sure your department is actively represented in the Graduate Student Organization. Given all that was said above it is still foolish not to be in on a potential power base. Representatives should be as critical as is necessary and should not be afraid to "tell it like it is" whenever graduate student oriented goals are relegated to a back seat so that organizational games can caress bureaupathic egos.

3. Be an ad hoc representative of graduate students wherever your interests lead you. If you are a sports car buff join the Auto Sport Club but make it clear you are a graduate student. If they say they have restricted their membership to undergraduates I am sure the G.S.O. would be happy to hear about this. On the other hand if they happily accept you just keep in mind you are a grad student. Become an officer if you can and let the G.S.O. know of your title.

4. Keep your eyes open. For every sign, advertisement, announcement, radio broadcast, trip or special offer that doesn't openly include graduate students find out why. Obviously nominations for sophomore class officers are justified in not including grad students. But what about the many club notices, special committee membership openings, etc. that I've seen which specifically say undergraduate. Any reason? Follow these up

5. Bring all cases of graduate student injustice to someone's attention and see that something is done. I have referred to the G.S.O. as a possible place for such complaints.

Letters to the editor

Semites

To the Editor:

I read your article 'Arabs are not anti-Semitic' with great care, and wish to reply. I don't consider myself an authority on the Arab-Israeli conflict, but I do have some valid credentials, I lived through it for over a decade.

I was born in Egypt in 1945, and after spending fifteen years of my life in such a warm land, was expelled from it along with my family and thousand of others for one simple reason, we were all Jewish. And yet, Mr. Khouri claims that Arabs are not anti-Semitic. Let me quote President Nasser, the so-called fearless leader of the Arab world,'we (the Arab states) shall erase the state of Israel from the map of the world.' Let me go one step further and describe briefly what really did happen in Egypt during the 1956 Suez crisis. Well-established Egyptian Jews were put in concentration camps along with their families. Their life-time savings were confiscated permanently, their properties stolen if not burned. I believe that such acts should be forever condemned no matter who is involved, not only by the American press but by the world.

However, I wish to clarify my position, I am not a Zionist, and hope that this reply won't be considered as anti-Arab. I still have some good Arab friends, and for one good reason, we understand one another. And that is the one solution to this so-called endless conflict, understanding one another and not annihilating each other. Why can't we live in an atmosphere of peace and brotherhood? We eminated from the same parts of Palestine, and we have been blood-brothers for ages. So let us join hands once again, and set a universal example that might restore peace throughout the world, and I mean peace.

R. Aaron

Arabs are not "anti-Semitic" in that they too are Semites. Whether or not they are anti-Jewish is another matter. Ed.

Sick Greeks

To the Editor:

The remark that the Greek system is "sick" is an understatement: the Greek system is dying, and will soon be dead unless they can make some drastic changes in some of their basic ideas and concepts. The aspect of the Greeks that gripes me most is their hypocritical claims of "brotherhood" and "sisterhood."

One example of Greek "brotherhood" occurred last week. A friend of mine (who happens to be what some people call a "hippy") was walking by a frat when four brothers reeking of "brotherhood" (and alcohol) came out and pounded the daylights out of him. He required medical treatment and a new pair of glasses.

In Friday's DO, the ADPi girls spoke proudly of sisterhood in their sorority, even though they are aware of discrimination in the selection of sisters. Perhaps it would be "suicidal" for the Alpha Tau chapter to oppose the national, but I can't see why anyone would want to belong to a sorority (or fraternity) that so blatently perpetuates discrimination against the Negro. Apparently, discrimination is an example of "rich heritage in tradition" which Mr. Schefmeyer failed to mention.

Greek "brotherhood" seems to be more as Mr. Roe described it. He cited the fact that when SAE lost its charter, various houses contacted the national so that the SAE brothers could stay in their house. Brotherhood seems to be helping guys in your frat or helping out another frat. (By the way, some of us remember one of the reasons SAE lost its charter.)

Yes, the Greek system is dying, and justly so, since their concept of brotherhood is so narrow that there is no room for it in a world whose greatest problem is recognition of the fact that someone can look different and still be a human being.

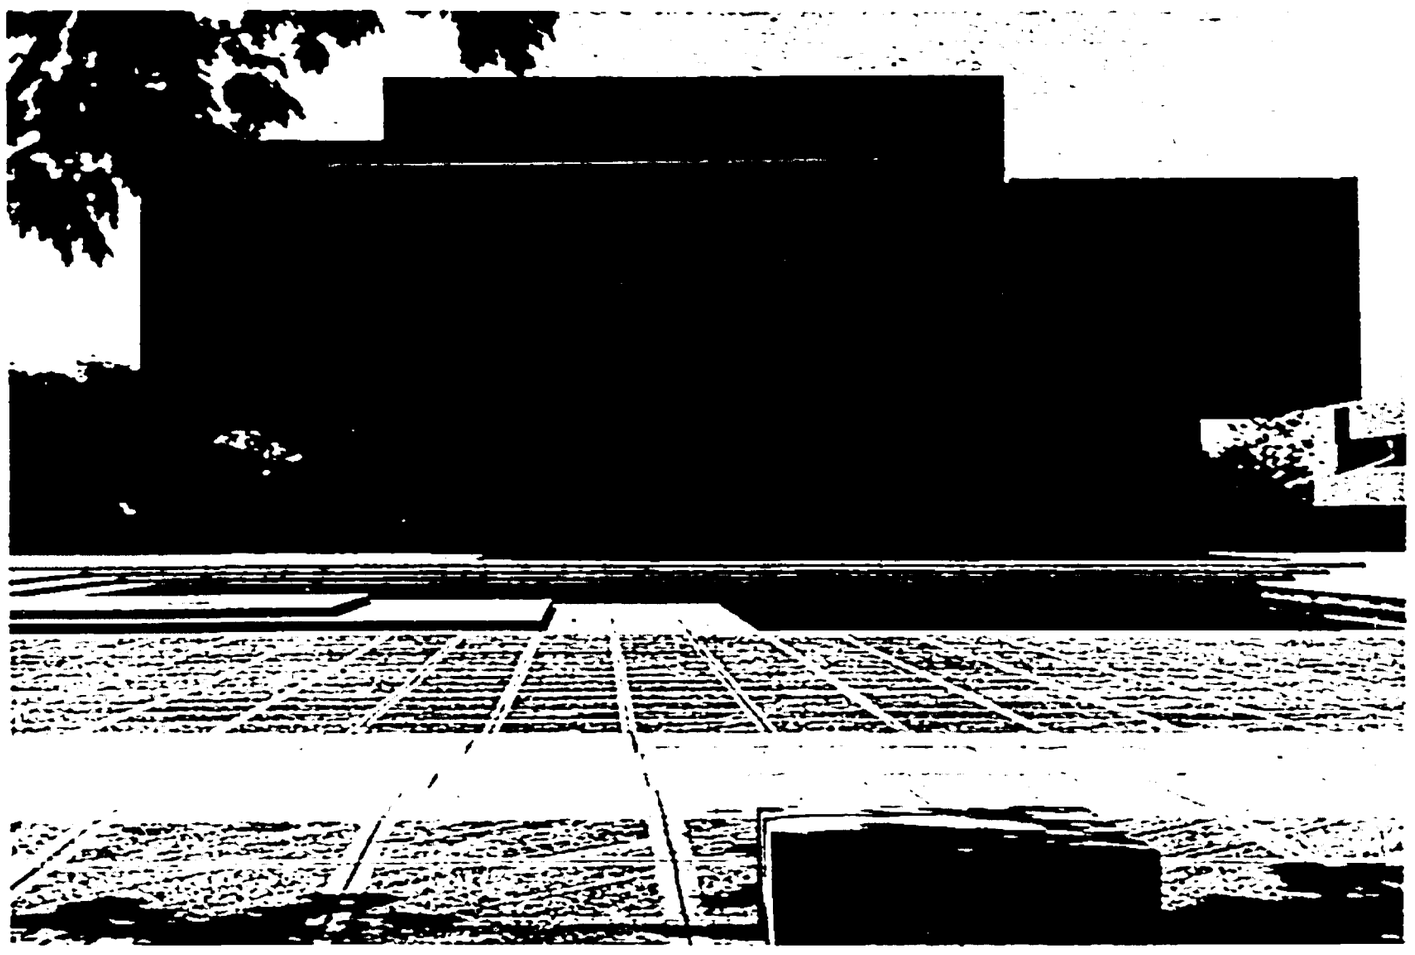
Public sponsored museum to open

On Friday, Saturday and Sunday, Everson Museum will open and dedicate its new museum building by I.M. Pei, architect. This building has from its earliest planning stages received wide recognition from various news media, having first been cited by "Progressive Architecture" as "a work of art for other works of art." The Everson building is currently being featured in an exhibition "Architecture of Museums" at the Museum of Modern Art.

Architect Pietro Belluschi has described the new Everson as architecturally one of the most interesting buildings recently erected in this country. According to Belluschi, "It is a statement of great power as sculpture and is a most sympathetic place in which to experience Art. Architect I.M. Pei has shown in this, even more than in others of his recent works, his brilliant qualities as a perceptive interpreter of the modern mood."

Four main galleries are cantilevered out over a plaza area and are flanked on the right by the administrative-members area and on the left by the auditorium. The central sculpture court, two stories high, is dominated by a circular stair. Pei feels this central court area is visually and symbolically the heart of the museum.



As a private museum, with land provided by the city, the new Everson building has been achieved through the wide support of the Syracuse community, according to museum officials.

"This represents a broad base of support from a community which has not preciously been strong in the support of the arts, and which has never had a tradition of donors, collectors, or art patrons."

Beginning with a million dollar bequest from Helen S. Everson "to build and maintain a museum of art," the trustees of the Museum in 1963 initiated a Building Fund Campaign to raise an additional 1¾ million dollars. This campaign, through a 5 year community effort, ultimately achieved its goal through gifts from business and industry, groups and organizations, and individuals within the community, creating a building project in excess of three million dollars.

Since 1961, when plans for the new building were first announced, the Everson Collection has more than doubled in size. This growth of the collection, in many cases through gift, also reflects community response to the Everson program.

Everson's opening and dedication will begin with a preview dinner for donors, lenders, collectors, critics and distinguished personages from the museum and art world on Friday evening, October 25. Dedication ceremonies for members, donors and invited guests will follow on Saturday, October 26. The Museum will open to the public on Sunday, October 27.

New Everson

The new Everson Museum, to open this week, was designed by I.M. Pei, the same architect who designed the Newhouse Communication Center. The Everson has been called "a work of art for other works of art."

Grape pickers pick gripe . . .

Public Law was issued which stated that for every 100 Phillipino men coming into the country, only one Phillipino woman was allowed, and that no Phillipino man could marry out of his ethnic group.

Consequently, many men who have contributed long years of work on the farm since that time have nothing now in the way of family.

Olijuin further stated that many farm workers, particularly those in leadership positions, have been deemed Communists and are meeting stringent opposition from the John Birch society and the Let Freedom Ring Society.

Another set-back cited by Olijuin was the fact that whenever workers strike against one brand label, new labels invariably spring up to take their place.

Richard Nixon was singled out for criticism since, when he was running for California's governorship, he promised improvements for farm workers in one speech but in another, stated that the grape boycott was not to be tolerated under any circumstances.

However, Olijuin stated that "after you put down our exaggeration about success, and the opposition's exaggerations of our failure" there have been certain gains made. Wage increases have gone through in some areas and more sanitary conditions have been achieved, the wine-grape growers being the most cooperative in these respects. Also, the U.S. government has been buying more grapes for use by soldiers in Vietnam and elsewhere.

But these gains are not enough; the strike goes on . It has gained national attention and national concern. At the end of Chavez' hunger strike in February, the late Sen. Robert Kennedy was present to give his the first of his food.

Although only enough workers are used to keep the strike in force, their numbers may eventually result in desired action.

Correction

In Friday's Daily Orange a letter from a Jim Roe of Phi Gamma Delta fraternity erroneously listed him as a member of Sigma Alpha Mu.

This represents a printing error, rather than a deliberate attempt by the DO to undermine the greek system.

Marketing at IBM

"Working with company presidents is part of the job."

"I'm pretty much the IBM Corporation in the eyes of my customers," says Andy Moran. "That kind of responsibility's not bad for an engineer just two years out of school."

Andy earned his B.S.E.E. in 1966. Today, he's a Marketing Representative with IBM, involved in the planning, selling and installation of data processing systems.

Plenty of business experience

"Engineering was my first love," Andy says, "but I still wanted good business experience." So far, he's worked with customers involved in many different computer applications, from engineering to business. His contacts go from data processing managers all the way up to the president of his largest account.

"At first I was a little nervous about working at that level," says Andy. "But then you realize you're trained to know what he's trying to learn. That gives you confidence. You're helping him solve his problem."

With his working partner, the data processing Systems Engineer, Andy has helped many customers solve their information handling problems. "I get a broad overview of business because I run into every kind of problem going. Sometimes I know the solutions from experience. Other times I need help from my manager.

"That's one of the best things. My manager is more of a backup than a boss. He's there when I need him. Usually, I pretty much call my own shots."

Andy's experience isn't unusual at IBM. There are many Marketing and Sales Representatives who could tell you of similar experiences. And they have many kinds of academic backgrounds: business, engineering, liberal arts, science.

They not only sell data processing equipment as Andy does, but also IBM office products and information records systems. Many of the more technically inclined are data processing Systems Engineers.

Pinebrook evaluation . . .

which the ideas could be carried out.

That evening, films made by students at SU were shown. They varied from the thoughts of a blind child to the life of a ticket puncher working for food service and the housewife doing her shopping.

On Sunday morning, Chancellor William P. Tolley addressed the conference. He opened his speech by presenting the view that people have of a university.

"People feel the university is a static or slow-moving thing, long over due for change. But it is a living institution and does change quickly," he said.

The Chancellor spoke of changes that took place in higher education in Europe and how they spread to the United States. He then said, "The honeymoon is over. The time when a university could live in the tradition that came down from Paris, that colleges handled their own matters and politics weren't involved is past.

"Students are now treated as citizens and are subject to political pressures. We are going to see political changes affect higher education in a bad way," continued Tolley. "The behavior of the majority of students has been exemplary. Yet, the faith in education has been undermined because of the behavior of a few."

Professor Michael O. Sawyer then gave an evaluation of the Pinebrook Conference. He compared the university to a machine in which the inputs act upon the students and convert them into educated people with an idea.

Sawyer was pleased with the change from a discussion of social issues to academics and said, "now there is a revival of the concern about communication. Students are sitting on committees with faculty members and administrators and academics is the major concern here because it concerns all of us," he continued.

Sawyer concluded, "the idea we are moving on (academics) is an important one. If the good spirit that has been shown here lasts, it will have been a fantastic experience."

Tau Beta Pi starts plans for election of members

The New York Beta Chapter of Tau Beta Pi, the national engineering honor society, met last week to begin plans for election of new members and for various group projects.

Tau Beta Pi was founded in 1885 to recognize outstanding students in engineering and has since grown to 128 chapters. Syracuse's chapter was the thirteenth to form.

Eligibility rolls have been compiled from the junior and senior classes. eligible students must have an accumulative average of "B" or better.

Grad students trained to teach in Argentina

By GREG SMITH

The Maxwell School of Public Administration, in conjunction with the University of Buenos Aires, Argentina, is training six Argentinians to serve on the South American school's Faculty of Economic Sciences.

"There's been relatively little training in Latin America of people to go into public service or business," stated Dr. John C. Honey, head of Maxwell's Latin American Studies Program and professor of political science.

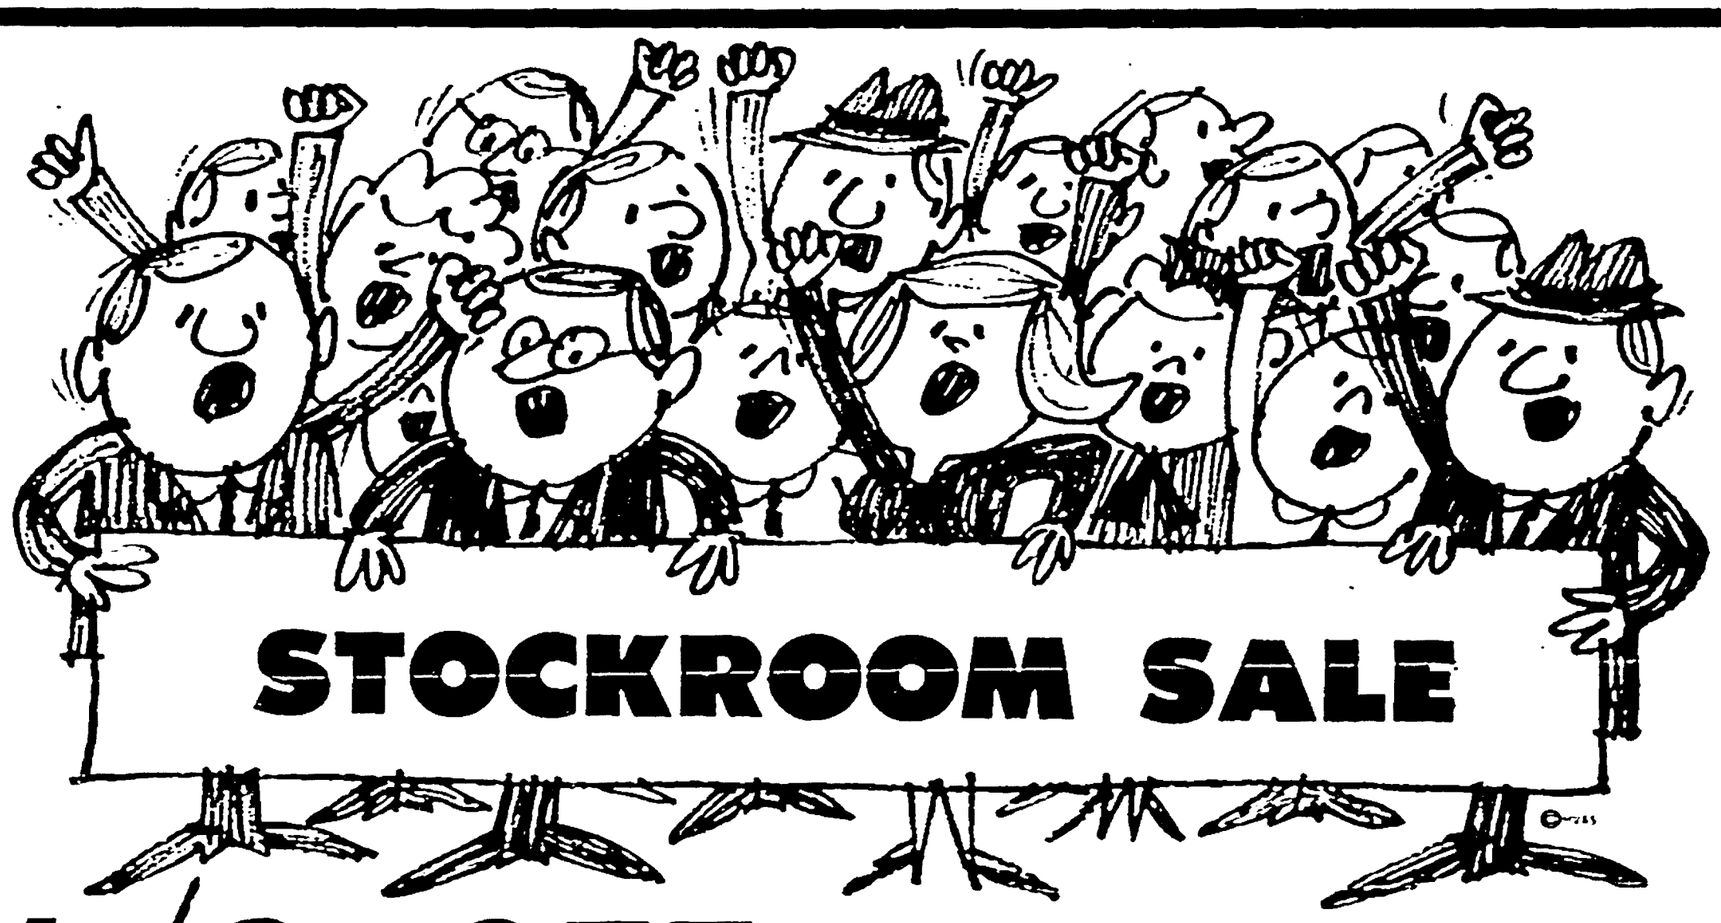
"This is one of the instances in which a leading university in South America has recognized that it has a responsibility to try to train people for public service," continued Dr. Honey.

Syracuse began its cooperation with the University of Buenos Aires following a November 1967 conference in Rio di Janeiro, Brazil, entitled, "The Role of the University in Educating for Public Service" at which Maxwell Dean Stephen Bailey gave the opening address.

Dean Bailey and Dr. Honey conferred with Dr. Luis Mey, former Dean of the Faculty of Economic Sciences and currently professor of administration, who devised the plan, and Mr. Henry Randall, assistant director of the United States Agency for International Development's (AID) Argentina program, over the possibility of an association between the two universities.

Dr. Honey termed the cooperation "quite an important effort" and commented, "We've also been advising on the development of the graduate program and the instituting of political science courses at Buenos Aires. Typically, there's no training in political science in the empirical sense in Latin America. Nevertheless, political science is an essential background for people in public service."

Dr. Mey has already conducted a similar venture, sending fifteen students to Columbia University's Graduate School of Business Administration. They returned to serve on the Faculty of Economic Sciences.



AID is helping to fund the program with a $24,000 grant to SU plus educational awards to the six students and special allocations for consulting and advising fees. AID pays the Argentinians' travel and living expenses, and tuition.

The six graduate students--Miss Elena Trovati, Aaron Bernardo, George Bogo, Enzo Carbone, Juan Llamazares, and Esteban Starnfeld--were selected by the Faculty of Economic Sciences to become candidates for master's and doctoral degress at SU while taking courses in public administration and political science.

TV raters survey SU

The A.C. Nielsen Co. (the T. V. rating people) of Chicago is conducting a "corporate recruitment survey" on the SU campus as well as 70 other colleges and universities throughout the country, to enable businesses to judge the quality of their recruitment programs.

In this 2-month survey, students who have signed up for job interviews with various companies are asked to complete a two-part questionaire at the Placement Center. The first part consists of six questions to measure the students' attitudes toward the company being interviewed, and is to be left in the collection box at the center. Part two is to be completed and sent directly to Nielsen (via a postage paid envelope) after the student has had a job offer and/or a visit to the company.

Movie review

'Battle of Algiers' portrays patriotism, tragedy

By PATTI WILLIAMS

The devastation, horror, fierce patriotism and tragedy caused by war are almost too forcefully conveyed in "Battle of Algiers," a Film Forum movie at the Regent Theater through October 26.

This film, about the Algerians' struggle for independence from France in the late 1950's, shows the bloody incidents of the war in a documentary fashion. Director Gillo Pontcorvo used no newsreel film but employed a documentary technique to give the movie an air of reality and immediacy.

A flashback begins the film as a member of "the Organization," the rebel Algerian (Arab) group, is tortured by the French into betraying his friends.

One of those betrayed is a young man named Ali. If the film can be said to dwell on any characters, it dwells on him as he is transformed from a young hoodlum into a patriot and leader of "the Organization."

The cameras also intermittently follow the actions of a small Arab boy, four young Arab women, and the head of the French forces.

The boy, about 10, personifies the Arabs' fierce determination and resourcefulness. When some Arabs are led to prison by the French, the boy secretly steals one of their microphones and broadcasts a fervent rallying speech to the Arabs. His huge brown eyes with their serious and determined expression belie his age.

The same unswerving devotion to "the Organization" is demonstrated by the four Arab women as they carry bombs into the French section of Algiers. In order to enter the sector, they must discard traditional Arab veils and draperies for European clothes and cut their hair. Their tearful eyes, reflected in a mirror, convey another aspect of the sorrow of the war.

The emotions of the boy and the four women represent an aspect of the film Pontcorvo has unfortunately allowed to be overshadowed by scene after scene of murders, explosions and dead bodies. In an attempt to picture angry, determined mobs the camera neglects individuals, the film nearly numbs the viewer with almost a continuous crowd scene of death and destruction.

The audience sees bodies blown apart but only rarely feels the significance of those deaths.

One rare attempt to convey that significance occurred when the four women carried bombs into a teenage dance hall, a bar, an airport lounge and a restaurant. The camera focused on a child eating ice cream, teenagers dancing, and adults smiling. Moments later their burned and gragmented bodies were being carried away.

An aspect of the war having special significance for Americans is introduced when the head of the French forces, a colonel, deplores French sympathy for the Algerian cause. He disliked Sartre's and other liberals' opposition to the war, which, he said, was demoralizing to the troops. The viewer may not agree with him but probably sympathizes with him.

"Why is it the liberals are always on the other side?" the colonel asks rhetorically.

Reporters asked him about rumors that torture was being used on Arab captives.

"'The Organization' wants to throw us out and we want to stay," he said. "We are not sadists, we are soldiers and this is our duty. You must ask, 'Shall the French remain in Algeria?' and if your answer is 'Yes' then you must accept the consequences."

On the surface, Pontcorvo presents an impartial film, simply representing incidents of the war. Although he shows the blood and destruction caused by both sides, the image the audience is left with is the sad and fierce eyes of the Arabs and the thought that from their blood and mourning came freedom.

Cal holding its own on the gridiron

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

The University of California at Berkeley ranks first in the nation in student protests, second on Playboy Magazine's list of party schools, high on Prof. Harry Edwards' list for alleged discrimination against Black athletes, and this year, for the first time in many seasons, high on the list of tough collegiate football teams. SU will visit the Berkeley campus this weekend.

"They could be ranked in the Top Ten at the end of the season," coach Joe Szombathy told the weekly press luncheon at the Hotel Syracuse. Perhaps because scouts say the same thing every week, he added, "I mean that sincerely."

Szombathy watched California in its 39-15 win last Saturday over UCLA and in its only loss of the season, a 10-7 decision to Army at West Point. "They are an exciting and sound football team," he said. "Saturday's game will be great if we rise to the occasion and hit with them. They are the hardest hitting team we've faced.

Syracuse and California have been once around the block already. Last year at Archbold, SU won, 20-14, on a 22 yard aerial from Rick Cassata to Larry Csonka with 1:22 remaining. After that, Cal drove toward the SU goal, with a pass on the last play of the game almost going for a score. "They felt they should have won last year's game," said Szombathy.

Syracuse head coach Ben Schwartzwalder calls Cal's Ray Willsey "as fine a young coach as there is in the country." He brought Cal to a 5-5 record in 1967, and needs only one more victory to equal that this year.

"We're biting off a big chew this weekend," the Cal coach said over the phone hookup. "We know quite a bit about Syracuse, since we played them last year. When you blow the whistle, they come to play. Defensively, they crank up and let it all hang out."

Cal will not be caught with its drawers down on defense, either. "They're strong, quick and well-coached defensively," Szombathy said. "They never use the same defense two times in a row." The Golden Bears' multiple defenses feature tackle Ed White, whom Szombathy and Willsey both call a bona fide All-America.

On offense, Cal will go with a pro set with a split end and flanker. Big (6-7) Wayne Stewart and speedy Paul Williams are the main targets for quarterback Randy Humphries. Szombathy noted that when Cal lost to Army, it looked as though Humphries was on a "sightseeing tour."

Schwartzwalder also announced that defensive halfback Tom Hermanowski suffered a broken fibula during the Pitt game two Saturdays ago. He will be lost a minimum of four weeks, and possible for the year.

"It's a blow," admitted Ben. "We don't dare change our whole format. We'll take (Gary) Bletsch, (Duane) Walker and (D.J.) Harrell (all sophomores) and do the best we can with them."

Against Cal's wide open attack, these sophs will get their training under fire. Ray Willsey said, "We're not a great team--we just haven't been making mistakes." He just might be selling his team short on that count.

Ben says Orange will have its 'hands full' this weekend

By DOUG GARR

This weekend the Orange football squad travels to Berkeley for their second meeting with the California Bears. Last year the SU gridders won 20-14 in a closely contested ball game. This year should prove to be just as tough.

Coach Ben Schwartzwalder said, "We've got our hands full this week, I'll promise you that." Ben said the West Coast team was a lot better than last year's version. They have a 39-15 "upset" over UCLA last week to prove it.

The California squad beat Michigan, (who beat Michigan State), but they had a bad game against Army, and lost, 10-7. Last week they showed their true worth by trouncing UCLA. Commenting on that game, Ben said, "They beat UCLA to a pulp. After the Army game they changed their format from a slot to a pro set."

Up until last week, California's strength was in its defensive game, giving up an average of less than five points per game. Now they have established an excellent running game as well. "They run the same option that we do real well and mix it in with a fine passing attack," said Schwartzwalder.

They have excellent receiving in Paul Williams, their wingback converted from tailback. "Before now, he couldn't catch a pass, but he didn't miss one against UCLA," Ben said.

Ben also had high praise for their quarterback, Randy Humphries. "He was really sharp last week. Every pass seemed to be a strike. He's also a real strong runner."

California's best individual strength lies in defensive linemen Ed White, 6 ft. 3 in., 250. Schwartzwalder said that he is very quick and strong. It is extremely tough for one offensive linemen to contain him. "He's probably the best defensive end I've seen in three years. He's the defensive equal to Mike Ditka (All-America, Pittsburgh) and Ted Kwalick (All-American candidate, Penn State). He's a true All-American."

Overall, the California squad is in extremely good physical shape. They have no starters out with injuries, while the Orange will be without the services of defensive halfback Tom Hermanowski.

Ben was impressed with California's pre-game warm up against the Uclans. "Before the game, they really ran their squad in a temperature of 74 degrees. Then, they went out and just out-physicalled UCLA."

After losing four straight years to the Bruins, the Bears surprised a lot of people by doing a better job on them than either Penn State or Syracuse. And now, the SU coaching staff cannot find any apparent weaknesses in the Californians.

SU harriers down Alfred

The Orange cross country team downed Alfred Saturday in the rain and cold at Drumlins. Syracuse runners took the first four places to sew up the win. Larry Zuller, Dave Crans, Dale Parfitt, and Phil Riposo led the way, followed by Dave Kunz (9th) and Bill Swift (10th) in the 19-36 triumph.

The SU frosh also won, beating the Alfred frosh by a 23-38 score. Bob Quinlan of the Tangerines set a new freshman course record of 16:13.

Wolves win, 19-12

DO Chickens bow in mud

With the biggest football weekend of the year now history, the Syracuse campus is slowly returning to normalcy.

Under the worst possible football conditions, the inspired WAER Wolves out-battled a game DO Chicken ballclub Saturday, 19-12.

The game started with a fine mist descending on the already mushy Women's Building Field. This precipitation eventually developed into a torrential downpour and severely hampered the speed of the Chicken squad.

Lee Shirvanian, captain and quarterback of the Wolves, took home the prized Chadwick Cup. Shirvanian had two touchdown passes and ran for another.

The Chickens, who were relying on their blinding speed to offset a size disadvantage, were hampered by the wet turf and slippery football, and were forced to play catch up football throughout the contest. The Wolves, led by single-threat Shirvanian, methodically moved the ball on offense, clicking on runs and short passes.

Visibly dissappointed with his team's loss, Chicken player-coach Mike Greenstein nevertheless has kind words for his battered charges. "There were a number of fine performances by Chicken players," said Greenstein, "but we didn't win the game, and this means we flunked our first test.

"The game did give many of our rookies a chance to get their feet wet," he continued, "Now we should be able to settle down and play some good football."

Another factor that hurt the Chickens was the absence of Ira Silverman, who was sidelined with the sniffles. "Losing Ira had to hurt us," said Greenstein. "With him missing, we had to carry our own water buckets."

The Chickens will have an off date this week before their match with the Promethean Piggys. "We'll stick with basically the same lineup," says Greenstein, "Ham Biggar did a great job at quarterback both running and passing. Ed Agranowitz and Greenstein were both effective as pass recievers, Mike Weber went both ways on the line, and Evan Richert and Gillie Gillispie both did well as defensive backs."

Looking ahead to the Pro, Greenstein comments, "The Piggys will be a desperate ballclub--we'd better be desperate too."

CHICKEN FEATHERS: The rain held the attendence down to a crowd of four.....Weather also forced cancellation of halftime show by the famous "Marching Chickens".....Both teams wish to thank Bob Wolfe and Gene Duffy for doing a helluva job as officials under adverse conditions.

'Our say is final'

Snyder clarifies role of present Judicial Board

By RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

In a time when students are demanding increased autonomy from the administration and a greater voice in decision-making, SU is proving to be somewhat of a paradox, at least in matters of discipline.

"A student called into the office of a personnel dean has the option of going to the administration or coming to us," said Paul Snyder, chief justice of the University Judicial Board, yesterday in an interview.

It is Snyder's contention that most students choose the administration to impose disciplinary action upon them because they feel that the UJB can be overruled in its verdict.

While this was true of the old student court, it is not true of the present board, according to Snyder.

Holding that a Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) pamphlet referred to the UJB as the "student court" Snyder sees a need for clarification of the Board's function and power. "The old student court ceased to exist two years ago," he said. "Our say is final."

Essentially, the Board has two principle functions, according to Snyder. First, it is to provide students with proceedural due process, and second, it must make the punishment fit the crime.

"The old student court could decide guilt or innocence but did not have a judicial code specifying proceedures and penalties," he explained. "Also, there was no right of appeal as there is with us."

So far, the appeals court of the UJB has not heard a case, according to Snyder.

Snyder pointed out that the UJB has "found a good number of people to be innocent. Our verdicts may range from innocence to expulsion," he said. So far the Board has not expelled a student from the University.

The previous student court disbanded in March of 1967 over a disagreement with the administration concerning disciplinary action taken against SG president Peter Jeffer. In a protest against the administration's prohibition of alcohol on campus, Jeffer drank a can of beer in the lobby of his dormitory.

The student court refused to rule on the case until a council was formed to act on the rule concerning alcoholic beverages. Consequently, the administration stepped in to take disciplinary action against Jeffer.

In protest against what it held to be a lack of respect for its authority, the entire court resigned. For a year there was no student judiciary board on campus.

The present court was appointed in March of 1968. Future members will be appointed by a committee consisting of a senior year justice, the UJB chief justice, the speaker of Student Senate, the president of Student Government and three members of faculty senate, according to Snyder.

He stressed the idea of the Board's being a non-political body, with membership limited to those who are not actively affiliated with a campus political body. Also, Snyder pointed out that there is no "Greek-independent split within the Board."

WILLIAM J. VANDEN HEUVEL

Former RFK aide blasts Johnson Administration

By ETTA FIELEK

Hurling verbal missles at the Johnson Administration and at Richard Nixon's qualifications for the presidency, William J. Vanden Heuvel, in an address last night, said he supports "with enthusiasm and with energy the candidacy of Hubert Humphrey for President of the United States."

A former aide to the then Attorney General Robert F. Kennedy, Vanden Heuvel admitted he spoke as one who originally favored another man but he "realizes the decisions men must come to."

Speaking not only of the prospects of the Democrats in 1968, Vanden Heuvel also referred to the future of the party. He believes that it cannot be removed from the public forum without jeopardizing the social gains and political actions of the last 30 years.

Presently the chairman of the committee of McCarthy and Kennedy supporters for Humphrey, Vanden Heuvel said, "I regard Lyndon Johnson as a catastrophe of the Democratic Party, both in terms of leadership and decision making ability." Johnson, he continued chose to quit the race rather than run for an office he knew he would not regain.

Vanden Heuvel said that the only democrat who can win the election is someone either not at all identified with Johnson or someone who has skillfully succeeded in overshadowing this identity with his own deeds.

"I have actually come to speak for two men," Vanden Heuvel said, "for Vice-President Humphrey in support of his candidacy for the presidency and for Paul O'Dwyer for election to the Senate."

O'Dwyer he said, is a "mover and a shaker." He has a "maverick reputation" and is deeply committed to achieving social justice for all."

In addition, his election to the Senate "would mean a lot to the future of the democratic party," said Vanden Heuvel, because, in this time of political uncertainty "O'Dwyer's victory might be just the impetus needed to help rebuild the party, particularly in New York State."

"There are two reasons why Hubert Humphrey should be President," Vanden Heuvel stated, "and the first is Hubert Humphrey."

There is a Humphrey he said, who was a United States Senator, a liberal spokesmen for 20 years who is beyond the identification as Vice-President of the United States under Johnson.

In considering the problems of Black America, Vanden Heuvel said there was no choice between Hubert Humphrey and Richard Nixon, a second reason why Humphrey should be elected.

"Hubert Humphrey stands for civil rights for all Americans even when Vice President Richard Nixon opposes them," Vanden Heuvel said. "The only hope for America is that Humphrey's great liberal strain might be resurrected."

Continuing with the second reason why Humphrey should be elected, namely Richard Nixon, Vanden Heuvel pointed out that since Nixon's nominations he has been called upon to make only one major decision, the choosing of a running mate, and he chose Spiro Agnew.

Popovic raps today

A professor whose recent book was censured by the Yugoslav embassy will be the guest at today's UU Bull Session.

Nenad D. Popovic, a visiting professor in international finance, defected to the United States in September, 1961. He had been chief of economic affairs in the Yugoslav Foreign Ministry.

Popovic's book, "Yugoslavia: The New Class in Crisis," discusses the rise of an elite group of government officials who are using political and economic interests to further their own power.

The discussion is scheduled for 4 p.m. in Chapel House.

Men invade Mount due to atmosphere

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

SU's "pink luggage set" of Flint Hall may be replaced by male students next September if such a proposal is approved by the University Housing Committee.

The proposal to change Flint Hall into a men's dormitory arises for secuity reasons and to abolish the students' shunning of the hall because of its "undesirable atmosphere."

With the conversion of a girls dorm into a mens dorm, the inter-dormitory or housing committee hopes to break up two complexes on campus, Flint and Day Hall and Sadler and Lawrinson Halls. Sadler Hall is the likely prospect for the conversion mainly because its housing capacity of 492 compares with 538 of Flint Hall.

Under the guidance of Peg Johnston, president of Inter-dormitory Council and Ane-Marie Kis, student director of housing, statistics are being gathered to show advantages of the conversion. Also a campus poll will be initiated to obtain student opinions on the proposal.

Flint Hall has numerous exits in addition to its easily accessible first floor which makes the dorm more approachable for entry than Day Hall. Flints' unfavorable image on campus is reflected by the women students when signing up for the living centers. Invariably it is the last dorm to be filled.

The Inter-Dormitory Housing Committee believes that male occupation on the Mount will increase security and abolish the undesirable reputation of the large living center.

The big obstacle to overcome, according to Miss Johnston, is the necessary plumbing revisions. This could be arranged at a "reasonable" cost. But, because the dorms are occupied in the summer by students or convention guests, the only available time for plumbing rennovations would be the month of August.

Booth Hall has also been considered for the exchange, but its limited lounge space is a major problem. Also, it has only one trunk room, a television room with a seating capacity of only 25, and there is no snack bar.

Sadler on the other hand, has lounge space comparable to that of Flint, snack bar, large television room and several storage rooms. There are lounges, study rooms and cooking facilities on each floor of Sadler Hall.

Wallace, the spoiler, can't be ignored

It is hard to believe there are still some people who don't take George Wallace seriously. The strutting little gamecock apparently will hold about 20 per cent of the American electorate in his column through election day.

Most people including George Wallace don't expect the former Alabama governor to win in 1968. But consider some electoral arithmetic of 1948. Truman and Dewey squared off with enough differences to distinguish one from the other just as Nixon and Humphrey are distinct from one another. Henry Wallace, FDR's vice president, entered the race with his American Labor Party to draw the solid protest votes something like Dick Gregory and Eldridge Cleaver will draw to a lesser extent the hard-core protest votes this year. Strom Thurmond ran on the Southern conservative right but not as effectively as George Wallace is doing today.

Consider these figures: In New York, the vote for Dewey was 2,841,000. The vote for Truman was 2,780,000. All of New York's 47 electoral votes went to Dewey. There were also 509,000 votes cast for Henry Wallace that might otherwise have been cast for Truman.

In Maryland Dewey received 294,000 popular votes and the state's eight electoral votes. Truman received 286,000 and Wallace 10,000.

It was the same in Michigan; Dewey, 1,038,000; Truman, 1,003,000. Wallace got 46,500. Nineteen electoral votes went to Dewey.

Strom Thurmond got on the ballot in only 16 states; Wallace is on all fifty. The Dewey Republicans hoped to carry Florida and Virginia where the party was growing and resentment of Truman was strong. The results in Florida were: Truman, 282,000; Dewey, 194,000 and 89,700 possible Dewey votes cast for Thurmond. In Virginia Truman won 200,800; Dewey, 172,000; and Thurmond, 43,000.

Despite the close popular election, Truman carried the electoral college 303 to Dewey's 189.

These figures illustrate the public opinion polls are not accurate predictors of the final outcome. Furthermore, Wallace's spoiler role may be increased if the electoral college is deadlocked without any candidate having a majority.

It is reported Wallace's aim at this point is to continue broadening his base so he can make another attempt at the presidency in 1972. Imagine Richard Nixon as President for four years with racial strife bloodier than ever and George Wallace snipping away from the sidelines. Or imagine Hubert Humphrey as President with intense disappointment over a degrading settlement to the Vietnam war. George Wallace would find him and his liberal policies an easy target.

The ugly anti-intellectualism and racism of George Wallace cannot be ignored and should be combatted – if only by working and voting for the major candidate of your choice.

Sounds of silence

Nixon reception

The Nixon Reception Committee is a non-partisan organization devoted to the democratic principle of open debate and discussion. NRC feels silence on the key issues by any candidate indicates a lack of respect for the American public.

NRC has the goal of organizing both the university and city communities in a coalition of students from various campuses in the area, Labor forces, and citizen groups.

NRC wishes to bring to the attention of the American public Richard M. Nixon's avoidance to date of any and all dialogue with either his opponents or public.

NRC wishes to protest this fact in an orderly and organized manner with the objective being to force Mr. Nixon to debate the issues with other candidates and break his "Madison Avenue" silence in this crucial election year.

NRC's form of protest: 1. orderly pickets in front of the War Memorial, 2. singing of the "Sounds of Silence" inside the War Memorial, 3. press releases explaining the significance of "Sounds of Silence" in regard to Mr. Nixon's campaign, and 4. absolute freedom of speech for any speaker that visits Syracuse.

NRC is soliciting the support of all campus groups and individuals. Time and place of meetings coordinating the October 29 visit will be announced.

Student taught courses

The prospect of a student-taught course in "Black Culture" offering a totally new dimension in education appears rather dim. In examining the so-called "Baumgarten plan" presented before the Liberal Arts faculty, one is hard-pressed to see how the plan will produce the anticipated meaning: "making (an SU) degree more than just a piece of paper."

Graduate students have for some time been teaching courses at the University level, and complaints have been continually raised that even they are unqualified to teach just yet. In light of this, there is little to recommend that undergraduate student leaders have the academic creadentials to undertake this task. It seems equally doubtfull that the courses for which these student teachers are currently enrolled will give them the requisite training.

In an attempt to bridge a gap between itself and the students, the administration appears to have been overly permissive at a time when academic common sense should have prevailed.

Letters to the editor

Ballot burning

To the Editor:

I am twenty-one years old, a senior at Syracuse University, a resident of New York State and an American citizen. For me, today, the United States of America is the best place to live.

I have a political problem — the act of voting. I received my absentee ballot in the mail and was saddened to find that there was no one on it I could honestly support with my vote. I considered writing the name of Senator Eugene McCarthy on the ballot but was informed that this is an indirect vote for Richard Nixon, since under the present system we vote not for the man directly but for electors. A McCarthy vote, then, would deprive Hubert Humphrey of Democratic electors.

Therefore, on Wednesday, Ocy. 30, 1968, I will burn my ballot on the steps of Hendricks Chapel at 12:00 noon. That act will be my vote for the President of my country.

Anyone wishing to join me with a fiery ballot of his own may do so.

Lonesome cities

To the Editor:

Labeling Rod McKuen as the "Prophet of Today" is one of the most striking of all comments concerning the direction our country is taking. Having read Mr. Ondreyko's review of Lonesome Cities a number of times, I'm still not really sure if it's tongue-in-cheek or not. He sees Rod McKuen exactly as he is, describes his postion perfectly, and yet does not take the trouble to notice anything about it. This review keeps on saying things like how Rod McKuen is so nice, and how he doesn't over-extend himself, and how one time he used the word the word "ass-hole" and ruined a smooth understated lyric. There is no recognition that this line of bad poetry is somehow the essence of what makes this man so human and thus so popular.

Rod McKuen can be as moderate as he wants and if he could write good poetry about it, find fresh images and make people see anything new, then he might be as valuable as the most talented radicalism. But, especially as poetry, honesty cannot be allowed to sell for talent. Of course honesty is necessary, but it's really frightening to think that it's become so rare, or so hard to recognize, that Rod McKuen's brand of it has reached the proporiions it has.

The review speaks for itself, as does the admission by Mr. Ondreyko that he has "no rationale, only a disposition." If he really does mean this, he would be better off with bad novels.

Cheating

To the Editor:

Apparently there are many people on campus who believe that the Greek system is "sick". Those who doubt it should sit in on Dr. Gibbs religion 255 course.

It is offered at the convenient hour of eleven on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays. Perhaps it is too convenient because it catches wide awake those Greeks who go to class. Many of them sit together in a block that composes the last few rows of Max. 101. Since the first days of class, they have talked continually, while Dr. Gibbs has attempted to lecture. He has asked them several times to remain silent, but they insist upon depriving most of the students of the benefits of the course.

The situation come to a head last Wednesday when the first exam of the semester was given. At this time, flagrent acts of cheating occured, and they did not escape the notice of Dr. Gibbs and his assistant. On Friday, Dr. Gibbs expressed his distaste for what he termed, "the most serious case of cheating I have encountered at this university." He noted that those people who had been doing most of the talking were also those who cheated on the exam. He then demanded that those who cheated drop the course or else face possible disciplinary action.

It is my hope that Dr. Gibbs will follow up on his threat, and I also hope that sometime in the future the Greeks will take a good look at their system, and see what type of individual it helps to produce.

Dorm unification is aim of North Campus Alliance

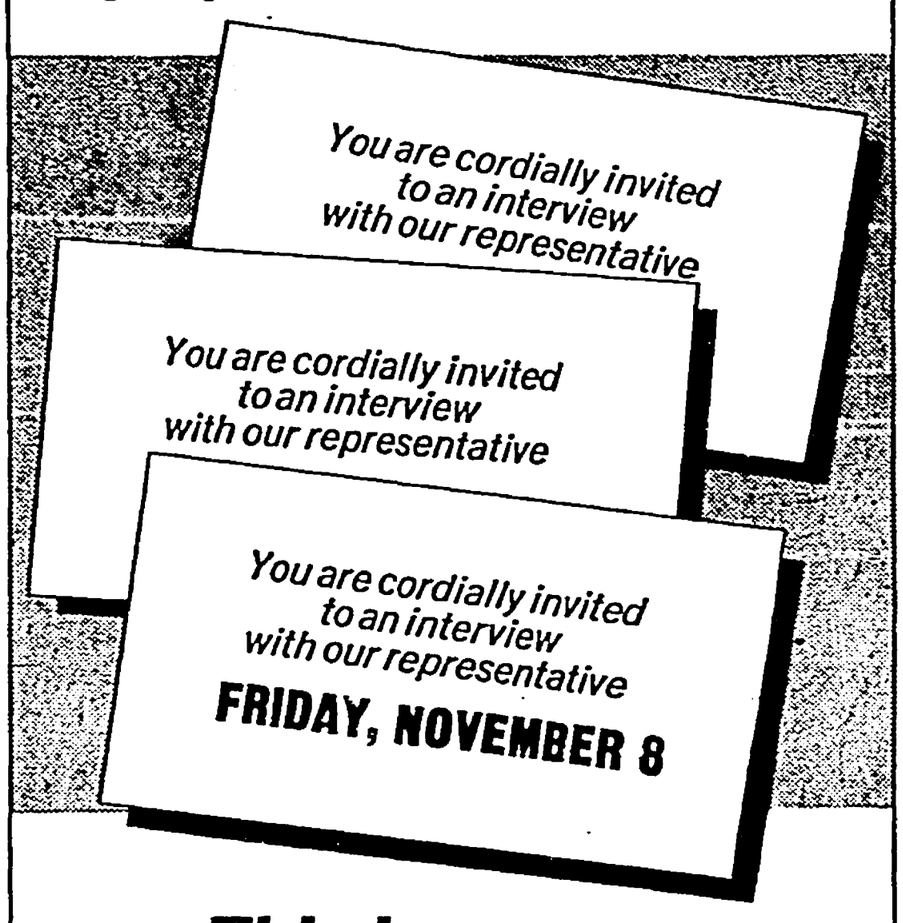
A newly-formed executive committee has been meeting for two weeks at Ambassador to organize and unite the dormitories in the north campus area.

The North Campus Alliance includes Chaumont-Merrill, Ambassador, Sherbrooke, Washington Arms, Grover Cleveland, Seneca, and several cottages.

Steven Gordon, prime minister of Chaumont-Merrill and chairman of the North Campus Alliance, said: "The purpose of the Alliance is to give students living in the north-campus area an effective means of participating in student affairs and in dealing with the administration."

Because of the size of the north-campus living centers "they have not been given the recognition of the larger institutionalized dorms," he said.

As a means of obtaining student support, the Alliance has organized a party at Washington Arms this Saturday night from 9 until 1:30.



Frosh rush

All freshmen, especially those interested in going through rush in January, are invited to attend the Panhellenic convocation in Grant Auditorium tonight. Rush counselors will notify girls which of two convocations to attend.

The program includes a description of all facets of Greek life, an address by Dean Smith and an explanation of rush procedure.

All sorority houses will be open 1:30—5:30 p.m. this Saturday and Sunday, October 26 and 27. Freshmen considering rushing in January should go to all houses.

This is a copy of a copy of an invitation to interview a company you may not know well enough.

Making copies is only part of the story.

You can get the other part straight from the source. Talk to our representative and ask him about R&D looking ahead to major advances in education...in areas like color xerography and 3-D imaging...about refinements in combined xerography and EDP systems to process and graphically reproduce any theory or fact available...at any distance.

Ask anything imaginable and you'll discover you're probing a company that's involved with every phase of the information and education explosion.

We place great emphasis on individual initiative. Additional schooling aimed at advanced degrees. Brainstorming. A variety of short-term project groups. And benefits. In short, your career, not simply a job for you to fill.

So while you're looking us over for career opportunities, we'll be looking you over for career potential. Fair enough?

Why not make an appointment with your Placement Director. A half hour of your time could be the start of a great future in research, engineering, manufacturing, programming, accounting, finance, statistics or marketing/sales.

Save your seat at your first sit-in.

The trouble with a sit-in is what you sit on. And that you have to sit on it so long.

Since our thing is keeping you alert mentally, we've had no remedy for other parts of the body that may fall asleep. Until we invented The Sit-On.

What distinguishes The Sit-On from an ordinary pillow is a pocket for your NoDoz®.

Which means that now you can sit it out until the wee hours. Alert from top to bottom.

I want to save my seat. Here's my $2.00. Send me The Sit-On. Send check or money order to: NoDoz Pillow, 360 Lexington Avenue, New York, New York 10017.

Students planning careers in teaching to meet in HBC

All students, both undergraduates and graduates, who are interested in securing public school teaching positions either for the second semester or for the school year 1969-70 are asked to attend a general meeting Wednesday, October 30, at 4:00 p.m. in Gifford Auditorium in H.B. Crouse.

At this meeting Miss Lina Stedman, head of teacher placement, will describe the functions and operations of the placement office. Blanks for application will be distributed to the group, and proper procedure for registering with the Educational Placement Bureau will be covered by Miss Stedman.

Other topics that will be discussed at this meeting are the possibilities of placement for next year, salaries, letter of application, the technique of a personal interview, professional ethics, and general points that will be helpful to the teacher-to-be.

Discount trips offered to Europe, Virgin Islands

By COLETTE STALLINGS

Students interested in flying round-trip to Europe for $210 this summer must become members of the International Student Affairs club (ISAC) prior to Dec. 1.

Membership in ISAC is available to students who are members of the National Student Association (NSA) for $1.50. Because Syracuse is a charter member of NSA all university students are NSA members.

ISAC members are also offered discounts on two NSA publications: "The Official Student Guide to Europe," which lists student hostels in Europe and intra-European Charter flights, and "The Student Traveler," which lists work, study, and travel opportunities abroad.

NSA sponsors winter ski trips to St. Donat and St. Sauveur in Canda -- available to groups at $30 per person for a weekend or $90 per person for five days. Groups can make block reservations for these trips.

A 17-day Christmas ski trip in Switzerland is available for $460, which includes round-trip air fare, hotels, meals, travel through Switzerland and ski lifts and tows.

Another Christmas vacation plan is a seven-day cruise of the U.S. and British Virgin Islands, available to NSA members for $359.

Working in conjunction with the National Union of Students in Ireland, the British Universities of North America Club, the National Union of Australian University Students and the New Zealand University Student Association Inc., NSA has arranged an "Exchange Visitor" program.

Students interested in obtaining their ISAC membership or further information on any of these programs may stop at the NSA information table in the HBC lobby today, tomorrow and between 10 a.m. and 1 p.m.

Ed Stevenson's getting too big for his britches.

We'll put him in his place.

You can bet it'll be the right place, too, because Ed's turning out to be a good engineer. On his way up.

It started two summers ago when Ed got his B.S. in Mechanical Engineering from Purdue. He was interested in engine propulsion, so we put him to work.

First he worked in the project group that developed a 1,400 shaft horsepower version of the T-53 gas turbine engine. Then he was a Fan Jet Engine Performance Engineer. Right now he's wrapped up in Constant Speed Drives and Ground Support Equipment. And to give you some idea of Ed's dedication to propulsion systems, he spends his evenings at home developing a free-piston engine.

There'll be no stopping him from here on, because Ed's working for the world's largest producer of gas turbine engines.

It's a fresh and exciting field—really just beginning and growing fast. Ed's growing with it.

We'd like more eyes-on-the-skies engineers like Ed Stevenson at Avco Lycoming. They'll take a big part in designing new gas turbine engines for new land, sea, air applications.

And they'll find we're a company whose compensation and fringe benefits are the best in the industry, not to mention expense-paid graduate studies at neighboring colleges.

Like the idea? Come visit Avco Lycoming and check out the possibilities. We're in Stratford, Connecticut, just 60 miles from New York.

If you can't come, write Professional Placement Manager, Department 196, Avco Lycoming Division, Stratford, Connecticut. Or see your Placement Officer.

Uninformed?

Voters either dogmatic or apathetic toward candidates, campaign issues

By PATTI WILLIAMS

The American voter is generally uninformed about political issues and is content to remain that way, agreed three members of the Syracuse University Young Republicans Club Monday night. Their opinion seemed substantiated as they went door-to-door campaigning for Congressional candidate David O'Brien.

"The voters say they're well informed, but I've found them to be very ignorant of the issues," said Chuck Stoffel, vice president of the Young Republicans. "I asked one man last week if he'd like to discuss the issues and he said, 'How can you ask me that when there's a pro football game on?' "

"We're trying to stir up interest in the issues," said Andy Rosenblatt," president of the Young Republicans. "I spoke to one lady who was interested in welfare. She had only a surface knowledge about it and wanted to know more. I talked to her for 20 minutes and I felt that I had really helped inform her. In a way, door-to-door campaigning is rewarding."

Rosenblatt said voters are impressed that volunteers take the time to go from house to house campaigning.

The reception to the door-to-door campaigners varied. One Wallace supporter refused to accept the Republican literature saying that he is voting for anyone who is not a Democrat or Republican.

One woman accepted the literature but declined to listen to anything about the candidates because she had to go grocery shopping.

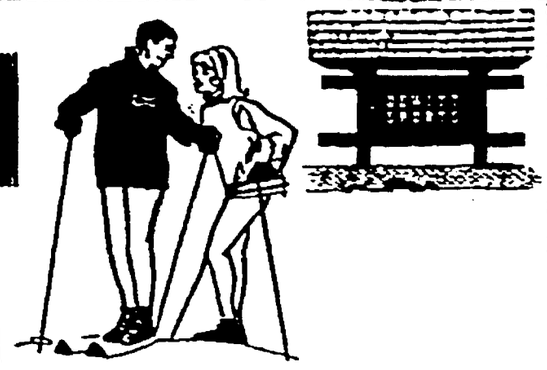
Several people said they didn't need the literature because they were voting for a party ticket.

When one woman was asked if she had any questions about any Presidential or Congressional candidates she said, "I don't know anything about this. My husband's not home."

One man said he supported a particular candidate but was unable to explain why he supports him. "I just think he'll do a better job," he said. "I like the way he talks."

Another voter said he favored a particular candidate because he wanted to see the Vietnam war ended, but the voter couldn't elaborate on that point.

At one of the few houses where the door-to-door campaigners were invited in, a man said they were the first door-to-door campaigners ever to speak to him about a candidate. He said others had simply given him pamphlets and left.



"I try to read and keep informed but I go away on business trips, I have work I bring home from the office, I bowl, and I have things to do for my children so I don't have time to read everything I'd like to," he said.

Congressional candidate David O'Brien said the voters are more informed this year than in the past because of the war and issues such as law and order.

"Ordinarily it's hard to get across the issues," he said. "By and large, we're beginning to see a candidate oriented politics. People tend to look at a guy and say, 'Do I like him' and they don't become more involved than that.

"I concentrate on two or three issues and hope they get through."

Pritzlaff, McCard guarding the line

By IRA SILVERMAN

While the backs are scoring touchdowns and the defense is getting the raves, the offensive linemen continue week after week to do their job of opening holes for the runners and protecting the passer.

Jim Pritzlaff, the right guard on the strong side, and Dave McCard, the left guard on the weak side, anchor an SU line that has shown vast improvement as the season has progressed.

Pritzlaff, 6-0, 225, is actually positioned in the center of the Orange unbalanced line. When the line sets up in a cup to protect the passer, he is in the center while McCard drops back, more like a tackle.

Perhaps the most difficult part of playing their position is determining how to block on each play. The individual blocking assignments are not called in the huddle, but a split second before the ball is snapped. McCard makes the decision on his side, while tackle Andy Fusco or Pritzlaff call it on the strong side. A simple code word is shouted, depending on the opponent's defense.

Both Pritzlaff and McCard view films of upcoming opponents to try to determine whom they will be blocking and how best to execute those blocks. But most of the actual decision takes place on the field.

DAVE McCARD

"I usually play against the middle guard," explains Pritzlaff. "There are two main ways to hit a man. If he's the kind of player that hits and reacts, I try to hit him high to get body position. If he hits and comes across, I like to hit him lower. But I always try to keep myself between the middle guard and where the ball is going."

An integral part of playing guard is "pulling," especially on sweeps and roll-outs. Here a guard usually fakes a block and goes in the direction of the play.

"I try to keep my stance as normal as possible," said McCard. "I try to anticipate the count to get the extra step back."

"I put less weight on my hand," added Pritzlaff. "But you have to make sure you don't show it. I then swing my arm back at the same time as my leg in the direction I have to go."

Syracuse uses the turn-and-step-at-the-same-time method. This method is quite different from those utilized at other schools, where the guards have to fake their blocks first.

Observers at the beginning of the season rated the Orange offensive line as fair at best. Few realized that six of the seven starters were juniors, and had played together for three years. Only end Tony Gabriel was a sophomore.

JIM PRITZLAFF

"I don't think pre-season polls mean much," said the 6-2, 225 McCard. "Since we have played together for three years, we know what the other guys can and will do. We have confidence in the other guys."

Pritzlaff added: "I wasn't worried about the line. Everyone starting this year was a close second team last year. No one realized the togetherness and unity we have."

Pritzlaff, who played center and tackle at Snyder High School in Jersey City, and McCard, who has played guard since high school at nearby Jordon-Elbridge, do not miss the headlines that many of their teammates have been getting.

"I feel that anybody who really knows the game," explains Pritzlaff, "appreciates the job an offensive linemen is doing. I mean the blocks being thrown and the holes being opened."

"It's a feeling of walking away from the field and knowing you've done the job," concluded McCard.

Polls agree — Orange 10th

The Orange of Syracuse University moved into 10th place in the national polls of both wire services released yesterday.

Syracuse, with a 3-1 record, advanced despite its open date last Saturday. SU displaced Florida in the Top Ten, as the Gators suffered their first loss Saturday against North Carolina.

At the top of the poll, Southern Cal stayed in first place, but its margin over second place Ohio State decreased to only 16 points in the Associated Press tally of sportswriters. The United Press' coaches' ratings gave the Trojans an edge of 100 points.

Penn State, also idle, slipped a notch to fourth place, while Kansas, after its fifth straight win, took over the third slot.

Notre Dame, which walloped Illinois, 58-8, moved up to fifth place, with Tennessee, a 10-9 victor over Alabama, gaining the sixth spot. Purdue, a one point victor over Wake Forest, was seventh, followed by Georgia, Miami and Syracuse. California, SU's next foe, is 11 in the AP.

In the Lambert Trophy balloting, Penn State again grabbed all first place votes, and SU got all the second place votes. Unbeaten Yale, riding a 12 game winning streak, is third.

Voice from the bleachers

East rises again

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

The wire service polls on this page reflect the end of a draught that makes the New York water shortage look like a flood. For the past four years, the fortunes of Eastern college football have been as dry as the Sahara, but it appears that the era is now over.

Penn State, unbeaten and ranked fourth, is leading the resurgence. Closely following is Syracuse, once beaten and sneaking into the number 10 slot. It is the first time since 1963 that two Eastern teams have figured so prominently in the national picture.

The East had been the cradle of football. Until 1930, its teams were the most feared in the nation. Until World War II, colleges like Penn and Fordham could battle on even terms with Notre Dame or Alabama. Even until 1960, an Eastern team like Syracuse could sneak through and claim a national championship. But, alas, times change.

After the war college football became more of a money game. Emphasis shifted from the Bucknells and the Harvards to the Purdues and the Southern Cals. In the East, academic standards were raised; in the South, the number of scholarships went up. The main aspect of coaching became recruiting rather than strategy. Some coaches could promise the world, but Eastern coaches could not.

Finally the bottom fell out. In 1963, Pitt won nine games behind Paul Martha and ranked fourth in the nation. Navy, the same year, won nine games and the Lambert Trophy, ranked second, and went to the Cotton Bowl with Heisman Trophy winner Roger Staubach. Texas won the game, 28-6, and the slide began.

The 1964 Lambert award went to Penn State, which boasted a mediocre 6-4 record, including a loss to Syracuse. In 1965 Eastern football carried all the prestige of the Fayetteville Midget Football League.

When Dartmouth was crowned Eastern champion, the humiliation was too much for the Eastern independents. They gritted their teeth and began to fight back. Each year since they made some progress, and after this season, the battle may be won.

Intersectional engagements are where prestige is made or broken. Penn State has beaten Kansas State of the Big Eight and UCLA of the Pacific Eight. Army has handed California its only defeat. Syracuse won five of its seven games series with UCLA. Even Pitt, with only one victory, scored it over William and Mary of the Southern Conference. There have, of course, been losses, but aside from the UCLA-Pitt game, no massacres.

The stars are returning to the East as well. Recently, only Syracuse has been turning out players worthy of All-America consideration. Now Penn State has a half dozen, led by Ted Kwalick, whom Duffy Daugherty and Tommy Prothro agree is the best tight end in college football. Even the Ivies are getting into the act, with Yale's spectuacular Brian Dowling raising some eyebrows among pro scouts.

It would still take either a minor miracle or some major upsets for an Eastern team to again rank in the number one position, for there are still many skeptics in the South and West. But as they sit watching TV in their living rooms on Dec. 7, the issue may be decided for them, right before their eyes.

Sports sidelights

Grid defensive halfback Tom Hermanowski will probably be out for the remainder of the season.....Hermi broke his fibula in the Pitt game two weeks ago.....Schwartzwalder said that he might be back for the Penn State contest on December 7 but would probably be out of shape.....Promising sophomore Gary Bletsch will replace him....

Protestors will meet Nixon rally Tuesday

By SUE LEVY

Republican presidential candidate Richard M. Nixon will apparently be met by a demonstration and a demand that his "campaign silence" be broken when he arrives in Syracuse Tuesday night for a War Memorial speech.

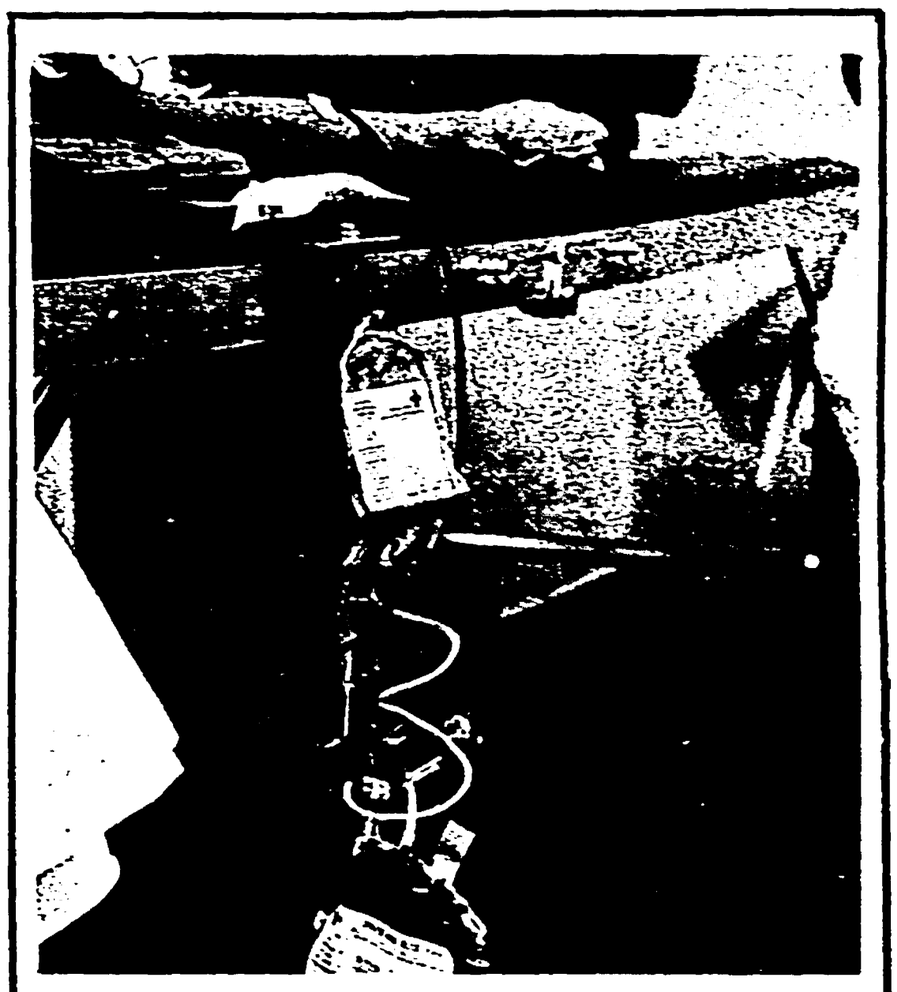
This was the subject of a nearly two-hour, heated debate at last night's Peace and Freedom Party meeting in the Hall of Languages.

Also under debate was whether the party should support the proposed plan of the Nixon Reception Committee, which, according to a DO article yesterday "wishes to protest Richard Nixon's avoidance to date of any and all dialogue with either his opponents or the public."

Larry Alexander, regional organizer for PFP, said that the party was demonstrating as a separate group, and was going to do so inside the War Memorial rather than outside.

He said that more could be accomplished that way, and, as one student said, "Since it's too late to change many minds, we might as well go in and freak out as many people as we can."

NRC's form of protest, on the other hand, will probably be one of "orderly picketing in front of the War Memorial," in accordance with its goal of protest in "an orderly and organized manner."



It was finally decided that PFP members and supporters would stay together throughout the rally, support the NRC as far as they can and "those who want to" will wear a black glove as a symbol against the war in Vietnam.

An appeal for another demonstration, this one by a representative from the National Organization of Women (NOW), involved a recent controversy in Syracuse over the fact that the Rainbow Lounge in Hotel Syracuse will not honor unescorted women as customers.

A demonstration is scheduled for 5 p.m. Sunday at the hotel. "We want one of two things to happen next Sunday," the NOW representative said. "Either all the women will get served or we'll all be arrested, in which event we'd have a good case in court using the Fourteenth Amendment," apparently referring to the due process clause.

A proposed party constitution also was passed out to the handful of students attending the meeting. The object of the document, according to Gene Woloszyn, who chaired the meeting, is to insure PFP's rights as a group.

"The next time we have a speaker like Judy Mage on campus," he said, "we want to be able to get the inside of Hendricks Chapel and not just the steps."

The annual blood drive continues today from 10:45 to 3:45 in Shaw basement.

Babcock and Kelly debate Greek virtues, deficiencies

By BETH HILLSON

The eternal controversy over Greek vs. non-Greek became the focal point of a discussion-debate in Kimmel Lounge last night. Bob Kelly, president of IFC and a brother of Tau Kappa Epsilon, and Charles Babcock, an independent and editor-in-chief of the Daily Orange, discussed the pros and cons of the Greek system for a small group of Kimmel residents.

Babcock's ideas centered on the recent ADPi incident. He said the reason for the recolonization was an attempt to raise themselves on the social ladder rather than to achieve a system of sisterhood.

Babcock said that the Greek system's backbone was social status. It is a characteristic of society, he pointed out, but charged that it was an "institutionalized perpetration of one of the worst attributes of human nature."

Kelly projected a more general view of the Greek system. He agreed that social status is one criteria of fraternities and sororities, but claimed that it is not a major aspect of the Greek system. "A fraternity offers an opportunity to mature and work for a common goal."

Brotherhood within a fraternity involves certain responsibilities and obligations toward the house and brother, Kelly pointed out. "There is some social status involved, but it's not a major part of fraternity life. On this campus there is more emphasis on social status than on some, but that is because SU is a bigger social school," he said.

Kelly insisted that the ADPi chapter was closed because it did not meet its obligations. With 75 per cent of the women on campus to choose from, Kelly saw no explanation for ADPi not being able to find enough members to keep their chapter active. "Either they did not try to find new girls or they didn't find any who fit their standards," he suggested.

He pointed out that a fraternity or sorority obligation is to maintain its strength and its image. It does that by making itself attractive to its rushees.

Kelly suggested that a house may become overconfident and too choosey about the rushees it takes. It might decide to take fewer pledges one year, then its brotherhood might drop and end up as ADPi did.

It is possible that this did happen to ADPi, he said. "We can't say because we don't know enough about the background."

Babcock agreed that ADPi had failed in its obligation to keep a large number of members and to be financially solvent. "To keep them, they had to offer something social. They didn't," he said. Babcock saw fraternities as a "contradiction of values." He felt that a fraternity or sorority judges its rushee and the rushee judges the fraternities on a social basis. But they say that the ideal of the Greek organization should be brotherhood.

Kelly attacked Babcock's term of brotherhood as meaning "everyone goes around loving everyone else. It's a noble aim but not the goal of a fraternity."

A person joins a fraternity to by accepted by his peers. It's the same way in society, Kelly pointed out. But there is brotherhood within the house itself. "This is tempered by living with a bunch of guys, working together and participating in the same social functions," he said.

The informal debate was sponsored by Len Berman.

Faculty-student unity is plan of Pinebrook

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Campus News Editor

Pinebrook is the place where the gap between students, faculty members and administrators is sometimes bridged. Now that the conference members are back in Syracuse, they have had a chance to reflect upon the ideas which were formed during the weekend.

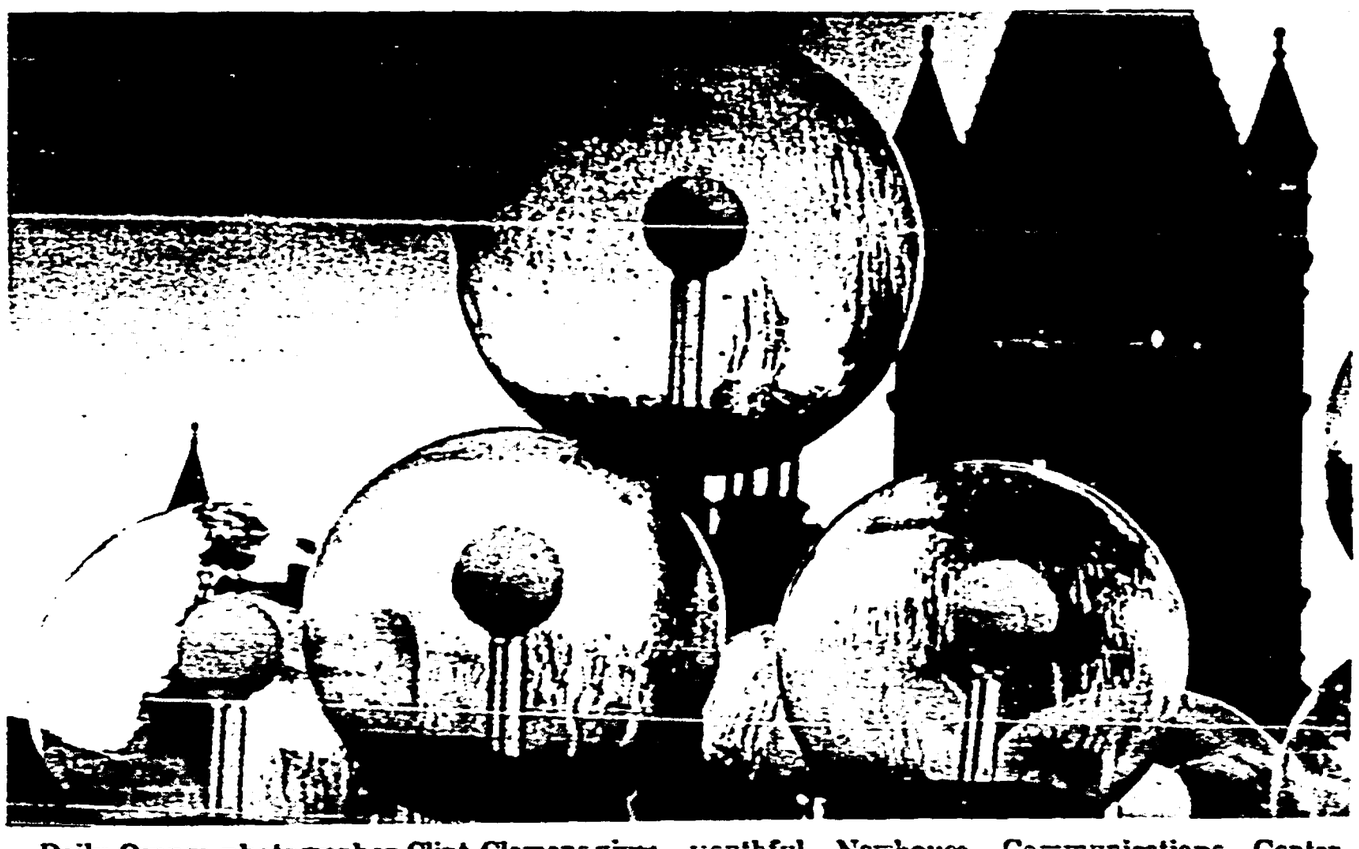
'Yugoslavs uniting behind new class'

Nenad D. Popovic, former chief economic minister in the Yugoslav Foreign Ministry, discussed political and economic life behind the Iron Curtain during yesterday's UU Bull Session.



The Maxwell School professor explained that power is the essential focus of the Communist system. A new class, composed of those at the top of the party system in Yugoslavia, is engaged in a dramatic struggle with the Party. He said these elites have attempted to use the Party as a tool in their own drive for power, and that the Yugoslavs are uniting behind them.

Popovic noted that this unity in Yugoslavia increases the likelihood of economic aid from the United States. He believes that aid in the early fifties went to stabilization of the Communist regime, as well as establishment of an economic base, and that Tito now will use the aid to strengthen his domestic power position.

Yugoslavia should be granted aid only if more freedom is given to pro-democratic forces, he said.

Popovic's recent book, "Yugoslavia: The New Class in Crisis," discussed the rise of this elite group of government officials who are allegedly using political and economic interests to further their own power. The book was denounced by the Yugoslav embassy in Washington.

Popovic said of the Czech situation that the Russians have a "gendarme" personality. The gendarme beats his wife because he doesn't know how to impress her with courtesy. The implication was that the Russians believe that political and economic pressures are ineffective, so they use force.

Vote on Nov. 5

A letter to the editor yesterday suggested burning absentee ballots as a protest to the lack of choice in this year's election. We too have wrestled with this issue.

Who wishes to cast his vote for Happy Hubie, apologist for the Johnson administration and advocate of current Vietnam policy?

And who wishes to cast his vote for Richard Nixon, the shallow tactician who won his nomination through reconciliation with the Southern Dixiecrats, who hasn't won a popular election without Eisenhower's apron strings for 15 years, and whose studied pose of self-confidince has touches of sham.

To vote for either major candidate is to violate one or another of the values many of us have cherished. On the other hand, what does it mean not to vote?

To not vote means one is giving up his most direct participation in his government. To not vote means one will be acted upon by the next president without having possessed any voice in whom that president should be. Such action could be justified only by proving there is no difference between Hubert Humphrey and Richard Nixon, that they are evils without the slightest distinction of merit between them.

We submit there are several obvious differences between Nixon and Humphrey. These differences can be perceived by reviewing the records and accomplishments of the two candidates. It can be perceived by examining their approach to problems and methods of solving them. Examining a candidate's record enables one to gain clues to how he thinks and reacts in crisis situations--his general frame of mind. Lastly, one can examine what is being said during the campaign.

But chances are he will find one to be closer to his own views on more than one issue. Before anyone can justify refusing to vote he must attempt to discover these distinctions.

The refusal to vote sometimes indicates intellectual slackness rather than a moral hang-up. Only when a voter is confident the two candidates represent evils of equal magnitude can he desist from voting.

And if the moral hang-up is genuine, for what day is the voter keeping himself uncompromised and pure that he cannot choose the lesser of two evils?

YOU CAN'T FOOL ME; I KNOW A COMMUNIST FRONT WHEN I SEE ONE.

Scholars?

To the Editor:

Abe Wagner in his comments on "student taught courses" makes some very good points as to the necessity of some extended scholarly training before one is to be permitted to "teach" at SU.

But it has been my experience at other universities that when very current or controversial or even never before incorporated material is being dealt with in a course it is often those people most closely involved with the subject area — irregardless of their "academic training" — who are most capable of engaging those "taught" in that intellectual dialogue which comes closest to the "true" prupose of a liberal education. Often the "traditionally" trained scholar, because of the limitations that tradition sets on him, cannot help but stamp out the spark which would have made the course both engaging and relevant.

Litter

To the Editor:

I was interested by your complaint last week about the littering problem because I am, I confess, a person who does litter now and then. When I first arrived here in September, I noticed that the grounds have a tendency to collect paper and such and "deplored the situation," but when I first had an empty paper cup to throw away en route to class, I really could find nowhere to throw ti except the ground. Oh, I could have carried it with me until I returned to the dorm, and I know now that there is a waste-paper basket in front of Maxwell; but I am, I confess, slightly lazy.

A number of years ago, Maryland, from where I come, decided that she was spending simply too much money collecting litter and sunk a fair sum into trash cans which are now everywhere down there; collection costs dropped, and everyone is happier. Perhaps if someone were to put trash cans all around here, the results would be similar. It seems to me that increasing collection efforts as you suggested would not handle the problem as well as investing in an ounce of prevention.

Flag out

To the Editor:

Being relatively patriotic and unable to make any happy decision about today's Law and Order candidates I was only mildly pleased to see that dissent has arisen in the ranks of the AFROTC. As I wandered past the flag poles in front of Hendricks Chapel tonight at 9:30 p.m. I was greeted by the sight of our flag still flapping wetly up its pole. It is not that I hold the flag in any great respect over others, but it is still a colorful tapestry and it seems a shame to have left it out in the rain and up a "tree" without the proper lighting called for by the law and by artistic taste.

The flag remained out throughout Sunday night in the rain, unlighted, neglected.

Bazooka recruits

Gum in the works

By Bob Tembeckjian

Upon hearing the news that the administration was allowing the Bazooka Bubble Gum Company to recruit on campus, 15,000 graduate and undergraduate students staged a spontaneous walkout, demonstrating their dissatisfaction. Immediate attempts to reach a compromise failed, as student leaders and administrators spent an entire weekend of fruitless negotiations at Pinebrook. Even Dr. Michael O. Sawyer was heard to admit, "Things look bleak-almost as bleak as the Democratic Party."

In face of the walkout, all university classes were totally empty on Monday. Student leaders issued a statement that morning declaring that the protest was held because "the very word Bazooka undermines the American system of values."

The Chancellor, resorting to extreme measures, declared that anyone who did not return to class on Tuesday would be expelled. When classes were again empty the next day, the administration announced that Rule One had been invoked upon the entire student body.

As a direct result, the Student Senate felt moved to meet in emergency session Tuesday night, declaring unanimously that a student investigation of the situation should be held. The resolution went entirely unnoticed.

The Student Court, attempting to assert its legal authority to hear all expulsion cases, was denied that right by the university and invoked its suicide clause.

Despite the removal of the entire student body, the students remained in their residence halls. The university, in a bold move, shut off all gas, water and electricity in the dormitories, hoping to force the occupants out of the cold rooms into warm classes.

At the insistence of Student Government President Huck Chicks however, no one moved. "We've got to do our thing, that's all. Staying here is doing our thing. Peace."

Attempting to grab the offensive, a group of 75 administrators swiftly took control of Watson Dormitory and staged a sit-in. However, forgetting that the heat had been turned off, the administrators slowly began to freeze. Students formed a ring around the building, making it impossible for the administrators to leave and forcing them to use Food Service. The betting ran high as to whether they would succumb from the effects of the cold or the food.

At this stage the entire world realized the crisis that existed.

President Johnson seized the political initiative by declaring this government's intention to honor all committments to Syracuse University. To this end, he placed three divisions of the United States Marines on emergency call.

Vice President Humphrey began defending the administration's policy two hours before it had been reached.

Senator Eugene McCarthy attacked the President, saying the American committment was to the people and students of Syracuse, not a handful of undemocratically appointed rulers. He urged a unilateral withdrawal of all elements, seeking a negotiated peace.

George Wallace attacked the pseudo-intellectuals he charged were outside agitators, announcing his intention to drive to Syracuse and run down any hippies in his way, calling the hole thing a Communist conspiracy.

Wallace's running mate, General Curtis LeMay, advocated the immediate bombing of all strategic student gathering places, naming as targets the Orange, HBC, and the Quad. LeMay also made clear that an infiltration route from the Mount, north of the Physics Building, must be destroyed.

U Thant attempted to call an emergency session of the Security Council.

Richard Nixon refused to comment, stating that anything he might say could jeopardize the possibilities of a peaceful settlement. An aide of the candidate, however, was quoted as saying that Mr. Nixon had long suspected the university administration of being "soft on communism."

U Thant again tried to call together the Security Council.

General Dwight Eisenhower, summarizing the situation precisely, said at his Gettysburg address: "Well, I would think that I would hope that in spite of all the confusion that perhaps you might recall that I went to West Point. Ugh, yes. When you consider that, when you consider I was President, when you consider my military and diplomatic background, when you consider my background from Abilene, Kansas - if you consider all this, I'm sure that, yes, you'll agree with my position."

U Thant still tried to call together the Security Council.

Fortunately, the problem was inadvertently solved when the three presidential candidates, most notably Mr. Nixon, put together all the hot air at their command and created a massive Bazooka bubble, gumming up the works at the industry's major factory and thus necessitating the cancellation of all campus recruitment. Classes resumed the following day as U Thant was still trying to call the Security Council into emergency session.

Students on tenure committee suggested

Joey Edwardh, a representative from the Council on Student Life, said, "It was an informing experience in the sense that you were able to exchange ideas with fellow student leaders and faculty members. This Pinebrook was particularly beneficial because it dealt with academics and the role of students in controlling their own affairs."

In the past, the conference topics have been concerned with social problems, while this year's weekend dealt only with the academics.

In this mode Dr. Thomas Green, professor of education and director of the Educational Policy Research Center said he was impressed to see students are paying attention to the problems of academic affairs rather than the customary concerns.

One of the ideas presented at Pinebrook was to have students participate in the committee on tenure. Dr. Peter T. Marsh, chairman of the history department, served as the co-chairman of the curriculum committee at Pinebrook and commented on this idea.

"I think if I were to select the most interesting suggestion the entire committee liked in particular it would be the idea that students be members of the tenure committee," he said.

He feels there will be probably repercussions when this idea is presented but that does not make the idea less interesting.

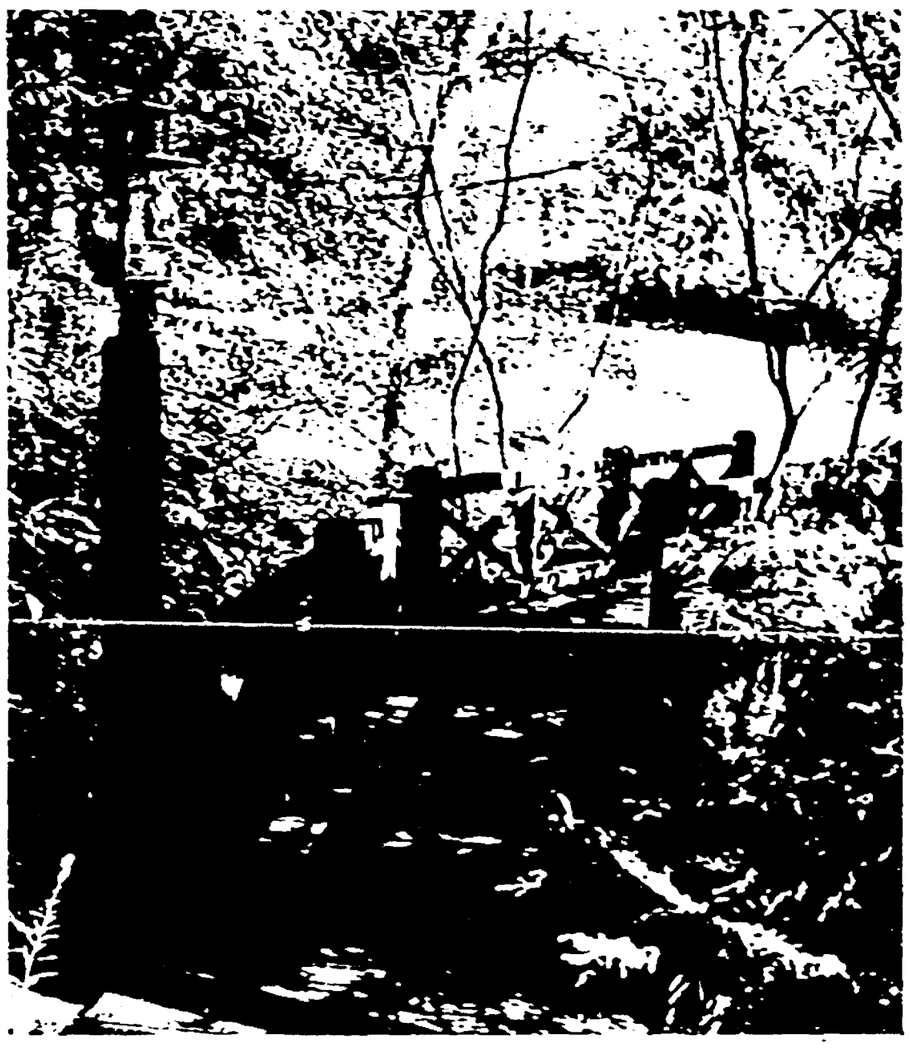
Carol Valmy, who was a member of the educational innovation committee, was pleased with the change of topic at Pinebrook. She said, "The professors have come more than half the way. Students don't know how much the faculty is doing for them."

"I was encouraged to see Pinebrook's idealism was tempered with reality," said Peg Johnston, president of the Inter-Dormitory Council. She continued, "I was discouraged, on the other hand, by the lack of structures to implement the proposals that were presented."

Jeff Portnoy, vice-president of Student Government, feels the most important thing that happened at Pinebrook was "People were able to learn about others and not in the social way when people have to play their roles. The topics were secondary."

Another student who attended the conference feels the ideas that were made are good ones but she has serious doubts about how they will be accomplished.

Dr. Michael O. Sawyer made two comments on Pinebrook.



"Speaking as an institution it was the best Pinebrook I've ever attended. Although the others were good, a most important thing was talked about this year--what learning goes on at Syracuse."

"A great many ideas came out of the conference," continued Sawyer. "There is a great risk, however, that everyone will feel let down if the world is not different next week. Some priorities should be set in putting the ideas into effect."

Speaker of Student Senate. Ed Feldman, said he had heard about the spirit of Pinebrook Conferences before he attended. "I thought it wasn't true and that there could never be an atmosphere where students could talk on an equal plane with faculty members and administrators."

He continued, "It's good to look into the future and dream, but things should also be put into effect and get the ideas passed."

Reports from the individual committes were turned in yesterday, and according to Chuck Hicks, president of Student Government, the Pinebrook Report should be ready by November 1.

Debating team victorious in international tourney

Both branches of the Syracuse University Debate Team met success in tournaments last weekend.

The Syracuse Parliamentary team defeated the Royal Military College at Kingston in the final round of the Sir George Williams University International Debating Tournament in Montreal.

The negative team of Robert Vitello and Arthur Nacht were undefeated in the tournament while Frank Mauro and Bruce Petito lost only one decision. The Nacht-Vitello unit came up with near-perfect scores on four rounds. Syracuse brought home the team trophy, and Vitello won the top speaker award.

Syracuse defeated Harvard, Boston College, Buffalo, and Canadian powers Royal Military College, McGill, and Sir George Williams. This makes two straight tournament victories for the parliamentary team, the first coming a week ago with Arthur Nacht taking first place at Ithaca.

While the parliamentary team was winning in Montreal, the intercollegiate team travelled to Philadelphia for the Rosemont College Invitational Debate Tournament. Chuck Dworkin and Bob Putnam won all their debates, finished as the first place negative team and led Syracuse to an overall fourth place finish.

Dworkin and Putnam met and defeated the University of Pennsylvania, Drexel Institute, William and Mary, West Chester College, and MIT.

Debate

The Debate Union will be sponsoring a debate Thursday at 7:30 p.m. in Maxwell Auditorium, with Professor Dale Tussing, who is currently a candidate for Congress. The topic will be: "Resolved: That neither major political party has offered a meaningful choice in 1968." Professor Tussing will be debating on the affirmative side with Miss Joan Howard of the Freedom & Peace Party. Debating on the negative side will be Robert Putnam, the President of the Debate Union, and Arthur Nacht, former President of the Debate Union. At the conclusion of the debate members of the audience will be allowed to comment on the positions taken by the debaters. The debate will begin at 7:30 p.m. All are welcome to attend.

Height of Fashion.

You could see them on the streets of New York.

Men, women—even children.

It was the height of fashion in the garment industry in those days to carry home huge bundles of work.

And that was after a full day of work!

A day off? There was no such thing. At that time.

Work pursued employees around the clock—at home or in the shop.

Happily, times have changed.

Garment workers can now enjoy their homes, paid holidays and vacations, their families and friends.

Seems like a million years ago —the era of the seven-day week and the $5 weekly paycheck.

Today, we 450,000 members of the ILGWU—80% of us women—have achieved security, fair wages, decent working conditions, the dignity of a voice in our conditions of employment and a position of respect in our communities.

This progress has helped raise standards of working and living throughout the entire community as well as the nation itself.

The ILGWU label, sewn into ladies' and children's garments, is our signature. Look for it the next time you shop.

It is your guarantee that the clothing you buy was made by skilled craftsmen in a shop reflecting the best American standards and traditions.

If you'd like some interesting (and brief) reading plus many fascinating historic pictures, send for our 64-page publication entitled "Signature of 450,000."

Many questions asked

Progress of parietal hours dampened

By HELENE MACDONALD
Associate Editor

The progress of parietal hours, now being investigated by standing committee No. 3 of the Council on Student Life, has been hindered by questions of the jurisdiction of the committee and the scope of the experiment.

Unlike the other two standing committees of CSL, committee No. 3 was not established with the presupposition that a major policy change would take place. Therefore the committee does not have the power to act on the petitions for parietal hours it has received.

CSL had assumed that all living centers could be involved in the parietal hours experiment which would take place for a specified length of time, for example, a semester.

However, the administration thought that about 20 per cent of the residences in each category (small, medium, large, fraternity, etc.) should be involved in the experiment.

The minutes of the first meeting of committee No. 3 stated that the committee's purpose is to "review and process petitions from living centers requesting visiting hours privileges."

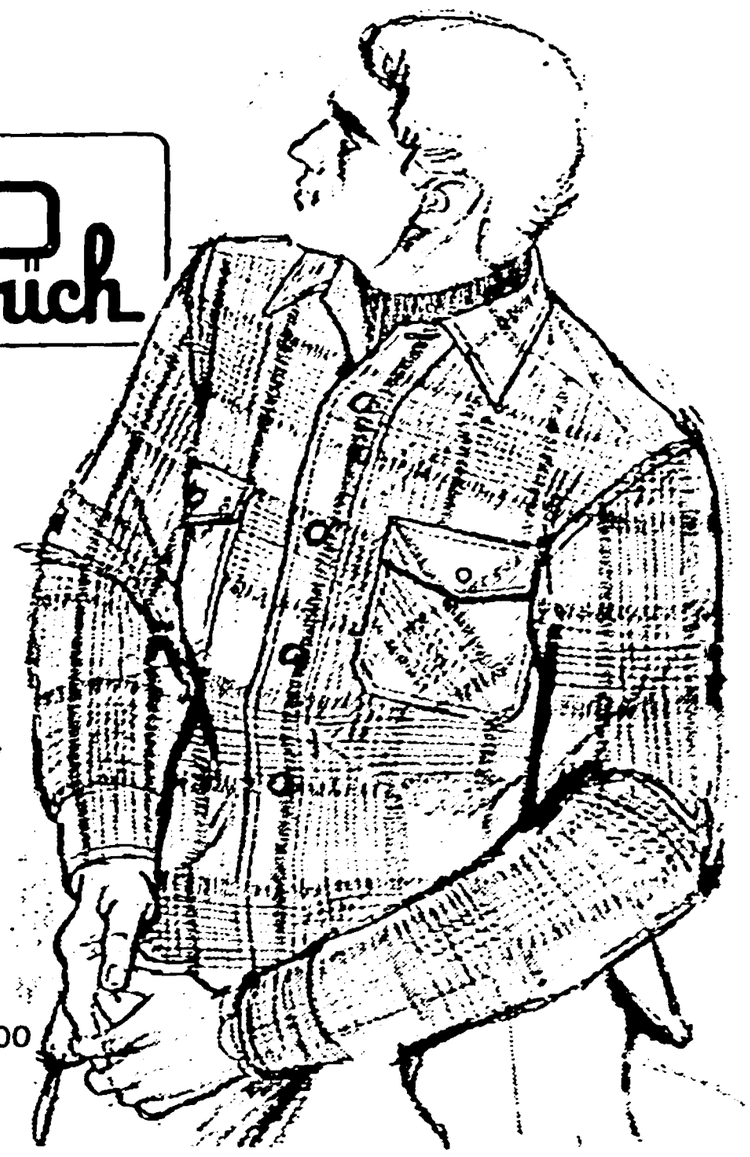
However, at the second meeting of the standing committee there was considerable discussion that 1) the committee hadn't been issued authority by CSL to investigate a major policy change with regard to dormitory visiting hours and 2) the scope of the experiment had not been defined.

Such a limitation would make committee No. 3's job, if it is given power to act on petitions for parietal hours, more difficult because five women's cottages, two men's large dorms and a fraternity have already submitted proposals for parietal hours.

There is also a dichotomy of opinion about how open dorms would be used, i.e., sex or studying. Some members of the committee are skeptical about the purposes of visiting hours.

The jurisdiction question will be discussed and acted on at Friday afternoon's CSL meeting. Standing committee No. 3 meets Monday and if it has the power to set up and administer experimental parietal hours, it can go ahead and begin approving the proposals and set up criteria for evaluating the experiment.

The committee consists of Dean of Women Marjorie C. Smith; Dean John McCombe; Dean of Men David Tatham; Dr. Benjamin P. Burtt of the chemistry department; Cindy Bailey, AWS president; Sally Clonninger, Panhellenic president; Peg Johnston, Inter-dormitory Council president; and Bob Kelley, Inter-fraternity Council president.



Several student members of the committee have received a duplicated page with no accompanying explanation or letter in an envelope with the return address, "The office of the Chancellor."

The students have been told that it is an excerpt from a speech given by Chancellor Tolley opposing open dormitories.

The excerpt reads in part, "I have felt that open dormitories would not contribute in a constructive way to the climate of our own institution or to the healthy self-development of the individual. . ."

It also says that a college can protect the student from his own impulses and society's wrong influences.

We encourage job-hopping. We do try to keep it intramural—within Du Pont that is—and we do have a more formal title for it, "planned mobility."

Saylor Gilbert, CH.E., V.P.I., 1962, tells it like it is.

It only means we don't put you in a training program. We put you in growth jobs—to help you get to the top of your field the way you want to get there.

"Take a good look around you, and you'll see people at Du Pont who've had a lot of movement through very different kinds of jobs. There's no doubt that this diverse experience helps you. For example, I had four assignments concerned with different aspects of polymerizing, casting, stretching and finishing our polyester film base."

"Having had all this, I feel I was better prepared for my present position of training supervisor. But aside from the fact that variety can help you, I believe most people just like a change after working at one job for a period of time."

Your Du Pont recruiter will be a guy like Saylor. Ask him about planned mobility—or anything else you'd like to know about Du Pont. Mailing the coupon is the surest way to get in touch with him.

In Switzerland politics is a personal thing

This is the third of a series of articles on the observations of DO reporter Rami Khouri, who spent the summer travelling in Europe and particularly in Switzerland, where he has spent much of his life.

By RAMI KHOURI

As I continued my search for the Swiss political life, I learned many new things. In time I found myself trying to learn all other aspects of Swiss life, but I continued looking for the mad socialists who wanted to bury me, the ardent conservatives and any free democrats available.

I quickly found it a great asset to openly proclaim my admiration of free enterprise and capitalism, as that led me to many people, and more discussions. Drunk one night with my friends (psychedelic fellows, some of them, who thought me as crazy as I thought them) I found Vietnam to be a fine conversation piece. And I soon learned the small tricks which could be used to start heated debates. I was to always wear the most obnoxious madras clothes I could find, never obey signs, habitually take on the air of a soul brother on buses, and always yell when people were around. In short, I found it useful to play tourist.

And, in time again, I found what I was looking for: that the Swiss political life was not to be found in open air rallys or mass demonstrations; that a political viewpoint was always to be gotten from papers; and that if anyone had any new thoughts, he never voiced them from a soapbox or podium.

Certainly, the Swiss had opinions about their government. They were definately politically oriented, if only likeing or not liking the train service (they all loved it). But they did not find it proper to drag their messages through the streets as if they wanted to impose their ways upon the others.

A Swiss believes that a political ideology is a personal thing, to be discussed with close friends, and usually never in the presence of children. But, again, political parties need mass support, and this is where the street walker is confronted. "Vote for Change, Vote Radical" read a few of the posters on the walls. "Stability", cry the conservative appeals. "Revolution" sing the students in their leaflets.

This is where the necessities of politics were allowed to bloom, and only here, on posters and leaflets.

Those who actually went to the people in the streets, those who took their causes to the pelple, were admitting their fanaticism, such a label would inevitebly be equated with weakness. For the Swiss cherish their hold on reason and sanity. And, in effect, that person who must practice his fanaticism is always found to be much more concerned with simply doing something, anything, than doing it well.

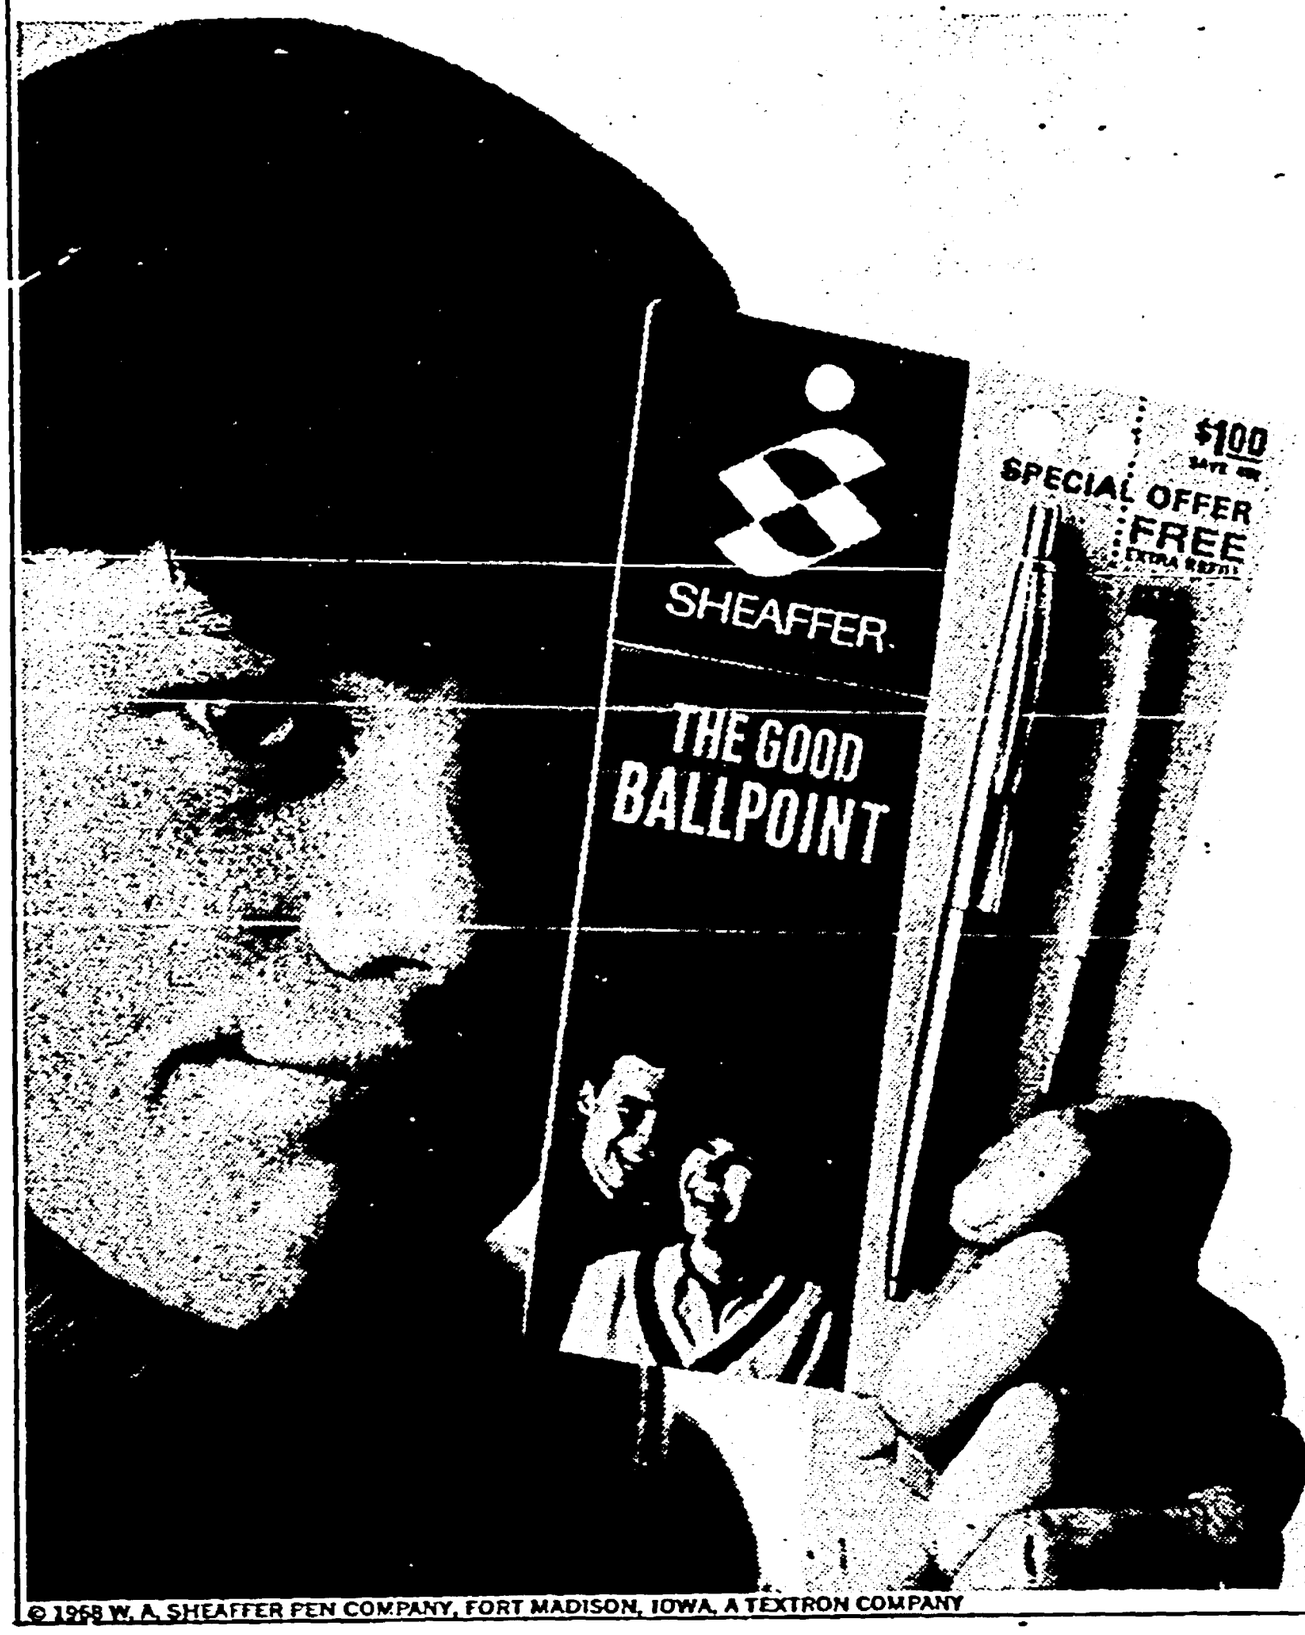
For this reason the papers ask if the American society is sick, if indeed the learning processes have been compromised for simply the working processes.

Everything in Switzerland must be proper, this goes for politics as well. Youth only have anti-Vietnam demonstrations on the 4th of July, and papers only attack or simply question the sanity of American society after an assassination or riots. Here is to be found a people that appreciates the value of the power to reason. "Let's talk it over a fondue dinner," or, "Let's have a bottle of wine to discuss that over" is the Swiss reply to accusations.

Call them Communists, old conservative fools, dreaming Marxists, or anything else, and the only reply you will ever get in public is a slight look of amazement and a quickly turned back. Of course the next day's papers will never let you forget it: indeed, they would like to very much forget you.

And so after much hunting, I finally discovered where all the people I was looking for were. I discovered my Marxists, Socialists, Aristocrats, Bourgeois and Democrats. I would now return to the normal life of looking for parties, assisting young girl tourists, bringing my friends to the United Nations, and generally trying to stay alive and sane in the streets.

But then it started again, and all with such a small incident. An old lady, old in Geneva being somewhere around 150, accidently walked into me and dropped her afternoon's shopping on one of Geneva's busiest corners. With a flurry of rather diplomatic obscenities, I was told that I was not really appreciated.



The woman actually hated me, and she did not know me. And this was the question I would pursue next, why the Swiss detest Americans and anything that has to do with America. In fact, I would soon learn to hate that woman, and with more reason than she ever had to hate me.

Prototype of Peace Corps

URC may append Crossroads program

By MARK MASTERSON

University Religious Council (URC), the coordinating tool of Hendricks's Chapel Organization, may add an off-campus program to its now extensive operation of religious, social and cultural affairs on campus.

The local chapter of Operation Crossroads Africa (OCA), a national organization, has asked to be made a standing-committee of URC. News of the request was presented Tuesday at the bi-weekly business meeting of URC. Council committeemen will vote next Tuesday whether to honor the request.

Operation Crossroads Africa was started in 1957 by Dr. James Robinson, minister of the Church of the Master in New York City who has delivered sermons at Hendrick's Chapel in past years. The prototype of the Peace Corps begun in 1961, Operation Crossroads lends the talents of student volunteers to developing African nations. Each summer about three students from the Syracuse chapter OCA offer their services upon request.

OCA, Syracuse chapter, is a relatively small organization and needs underwriting from a larger body. If admitted, it would automatically be linked to the financial and human resources of URC.

URC is presently organizing ways for raising an estimated $1,000 to pay for training manuals and text books used in Project '70. The money is expected to come from the various fellowships and ministries attached to URC.

Also in the planning stages is a Christmas choir concert Dec. 14 at Hendrick's Chapel for handicapped and underprivileged children in Syracuse. The concert will be part of the annual children's Christmas party sponsored by Phi Chapter of Alpha Omega National Fraternity.

The 5 billion dollar corporation you probably never heard of.

Funny how big you can get and still remain virtually anonymous.

Somehow we've managed to do it.

We're a group of over 60 companies, making everything from microwave integrated circuits to color television. And we rank number 9 in the top 500 corporations in the nation.

Pretty hot stuff for a nobody.

But though you may not recognize our name, maybe the name Sylvania rings a bell.

It's one of our companies.

You may even live in one of our telephone company areas. We operate in 33 states.

So here we are, 5 billion dollars strong, growing all over the place, and looking for engineers and scientists to grow with us.

Why don't you think us over with your Placement Director.

Incidentally, we're known in the communications field as General Telephone & Electronics.

Pssst.

Pass it on.

Art display

New sculpture, paintings, woodcuts shown with faculty work

'Major work'

Antoine Bourdelle's "Herakles," on display outside the entrance of the Joe and Emily Lowe Art Center, was recently acquired for the SU collection. It has been called one of his major works.

An Antoine Bourdelle sculpture and paintings by Willem de Kooning and William Gropper are on display at the Joe and Emily Lowe Art Center during the 1968 faculty art show, which continues until Nov. 11. These and other works were recently acquired for the Syracuse University collection.

Bourdelle's "Herakles," done in 1909, is outside the entrance of the art center. Laurence Schmeckebier, dean of the School of Art, said, "This was the last available cast of this world-famous figure. It is the gift of publisher S.I. Newhouse and comes directly from the Bourdelle estate in France. Another cast is in the Metropolitan Museum of Art."

Bourdelle modeled "Herakles" -- Greek for Hercules -- as a nude archer. "Without question the 'Herakles' is one of Bourdelle's major works," Schmeckebier said. "Bourdelle belongs with Mestrovic, Zorach, Barlach, Milles and Maillol as the great masters of early twentieth century sculpture." Four years ago the S.U. collection acquired one of Bourdelle's series of Beethoven studies, "A Tragic Mask," done in 1901. A copy of that work is in the Museum of Modern Art.

The de Kooning painting "Weill Plaza" was done in 1964. It is one of the "woman series" that the artist has been developing since the late 1950s.

The work of the Dutch painter, who has exhibited in the United States since 1936, is in all important collections. "Our painting is particularly significant in that it expresses the artist's individual reaction to the model as a violent, aggressive, brusque attack," Schmeckbier said. "The paint is hurled on the canvas with a loaded brush 'trailing meteroic drips and splashes.'

"Along with Mark Rothko, Robert Motherwell, Jackson Pollack, Franz Kline and Adolph Gottlieb, de Kooning is one of the leaders of abstract expressionism."

William Gropper has given his painting "The Boatman" to the University collection. The 70-year-old American artist, whose studio is in Westchester County, is still working and exhibiting. The Lowe Art Center will present a major retrospective exhibition of Gropper's works in November.

The Syracuse University collection has acquried another painting by William Palmer, director of the art school of the Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute in Utica. It is "Expanding Landscape," described by Schmeckebier as one of the most typical and important of Palmer's more recent paintings.

Several woodcuts by the young Chilean artist Santos Chavez were also acquired recently. "Pajaro Planeta," done this year, is on display. "It reflects the weird mystery of interplanetary flight as expressed by this highly original contemporary artist," Schmeckebier said.

Created for the Creative Designer... an Engineering Masters Fellowship Program

Are you content to understand the technical aspects of a problem? Or, are you impelled to go on and create a design that solves the problem? If you're the latter type, Grumman invites you to investigate its fellowship program. These Fellowships were established to give encouragement and financial assistance to engineering graduates, knowledgeable in the technical disciplines, with an aptitude for reducing ideas to practice. Specifically, this is an opportunity for people with creative abilities who are interested in applying their talents to design usable hardware, as opposed to careers in pure analysis or research.

Grumman, a high technology company producing a wide range of systems, annually awards 20 Fellowships for work toward Masters Degrees in Engineering. These are divided equally between members of the year's graduating class and company employees.

THE PROGRAM

The Program combines work and study. The Fellows work 24 hours per week during the school year and full-time—40 hours—during the summer. A Fellow is expected to carry a school load of one-half the full-time program, so as to complete his Masters Degree in two years. For the hours worked, the Fellows are compensated at rates consistent with regular employees of comparable education and experience, and they participate completely in full normal employee benefits, including fully paid medical plan and insurance. In addition, a Fellow receives a stipend of $1,000 per year plus $500 for each dependent (spouse and children), full tuition, fees and books. This package has an annual value of between $10,750 and $13,000. The Fellowships are granted for one year and will be renewed for a second upon satisfactory completion of the 12-month work/study plan.

THE APPLICATION

If you aspire to a career of creative design and can meet entrance requirements to graduate school, clip and mail the coupon below now. Completed application forms must reach us by March 1, 1969. All the Fellowships will be awarded by March 31, 1969.

I Wish I Knew a Woman

I wish I knew a woman who was like a red fire on the hearth glowing after the day's restless draughts.

So that one could draw near her in the red stillness of the dusk and really take delight in her without having to make the polite effort of loving her or the mental effort of making her acquaintance.
Without having to take a chill, talking to her.

California will show Orange some top-flight personnel

By LARRY CENTER

Last season Syracuse managed to beat the California Bears, 20-14, in a game whose outcome was in doubt up to the final gun. Although Larry Csonka carried the ball 35 times for 204 yards, the Orange only pulled it out by scoring on a 22-yard Cassata-to-Csonka pass with 1:22 remaining, and then stopping a Cal drive near the SU end zone.

That California team ended the year 5-5, and this year's squad, already 4-1, promises to be a lot tougher. The Bear defense has allowed five opponents just 32 points, second best in the country, and leads the Pacific-Eight Conference in total and rushing defense.

The leader of this unit is junior defensive guard Ed White, 6-3, 250, whom Cal coach Ray Willsey calls "the best lineman we've had in years. He has size, quickness and speed. White has always been able to locate the ball first and then worry about shedding blockers. Not many youngsters can do that."

White's talent really became apparent in last year's Cal-USC game, when he played opposite Ron Yary, the first pick in the AFL-NFL collegiate draft. On that day, White made 21 tackles and, said Cal line coach Bill Dutton, "Yary hadn't blocked him yet."

Other outstanding Bears on defense are safety Ken Wiedemann and linebacker Dennis Pitta. Pitta came to Cal last year from Modesto JC, where he was an All-Conference selection. He got a starting chance when a first-stringer was injured and kept getting better as the season progressed.

Wiedemann has a history of being ball-conscious. He intercepted five passes in five frosh games in 1966 and last year, All-Coast as a soph, grabbed off six to tie for the conference lead. This season he already has six more, including three last week against UCLA. SU coach Joe Szombathy says he "makes all the key plays."

Cal's offense also boasts several fine players, including the leader of the unit, junior quarterback Randy Humphries, who has taken over from senior Barry Bronk. Bronk started here in last year's game.

Humphries first started against USC last year, and guided the Bears to decisive year-end victories over San Jose and Stanford. Szombathy says he's "greatly improved over last year. He is a fine long passer who can throw the ball 60 yards and also throw the rollout pass well. Last Saturday he ran real hard on the option."

Now starting at wingback is speedy Paul Williams, who has been switched from tailback to make better use of his deep receiving ability. Last year Williams led the Bears in rushing, punt and kickoff returns. Part of his 432 yards rushing was 116 in 13 carries here, including a 63-yarder.

Coach Ben Schwartzwalder says, "When Williams is inside, you must defend against the reverse. He didn't drop a pass Saturday, although he dropped a lot against Army," in the game Cal lost, 10-7. Szombathy says "he is the boy you've got to stop."

Alternating at tailback are Gary Fowler and soph Bob Darby. Besides being a good runner, Fowler is a fine punter and receiver. In '67 he averaged over 40 yards per kick in the final seven games, and caught 18 passes for 226 yards. He scored both Cal tds here last year.

Darby, last year's "most valuable freshman," set a frosh rushing record in netting 438 yards in four games for a 6.54 average and five td's. He also has fine hands and is a good blocker.

The Orangemen will be in for a tough afternoon Saturday, but they plan to hold a "student demonstration" of their own that will send them higher up in the national ratings.

Ben's backfield blossoms with its 'Bolt' from the blue

By BOB GALLAGHER

From his tailback position in the Syracuse backfield's "I" formation, flashy John Godbolt strikes the line as quick as lightning and bolts into tacklers as hard as thunder.

A team is in the "I" formation when the offensive backfield has the quarterback, fullback and one of the halfbacks called a tailback lined up one behind the other, with the other halfback, called a wingback, split off a few yards to either side. In this formation the tailback stands with his hands on his knees, rather than in a three point stance like everybody else except the quarterback.

The "I" formation has two major advantages, Godbolt feels. "First of all," he said, "it gives me the proper depth for flare passes and the option so that I have a better chance to beat the linebacker. If I'm not deep enough when I get the pitchout the play won't turn the corner." He continued, "You can see the blocking a lot better from tailback and this helps determine when and where to cut."

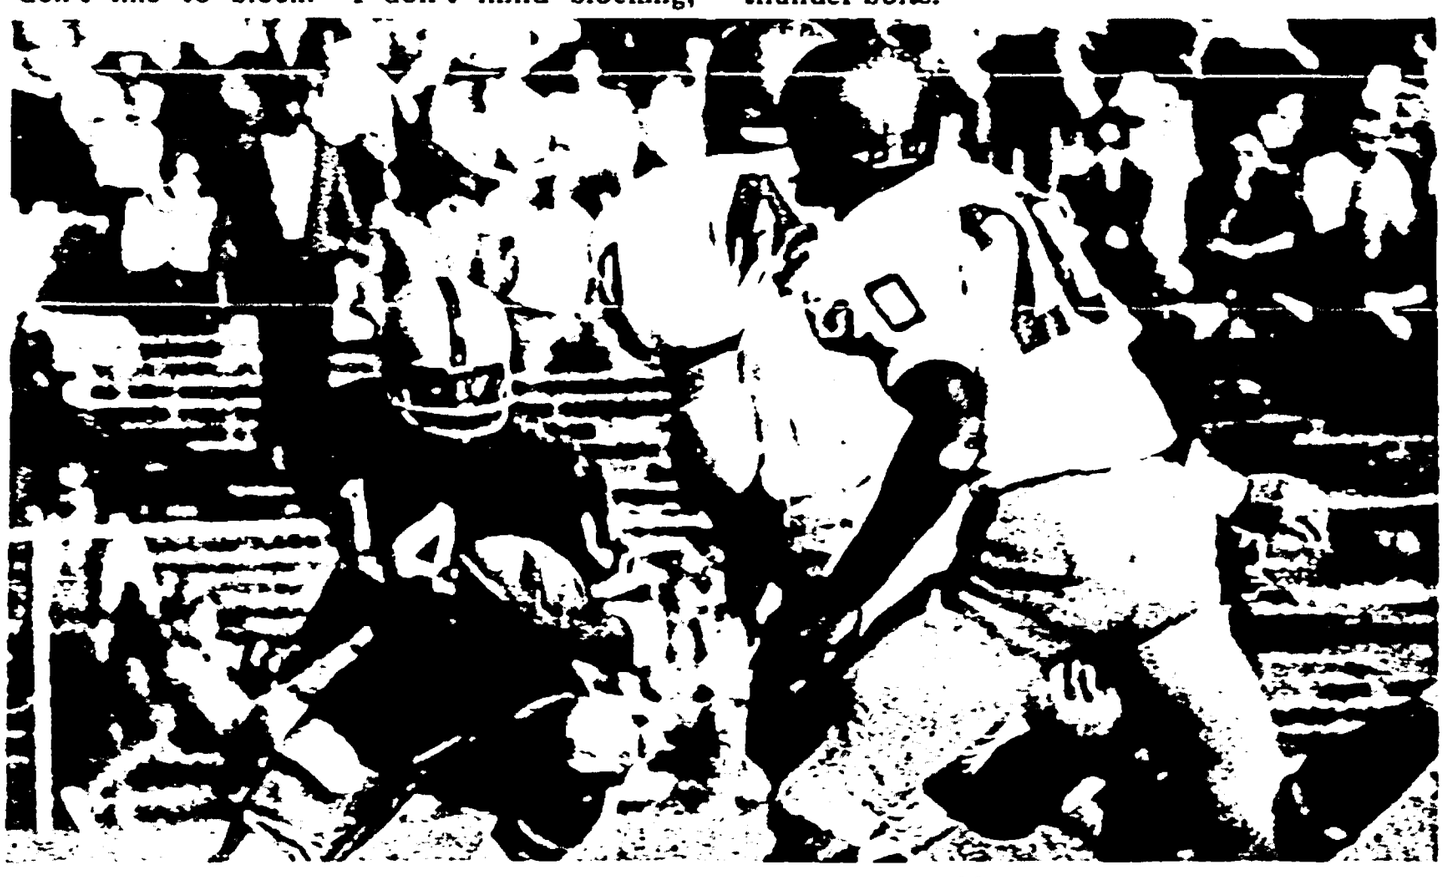
When running inside, Godbolt says, "You run toward the point of attack rather than right at the hole. This is where the blocker is. Then you cut to where the daylight develops," he said.

Godbolt prefers to run the sweep to the outside rather than running inside. "On the sweep," he said, "I'm able to move and set up my blockers."

As a tailback Godbolt is also called on to do some pass receiving. He said, "Most of my patterns are for the short gain of eight or nine yards but sometimes I run deep pass routes."

Blocking makes an offense go. Many backs don't like to block. "I don't mind blocking," Godbolt said. "I'm not to effective at it now but I'm trying to improve," he added.

Godbolt faces stiff competition from Ron Trask for the tailback spot. Trask opened the season at tailback, was injured, lost the job to Godbolt and has been trying to win it back ever since. "With Trask pressing me all the time it gives me an inspiration to play well and not make any mistakes."



Besides ability to catch passes and blocking technique, Godbolt feels peripheral vision and adequate speed are important. He runs the hundred in 9.7. "You need speed and especially good acceleration once you get past the line of scrimmage," Godbolt said.

The running game has improved steadily so far this season. Godbolt feels it is because of "the strong passing threat and also because the offensive line is made up of men that do the job."

It is difficult to establish a running game against anybody, and the opponent this week, California, will be no exception. None of its opponents has scored on the ground against them this year. "We can run against them," Godbolt says, "if our linemen open up the holes and the backs run hard."

Godbolt thinks the game at Berkeley is the most important game of the season thus far. "With our number 10 ranking in the polls, we have received a measure of prestige and recognition. We're not about to give that up," he said.

Orange fans hope that after this Saturday's game the California Bears will think they were hit by a hurricane after Godbolt's lightning strikes and thunder bolts.

QUICK BOLT. John Godbolt, the speedy sophomore from Bridgeport, Conn., stepped into the tailback slot in the second game of the season, and has not stopped running since. He, along with Al Newton, Ron Trask, Bill Knox and Mike Chlebeck, form a great crop of soph runners. (Photo by Biggar)

Football school?

By ED AGRANOWITZ

This week Syracuse pushed its way into the top ten in the national football polls. The Orange are now riding in fast company and rubbing elbows with the big boys -- Southern Cal, Notre Dame, Purdue. These are the football schools, who send endless players to the pros and who are prominent on the national scene every year.

Is Syracuse a football school? The coaches will readily admit that there is not as much talent at their disposal as there is at other "football schools." Earlier in the year, coach Ben Schwartzwalder commented, "As far as recruiting is concerned, we're just a one horse outfit in the big time operation."

The Orange rating is a lofty one at the moment because of an excellent job being done by Ben and his aides, and because of the tremendous spirit and determination of the players.

The one thing that seems to be lacking in the football picture on the Hill is the support of the fans. It is true that the spectators turn out in large numbers for the home games, but just showing up does not mean they are really behind your team. Aside from the orientation week affairs, when was the last pep rally? And when did the Archbold goal posts ever come down after a big win?

Friday morning the Orangemen will fly to California for a game that will very probably decide SU's bowl status. "If we beat California, we'll go south, it's as simple as that," says SU safety Cliff Ensley, "but they're the toughest team we've faced yet -- this game is our whole season."

California is rated 11th and 13th in the polls, beat the daylights out of UCLA, and would be a Top Ten team if it weren't for a 10-7 upset loss to Army. They are slim favorites to win Saturday in their own backyard. The only encouragement the Orangemen will get will come from our 10 cheerleaders, who will make the trip.

It has been said that fans only follow and support a winner. This year the Hill could have a real big winner. "We've never had any pep rallies of any consequence for big games before," says Ensley, "but it would be a great thing for the team. The guys would really appreciate it."

Tonight, the Sadler Dorm Council, under the leadership of Bob Cline, will sponsor a pep rally at Hendricks Field, between Sadler and Lawrinson Halls. "We had to pull teeth to organize this thing," said Cline. "I hope we aren't disappointed by the turnout. The team deserves some backing."

The Syracuse Marching Band will kick off the festivities at about 7 p.m. on the Mount. They will parade around campus and arrive at Hendricks Field for the rally, which will start at 7:30. The cheerleaders and Goons will be on hand also.

The Orange will have their moment of truth this Saturday when they take the field at Berkeley. The Orange fans will have a chance to prove themselves tonight at Hendricks Field.

Captain Tony Kyasky has indicated that the team will attend the pep rally. Will the Syracuse fans let them down? Or is Syracuse really a football school?

An antiquated Rule One is modified

By RONI ZLOKOWER
Associate Editor

The right of arbitrary expulsion, once reserved to the administration by the university trustees in Rule One of the General University Regulations, no longer exists at S.U. An S.U. student may no longer be suspended from school by administrative officials without being given a reason or a chance to appeal his suspension.

Rule One, as stood before its modification read: "Attendance at the University is a privilege and not a right. The University reserves the right, and the student concedes the University the right, to require the withdrawl of any student at any time for any reason deemed sufficient to it, and no reason for requiring such withdrawl need be given."

While the University did have other means for punishing students for disciplinary, social, and academic reasons, Rule One, provided the administration with a right which denied a student information of charges, the right of counsel, and the right of self-defense. If university students were under the protection of both state and federal constitutions, then Rule One acted in direct violation to the concept of "due process" of the law.

Now stated in paragraph rather than in numbered form, the rules regarding student discipline do not give the administration the right of arbitrary expulsion. As printed in the 1968-69 Dates and Data, under Standards For Students, the rules read: "Attendence at the University is a privilege and not a right and the University may cancel a student's registration for any cause

Winning debators say election offers choice

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

Protest voting will dominate at the polls this November said Professor Dale Tussing last night to a sparse group in Maxwell Auditorium.

The Congressional candidate, who is running on the Liberal Party ticket, debated Robert Putnam, President of the Debate Union on the topic; "Resolved: That neither major political party has offered a meaningful choice in 1968."

Tussing debated for the affirmative with Miss Joan Howard of the Freedom and Peace Party. Putnam was accompanied by Frank Mauro for the negative side.

"In this election year it appears that all voters are casting protest votes," said Tussing. He added that votes cast for the Republican party indicate a protest against the present administration, rather than an endorsement of Nixon's qualifications. Citizens voting for Humphrey, however, are protesting the "dangers" of Nixon.

Wallace for nothing

Tussing limited himself to one brief remark concerning George Wallace, American Independent Party Presidential candidate, "Wallace voters are protesting everything..., and are for nothing."

Showing similarities between both major Presidential candates, Richard M. Nixon and Vice-President Hubert H. Humphrey, Tussing cited each candidate's political record on the anti-Communism campaign. He concluded, "Both have made obsessive anti-Communism the hallmark of their careers."

The affirmative speakers maintained that the 1968 Presidential campaign is "bereft of issues and ideas." Neither candidate will discuss the two main issues of the Vietnam war and Racism.

The negative side

Debating for the negative, Robert Putnam asserted that "This country is faced with a dichotomy in our citizenry." He illustrated "serious splits" within the country with examples of the Chicago and Columbia riots.

Putnam noted that Nixon's policy is "Law and Order" which differs from Humphrey's policy of "order and justice." Miss Howard, of the affirmative, later quoted, "Humphrey will put in jail after a trial, but Nixon will just out in jail."

Putnam pointed out differences between the records of Nixon and Humphrey. Nixon supports a tax cut, but he will also decrease government spending. Humphrey, however, supports the present taxing rate, or even an increase in order to supply more Federal aid to the urban poor.

Other differences

Humphrey's support of Abe Fortas' appointment to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court differs from Nixon's advocation of more strict constitutionalists on the Court. Also, Humphrey proposes a reform of the government welfare program; whereas Nixon "wants to get more people off the welfare roll."

Putnam also said Nixon opposes Vietnamese participation in a coalition government, but Humphrey favors it.

The similarities

Previously, Tussing showed similarities between the two Presidential candidates. Nixon was Vice-President and Humphrey is presently the No. 2 man in the country. Both have been "washed up" at one time and were cast out of the political picture: Nixon, after his gubernatorial race defeat in California; and Humphrey, after his lack of recognition at the 1960 Democratic National Convention. There, he opposed Johnson as a Vice-Presidential nominee.

Negative side wins

The audience vote at the conclusion of the debate bestowed victory on the negative speakers.

Statesman, educator of Philippines addresses SU Forestry convocation

Philppine's statesman-educator Carlos P. Romulo will speak at an all-college convocation at the State University College of Forestry at Syracuse University, Monday night at 6:30, in Hendricks Chapel. This will begin his tour of State University campuses under the University's Scholar-in-Residence program.

Gen. Romulo is well-known for his humor and story-telling ability in dealing with serious topics, and his address here will be open to the public. He will speak on "The Far East In World Affairs."

His two-day visit to Syracuse will include seminars and discussion with faculty, particularly those from the College of Forestry who served in his country with the AID project to help rebuild the University of the Philippines' College of Forestry.

Gen. Romulo, University of the Philippines president, first achieved international prominence as Gen. Douglas MacArthur's aide-de-camp in Bataan, Corregidor and Australia during World War II. He accompanied MacArthur and the liberating forces in the invasion of Leyte and in the recapture of Manila.

He was president of the Fourth General Assembly of the United Nations (1949—50), and was twice president of the U. N. Security Counsel in 1957. He was Ambassador to the United States from 1952 to 1953, and again from 1955 to 1962.

A Pulitzer prize recipient, Gen. Romulo is the author of 14 books dealing with educational change, economic progress and the war years in the Philippine Islands. He was formerly editor-in-chief and publisher of newspaper chains in Manila.

Gen. Romulo began his career teaching English at the University of the Philippines, and retains the title of University Professor as well as President of that institution. He is president of the Philippine Academy of Sciences and Humanities, and a Special Presidential Advisor on Foreign Affairs.

He has been awarded 56 honorary degrees by educational insittutions, the majority of which are in the U.S. But they include universities in Indonesia, Korea, Japan, Bangkok, India, and the Philippines.

Other honors include the First Annual Gold Medal awarded by World Government News; Gold Medal Award by the Woodrow Wilson Memorial Foundation of Princeton University; International Benjamin Franklin Society's Gold Medal; City of Manila Gold Medal Award.

Gen. Romulo's State University itinerary after leaving the College of Forestry follows: September 30-31, Geneseo, November 1, Fredonia; 4-5, Potsdam; 6-7, Plattsburgh; 7-8 Binghamton; 11-13, Oneonta; 14-15, International Center (Planting Fields); statutory colleges at Cornell University; 19-20, Alfred; and 21-22, Brockport.

Seven religions to unite in Chapel

By MARK MASTERSON

The Ecumenical Movement at SU will go into it's foremost phase Nov. 3 at Hendrick's Chapel when seven religious traditions — Buddist, Christian, Hindu, Jain, Jewish, Islamic and Sikh — unite for an hour long "celebration of man under God."

Society fails democratic processes

Cries abound that the democratic system isn't working this year. Neither Rockefeller nor McCarthy were nominated when public opinion polls showed that a majority of the American people wanted them as candidates. A hawk and a converted hawk were nominated when the nation wanted peace.

Such cries are misinterpretations of what has gone wrong. As Walter Lippmann said in A Preface to Politics, "Democracy has put an unfounded faith in automatic contrivances." We believe our federal government should operate according to a framework of mechanically automatic balances. But ever since 1887 we have been modifying that system of checks and balances. Public officials are expected to mechanically respond to the people as if elections, referendums, and recalls guarantee that these public officials will automatically safeguard the public interest.

It is not our democratic contrivances that have failed, however. Lyndon Johnson, Hubert Humphrey and Richard Nixon are the products not only of the democratic contrivances but also of the invisible government, the "establishment," the social systems in American society within which the machinery of democracy functions. The genuine government of society might be more accurately pinpointed within the political parties, the trade unions, the corporation managements, the financiers of Wall Street, and the professional organizations. (Is Mayor Lindsay of New York governing these groups or is he merely mediating their interests?)

These groupings are mainly social groupings bound not by mechanical contrivances but by friendship, interest, favoritism, patronage and habit.

Consequently when the complaint is sounded that democracy isn't working it is false. The democratic system is working in the same manner it always has. Nixon received the nomination mainly because of his loyalty to the party, his network of friends within it, and his leadership that conformed to its habits. Likewise Humphrey.

President Johnson would normally have had little trouble engineering his renomination. The challenge to him by Senators McCarthy and Kennedy succeeded only because the dominant social system was fragmenting.

What can we say for the society and its social systems if it produces a Johnson, a Humphrey, and a Nixon? Other than it used to provide a satisfactory system of order, its chief virtue is that it is changing.

It is seeking a new system of order based on a new basis of priorities and new commitments. None of the three major candidates is providing adequate leadership in this vital function. The one who wins the Presidency will have to cope with these dilemmas by arriving at new commitments or yield in 1972 to a man with greater vision.

In person . . .

A new Nixon

By Paul Finkelman

Once again the national political scene will be brought to Syracuse in person. On October 29, the people of Syracuse will get a chance to judge whether there really is a difference between the "new" Richard Nixon and the "old" Richard Nixon. In order to make such a judgement, we must know something about the "old" Nixon.

The "old" Nixon first gained national prominence while working with Senator Joseph McCarthy during the "witch hunt" days of the late forties and early fifties. Nixon helped convict and destroy Alger Hiss, one of the nation's brightest young lawyers. He did so through legal shenanigans that included demanding a new judge. Congressmen Nixon was as skillfull as a witch hunter as he had been as a mudslinger during his campaign for the house. The two talents earned him the right to run with Eisenhower in 1952.

On the way to the Vice-Presidency, Nixon ran into a complication. It was discovered that the great, and moral witch hunter had embezelled $17,000 and thus Eisenhower didn't want him. Nixon, however, received one last chance to clear his name. He went on national t.v. to explain his action. He never mentioned the money in his speech. Instead he spoke about his wife Pat, his two daughters Julie and Trica, his lovely California home, apple pie, motherhood, and his dog Checkers. During the entire half-hour of the "Checkers Speech" Nixon said nothing to clear his name. In so doing, he somehow hoodwinked the American public into believing that he was an honest, sincere politician. Nixon himself apparently realizes how bad the speech was because he hs since bought all the vidio-tapes of it so the people will not be able to see the "old Nixon" on film.

Under Eisenhower, Nixon served as an able Vice-President. He helped plan our committment to Vietnam, a committment that he may soon have to reckon with. He also was on hand when the President ignored Castro's friendly overtures and supported the dictator Batista in the late fifties. On his state tour of Latin America Nixon managed the impossible of being booed at every stop. This stands in contrast to JFK's trip there.

After his loss to JFK in 1960, the candidate tearfully conceded defeat and announced his retirement over national t.v. Then in 1962 he entered the California gubernatorial race in attempt to oust Pat Brown. After lossing, a bitter and defeated man attacked the press corps for what he felt was unfair press coverage. He ended the attack with, "Gentlemen, you've had your fun, but you're not going to get to kick Dick Nixon around anymore because this is Dick Nixon's last press conference."

And, in this mature and dignified manner the "old" Nixon retired from public life and went to New York to practice law and support Barry Goldwater for President.

Now we face a "new" Nixon. The "new" Nixon smiles more (like he did during the Checkers speech). He talks about law and order in the South. He talks about Black Capitalism in the North. He walks arm in arm with Strom Thurmond in the South. He hints about Liberal cabinet appointees and runs with Spiro T. Agnew. He talks about peace, and won't disclose his plan. He attacks his opponents, but won't face them in a debate.

As we wait for the "new" Nixon, and reflect on the "old" one, we can only hope that "Law and Order George" or the "Mad Bomber" will come here so that we can compare all aspects of the Unholy Trinity that we face this November.

Letters to the editor

Rushing Vet

To The Editor:

I would like to heartily agree with Jeffrey Miller (Cheating-Oct. 23) and say that not only do Greeks cheat on exams and cut classes but they also are irresponsible, flunk courses, steal from the bookstore, drink to excess, masturbate, fornicate and worst of all ruin the campus; unlike independents who do none of these. This obviously shows how degenerate the Greek minority is and how all students should avoid becoming a part of it. As everyone knows the only knowledge to be gained at a university is in the classroom. What can an atmosphere of bigotry, social climbing, libertinism, for all frats are the same, offer any conscientious student.

I have been rushing various fraternities for five semesters now and though none have offered to pledge me I feel I can still say that I have seen their sickness from within.

I hope that I have been only half as open-minded as Mr. Miller and his friends.

Dale Tussing

To the Editor:

It seems that the Daily Orange has elected to carry the banner of Dale Tussing, congressional candidate of the Know-Nothing Party. The D.O. articles seem to be an attempt to portray Mr. Tussing as a cleverly disguised economics prof who is in reality a super foreign policy expert. However, after reading the revelations of Super Tussing, I was left wondering how in hell he manages to get out of bed in the morning, let alone attempt to dictate world politics.

Mr. Tussing tells us the reason there was so much delay in Washington after Hanoi agreed to talk was because we had not expected or planned on them accepting our offer. This is no doubt true, but not for the nefarious reasons advanced by Mr. Tussing. What else was to be expected when over one hundred attempts over a two year period had been made to draw Uncle Ho and his boys to the conference table, and each attempt had been ignored.

In regard to a bombing halt, Mr. Tussing would have us believe that it is all that is standing between us and times of peace and joy. Apparently his economics books didn't tell him that there have been total bombing halts several times a year ever since the bombing of the north began, several of the halts around the Lunar New Year lasting in excess of a month. Each halt was used by the north to build up its war potential while refusing offers to negotiate. Mr. Tussing also seems blissfully ignorant of the fact that North Vietnam had been carrying on an aggressive war against the south for several years before the bombing ever started, and indeed the bombing policy was only started as a last resort after Hanoi had refushed to scale down its aggression. It might also be added that those who wish to vent their spleen against LBJ choose a very poor way of doing so by advocation of a bombing halt. Johnson resides in the White House, not a fox hole, and as long as he insists upon sending American boys over there, they suffer by a halt in the bombing, not him.

Mr. Tussing finally socks it to us with the obviously inside information that the Paris talks are only a front on our behalf, and we are at this time planning a military victory over North Vietnam. Well, Mr. Tussing, is this why we have never carried out a total bombing policy against the north, why we have now stopped the bombing over most of their territory and 90% of their population, why we never blockaded their ports, and why we forcibly prevent the military forces of South Vietnam from invading the north? Is this why we have never committed more than a fraction of our available armed might to the conflict, and indeed why we have already implemented plans to reduce the troop strength now engaged?

Tribute to Jaime Ferran

(Ed. note: The following appeared as an editorial in Spanish in El Tiempo, a newspaper in Bogota, Colombia. Jaime Ferran is an associate professor in the Department of Romance Languages at Syracuse University who is in Bogota at the University of Andes, with ten students from SU. The editorial was translated into English by Pat Roth and Judy Wingerd, two of the SU students who are attending the University.)

Jaime Ferran is a poet--a great poet of Spain--who some years ago came to Colombia--to fall in love with the land. Far, very far in his native land Catalana (Spain) or his Syracuse U niversity, he continued his deep enchantment and the product of this love is the most beautiful book, exquisite, tender, written with sweetness and elegance, with such fine delicacy that it is almost a lullaby.

The book has been written for the imagination of children, whose archangelic fantasies are encouraged by the magic of Jaime's tales. "Angel en Colombia" -- which has already won a prize in Spain--would be enough to compensate us--with a good deal to spare--for the overabundance of embittered, miserable literature that up till now has run rampant against our country.

The words of Jaime Ferran, on the other hand, redeem us and raise us. It is not that it treats a common subject, written in order to show us in geographic, political and economic dimensions. It is that this poet has taken Colombia as primary material for his fascinating creativity, and through his orders Angel has gone (on) sewing the tale of his fantasy with the thread of love and dreams. And more than relating, he has painted, because his book is a picture, a wizard of colors, that through him, fly and wander through skies and lands and names.

If anyone truly deserves the gratitude of the Colombians, it is this Spaniard who here left his heart anchored--and to us has returned with no other desire than that of a pilgrimage of fondness; on a type of cordial retracing of what he lived and felt.

Or perhaps because, as he says in his story, that there he missed a great deal of Colombia: "Angel glanced again at the map of his Creator." Ferran writes at the conclusion of this beautiful book "but he saw the splendor had ceased and no other site signaled. And in a certain mode it upset him that he could not continue seeing Colombia, because he had missed practically all of the northern and western parts of the country. But it was not time to return--at least for this time."

And here, again, has returned our Angel in Colombia. Welcome for your devoted, inextinguishable sentiments.....

GSO elects president

By MARTY BLOCK

By an overwhelming majority, George Dolch has become the first president of the Graduate Student Organization. The election of Dolch, working on a doctorate in education, was later made unanimous by acclamation.

Prior to his doctoral work, Dolch had taught and served for 25 years as a Methodist minister. In 1966 he earned his masters in religion at Syracuse University. Apparently because of Dolch's experience and unique position as both a student and educator, he will be able to freely exchange ideas with SU administrators.

Dwight Emerson, one of the creators of the G.S.O., was elected vice president. Marion McDaniel became G.S.O.'s first secretary, with Jay Morely as treasurer and Jacques Lebel as parliamentarian.

General goals presented by Dolch and G.S.O. include the possible formation of tripartite government with the undergraduate Student Senate and the Faculty Sentate, improvement in the current Graduate Assistantship Program, a possible initiation of graduate student social functions, an immediate look into the problem of football ticket distribution and the selection of committee members for the selection of the new chancellor and a new dean of the College of Liberal Arts. All graduate students are eligible to become members of either of the committees. Interested grads should attend the next G.S.O. meeting, Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. in Maxwell Auditorium.

P.E.A.C.E.

P.E.A.C.E., the official anti-poverty agency in Syracuse and Onondaga County, is now working to organize this neighborhood. At 7 p.m. Monday in the University Methodist Church, corner of University and Genesee, people from this area will elect a representative to the P.E.A.C.E. Board of Directors to plan programs that will help the poor people of Syracuse.

University students are part of this area and are invited to attend. A Neighborhood Advisory Council will also be formed to work on programs for this area such as teen programs, pre-school programs, and housing programs. Participation is necessary to make this program a working one.

WORK FOR JAVITS.
HE'S WORKING FOR YOU.

The war. The draft. The upheaval in our cities.

Senator Javits knows the problems that are troubling American students. And he's working toward solutions.

The War: In February 1967, the Senator split with the administration's war policy. Since then he has been working for a halt to the bombing in the North, a cease fire on both sides and a speedy de-Americanization of the war.

The Draft: This year, the Senator introduced a bill to Congress to change our antiquated draft laws. In part, it would give us a lottery system. One which would subject a man to the draft for only one year. Instead of eight.

The Cities: Senator Javits is the man who founded the Student Coalition for Urban Action. A group that will become directly involved in solving the problems of our problem-ridden cities.

The future of America will soon be in your hands. Yet many of you, too young to vote, feel that your hands are tied. Senator Javits disagrees. If you're old enough to have an opinion, if you're old enough to speak out, then you're old enough to work for a man who shares your opinions and who will speak out with you.

If you'd like to know more about Senator Javits' accomplishments of the past and plans for the future, you can. If you'd like to help work for Senator Javits, you can.

Either way, contact David Warner at 455-0747.

And remember, you don't have to be able to vote in November to make your opinions count.

determined through University established procedues. The Board of Trustees delegates disciplinary authority to the Chancellor who exercises this authority through designated administrative officers, and through various committees and groups established specifically to handle disciplinary matters. The procedures used and decisions made by these administrative officers, committees and groups may be reviewed by the Chancellor at his discretion."

The present wording of the antiquated Rule One is vague in that it does not specify 1) what are the University established procedures, 2) who are the designated administrative officers, committees, and groups and committees established specifically to handle disciplinary matters and 3) if the procedures used are uniform for all students and 4) if procedures used are suited to the gravity of the offense.

Dean of Student Services, Dean Carleton, has pointed out, however, that all three means of disciplinary action at S.U. provide the student with "due process" and the right of appeal to a higher authority. A student now may choose to be tried by an 1) administrative disciplinary committee whose decision may be theoretically appealed to the Chancellor 2) by the Student Judicial Board whose decision may be brought to an Appellate Board and 3) by summary action, action directly between a student and an administrator, the decision of which may be brought to the Administrative Disciplinary Committee.

Dean Carleton feels that the modification of Rule One has clearly established that "it is no longer permissable to suspend a student without saying why." The recognition of "due process" and the establishment of procedures designed to protect the individual rights of student are two other aspects of student discipline which the Dean feels the new ruling takes into account.

Since the early 1960's, starting with the Freedom of Speech Movement at Berekley, students have been protesting against infringements of their civil liberties. Last year's student rebellion at Columbia University, which caused a closedown of the Morningside Heights campus, shows that students' demands are now centered on obtaining a greater student voice in university policies, disciplinary policy included.

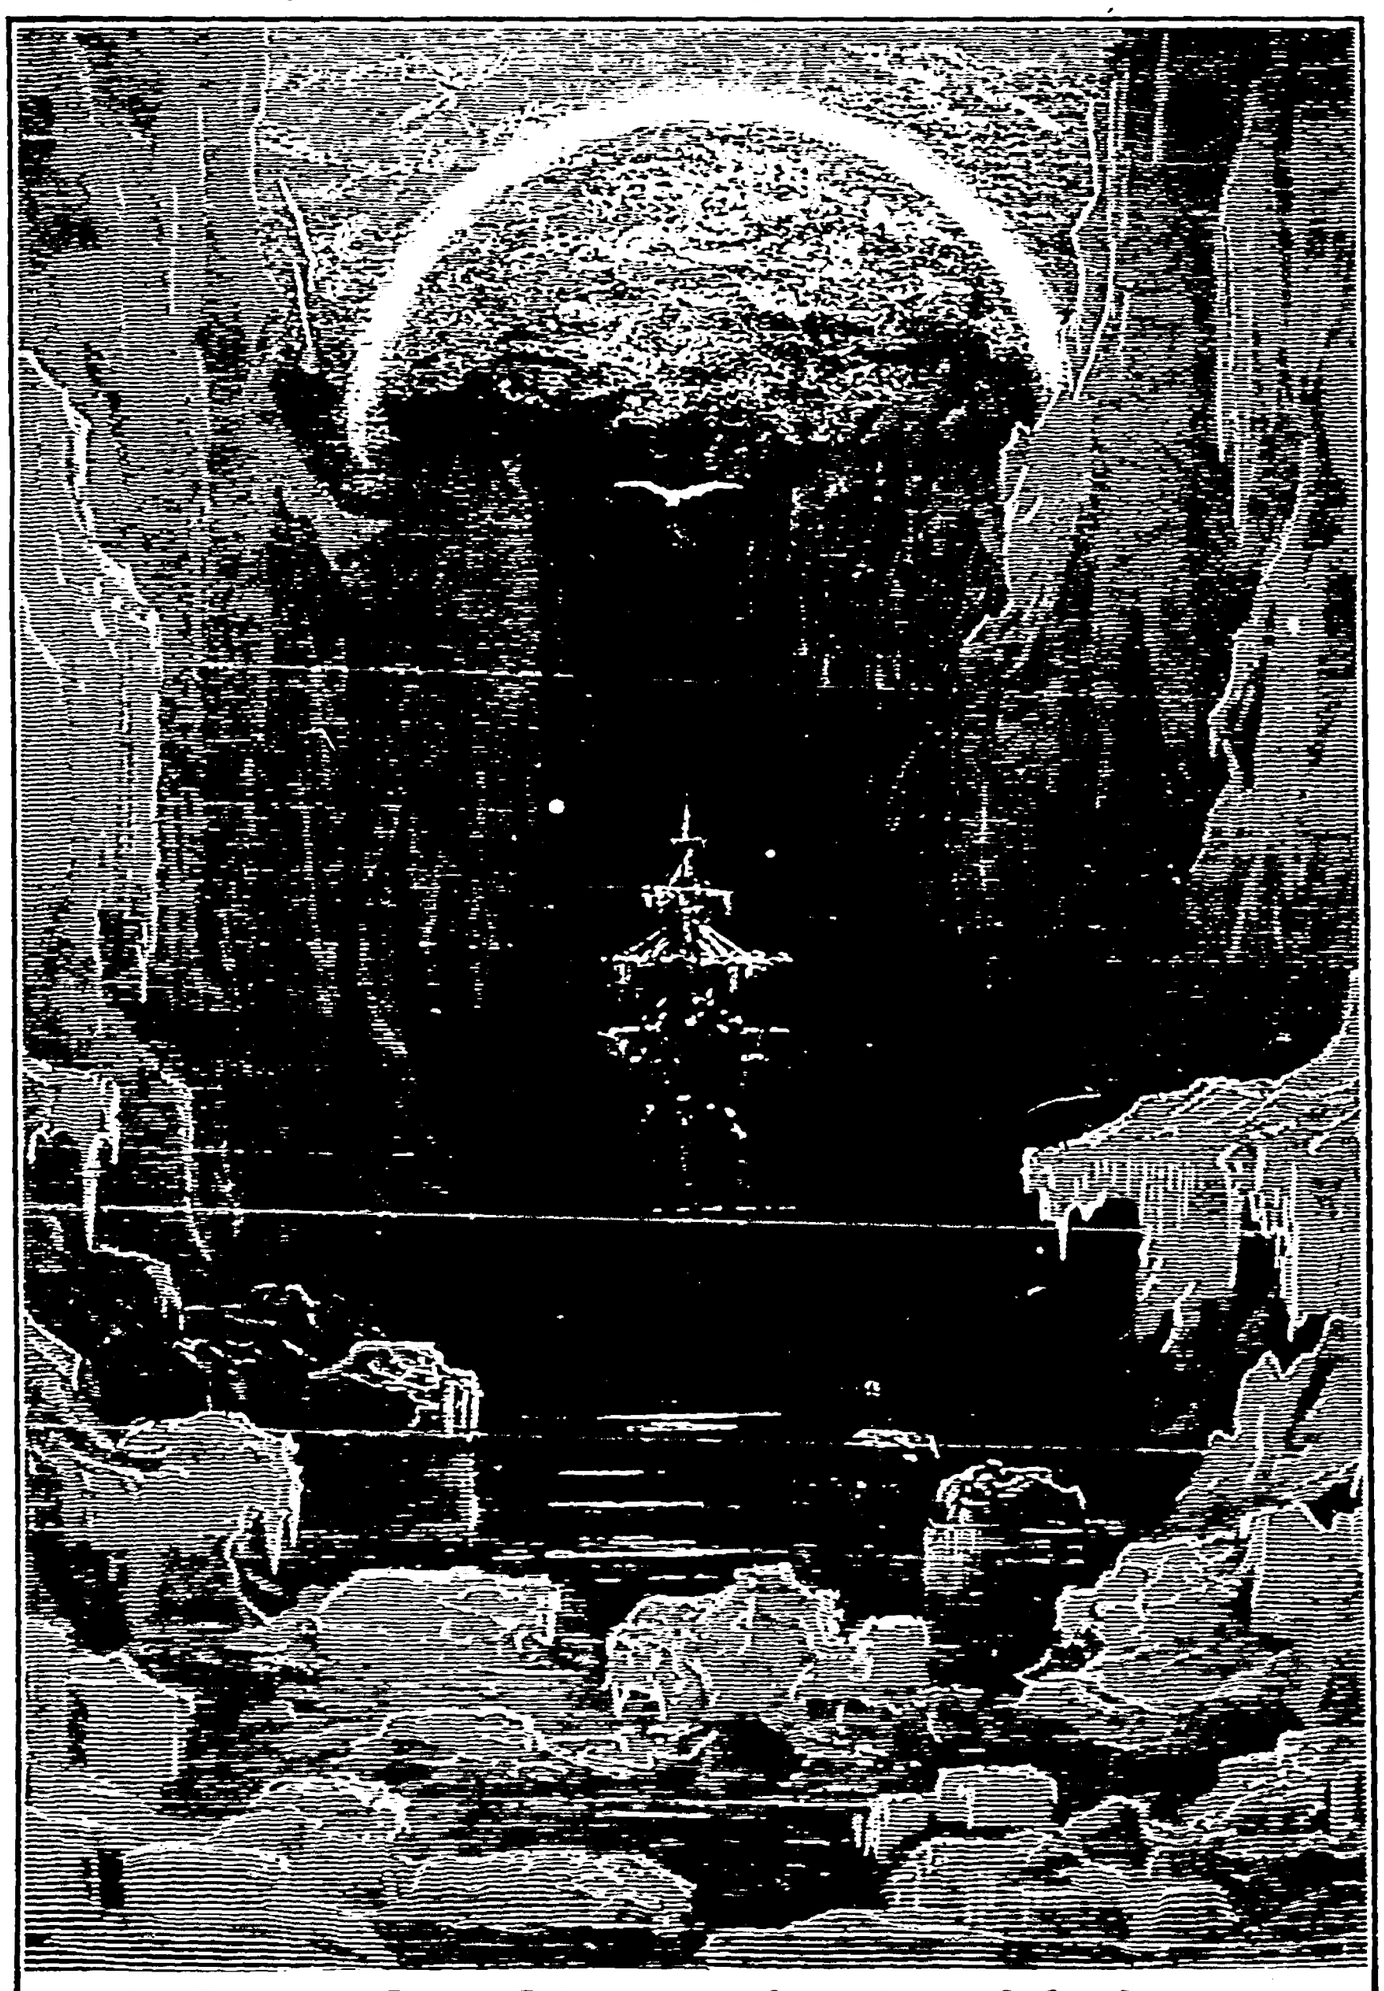
The right of a university to arbitrarily dismiss a student for unstated reasons has been challenged in courts many times by students all over the country, S.U.'s Rule One was challenged in court as early as 1920 by a young coed who had been dismissed under the rule's power.

At that time, Rule One's right of arbitrary expulsion was prefaced with, "In order to safeguard those ideals of scholarship and that moral atmosphere which are in the very purpose of its founding and maintenance, the University reserves the right...."

In this case, Anthony vs. Syracuse, tried in the Appellate Division of N.Y., Syracuse had dismissed Miss Anthony, a senior, after a university official had spoken to her sorority sisters and concluded that she was not"a typical Syracuse girl." The school used Rule One for the dismissal and therefore would state no specific grounds for the expulsion.

In its decision, the court upheld the University's right to act in accordance with its rules, not questioning the rules themselves for their legality. The court was also defending the right of the university to act "in loco parentis" - in place of the parents - thus being able to decide the moral and social standards for its students and the discipline to be used in handling students.

A very recent court ruling, handed down by Federal Judge Frank M. Johnson Jr., a veteran of the legal wars that brought integration to the south, has very carefully defined the rights of both students and universities in disciplinary rulings. The UPI article which covered the Alabama court case referred to S.U.'s 1928 case involving Miss Anthony to illustrate the change in court policies regarding students rights.



The article stated that last month,"Johnson ordered Alabama's Tuskegee Institute to readmit, temporarily at least, 54 students accused of imprisoning the college board of trustees in a campus guest house. Johnson has ruled that: 1) A university can enforce "reasonable" rules to insure that it is able to maintain an orderly educational climate. 2) That a school administration cannot dismiss a student without a hearing. 3) The constitutional rights of a student cannot be "unduly" abridged, but the university has some latitude in maintaining discipline. Johnson's ruling was indicative of the court's trend in acting on student disciplinary cases in recent years.

Court Ruling's in Past Years

A famous 1960 fifth circuit case involves the expulsion of Negro students without hearings by an Alabama state college for participating in sit-in demonstrations. The U.S. District Court held that students have no procedural or substantive rights, as long as a school acts without malice in expelling them.

The Court of Appeals reversed the decision, holding that State Colleges--like all other governmental bodies--were constitutionally required to provide procedural due process

Distribution problem

Students, faculty complain about bookstore

By JIM WOOLSEY

Student complaints concerning the university bookstore are anything but scarce. Some faculty members too are dissatisfied with the bookstore's method of distribution.

James Thornblade, assistant professor of economics, says, "I myself have had no bad experiences as far as getting books is concerned, but my students have.

"Undoubtedly," he continues, "the books were ordered. It's just getting them on the shelves that seems to be the problem."

Another professor of economics, Dave Miller, says he is not clear where the fault lies. Speaking only for himself, he considers communication between faculty and bookstore the possible cause of confusion.

"The bookstore used to contact the professor when his books were running low and order more," Miller says. "Now they let him know when all the books have been sold."

The problem appears to be one of distribution rather than prices, according to Thornblade. He says that prices for new books are about the same everywhere, but that the university bookstore seems to charge more for used books.

Fred Kinne, former bookstore employe and a senior at SU, disagrees. "The bookstore buys used books for half-price and sells them for three-quarters," he says. "This is the general practice of the National Association of College Stores."

On the matter of distribution, Kinne says that teachers should allow three weeks or a month from the time they place their orders with the bookstore to the time the books come in.

"After that," he says, "if the books still aren't in, the teachers have a legitimate gripe. There are arguments on both sides of the fence."

The issue may get some airing this November, when the manager of the bookstore is scheduled to meet with the Faculty Senate.

But the bookstore still gets the bulk of the business. "The students will probably continue to prefer the bookstore because of the easy availability of credit," Thornblade says.

In a letter to the Subcommittee on Faculty Services, Miller offers what he terms a "facetious" solution." "Just let the bookstore keep on getting crowded and confusing, and in a few years the faculty will just take their business to other merchants."

Boris Karloff

Boris Karloff will highlight "Tales of the Frightened," a WAER Halloween special scheduled for this Sunday from 6-9 p.m. on a program called "Play of the Week."

The Program will feature Boris Karloff reading thirteen Tales of the Frightened and Tales of Terror by Edgar Allan Poe. Another highlight of this show will be the soundtrack of the celebrated thriller "Sorry, Wrong Number" starring Agnes Moorehead.

Due Nov. 1

Student Senate will scrutinize all constitutional requirements

November 1 is the deadline. Every organization on campus from Associated Women Students (AWS) to the Zoology Club must have a constitution submitted to Student Senate by Nov. 1.

Government Structures Committee has the responsibility to review the constitutions of every student organization. Coupled with that responsibility is the power to stop any organization not fulfilling constitutional requirements from using University facilities.

If a constitution is not passed by Student Senate, then the organization will not be permitted to register any rooms on campus. A tentative approval will be given to all organizations who submit consitutions on Nov. 1, and after examination of each constitution, the Senate will vote on the documents.

Required by Government Structures for all constitutions are: 1. stated purpose, 2. provisions for amendment with notification of the legislature, 3. democratic means of electing officers, 4. membership requirements, and 5. provisions for meeting.

As a service to the student body, Student Senate will compile a booklet listing student leaders and where they can be reached. All constitutions must include the name of the president or chairman, place of residence and telephone number.

There are three locations to hand in constitutions from now until Nov. 1. John Ross, chairman of Government Structures at Co-op 1, and Gerry Horn in DellPlain 155 will take all constitutions. The new Student Government office at 125 Stadium Place is also a drop-off point for constitutions.

"Student Government sought the power to prohibit usage of University facilities as a step towards self-government," according to an SG spokesman. Limiting unfair practices in student organizations, Student Government has the room registration lever to use as a punitive measure.

Freshmen officers meet to make plans for year

By FRANCINE PINTO

Newly-elected freshmen officers (Bob Tembeckjian, president; Cherie Griffith, vice-president; Francine Pinto, secretary; and Rich Garfein, treasurer) had their second meeting Tuesday night to discuss goals and plans of the freshman class this year.

The most immediate task confronting freshman officers concerns the organization of their freshman executive council. The aim of this committee is to serve as a representative and advisory body to the officers. All interested frosh should submit their applications with their place of residence and extension by Tuesday, Oct. 29 to the main desks at Haven, Watson East, Day or Sadler.

The following three questions should be answered: Why do you want to join the council? What activities do you propose the Freshman government undertake? What do you consider your qualifications for the position?

Newly-appointed commitee members will be informed of their acceptance next Tuesday night. On the following Monday, Nov. 4, the first formal meeting of the executive council will be held at 7:30 in the Hall of Languages. Attendance at this meeting is mandatory for all committee members.

The first freshman function, a "Frosh Drop-In," is tentatively scheduled for Nov. 12 or 14. This event is designed to promote class unity and serve as an introduction to frosh officers and the plans they have been working Anyone interested in auditioning for the "Drop-In" should contact one of the officers. They can be reached at the following living centers: Bob Tembeckjian, ext. 2937; Cherie Griffith, ext. 3413; Francine Pinto, ext. 2167; and Rich Garfein, ext. 2883.

Senate news
Students attend hearings

Public hearings will be held at Syracuse University Tuesday and Wednesday on the question of student representation in University Senate and "participation in the campus governance process." Prof. George G. Stern, chairman of the Senate committee on undergraduate students, said all members of the campus community are invited to attend and to express their views "on the specific questions of procedure as well as the broader policy issues involved."

Two sessions are scheduled for Tuesday—from 2 to 5 p.m. in the penthouse of Haven Hall, and from 7 to 9 p.m. at Flint Hall. The Wednesday hearings will be from 2 to 5 p.m. in the Founders Room of Maxwell Hall.

"The purpose of the hearings is to stimulate public discussion on the implementation of the Senate's decision of last May to broaden its base by including students as voting members," Stern said. Heretofore the University Senate has been a preponderantly faculty-administration group. Students were ex-officio members of some Senate committees.

Stern said the discussion at the hearings would be particular relevant on the following matters, among others: What proportion of the Senate should be made up of students? What groups should they represent? How should they be chosen? Are there guidelines for the assignment of students, faculty and administrators to particular senate committees? What effects should these changes have on the University? Are there other issues to be considered in relation to these long-term iffects?

Interested persons should contact Stern at 216 Sims or ext. 2295 to sign-up for the hearings.

'New forms of schooling'

Imagination in focus for Croton-on-Campus

By LARRY SAMPSON

A large index card hangs on the wall precariously beneath the pictures of Leslie Uggams, Diana Ross and the Supremes, Harry Belfonte, Marion Anderson, Leonyte Price and Louis Armstrong. And as you thoughtfully reread the card, a mixture of sounds-- peals of laughter, the soul sound of a Temptations album and the caustic ambivalent voices-penetrate the quiet sanctum of your thoughts. These are the sounds and voices that fill the halls and classrooms of Croton-on-Campus.

Through the cooperation of the Syracuse City School District and Syracuse University it is an imaginative experimental effort to channel talented intellectual resources into the area of education of urban Negro children. It will enable specialized educators to document conditions presently existing in schools, which contribute to frustration, educational failure and frightening dropout rates of ghetto children.

Croton-on-Campus was first proposed in the spring of 1967 by The Rev. Forest Adams, a leader in the Syracuse Negro community, to allow students of the de facto segregated Croton School on East Castle Street to spend half-day sessions in classrooms on the Syracuse University campus.

But Croton-on-Campus today is an on-going experiment designed to utilize behavioral sciences to educate Negro ghetto children. Under the direction of Dr. John L. Johnson, a black assistant professor of Special Education at SU, approximately 300 fourth, fifth and sixth grade Negro students of Croton School are participating in this demonstration and research program. Each school day they are bussed from their home school to the campus to spend a half day session in a specially designed school building erected for the project. Half of the 300 children attend Croton-on-Campus in the morning and the other half in the afternoon.

Because of the dominant participation of Negro children, the project was attacked for perpetuating segregated education. Dennis Dowdell, executive director of the Syracuse Urban League, strongly opposed Croton-on-Campus. "It is our feeling that taking Negro children up to the campus of SU without the component of full integration is unwise and does not demonstrate fully commitment of quality integrated education."

However, Croton-on-Campus is not geared toward integration, although some is to occur (up to 20% white) in the future.

The project will also allow educators to construct and tryout, in a systematic fashion, "new forms of schooling which will interrupt the educational apathy and discouragement cycle which is characteristic of a majority" of the Croton pupils.

Dr. Johnson and his staff (six teachers and their SU student associate teachers) believe that "education can be made relevant to a specific deprived group...." This means the pupils' cultural background is preserved. The black pupil is not expected to conform to white middleclass values. The primary goal is to further his educational achievement and prepare him with the knowledge, attitude and skills to enable him to make use of those opportunities this society offers members of minority groups. Unlike many other education experimental projects, the child and his problems, not the teacher, are of primary concern.

After a brief use of Peck Hall at University College, the project was moved in November, 1967 to the $120,000, specially-designed, six-classroom building erected on the SU campus. The Syracuse City School District provided the necessary funds for the construction of the building and SU leased the land.

Within the air-conditioned, windowless school house, Dr. Johnson and his staff have begun to explore a number of ways to meet the needs of Croton children. A major concern is the development of the youngster's language and speech and increase of his vocabulary.

Aside from the utilization of self-instructional materials, a modified program, "Hooked on Books," is incorporated in teaching plans. A classroom is "flooded" with paperback books and magazines with little thought to difficulty. Under these conditions, youngsters are encouraged to plunge in and select any reading material they are interested in and feel they can handle. The idea is to merely get any kind of printed matter into their hands.

Walking into one of the classrooms one sees the name of Harriet Tubman printed on the blackboard. Three small boys who remained behind to complete their assignment are answering questions about this woman who helped slaves escape from bondage during the 19th Century. Throughout the room are pictures and books about black people, suggesting that indeed "black is beautiful." This too is a concern of the Croton-on-Campus program. Social and cultural studies emphasis Negro history and culture.

To enhance the learning process, each of the six classrooms serve a particular purpose. Two rooms are learning laboratories with carrells to permit individual instruction Other designated areas attempt to enhance group activity and social interaction.

In various classrooms, removal of the teacher's desk represents the elimination of authoritarian symbols. Dr. Johnson explained, "The students must feel that it is their room." Rooms, with the efforts of the staff, are designed to evoke desirable learning behavior.

Upon leaving Dr. Johnson's office which he shares with his staff, the sounds and voices of Croton-on-Campus once again impinge upon a visitor's thoughts. Children are shoving and pushing one another in the hall. It is time for them to get on the school bus and go home.

Somehow by looking into the shy but smiling faces of the children as they watch you leave the building, one sees in the confusion that veils their eyes, a yearning to know who they are. And in spite of their apparent hyperactivity, jostling one another and running aimlessly about, one begins to understand the powerlessness with which they confront a system and society that persecutes and frustrates them.

Dr. Johnson

Under the direction of Dr. John L. Johnson, assistant professor of special education at SU, approximately 300 Croton School students are participating in the on-campus program.

"Education can be made relevant to a specific deprived group.." The black pupil is not expected to conform to white middle-class values.

BIG MACHINE ON CAMPUS

You don't need a slide rule to figure the capabilities of the great new Olds 4-4-2.

Check out the vital statistics and you'll see what we mean. 400 cu. in. displacement. 350 horsepower. 440 lb.-ft. torque. 4-barrel carb. And dual low-restriction exhaust.

And if it's the ultimate head-turner you're after, you can order your 4-4-2 with Force-Air Induction. (Better known as Dr. Oldsmobile's W-30 Machine.)

So if you're planning an escape from the ordinary, why not make it big! Make it in a 1969 Olds 4-4-2.

SDS says it is important to overthrow the 'System'

By JEAN HAVENS
Associate Editor

"Freak-outs," peace marches and Dow protests are words that have been used in describing the activities of the SU chapter of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). An active group on campus, SDS is only a small part of the national organization.

Founded in 1962 at Port Huron, Mich., SDS was a successor to the Students League for Industrial Democracy. The 59 people representing 11 colleges who attended the first meeting aided the organization's first president, Tom Hayden, a University of Michigan student, in drawing up the "Port Huron Statement" of basic SDS beliefs.

The statement declares: "...We seek the establishment of a democracy of individual participation, governed by two central aims: that the individual share in those social decisions determining the quality and direction of his life, that society be organized to encourage independence in men and provide the media for their common participation."

In advocating "participatory democracy," a leaderless, decentralized system where each person's views are equally important, the Port Huron Statement set down a basis for the group's organization.

Anyone who wants to become a member is allowed to, whether he is politically a Marxist, anarchist, Democrat or whatever. By paying $5 dues to the national SDS he may become a "national member," along with about 6,000 others. The organization now numbers about 35,000 members on 300 campuses.

The SDS belief in participatory democracy also has a basic tenet that power shouldn't evolve from the top down, but rather from the bottom up. It is because of this and the organization's fear of the creation of an "elite," that SDS leaders are not held in any special esteem.

Nationally, SDS leadership consists of three yearly-elected secretaries and an eight-member national interim committee. There are also about 20 organizers, paid $15 a week, who travel around the country.

The national headquarters, 1608 West Madison St., Chicago, is located in a bad neighborhood, necessatating the loose chicken-wire covering of the second-floor office windows. The office is staffed at all times, but the door is locked and those who ring for admission must be approved before they may ascend the stairs.

SDS has a national organization, however many members do not know the national officers' names. Actually, each campus chapter decides for itself, through its own particular circumstances, what goals it will work for and the methods it will use.

Over the years these campus chapters have supported the philosophies set down in 1963, again by Tom Hayden, that: 1) there is a military–industrial complex in the US which is a threat to peace and 2) that the SDS should work with the poor in the black and white ghettos.

The year 1964 saw much ghetto agitation in 17 cities where 300 SDS members moved into predominantly white ghettos to help the people air their local grievances. Members also led welfare and rent strikes and assisted in Negro voter registration drives.

Anti–war teach–ins and marches highlighted 1965 as several campus SDS chapters set up Free Universities. The following year SDS continued its attacks on "the System," rallying opposition to the war and the draft, and supporting SNCC by passing a black power resolution.

Last year SDS demonstrated against ROTC and campus job recruiters from Dow Chemical, the CIA and the military. The takeover of buildings on the Columbia University campus and the Democratic Convention demonstrations in Chicago were two of this year's large-scale SDS activities.

SDS has changed its tactics from the early days of nonviolent sit-ins and marches. Its resistance now calls for violent convrontations. A national SDS officer, Mike Speigel, speaking in a recent Live magazine article explained: "Columbia was a power convrontation because our analysis is that the only thing this country responds to is power. Our power lies within the people and is only meaningful as a legitimate power source in that sense.

"Protest doesn't work, now the next step is power. The logical extension of civil rights is black power, the logical extension of student protest is student power."

This student power has resulted in imprisoned administrators, disrupted classes and barricaded buildings as SDS seeks to reform university structure and curricula, increase student participation in administrative matters, increase the number of minority-group students admitted, and oppose the dismissal of radical faculty members.

In the Life article, Speigel declared: "We want free universities, and there can be no free universities in an unfree society. All the current universities feed off the system in terms of government grants and investments from big corporations. In return, they are set up to channel manpower into the system, for the system.

"We feel we have to shift the emphasis of the university and stop the educational process from designing people to fit into the system. We want to promote change by developing students trained to be critical of what they see and to continually seek new and better."

SDS believes that pelple will ultimately see the corruption and immorality of "the System," and will want to overthrow it by direct action. University of Wisconsin student John Kauffman, speaking in a Look magazine article, said: "Our main problem is that people feel they are impotent. You have to convince them that they can change things. That means coming back to talk with them again and again."

Direct action spurred by national SDS became evident on the Syracuse campus in April, 1965, when a group of 18 SU students asnwered the SDS call to participate in a march on Washington, D.C., protesting the war in Vietnam.

The campus chapter emerged shortly, accompanied by such related groups as: the SU Committee to End the War in Vietnam, the SU Committee on Equality, the ad hoc Faculty–Student Committee on Political Issues and the SU Student Conservative Committee of the Young Americans for Freedom.

In 1966, the SU chapterpicketed the Administration Building with signs bearing anti-war slogans. Their aims, according to a Daily Orange article, were "to get the Chancellor to cancel the draft test" scheduled for that weekend, and "to get the Chancellor to stop the University from compiling class rankings for release to the draft boards."

Acting as SDS spokesman, Bob Tompolsky wrote an article that year for the Promethean, protesting the draft test, dorm life ("Why should the administration or for that matter, Student Senate or AWS, have anything to say about curfews, visitation rights or drinking?") and courses (claiming students should have a say in deciding content).

One extreme induces the other as supporters of the war in Vietnam exercise their right to bear signs in front of SDS coordinator Bob Tomposky (top). Members of SDS were among the various anti-war elements who took over the administration building last spring (left).

SDS, the DO reported, was also urged to "actively support the Physical Plant strikers in their battle to gain adequate democratic channels to represent their interests."

This past March, SDS members occupied the Administration Building as a protest against the on-campus recruiting by the Dow Chemical Company. Another SDS-sponsored event was the 1,300-member peace march from Thomden Park to the postoffice building downtown.

This year's plans include a teach-in on the campaigns of Humphrey, Nixon and Wallace, an educational Monopoly game and continued demonstrations against Dow and the armed forces.

Tomposky, who became a travelling organizer for SDS, is still the local chapter's spokesman. At a recent meeting he reportedly admitted that SDS seeks to disrupt and destroy the present social, political and economic order in America.

This statement, when viewed with a understanding of the beliefs and sims of SDS, is not as radical as it may seem. Although the organization has been termed "a new type of subversive" by FBI director J. Edgar Hoover, and the potential "grave diggers of academic freedom in the United States," by New York University philosophy professor Sidney Hook in a Reader's Digest quote, SDS believes that it has been given the task of working out a new American way of life from the turbulence of fast- paced industrial advancement.

Past national officer Carl Oglesby said in the Life article: "Everyone seems helpless - our social systems won't respond to the problems they face...But if we weren't obliged, above all, to save the capitalist elite which is misruling the country, we could at least begin to solve these problems."

In its attempts to solve these nation-wide problems, the SDS must reach out from the campus to involve all of American society. It is currently debating how to organize effectively outside the college community.

For its battles against "the System" SDS needs new troops. It is confident that it will get them, the SDS way, without a draft.

Rule one change . . .

when inflicting deprivations.

According to the original decision, made by the U.S. District Court, Middle District of Alabama, "The courts have consistently upheld the validity of regulations that have had the effect of reserving to the college the right to dismiss students at any time for any reason without divulging the reason other than its being for the general good of the institution... The court, in essence, based its decision on custom from previous cases dealing with student expulsions.

The reversal, made by the U.S. Court of Appeals, Fifth Circuit, in its 1961 reversal of the decision held that state colleges like all other governmental bodies, must observe due process. This established the principle that the disciplinary authority of state colleges is not solely a matter of the discretion of officials but is limited by the constitutional rights of students.

Many advocates of "due process" say that there can be an extension of constitutional policy as has been used in other areas of law in order to insure "fairness" in cases involving student expulsions.

In cases regarding contracts, however, the courts have the freedom to read into the terms of contracts so that both parties, in this case, the student and the university, receive justice.

Most educators would in fact agree that educational institutions serve an important public function and would therefore come under the laws of the state.

Laymen share pulpit

Dr. Willie to speak this Sunday at Hendricks about city problems

Dr. Charles V. Willie, chairman of SU's sociology department, will speak Sunday at the Hendricks Chapel. Willie will speak on "Crisis in the City" at the 11 a.m. service.

Willie is the second layman to speak as part of a Chapel program in which prominent campus personalities share the pulpit with the Rev. Dr. John H. McCombe Jr., dean of the Chapel.

Dr. Michael O. Sawyer, professor of political science, a Roman Catholic layman, was the first guest speaker, on Sept. 29.

Willie is a member of the Executive Council of the Episcopal Church in the United States and a member of the strategy and planning committee in the Diocese of Central New York. This summer he and his wife, who is organist and choir director at Grace Episcopal Church in Syracuse, attended an international conference on People and Cities sponsored by Coventry Cathedral, Coventry, England. During the conference he was a guest preacher at the Coventry Cathedral.

He has been a member of the Syracuse University faculty since 1952. From 1962 to 1964, he was also research director of Washington Action for Youth.

Shaw plans big weekend featuring mixer and "Zoo"

By NANCY KLINKENSTEIN

Shaw Dormitory has proclaimed this weekend, Oct. 25-27, as Shaw Weekend. Highlights of the trhee days include a mixer and the opening of Shaw's coffeehouse, "The Zoo."

The mixer will be Sunday, from 6-8 p.m. in the basement of Shaw. Featured are the Asylum, formerly Hard Water, a rock group with a built-on light show. Free beer and pretzels will be offered.

"The Zoo" begins its season this Friday and Saturday night from 8-11 in Shaw's rec room. Omar, a noted folksinger from the Baltimore area, will be the special entertainer.

According to Ellen Rogers, chairman, the coffeehouse will seat 75 people. The prominent decor will be an Eastern influence. Co-chairmen Barbara Grossman and Toby Mazer stress that there is no admission charge to "The Zoo." Bread, cheese, coffee, tea, and upon donation, wine, will be provided.

Omar, with his 12 string guitar, sings semi-Donovan style though he writes most of his own music. He has been featured in newspapers, on radio and television, and in coffeehouses throughout the East Coast.

The girls in Shaw are hopeful that, through everyone's support, their coffeehouse will continue to operate throughout the year. Plans are being made for singing groups, speakers, and cultural and social programs for the future.

Correction

The Daily Orange incorrectly reported in yesterday's edition that the demonstration by the National Organization of Women against the Rainbow Lounge at Hotel Syracuse was scheduled for Sunday. It is slated for Saturday.

On Campus with Max Shulman

(By the author of "Rally Round the Flag, Boys!", "Dobie Gillis," etc.)

THE WINDS OF CHANGE ARE GIVING ME A STIFF NECK

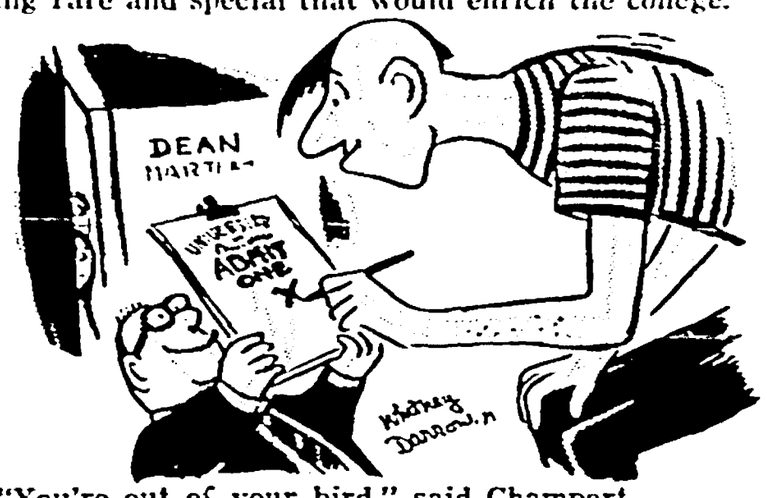
Today if I get a little misty, I hope I may be forgiven. This is an anniversary; it is exactly fifteen years since I started writing this column in your campus paper.

Fifteen years! What a pageant of memories marches through my mind as I sit this day on my verandah, my faithful wife crouched at my feet, my hot line to Medicare within easy reach! What changes I have seen in American college life! What strange new things—the teaching machine, the disposable dean, the rise of Eugene...the Moby Grape, the naked ape, the hairy nape, the Carnaby drape, the generation gape...the Grateful Dead, the acid head, the tiger tread...the electric sitar, the menthol cigar, the come-as-you-are. And, of course, the Electro-Coated Blade.

The Electro-Coated Blade, which is to say the new Personna Super Stainless Steel Blade, is mentioned here because the makers of the new Personna Super Stainless Steel Blade are the sponsors of this column, and they are inclined to stop payment on my check if I omit to mention their product.

Not, mark you, that it is any chore for me to sing the praises of Personna, for it is a seemly blade that shaves you cleanly, a gleaming blade that leaves you beaming, a trouble-free blade that leaves you stubble-free. If you seek facial felicity, if you yearn for jowl joy, try Personna today. It is available both in double-edge style and in Injector style, both styles Electro-Coated with a new process invented by Personna's resident mad scientist, Steinmetz Ampere, who also invented the opposing thumb, without which millions of castanet players would be destitute today.

But I digress. We were discussing the changes in college life during the last fifteen years. Let's take up one change in particular: the emergence of a new breed of admissions dean.



The old breed of admissions dean (and they are still a majority) admit freshmen on the basis of standard, cut-and-dried criteria: IQ score, SAT score, high school standing. But the new breed of admissions dean occasionally will take a chance on an applicant with a low IQ, a low SAT score, low high school standing. He looks not so much at a man's test scores as at the man. If the dean's intuition tells him that within the man are hidden qualities, something rare and special that would enrich the college, the man gets in, test scores notwithstanding.

Take, for example, the case of Champert Sigafoos.

Champert's credentials for college were not what you would call promising. He graduated 419th in a high school class of 419. His IQ was 14; his SAT score was 12. Also he was bald on one side.

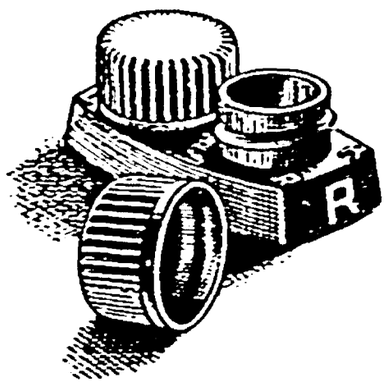
Nevertheless Champert trudged from campus to campus, showing his dossier to admissions deans. Everywhere the result was the same: projectile vomiting.

Then one day Champert came to a campus where the admissions dean, E. Pluribus Ewbank, was one of the new breed. "Champert," said Dean Ewbank, "my intuition tells me that within you are hidden qualities, something rare and special that would enrich the college."

"You're out of your bird," said Champert.

"No, Champert," said Dean Ewbank, "I know whereof I speak, for I am not only the dean of admissions here, but I am also the basketball coach. And the hidden qualities I see within you are that you are seven feet three inches tall."

So Champert was admitted. It did not, alas, work out as well as it might have, for Champert shortly developed acromegaly (a morbid fear of hoops) and was dropped. Today, a broken man, he earns a meagre living as a mooring mast in Akron.



Dean Ewbank is no longer with the college either; he has gone into the three-minute auto wash game.

are your contact lenses more work than they're worth?

If you're tired of using two or more separate solutions to take care of your contact lenses, we have the solution. It's Lensine the all-purpose lens solution for complete contact lens care—preparing, cleaning, and soaking. ■ Just a drop or two of Lensine before you insert your contacts coats and lubricates the lens surface making it smoother and non-irritating. Cleaning your contacts with Lensine retards the buildup of foreign deposits on the lenses. ■ Lensine is sterile, self-sanitizing, and antiseptic making it ideal for storage of your lenses between wearing periods. And you get a removable storage case on the bottom of every bottle, a Lensine exclusive for proper lens hygiene. ■ It has been demonstrated that improper storage between wearings may result in the growth of bacteria on the lenses. This is a sure cause of eye irritation and could seriously endanger vision. Bacteria cannot grow in Lensine. ■ Caring for contact lenses can be as convenient as wearing them with Lensine, from the Murine Company, Inc.

You can't get any closer.

Some men think the only way to get a good, close shave is with a blade.

If that's what you think, we'd like to tell you something about the Norelco Tripleheader Speedshaver®.

In a very independent laboratory, we had some very independent men shave one side of their faces with a leading stainless steel blade, and the other side with a new Norelco Tripleheader.

The results showed the Tripleheader shaved as close or closer than the blade in 2 out of 3 shaves.

The Tripleheader has three rotary blades inside new, thin, Microgroove™ heads that 'float,' so it follows your face, to shave you closer.

The Tripleheader has a pop-up sideburn trimmer. A handy, coiled cord. And a 110/220 voltage selector.

It comes in both a Cord and a Rechargeable model.

And it won't pull or nick or cut.

Because it shaves your beard.

Not your face.

Student mobilize for parents' visits

Plans are being formulated for Parents Weekend, Nov. 8-10, and students have been chosen to head committees arranging for a varied program during the three days. Barbara Jacobson and Mark Herweg are co-chairmen of the general committee.

There will be faculty and student art exhibitions, films, guided tours, "The Boys from Syracuse," a Goon show and a Crouse concert.

Chancellor William P. Tolley will speak at the parents' convocation on Friday afternoon, followed by a question-and-answer session. The fall 1968 Report to Parents has been sent to parents of all undergraduates. It lists the program and provides a form on which parents can submit questions about academic and extra-curricular matters for answer at the session.

Saturday afternoon there will be open houses following the game with William and Mary.

Administrators and Greek men meet

By LARRY CENTER

Syracuse fraternity men and faculty administrators will be meeting this weekend at Camp Minnowbrook in the Adirondacks to analyze and attempt to improve the Greek system at SU.

The Dean of Men's Office is in charge of fraternity affairs, and Assistant Dean of Men Melvin Mounts said that the "main purpose of this retreat is to allow representatives of member fraternities to reassess and reevaluate their role at Syracuse University and to work towards resolving some of the problems they have in common."

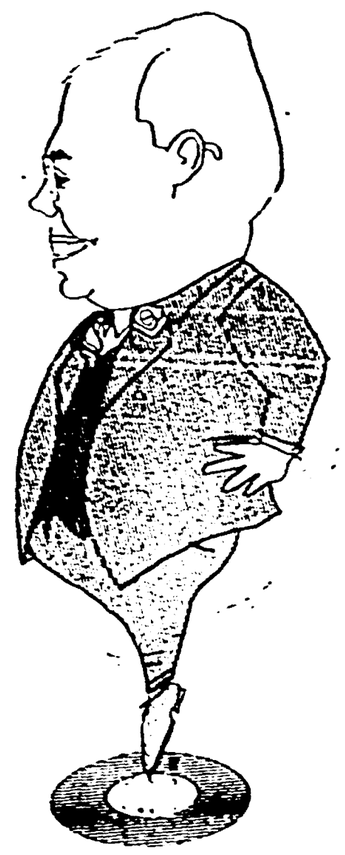
The conference, which will meet from tonight until around noon Sunday, will discuss three main topics: rush, the benefits of the Greek system as opposed to independent life and what IFC should do in the eyes of its member houses.

Saturday and Sunday discussion groups will examine the topics and then the three group leaders will go over the results with the intention of passing resolutions to become laws or programs.

Leading the convention will be the president of IFC, Bob Kelly, Vice President Bob Brandon, Secretary Ron Beeber and Treasurer Gerry Long. Attending with Dean Mounts will be Dean of Men David Tatham and faculty administrator Mr. Robert Massey.

Gerry Long said that last year's conference went real well. "Cooperation among houses and between IFC and houses improved greatly. Immediately afterwards, the constitution came out and was passed."

"Last year, he said, "the topics were more internal. They were: house matters, constructive pledging, house finances and rush. This year the conference is adopting a more idealogical standpoint. We want to establish the real advantages of Greek life, not in a brainwashing way. We're aware we're not perfect, and we want to clear up this misunderstanding among independents."



The administrators will be sitting in as resource persons and making suggestions in the discussion groups.

Campus notices

Campus Notices must be brought to the DO Office (1101 E. Adams St., second floor, first desk on the left) by 3 p.m. on the day before they are to be published. We regret that due to the many requests each notice must be limited to 25 words and may not be run more than two days in a row. Notices will not be taken over the phone.

ISO needs support from campus

By RAMI KHOURI

How many times I read about America, in my country's magazines, and listened to America speak to me over my radio at home. I would spend days wondering about whether I would ever really get a chance to come here — this country which first came to me in printed words, pictures, letters, and stories. Certainly, I was studious, hard working, and always ambitious. With one dream from my cradle, I lived out a hope. I wanted to come here to America to study. And finally, somehow sustained, here I am. Here we are, "all come to look for America."

Thus goes the story of the international student in the United States. He is a short, Negro African, walking around with his attache case. His complexion is neither white nor black, because he's from Italy, India, and Lebanon. He worships in a church and a temple, he carries a rosary in one hand and Moslem beads in the other. He loves DeGaulle, Sukarno and Dayan, always aware that he is Mr. Johnson's guest. He speaks French, German, Hindu and Arabic. And he regards his education here as a privilege, far from a right. The international student has come to America, bringing in his suitcases and cloth bags a thousand cultures and a varied collection of concepts of living.

As many students from the entire world voyaged to study in the U.S., some 700 of them from 80 countries came to Syracuse University. And a gentle lady at the International Student Center stood at the door of 230 Euclid Ave. to make sure that SU kept its arms open to the world. Mrs. Virginia Torelli took on the United States Immigration Office single-handedly, and she waited at the door till every new student was counted.

After making sure that all her guests were clothed, fed and lodged, Mrs. Torelli, assistant foreign student advisor, set them free to digest Syracuse. To aid these new students, many of whom are first-time visitors to the U.S., the International Student Organization set up a "work force" of International Student Guides.

Henry Riger, a senior and co-chairman of the guides, leads a kind of crusade in organizing the guides. In his words, the aim of the ISO guides is to provide "manpower" which helps the many international students put on dances, dinners, lectures, debates, two major balls, picnics, movies, concerts and the International Week in the spring.

Working with co-chairman Pat Berry, Riger said their aim is to "make the campus aware of international affairs and promote more programs of cultural exchange." More guides are always needed, as this year only 15 are doing the job.

Anne Solis, a colorful Phillipino grad student, helps our international guests by being their publicity chairman. She's concerned with promoting the fact that SU does indeed have some "foreign" students. She refers to the guides as "hosts," being the ones who introduce the new students to American customs and mannerisms.

Miss Von Hahmann stresses the fact that ISO members have organized themselves geographically. Each Sunday a certain group of students Africans, Indians, Chinese cooks dinner at the center. All students are invited but, to her disappointment, very few show up.

Girha-Gopel, an international student, moderated an ISO Great Decisions Meeting last year. The ISO aim is to "make the campus aware of international affairs and promote cultural exchange."

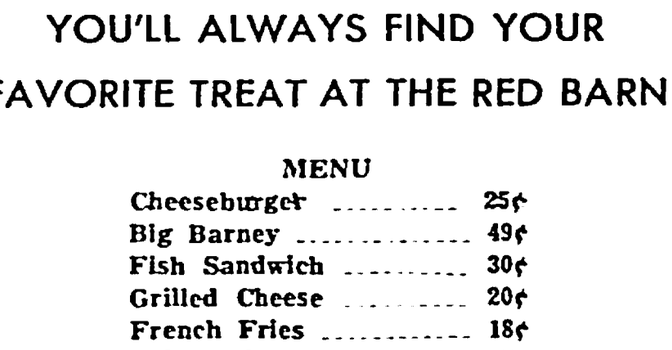
Nuclear 'strategy' puts humanity on the line

It's fairly easy to talk about the necessity to curb nuclear proliferation. There is also little difficulty in arguing that American nuclear capacity should be such that it will deter any attack upon the American mainland. Because these topics have some logical content and a degree of acceptability to American ideologies, they can be discussed and considered openly.

Because of their acceptance, though, there is really little immediate use in concentrating much additional discussion on these particular issues. Instead there is a need to consider the policies that the United States has let stand in regard to the use of nuclear weapons in a war situation not directly affecting American territory. This has not been widely discussed.

With respect to Southeast Asia and Europe, the U.S. has retained the option of using nuclear weaptons if our military situation is threatened and seems to warrant their use.

I would like to think the unthinkable for a moment and contend that there is no legitimate or logical grounds for the use of nuclear weapons in either of these areas. I make this contention in consideration of the very strong argument that once an initial strike has been made with a nuclear weapon, the opposing side will no longer have any qualms about nuclear retaliation. This retaliation would most likely lead to a growing exchange of atomic strikes, each escalation to prevent "defeat," leading to the much discussed total human obliteration in World War III.



This potential result may seem remote but we have nevertheless been reared to accept it as our fate. The U.S. is committed to use nuclear weapons to defend borders other than our own. Assuming the retaliation sequence, this would mean that if the Russians invaded Germany and we could not stop them with conventional military forces, we would then put the continued existence of the entire human race on the line by initiating a nuclear war. In essence, the U.S. is subsequently saying to the Soviet Union that the integrity of the German border is more important than the existence of humanity.

Though sketchily described here, this is what our policy boils down to. And it is more than simply a threat to keep the Russians on their toes, as the existence of American military leaders such as Curtis LeMay testifies. I think it's fine to be dedicated to causes and commitments, but not with human existence at stake.

This is why I feel that it is time to think the unthinkable: let's face the fact that we, the all-powerful Americans, could lose a conventional war and not have lost everything. Let's face the fact that the Russians could take over all of Europe and the Chinese all of Asia and all that they may have inherited is additional problems. In any of these cases there at least will still be a world existing in which men can hope for change and betterment.

Each of these alternatives, however, is usually considered to be taboo–unthinkable thoughts. But since they do have some logical merit, we should at least admit that they exist and bring them into our foreign policy discussions, on the individual as well as the national level. Why have them buried with us?

Frank Doble and cox Richie Kortwright, rowed in the same race last year. They said that the Head is a difficult race to row, not only because it is a grueling three-mile river course but also because the starts are staggered, and a crew has nothing to race against except the clock--unless, as happened last year, the boat is moving fast enough to pass the boats which started before it.

Stern test . . .

we've met and get stronger as the game goes on. We'll have to be more ready than we were for UCLA."

Ben dismissed Cal's loss to Army by saying, "They were taking Army too lightly, looking ahead. Still, they only got beat on one play in the last four minutes, when their boy went for an interception and missed it. Take away that one play and they'd be right up there."

The coach knows Saturday's contest is very crucial towards how the team does for the rest of the season. He said that although any team could pull an upset, Cal has more potential power than any other team SU must play, except Penn State.

If the Orangemen can pass tomorrow's test, they could move up near the heads of the class--USC, Ohio State, Kansas and, yet to come, Penn State.

The crew will not go to the Head cold. Tney had a taste of victory last Saturday, when they rowed against Marist, a small college in Poughkeepsie. Although Marist has had a rowing program for eight years, it has never been famous for its powerful crews. Apparently they thought they had something this year, since they challenged SU to a "practice race."

The Syracuse rowers, including the frosh, embarrassed their opponents in the four races. The varsity boat won its race by several lengths. The JV boat, after taking a two-length lead at the start, went on to win by 40 seconds, although they were rowing 29 strokes per minute to Marist's 36. Varsity coach Bill Sanford, charitably conceding that "Marist was rowing way out of its league when the crew took us on," nevertheless felt that his boats could have had better times had the race been closer.

The three freshman boats, made up of oarsmen which coach Gary MacLachlan refers to as "the strongest frosh crew Syracuse has seen in four or five years," took their two races easily, showing a remarkable degree of finesse for such a young crew.

While admitting that the crew showed promise last Saturday, Sanford characteristically refused to make any overconfident predictions. He said, "The real test will come at the Head, when we meet the Ivy League. Then we'll see what this crew can do."

WAER sports

WAER has rapidly become the most sports oriented station in central New York. It features Syracuse University frosh football, freshmen and varsity basketball, varsity baseball, plus Syracuse Blazer Hockey.

Nine Syracuse Blazer games will be heard exclusively on WAER this fall and winter. The WAER Blazer schedule includes the following games:

Nov. 4 . . . . . Charlotte
Nov. 14 . . . . . Jacksonville
Nov. 19 . . . . . Clinton
Nov. 24 . . . . . Johnstown
Dec. 3 . . . . . Long Island
Dec. 13 . . . . . Long Island
Dec. 19 . . . . . Nashville
Jan. 14 . . . . . Clinton

WAER also carries all Syracuse varsity games and most freshmen games. It is the most complete coverage offered on any station. In addition to the play by play, Syracuse players and coaches offer comment on past and future games.

Seven religions in Chapel . .

The idea for such a celebration arose form discussions by students in the Hendrick's Chapel Organization who wanted to expose the heart-beat of all major traditions under a common theme. A planning committee, composed mainly of international students, was set up under the guidance of The Rev. Dr. John H. McCombe, Hendrick's Chapel dean. From this committee emerged a program for the first such celebration at the Chapel.

Under the theme of man's meaning in the world, each tradition enjoys a unique interpretation which will be expressed individually through scriptural readings, symbols and prayer. All participants will witness the human form in worship in the context of the native traditions.

Presentations will include:

The Buddist parallels of birth and death. According to Buddist belief, birth and death have no beginning but are momentary intervals of suffering form which man can liberate himself. Hence, for the Buddist, human existence is a time when the soul sleeps and only death can awaken it to life.

The Sikh belief that man, having emanated from a pure source, remains pure and sinless throughout life. The expression will be in the form of spiritual recitals.

The Islamic concept of man as God's liege on earth, his surrender to Divine will and equity before Allah, as shown in Islamic methods of worship.

The Christian expression of brotherhood of Christ and man as a loving servant.

The Hindu idea of man as an intregal part of the Divine, the concept of oneness.

The Jewish theme of man made in the form of his creator. Man is represented in Judaic history as the crest of creation and the vessel of Divine spirit. This theme will be brought out in music and readings.

The Jain tradition of man as maker of his own destiny. While Jains do not believe in God, the sanctity of life dominates their tradition. Jains express perfection, "the state of supreme bliss," through deep meditation.

As a final show of unity, the congregation will end the celebration by singing "No Man Is An Island." A coffee hour will follow in the newly renovated social rooms at the Chapel.

Garland

Judy Garland in the "Wizard of Oz" returns to Syracuse audiences on Monday on WAER radio, 88.3 F.M.

Ed Gabriel will produce and announce the original cast soundtrack recording of "The Wizard of Oz," starring Judy Garland, with Ray Bolger, Bert Lahr, Jack Haley, and Frank Morgan. It will be aired from 7:00-8:20 p.m. on a program called "On Stage and screen."

The story is about the adventures of Dorothy, a Kansas farm girl who dreams she is in a land of fairies and witches where an all-powerful wizard is said to have the power to give a brain to a scarecrow, a heart to a tin man, courage to a lion, and a way of getting home to Dorothy.

The original movie of "The Wizard of Oz" is telecast annually as a television special.

Orange faces stern test at Cal.

By LARRY CENTER

Three weeks ago coach Ben Schwartzwalder said it would take nothing less than an all-out effort for Syracuse to beat then fourth-ranked UCLA. After the Orange 20-7 victory, the campus went wild. UCLA had been undefeated and had mauled Pitt, 63-7.

Last week the California Bears trounced UCLA, 39-15, even though the Uclans had their number one quarterback, Bill Bolden, back in action. Schwartzwalder said earlier this week, "We'd like to think UCLA wasn't as good a team" after two straight losses, "but the game was close for a half. UCLA led, then collapsed and Cal was really outhitting them, firing out when they took off in that third quarter."

Syracuse invades Berkeley's Memorial Stadium tomorrow seeking its fourth win in a row, while the Bears, winners of four out of five, are starting to sniff the roses of Pasadena. The game may be a low-scoring one, since both teams have very strong defenses. Cal rates a one point choice for the 4:30 EDT starter.

Cal's defense, one of the top units in the country, is a multiple set-up. Says Schwartzwalder, "Most teams have a couple of defenses. one even and one odd. They don't--they will use a 4-4, tight-6 and the Okie, 5-4. They're the first team we've played in several years with so many defenses, about 12 sets overall."

Ben complimented some of the Cal defenders. "Ed White is one of the best linemen in the nation. The two ends, McCaffrey (6-3, 215) and Augustine (6-1, 205) are very good. That linebacker Pitta is quite a boy, as is Wiedemann, the safety. That's five outstanding boys, and the rest are good." He added, "Jerry Woods, a linebacker who was considered exceptional, may be ready for us."

California has a diversified attack favoring a pro set to go with this tough defense. Gary Fowler can play tailback or wingback and Paul Williams can play tailback, wingback or split end. The move making Williams a wide receiver gives the Bears a deep receiving threat they didn't have last year, and takes a large burden off split end Wayne Stewart.

Ben explained, "Their offense is improved even over two weeks ago. Until the UCLA game, defense won for them. Last week the offense really blossomed out all of a sudden. Williams has great speed—nobody can cover him—and last week he caught every pass. Darby, that sophomore tailback, is very fast and Fowler is a real, solid player who runs and blocks well."

He also commended quarterback Randy Humphries, who "last week threw and ran options very well." Ben said that "instead of a great defense and respectable offense, they now have that great defense and a real fine offense."

Syracuse will be hurt tomorrow by the absence of Tom Hermanowski, who broke a fibula in the Pitt game. His place will be taken by sophomore Gary Bletsch, who will be backed up by Duane Walker, Dana Harrel and Chris Moutenot. The coach said Bletsch has looked good so far, but only the game itself will show how the pressure of starting affects his play.

Otherwise, the Orange will go with the same starting lineup that faced Pitt. The offensive backfield will have Newton, Bulicz and Godbolt, who are all averaging five yards a carry or better, with Paul Paolisso, who has hit on 42 of 73 passes at quarterback. These boys will find it tough picking up ground against a defense allowing 6.4 points a game and will probably use a lot of checkoffs to combat the shifting defense.

Ben admitted, "That defense makes no mistakes and is so well-organized we can't afford any errors; the warm weather and the 3,000 mile flight take their toll."

He said, "It's a question of getting ready so we take advantage of every break we get. They're the most physical team

SU frosh visit Army Plebes 'pointing' for second victory

By LARRY KRAMER

The Army Plebes will be the hosts today as the Syracuse frosh travel in quest of their second straight victory over a service adademy. WAER will air the game, beginning at 3:30.

"We're happy to win anytime we play an academy," said freshman football coach Jim Shreve, commenting on the Tangerine's 14-7 victory over Navy's frosh two weeks ago.

Shreve went on to say that the inexperience of the squad showed throughout the game. "We made a lot of mistakes, but you have to remember, this was our first game, and their third," he pointed out.

"Ross Sposato was our best blocker, and we received good performances from Ray Jarosz at end (three receptions), fullback Marty Januszkiewicz (two touchdowns) and Greg Allen (wingback)," continued Shreve.

Dennis Finnegan rated a "hero-of-the-game" rating from Shreve for his outstanding defensive work, including two interceptions. Other defensive standouts were Ed Berry, a linebacker and George Bodine, a defensive end.

"Army has been having a down year, but when you're losing, you tend to be tougher and meaner for the next game, and as I said before, academies are always tough," Shreve went on. "We service the varsity for about an hour a day, and this is one of the main reasons for our small schedule. We don't have enough time to work on our own game." The freshman carry a five-game schedule, including two home dates.

Everyone will be making the trip to the Army game today, including seven non-scholarship players.

"We plan to begin switching some of the positions the boys are playing," said Shreve, "in order to give them more experience at different spots. It will make it easier for us to fit outstanding freshmen into the position on varsity where they'll be needed the most next year."

Allen, a 5-10, 170 pound wingback from Plainfield, N.J. applauded coach Shreve's efforts. "He's a fine coach, and great to work with."

Sposato, a 6-3, 220 pound inside tackle, echoed Shreve's feeling about the academy. "It was a disappointment for all of us when the Manlius game was called off. It got pretty hard trying to get up for the Navy game," he said.

One of the two game captains for the upcoming Army tilt is John Lobon, a 6-2, 220 interior offensive lineman from Hartford, Conn. Lobon said, "Traveling is the toughest part of the away games. We spent 16 hours on the bus to and from the Navy game."

The second game captain for tomorrow is Jarosz, a 6-4, 215 pounder from Westtown, N.Y.

Another player to watch is Joe Ehrmann, an interior lineman from Buffalo, N.Y. He is being groomed to possibly fill the shoes of the departing senior Art Thoms. Erhmann has the size, 6-5, 240 pounds, to make his presence felt.

Calling the signals for the offense again this week will be Larry Hatalsky, a 6-2, 180-pounder from Mechanicville, N.Y. Calling the shots for the defense will be the "Mike Man," 5-10, 190-pound, Clark Yingst.

Yingst and Doug Auld, a 5-11, 210-pound middle guard from Weymouth, Mass. acted as game captains against Navy.

SU crew set for Charles

By GINA BELL

The Syracuse crew is not dead--it is alive and well and living for a race in Boston this weekend.

It may come as a surprise, to a number of people to learn that the crew is in training this fall, let alone preparing for the race of the season. The crew is above the traditional scramble among athletes for recognition; they've got bigger things on their minds. Things like shaving seconds off the times they racked up in the "practice races" against Marist College last weekend. Things like surviving the rugged practices they've been having all week. Things like winning some gold in the Big One--the Head of the Charles, the race held in Boston this Sunday which will climax two months of practice.

The crew is psyched for this race, and with good reason. They've got a lot at stake. The junior eight will race as defending champs, and will try to bring home another gold medal. The senior eight, last year's silver medal winner, will be racing against some of the toughest crews in the country, including the Penn varsity, which lost to Harvard by a few feet in the Olympic trials.

Several oarsmen in the varsity boat, which is stroked by Bill Wilson and includes Duane Hickling, Gary McKinney, Lynn Gardner, Steve Rogers, Don Plath, Chuck Harris, Captain

Nixon's foes schedule 'silent' treatment here

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

An orderly but not so subtle demand that Richard M. Nixon break his "campaign silence" will be made tonight at the War Memorial, where the Republican presidential candidate will make what is expected to be a major speech.

A number of SU students have created an ad hoc committee, known as the Nixon Reception Committee, to present the demand in the form of a candlelight march to the War Memorial and the singing of Simon and Garfunkel's "Sounds of Silence" once inside.

Gene Kane, one of three directors of the committee, estimated a turnout of 1,200 for the march. About 70 students have been named marshalls "to assure that the march is orderly," Kane said.

The demonstration is planned to begin at 5:45 p.m. according to Kane, when participants will assemble in Walnut Park near Waverly Avenue.

With lighted candles in hand, the march will then proceed to the War Memorial.

Here, said Kane, participants plan to sit as a group, and, after Nixon is introduced, the "Sounds of Silence" will be sung "as if the whold world depended on it."

Kane gave three reasons for forming the NRC and the march.

One, "Nixon has refused to debate." One of his refusals came to a request from the local Democratic organization, with Vice President Humphrey's backing, that the two meet at the War Memorial tonight.

Two, "Nixon's avoidance of the issues, of refusing to take clear stands."

Three, "We're insulted at the Madison Avenue approach which is his entire campaign." He has decided to make himself a Neon god.

As a secondary purpose, the march is planned to be "super-orderly, to show the public that students can dissent in a meaningful procedure," said Kane.

"This is a dramatization, not a demonstration," he said. "We want an orderly dramatization of youths' concern that they can find no one to lead them."

Kane said the NRC is anxious to be distinguished from demonstrators representing other organizations which might be present, not only to assure the identification as an orderly organization, but also because "Nixon has never been confronted by an orderly demonstration. We wonder how he will react."

The Peace and Freedom Party has said that it will also demonstrate, not necessarily peacefully.

Philippine statesman sheds light upon American' 'misconceptions' of Asia

By JUDITH T. SCHLESINGER

Despite more than 100 years of United States involvement in Far Eastern affairs, the American people are almost completely unaware of the true realities of Asian affairs.

Gen. Carlos P. Romulo, Philippine statesman–educator, expressed this viewpoint in an address to the College of Forestry convocation last night in Hendricks Chapel.

According to Gen. Romulo, Americans generally hold one of two misconceptions regarding Asia. The first is the romantic fallacy of the "mysterious East," including visions of Shangrilas, Oriental mystics and grass skirts. This glamorous myth is largely the product of the imagination of Western writers who "never bother to look at Asia as Asia really is."

The other view is directly opposite. It includes exaggerated images of "firece cannibals, poverty, dangerous and impossible mountains and insect–infested swamps."

Gen. Romulo cited other instances of popularly-held, distorted attitudes. "Many Westerners are inclined to think of the Far East as being backward and primitive, but Asia cannot be judged by Western standards," he ventured.

"Americans tend to believe that our new awareness is subversive," Gen. Romulo observed.

"We must develop according to our own national identities," he said. "Exact duplication of Western life would be a forgery."

Gen. Romulo stressed the fact that his people have always been grateful for American aid and guidance. Through Western technology an intellectual revolution has been taking place in the Philippines. Students who could not afford textbooks, are able to purchase paperbacks, and are now reading philosophy and politics.

"Everything is being brought into the circle of Asian awareness," Gen. Romulo said, using the example of a farmer behind his water buffalo, listening to a transistor radio for the latest news from Nigeria.

"You have been generous. You have always extended your hand to Asia, but only by understanding us can there be real real friendship."

Gen. Romulo received a standing ovation.

Broadens base

Student representation set for scrutiny

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Campus News Editor

Spurred by nation-wide campus incidents, an increasing number of colleges and departments within SU are seeking student opinions in policy decisions. Now University Senate, composed of administrators and faculty members from all branches, is holding open hearings.

The public hearings will be conducted today and tomorrow on the subject of student representation in University Senate and participation in the campus governance process. The purpose is to stimulate discussion on the Senate's decision of May 1968, to broaden its base by including students as voting members.

At this time, one student has a vote in the Senate. He is Ed Feldman, speaker of Student Senate.

The Committee on Students, chaired by Professor George Stern, is holding the hearings. Stern said, "They are the only device we've got to bring about a discussion as to where we (University Senate) should be headed.

"Those people who are most involved and who are concerned will voice their opinions," continued Stern. "The campus community will learn more about the issues and those members of the staff who are not active participants will know more of what students want. Until the staff hears students express their opinions, they can't respond."

During the past year, University Senate has made some progress toward broadening its base in order to make it more representative of students as well as faculty and administration interests. With creation of the Council on Student Life in November 1967, representatives from the student body, the faculty, the administration and trustees are all on the same committee.

Also, three ad hoc committees were created for the Black panelists charge racism

By GREG SMITH

Recognition of black heritage was the keynote of "A Black Awareness Panorama" in Kittredge Auditorium Friday, Saturday, and Sunday evenings.

Sponsored by PanAfrican Students Association, Society of Afro-American Students (SAS), and Urban League Youth Community, the panorama was designed "to bring together the black youth of the community and African students so they may acquaint themselves with their rich cultural background."

A Saturday panel discussion entitled, "Black Power as Defined by Afro-Americans and Africans" highlighted the event. Panelists during the sometimes emotional exchange between the panel and the audience were Betty Hubbard, president of SAS; Ron Ashford, editor of the Liberated Voice; Aubrey N'Komo, from S. Africa; and Slulumi Oldjohn, S. Africa. Ron Walters moderated.

Ashford, a senior, denounced SU administrators for "conspiring to maintain the status quo" and said that students' minds were being molded "just like children in kindergarten are molded." In response to a question, he urged that those whites really interested in changing things "join SDS and other similar organizations."

Miss Hubbard, a sophomore, minimizing a possible loss of her scholarship from "you white folks," claimed that "the power of the whites" was like an old

Profs lend support to Humphrey drive

By MONTYE CHAFEY

Former supporters of Robert Kennedy and Eugene McCarthy wholeheartedly endorsed Hubert Humphrey for president at the first meeting of "Professors and Physicans for Humphrey and Muskie" yesterday afternoon in Maxwell Auditorium.

The organization is not just a Maxwell group, but is designed for the entire university. The 110 registered members feel that Humphrey is the best choice for the Presidency because of his "diverse experience and achievements in politics and for his integrity and honesty as a person." In accord, they also endorse Senator Muskie because "he is fully qualified as a vice-presidential candidate if he ever were to succeed the President."

Economics Professor Irving Swerdlow, a former supporter of Robert Kennedy, said that the assassination and the Chicago convention caused him to reassess his ideas. He remembered while working in Washington on foreign appropriations that he had noticed in Senator Hubert Humphrey an "instinctive reaction to be on the right side." He concluded that Kennedy supporters should have confidence in Humphrey for "I honestly feel we are not taking a second choice."

Karl Schmidt, professor of political science and chairman of the meeting was a former backer of Eugene McCarthy. He reminded the audience that "rarely can we back a candidate who agrees with our opinion 100%." He stressed the point that "the old Nixon is very much with us" and asked the audience if they really wanted Spiro Agnew one heart beat away from the presidency.

The making of a memory, 1968

The falling leaves are memories, teardrops of a departing autumn. An autumn leaf came through our window the other day and we found its call irresistable.

It led our imaginations back to a time before the rain was filled with winter chill. We did not escape USA 1968 nor Campaign 1968 but we did imagine them amid foliage of red, gold and yellow, and sunshine.

It was a time when America was grappling with its history and trying to overcome its misguided actions of the past, a time when she was trying to remove the arrogance from her power to seek a newer world.

A young man gave voice to that budding America in words that were blunt, direct and passionate. He was no better than the rest of mankind. He was as astute a student of power politics as America could offer. The difference was in his combination of purpose and achievement, a recognition that power was neither good nor evil in itself but good or evil according to what purpose it was used and in what manner it advanced that purpose.

His call was not to law and order or to the silent majority which he knew was better off than ever before. It was to an America in which nobody would be left out. He appealed to the youth, the poor, the Negro, the Mexican–American, the alienated intellectual.

Nor was his role that of the detatched critic but that of the passionate participant, testing his ideas on the debasing battleground of action. Most important he faced America's problems rather than blaming them on foreign threats and conspiracies. He broke with the policy of his brother that dragged on in endless bloodshed while acknowledging his role in forming that policy.

Once upon a time he was off in the pursuit of justice and now the falling leaves are memories, teardrops of a departing autumn.

Guide for confrontation

Nixon night

By Abe Wagner

It is seldom that a single issue can find such widespread campus support as the prospect of thwarting Richard Nixon's second efforts at becoming the next President.

While wide disagreement still exists over who presents the most viable alternative, the hope that "tricky Dick" will once again snatch defeat from the jaws of victory burns in many a student's breast. To avoid student confrontation, the 1968 Nixon Campaign has steered clear of every campus in the nation, save that hotbed of Liberalism, Georgia State.

The appearence of the Republican nominee in Syracuse tonight presents far more than an opportunity for Syracuse students to confront this apostle of the past; it seems almost an obligation of the Syracuse student body to provide Nixon with the confrontation he has escaped thus far.

The plan proposed by the Humphrey-Muskie coalition for the best alternative shows marked ingenuity and appropriateness. I would encourage all to join in the singing of "Sounds of Silence."

If we are to judge by past performances of the local Republican rank and file, there should be a large percentage of the seats in the War Memorial vacant for those wishing to participate in the proposed confrontation. However, from the information we have received, the great American institution the door guards will be directed to prevent large numbers of students from entering the hall. To the end that all who wish to see Nixon might be able, I offer the following guidelines to success.

1.) Get in line early, looking as close to a human being, or at least the Republican image of a 'clean cut kid' as possible.

2.) Wear a Nixon button of some sort. You are dealing with people who have convinced themselves that there exist large masses of students for Nixon. They may be pleased with the turnout of young supporters and admit all bearing superficial signs. Once inside you may, if you choose; use the button to help tinplate the floor.

3.) Bring with you a Nixon sign. Better yet bring two of them and your 'magic marker.' Besides saving you the cost of your own sign you can take in the two signs, turning them face to face, and make your own. In observance of the impending holiday season, an appropriate slogan might be "Nixon for Halloween."

Remember, even if you can't vote, you can still sing. It is now that the crucial tide of the election is turning and we are guaranteed a national spotlight for our actions. Just as we cannot be party to irresponsible action, we cannot fail to act.

SDS statement on Nixon visit

SDS does not see Richard Nixon's refusal to debate with other presidential contenders as a significant reason for protesting his visit to Syracuse today. All Nixon has to offer is polite rhetoric about supporting the President in Vietnam, law and order, and permissiveness in America. What lies behind Nixon's rhetoric is that he will, if elected, continue the policies of racism, war, and general repression of the Johnson administration

The three major parties have run three candidates, all of whom, in their own way, promise four more years of the same repressiveness, war, and low quality of life we have seen since 1965. We must make clear our opposition to all candidates who offer no hope of radical change in this country. Nixon is one of those candidates. Let us make clear our opposition, and begin to convince more people of the validity of reasons behind it.

We will gather at 5pm at the 7—Hour Cleaners parking lot, corner of University Ave. and Marshall St. to go as a group to the War Memorial. This event is also sponsored by the Peace and Freedom Party, Medical Health Professionals Against the War, and Citizens for Gregory and Tussing.

Letters to the editor

Tourist

To the Editor:

I wish to inform Rami Khouri that your recent article concerning Switzerland appears to be a bigotted, one-sided (the backward side) view of their political and foreign attitude.

The only truism within this work is your title and sadly enough, your first paragraph. By the way, your first paragraph may be exactly why you were obviously received as you were.

I am sure you confined yourself only to a particular group class in that land, for I myself have talked with the Swiss people and have found the atmosphere to be extremely opposite from yours.

How assinine to dwell upon and place so much importance upon your ridiculous incident with the old woman in Geneva as a gross representation of the Swiss feelings towards foreigners. If you really believed that you witnessed contempt held for Americans by the Swiss people, then the picture you presented and the questions you raised, I am sure, instigated this feeling.

Only one other truth found in your irritating article - i.e., "the Swiss cherish their hold on reason and sanity." Perhaps, one should learn from and live by this, for this is surely the tool to a persuasive nature, not your "tourist" way.

A Friend of American
& Swiss Alike

Dear Friend of American and Swiss Alike:

I am most distressed to find that you have totally misunderstood my articles, and that you have found it appropriate to chastise me and not those who contribute to the situations I mentioned.

Bypassing grammatical mistakes and rather fiery accusations, I would simply, in both sane and sober mind, like to point out that I have not tried to instigate any contempt or antagonism between Swiss and Americans but, quite contrary to your beliefs, have tried to explain the reasons behind the feelings.

I would also question your right to label me a "tourist" (highly dangerous accusation you know). In all due respect, sir, I would kindly ask that verbal phantasmagoria be used where it could do most good. I love the Swiss for their many fine qualities. I've lived with them in great harmony for many years, and plan on living there for many more. If my article is truly "bigotted, one sided... assinine..." and "irritating" then please believe that it was not meant to be. If you fine me a gauche tourist, then accpet my apologies for my very sad personality. I can only suggest that one finish reading a multi-part series before denouncing it, and that perhaps fault is in the eye of the beholder, so to speak.

Respectfully,
Rami G. Khouri

Aspiration '72

To the Editor:

Contrary to the beliefs of Friday's Daily Orange, "Aspiration 72" will be aspiring this year and for many years following. Contrary to the beliefs of most Freshman, "Aspiration 72" is not a political party, but a program designed to establish scholarships for Negro High School students in Syracuse and to discuss their relative problems. The program was established by Larry Kramer and he plans to see it carried out.

The 35 Freshman that were part of "Aspiration 72" were supporting this program and not a Greek affiliated party, as many believe.

I feel that the DO, in discussing the false Senate accusations against Kramer in Thursday's edition, made it practically impossible for him to achieve victory.

THE CAR YOU IDIOT!

'Doing your own thing'

Dr. Willie stresses need for interdependence in America

By PATTI WILLIAMS

Every time an American dies in the electric chair or in Vietnam, every American citizen shares the responsibility for that death, said Dr. Charles V. Willie, chairman of the department of sociology, Sunday. Delivering a layman's sermon at Hendrick's Chapel, Willie changed the topic originally announced, "Crisis in the Cities," to "Doing Your Own Thing for Interdependence."

Willie used two quotations to explain what he meant by interdependence. The first was part of a Negro spiritual and asks, "Were you there when they crucified my Lord?" The second was a line of John Donne's poetry, "Each man's death diminishes me."

"When my neighbor is hurt, I also am hurt," said Willie. "Were you there when they shot John Kennedy? Were you there when they burned a hill in Vietnam? Were you there when they drafted a young husband and thus ended his life? Were you there when a man was sent to the electric chair in the name of the people?

"Whose life is being taken today that diminishes your life?" Willie asked. "We must acknowledge and accept our interdependence."

He suggested to young people who feel alienated from society that they seek out some evil in society and work to eliminate it. Each man is called to correct some injustice, according to Willie.

He discovered his mission, that of working to eliminate capital punishment, when he read an anti-capital punishment book by Clarence Darrow. Willie soon joined the New York State committee to abolish capital punishment and successfully worked for the passage of a New York State bill to eliminate capital punishment for most crimes.

"Retribution is a form of vengence that debases the avenger," he stated. He said the major argument for capital punishment, that it discourages people form committing major crimes, is invalid because many states with capital punishment have crime rates almost twice as high as those rates in states that have abolished capital punishment.

The question, "Were you there?" must also be applied to the issue of wars, said Willie.

"This is especially a question for women and older people and those who have exempted themselves from the draft," he said. "The existence of the selective service means the death of every soldier is on our hands. The war is a coersive practice that compels others to do our own misdeeds.

"Service in the war must become a voluntary act of love for the country or not exist at all. To require by law that another person sacrifice his life for your own safety is to brutalize our social interdependence."

"When I was in graduate school, I wanted to make sure I'd get to use what I was learning. That's why I went into marketing at IBM," says John Houlihan.

John earned his MBA in 1966. He now sells IBM computers to mutual funds, banks and other financial institutions.

"It's a management consulting job," he says. "The reason is, computers affect nearly every area of a business. I get involved with a customer's accounting, finance, and marketing. Which means I have to know something about each of these areas. So I'm constantly using the broad scope of knowledge I picked up in graduate school."

Working at the top

Another management consulting aspect of John's job is the level of people he deals with. "Most of the time," he says, "I work with vice-presidents and the data processing manager. But I also have to deal with the president because he's often the only one who can give final approval.

"And when you're working with people on that level, you need the management tools you get in graduate school. If a customer starts talking about a regression analysis, I can stay with him. Or, I might get involved in a linear programming study to determine the optimum stock mix for a portfolio. Believe me, getting an MBA was worth the extra effort."

Career areas for MBA's

Marketing is only one of several areas for MBA's at IBM. Others include finance and engineering. MBA's in finance can work in Financial Planning and Control, Financial Analysis, Accounting, and Information Systems. In engineering, MBA's work mainly in industrial engineering and manufacturing.

Whatever area you choose, we think you'll agree with John: "Getting my MBA was worth the extra effort."

Humphrey team . . .

Swerdlow and Schmidt both agreed with Stephen Bailey, dean of the Maxwell School, who stated that Humphrey is the best man for the presidency due to his personal characteristics and his positions on the issues.

Bailey had outlined the major issues of the campaign as being 1) "Which of the three candidates is most likely to resolve the tensions and war in Vietnam" 2) "Economic growth and fair shares in our own society" 3) "To rebuild the sense of community between black and white, law and order are not enough."

Bailey elaborated by saying on the third issue "we are going through the withdrawal symptons of 300 years on the drug of racial discrimination." Nixon indirectly and Wallace more directly are suggesting that we go back on that drug, he added.

The Dean of the Maxwell School said that in his 18-year friendship with Hubert Humphrey he had learned to admire Humphrey's knowledge of government, his understanding of people and his creativity and patience in widening consent for passage of programs in the senate.

George Frederickson, another political science professor, had planned to speak as a former supporter of Nelson Rockefeller for president who now is backing Humphrey. The meeting was scheduled in conflict with one of his classes, however, and he was unable to speak at the meeting.

The meeting ended after amendments were made to an advertisement drafted by the group in support of Humphrey.

The Nixon Reception Committee will assemble at Walnut Park at 5:45 p.m. instead of at 6 p.m.

WAER will broadcast Nixon's address live at 8 p.m. The speech will pre-empt any other station programming.

UU sessions this weekend

University Union is sponsoring a Leadership Training Conference this weekend to examine definitions of leadership and role-playing within a group.

In a series of general sessions, mock meetings and samll group discussions, participants will observe, consider and test the decision-making process.

The conference is open to all interested students, and required for anyone wishing to apply for next year's UU board positions.

Ron Wolk, assistant union director at Upstate Medical Center, is coordinating the project with UU. He is a candidate for a doctoral degree in educational psychology and has worked on a similar program at the University of Rochester.

The sessions will be from 1 to 5 p.m. Saturday in Haven Penthouse and at the same time Sunday in Lawrinson Penthouse. Students may register Friday at the UU office in Chapel House. They will receive booklets on group dynamics at that time.

Students wishing to attend must contact Mary Franciosi, ext. 2738, by Friday.

Shakespearean theater will be discussed today

Professor Robert Weimann, a visiting lecturer from East Berlin, will speak on Shakespeare at 4 p.m. today in Maxwell Auditorium.

Professor Weimann, on the faculty of Humboldt University, will discuss "Past Significance and Present Meaning in Today's Shakespearean Theater."

One of the best known of Germany's younger scholar critics and a member of the board of the German Shakespeare Society, Professor Weimann is a specialist in Shakespeare and the Elizabethan Theater. His publications have been translated into seven languages. He is also a recognized authority on the English novel and modern literary criticism, with books on Daniel Defoe and on the American New Criticism. His most recent critical study is "Shakespeare und die Tradition des Volkstheaters" (Berlin, 1967).

As a modern critic, Professor Weimann is interested not only in the historical significance of Shakespeare's work but also in its meaning in the context of today's rapidly-changing world. He will comment in his lecture on contemporary German productions of Hamlet.

Black awareness . . .

dress that one had worn too long. She prodded whites to "go to the laundromat and wash it" lest "we rip it off you in the middle of the street."

Benjamin H. Wright, who served the U.S. State Department in Liberia as a political and economic reporting officer, gave the main address Saturday before approximately 45 persons.

Wright, who has a B.A. in business administration and a M.A. in economics from the University of Cincinnati, was formerly employed as director of sales promotion and merchandising for the Johnson Publishing Co. and currently works for Clairol Products, New York. He has been active in a number of human rights endeavors, including having played a large role in organizing the Black Power Conference in Newark, July, 1967.

Terming America "a racist society," Wright rejected the philosophy of social integration as being "impossible," asserting that it was "against the will of God."

He said that Jesus had called on every man to be the best man he could possible be. Wright urged all black people to be the best blacks that they can be. He declared, "By definition a person is black if he has one drop of black heritage in him. If a black marries a white, the offspring are black. Unless America wants to end up a nation of people colored like the West Indians, she will not permit intermarriage on a large scale. Thus we cannot have social integration." Commenting that the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) and the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE) had only recently dropped the doctrine of social integration, Wright criticized the Urban League's Dr. Kenneth Clark for stating that, "social integration must come about."

Charging that "white America" has made "not one determined effort to correct the situation," Wright remarked, "I do not believe that you here are racists, but I do believe that you are heirs to racism. If you are aware of what's going on and you do nothing, then you are racists."

Wright accused "white America" of "psychologically crippling the black people." He compared "400 years of conditioning that blacks have received to believe that they were dirt" to a conditioned rat in a maze.

He blasted current welfare laws as "racism in the worst degree" and exclaimed that the manner in which history books depict blacks is "criminal."

Wright affirmed his desire for both black and white awareness of black heritage, exhorting blacks to display their "pride and dignity."

Between Wright's comments and the panel discussion, a ten—minute film, "Survival and Liberation of the Black Nation," on Freedom and Peace Party New York senatorial condidate Herman B. Ferguson was shown. Ferguson and Arthur Harris are currently appealing their 3-7 year sentences for being convicted of plotting to murder moderate civil rights leaders.

Approximately 75 had appeared Friday to hear Wright speak, but he was delayed and his talk was postponed until Saturday. Instead, two films from the CBS—TV "Of Black America" series were shown. They were: "Black History: Lost, Stolen or Strayed," narrated by comedian Bill Cosby; and "Black World," a discussion of the civil rights movement in American between Floyd McKissick, former head of CORE, Rep. John Conyers, Democrat of Michigan, and two prominent African leaders.

Plans for an "Africa, or Safari Night" this spring were announced Saturday. The affair would include African music, food, and folk dances.

Senate: committee the selection of a new Chancellor, committee for the reorganization of Senate and a committee to study the goals of the University. These were formed with the understanding that students would participate on them.

In reorganizing the structure of Senate, it is hoped that students will become voting members. Along that line, the Committee on Students would like to hear views on what proportion of the Senate should be made of students, what groups they should represent and how they should be chosen.

The committee is also concerned with the guidelines that should be set for assigning students, faculty members and administrators to particular senate committees. They would also like to hear opinions on the effects that people feel the changes will have on the University.

The hearing committee consists of Jesse V. Burkhead, professor of economics; Mrs. John Chapman and William S. Clark, trustees; Robert G. Cox, dean of the College of Business Administration; Charles R. Hicks, president of SG; Joan Howard, Graduate Student Association representative; Lillian Mohr, professor of home economics; David H. Owen, professor of English; Frank P. Piskor, vice president for Academic Affairs; Michael O. Sawyer, professor of political science; and Chairman George G. Stern, professor of psychology.

The hearings will be in Haven Hall penthouse from 2 to 5 p.m. today and in Flint Hall recreation room, from 7 to 9 p.m. Tomorrow they will be from 2 to 5 p.m. in the Founders Room of Maxwell.

THE OLD Record Rubber Will Be Back AGAIN THURSDAY

Nowhere to go but up

Holy Cross is next foe

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

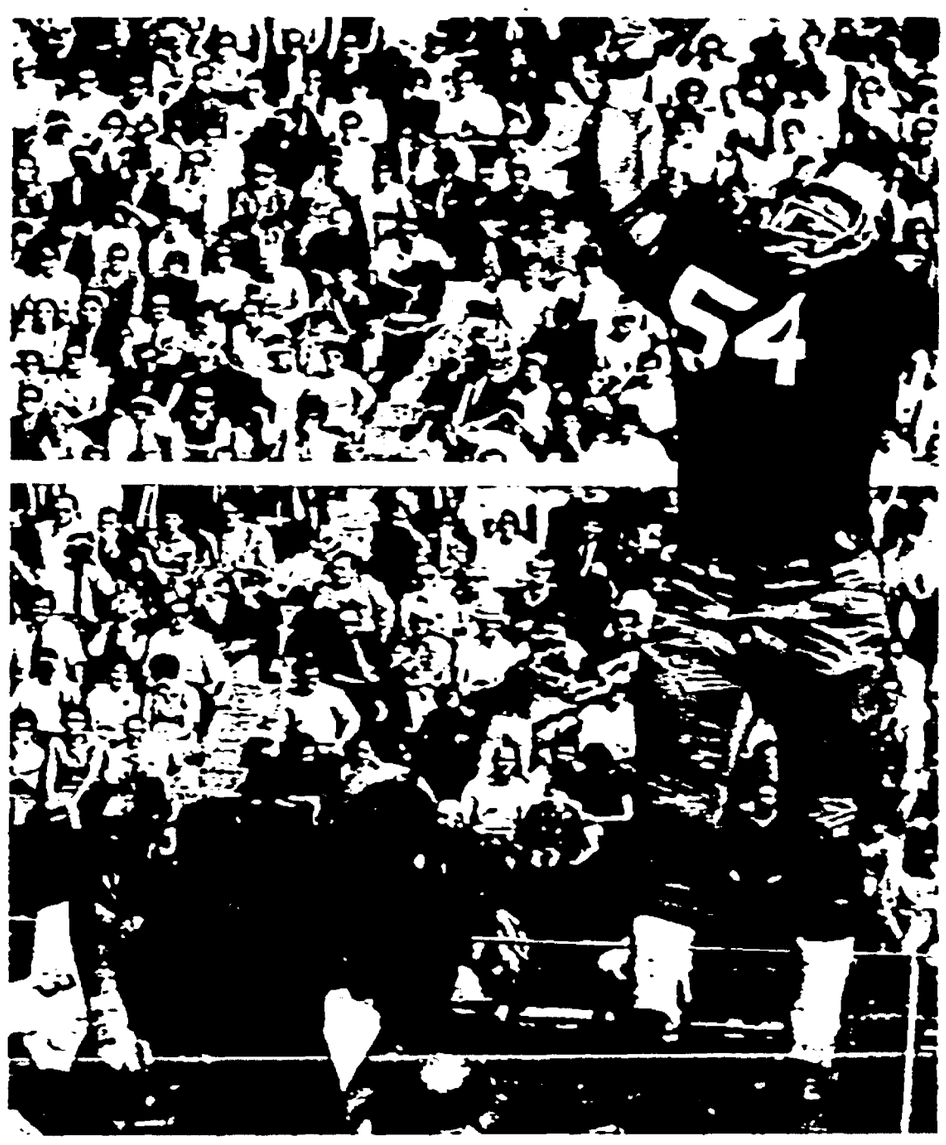
Battered in body and bruised in pride, the Orange of Syracuse will attempt to pick up the pieces from Saturday's California game. At times like these, SU fans should say thank heaven for Holy Cross, the Orange's next opponent.

The Crusaders have beaten only Dartmouth and tied Boston University in five starts this year. Their latest setback came last Saturday at Buffalo, where they were nipped, 10-9. Harvard and Colgate have also notched victories against coach Tom Boisture's team.

"Over the years," noted SU scout Roy Simmons, "they have always been tougher at home." Holy Cross' Fitton Field in Worcester, Mass. was the scene of their lone win of the campaign. Its high school bleacher type seats hold 25,000 cozy patrons.

Holy Cross uses many formations on both offense and defense. Simmons advised the weekly press gathering at the Hotel Syracuse, "We'll see a lot of shotgun." This formation, popularized some years ago by the San Francisco '49ers, is actually short punt formation with a double wing and flankers. "They will send out four or five receivers," Simmons said, "since the quarterback is back deep and very maneuverable."

The HC quarterback is senior Phil O'Neil, who has hit 47 of 96 passes for 622 yards and two touchdowns this fall. Last year, in the Orange's 41-7 win, he only connected for 52 yards, however. O'Neil, whom some pro baseball scouts consider the best hitter in the New England college ranks, reportedly turned down a $50,000 bonus with the Detroit Tigers to play out his senior year.



Right end Bob Neary is the main target for the southpaw quarterback's passes. Neary has grabbed 23 for 323 yards and three touchdowns thus far, representing almost half the team's totals. Wingback Ed Murphy and tight end Jim McClowry are the other primary receivers.

Steve Jutras, a junior, is the leading rusher for Holy Cross, with 281 yards in 73 carries. He is not particularly fast, according to Simmons, but is good "at running over and breaking tackles."

On defense, the Crusaders, like California, are constantly shifting, which makes SU coach Ben Schwartzwalder's messenger system merely a guessing game.

"They are bigger than we are," said Simmons, "So far, they have been playing well for eight or ten minutes at a time. If they can put together 60 minutes, they could be tough."

Schwartzwalder seemed to take this remark to heart when he commented, "If we hit and make mistakes like we did against California, we will not beat Holy Cross; they will anninilate us."

Player of the week

Tough one for Bletsch

By BOB GALLAGHER

Coaches usually try to give the young players their game experience a little at a time. Gary Bletsch, sophomore defensive back, first got his feet wet against Pitt and then was totally immersed last Saturday against California.

The immediate inserting of rookie Bletsch into the starting lineup was because regular Tom Hermanowski sustained a broken fibula against Pitt.

Although he got some experience in the Pitt game, Bletsch thinks "It's better to get experience against a good team like Cal." His play against the Panthers wasn't very helpful to him in his first starting role, he said, becuase, "The Pittsburgh receivers ran different type patterns than California's."

For most of Saturday's game Bletsch was assigned to cover fleet Paul Williams who runs the hundred in 9.6. One of Bletsch's problems in covering Williams was not only his speed, but also the manner in which he ran his patterns.

"On deep patterns, Williams," he said, "runs straight down and tries to make the defender turn one way or the other. Then he cuts the opposite way. Most receivers take two steps before they go up field, but he took five, which prevents the back from coming up until the ball is in the air."

Bletsch thought that possibly he might have respected Williams' speed too much, and played off him too far. "I thought since I was a rookie, they would throw to him a lot, especially long bombs, but they didn't throw as many as I expected," he said. While Bletsch was on Williams, he only managed to grab two passes.

"California," Bletsch said, "went after us all the time and never let up. They were a good team and once they got the upper hand they kept it." SU has its problems—fumbles and interceptions, and the Bears had the answers—points and points. "They capitalized on our mistakes, and when we broke down they took off," he said.

Saturday the Golden Bears showed they were a tough team with a balanced attack. "California hit hard," Bletsch said, "but we stayed with them physically."

Bletsch can play safety as well as half back, and last year as a freshman he played linebacker. "I like them both, but all I want to do is play. The major differences between the two positions," Bletsch said, "is that the safety has more responsibilities and must cover any receiver who goes deep."

If Bletsch can continue to keep his head above water, then after a few more games he ought to be able to sink some opponents and help dam up a sometimes leaky pass defense.

Soccer Club

The SU Soccer Club, skillful but outmanned, dropped its last two games of the year to a couple of the strongest teams in the East, Cornell and Colgate.

The club finished the year with a 3-4-2 mark against varsity competition.

Ben puts blame on himself for worst loss since 1952

By DOUG GARR

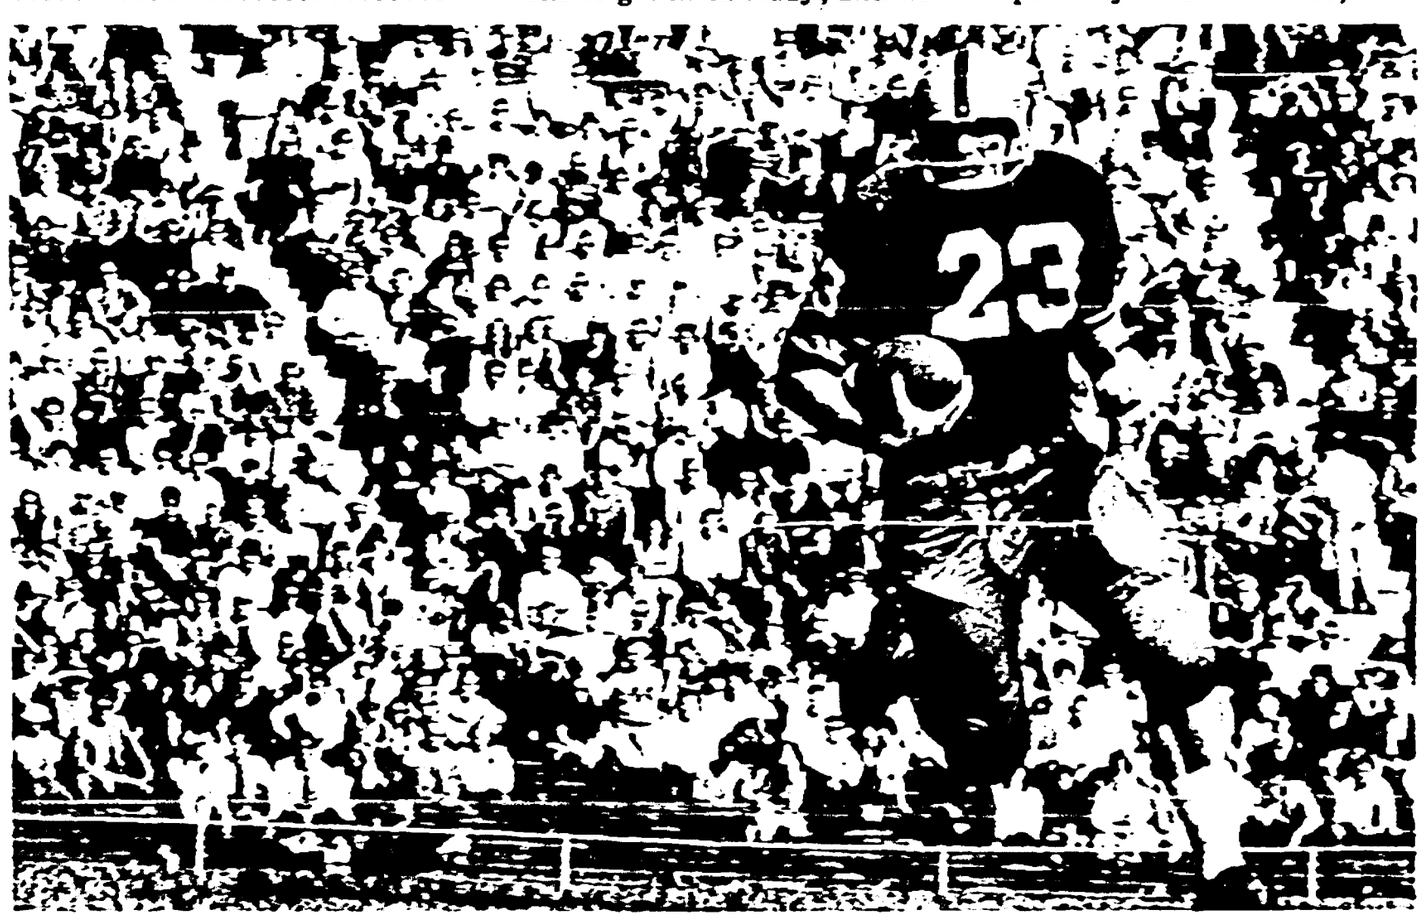
There was no joy in Syracuse on Saturday, as the Orangemen had a rough day in Berkeley, Calif., losing to the Golden Bears, 43-0. The game was like the Syracuse weather; awful.

To sum up a day that was comparable to a Saturday afternoon horror movie, coach Ben Schwartzwalder said, "We didn't do much of anything right—thinking, executing, or hitting." He said that the offense made numerous mistakes, which were capitalized on quickly by the hard-hitting California defense. The offense was plagued by numerous penalties, fumbles and interceptions.

The interceptions hurt the most, as the Bear defense was all over the SU receivers. "You can't blame all the interceptions on the quarterback," Ben said, "because players were missing blocks and the offensive line had a bad day."

Schwartzwalder declined to blame any individuals in Saturday's loss. "I had two weeks to get them ready, and we just didn't play football. There's just one guy I can point to, and that's me."

One of the most important problems the gridders had was a failure to carry out individual assignments properly. Ben said, "A big mistake was simple execution — we just weren't doing any of it." He said this ultimately led to the costly errors that hurt the team.



The Syracuse coach also said there was a "lack of concentration or enthusiasm" which affected the team's play. "The boys just weren't in a working frame of mind," he commented.

One of the things that the gridmen will work on in preparation for the Holy Cross game will be fundamentals. "Fundamentals on a physical basis are very important. If you get away from this, you're going to lose ball games," Ben said.

"When you lose a ball game like that, there aren't a lot of good things to say," Ben said, but he did manage few words of praise. "The defense played respectably for a while, and Gerry Beach, Steve Zegalia, and Ray White played all right."

Offensively, Schwartzwalder thought that Lee Castner, Bill Maddox and John Massis turned in good performances.

The coaches have already forgotton the past and have started viewing movies of the Holy Cross eleven. The Orangemen will be hungry for victory in Worcester next Saturday to erase the memory of their worst loss since 1952.

Colgate trips SU Harriers, but frosh win

Syracuse's varsity harriers went down to their second defeat of the season at Colgate Saturday, but the frosh team ended its campaign with a convincing victory over the Red Raider yearlings.

Colgate's Andrews set a new course record as his team defeated the Orange, 21-36. He covered the course in 26:47, besting the old record by three seconds. Larry Zuller, who has been the most consistent Orange runner all year, took second place, only 16 seconds behind. The third place Colgate harrier was another four seconds back in the extremely close race.

Dale Parfitt of SU was fifth, Dave Crans eighth, and Phil Riposo 10th in the field.

SU will finish its dual meet season against Penn State Saturday, and a winning record will be on the line.

The frosh, meanwhile, finished with a 3-1 slate, losing only to Cornell. They defeated Colgate, 21—40, behind the one-two finish of Bob Quinlan and Mark Sandberg. The Tangerines also swept fifth through 10th places under the cool and rainy skies.

Quinlan's time of 14:59 was off the course record, but he was not pushed at the finish, with a lead of 40 seconds over Sandberg. The SU freshman held off his Colgate opponent by five seconds for the place position.

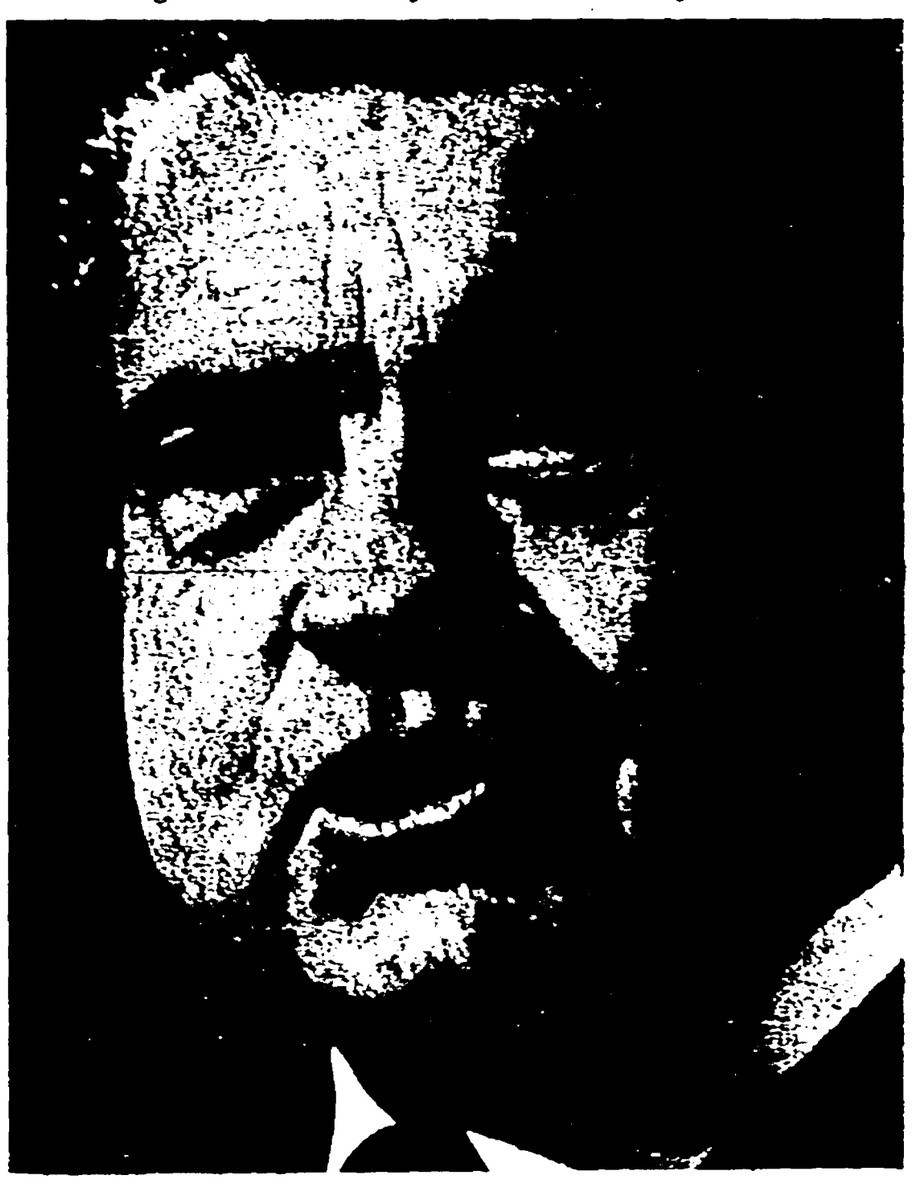
Nixon answers SU students, predicts 3-5 million vote win



With 1968's presidential campaign entering the homestretch, Richard Nixon brought his bid to Syracuse last night. Hundreds of SU students joined approximately 8,000 area residents to hear the candidate's spiel. (Photos by Haxo)

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

"New York is even," declared Richard Nixon in Syracuse last night as he speculated on a 50-50 chance to capture the electoral votes of one of the nation's seven most populous states -- targets of the final days of his bid for the White House.

Nixon seemed pleased at the state party unity displayed as three of the top New York State Republicans joined him on the dias before the highly partisan crowd that packed the Onondaga County War Memorial. They included state party chairman Charles Schoeneck, Senator Jacob Javits and Govenor Nelson Rockefeller, who introduced Nixon.

"There is no question that we will win the popular vote," claimed Nixon, projecting a three to five million vote margin over his opponents. "I will abide by the results of the popular vote. Whoever gets in should be the next President."

He claimed his Democratic opponent Hubert Humphrey will not do that, saying Humphrey wants to win by a deal in the House of Representatives. "In your hands rests the power to see it won't happen."

The beginning of Nixon's speech was interrupted by the protest singing of "Sounds of Silence," by hundreds of SU students sitting in the rear of the auditorium. Nixon, informed of the protest in advance, took it calmly.

"We're going to have an unusual treat," he said. "I understand we have a group of Syracuse University students who want to sing a song to express their differences with me." At that point, he stopped to let them sing. Even as the crowd started to boo, he admonished, "Let them go."

When the protest was finished, he said: "This is a very unusual group because they have said they will listen after they sing. Those students have set an example. We've allowed them to talk and now we're going to talk."

Nixon told the group that he had read the words of "Sounds of Silence" and he wanted the young people to hear the "truth." Speaking first of a treaty for the non-proliferation of nuclear arms, he said "I supported the treaty a year ago and I support it now."

He qualified that support by saying that while the Soviet Union had troops in Czechoslovakia we shouldn't negotiate a treaty. "Let's make sure to keep it." The crowd, containing hundreds of area high school students, roared its approval.

In rebutting a television commercial that claimed Nixon was opposed to Social Security, he said, "I have always supported Social Security." He accused his opponents of trying to mislead older people because "They're afraid of what they are going to do to them on election day."

Speaking on peace in Vietnam, Nixon said, "Compare the record." Appealing to the sentiment of the crowd, he boasted: "I served in an administration where we ended one war and had eight years of peace." He made three broad recommendations for Vietnam saying it was first, "necessary to see that the South Vietnamese have something to fight for."

Secondly, he said we must get the South Vietnamese "so that they can protect their own country." Thirdly, we "have got to broaden the number of people around the negotiating table," meaning representatives

Police idle as Nixon foes stay orderly

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

Students' bitter disapproval of the GOP presidential choice poignantly confronted Richard Nixon as he ventured near SU last night.

An impromptu SU glee club filled the War Memorial with Simon and Garfunkel's "Sounds of Silence" as the candidate rose to speak. Apparently prepared for this well-publicized demonstration, Nixon reclaimed his seat until the 700 musical dissenters completed their chorus.

Once Nixon began his address, most students remained silent and orderly while discouraging others from heckling. A handful seemed to have come only for the preliminary revelry, and walked out before the speech. Several dozen also left during the address.

Like Nixon's campaign, last night's protest was admirable for its logistics and sophistication. Press releases were distributed to national newsmen and marshals were appointed to maintain order within the group.

When the marchers, some holding candles, reached the War Memorial, they were relegated to a limited portion of the rear balcony. Sections of the auditorium remained unfilled -- ostensibly "reserved." High school students, arriving later than SU's contingent, were shown to seats near the center.

A number of students who could not find seats in SU's section were asked to leave, although scores of chairs elsewhere loomed emptily. One highlight of the festivities in the rear balcony was Louis Jacobs' verbal sparring with the Secret Service and Nixon's advance men over this apparent seating inequity. One officer was overheard radioing for advice after Jacobs emphatically demanded that students be allowed to occupy the unclaimed seats.

Although assorted justifications were offered by policemen, fire inspectors, Secret Service men and Nixon staffers, it did appear that a concerted effort was being made to minimize attendance by collegians.

As Nixon's appearance drew closer, SU's block became saturated with nearly 100 security personnel. Forces sending representatives included the Onondaga County Sheriff's Department, the Syracuse Police Department, the US Secret Service and the Syracuse Fire Department. Robert D. Flaherty, director of SU Security Police, also kept an eye on balcony activities.

However, this intensive security cordon was distinguished by the absence of any nightsticks. Only one instance of forcible eviction was observed, but not in the SU section.

Before the speech, one of Nixon's national advance men informed protest leaders of certain "guidelines." He said the police would let them sing, but would not tollerate profanity, smoking or candles.

SU's New Left groups also turned out for Nixon's visit, but their seats and manners were segregated from those of most campus demonstrators.

Students' voice

Faculty Senate lends ears

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

Faculty decision-making is centralized on an all-University basis in the University Senate, which is composed of elected representatives from each of the colleges and a substantial number of administrative personnel who participate as ex-officio members with votes.

The major work of the Senate is conducted through its standing committees, one of which is now holding hearings on the subject of student representation in the University Senate and participation in the campus governance process.

Professor George G. Stern, chairman of the Committee on Students, is also serving as the chairman of the open hearings. He commented on the presentations that were made yesterday afternoon during one of the sessions.

"Several students came and spoke about what they feel is needed in the University and the response of the committee was a good one. The purpose of the hearings is to get people to express their opinions and that is what has happened so far," said Stern.

The committee is composed of two trustees, one administrator a representative from the undergraduate and the graduate student body and six faculty members. It is taping the three sessions, including the final one which will be held this afternoon from 2 to 5 p.m. in the Founders Room of Maxwell. A report will then be compiled by the members and submitted to the University Senate.

The report will play an important role in the reorganization and reapportionment of the Senate. An ad hoc committee has been formed to study the reorganization, which hopes to include students as voting members of the University Senate.

At this time one student is a voting member. It is hoped that through the open hearings, the committee will be able to decide how many students should become members and how they will be chosen.

The importance of the work of Senate committees can be illustrated by the role of the committees on Curricula and Appointments and Promotions. These committees have, by tradition, made the final decisions concerning changes in the curriculum and faculty promotions.

Although promotions are formally approved by the Board of Trustees on the recommendation of the Chancellor, it has become the custom to grant "pro forma" approval to the list submitted by the committee.

One committee which was recently formed is the Trustee-Administration-Faculty Committee on Academic Policy and Planning. Through this committee, the Senate participates directly in discussions with representatives of the Board of Trustees and the central administration.

Democratic reform

The attempt to sing "The Sounds of Silence" at last night's Republican Rally won few anti-Nixon converts. Instead it demonstrated again the futility of irrational protest, especially at a pseudo-event like an organized political rally.

The democratic system is working in the same manner it has always worked. The legitimate complaint of all who are upset with it and its end products lie within society from which our democratic mechanisms produce superficial reflections.

The improvement of society is a task for the far-sighted and long-winded. Until utopia arrives, however, we might work toward democratic reforms that will minimize our cultural failures, and maximize the opportunity for social advancement.

First, let us agitate for the direct election of delegates by popular vote to our political conventions in order that a future McCarthy may be more justly treated when he runs for high office in New York State.

Campaign finances for Congressional candidates should come in many small contributions from private citizens and from the national committee of the party. Such financing would reduce a Congressman's dependence on local interests and increase his concern for the national interest.

Where one party has long been dominant, thus allowing some dunderhead Southern senator to pile up seniority, the reformist zeal should be channeled into the creation of a competing party.

Congressmen, instead of legislating between campaigns, should be freed to devote more concentration upon their jobs by doubling their term to four years.

In the similar interest of increasing governmental stability in order to deal with the pressing problems, the terms of senators should be increased to eight years, with half the senate re-elected each presidential election.

Furthermore, the twenty – second amendment which places a two-term limit on presidents should be repealed. A second term president tends to deteriorate into a lame duck by the time he enters his seventh year and cannot govern effectively. Domestic and foreign policies need a sustained, long term approach, not that of fitful presidential power.

Finally, we agree with the writer in the June 1964 Saturday Evening Post who was irked at Lyndon Johnson's refusal to debate Barry Goldwater and said: "Television debates were not designed to serve a candidate for office: they were designed to serve the public."

"Debates prevent a candidate from waging a campaign on the basis of special interest appeals - no longer can he say one thing when addressing labor and something else when addressing business. Debates force a candidate to present a systematic program . . . Voters also have the opportunity to see the real man, not the synthetic product of public relations."

These words, especially true this year, were written by Richard Nixon.

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

This campus is full of addicts. They are constantly indulging in their habit, and carry addictive materials with them at all times. They are easily indentifiable by their strong odor, bad breath, stained fingers, loud coughs, and lingering air pollution that they carry wherever they go.

It seems strange that the use of tobacco which started as merely a simple pleasure has expanded into a "disagreeable way of life" for millions of people. Even though the practice of smoking cigarettes is physically harmful, asthetically unnatural, somewhat perverted, and unclean, modern advertising techniques supported by capitalistic purely economic pressures have succeeded in conditioning a tremendous smoke-filled sub-culture in the world.

When cigarettes are described as a pleasurable undertaking, I think of heroine. In both cases, what should be momentary enjoyment becomes perpetual indulgment. The concept of physical pleasure is completely out of hand in our society. If you have ever seen a cigarette addict have a "nicotine fit" you should agree that if cigarettes were made strongly illegal there would be many people now no better off than our present day junkies.

I can understand how a naive college student could become a cigarette addict. I can't understand how sensitive, intelligent people, people who question and doubt the world as it exists today, can support the "war and political machine" in this country that they value so little by purchasing heavily taxed cigarettes, and at the same time support a habit with such obvious diminishing returns.

Whatever your reason, my friends and I would like to help you stop or diminish your cigarette problem. Join the "unhooked generation" call X3934 any weekday evening.

To the Editor:

In observance of the Jewish holiday of Sukkot, the Hillel Foundation constructed a Sukkah, a holy sanctuary, adjacent to Hendricks Chapel. The Sukkah is a threesided wooden structure with branch coverings.

Some person or group of persons ripped apart this Sukkah and stole the plywood boards that were used for the sides. The Sukkah was thus rendered unusable for the remainder of the holiday period. Thus the Jewish students desiring to observe their holiday were deprived of this opportunity by a small group acting without regard for the rights of others.

It is hoped that this type of incident will not reoccur. We would also greatly appreciate it if anyone having information concerning the whereabouts of this material would contact the Hillel office.

Sincerely,
The Hillel Executive Board

An Autumn night on the Quad

A gentle breeze drifts past my uplifted face
Calls to the crisply browned leaves with warm memories
Of a summer's day lost just one sunset ago,
Softly raising them from their beds and carrying them
In a silent, fluttering flight to the barren earth.
The stars look on, pretending not to take notice of
That which the night imprisons within its blackness
As the tiny leaves lying crumpled in the grass carpet
Like the ground-out butts of so many used cigarettes
Are raised in death by the wind to a dancing mockery
Of the music of the summer which gave them life.

They walk alone along the unfeeling strips of cement
Laid carefully over the encompassing sea of green life
Which refuses as yet to succumb to the cold winter's night
Holding still a final hope for a summer already defeated
Holding still a promise of a spring not yet anointed.
Or else they walk in pairs through the blades of grass
Happy with life and trying not to think of winter's advent
Content with autumn and wishing not to see it die
Defying the silence of death with punctuations of laughter
Sharing their life in a storehouse of love to penetrate winter
And bring about the sweet renaissance of the spring.

It heaves its massive domed form high above the death
Which surrounds it on all sides and attacks the steps
Conquers the frozen, stone steps with brown invaders
Borne by the wind to the opened doors and the strange light
From within made even stranger by the blackness of the night.
An unmoving, colonnaded visage scowls at the strollers
Blaring itself in uncompromising light against the darkness
Murdering the black unreality of night as the lonely ones are Murdered by love; the bleak whiteness of the infinite steps
Caresses the lonely and the lover in the roughness of reality
As a constant threat of certainty in the eternal vagaries of night.

Part one — Growing up absurd

University environment

Editor's Note: This is the first in a two part series by Dr. Julian Friedman, Associate Professor of Political Science, on the current state of university affairs.

Today universities, including Syracuse, are growing up (and down) absurd. Something is clearly wrong in places other than Denmark. The proof of this state of affairs appears to be the demonstrations and happenings in the groves of academe. The crisis is of epidemic proportions. By good fortune, however, the mandate of change has arrived in the nick of time from quarters unknown, and it is getting a thorough going over in the suites of chancellors, mountain retreats and coffee houses. Daily new committees, full of student and faculty representatives, are joining the ranks of the Muscatine, Gardner, Kerr, and lately Cox commissions in the search for salvation. To my way of thinking, the causal explanations of the situation are woefully inadequate. As for the currently fashionable remedies, most only add to the prevailing absurdity.

According to learned opinion and tell-it-like-it-is circles the university is afflicted with a stultifying malaise of irrelevance. That is a way of saying that the centers of higher learning are out of touch with the world of which they are part and parcel, of the social and political environment to which they are attached. While they have been doing business as usual, a new order has been evolving in the United States, which deserves to be called the conglomeratist society, after the emerging conglomerates of finance and industry. From the domain of these giants radiates influences that penetrate education and government, which are being coopted to serve them.

To many people these days, as in the past, the universities do seem vastly irrelevant. However, that is not because in fact they are so but because they tend to adapt and adjust slowly to new conditions: first in ideas and last in action. Actually they are forging firm links with the conglomeratist order, of course with variations for the diverse institutions involved. For example, the long standing partnership between pedagogy and publishing is steadily being integrated into the communications arms of the conglomerates, at the same time exposing it with ever greater intensity to technological moderinzation.

It is very interesting that the students should be more sensitive than academic administrations and faculties to the changes under way in the economic, social, and political environment. Consequently, they sense painfully the prevalence of obsolescence in the university environment. They are very properly concerned about the future, their future in particular. If they have overreacted on occasions, the basis for their reaction is, nonetheless, real to them. Their initiatives are their way of mediating the incongruities between the university and the society at large and of providing direction and content for long overdue reforms, which academic leadership has too often neglected.

GUESS THAT BLOWS THEIR NIELSEN RATING.

Discussion group evolves

JERB outlives purpose; liaison committee to take over

By HELENE MACDONALD

JERB is dead.

The Joint Evaluation and Review Board (JERB), created by the Association of Women Students (AWS) to approve constitutions submitted by living centers wishing to go on optional hours, has outlived its purpose and died quietly early this semester.

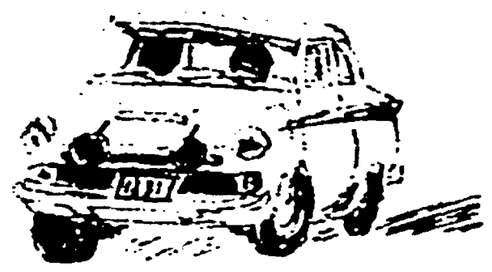
All living centers housing upperclassmen now have optional hours so JERB's responsibilities of reviewing the submitted constitution, interviewing the group as a whole and then interviewing representatives of the group are finished.

However limited JERB's purpose was, its members (students, head residents and members of the Dean of Women's staff) found there was potential in the informal discussions they were having.

Last spring, AWS Exec decided that a committee having more jursidiction than JERB was needed and began to draw up a structure for the new body. The groups making up JERB were to be included in the new group.

The liason committee, as it was called, was approved by the Dean of Women's office. There was little jursidiction left for a group to obtain, so an unstructured discussion group evolved.

The liason committee or "LSD" (living situation discussion), as Chairman Joan Zofnass calls it has met three times. Its aims and functions were discussed at the first meeting, the Mount and dorm government at the second and security and parietal hours at the third.



The meetings are informal, designed to test ideas and get reactions from the people involved. Two members of the Dean of Women's Staff, 10 head residents and nine students attended the third meeting.

Suggestions about the need for more lights behind Newhouse Center and Kimmel dorm were made and will be discussed at the next meeting. Several people will be reporting about the possibility of having men proctor all night in large dorms.

Step forward anticipated

Minnowbrook proposals emphasize change

"If the resolutions passed at Minnowbrook this weekend are realized, fraternities at Syracuse will take a tremendous step forward."

This statement by Bob Kelly, president of the Inter Fraternity Council, reflects the hope of delegates and administrators who attended the annual I.F.C. Minnowbrook Conference this past weekend at Syracuse University's Adirondack retreat.

Guests of the conference included Dean of Men David Tatham; Melvin Mounts, assistant to the dean; Robert Massey, Fraternity Affairs advisor; Arthur Jansen of the Alumni IFC; and Ed Feldman, Speaker of Student Senate.

The theme of the conference was "Change." Dean Tatham, in his Saturday morning address, suggested that although tradition has given the Greek system much strength over the years, it may also endanger the flexibility of Greeks to adjust to current trends and to needs of Syracuse undergraduates.

Delegates discussed three general areas. The first, chaired by Kelly, concerned rush. Starting this semester, members of the IFC will visit freshmen on their floors to discuss merits of the Greek system and answer individual questions. Prior to the holiday break, a six-day open contact period will be set up whereby houses will be divided into three groups according to their geographic position on campus. Houses of each area will be open for two days during the six-day period.

A pre-rush convocation in December will explain rush procedures, answer questions and distribute the "Meet the Greeks" booklet.

Unlike previous years, freshmen will not be required to visit a certain number of houses to obtain stamps. However, freshmen will be encouraged to formal rush more than one house.

A second group discussed what the Greek System can offer to freshmen, and more important, do these offerings meet the needs of freshmen. It was proposed that fraternities should continue their progress in seeking new ways of promoting unity other than by hazing. Houses were complimented on introducing increased academic emphasis in their pledging programs.

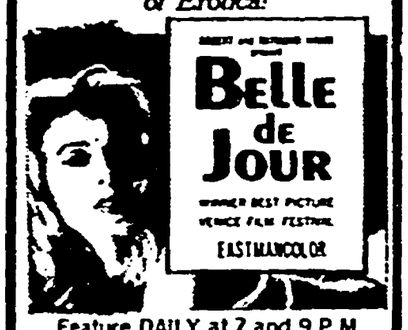
Said Gery Yoh, IFC treasurer, "The incoming freshman is more concerned with academics than ever before and we must be also."

A third discussion re-evaluated the role of IFC and proposed a change of structure. More work will be done in small groups and brought together in a coordinating committee.

"This organizational structure is used very effectively by the Traditions Commission," commented Ron Beeber, IFC secretary and Traditions member. "More work is accomplished, more people are actively involved, and less organizational meetings are necessary."

Regular meetings of IFC will be conducted monthly.

Through the efforts of Bob Brandon, IFC vice-president, a professional public relations man will be consulted to seek better means of communicating with the campus.



A personal persentation of the ideas and proposals of the Minnowbrook Conference will be made to each fraternity chapter by an IFC representative.

Markets nobody else knew were there made Mustang and Thunderbird a success.

Help wanted:

Does the growing youth market offer a new potential?

Situation: By 1972, 46% of the U.S. population will be under the age of 25. If this is a new market with substantial potential, should we base our product concept on economy or performance characteristics?

Consideration: The under 25 market poses some interesting opportunities. For one, today 142% more young people work toward advanced college degrees than did the youth market of 10 years ago. That would seem to indicate a need for a new car based on economy of purchase and operation.

But, market affluence and the increasing number of multiple car households could indicate that a new vehicle should be developed around high style and high performance.

Need the facts and your analysis of this assignment for a meeting with management next month. Thanks.

Wide open for suggestions

Personnel defend bookstore procedure

By RAMI KHOURI

Apparently angered by a DO story concerning complaints thrown at the Bookstores, Mrs. Melba J. Hrncir, cornerstore manager, yesterday replied to the accusations.

"It seems very strange to me, stated Mrs. Hrncir, that so many students and faculty members can complain about their experiences with the bookstores, yet so few of them have ever come in to talk with us." Many students come to the bookstores asking for course books and are met with the familiar "Sorry, we're all out of that at the moment, but it should be here within 10 days or so."

Students and faculty immediately call the bookstore every name in the book, and walk away with a sore throat and zero for accomplishment. The problem is not lack of manpower in the bookstores or lack of effort by University personnel. Mrs. Hrncir attributes missing books to problems of shipping, delivery, books being out of print, orders mishandled by publishers, among other reasons.

Another bookstore favorite, said the manager, are the students who get their lists of suggested reading and come prancing to the information desk. "Excuse me, bellows the student, but do you have any of these 300 history books?"

The problem, she said, is that the professors of most courses do not submit these lists to the bookstores.

Mrs. Hrncir said she wishes the professors of the University to visit her at the store and talk with her about books to be used in courses. Books for the students could easily be ordered in advance and held for specific courses, she said.

She said a very small number of the faculty ever see her about such matters, and when the students do not find the books they desire, "everyone is unnecessarily irate."

All bookstore personnel are "wide open for suggestions and ideas from both faculty and students." The cornerstore has semi - annual "faculty book fairs," at which new books are displayed. Invitations are sent to all instructors and professors, but few ever follow with a visit to the stores.

Concerning prices, the bookstores "would like to make it clear that the profit margin on new books is very small," and that prices are set by the publishers, not the bookstores. Mrs. Hrncir said that she would be glad to show any interested person the publishers' invoices if prices are thought to be unfairly high.

For this reason, the cornerstore must carry merchandise other than books to supplement profits. Such items as records, dolls, clothing, posters, etc. are slightly higher than M street prices. Though prices are beyond repair, there is variety. If the store does not carry a certain album, tape, or poster, students need only inquire with the management for help, said Mrs. Hrncir.

Mrs. Hrncir said she is also planning to establish a department of campus authors in the store, but cannot do so unless and until prominent writers on campus respond to the invitation to see her about it.

If we were happy with the world the way it is, we wouldn't need you.

Kids choke on polluted air. Streets are jammed by cars with no place to go. Lakes and rivers are a common dumping ground for all kinds of debris.

This is the way the world is, but it's not the way it has to be.

Air pollution can be controlled. Better transportation systems can be devised. There can be an almost unlimited supply of clean water.

People at General Electric are already working on these problems. And on other problems that need to be solved. Problems like developing more efficient ways of providing power to our cities and figuring out ways our production capabilities can keep up with our population needs.

But we need more people.

We need help from a lot of young engineers and scientists; and we need help from business and liberal arts graduates who understand people and their problems.

If you want to help change the world, we'd like to talk to you. We'll be visiting campus soon. Why not drop by the placement office and arrange for an interview? You might be able to turn a problem into an opportunity.

WAER staff

In a recent WAER staff change, former Public Affairs Director Robert Kravitz was appointed to the position of Promotion Director. The new Public Affairs Director is Ernie Grafe.

The Public Affairs Department is hoping to produce several documentaries in the near future. Anyone interested in working on one of these, or in otherwise getting involved should contact Ernie Grafe between 3 and 5 p.m., Wednesday through Friday, in the Public Affairs office in the WAER prefab behind the main library.

WAER airs discussions with Pinebrook members

WAER Radio presents a special three-part interview program devoted to the recent Pinebrook conference, today through Thursday at 6 p.m. The series is part of "Syracuse University Forum," aired Mondays through Thursdays.

Today's and tomorrow's segments will feature discussion with students who participated in the conference from Oct. 18-20, and the Thursday program will present faculty members. Tuesday night at 6, Cassandra Morrow interviewed Cindy Bailey, president of the Association of Women Students, John Diamond of Student Senate and Jeff Portnoy, vice-president of Student Government.

Wednesday's guests will include Sally Clonninger, president of Panhellenic Association and Chuck Hicks, president of Student Government. This year's Pinebrook conference centered around Academic problems including curriculum and relations between faculty and students. Representatives form the major university student organizations were in attendance, along with top administration and faculty members. Discussion will include many of the concepts that came out of the conference and plans for implementation.

from the Soviet Union and Asian nations.

Nixon raised many issues that have pleased his audiences across the country for much of the campaign. Referring to American prestige abroad, he shouted that the "American flag isn't going to be a doormat for anyone." College dissenters were another of his targets. as he said "Anyone who comes to a college or university should accept the law or he doesn't belong there.

"If we have a continuation, they're going to deny the right to study of many thousands of students." At this point, the crowd cheered, presumably both for Nixon and policemen ejecting a heckler.

Getting down to the issues, Nixon called for a new foreign policy, a new military policy, a volunteer army after the war is settled and millions of new jobs with private enterprise. Speaking of welfare, he said it "should be generous," but when a welfare client can find a job, the government should "get him off welfare."

"What happens in America, and America alone," concluded Nixon, "will decide peace and freedom in the world, There is nothing wrong with this country that a good election won't cure."

STARTING ROLE has finally come for senior John Bulicz. In his first two varsity years, Bulicz backed up Floyd Little and Larry Csonka, who didn't need relief too often.

Scissors man Bulicz is no cutup as starting wingback

By IRA SILVERMAN

After riding the bench for the better part of two years as an understudy for Floyd Little and Larry Csonka, senior John Bulicz, 6-0, 196, is the only senior on the SU starting offense, and, as such, must be counted upon to settle down a squad that at times has been less than relaxed.

Wingback is a position that allows Bulicz to run, receive, pass and block. Playing right outside the tight end, Bulicz is able to survey both the Orange formation and the opponent's defense.

Perhaps Bulicz's most important running play is the scissors play. "I take two steps back," explains Bulicz. "I then fit behind Newton (fullback) and inside Paolisso (quarterback). Then I just look for a hole. It can be anywhere from inside tackle to around the short end."

Bulicz has also been an important factor in SU's passing attack. He ranks third on the team in receptions with 11, which have been good for 87 yards and one touchdown.

"The best part about pass receiving is that I can freelance a lot," Bulicz says. "I run, shoot, curl and drag patterns.

"On the drag pattern," he continued, "I first block the tackle or end. Then I hold and wait for the linebackers to move back. Then I look for an empty spot."

While Bulicz has been an important receiver and rusher (146 yards on 26 carries for a 5.6 average), he has also been quite effective running the pass-option play.

"The option play depends a lot on the fullback," explains Bulicz. "His fake or block is very important. First, I wait for the short-end to fake and get in the clear. Sometimes I look for the quarterback." So far this fall, Bulicz has completed 2 of 3 passes for 58 yards.

Bulicz, who is married, came to SU from Sheffield, Pa., where he was All-State in football and basketball. In high school he played right halfback on offense and defensive linebacker. He was bird dogged by SU alum Frank Baker.

Bulicz picked up tips from Little and Csonka that have really helped him. "Little helped me in blocking bigger men," commented Bulicz. "Unlike Csonka, who over-powered opponents, Little chopped them down by hitting them low.

"I gained a lot of overall knowledge from Csonka," he continued. "He helped me with my basic game."

Commenting on the California game, all Bulicz could say was "Nothing seemed to go right."

For the first time this year, Bulicz was not able to catch a pass. "The linebacker and defensive end dropped off in the flat," explained Bulicz, "where I usually run my pass patterns. This had never happened before."

Bulicz, like the rest of the team, will be working primarily on fundamentals this week for the game Saturday at Holy Cross. The Crusaders will have a hard time stopping the four-way threat that Bulicz will impose from his wingback position after last week's great disappointment.

Don't knock the Rock

Man in the cage is Archbold rage

By MIKE WEBER

The New York Yankees may have their "Big Pete" and "Little Pete," but it is doubtful that any male student or faculty member at SU would trade our own Robert Palumb for anyone.

Palumb, better known as "Rocky," has been a fixture behind the "cage" in the men's gym for the past dozen years. Issuing towels and other gym gear, the "Rock" has gotten to know just about everyone who has ever crossed the Archbold portals.

"Oh sure," said the seemingly ageless "keeper of the gear," "I'm a friend to anyone who wants to be friends with me. And I've gotten to know just about all the athletes that have played here in the past 12 years."

Rocky then began to run down a list of some of the athletes with whom he has become personally acquainted. The list included such notable alums as former gridder Al Bemiller, All-American basketball star Dave Bing, the late and great Ernie Davis, right up to Larry Csonka and Floyd Little.

"All the athletes I've known have been really great guys," commented Palumb. "Guys like Ernie Davis and Floyd Little were just as fine off the field as they were while playing.

"In fact, Floyd spoke at my son's athletic banquet three years ago. My son, Peter, was head football coach at Nottingham High and asked Floyd to speak. Just like that, he was there. A really fine boy, that Floyd."

Rocky and his wife Dorothy, who is coach Ben Schwartzwalder's secretary, have a daughter, Carol, married and a teacher in the area. Peter Palumb is now head coach at West Genesee.

"The Rock" was born in Syracuse and attended Central High School and Central City Business School. After graduation, he took a few electrical jobs and then became general foreman for Remington Rand.

"I worked there 25 years," Palumb remembered. "In fact, if they hadn't moved to Elmira, I'd probably still be with them. But, I was married and I couldn't do all that moving around, could I?"

Rocky heard of the job opening at SU and upon applying, found himself embarking on a second career.

He commented, "I like Syracuse and all the kids here. I've had a lot of fun and I'm glad I came."

He then began to describe his jobs at the university. The jobs which have brought him into contact with nearly every Syracuse male student as well as opposing football players.

"It gets hectic around here sometimes. You have to try to keep peace in the family by satisfying everybody. That's impossible of course, but you have to try."

Rocky feels that the busiest part of his year is just beginning, with the advent of the winter sports program.

"In just this one building, we have to accomodate all the students, in addition to wrestlers, fencers, swimmers, gymnasts and the crew team. And with basketball intramurals starting soon, things really get busy."

A joker at heart, "the Rock" has a few stories which have become imbedded in his memory. He told one about a student who complained there was no soap available.

"I told the kid that we had put liquid soap in with the shower water and that it came through the spout. He just smiled and walked into the shower room. About ten minutes later, he came back and admired himself and said 'Works pretty good, Rock.'" Groan!

Another story which has caught "the Rock's" fancy was about a freshman who gave Rocky his measurements to be sure his gym equipment would fit.

"I gave him a pile of gear and he asked if it would fit. I told him if it didn't he could come back at three o'clock when the tailor would come. Well, sure enough, he came back at three and asked me if he was here yet. I said 'who?' He answered. 'The tailor, of course.'" Of course!

And so, the life of Robert "Rocky" Palumb, Syracuse's "man in a cage," goes on.

Times uncertain

SU eights second in Boston

By GINA BELL

Hang—up of the Week: how to write a story about the SU crew's exploits at the Head of the Charles when nobody knows who won the race. Solutions? Accept the unofficial times, which are invariably wrong and which several coaches, Syracuse's Bill Sanford included, are hotly contesting. Accept the unofficial unofficial times, which place both Syracuse entries in second place and which will hopefully be confirmed by the official times.

According to the most accurate figures available, the varsity, competing against five other crews, was defeated only by an exceptionally strong Northeastern boat.

Sanford was pleased with the varsity's performance. "Although Northeastern got a lead on us in the first half mile, we managed to hold them off for the remaining distance despite rowing four strokes lower. Our new style, which we've been trying to perfect this fall, is coming through if we can understroke a strong crew like Northeastern and not lose ground."

At one point in the race, Northeastern, stroking much higher than Syracuse, almost caught up. Sanford said, "We trained to row 31 strokes per minute because we didn't expect any crew to be able to row much higher in a three-mile race. Northeastern was in phenomenal shape—six of the eight had rowed for a straight year. They were able to keep the pace up."

The junior eight looked strong in its race against 19 other crews, although it was rowing into a 25 mph headwind. Sanford remarked, "There were no fast times, because the conditions were pretty bad, but the JV did a tremendous job—much better than anyone had hoped for."

The Head of the Charles attracts crews from clubs, prep schools and colleges from places as far distant as California and Norway. The race, rowed upriver on a three mile, wickedly curved course, is fashioned after the famous English races, and is a test of both a cox's skill and a crew's endurance.

As a fall race, it is useful to coaches, who can size up the opposition's strength and prepare their winter programs to better it. To everyone's disappointment, the Ivy League coaches chose to enter fours instead of the expected eights, and thus prevented anyone's getting an estimate of their strength.

Self-government granted

AWS approves code

By HELENE MACDONALD
Associate Editor

The AWS code granting almost complete self-government to living centers and optional hours to second semester freshmen was passed unanimously by AWS assembly last night but has been somewhat deterred by the Dean of Women's staff.

In a letter received by AWS President Cindy Bailey shortly before the meeting, Dean of Women Marjorie C. Smith wrote that her staff had reviewed the code and "is in favor of a thorough study of the present optional hours program."

The letter also asked that the AWS EXecutive Committee meet with the staff, head and sorority head residents to "consider the many aspects of the proposal to codify the system."

However, this group would not cover one of the most important features of the code--freshman optional hours. The question of optional hours for freshmen would constitute " a major policy change which would require separate consideration."

The group studying the current optional hours system would be an ad hoc committee of the living situation discussion group, the descendent of the Joint Evaluation and Review Board, the body that approved constitutions for living centers desiring self- government.

Miss Bailey reported that many of the objections to allowing living centers so much self-government was that many of them have difficulties assuming the responsibilities that they already have and moral responsibility would cause more problems for the center.

Now that the idea of the code has been passed, it will go to the ad hoc committee for study and revision and will be brought up again.

AWS would remain a coordinating center and a communications network if the revised code is approved. The study also could call for a complete revamping of AWS.

AWS has been meeting with representatives of freshmen floors and living centers to discuss the procedure for these groups to obtain optional hours.

Miss Bailey said, "AWS hasn't presented a strong case for freshmen optional hours this year but we are collecting facts and data to prove that freshmen are ready for optional hours."

AWS currently does not have a vice-president because of the resignation of Pam Abraham. Under the AWS consitution, the president can appoint a vice-president, subject to ratification by the assembly.

Miss Bailey asked for applications from anyone interested in the position. Although the requirements are 2.5 average and 75 completed credit hours, these can be waived by petitioning AWS Judicial and Review Board.

Four changes proposed for parking problems

By VICTOR LIVINGSTON

Representatives of Student Government, meeting with Syracuse Traffic Commissioner Joseph Rice yesterday, proposed four changes in campus parking regulations, two of which "have a good chance" of being enacted.

Jeff Portnoy, SG Vice President, Chuck Hicks, SG President and administration representative David Tatham, Dean of Men, proposed the following changes be initiated:

1) Extension of alternate street parking from 8:30 a.m. to 6:00 p.m.;

2) Alternate street parking on Comstock Avenue, from Colvin Street to East Adams Street;

3) Short term metered parking on the right side of College Place;

4) Short term metered parking on Ostrom Avenue between East Adams Street and University Place.

The first proposal, if enacted, Portnoy said, "would mean students would not have to move their cars early in the morning."

Comm. Rice was receptive to this proposal and will send a recommendation to City Hall in the coming weeks.

Alternate street parking, originally proposed on Comstock Avenue from Colvin Street to East Adams Street was deemed impractical by Comm. Rice, due to heavy traffic volume. However, alternate street parking may be available from Euclid Street to East Adams Street on Comstock, and this proposal is currently under study by the city.

"Short term metered parking on Ostrom Avenue between East Adams Street and University Place would allow people a short time to stop in the dorms. As of now, they have no place to park in that area.

Ostrom Avenue, Comm. Rice said, is " a dangerous, uphill, narrow street," but reported that a study of the area will be made.

Also proposed by the SG representatives was extended on street parking around the St. Mary's complex.

Proposals made, however, were termed not feasible by Comm. Rich who said that the streets must be kept clear for snow removal.

Comm. Rice commented on the removal and defacing of traffic signs on campus. He asked that students not deface or remove signs in the interest of safety. If a student wants a sign, he said, he may contact the Commissioner and purchase one.

Students to join ranks of instruction committee

By JEAN HAVENS
Associate Editor

The Committee on Instruction of the University Senate is seeking ten student representatives to join the ranks of the faculty and administrative committee members.

The Committee is concerned with academic instruction and, according to SG president Chuck Hicks, was responsible for the institution of the pass-fail option.

Five of the students will be undergraduates, representing as wide a variety as possible of campus groups. According to chairman Dean Alfred H. Cope, the committee is hoping to attract students "who are outside of the formal organizations," such as honors students and "others who are not able to take part in the student elective process."

Interested undergraduates should contact Chuck Hicks, ext.3569. They should be prepared to submit one or more paragraphs describing what they feel would be their role or function on the committee and how they think they could be involved.

Five graduate student representatives will also be chosen. It was recommended that at least two of the five be teaching graduate assistants.

Student members were also added to this year's Liberal Arts Judicial Review Board which hears cases on cheating and similar matters concerning Liberal Arts students. The three student Review Board members are Gilda Harris, Lowell H. Brown and Mike Shapiro.

Barred students take action

Obtain apology from chairman Bogardus

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

Members of the SU Young Republicans and the Peace and Freedom Party took action quickly yesterday after being denied admittance to the Richard Nixon speech in the War Memorial Tuesday night.

Representatives from the YR's, including president Andy Rosenblatt yesterday afternoon met with Republican County Chairman T. Elmer Bogardus, who had guaranteed their group front row seats in the auditorium. YR's returned to campus with a letter from Bogardus offering his "sincere apologies for the unfortunate situation which prevented the club's delegation from attending the Nixon rally Tuesday night."

Peace and Freedom Party members late yesterday morning were rejoined by two of their members who were arrested by Syracuse Police outside the War Memorial Tuesday night. Charged with disorderly conduct and resisting arrest were PFP SU chapter secretary-treasurer Larry Augustyniak and New York State PFP organizer Larry Alexander. They were released on $500 bond with Liberal congressional candidate-Maxwell instructor Dale Tussing co-signing their release.

Over 300 Young Republicans and friends, and approximately 100 PFP members were turned away from the War Memorial Tuesday, having arrived sometime after 6:30 p.m., the time the Fire Department officials closed the doors for safety reasons.

YR's Rosenblatt, concerned not only with Tuesday's incident, but with the County Committee's attitude toward the group, came away from the meeting "very satisfied." Bogardus said that he and the "County Committee recognize the importance of student participation in politics and we are grateful for the active and worthwhile work that your club is doing in this election. I trust that your interest will continue in the future. I assure you that your efforts will be recognized and rewarded."

In addition to offering an apology, Bogardus agreed to pay the charter fees for the four buses Republicans filled Tuesday, promised to provide funds for a post-election YR victory celebration and will try to bring a major speaker to the SU campus under YR sponsorship.

In a statement on PFP arrests, Dale Tussing yesterday protested "vigorously against the brutal, illegal and un-American activities of police and Republican Party officials at last night's Nixon rally." The PFP held an "internal meeting" last night to plan further response to the incident. Details will be made available for Friday's DO.

Agreement Prior to Election

It is opportune at this late date to revisit "Our Next President," a slender volume of black humor by Russell Baker. It must be remembered that Baker was originally a promising reporter of the NewYork Times' Washington office. Baker, however, saw the futility of seriously reporting what went on in that great city and has been practicing his own brand of the theater of the absurd ever since.

Although Baker did not foresee all the startling events leading up to this election, he did predict a stalemate in the Electoral College and the election going into the House of Representatives. He also predicted bartering and bribing there for the prize and another stalemate. The Senate finally acted on January 15, 1969 to elect a vice president who became acting president and saw to it that a legitimate president was not elected.

Although we cannot foresee if the election will go as far as the House Representatives, we would do believe if anything near the events Russell Baker so humorously describes were to transpire, then the unity and order that is left in America would evaporate.

In the future the Electoral College should be abolished and the president chosen on the basis of who receives the majority of the popular vote.

In the event of this election going from the Electoral College to the House, we think all major candidates prior to the election should instruct the House delegations to vote according to the popular vote of the state, regardless of which party now controls the delegation.

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

The beauty and tragedy of the "Sounds of Silence" will reverberate forever in the War Memorial as of Tuesday night's reception of Richard M. Nixon.

We would sincerely like to thank all those who took part in the Candlelight March and the dramatization by song in the War Memorial's Republican Rally.

The Nixon Reception Committee was not backed by the Democratic or Republican parties, nor for that matter the American Independent Party. NRC was a coalition of many different views unified by an orderly demonstration, and we accomplished the major goal of our committee.

Richard Nixon addressed the people who were " hearing without listening," but national media realize Nixon was still a man of the "Sounds of Silence" after his unreceptive speech.

To the marshalls and all who maintained the proper form of protest and joined the committee, NRC owes an inexpressable vote of thanks.

NRC

To the Editor:

Due to a death in my family I was unable to take an exam last Friday, October 25, 1968. I notified my professor Thursday night to tell him that I wouldn't be in for the test. I was upset to start with but even more upset when my professor asked (told) me to provide him with written proof as to why I wouldn't be in class Friday.

What's wrong today? Are student morals rapidly decaying? Is the older generation losing all or any faith they have or may have had in the student body? Maybe it's both.

Please withhold my name.

Correction

In my column in Tuesday's DO, I attributed the plan for the singing of "Sounds of Silence" to the Humphrey—Muskie coalition for the best alternative, based on information given me by people presenting themselves as members of this coalition. In light of information given me later, I no longer attribute this plan to the coalition.

Peace and Freedom Party

Statement on arrests

At 5:00 pm, Tuesday, October 29, the Syracuse Peace and Freedom Party sponsored an organized protest to the candidacy of Richard Nixon. The protest was not allowed to occur because the Syracuse Police Department barred entrance to all members of the Peace and Freedom Party with what can only be termed "the strictest suppressionary force."

Prior to the demonstration, on Sunday afternoon, October 27, 1968, representatives of the Syracuse Police Dept. came to the Peace and Freedom Party headquarters at 116 Standart St. and discussed the protest movement with the party coordinators. It was at this time that the Syracuse Police assured PFP that its members would be allowed entrance to the War Memorial without incident. In addition, the Onondaga County Republican Committee and the Syracuse news media had announced the Nixon rally as a free, open, public event and did not inform the public that most seats would be "reserved."

At 4:15 pm on October 29, PFP phoned the Syracuse Police Dept. and were informed that entrance of all protestors to the War Memorial would be barred. This reversal of police policy, which they said was forced by the Onondaga County Republican Committee, occurred 45 minutes before the scheduled departure of the approximately one hundred supporters of the protest. Had the Syracuse Police notified the Peace and Freedom Party about the change in police tactics, appropriate arrangements might have been worked out. However, the Syracuse police made no attempt to notify PFP.

...arriving at the War Memorial, after a march from Marshall St. and University Ave., Larry Alexander called for the PFP people to stay together in a group. While organizaing the loose members into a unit, two unidentified policemen pushed him into the crowd and told him to keep moving. Larry demanded to see their identification and police badges. They were wearing yellow-caped raincoats and their badge numbers were concealed. The police kept pushing Alexander with increasing roughness and in frustrated anger, he shouted: "What are you, chicken? Show me your badges!!!" In reply one of the peace officers swung his night stick. Larry dropped to the ground and covered his face and head to keep from being hurt. (Or, more correctly, to keep from getting as hurt as he would have been otherwise.) The police dragged him into the street and pushed and pulled him into a police car. The charge was disorderly conduct and resisting arrest.

The case of Bruce Augustyniak is similar enough to be described as the same and indeed, the charges were the same.

As other members of the protest group dissipated into the crowd to avoid such physical conflict, the police continued to suppress any possible protest action. (It is interesting to note that there was no noticeable protest to be suppressed. No chanting, obscenity, or violence.) Persons with long hair, moustaches, beards, sideburns, or just those under thirty, were systematically rooted-out of the audience by the Syracuse Police and Secret Service agents.

The Peace and Freedom Party categorically states that the Republican Party and the Syracuse Police Department have committed acts of political repression. We shall take whatever action is necessary to correct these injustices and prevent their reoccurence in the future.

Part two — The aroused generation

Editor's Note: This is the second in a three part series by Dr. Julian R. Friedman, Associate Professor of Political Science, on the current state of university affairs.

The aroused generation on the other side of the gap contains discontents of every shape, form, and size. The revolutionaries make fine weathervanes for the movement but leave something to be desired as meteorologists. They have no monopoly of militancy, while not all the militants on campuses share the same values, sentiments, or perspectives. A substantial portion, to whom stability means a great deal, are seeking change primarily to hasten the arrival of the new status quo, not the revolution a la Marx.

It is in this context that I offer some comments on the proposed innovations in the academic community. Students have unfurled the banner of participation. They want to participate in decision-making and policy formulation and in management. It is simply wonderful that students are willing to perform tasks gratis that others are paid to perform and at the same time to tender tuition to the university for the privilege. The message I detect is that they want to join the establishment immediately rather than wait to do so until they have departed from the campus. It looks to me that many want to get locked into the system in their tender years. It is one thing if the protest over student participation is an expression of democracy. It is quite another if it is essentially a reflection of consumer sovereignty of the marketplace variety. In the one case the university as a way of life is at issue. In the other the issue is education as a commodity. Surely so vital a question should not be resolved solely on the principle that the customer is always right.

As an innovation students are to teach courses. I find this development puzzling. If I have heard the usual complaints properly, the problem is not that there are too few courses taught by students but that too many are being handled by graduate students, who seem to comprise the great proletariat of the campuses.

It is now considered very mod to augment the liberal arts curriculum with courses on Afro-American history, Black literature, and so forth, which admittedly can be most interesting but also quite peripheral. Ordinarily they can be expected to attract relatively few students, leaving the bulk in their ignorance and unexposed to these subject areas. It is imperative to bring these areas into the mainstream of learning, and that can be done only through the survey and advanced courses in major fields. These should be revamped without delay to include components that have previously been overlooked. Moreover, the aspects of knowledge in question should be part of the stock in trade of any social scientist and humanities scholar worth his salt and not simply assigned to graduate students as a way of siphoning off their militancy.

Much attention is now being paid to the quest for identity by Black students. The issue is unquestionably of first importance, but the kind of identity pursued on campus is open to question. At least alternatives should be considered or permitted. Perhaps in the final analysis the only one the White establishment welcomes is, paradoxically, Black Power. Afro-American groups are springing up, often with the official sanction of the university, and at several places their value has been amply demonstrated. I wonder, however, whether in most instances they are not the equivalents of the white Greeks, which have been unduly tolerated and even supported by administrations despite their declining utility to the academic community.

Student Senate

Dress code abolished for dining hall patrons

By COLETTE STALLINGS

The Student Senate last night approved a resolution that there be no dress code for any meal in any University eating center.

If any individual eating center wishes to establish a specific dress code, it may petition the Student Senate through the Government Structures Committee.

"This new policy does not eliminate health laws," remarked John Diamond, Speaker Pro-Tempore. "It is a New York State and Federal law that no bare feet are allowed in public eating places."

Chairman of the Student Services Committee Richard Barton reported that the Committee plans to set up a system whereby students may make a statement of a complaint and submit it to the committee through Patty Kuschner.

Barton also noted that the Student Services Committee is trying to establish a procedure for student evaluation of the bookstore. Academic credit may possibly be obtained for students in the College of Business Administration who are working on this evaluation.

A motion that the deadline for the submission of constitutions of student organizations be extended to December was approved. Constitutions for new organizations must be presented on creation of the organization.

The constitution stating the purpose of the Peace and Freedom Party to be the advancement of radical ideas, and the constitution of the Commuting Students Association were approved.

"If you like the executive branch of the government, and class governments, come "to the open hearing in 204 HL, Monday November 4 at 7:30 p.m. If you don't like them, don't come," said John Ross, Chairman of the Government Structures Committee. According to Ross, the Committee is working on a proposal to eliminate the executive branch and all class governments.

John Diamond will be a member of a faculty-senate committee which will meet Wednesday, November 6 to decide if there should be "one senate for the entire University." Such a senate would require representation of the administration, faculty and student body. Chairman of the committee is Dr. Eric Gardner, Chairman of the Psychology Department.

The Student Senate will not meet next week.

Promethean

The Promethean, "SU's independent magazine," may be bought for 10 cents a copy beginning tomorrow. Bruce Chadwick, editor of the PRO, cited "deep debt" as the reason for the charge.

The PRO had been given away for six issues in order to increase circulation to 5,000, but now must sell in order to cover printing charges.

Selling points will be in HBC, Newhouse, Maxwell, dining halls, dormitories and M-Street.

How to interview 170 companies in half an hour.

Just talk to the man from General Electric.

He represents 170 separate GE "companies" that deal in everything from space research to electric toothbrushes. And each of these product departments is autonomous. Each has its own management and business objectives.

So a job at General Electric offers the kind of immediate responsibility you might expect to find only in a small business.

Right from the start you get a chance to demonstrate your initiative and capabilities. And the more you show us, the faster you'll move ahead.

As you do, you'll find that you don't necessarily have to spend a lifetime working on the same job in the same place. We have operations all over the world. Chances are you'll get to try your hand at more than one of them.

Our interviewer will be on campus soon. If you're wondering whether it's possible to find challenging work in big business, please arrange to see him. He speaks for 170 "companies."

J-school committee discusses pertinent issues

The School of Journalism's experiment in communication — the Student-Faculty Liason Committee — has one meeting and a myriad of ideas under its belt.

The nine-member committee, including five elected students and four appointed faculty, met in Newhouse lounge Tuesday to define its purpose and outline specific problems that might come under its jurisdiction.

Dr. Edmund Arnold of the Graphic Arts Dept., who fathered the idea of the committee in conjunction with a steering committee of journalism award winners and officers of the two professional journalism societies, was temporary chairman. Dan Schlossberg, senior class representative, was later elected permanent chairman.

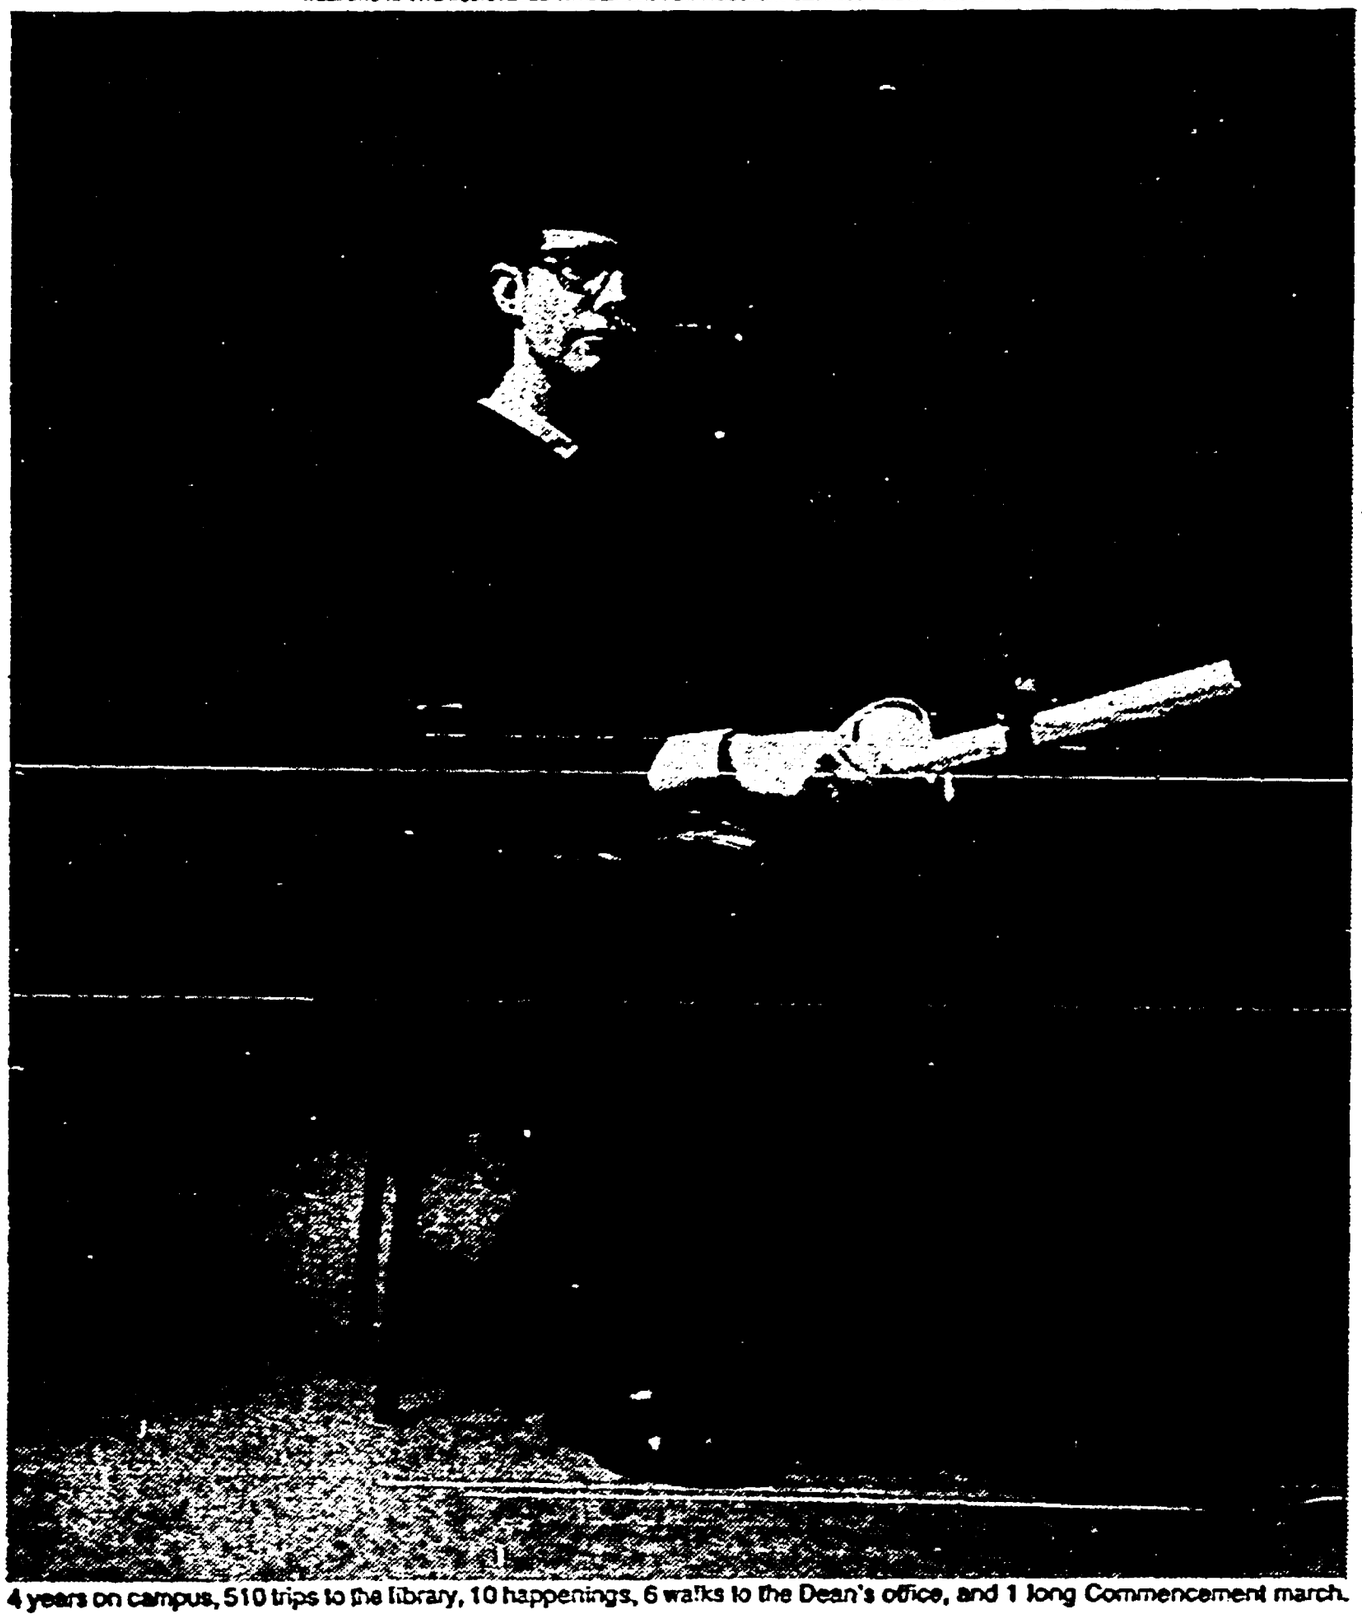
Others on the committee include faculty members Thomas Richards, Robert Kearns, and Don Vance, vice-chairman and student representatives Judy Ardito, freshman class; Janice Poplak, sophomores; Marsha Smelkinson, committee secretary, juniors; and Linda Chiavaroli, graduate students.

After deciding to use the power of influence rather than the power of decision-making, the committee outlined some of the problems facing students in the School of Journalism. Among them were the following:

Senior comprehensives, library vandalism, Friday classes, the option of writing a paper instead of taking a final exam, required attendance, a poll of student problems, an awards banquet instead of an awards luncheon, financing of the journalism school newsletter, a pass-fail marking system, and the possibility of getting a student from the committee to sit in on each faculty meeting on a rotation basis.

Dr. Arnold suggested that students sponsoring some of the above suggestions should be prepared to present a carefully thought out, well-worded statement to the dean so that it could be placed on the agenda at a faculty meeting.

The first of the prepared written statements are likely to be presented before the next committee meeting, Nov. 18, at 4 p.m. in the lounge. On the agenda for that meeting are a discussion of senior comprehensive exams, scheduled for Jan. 11; problems of class scheduling for spring semester; the question of student feedback; and the possible reactivation of Journalism Council. Also on the docket is a motion by Vance that students sit in on faculty meetings and possibly even on faculty sub-committee meetings.



A meeting of student leaders opposed to senior comps, including Sigma Delta Chi and Theta Sigma Phi officers, was held last night and may add fuel to the fire

'Good feeling'

Pumpkin contest gains money for treats

By ANDRIJ BILYK
Associate Editor

It took a broken arm, swollen lips and one totaled car, but with fairy god-mother's blessing Halloween is going to be a happy occasion for the children of Upstate Medical Center and Crouse Irving Hospital.

Jack Pierce, vice president of St. Mary's male dorm council, said that toys, candy, and pumpkins have been donated to the children's wards following the success of a dorm-wide pumpkin carving contest.

"Each floor obtained its own pumpkin. Size, color, and style in carving were unlimited and the finished products placed in the lounge. Residents voted by placing a nickel in the pumpkin of their choice."

Pierce said that he never expected the $97.15 which was raised. "It's fantastic," he said. "We had boxes of toys and candy."

Since St. Mary's is co-educational there were two winners. The men's second floor amassed 605 votes while the women's second floor took first with 201 votes.

The social chairmen, Jack Pierce and Karen Lider, both seniors, coordinated the contest for their respective dorms. It was when they (and two RA's) were leaving Nottingham shopping plaza that the accident occured. However, despite the demolished car, no one was seriously injured. And one has only to look at fourth floor RA Peter Clute smiling through his swollen lips to realize that everything is OK.

The children's wards aren't the only ones to benefit from this contest. For aside from the "good feeling" one gets in knowing that the children are happy, the second floor's residents, with a keg of beer supplied by the dorm council, will certainly adhere to rule six of the contest which reads:

"Winners of men's dorm and women's dorm will get together for a rally at the earliest possible convenience."

'Voice' in trouble

"Captive at Large"

Playwright obscures relevant theme with excess perplexity

By PATTI WILLIAMS

If you're interested in an evening of mental gymnastics, some comic relief and some superior acting performances, then see "Captive at Large," playing at the Regent Experimental Theater this Thursday through Saturday.

If, however, you become frustrated when you do not discover what a play is about until it is more than half over (and even then are not quite certain), and if you are irritated by abrupt changes of scene and mood, then "Captive at Large," is not for you.

According to programs given to the audience, "Captive at Large," is a play "of the here and now." Supposedly it has some significant things to say about drawing the line between individual liberties and the need for law and order. Written in 1952, it supposedly warns us of the dangers of Sen. Joseph McCarthy - type hearings and of military supremacy and is relevant today because of the Vietnam war.

It's a shame the play doesn't do what it's supposed to do.

The playwright's admirable intentions are lost, for the most part, in a maze of bewildering switches from reality to fantasy and from past to present. Pirandello can get away with such a technique, but David Mark, author of "Captive at Large," cannot. Mark has not only blurred the distinctions between illusion and reality, but he has decided to add elements of the unknown to an already confusing form of play.

The audience learns that a man is being sought after but it doesn't know by whom or for what reason. Suddenly, it sees the man standing in a yellow room about to bang on a radiator pipe but the audience has no idea where he is or why he's there. Next, men in trench coats are pursuing him because he knows a secret but the audience doesn't know who the men are, why the secret is important or what the secret is.

By the time the audience learns some of the answers (the third act) it may well be too frustrated to care. It is difficult to feel any sympathy for a character that you do not understand or know what to expect from. Just when you are about to feel that sympathy, the character is in a different situation, reacting in a different way and you must re-adjust yourself.

The confusion of the play was fortunately interrupted by moments of comic relief as two workmen, supposedly setting up scenes for the play within the play, revealed that they didn't understand the play either. This knowledge was comforting, but not much.

Act III, with one exception, remained in one time and setting. It also had basically one set of characters and thus was easier to follow. The act was a mockery of televised McCarthy—type hearings. It exposed the hearings as being staged for the benefit of television cameras.

The act was funny, perhaps too funny. The comic aspects of people playing up to television cameras may have been overemphasized at the expense of the dialog.

Soccer club floating, buoyed by $300 grant

By MIKE WEBER

Although Christmas is officially two months away, it would take a lot of trying to convince members of the Syracuse Soccer Club. The club was notified last Friday that they will receive an early present in the form of $300, according to president Steve Kass.

Kass said that the grant was given by an SU alumnus from Detroit, a member of the class of 1929. The club, according to Kass, had been seeking funds through the University Development Department for some time.

Until the receipt of this donation, the soccer club's members had absorbed all the costs involved in the team's functioning. Kass said the money will ease scheduling restrictions and that he has an eight to ten game Spring schedule in the making. In addition, plans are being made for the fall, 1969 campaign.

Kass then elaborated on the proposed spring and fall schedules.

"We have now made a name for ourselves among upstate New York soccer teams. We had a 3-4-2 record this year against varsity teams and outscored them 27-21 overall. Teams are coming to us for games now. It used to be the other way around. We feel we are now established."

The 3-4-2 record featured wins over LeMoyne College, Utica, and Niagara while standoffs were gained with Colgate and Hamilton College.

High scorers for the first-year crew were Joe Sayer and Gerard Ahombo with five goals apiece. Kass and John Van Steen were next in the scoring race with four and three goals respectively.

Kass said that Sayer acted as playing coach and was the "key man on and off the field."

"Joe can kick equally well with either foot," Kass continued, "and he controls the ball well with his head."

John Marchyn, who was captain of the team this year, was also singled out for plaudits.

"Marchyn displayed a lot of spirit," commented Kass. "He was always there to keep everybody 'up' with his enthusiasm."

Sophomore fullback Marh Reichard turned in standout performances for the SU club.

Kass said of Reichard, "He is a real safe fullback. He's always calm and doesn't get flustered under pressure. His job is to keep opposing players out of our zone and he is really tough."

Of Markulaitis, Kass commented, "He has great potential. He's only a freshman, so we are expecting a great deal from him in future years."

Kass said the team as a whole is quite young with 14 of the 22 regulars being either freshman or sophomores. With spring games already scheduled with Cornell, Colgate, LeMoyne, and Hamilton, speed of maturity will determine what lies ahead for the SU Soccer Club.

Bill During -- Red-Shirted??

Sidelined Orange wearing shirts of a different color

By ED AGRANOWITZ

It's tough being a football player. Just ask anyone on the Syracuse team. They come to school late in August and go through grueling double practice sessions daily until classes start. If they have a desire to graduate, they must find time to hit the books in addition to working out every day during the season. They have a little time to relax during the winter, but come springtime, it's right back out to the practice field for spring drills.

The pressure of winning is always there, too. It's not easy explaining to everyone "what happened" after a 43-0 loss. It's tough being a football player.

Nor is it easy being a football player who isn't a football player. Just ask Bill During, Dennis Kleinbach and Eddie Phillips. This trio of Orangemen are watching the action from the bleachers this season because of injuries. They are being withheld from action or "red shirted."

"Don't call it red shirting," says Syracuse Director of Athletics James Decker. "Although red shirting is legal under NCAA rules, we have eliminated it here at Syracuse."

Technically, red shirting a player involves holding him out of action for an entire year, for one reason, or another. Perhaps the coaches think he hasn't reached his potential, or maybe the team is loaded at his position and they want to save him.

NCAA rules specify that a player may take 5 years to play out his 4 years of eligibility.

"Syracuse has an agreement with Penn State, Pittsburgh, and West Virginia that requires a player to complete his eligibility in four years," continues Decker, "and the only exceptions to this rule are cases of injury or hardship. If a player is injured we can petition the other schools and he will be granted an extra year of eligibility."

For the injured Orangemen, it seems to be tougher to watch from the sidelines than to get out there and mix it up with the boys.

Bill During has had two operations on his right knee. The first one, in his freshmen year, sidelined him for what should have been his first varsity campaign. After being held out, he came back last year and played several fine ballgames, three as a starter at tailback.

The knee was still bothering him through spring drills last year, but he worked hard on it this summer and felt strong when practice opened.

"After working so hard this summer to strenghen the knee," says During, "it was very discouraging to me to hurt it again and require another operation. I love to play football and it hurts to be on the sidelines. I'll have to give a lot of thought about trying to come back. I could be wrecked for life if I got hurt again."

Ed Phillips didn't get much of a taste of the action before he got hurt as a freshman last year. A freak accident in practice, in which he collided with a pulling guard from his wingback spot, fractured both bones above his right ankle. One is slow in healing and will keep Phillips under wraps this year.

"The year won't be a total loss for me," says Phillips, "because I am able to practice with the team now. I can do a little contact work, and I'll be ready to do full hitting this spring.

"I'll gain a lot of experience working out with the team all year," continues Phillips, "but it's really frustrating to me to practice all week long and be a spectator on Saturday."

No one has been frustrated more than Dennis Kleinbach. Last year as a junior, Kleinbach improved as the season progressed, and started the last six games at tight end. Early in the UCLA game, he took a Rick Cassatta pass, tried to make a sharp cut, and caught his heel in the turf, injuring his knee.

After a winter devoted to strengthening the knee, Kleinbach re-injured it before spring practice was an hour old. A spring operation seemed to do little good, as he twisted the knee three times in the first fall scrimmage and again needed surgery.

"This is the first fall in a long time that I haven't played ball," says Kleinbach. "I just don't feel part of it. It's tough for me to watch a game from the stands."

This winter, Kleinbach plans to work a lot with the weights and give it one more try next spring. "I'm not going to pack it in because of a couple of operations," says Kleinbach. "Tucker Fredrickson of the Giants is playing now after two knee injuries. Of course, he makes a little more money than me."

"But I'll give it a full try next year," he continues, "I can't quit — that's the easy way out."

Game Watching

By GINA BELL

Some girls don't like football games. Naturally, most of them won't admit it; in a football school like Syracuse, it's downright embarrassing for a girl to confess that she enjoys everything about games from the sour hours to the victory dances except the games themselves. The girls who admit this are the honest ones, and as such, deserve help. After all, games are to be enjoyed, not endured.

Needless to say, there are many ways to enjoy yourself at a game, few of which have anything to do with football. If you enjoy jumping around, throwing wet newspaper at the Goons and yelling "Awww shit!" in unison, you were born to be a placard cheerer, and, frosh or not, should give the Goons a break and follow your calling.

Games are great if you enjoy people-watching; you can get through an entire game without looking at the players once. There's always something to watch, whether it's the cheerleaders visibly wilting each time the kids yell "Push-ups!" or the Goons trying to dance without falling through the bleachers, or the Saltine Warrior running around as if he's just discovered firewater, or Father Charles invoking the Holy Ghost on a tough play.

If you like to drink--enough said.

However, you may be a girl who doesn't particularly enjoy herself any of these ways. There are two solutions to your dilemma: you can invent your own way of amusing yourself or--you can watch the game

We've now come to the basic hand-up: you don't know much about the game other than that the guys in orange helmets are SU, and anyone else on the field is THEM (refs included.) If this is your problem, perhaps a few of these suggestions will help you to get with it for the next game.

It's absolutely essential to have a rudimentary knowledge of the game. If you've never picked this up, you'd better find a date with infinite patience who'll explain a few of the basics beforehand.

You might find it too complicated to follow the whole game all at once, so pick someone special to focus your attention on. There are infinite possibilities. If you're fairly advanced, watch the quarterback. If not, do some homework. Find the name of the opponent's superstar, and watch him, noticing how we handle him. Check for the other team's threat in the DO. Running? Defense? Watch for it. If all this is completely beyond you, try to keep your eye on the ball.

As a last resort, when you're really lost, ask your date. How he reacts to your questions is the acid test of his personality. If he mutters, "Shuddup, I'm watching," either you've made a ghastly mistake or you've asked the question at the wrong moment. You must remember that he's enjoying the game, and consequently must observe a certain etiquette when you ask him what a first down is. You deserve any answer you get if you ask while a play is going on. Wait for a time out, or at least for the teams to regroup. If you're that lost, a few seconds can't hurt. Don't interrupt!

Hopefully, you'll find a few of these ideas useful. If not, you'll have to adapt your personality, and become a rah-rah, or a people-watcher, or a drinker. But give it a try--watch the game. Who knows? You might even enjoy it!

Deficit of $296,000

SU picture not all red, but funds lag behind needs

By JOAN TULLY

Syracuse University experienced a $296,000 deficit in its general budget for the year ending in June, 1968, according to an Oct. 4 report to the trustees. Already this year Assistant Dean of Women Carolyn Jones has told her staff that no improvements can be made in residence halls in 1969 because the budget is already being strained by repair bills. University comptroller Victor Colway admitted he had been forced to make the housing budget small this year.

Syracuse for its size is relatively poor, according to Allen C. Best who raises money from parents. He said some donors feel giving to Syracuse is like giving to the federal government until he points out that if you divide the number of students into the total endowment, you get about $1,000 per student. At Wells College the per capita endowment is $12,000, he said. Syracuse has less than $40 million in cashable endowments. Harvard and Yale have more than $1 billion.

At Pinebrook the fact that food service makes almost $100 on a board contract was discussed. Colway said, "We really needed the money made by food service this year." A student pays for 90% of his education at Syracuse, Colway estimates. He also said that like food service revenue the student fee goes into the general operating budget; he considers it part of tuition.

The Syracuse picture is not all red, however: $55 million of the $76.3 million quota for the 1970 "Syracuse Plan" has already been raised. This money includes the grant for the new library. Two foundations evaluating Syracuse in 1960, according to Best, found that Syracuse used its facilities to 85 percent efficiency; the national norm is less than 50 percent.

Best added that Syracuse alumni are among the top 10 in contributions. He also pointed out that the University is generously supported by non-Syracusans, such as parents, corporations, foundations, churches and businesses.

The University also runs certain of its own businesses, Colway said. The newest acquisition is the Civic Survey in Syracuse, which is run like the Welcome Wagon but publishes a book of services. A Florida woman gave this to the University with the understanding that the University would operate it and pay her a fixed annual income. Colway said the Survey is being reactivated and is not yet profitable.

The University also owns and lets the University Building in downtown Syracuse. It also leases a Syracuse building to Baker Shoe and an Endicott, PFP members arrived at 5:45 p.m., before the doors were open to the general public.

Two SU professors urge Humphrey-Muskie support

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

Two SU professors encouraged support for the election of the Humphrey-Muskie ticket in an address to students last night in White Hall.

The two speakers who promoted Vice President Humphrey's political record were Dr. Karl Schmidt and Dr. Thomas Fondy, co-founders of the Student Coalition for Humphrey-Muskie. Dr. Schmidt is an assistant professor of political science in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Dr. Fondy is an assistant professor of biological chemistry.

Dr. Fondy generalized his remarks to promoting Vice President Humphrey as a "worthy" man to hold the office of President of the U.S. Fondy further described Humphrey as a compassionate and effective leader.

"He also is the most competent and well-liked man in Washington," said Fondy. "And we desperately need a good and decent man in the White House."

Dr. Schmidt, on the other hand, outlined both Humphrey's and Nixon's political careers to illustrate his two observations that (1) There is a choice between the two candidates; and (2) There is an increasing chance of electing Humphrey.

Comparing the major political party candidates, Schmidt "disqualified" Richard Nixon as a Presidential choice because he has a "mud-slinging" campaign history. Beginning in 1946, for example, when Nixon defeated Jerry Voorhi's for Congressman from California, Nixon has accused opponents of being "soft on Communism."

In 1952, a $17,000 "slush fund" was attributed to Nixon, which prompted his famous "Checkers" speech over nationwide television. The slush fund was never explained, however. Schmidt compares this incident to that of Thomas Dodd's exposure last year.

Schmidt summarized that there is no new Nixon because he lacks the ability to change to the times.

Hubert Humphrey also began his career in 1946, when he was elected Mayor of Minneapolis. In 1948, he gained recognition when he challenged the Democratic National Convention to specify its stand on the Civil Rights issue in the party platform.

Humphrey's proposals over the years include Medicare, the Peace Corps, Food for Peace, the Nuclear Test Ban Treaty and the Edward English, self proclaimed "vagabond poet," basks in the sunshine during a visit to the University of Kansas last month. The 53-year-old bard has dropped in to read his works to SU students and faculty.

Poet to read Wednesday

By JEAN HAVENS
Associate Editor

His clothes are one of the most fascinating things about him. In a world concerned with material values, he travels around the country in a comfortably dilapidated suit. He is Edward English, vagabond poet, and he knows where it's at.

There is a psychological reason behind his attire. As English declares, "I'm teaching people outside of the classroom." His poetry readings are his subtle "lectures." Fear of appearing stupid, often causes students to refrain from asking basic questions of a smooth-looking well-dressed lecturer. English feels that his appearance makes inquiring students feel at ease and perhaps even a bit superior. They begin asking questions and are often surprised at his answers, for the indeed knows what he's talking about.

Traveling about by bus, English has visited tow-thirds of the colleges in the U.S., Canada and Central America. His first visit to SU two years ago resulted in a poetry reading which attracted about 300 students. English will again give a reading next Wednesday, Nov. 6, at 8 p.m. in Hendricks Chapel.

"There's a lot here who know me and a lot here who've never seen me before," English said. "Some schools I've been back to three times, but it's always

Humphrey offers better leadership

It is not easy to compose an endorsement of Vice President Hubert Humphrey for President because we are for a repudiation of the Vietnam policy as well as a commitment to civil rights. We desire a return to an orderly society as well as an end to the arms race. We support an all-volunteer army as well as the Supreme Court.

We cannot decide who to support solely on the basis of what each candidate is saying (automatically excluding the Alabama race-baiter) since both candidates are attempting to express what Americans already think more than what they themselves are thinking.

A more rational approach, we think, is to examine what each candidate has done as well as what he has said. Examining the record reveals differences of approach to problems as well as differences of accomplishment. Such differences, we believe, are distinctions of substance.

It would be too easy in composing a Humphrey endorsement to write an anti-Nixon statement. In announcing our support of Hubert Humphrey, we feel compelled to show how his leadership is superior to Richard Nixon's.

Humphrey was defeated in his first attempt to become mayor of Minneapolis. He rebounded by reconciling the radical and moderate factions of the Minnesota Farmer-Labor Party. A united Farmer-Labor Party was still too weak to overcome the growing Republican Party. Humphrey approached the chairman of the Democratic National Committee and won his approval to attempt merging the Minnesota Democrats with the Farmer-Labor Party. He took his message of fusion to members of both parties and after 250 meetings between the two, the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party was born.

Humphrey was elected to the mayor's office as the Democratic-Farmer-Labor candidate in 1945. He established the first Fair Employment Practices Commission in Minneapolis. He appointed a tough police chief and won recognition from the FBI a year later for the most effective law enforcement against organized crime. He was re-elected by 97,000 votes to his opponent's 49,600.

Richard Nixon lost to his Democratic opponent in the combined party primary of his first race in 1946. He rebounded from the primary defeat to win a California Congressional seat by a comfortable margin.

His opponent, Jerry Voorhis, was a popular Congressman. He was originally a LaFollette Progressive, a Socialist, a supporter of FDR's New Deal and advocate of cooperatives. He received the endorsement of the Political Action Committee of the CIO, suspected to be under Communist influence. Voorhis refused the endorsement and remained on the defensive trying to answer Nixon's charges of "lip-service Americans who front for un-American elements, wittingly or otherwise. . . ." Another statement approved by Nixon mentioned "the insolence of Moscow in telling the American voter to elect PAC candidates such as Mr. Voorhis."

Nixon distinguished himself in Congress in the Alger Hiss case before the House Un-American Activities Committee. Hiss, a State Department official, had many powerful supporters who upheld his integrity when Whittaker Chambers testified before the committee that Hiss was a Communist. Through Nixon's persistent investigation, despite political pressure, documentary evidence was produced that led to Hiss' conviction.

Nixon ran for the Senate in California against Congresswoman Helen Douglas. The anti-Communism of the time was milked as an issue by Edmund Pat Brown, Democratic candidate for attorney general, James Roosevelt, Democratic candidate for governor, and Richard Nixon. Nixon named Douglas "the Pink Lady" and said, "My opponent is a member of a small clique which joins the notorious Communist party-liner, Vito Marcantonio of New York, in voting time after time against measures that are for the security of this country." Mrs. Douglas tossed similar false charges but lost the election.

Mayor Humphrey was also caught in the anti-Communism of the time. Members were leaving the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party in droves because of rising Communist influence within it. Humphrey became one of the founders of the Americans for Democratic Action, a group that proposed domestic reforms but resisted Communist expansion abroad and the candidacy of Henry Wallace. Humphrey led the Minnesota chapter of the ADA in an appeal to the rank and file of the Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party to elect non-Communist delegates to the party's next convention. A huge majority of regular delegates were elected and the Communist- dominated executive committee displaced.

Anti-Communism was left behind, however, when he attended the Democratic National Convention in 1948. Truman was engineering his renomination and told the platform committee to make no specific proposals on civil rights. He announced a ten point civil rights program earlier in the year but wished to maintain Southern support and party unity.

Humphrey took the issue to the convention flooor. "There are those who say, we are rushing this issue of civil rights. I say we are 172 years late." Humphrey's minority report was adopted 651½ to 582½. Thirteen members of the Alabama delegation and the entire Mississippi delegation walked out.

Humphrey gained national recognition and in a race against a conservative Republican, won the Senate seat by 250,000 votes.

In the Senate, Humphrey sponsored medicare-type legislation in 1949. He proposed the Peace Corps and led the fight to enact the program when President Kennedy proposed it. He originated the Food for Peace program that sent surplus American food to hungry peoples. He worked for federal aid to education, every major housing bill since 1949, and floor managed the 1964 Civil Rights Act.

We believe Hubert Humphrey has shown the qualities of leadership needed today. He can unite disparate factions for a common purpose. He can ease tensions while promoting the public good. Which of the two candidates can better ease the tensions between the races in America? Could Nixon escape his career of strident anti-Communism to gain a detente with the Soviet Union? Would he have more patience in negotiating with the Communists than Humphrey, who has had a part in achieving the bombing pause?

We like Nixon's proposal for an all-volunteer army but wonder if he would ever feel secure enough to implement it. In reflecting on the Alger Hiss case, he wrote: "where the battle against Communism is concerned, victories are never final so long as the Communists are still able to fight. When you have won one battle is the time you should step up your effort to win another until final victory is achieved."

Will Nixon approve and make effective the desparately needed non-proliferation treaty? His quest for superiority rather than parity will escalate the arms race.

We think America needs a commitment to social justice for the Negro and the poor. Humphrey's record and commitment are clear. Nixon on the other hand would prefer to make the Kerner Report an underground publication.

Nixon has consistently refused to debate for reasons that are now absurd. Humphrey was willing prior to the Democratic convention to confront McCarthy and McGovern before the California delegation.

We cannot explain away Chicago or the defeat of Senator McCarthy but the election of Vice President Humphrey may leave us a nation and a system worth improving in 1972.

PFP questions Reception Committee goals

The Peace and Freedom Party of Syracuse finds it necessary to raise several serious points concerning the organization and purpose of the "Nixon Reception Committee (NRC)."

Shortly after the NRC announced its intention to demonstrate, PFP considered lending it our support. We reserved judgement on an endorsement however, because we suspected that this NRC movement had been organized by Humphrey and ex-McCarthy people whose views we do not share.

Prior to Tuesday, October 29th, we received indications that NRC was not run by these groups but much to our surprise, by persons connected in various ways with the Republican party and specifically the campaign of David O'Brien, an avid supporter of Richard Nixon.

On Sunday October 27, NRC held a meeting for coordinators, marshalls, and "other interested people" at Maxwell auditorium. The meeting had no formal structure, with the exception of three people who dominated the state; Gene Kane, Joseph Nicoletti and Lou Jacobs. Kane is a key person in the O'Brien campaign on the S.U. campus. Nicoletti is closely associated with the Javits campaign. Jacobs is a Humphrey-Muskie campaigner and worker.

The Peace and Freedom Party tried to warn campus people that something seemed dubious with the NRC. We strongly suspected and suggested that the NRC was a highly organized publicity project: a gimmic to show Nixon's "receptiveness to student criticism." Peace and Freedom attempted to gather further information about the leadership of NRC. One of the PFP research people called the NRC phone number, x3138, and inquired who was in charge. The speaker, who identified himself as Gene Kane, said that he did not know. In addition, a few weeks ago PFP had contacted the D.O. about the use of the Student Government facilities by Gene Kane for the purposes of the O'Brien campaign.

The Student Government building was appparently being used, at least on an intermittent basis for partisan politics. This same building was one of the headquarters of the NRC. Isn't it strange that the same building was being used by both Republican workers and an anti-Nixon movement?

In the initial announcement of NRC (DO, Oct. 23), it was stated that "NRC is soliciting the support of all campus groups and individuals. Time and place of meetings coordinating the Oct. 29 visit will be announced." The fact is that no coordinating meeting was ever publicly announced. The names of the leaders of NRC and their allegiances and political positions were never revealed. NRC was undemocratic in its no elected leaders. The subsequent efforts of this elite group of marshalls to control unsanctioned dissent is further evidence of undemocratic procedures. The letter that appeared in the D.O. on Thurs., Oct.31, and signed NRC, does not democratically represent the position of those who participated, but was in fact written by one individual, Louis Jacobs. This letter, which refuted charges before they were formally made, confirms PFP's initial suspicions about the undemocratic nature of NRC.

Finally, the publicity that resulted from the Nixon Reception Committee was anything but negative to Richard Nixon. This seems to lend credence to the theory that NRC was a publicity stunt. Consider these headlines and ask whether this is negative: "Nixon Answers Student Critics" (Post Standard Oct. 29). This in the final analysis makes us believe that whether by manipulation or circumstance, the NRC was a positive factor to the Nixon campaign.

At the War Memorial Nixon "graciously" spoke to a group of student protestors for the first time in his campaign. He claimed he was "replying" to the NRC questions. Furthermore the Herald-Journal confirmed in their news copy that there were reserved seats for the NRC demonstrators. This statement demands an explanation. (PFP was refused seating as well as later being denied even entrance.) We were told that there would be no reserved seats by the War Memorial officials and representitives of the Republican party.

We in Peace and Freedom believe that the NRC was organized by persons whose political credentials in an anti-Nixon movement were at best questionable. We ask of the students who sincerely wished to make public their displeasure with Nixon's silence: Were you, in fact, duped and used by a group of people

The leadership of the Democratic party completely manipulated their convention in Chicago and we feel that the NRC did the same in Syracuse. In contrast to the manipulation of people by the Establishment, the Peace and Freedom Party is dedicated to insuring people control of their party and lives.

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

On this page, the Peace and Freedom Party makes several accusations about the Nixon Reception Committee. These allegations have been made in a most irresponsible way based on questionable evidence and misleading interpretations.

NRC welcomes an investigation to these and other charges that any group would wish to raise. NRC invites The Daily Orange or Student Senate or any body whose credentials are above question to answer these unfounded remarks.

NRC does not intend to criticise the Peace and Freedom Party's protest nor to mimic accusations with no real vehicle to include proof. NRC will not engage in answers which do not resolve the accusations but only present another point of view.

Truth about the "Sounds of Silence" and NRC will never be found in a shouting contest through printed words on this page.

If the "Sounds of Silence" taught one message, it could easily have been not to engage in immature name-calling, and to shed real light rather than flashes of neon light on an issue.

NRC remains a non-partisan organization created as an ad hoc committee to protest in an orderly fashion. And we did. And we will continue to do so.

Get away from it all

Alma mater welcomes vagabond student

EDITOR'S NOTE: The Daily Orange is presenting this literary addition to our usual news coverage in the hope of providing material for weekend reflection.

By BARRY ANCONA

I must have been daydreaming. My mind would often wander during the evening drives into the countryside to escape the petty responsibilities of graduate academia. Usually I would head out on the Interstate, or on Route 92 — they were free roads — and I would drive until I became tired, or some nagging chore would turn me back. But that evening I headed west on the Thruway. I'm not sure why I did it — I certainly wasn't thrilled about having to pay the toll. The last thing I remember clearly was heading into the setting sun, and wondering what would happen if, someday, I didn't turn back...

In my dream, I was racing west, and the sky was quickly going black. A strong wind was blowing against the car, but I just laughed, and fed more gas. I was really flying now, travelling tremendous distances — I wasn't going from state to state; I was crossing international borders! Faster and faster, and I was getting very sleepy. I turned off the road and stopped at a motel. It was very late by now, but they must have expected — there was a room waiting. I showered the world off my skin and fell asleep.

When I awoke, the sky was bright and the wind had stopped. I headed west again. The sun was warm, and I rolled down the window and breathed clean air. The pavement beside the road gave way to dirt, and soon there were farmers riding tractors and working the land. Traffic became lighter and lighter and I realized that not many people were heading my way. And suddenly it struck me where my mind was taking me -- I'm not sure whether it was the air or the dirt or the farmers or the light traffic or the people who smiled and waved, but I knew I was going back to my college.

I stopped at a truck stop where I had often gone for midnight snacks. One of the waitresses asked me how I had been. I was shocked that she remembered me, and didn't quite know what to say, but I mumbled something about being o.k. but it was good to be back. She called her husband out of the garage, and he shook my hand and told me it had been too long. I remember agreeing.

The drive to the campus was effortless -- the car seemed to drive itself. It stood just as I remembered it. My sister met me, and I was shocked to see her there -- but then I remembered that she had gone out this fall as a freshman -- I didn't know that my dreams could so clearly project things I had never experienced before.

The campus was filled with people who knew each other and knew me, and I was struck by the fact that they all expected to see me there. The rest of the day is unclear in my mind, but I remember going out for a midnight snack with a friend of mine from my old dorm, and three beautiful girls. I'm sure I don't know how it happened, but the last thing I remember of that day was lying on a bed in a women's dorm and falling asleep in the arms of one of the girls.

The next day I went down to the railroad station -- the depot where I worked years ago. The agent was still there and he gave me a piece of homemade candy and offered to play a game of chess as soon as number 59 was by. I thanked him and hurried off to the newspaper in the next town where I used to work. The composing room crew all gathered around and asked me how I was enjoying journalism school. I didn't have the heart to really tell them, but I did let them know that working with them had enabled me to qualify out of two graphic arts courses. Once again I realized it was only a dream -- I found an error in a headline and saw a new lead for a story. The editor had already left, so it was up to me to have the head corrected, the new copy set, and to approve the new layout. The advertising manager, who was in charge when the editor was out, wasn't too sure of the changes, so there I was, moving copy and reading hot metal and giving instructions to the make-up man.

I bumped into the editor of the college town's small and outdated newspaper -- the paper that I wanted to take over and make great. He heard that I was in journalism school, and said that he'd like to trade places with me. I laughed to keep from crying, because I knew he wasn't serious.

Journalism kept cropping up in the dream, for the next thing I knew I was giving a lecture on effective newspaper design to a radical but inexperienced underground newspaper editor. I remember working on the paper, sleeping, working on it more, and then racing at ninety miles an hour to get the copy to a printer. I seemed to be involved in everything, working all the time. It was the most active dream I can recall.

Memory becomes dimmer, but I remember walking through the student union and seeing people everywhere laughing and talking. It seemed to be some kind of super-fraternity, where everyone was everyone else's friend: men, women, students, faculty. I recall seeing one of my professors, a classicist and master of the dialogue, shooting pool with some students.

Everything was free. The pool was free. Ping-pong was free. I wandered through the theatre building where I used to work, as students watched Shakespeare free. I walked past the chapel, where the orchestra and choir gave a free concert. And I danced in the decorated gym where the entire community was having a formal dance free. I once again was reminded that I was dreaming as I sat in the stadium press-box drinking coffee and eating donuts and watching the football team get every break in its favor and win. And the stands were filled with people watching the game free. Even student protest was a happy event, with guerilla theatre spoofing the administration, and a boy being crowned "the people's" homecoming queen.

I knew that the dream would end sometime, and my beautiful friends knew it too. I told them that it was time to go.

At some time during the daydream I must have turned around on the Thruway, because I saw the sun, a little lower than it had been when I last remembered, glaring in my rear view mirror. The dream was very vivid at that point, and I drove carelessly back to my apartment near the university.

It was the odometer that first told me something strange had happened. I could have sworn it read 59,000 miles when I went out that evening, and now it read 61,000. And I couldn't explain the oil company credit card receipt from a gas station in Grinnell, Iowa, that I found in my wallet. And the next day in class when my professors politely inquired as to where the hell I'd been for the past week I really couldn't tell them.

SUSKI plans ski trips for snow season

Upperclassmen know snow is abundant in Syracuse and freshmen will soon find out. Most hearty Upstate New Yorkers accept it, but most SU students groan.

This year, SUSKI hopes to make everyone overjoyed by the omnipresence of the white flakes.

Next week SUSKI will get the ball rolling for anyone who wants to make winter the best time of the year. Memberships will be sold in the cloakroom of HBC from 8:45 a.m. to 3:15 p.m., Monday through Friday.

The first meeting is scheduled for Thursday, Nov. 7 at 7:30 p.m. in 117 Lyman. Highlights will include ski movies and a complete introduction to the program and calendar of events.

Before the season starts the club wants to help everyone who is thinking about equipment. Chip Leidner is chairman of the ski and fashion show to be presented Friday, Nov. 8 from 3 to 5 p.m. in the Men's Gym. Four major ski shops and three ski areas from Syracuse will be represented.

Henry Maxon, vice president of SUSKI, compared SU's club to Michigan States' Ski Club, where he was vice-president for three years. He said, "The $5 membership fee sounds high but those who participate will get a lot for their money.

"We offer discounts on day trips to local areas, a free SUSKI patch, group rates for weekend trips to Vermont, free TGIF's, free ski flicks and fantastic meetings, including a visit from Jimmy Henga, world famous skier."

This year, SUSKI has an innovation for all classes of skiers who want lessons. Beginners will have an opportunity to learn fundamentals under proper instruction.

Arrangements have been made with nearby Labrador Mountain for a complete package of lessons, skiing and transportation.

The ski trips which have been planned are as follows: Dec. 14--trip to Snow Ridge; Jan. 22-26--trip to Stratton, Vermont; Feb. 1--trip to Gore; Feb. 15--trip to Intermont; Feb. 21-23; Mar. 1 or 8--trip to Snow Ridge.

"...so alike, so inexorably alike."

This is the season when millions of members of the family of man—of many faiths—observe solemn holy days.

Each faith, in its own way, recognizes in its observance the oneness and brotherhood of man.

Carl Sandburg once wrote: "Though meanings vary, we are alike in all countries.... From tropics to arctics, humanity lives with these needs so alike, so inexorably alike."

This ideal of brotherhood is fundamental to individuals and organizations dedicated to the common good.

The International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, for example, comprises 450,000 men and women of all faiths and creeds. We work together and live together with mutual respect for our neighbors—at the next bench or in the next house.

It is in this spirit that we extend our best wishes for the holiday season.

Abundant resources, but . . .

Inaccessibility of volumes discourages students' use of library's facilities

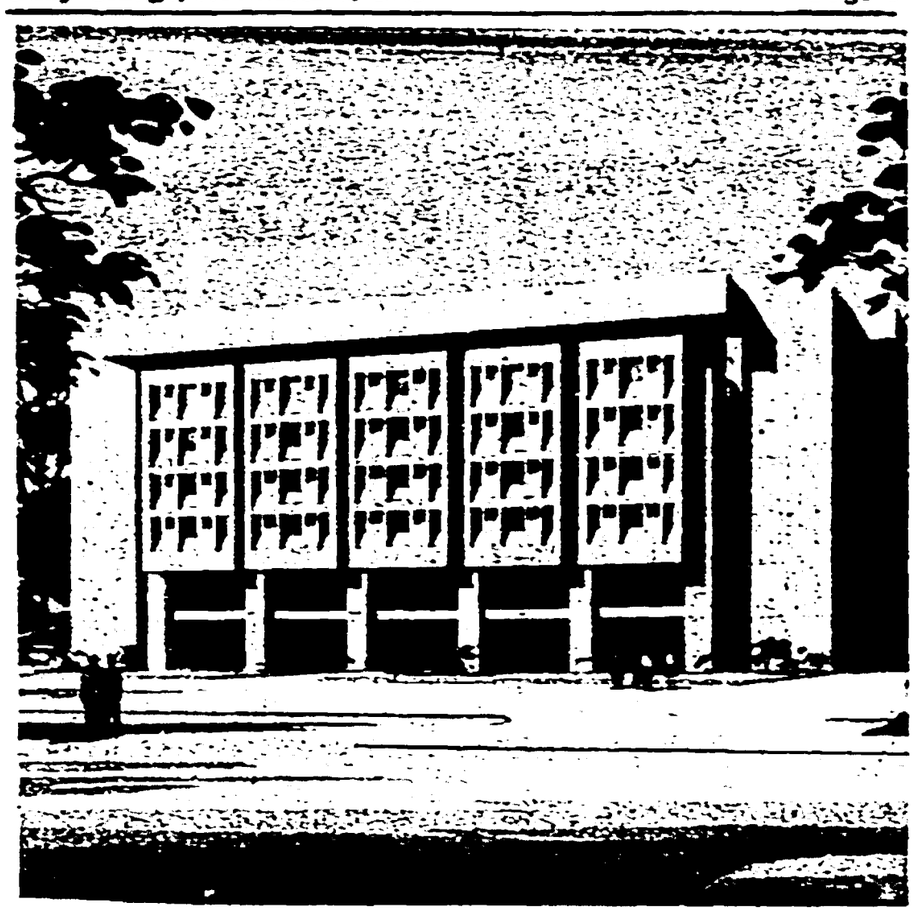
By TRINK LANXNER

"I can never find anything I need in that library!" is a complaint often heard on the Syracuse campus. Yet Syracuse University has one of the finest libraries in the nation and should be a source of pride, not of frustrated irritation. What's wrong?

The problem is lack of accessibility. Syracuse University library is the third largest in the state with a tremendous collection of volumes, periodicals, documents, records, and microfilms which include information from all over the world.

Carnegie, however, is a relatively small building, even in comparison to others on campus. It is ridiculously small to house the amount of materials it does. As a result the library has been forced to break down into a total of 22 branches. The resulting confusion is the cause of the dissatisfaction and the inability to appreciate the actual worth of the materials available.

Syracuse has nearly 75 thousand volumes at the student's disposal, a number which increases by enough volumes to fill at least two card catalogs a year. Besides the actual volumes the library collects government documents in such numbers that they must be stored in boxes of microfilm. The record collection is so large that it now occupies what used to be the Continental Can factory on Erie Boulevard. Also a member of the Association of Research Libraries which includes 60 top ranking libraries in the nation, Syracuse is entitled to periodicals and literature from countries all over the world. The library staff includes specialists to handle these materials.



Yet a student can walk into Carnegie in search of a book whose title and author he knows and still be unable to find it. Even if he does locate the proper card catalog and the Library of Congress (or Dewey Decimal) call number, he is still faced with several floors of stacks to climb. After puffing through five floors only to find the book is not there he is often too discouraged to continue the search. If he is persistent, however, and asks the librarian on the floor for assistance he may find that she too is unable to locate his book. His disgusted surrender is then pretty well assured. If the librarian then refers him to one of the various branches, the student is not too likely to thank her for her help or rejoice in appreciation of the fund of research materials Syracuse has supposedly placed at his fingertips.

Understanding the reason behind the seeming lack of organization may make toleration possible. Carnegie simply does not have the room for a library large enough to service a university the size of Syracuse. The lack of space is so acute that the administrative offices are squeezed into tiny rooms or into what were once hallways. Even with the 22 branches the jam on the shelves is such that books are often damaged or lost.

The volume of materials crammed into Carnegie and the constant need for reorganization and conservation of space makes it difficult for a librarian to keep pace with the changes. This accounts for her occasional inability to locate a particular book.

The University is in the process of solving the space problem. Those hammers and cranes heard all day are busy erecting a new library, the Ernest Stevenson Bird Research Library. Just one floor of this building will cover three-fourths of an acre. Once ready, there will be no more lack of room or disorganization problems. Until the move is made the library has one more problem to contend with, how to ease the transition without adding to the confusion.

All these problems concern the physical aspect of the Syracuse library facilities, however its contents and the source materials it offers are irreproachable. It is for this reason that the University library is one to be proud of. Once you wade through the organizational difficulties, there really are top ranking research materials available.

Join the quest for the world's largest cheese!

Start here. ↙

Franklin Pierce, you will recall, had a pet marmoset living with him in the White House. Jonathan Swift, on the other hand, observed in Polite Conversation, "'Why, everyone as they like,' as the good woman said when she kissed her cow." President Lyndon B. Johnson put it another way when, reporting to the nation in the aftermath of the Detroit riots of July 1967, he observed, "Righteousness and peace must kiss each other." It's all part of the same thing. The Italian Waiters' Convention at Yellowstone Park had the right idea. They're part of a Cow Cycle, of course, as is The Cradle Tomb at Westminster. (It must be admitted, however, that the latter is part of an Aborted Cow Cycle.)

Or here. What the hell. ↙

It's about time somebody invented a new literary form again. The mantle has fallen on the manly young shoulders of Christopher Cerf, editor, songwriter, singer, citizen soldier, film maker, and former editor of the Harvard Lampoon. He's had help from Michael K. Frith, who drew some pictures. These are not to be confused with the author's drawings. What more do you want? Cheese? On to the Wisconsin Pavilion at the New York World's Fair! Once you have read Mr. Cerf's book, you too will comprehend as never before the mysteries of symbiotic relationship between animals, fruit, girls, dreams, and cheese.

It's time to put up . . .

The generation that's running the show right now
Is everything you say it is.
It makes war,
Persecutes minorities, wallows in hypocrisy
And abominates your idols.
But it is a good many things
You sometimes forget it is, as well. It's Tom Dooley, Dag Hammarskjöld, Jack Kennedy.
It is concepts: the Peace Corps, Ecumenism.
The United Nations, Civil Rights.
It is awesome technology, inspired research, ennobling dreams.
You can take credit for
None of its accomplishments.
Blame for none of its sins.
But the time is near when
The terrible responsibility will be Yours.
You can stand on the shoulders of this generation
And reach for the stars
Quite literally. Or
You can keep to the ground
Snapping at its heels.
It's your choice.
You're the candidates of the future.
You are our life insurance.

N.Y., building to IBM. It owns the Hotel Sheraton Russell in N.Y.C., as well as some apartments near Central Park East, which were purchased with money from the endowment fund on the advice of the man who donated Lubin Hall, Colway said.

Why, then, does Syracuse finish out a year with a deficit, which means shifting money on paper from one account to another?

Colway suggests Syracuse is a victim of the economic phenomenon which a Bowen study shows is common to all higher educational systems. A university is dependent on human services, and like all service groups, the relative cost will increase as technological improvements spread more rapidly through other parts of the society. In manufacturing, the study points out, productivity per man hour is limited only by those designing technological change. But the productivity of a professor can only be increased by enlarging his classes or installing teaching machines. Costs per student in a university, therefore, have increased much faster than the cost per person in the general economy.

Syracuse is not the only institution faced with a deficit this year. In the 1968 report on the Future of Independent Higher Education in New York State, Chairman McGeorge Bundy said American private institutions as a whole face a $20 million debt this year. He agrees with the Bowne explanation but points out that this only increases the need for better management, cost control and cost accounting.

The report also suggests that the backlog of deferred maintenance is rising annually. Staffs are inadequate in number and quality, and most projects are handled on a demand basis. Syracuse is guilty of this; Colway said last year he had to dip into discretionary funds that were originally put aside for such improvements as new stairs to a building.

A study of the Financial Prospects for Higher Education, conducted by committee Z and headed by William Baumol, suggested that another rising cost was the salary increases which had to be given the faculty. His report gives Syracuse a "B" rating in both average and minimum wage scales, along with such schools as Cornell, Inidana, Ohio State, Vassar, and Dartmouth. He listed Syracuse in the $14 thousand to $14,499 bracket of average compensation for full-time faculty members. Cornell pays $16,000 to $16,499. The 1967 Syracuse financial report says instruction payments account for $18.7 million out of total expenditures of $50.8 million.

The second highest expenditure is for "auxiliary activities," which Colway said include such items as heating, the film library and fund-raising expenses. The greatest revenue came from tuition and fees, while the second greatest came from "auxiliary activities," such as food service, housing, and athletics.

The report also stated that contributions have increased by six or seven percent annually, but this is not keeping pace with the need. The University of Rochester, according to Best, recently received a grant from Xerox of $28 million. Best feels Syracuse's difficulties in fund-raising lie in its newness in the field. As Colway pointed out, Syracuse just became a university in the past 20 years. Best also said Syracuse has an open-door admittance policy which appeals to a broad segment of the population, not necessarily to just the wealthy.

In the past eight years, however, Syracuse has been conducting a large fund-raising drive, the "Syracuse Plan," to get money for a new library, a union, an interfaith center, a new infirmary, an architecture building, among other constructions.

Some suggestions offered in recently-published reports to improve university financies include:

1. Direct assistance to private universities and a possible change in the New York State constitution prohibiting religiously affiliated schools from receiving state aid.

2. More intercollegiate cooperation to achieve significant educational and economic advantages.

3. Less tolerance of deficits in sponsored research and guaranteed full recovery of overhead expenses should be written into new contracts. contracts.

4. Full overhead costs of federally-supported research contracts should be assigned and recovered, because universities often lose money on these research grants.

5. The suggestion to raise fees in order to reduce losses in athletics and room and board is not too applicable to Syracuse.

6. Increase productivity of those involved in the educational process.

According to Colway, the New York State Legislature voted to permit direct aid to private institutions, but they have not yet allocated any funds.

Syracuse was written up in Newsweek last year, Best said, for its recent emergence as a fundraiser. But Syracuse and other private institutions have far to go.

What the interviewer won't tell you about General Electric.

He won't tell you about all the job opportunities we have for college graduates.

Not that he wouldn't like to.

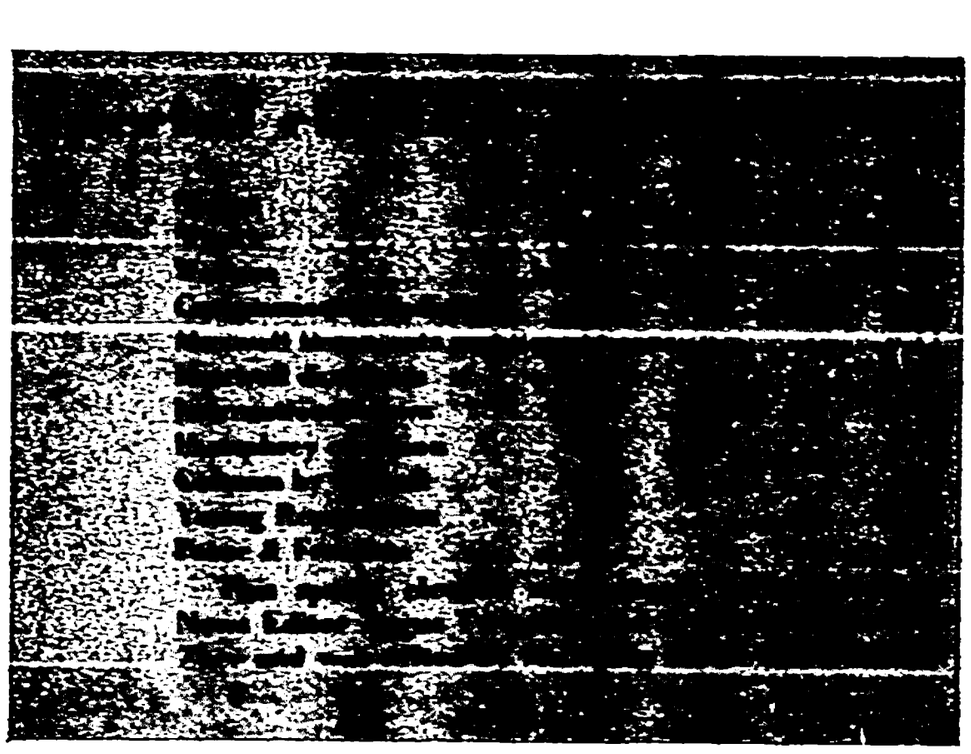
It's just that there are too many jobs and too little time.

In a half-hour interview our man couldn't begin to outline the scope and diversity of the opportunities we offer. Opportunities for engineering, science, business and liberal arts majors.

That's why we published a brochure called "Career Opportunities at General Electric."

It tells you about our markets, our products, our business philosophy and our benefit programs.

And, in plain language, it tells you exactly how and where a person with your qualifications can start a career with General Electric. It even gives you the first step in starting a career with us—a Personal Information Form for you to fill out.



If you like what the brochure tells you about us, why not tell us about you? Our interviewer will be on campus soon.

Political pro succeeding in 1968 comeback drive

Six years ago people were calling Richard Milhous Nixon a political has been.

After all he lost his bid for the presidency in 1960 to the late John F. Kennedy. And two years later he received a stunning defeat from the then incumbent Pat Brown in the California gubernatorial race.

Even Nixon must have thought his political career was over, or he would not have told newsmen at that now famous press conference in 1962 that they would not "have Dick Nixon to kick around anymore, because this is Dick Nixon's last press conference."

Yet today Nixon is the Republican presidential nominee, and according to the polls is currently leading both of his opponents, Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey and former Alabama Governor George C. Wallace.

What has happened since 1962 to make Nixon the leading candidate today?

Dr. Alan K. Campbell, who replaces Stephen K. Bailey as Dean of SU's Maxwell School in February, cites the lack of significant competition as enabling Nixon to win the Republican nomination.

Prior to the GOP convention the only alternatives were Gov. George Romney of Michigan and Gov. Nelson Rockefeller of New York.

Romney's failure was due partially to a personality and style that did not catch on with Republican voters, according to Campbell.

At the convention California's governor Ronald Reagan posed a real threat to the Nixon nomination. But the former Vice President was far enough to the right in his views to retain delegates who may have otherwise gone to Reagan, Campbell added.

"It was a question of Nixon's competition [illegible] itself," he emph[illegible]

[illegible]other fac[illegible]at Nixon is a [illegible]ical pro an[illegible]nows how to [illegible] the existing system to [illegible]vantage.

Dean Bailey cited the freedom and opportunity Nixon enjoyed after his forced political retirement in 1962, where he was able to [illegible] speech[illegible]rounds among local party officials without facing the responsibilities of a man in political office.

Dr. Karl B. Schmidt agreed with Campbell and Bailey that Nixon understands American politics and that he knows the way to win a presidential nomination is to "woo delegates."

Schmidt noted Rockefeller's refusal to support Barry Goldwater in 1964 and his inability to woo delegates in 1968 as reasons for his failure as a potential presidential candidate.

Although Nixon may have won the nomination through political maneuver[illegible] he has, nevertheless, attracted popular sup[illegible] Nixon is [illegible] can attract [illegible] of voters throu[illegible] and style and [illegible] position on issues has been [illegible]s than clear to many [illegible]s.

What [illegible]ributed to Nixon's supposed popularity boom is something inherent not in the man himself but in the circumstances of the times.

Nixon's Democrat opponent Vice President Humphrey is linked with an administration disliked and mistrusted by large segments of American public.

People are frustrated over the Vietnam situation and rioting in the cities, and Nixon has effectively played upon this frustration to win votes.

These are serious problems that face the nation and remain unsolved under the present administration, and Nixon is a candidate after votes. He is effectively walking a political tightrope, careful not to slip and lose the votes he already has.

Nixon is not wooing the right wingers, though no doubt he has support there. Rather he is seeking votes from the so-called moderates or "middle of the road" segments of our society.

He knows that Humphrey probably will receive close to 95 per cent of the Negro vote and his best chance to get elected is to concentrate on the white, middle class suburban voters, many of whom are tired of paying taxes for a seemingly endless war and a poverty program that neither seems to apply to them nor appears to be working.

But because he has neglected the Negroes during the campaign may not necessarily mean he will neglect them once in office.

Nixon, in effect, wants a less centralized government to deal with such problems as civil rights and social security. The private sector, he believes, can accomplish what the highly centralized form of government of the past eight years under Democratic administrations apparently could not.

Nixon maintains it will take "a new team" to solve our problems at home and abroad and says "his team" will solve them. And although he has not really spelled out how he will do it, people are believing him, and they will vote for him.

Sen. Edmund S. Muskie, Democratic vice presidential candidate, is said to have the greatest student appeal among this year's top candidates. He also may pull the election out for the Humphrey-Muskie ticket.

Strikes against apathy

Muskie — the candidate with SU student appeal

Edmund S. Muskie was the only major national candidate to make it to the SU campus. Until the Nixon speech last Tuesday, Muskie was also the candidate who had most actively carried his campaign to students. He still, however, has probably had the most contact with them this fall.

Sen. Muskie was fairly successful with college audiences during his tours. Students no doubt found him more credible and easier to respect than any other candidate. Muskie's connection with the Johnson administration is much more vague than is Humphrey's, and his career and past are less controversial than Nixon's or Agnew's.

Muskie's hecklers often shared his microphone for as much as 10 minutes. It seems that Judy Mage was an execption to his usual procedure, very likely because she wasn't a student. During his moments on the Hendricks Chapel steps, Muskie never gave an indication that he considered her request legitimate.

"This is my opportunity. She has all the chance she wants tomorrow. I was invited by the students of Syracuse University and I intend to speak to them and listen to them. If she wants to debate, she can write me a letter."

But because he would not let her speak, he had to answer her several more times.

The Senator seemed aware of the need for reform in his party and painfully conscious of Chicago. He proposed that the voting age be lowered to 18, asked for the popular election of the President, the one-man one-vote selection of state and national convention delegates and a broader base of participation in the party.

Both during his speech and at a press conference later, Sen. Muskie expressed concern with student apathy. It was an appeal to many of those awakened by Eugene McCarthy. "Reform won't come at all, he warned, "if those who become active this year prove they are capable of the same apathy as in the past."

Students are on the brink of becoming apathetic again. A lot of them are thinking of opting out because their candidate wasn't selected in Chicago. Apathy could have the same effect that it has had in the past. They will inhibit our vital institutions. They ought to know that some of the things they dislike are the products of parties in past generations."

Congressional aspirants rap

JAMES M. HANLEY

James M. Hanley, the Democrats' incumbent congressman, wholeheartedly supports the Humphrey—Muskie ticket. Last March, when President Lyndon B. Johnson announced he would not seek reelection, Hanley wrote a letter to the Vice President pledging his support at the Democratic convention. Hanley voted for Humphrey at Chicago.

Law and order is a catch-phrase being used by many during the campaign. Hanley prefers using the phrase "order with justice." Beefing up our police forces will not solve our long range crime problems. What is needed is better housing, an end to discrimination, better education and improved medical care. The need for more law enforcement today is a manifestation of existing social conditions.

Hanley has voted for anti-poverty programs of the Johnson administration. This includes such programs as Head Start, office of Economic Opportunity (OEO) and job training programs for the poor.

He has supported the Johnson administration's policies in the past. He believes cannot renege on our world commitments and that collective security is necessary. Any move toward a bombing halt should be left up to the negotiators in Paris and President Johnson. He believes any new administration should reevaluate our commitments.

Hanley was at the Democratic convention when the disorders took place. He said he saw instances of overeaction but also a lot of provocation on the part of the demonstrators. In many cases, the peaceful were pushed into the action by the not so peaceful. Hanley supported the concept of the demonstrations and is against violence but the people there for the convention also had a right to hold their meeting.

In 1961 he ran for a supervisory post in the county legislature but fell under Syracuse Mayor William Walsh's landslide victory. He has been a campaign coordinator for the Democratic party in the area. In 1964 he won the Congressional seat by 4,500 votes and in 1966 was reelected by approximately 28,500 votes. He was the first Democratic Congressman in 50 years in an area where registered Republican voters outnumber Democrats almost 2 to 1.

He is "cautiously optimistic," regarding chances on Tuesday.

DAVID V. O'BRIEN

Given an even chance to capture the Onondaga County congressional seat is Republican attorney David V. O'Brien. O'Brien, at 36, is the youngest congressional candidate ever to run from this county.

Richard Nixon is expected to score well in this area on Tuesday, and O'Brien is supporting himalong with the rest of the Republican slate. He appeared on the dias with Nixon at the rally on Tuesday O'Brien has taken a firm stand on maintaining law and order. He has urged implementation of the Kerner Commission Report on Civil Disorders as a move to alleviate the causes of riots and disorder. His plans for an anti-crime fight include: 1) a mandatory five-year prison sentence for those convicted of crimes involving guns; 2) a proposal that persons wishing to purchase a rifle or shotgun should complete a Hunter Safety Course beforehand, or have a hunting license; 3) a 48-hour waiting period between buying and obtaining a rifle or shotgun; 4) and controls on mail order sales.

Speaking on Vietnam last month to Young Republicans, O'Brien proposed a 30-day halt in the bombing to encourage negotiations.

A major issue in O'Brien's camp has been welfare. "The plain fact is that we have lost control of our giant public welfare system." In suggesting a "massive overhaul" of welfare, O'Brien proposes that there be one welfare qualifying category, based on need. He also called for a revision of the man-in-the-house rule, a single national standard of welfare incentives for people to work while on welfare, job training programs and child care facilities for working mothers.

O'Brien's experience in government includes serving as Deputy County Executive and County Research Director. He served for a year as the associate counsel to the State Penal Law Revision Commission.

O'Brien is running a hard but well-financed race. His numerous campaign appearances have included several trips to the SU campus.

DALE TUSSING

He is supporting Dick Gregory for the presidency on the Peace and Freedom Party slate. Of the three major political candidates there is really no choice. Out of the three, he feels Richard Nixon has the best chance of ending the war. He claims that Humphrey's main problems lie with trying to justify the administration's policies. He supported Sen. Eugene McCarthy's bid for the Democratic presidential nomination but has ruled him

And then George, you will start to erase the impurities in this country!

Wallace — a growing threat for now and the future

In a year when the frustrations of two-party politics would be enough to confound the nation, voters are faced with the strongest third-party presidential challenger in twenty years–George Corley Wallace.

Few people think Wallace can win, but his percentages in the national polls still have some of the experts worried. Wallace was shown drawing as much as 20% of the national vote when matched against Richard Nixon and Hubert Humphrey just a few weeks ago. His support has dwindled slightly since then, but as Nixon and Humphrey travel through the country, they aren't forgetting that they may have to go to the House to be elected by those congressional candidates they heartily endorse.

Much of the support for Wallace and his American Independent Party comes from blue collar workers, rural conservatives, ethnic minorities and racists. Many people have tried to analyze his support, and the consensus seems to be that his large numbers of followers are attracted by his neat uncomplicated remedies for the ills of society. Described as fundamentalists, Wallacites respond to his folksy manner punctuated by a snappy delivery.

On Vietnam, Wallace is willing to try negotiation, but if that should fail he says he'd let the military take over. Law and order can be achieved, he feels, by applying police force. On racial relations, it's merely, "We're not talking about race, we're talking about a philosophy of government."

Wallace's condemnations of the Eastern "moneyed establishment," the Supreme Court, the major political parties and increasing federal power ring home to the conservative elements of our society. These people who Harvard sociologist David Riesman says have never "been especially interested in politics, particularly at the national level," are confused and lost in these days of student rebellion, locked-up political conventions and a prolonged war in Vietnam. Without really understanding the problems, they associate themselves with the Wallace solutions.

The Wallace support seems to be failing, however. How much will remain until Tuesday is impossible to guess. Perhpas much of his early strength came from voters who released frustration by siding with him, but who always intended to vote for Humphrey or Nixon in the end anyway.

Others guess that '68 is only a warm-up for a bigger and stronger Wallace candidacy in '72. Should our next President be insensitive to the tenor of our nation, he may have his chance.

Maxwell School goes to the polls

See Nixon as offering a change

Maxwell School Republicans are not plentiful, even in an allegedly Republican year. Prof. Michael O. Sawyer is probably the most prominent of these Republicans, having been called on most often to speak for the party on the hill or to help one of its campus organizations.

1968 finds Dr. Sawyer closely connected with the re-election drive of New York's liberal senior senator, Jacob Javits. He is vice chairman of the State Committee for Javits. Sawyer, along with several SU students, also helped organize a campus Javits group which conducted a Javits-sponsored poll of student interest in his race against Democrat Paul O'Dwyer. Sawyer said this poll was the first of its kind in the campaign, and it indicated "considerable support for Javits."

While he supports the local Republican congressional candidate David O'Brien, who is a keen Nixon supporter, Sawyer has declined to endorse the Nixon candidacy. Reflecting on the presidential race in general, Dr. Sawyer said, "There's a choice -- a very substantial difference."

When asked if he was pleased with the way the issues had evolved this year, Sawyer replied: "As a teacher of the law, I'm glad to see that there has been emphasis on law and civil liberties." He again stressed that he was satisfied with the race because "there is a choice."

New York's Mayor John Lindsay is another Republican for whom Dr. Sawyer has worked.

Supporting the candidacy of Richard Nixon, but not really a Maxwell Republican, is Prof. Frank Munger. Dr. Munger, who outlined his support for Nixon at a Young Republican's meeting earlier this fall, is supporting Democratic candidates on the state and local level.

Munger's first consideration for Nixon was that "his commitment to the war is less onerous than that of Hubert Humphrey." He said that Nixon was in a better position "to risk peace" because he can always attribute a potential failure or continuation of the war to the intolerable situation he inherited from a Democratic administration, should he be elected.

Second, Munger thought that it would be "disastrous" for the leadership of the Democratic Party if Humphrey were elected. At the convention in August, "the party was split nearly in half and a Humphrey victory would prolong the agony of the present struggle." He said Humphrey would perpetuate "control of the party in the hands of Southern and machine Democrats." Therefore, he reasoned that the Democratic party "needs to be defeated."

Munger's third reason for supporting Humphrey was a personal one. He said that unlike many of the professors in Maxwell, he had "considerable respect for Richard Nixon's integrity and ability."

Prof. Spencer Parratt is voting for Richard Nixon because he's "tired of muddleheaded liberalism." He claimed that while "Nixon's position hasn't been as clear as I had hoped, Hubert Humphrey is even more confused. Sometimes he's for Humphrey, sometimes he's for Johnson and other times he's for both."

Talking about the way the issues have evolved, Parratt said he agreed with the emphasis on the war, but the issue of law and order "should have been more broadly conceived, and I think it would have been if it weren't for the riots that marred the conventions in Chicago and Miami."

He continues on law and order, explaining that he had hoped it "would have been kept in broader perspective," and not concentrated just on "crime in the streets."

Prof. Parratt missed the Nixon speech on Tuesday, but after reading an analysis said it was a "good and interesting speech." Referring to the "Sounds of Silence" demonstration, he said he had "no sympathy for the solution of complex problems by demonstration anywhere. These student protests are less clear cut on the issues than are the candidates."

Professors hopeful for HHH upset

Professors in SU's Maxwell School supporting Hubert H. Humphrey in his bid for the presidency are doing so for a wide variety of reasons and generally agree the vice president is trailing at this stage of the campaign.

The vice president's support ranges from enthusiastic endorsements to an avowal that he is the best alternative.

And although they concede their candidate is behind, they indicate a cautious optimism that he has a good chance to pull off an upset.

Maxwell Dean Stephen K. Bailey, the co-chairman of the Humphrey campaign in New York, said Humphrey has an "uphill fight" on his hands but is encouraged that third party candidate George C. Wallace is losing strength, and the gap between Humphrey and his GOP opponent Richard M. Nixon is narrowing.

Bailey said Humphrey will do "very well" in New York. The court decision keeping Sen. Eugene McCarthy off the ballot will greatly enhance the vice president's chances to carry the state, he added. And the Empire State is vital to Humphrey's upset hopes.

Bailey said he has supported Humphrey since 1951, and he has known him personally during that time.

"Humphrey has been the single most effective creator of legislation in the past 20 years," he emphasized. "His mind is relentlessly searching for answers to our domestic and international problems, and he has shown the capacity to work successfully with legislators when he was the Democratic whip in the Senate."

Bailey cited Humphrey's legislative record concerning medicare, education, civil rights and model housing, saying he could be "justly proud," while Nixon's legislative record was nearly void of any constructive action.

"And where was Nixon's voice when his Republican colleagues in Congress voted against social security, education and civil rights," he emphasized.

Dr. Alan K. Campbell, who replaces Bailey as Maxwell dean in February, though admittedly not an "enthusiastic" Humphrey supporter, nevertheless will vote for the vice president as the best alternative

Campbell said he election results will be much closer than most people think. He challenged the validity of the polls saying the determinants used by pollsters in computing their percentages may be inaccurate today.

The pollsters break down the population into certain groups and assume they will vote as they have in the past elections, according to Campbell. If there are internal divisions within these blocks and the divisions are no longer relevant today, then the percentages will be off, he added.

Wallace is losing support, according to Campbell. Many voting for him are doing so because it gives them a way to vote against the present administration without voting Republican, he said.

"The question is where will the Wallace voters go."

Wallace is drawing votes from the "disaffected people" who are frustrated with the sense that the country is going downhill, Campbell said. They blame race and the young people for a general moral decline, he added.

In the North, Wallace draws most of his votes from the low income working people who feel threatened by the Negro economically, he said.

Harvey A. Martens, director of Public Administration in the Maxwell School, is co-chairman of a coalition of SU professors and physicians from Upstate Medical Center who have pledged support for Humphrey.

The organization of nearly 150 members is designed for the entire faculty staff of the University. Dr. Thomas Fondy of the Zoology Department is the other co-chairman.

The group will be concerned largely with publicity and will purchase pro-Humphrey advertisements in local papers, depending upon financing, according to Martens.

Martens said the group actually was formed to act as hosts the day Humphrey's running mate, Senator Edmund Muskie of Maine spoke here.

Martens calls himself a "long-time Democrat and Humphrey supporter." He cited the vice president's record on civil rights, education and the Peace Corps.

The reason Humphrey trailed Nixon in the polls, according to Martens, was that due to a late Democratic convention he got a late start on his campaign.

He said he hoped Wallace would be "defeated and repudiated."

Professor Donald Meiklejohn, who describes himself as not a "rigid party adherent," nevertheless supports Humphrey because he feels the vice president will fit into the "tradition of Democratic presidents."

That tradition includes siding will the majority against the establishment, he said.

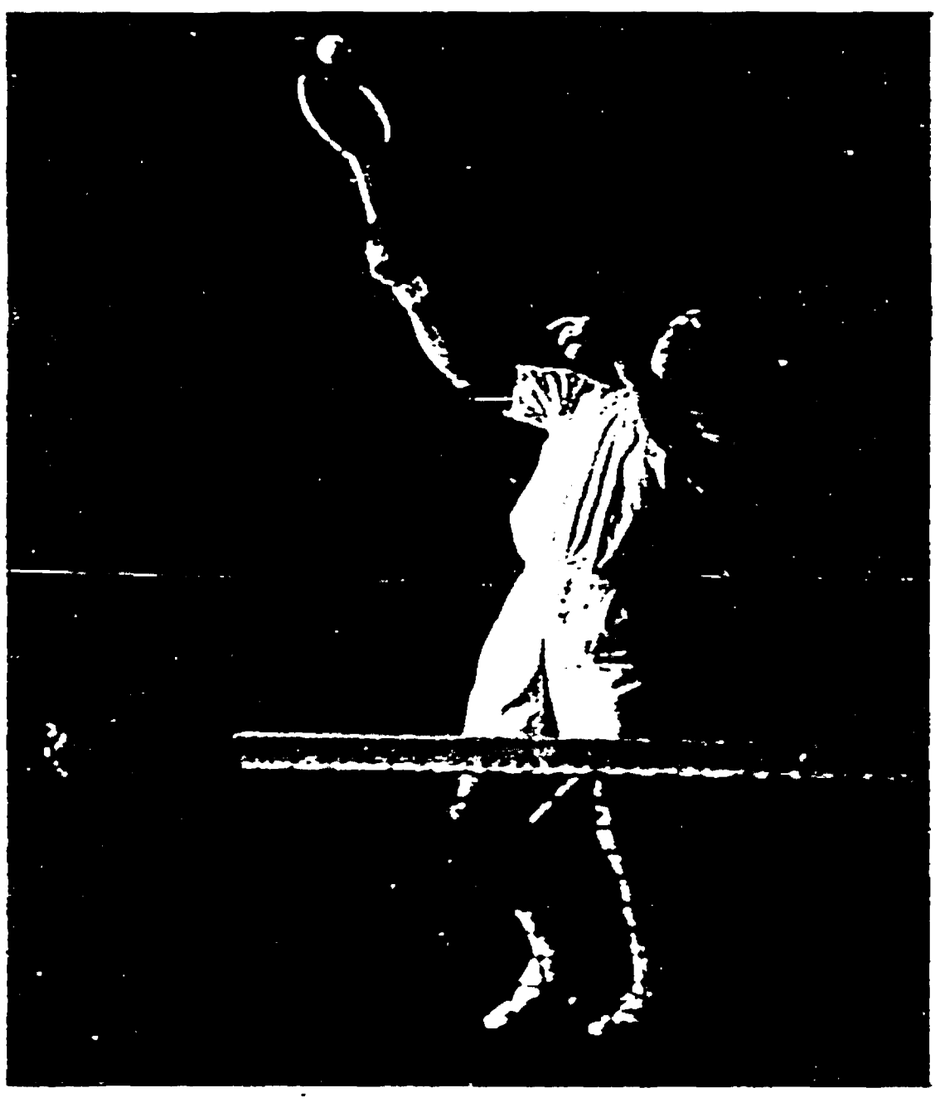
The country today needs a real commitment that is neither anti-Negro nor arch-conservative, he said. The Democrats are known for taking care of the underprivileged, "including the blacks, farmers, young and old Under Humphrey there will be a continuation of Democratic New Dealism in the area of civil rights and social welfare."

Maxwell: where they stand

Frank Munger (left) will vote for Richard Nixon Tuesday although he is supporting Democrats on the local level. "Nixon's commitment to the war is less onerous than that of Hubert Humphrey." he said. Harvey A. Martens, co-chairman of a coalition of SU professors and Upstate Medical Center physicians, likes Humphrey's record.

Professor Donald Meiklejohn (left), not a "rigid party adherent," feels Vice President Humphrey will fit into the "tradition of Democratic presidents," who, he says, have looked out for the underprivileged. Irving Swerdlow, orginally for Robert F. Kennedy, now also leans toward Humphrey (see p. 12).

Michael O. Sawyer, (left) best known Maxwell Republican, is closely connected with the re-election drive of New York's liberal senior senator, Jacob Javits. However, he has declined to endorse the Nixon candidacy. Maxwell Dean Stephen K. Bailey, a Humphrey supporter since 1951, is co-chairman of the vice president's campaign in New York.



Professors give reasons for new Humphrey support

Dissidents

Robert F. Kennedy, above with aide Alan K. Campbell, and Eugene McCarthy, who found strong support from Senatorial candidate Paul O'Dwyer (right), were among the most exciting presidential candidates earlier this year.

Jacob Javits

Sen. Jacob K. Javits visited this campus last month and sharply blasted student draft deferments in an address at Hendricks Chapel.

"National standards of fairness and equity are key elements in any law requiring military service of citizens. The current selective service law simply is not in keeping with a social contract calling for equality under the law," stated the Senator.

"I urge a law requiring the establishment of uniform national standards for students and occupational deferments. The President, given the nature of the current international situation, would be permitted latitude in determining the quality and the number of deferments granted under an equitable draft system," stated Javits.

He continued by saying student deferments are prime examples of special treatment that is accorded to particular groups of citizens.

Three influential professors from SU's Maxwell School who did not support Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey at the Democratic Convention have indicated a willingness to support the party's nominee now. They either cite Humphrey as "the best alternative," or are simply anti-Nixon.

Dr. Alan K. Campbell, who takes over as Dean of the Maxwell School in February, was an enthusiastic supporter of the late Sen. Robert F. Kennedy because he "had the strengths the others didn't have."

His position on issues like Vietnam and the complex urban-race problem gave him the support of many dissident elements in our society today, according to Campbell. The groups most antagonistic today, blacks, low income whites and young people, trusted Kennedy, he emphasized.

"Kennedy realized the world has changed in a way the social philosophy of the New Deal and containment policy in foreign affairs no longer apply today," he said.

What is needed today are policies giving excluded groups a real access to power, he said. They must develop their own institutions and a sense of dignity and pride in themselves, he added. "We need a whole new set of policies to open opportunities through education improvement and access to capital."

The belief that the world is divided into two camps no longer applies today, Campbell said.

He cited the rising nationalism and desire for independence among the underdeveloped countries as reasons for the irrelevancy of a containment policy.

Smaller countries are not interested in an alignment with either the United States or the Soviet Union, he said. "Our position in Vietnam is an incorrect interpretation of the world situation."

Nixon is captured by the containment concept, according to Campbell. He shows no signs of realizing the world has changed. He still talks of East and West. His plan to discuss all problems with the Soviet Union is based on a concept that the world can be controlled by the two major powers, he added.

"Domestically, traditional Republicanism embodies fiscal conservatism," he said.

Yet Nixon's plans to improve law enforcement and bring private enterprise into the problem-solving field will require a great deal of money, he emphasized. If it did not require government subsidy, private enterprise would already be involved.

Though not a Humphrey enthusiast, Campbell will vote for him. Campbell is not sure Humphrey understands the change in domestic and foreign policy but believes Humphrey's basic ideology does not stand in the way.

He calls Humphrey a "new deal liberal" who believes in "activist government."

He termed Humphrey's running mate Sen. Edmund Muskie of "presidential caliber" and one of four or five of the best men in the Senate.

"There's no reason to believe the same of Agnew."

IRVING SWERDLOW

Economics professor Irving Swerdlow also supported the late Robert F. Kennedy before the convention but has since come out strongly for Humphrey and Muskie.

Kennedy would have brought some fresh viewpoints to the Democratic party and the country as well, according to Swerdlow, and would have provided the new and vigorous leadership to get these ideas across.

But with Kennedy gone (Nelson Rockefeller was another candidate he respected, but the GOP chose Nixon), Humphrey is the best alternative, according to Swerdlow.

Swerdlow did say he supported Humphrey over John F. Kennedy in 1960. Humphrey's post-administration record shows he will stand for what must be done to solve today's problems.

Nixon's stands on the two main issues, Vietnam and the social upheaval, are far below desirability, said Swerdlow.

On Vietnam he is much more of a hawk than Humphrey, and concerning social upheaval, Nixon is a "narrow-minded tactician" against strong government and the "kind of things that must be done today."

Wallace represents the darker moods and unpleasant aspects of society that hopefully are not dominant, he emphasized.

"The third party candidate offers no real choice to a thinking man," he added.

DR. KARL SCHMIDT

Dr. Karl Schmidt was co-chairman of an Onondaga County group and a member of the New York State executive committee supporting Sen. Eugene McCarthy's unsuccessful bid for the Democratic presidential nomination. He too, has since thrown his his support to Humphrey.

Schmidt said he supported McCarthy's stand on the Vietnam war. McCarthy was more specific before the convention, but Humphrey has begun to spell out his position, he added.

Calling the present administration's Vietnam policy an "unmitigated tragedy," Schmidt said McCarthy spoke out at a time when no one else was speaking.

Though a part of Johnson's administration, there is no indication Humphrey aided in forming the Vietnam policy, he said. Humphrey, according to Schmidt, even opposed bombing the North.

But Schmidt seemed more anti-Nixon than pro-Humphrey. He referred to Nixon as a man "without integrity," citing his use of character assasination in his campaigns and his failure to answer the $17,000 slush fund charges brought out during the 1952 presidential campaign as examples.

Nixon's legislative record is almost nonexistent, and he built his reputation while working for Sen. Joe McCarthy during the days of the communist witch hunts, he said. Humphrey's record, he added, "is a strong plus" from the liberal standpoint.

World plants entire focus on America's Election

By RAMI KHOURI

As America goes to the polls this Tuesday, millions of people around the world will simultaneously tabulate returns in their own homes. The American presidential election has so grown in importance and influence that almost the entire world will be concerned with the outcome.

What, one may rightly ask, do Indian farmers, Israeli merchants, Japanese fishermen, or Australian industrialists care about our political system and its leaders? Like it or not, United States power and influence around the globe has evolved to effect practically every person on earth. What we do with our money, men, and merchandise is now of universal magnitude. Thus the Australian, Frenchman, Kenyan, and Chinese are all concerned about who occupies the White House and who directs America's foreign policy.

Primary concern of most countries including India is simply whether the United States shall continue to offer materially what it has in the past. In the educated class in India, all are well aware of the candidates.

Indians in administrative and governmental positions are aware of the needs of their country. They have relied on United States aid in the past and would like to be sure that it will be continued.

Another country which is interested in the American elections is Japan. Though its people are not accustomed to the American political system, Japan watches the presidential elections with interest. The people are quite well informed about the candidates, and again are interested in Japanese relations with the new administration. The Japanese are interested in world affairs by nature, and especially the United States because of economic ties.

Still in the Far East, Thailand is another nation which has interests in the elections. Richard Nixon, one of the candidates, has visited the country several times and the people are familiar with him. The Thai people know candidates by name, but could not discuss issues. Their concern, both those in government and civilian positions, is the large US military presence in South East Asia. To them it is a comforting protective "umbrella" which they both appreciate and desire. Thailand and others in the area would be quite "disturbed" if the US ever left that part of the world, and consequently show an interest in the elections and leaders of our country.

Moving west, the entire Middle East is directly involved in election results. Israel is most concerned about the US government policies, for it receives great military and economic aid from us.

As most candidates pledge to support Israel, that country has little to worry about who wins. Because the Israeli press coverage of the election is excellent, most people in Israel are very familiar with the campaigns and become concerned with certain specific issues.

Continuing onto The Continent, the French and Swiss are very well informed of both candidates and issues, yet there is little concern about whether the US will radically alter its foreign policy concerning these states. People in Europe in general are given a very sad and unrealistic view of America. They hear of the riots, assassinations, crimes, etc., but very little of that much larger and other America, which should perhaps be termed "good" America.

Therefore they tabulate their returns with the rest of the world, but with a feeling of almost pity. "Maybe this president will clear things up for those rich people across the sea," is a common thought. Nevertheless, they realize America's great interest in Europe and rest assured that they will not be shaken by presidential turnovers.

Going up and out to England and the Commonwealth, we meet a very well informed, educated people who again will not be greatly effected by the elections, but still show interest. The Vietnam issue splits Australia and New Zealand as it does the United States. Which of the two major candidates wins will not really fluster anyone. Great anxiety is shown over the mere possibility that a George Wallace could win, but other wise there seems to be "a general shrugging of the shoulders."

To some countries, the elections are almost a matter of life and death. To others, simply newsprint. Nations in such areas of the world as the Middle East, Latin America, and South East Asia are very concerned about who wins and what the United States foreign policy is. These are states who contribute little to us, but have very much to gain. They need us badly, and are aware of this fact.

Many other countries need us as well, but also realize that we need them. They simply read about the elections, while many smaller states literally "sweat it out" on November 5th. In any case, all over the world, Radio Free Europe, The Voice of the Arabs from Cairo, France 1, the BBC, the Voice of America, and in fact all world communications media will be tuned in as the United States of America announces a very special happening: Election '68.

Students seek votes for 'Best Alternative'

A group of Syracuse University students have been canvassing the Syracuse area seeking votes for the Democratic presidential nominee, Vice-President Hubert H. Humphrey.

The group, many of whom supported Senators Eugene McCarthy and Robert F. Kennedy and New York's Governor Nelson Rockefeller for president, are convinced that Humphrey is the "only alternative" to the "threat" of a Nixon or Wallace presidency.

The organization, called the "Coalition for the Best Alternative," was formed by Edward Humberger, a graduate student in Public Administration, after talking with Stephen K. Bailey, dean of the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs and co-chairman of the Humphrey-Muskie campaign for New York.

Humberger has said the group is not a part of the Young Democrats or the Democratic Action Corps but works closely with these groups.

Why does a perfect size 7 look perfect only 21 days every month?

It has nothing to do with calories. It's a special female weight gain... caused by temporary water-weight build-up. Oh, you know...that uncomfortable full feeling that sneaks up on you the week before your menstrual period. This fluid retention not only plays havoc with your looks but how you feel as well. (It puts pressure on delicate nerves and tissues, which can lead to pre-menstrual cramps and headaches, leaves emotions on edge.)

That's why so many women take PAMPRIN. It gently relieves water-weight gain to help prevent pre-menstrual puffiness, tension, and pressure-caused cramps.

Dems attempt reform, while GOP stagnates

The Democratic Party image has had its problems in this election year. There is the Vietnam war, inflation, disorder and riots, and other difficulties, most of which are attributed in some way to the past two Democratic administrations. The national party itself has had problems: loss of large numbers of traditionally Democratic voters in the South, the loss of a presidential candidate by assassination, division and animosity within the party, mass protests at the convention, LBJ and Mayor Daley. The list is formidable.

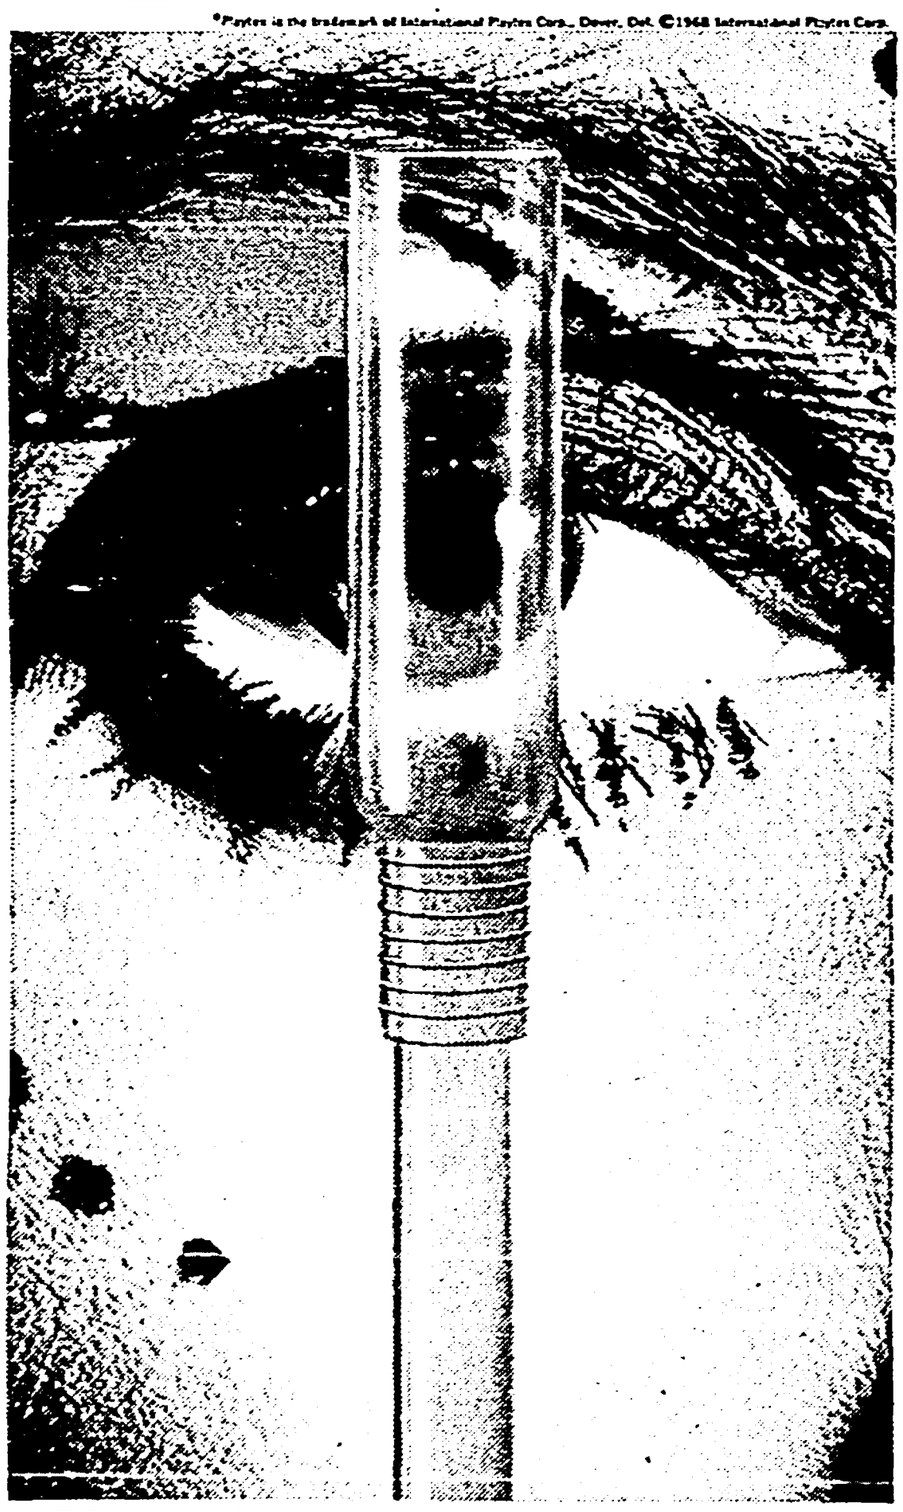
Many people have reacted to this situation by condemning the party and its processes as well as its candidates. No doubt there is some justification in such condemnation, but any judgments of this sort should be viewed in a perspective which makes some allowances for the realities which must be faced in American politics.

Little has been said, for example, of the comparable processes within the Republican party. While the Democratic party unquestionably needs to undergo some basic changes, these will have little effect on the nation as a whole if that party is out of office for eight or more years and the equally unreformed Republicans are in. Republican strength this year is built primarily on its adherence to traditional party methods, including down-the-line endorsements for all party candidates despite a divergence of views, particularly on the war. If the Republicans win the Presidential election and do well in the lesser campaigns, perhaps that would be as much of a lesson to the Democrats as the division at Chicago was thought to have been. In other words, the current Democratic problems by no means indicate that changes will be made in the direction of "reform". The Republicans came back after '64 without it.

There is another way of looking at the confusion among the Democrats, however. Many difficulties have arisen simply because there was a divergence of views within the party and they were being expressed. Such differences can be productive. But similar progressive views have made no headway at all in the Republican Party and probably won't for some time if Nixon wins.

The split at the Democratic convention also showed that there were new and strong ideas developing within the party, an attempt was made to throw out the old order. Some progress has been made since 1964 and hopefully this will continue. Retrogression will be inevitable, however, if those who have fought for and continually brought forward these ideas retreat from the political arena or are forced out of positions of political influence. And who is pressing reform in the Republican Party?

Another interesting point to consider is that the Democratic convention was the site of anti-war and anti-status quo protest, while Miami was free of such pressures for rethinking and revitalization. Part of the protest, admittedly, was directed toward the Democratic administration which was being represented in Chicago, but it can also be contended that among the Democrats change was much more likely–there was some hope for response within the party. There was no hope for change in Miami and no agitation for it.



Considering these possibilities, wouldn't it be ironic if Hubert Humphrey and the Democratic party should lose votes and possible lose the election simply because the Democrats were on the verge of renovation and didn't quite make it, while a party which has made no attempt at reform should gain control of the American domestic and international future?

Plans 'educational effort'

SU Young Republicans gaining support, broadening base

In a year rumored to be Republican, the SU Young Republicans have offered an extensive campaign program for members and interested students. YR efforts have been boosted by financial aid from the Republican County Committee and some attention from the youth divisions of the state and national Republican campaigns.

YR's recruited nearly 150 members during registration week this fall, but considerably fewer became active in the organization. Most of their efforts have focused on the tight local Congressional race between Republican attorney David O'Brien and two-term Democratic incumbent James Hanley.

O'Brien addressed the YR's in mid-September, familiarizing them with his race and asking for their support. From that appeal, a weekly neighborhood canvassing started on O'Brien's behalf in several nearby wards assigned by his staff.

Seemingly pleased with the support from campus Republicans, the county chairman gave the YR's $100 to help activate campaign plans. Part of that money went to charter three buses taking SU students to hear New York's Mayor John Lindsay last month at the War Memorial in downtown Syracuse.

YR's activities have picked up somewhat in the last two weeks as election day draws near. Several nights were spent in the Syracuse suburbs, again campaigning for David O'Brien. YRs operated booths dispensing Nixon literature for three days across campus and also canvassed the larger living centers to announce the Nixon address in Syracuse last Tuesday. Buses were again chartered to take students to the War Memorial, though students failed to get in.

Responsible for this calendar has been YR president sophomore Andy Rosenblatt. Active for several years in Long Island Republican campaigns, Rosenblatt had suffered somewhat from a lack of organization and student enthusiasm.

YR's though on campus for several years, were crippled last year by an internal split that resulted in the formation of SUYR II. The schism was healed, but the group still lacks internal structure and has been confronted with more requests than it can handle in an election year.

As a result, several other even more loosely constructed student organizations supporting various Republican candidates have appeared. Peter Gabauer, a SU law student working for O'Brien, activated the machinery of CAP and GIA, the campus political parties, to augment the O'Brien canvassing being done by the YRs.

Joe Nocoletti, last spring a candidate for Student Government president, and several other students have been working under Maxwell's Prof. Michael O' Sawyer on campus opinion polling and campaigning for Senator Jacob Javits. The Nixon organization in Washington D.C. has channeled some of its requests through several other contacts on campus. A Nixon sound booth on the quad, and an attempt to organize students to travel on Nixon buses were among these.

YRs have plans to remain busy after election eve. President Rosenblatt hopes to make an "educational effort" both within the club and on campus. Plans are also being made to bring a major Republican speaker sometime during the year.

SU chapter protests Establishment

PFP dedicated to 'radical issues'

The Peace and Freedom Party is an anti-establishment political neophyte whose SU chapter has been active since last August. From its headquarters at 116 Standart St., near Lawrinson dorm, the party has directed campaign activities on behalf of its Eldridge Cleaver—Judy Mage presidential slate, while looking to the SU student body and the Syracuse community to increase its membership.

Don Karp, a fourth-year grad student in microbiology, is political chairman for the party. He estimated the group's total membership at 100, but narrowed it down to about "10 that do most of the work." PFP meets several times a month and raises most of its funds from dues which are one dollar a year plus 50 cents per month.

Nationally, PFP is about two years old. It has been in New York State since last summer and has approximately 11 chapters in major college centers from New York to Buffalo. Instrumental in building the SU chapter has been Syracuse resident Larry Alexander who is the state organizer for PFP.

A clause in the constitution of SU's PFP states its purpose as building "a democratic organization dedicated to the raising of radical issues. That means going to the roots of problems."

FFP's primary concern this fall has been the presidential election. The party gained considerable attention at the Sen. Edmund Muskie address on the quad when disruption and heckling were caused by Judy Mage, PFP's vice presidential candidate. Reflecting on the confrontation, Karp thought the attempt to force Muskie into a debate hadn't been well organized. "We had trouble with publicity."

PFP combined with the campus SDS to protest at the Richard Nixon speech last Tuesday. Most of their members weren't allowed in the crowded War Memorial, but the several who made it inside gave the Black Power salute during the national anthem.

Because PFP's candidate Eldridge Cleaver did not make the ballot in New York, the SU chapter is thinking of holding free elections allowing a voter to write-in the name of any candidate. PFP is also supporting the Liberal Party candidate for congress, Dale Tussing.

Other "radical issues" that have gained PFP attention this fall have been the protesting of job recruiters from the Dow Chemical Company, the charges of "work discrimination" at local General Motors and General Electric plants and the striking Calidornia grape pickers.

After the election, PFP will give considerable effort to expanding its membership.

In reflecting on PFP's acceptance at SU, Karp thought students to be generally "apathetic." He thought they had been "brainwashed by society," which he expanded to mean conditioned to accepting only the political alternatives of the Democratic and Republican parties. "We are trying," he concluded, "to get people to think. I think we are getting there."

Humphrey - Muskie coalition . . .

Democratic Party Chairman Richard Planer has pledged full support and recognition to the group.

Humberger at the organizational meetings for the group, pointed out Humphrey's record as a liberal who supported liberal legislation when it was not popular.

Planer told the organization that "action, not inaction, is needed today." Electing Richard Nixon president would turn the nation back to the time of Nixon's teacher Dwight Eisenhower, he said.

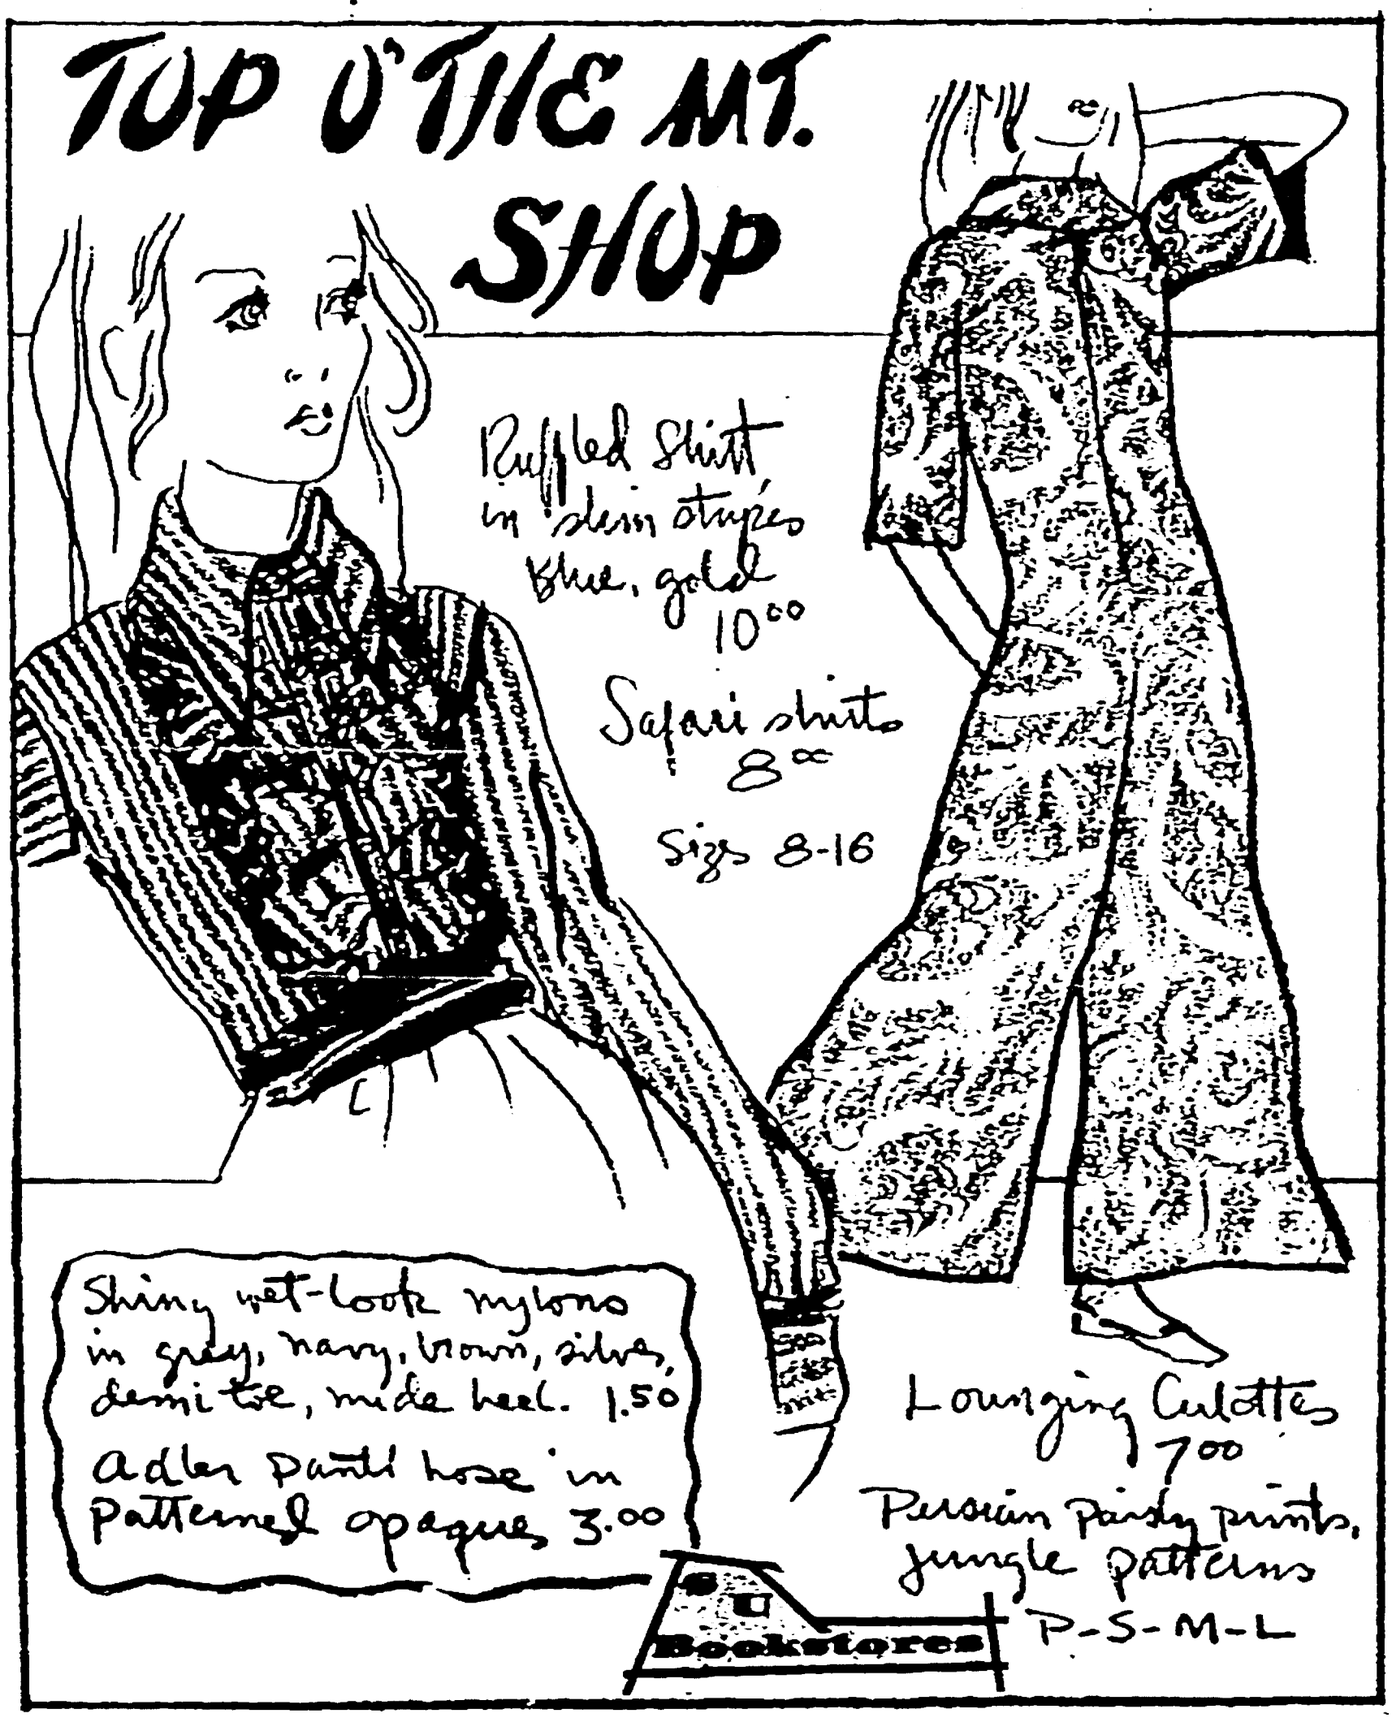
"If you remain inactive and you get Nixon, you deserve him and the 20 or 40 years he'll set the country back," he said.

Planer has urged all students to participate in the election even if it meant working for one of Humphrey's opponents.

"You don't change the party from outside it. You change it from within," he emphasized.

The Coalition was one of the hosts for Sen. Edmund Muskie, Democratic Vice Presidential nominee, when he came to Syracuse University and Humberger made one of the introductory speeches.

Muskie apparently came to Syracuse on his own request and against the advice of his demonstration-wary Washington office. According to Humberger, Muskie came because "he wanted to talk and he wanted to listen."



Humberger sees Muskie as far superior to Maryland Gov. Spiro Agnew, Muskie's Republican counterpart. "We believe Muskie will make the difference," he said.

Cooper's 'Rural Hours'

Journal portrays sights and sounds of rustic village life

On a November day in 1848 Susan Fenimore Cooper, daughter of the novelist, wrote in her journal:

"Tuesday, 7th -- Election Day. The flags are flying in the snow, which still falls in showers, with intervals of sunshine. The election goes on very quietly in the village, four years ago there was rather more movement, and eight years since, there was a very great fuss with hard cider, log-cabins, and election songs to all tunes. This afternoon there are scarcely more people in the streets than usual, and very little bustle."

Susan Cooper's journal of a year in her life at Cooperstown, N.Y., "Rural Hours," was first published in 1850, when she was 37. In 1887, when she was a vigorous 74, she revised the book, which had gone through several editions and which the poet William Cullen Bryant described as "one of the sweetest books ever printed."

Syracuse University Press is republishing the 1887 edition of "Rural Hours" Nov. 4, bringing back into print a volume long unavailable. It appears as one of the series of York State Books published by Syracuse University Press under the general editorship of Thomas F. O'Donnell, professor of English and chairman of the Division of Languages at Utica College.

James Fenimore Cooper's daughter did not tell her readers that the presidential candidates in the election of 1848 were Zachary Taylor, Whig, and Lewis Cass, Democrat. Her concern, according to the new introduction by David Jones, was with "how a representative part of the rural northeastern United States -- the Otsego country -- looked, sounded, smelled, and even felt in the middle of the nineteenth century."

Three days after the election Miss Cooper wrote: "Thermometer only 6 degrees above zero, at seven o'clock this morning. 'Don't be concerned,' say the farmers, 'we shall have our Indian summer yet.' " On the 16th she wrote: "Lovely day; bright air and soft sky."

On the 23rd, Thanksgiving Day, her entry read: "Lovely weather; beautiful sky for a festival. Pleasant walk. As we came back to the village the bells were ringing, and the good people, in their Sunday attire, were going in different directions to attend public worship. . . . It was one of the good deeds of the old Puritans, this revival of a Thanksgiving festival; it is true, they were suspected of favoring the custom all the more from their opposition to Christmas, but we ought not to quarrel with any Thanksgiving-day, much less with those who have been the means of adding another pleasant, pious festival to our calendar; so we will, if you please, place the pumpkin-pie at the head of the table to-day."

Big weekend planned for visiting folks

The Parents Weekend Committee, headed by Barbara Jacobson and Mark Herweg, has announced several changes in the program for Nov. 8-10.

There will be a TGIF for parents on Friday from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m. in Shaw dormitory recreation hall. Beer, soft drinks and snacks will be served, with music by The Deep Purple.

As previously announced, registration of parents will take place in Hendricks Chapel beginning at 11 a.m. At 2:30 p.m. Chancellor William P. Tolley will speak at a convocation conducted by Vice President Frank P. Piskor. Afterward, Vice President Kenneth Bartlett will conduct a question and answer period when parents' questions about academic and extra-curricular matters will be answered.

At 8:30 Friday evening, and again on Saturday, "The Boys From Syracuse" will be staged by the drama department at the Regent Theatre. Tickets are $4.50, $4, $3 and $2, with a 50 cent discount for students. The University Union movie, "Spencer's Mountain," will be shown at 6, 8, and 10 p.m. at Gifford Auditorium. The Goon Show will be presented at 7:30 and 9 p.m. in Crouse College.

On Saturday, after the William and Mary football game, there will be open houses at fraternities, sororities and residence halls. UU will present film shorts in Kittredge at 6, 8 and 10 p.m.

Buttons and mums for parents are being sold by the Senior Class in the H.B. Crouse lobby, for delivery on Saturday, Nov. 9.

Parents will be welcome to eat meals with their students in University dining halls. Prices are: Breakfast, 60 cents; luncheon, 90 cents; and dinner, $1.40.

Beer blast

This Saturday night will be a tradition-setting night for SU. The first annual freshman beer blast will be held in Flint lounge at 8 p.m. The gala event is being sponsored by various campus groups and dorm councils, and is being organized by several goons. The frosh may drink all the beer they can, and dance to the sounds of Art "Legs" Robbins and The Soul Brothers.

Profs for Humphrey...

Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty.

Schmidt regards Humphrey's actions as an "outstanding record" because it reflects liberal thought, creativeness, and shows he is ahead of his times, he said.

Referring to his second point, of an increased chance of Humphrey's election, Schmidt attributes this mostly to "the dates" and he thinks that voters originally intending to vote for George Wallace will switch to Humphrey.

"The thought of having Nixon in the White House is likely to change the minds of the voters," said Schmidt. "They can be swayed on Election Day."

Dr. Fondy also reported that there are now 170 SU professors who endorse the Humphrey--Muskie ticket. He said a "strong" endorsement will appear in the Sunday press.

Dr. Schmidt answered questions from the audience of about 50 students after his speech. He declined to answer one student's question, however, when the student coupled Schmidt's views with those of Ho Chi Minh.

different because there's a group leavin' and a group comin' every year."

English began writing poetry full-time in 1957 when he quit the painting business. That year a group of sharecroppers in Selma, Alabama, were kicked off their land for registering and voting. In an effort to aid them, he published poems in every major newspaper in the U.S. and Canada and also made radio and television appearances. As a result, $60,000 was raised for the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee in Selma to use in assisting the displaced sharecroppers who were forced to live in tents.

Schools he had visited in his nationwide campaign began to write, guaranteeing him a program if he wished to speak on their campuses. Thus the life of wanderlust which attracted English from the age of 12 when he left Selma was given added impetus. An ambitious tour of Asia, Europe and Africa, postponed twice, is now scheduled for next year.

English's philosophy is evident in everything he says: "I have a message. You've got to listen to it to get it... every time you do something good, people will remember... people are basically good, but some of them have a bad understanding of life."

Calling himself a "teacher of teachers," he declares that "if people would pay more attention to outside of the books, there would be more brilliant people on campuses."

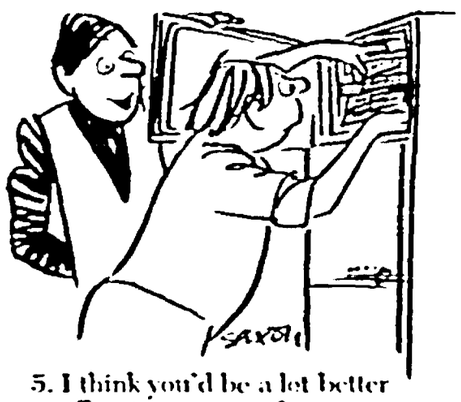
No, I'm trying to find where I stashed some dough.



2. That's where you keep your money?
Sometimes I put it in the flower pot.

3. What's wrong with the bank?
I'd only take it right out again.

4. But that's what you're doing now.
Not quite. The beauty of my system is that I usually can't find where I put it.

5. I think you'd be a lot better off putting some of your dough into Living Insurance from Equitable. It not only gives you and the family you're going to have a lifetime of protection, it also builds cash values you can use for emergencies, opportunities, or even retirement.
I wonder if it could be with the french fries?

out because he is not an active candidate.

Our major income protection programs--social security, minimum wages, unemployment compensation, collective bargaining--all have large groups excluded from coverage and those excluded most are blacks and poor.

Peace in Vietnam requires American withdrawal. There are three strong objections to the war, any one of which should have kept us out. First, it is wrong in terms of world politics. The Vietnamese are fighting for their independence, as they were when they fought the French. We are not fighting against world communism which does not exist, we are fighting against patriots. Second, the way we are fighting is immoral. It is not a war to get and keep territory, we fight, then count the bodies and withdraw. Third it is wrong because it is illegal and unconstitutional.

He is an enrolled liberal but that does not necessarily mean he has a strong attachment to that party or any other party. He is an ex-Democrat and worked the election of some Democrats from this area. He is 33 years old and is an Associate Professor of Economics at Syracuse University, specializing in economic policy with an understanding of urban poverty, employment and inflation problems. He was once a board member of Syracuse CORE and is active in People for Freedom and Peace, the American Friends Service Committee and the American Federation of Teachers AFL—CIO.

FRANCIS ASPINWALL

Running on the Conservative congressional ticket is Francis Aspinwall. He is not directly associating himself with any national candidate, though he plans to vote for Richard Nixon. Conservative candidate for the Senate in New York is James Buckley.

Speaking on law and order, Aspinwall found "the principle purpose of government is protecting the life, person and property of its citizens." Aspinwall sees three alternatives available to the U.S. in the war in Vietnam. The first is applying sufficient pressure on North Vietnam to force their men and materials out of South Vietnam. The second is to hold back the pressure which would result in an "interminable war, with the constant feeding of men and materials into the meat grinder." The third alternative is to get out entirely, which Aspinwall says would be Aspinwall ways would be "nothing more than a Dunkirk."

Aspinwall described our welfare system as a "dreadful bureaucratic mess." He says the key to the situation is to "get the federal government out and return control back close to the people."

Aspinwall has not had much political experience. In 1966, he ran as a delegate for the Constitutional Convention and ran for the County Legislature in 1967.

SU to seek redemption at Holy Cross

By IRA SILVERMAN

The SU Orangemen will try to pick up the pieces from the devastating loss the California last week when they invade Fitton Field to do battle with Holy Cross tomorrow at 1:30 p.m.

The Crusaders, who lost to the Orange 41-7 last year, are struggling this year with a 1-3-1 record. Their only win has come against Dartmouth, 29-17, while they have dropped decisions to Harvard, Colgate, and Buffalo. They fought to a 7-7 deadlock with Boston U. two weeks ago.

The Orange will be seeking their first road victory this season when they take the field at Worcester, Mass. Injuries to key men, though, may slow down the offense while putting a greater burden on the defense.

Center Gerry Vogt will definitely be out with a knee injury. Jim Raymond will start at that spot with soph Len Smith backing him up.

Also out will be defensive halfback Tom Hermanowski. Gary Bletsch will continue to fill in for him.

Other Orangemen injured in the California game who should be back are Tony Gabriel (leg), fullback Al Newton (shoulder), tailback Bill Knox (hip) and defensive tackle Art Thoms (knee).

Coach Ben Schwartzwalder had his troops working on fundamentals this week after poor tackling in the open field and a general lack of offensive blocking against California.

The starting backfield will again consist of Paul Paolisso at quarterback, fullback Al Newton, wingback John Bulicz and tailback John Godbolt. Oddly, Godbolt did not carry the ball once last week against the Golden Bears. He still ranks second on the team in rushing with 149 yards on 30 carries. Newton leads with 344 yards on 73 carries.

Coach Tom Boisture's Crusaders should be at full strength tomorrow with the return of cneter Vic Lewandowski and guard Charlie Boytano. Starting at quarterback will be a senior, Phil O'Neil, who ranked 25th in the country last year in passing.

Joining O'Neil in the HC backfield will be three juniors: Ed Murphy, wingback; Steve Jutras, halfback; and Tom Lamb at fullback. They have been responsible for most of the Crusaders yards on the ground. Jutras leads with 281 yards on 73 carries.

Leading receivers for HC are split end Bob Neary, 28 catches for 323 yards and 3 touchdowns, wingback Ed Murphey, 7 for 129 yards and tight end Jim McClowry, 7 for 53 yards and 1 TD.

All of the Orangemen who put the 41 points on the scoreboard against HC last year have departed. Syracuse lead 41-0 in that game until Paul Scopetski intercepted a Paul Paolisso pass and returned it 43 yards for a score. The SU defense held Holy Cross to minus 12 yards rushing and just 57 passing in that game.

Tomorrow's game will be the 26th meeting between Syracuse and Holy Cross, with the Orange holding a 20-5 lead. HC has not beaten SU since 1958, when they squeeked out a 14-13 decision.

This may very well be the year that SU throws more passes than ever before. Already they've completed 71 of 145 for 817 yards. But there have also been 11 interceptions. The Orange has gained 939 yards on the ground on 241 carries.

Tangerines meet Buffalo with perfect service score

By FRED KRAVER

The undefeated Syracuse freshman football team will travel to Buffalo Saturday to battle the Buffalo frosh. This will be the first of three tough games for the Tangerines, who will meet Colgate next Saturday, and Manlius November 15.

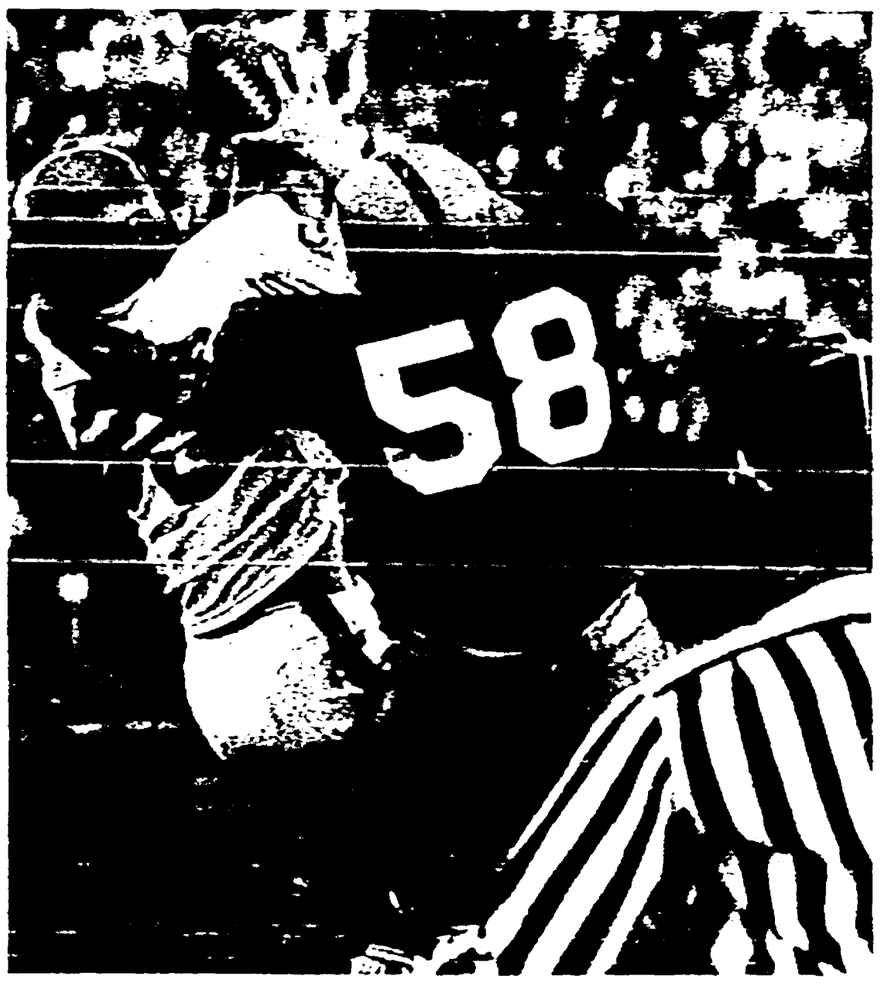
Buffalo is emerging with a respectable football team, and their freshman squad gives them reason to be optimistic. Colgate will be the Tangerines' stiffest competition, featuring size and strength. The Manlius game has been re-scheduled from October 4, the rain-out of the opening game of the season.

Fresh from successive victories over Navy and Army, SU's statisites are impressive. Syracuse has outscored the opposition 61 to 7, has gained a total of 550 yards rushing to only 30 by the academies, and has intercepted eight passes while throwing only one away.

Coach Jim Shreve refused to get overly enthusiastic over the Tangerines' 47-0 trouncing of the Army Plebes. "We had very good blocking from the offensive line," he pointed out. Proof of this is Marty Januszkiewicz' and Greg Allen's combined total of 331 yards rushing. The entire ground assault netted 424 yards.

However, the frosh had only one sustained drive. "We had the knockout punch," Coach Shreve explained. "Breakaway plays were what gave us the game. However, we did show more consistency than in our Navy victory."

The Navy game was plagued by generally sloppy football, and a lack of organization. That the Tangerines triumphed despite their troubles proves the quality of the team. Navy was no pushover, either, having beaten a strong Marylnad club.



"Buffalo is a very well coached, well disciplined them," said Shreve. "They have big interior linemen, and a very strong defense. In their 21-7 Navy victory, they moved the ball well, although their passing was poor."

Shreve is disappointed with the Tangerines' pass defense. The long bombs have been checked, but they are quite vulnerable to short passes. It was interceptions, however, that set up two Syracuse scores in the Army game, so improvement is in sight. Kicking has also been a problem.

Shreve had much praise for running backs Januszkiewicz, Allen, and Rich Phillips, tight end Ray Jarosz, linemen Doug Auld, John Lobon and Ross Sposato on offense. on defense, the praiseworthy players include lineman Ted Lachowicz, Linebackers Ed Berry and Clark Yingst and Dennis Finnigan in the secondary.

It is unsafe for Shreve to single out frosh who have varsity potential. "The role of the freshman tema is to service the varsity with sophomores. You can't build up the frosh since varsity football is a completely different level of competition. But our attitude is to play to win. I am very pleased with the team's spirit, attitude, and potential."

Shreve would like to send eight boys to next year's varsity. However, he is taking things one step at a time, and Satruday's game against Buffalo is the next important step.

Harriers Need Win to better .500 slate

By DOUG GARR

This Saturday the Syracuse Cross-Country team hosts visiting Penn State in the final dual meet of the season.

The Orangemen have a 2-2-1 record and this meet will decide whether they have a winning or losing season. Harrier coach Bob Grieve has had only one losing season in his more than twenty years on the Hill.

This will be the last home meet for seniors Dave Swift, Larry Zuller, and Dave Crans. Rounding out the usual starting team will be Dale Parfitt, Don Kunz and Phil Riposo.

Penn State has a 3-2 record and will be out to make it two straight against the Orangemen. Last year the Nittany Lions downded the SU harriers 15-50.

The Penn State squad will be led by co-captains Al Scheaffer and Ray Smith. The Lion squad boasts eight lettermen.

Coach Grieve was extremely happy with his team's attitude and was confident they will really put out for this meet. "Penn State gives track scholarships, while our boys all pay their own way," he said. Minor sports at Syracuse have at the most two full scholarships which are usually split between three or four athletes.

"You've got to take your hat off to these kids," Grieve said, they're really dedicated." The SU harriers practice every afternoon for more than two hours in the worst Syracuse weather. "They're out here every day, missing practice only when they have class. That's devotion for you."

Grieve continued to sound off on the whole minor sports scene at Syracuse. "If you're not a football or basketball player here, you're a true amateur."

After this dual meet, the harriers have only the IC4A meet in New York on November 18th.

The Penn State clash gets under way at 10:45 AM at the Drumlins Country Club Course.

Sports sidelights

The Women's Athletic Ass'n will sponsor a Hockey tournament Saturday at the Women's Building Field at 12:00, playing Fredonia, Buffalo State, and Potsdam. Tennis will also be played at the Women's Building courts from 12 to 4.

Election is deadlocked at 4 a.m.

RICHARD M. NIXON . . . Deadlock or Victory?

But Nixon is leading in key California poll; Illinois, Ohio critical

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

With election day advancing well into the day after Election Day, the 1968 presidential race was hinging, as predicted, upon seven key states throughout the nation.

Pennsylvania, Illinois, Texas, Ohio, New Jersey, Missouri and particularly California, and a total of 175 electoral votes, all were too close to call by 3 a.m. And, increasingly, the chance that the ultimate decision would be left to the House of Representatives--and the danger of a Constitutional crisis--loomed stubbornly possible.

The future, however, looked favorable for Richard Nixon and dangerous for Hubert Humphrey in New Jersey, Ohio and particularly in Illinois, where it appeared that the Chicago vote would not sufficiently buoy the vice president. Downstate Illinois, consequently, seemed likely to bring Nixon the state's 26 electoral votes.

This, totaled with New Jersey (17), Ohio (26), California (40), in which Nixon held a slim lead, and 162 electoral votes already locked up by Nixon, would boost the Republican figure to 271 electoral votes, one more than the magic 270 majority required.

From the start, when Dixville Notch, N.H., tabulated the nation's first election returns 8-4 Humphrey, a heated presidential race was apparent.

Early returns in the industrial East, the section most vital to Humphrey's hopes, seconded that trend. First came projected reports that New York and its 43 electoral votes were the vice president's. Disappointing Nixon showings upstate, including that in Onondaga County which is traditionally Republican territory, indicated a Humphrey victory. Downstate usually goes Democratic.

Then Pennsylvania (29 electoral votes), with an overwhelmingly Democratic Philadelphia, seemed to be following suit. And large Democratic areas of Pennsylvania and Ohio--Pittsburg, Cleveland and Cinncinnati--remained uncounted. In addition, Michigan gave the vice president its 21 electoral votes. The projected tally of electoral votes

Javits re-elected to Senate in wide victory over O'Dwyer

Incumbent Republican Senator Jacob K. Javits was the least surprising candidate in an upsetting election year as he walked home yesterday with the election.

Early this morning with 2,435 precincts tabulated, Senator Javits had garnered 530,625 votes compared to 337,465 for his closest opponent, Democrat Paul O'Dwyer. The Conservative Party candidate James Buckley won 151,794 votes.

Democrat Paul O'Dwyer refused to endorse his party's Presidential candidate Hubert Humphrey until last Friday. His refusal was consistent with his opposition to the war in Vietnam and his support of Senator Eugene McCarthy.

Although the New York Senate race could not be termed close, O'Dwyer was not defeated by the percentages the pollsters had predicted. One poll said Javits would defeat O'Dwyer with 50 per cent of the votes to 30 per cent.

O'Dwyer failed to develop many substantial issues against Senator Javits. He tried to convince the electorate that Senator Javits until recently supported the war in Vietnam. He claimed Senator Javits condoned the opposition to Abe Fortas for Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. He connected Senator Javits with banking and business interests.

Senator Javits in turn portrayed O'Dwyer as a "one-issue" candidate. The charge seemed borne out by O'Dwyer's own opposition to his party's presidential candidate and constant outspoken opposition to the war. Javits overlooked O'Dwyer's record of long time support for civil rights.

Hanley wins Congress bid over Tussing, two others

By RONI ZLOKOWER
Associate Editor

Incumbent Congressman from Onondaga County, Democrat James M. Hanley, defeated Republican David O'Brien, Peace and Freedom Party candidate Dale Tussing, and Conservative candidate Francis H. Aspinwall, in his best victory of three Congressional drives.

Hanley's margin of victory over his closest opponent, O'Brien, was increased by Humphrey's win in New York State. Election totals gave Hanley 93,108; O'Brien, 82,240; Aspinwall 6,856; and Tussing 2,237.

O'Brien, whose campaign has been termed "effective," had counted on Nixon to carry Onondaga County by a large margin and therefore aid him in what The New York Times called "a good chance of unseating Hanley." Nixon carried the county by only 10,000 votes and so O'Brien received only minimal aid from the national ticket.

Maxwell Dems unruffled by Javits' re-election

By RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

Despite an overwhelmingly Democratic tradition, Maxwell faculty members have expressed only mild discontent, and in some cases much enthusiasm, for the re-election of Senator Jacob Javits.

Reaction towards the liberal Republican's impending third term ranged last night from reserved optimism to complete satisfaction with his victory over challenger Paul O'Dwyer.

Dr. Michael Sawyer, a member of the Political Science department and virtually its only Republican, declared himself "delighted" with the Senator's re-election.

"Justice triumphs," Sawyer said. "Javits is an extra-ordinarily competent, well-informed and able guy. There were two attractive candidates and the better man won." He contends that Javits is "totally on the record in favor of bombing halts" and other measures aimed at cessation of the war in Viet Nam.

Dr. Ralph Ketcham, of the American Studies division, also appeared satisfied with the race's outcome. "I think that's just fine," he said.

Those among the staunchest O'Dwyer supporters did not seem

Regardless, We stand ready

We don't know at this time the outcome of the 1968 Presidential election. But regardless of the outcome, the two major problems of the next President are reasonably clear.

The American people have had a choice between two different personalities and styles of campaigning. The result of their expressed preference can hardly be called a mandate for either one. The campaigns began with a nation divided and bewildered. The national act of voting has not cleared up any issues or divisions.

Consequently, the next President whether Richard Nixon or Hubert Humphrey is going to have to deal with the divisions of the land. He is going to have to bind the generations together. He is going to have to heal the wounds between the races. He is going to have to reconcile the interests of the comfortable suburban rich and the central city poor.

Second, the next President is going to inherit the negotiations over Vietnam and the more recent burden of reluctant South Vietnamese participation. Each candidate deserves a share in the responsibility for the war in Vietnam. Humphrey has offered more in terms of a solution than Nixon but the American people have not expressed any clear choice between him and his aloof opponent. Consequently the next President will not have the approval of the people to follow any policy and he will acquire criticism for any policy that doesn't lead to an "honorable peace."

If the next President fails in resolving the Vietnam war or in restoring a sense of faith and unity in the American government, the sometimes tenuous order remaining in our society will be further threatened.

We believe Hubert Humphrey will be more likely to meet with success in these two major areas than his opponent. But we stand ready to accept the outcome of the election and to give either candidate the chance to achieve these pressing objectives.

Part Three-Reforms

Editor's Note: This is the third and final part in a series by Dr. Julian R. Friedman, Associate Professor of Political Science, on the current state of university affairs.

Obviously it is in most instances easier to oppose than propose. However, I have some proposals to put forward for the redemption of the university. First of all, the universities should genuinely endeavor to end their terrifying assault on the ego of students. Ego damage rather than sound education seems to be the persistent outcome of our efforts. Students enter as A and B persons and end up as C and worse persons or drop outs, with virtually no one appearing to care how this deterioration has occurred in so short a time span. It is a basic problem students, facutly, and administration are fully aware of but let ride for someone else to solve. The fallacies behind the treatment and assesment of students, which are at the heart of the matter, demand urgent scrutiny that is presently lavished on quite marginal episodes.

Black students. The issue is unquestionably of first importance, but the kind of identity pursued on campus is open to question. At least alternatives should be considered or permitted. Perhaps in the final analysis the only one the White establishment welcomes is, paradoxically, Black Power. Afro-American groups are springing up, often with the official sanction of the university, and at several places their value has been amply demonstrated. I wonder, however, whether in most instances they are not the equivalents of the white Greeks, which have been unduly tolerated and even supported by administrations despite their declining utility to the academic community.

A second area of reform relates to the orientation of the social sciences and humanities. These sectors have long been accommodation-oriented. Today it is imperative that they become criticism-oriented. It is a question of balance, not an either-or proposition. The conglomeratist order is expanding rapidly. If we are to realize its potentialities, then its foundations must be revealed, its values probed, and its abuses exposed. This is a prime task for responsible critical scholarship currently, not a century from now.

What is it that has made the social sciences and humanities less responsive to change than they might otherwise be? The standard answer is over-specialization for the sake of science or objectivity. If this is the case, remedies are available. A starting point is to confront the specialized approach with the comparative approach. Another is for facutly to bring concern to bear on their own determination of what is meaningful in scholarship.

Finally, faculties should untie their own hands for attempts at innovation that are possible within the existing university structures. All too frequently we advocate change of the status quo that our own professional commitments, actions, and aspirations tend to sustain.

In this day and age, above all a university must have courage.

Republican future

Inroads

By Abe Wagner

Regardless of the election outcome, the returns from the big cities show clearly what lies ahead for the Republican party, if it is to ever become a viable contender for the votes and faith of the poor, the minority groups, and the rest locked in our nation's sprawling urban areas.

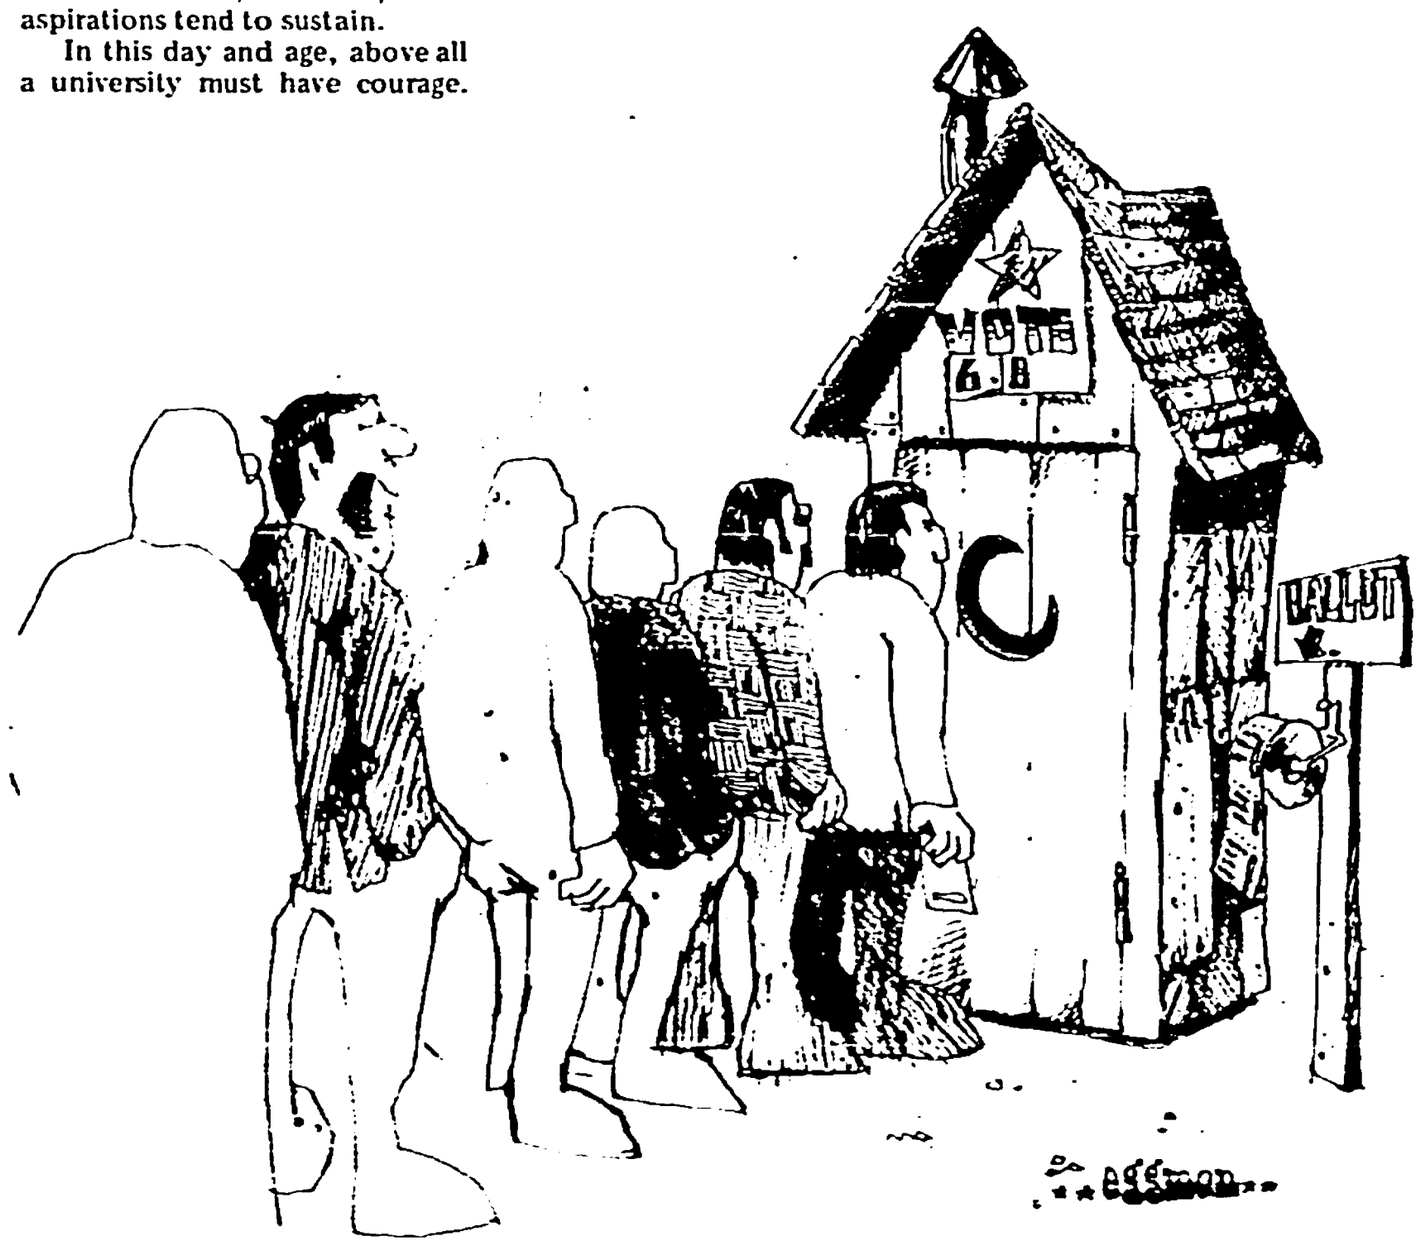
Nixon and his Republican team have failed to demonstrate a basic measure of credibility to the many disenchanted elements of American society who have been the primary cause of the civil strife and unrest that has shaken the nation. In spite of superficial overtures to "civil rights" and legislation directed towards the aid of the poor and idsenchanted, the Republicans have not been believed.

The recent Republican history, from the Nixon deal with racist Strom Thurmond to Spiro Agnew's tactful reference to "Pollacks" and a "fat Jap" to the very returns themselves, the 'new leadership' of promised by the Republicans has shown a decided lack of impact upon those elements most in need of it. To the blacks, the minority groups, and the poor who make up the generation of lost Americans.

In the total popular vote, it is obvious that the Republican party, at least on a national level, has been able to stage a remarkable comeback. If, however, they are to re-establish themselves in the areas of state and local government in the big population centers new inroads need to be made.

If the Republicans are to gain the support and the following of urban dwellers they need to solve the problems of civil strife in the urban areas, or appear as credible candidates with credible policies for the manifest problems of urban America.

The best hope for a viable challenge to entrenched Democratic leadership in the cities seems to hang on the question of whether the Republican Party can in fact express a genuine interest and concern for the alienated, rather than a committment to the traditional 'rugged individualism' of days gone by.



It becomes an imperative for Republicans to make a positive stand for progressive civil rights legislation. The time for platitudes and tokenism in dealing with real problems in strife-torn cities has ended. The painful realizations of reality are for the first time really hitting home for the Republicans. If the election should prove in their favor, they will not only be faced by a country divided, they will be faced by the challenge of those areas in which the problems seem greatest.

If the Republicans are to continue, either as the party in power or as a viable challenge, these are the inroads that must be made.

The '68 elections are the beginning of a whole new political movement.

Student opinions vary on elections

By KAREN WIEDIGER
and JEAN HAVENS

As the election results began pouring in last night, student leaders were asked to give their opinions on the elections. Of the eight students contacted, six voted for Humphrey, one for Nixon, and one was not eligible to vote.

The only Republican in the group was Jeffrey Portnoy, vice-president of Student Government, who said: "At 12:15 at night, it is hard to call the election. It's very close at this time and it might go into the House of Representatives. This may be the impetus needed to get rid of the Electoral College once and for all."

Portnoy was happy to see the Republican party gained several senatorial and gubernatorial seats which he feels shows there is a Republican trend in the country.

He went on to quote columnist Walter Lippman: ""The Democratic party needs a period of rest and recuperation away from the seat of power after an over-long tenure of power. So...it seems to me the better--though not the most beautiful--course that the voters should oust the party which has cost the country so much.' I agree wholeheartedly with that statement," Portnoy concluded.

Paul Snyder, chief justice of the University Judicial Board, would like to see a Humphrey victory and a decisive defeat of Wallace because he feels the former will be able to bring peace in Vietnam and has spoken constantly about control of the arms race.

"I went from Kennedy to McCarthy to Humphrey," said Cindy Bailey, president of the Association of Women Students. "I have a strange view of Nixon. I have lived in California and I know his family personally. He is not the type of person I would like to see as President. "I don't vote on issues, but on the person, and the image he portrays. I know Nixon and his image--forget it," she continued.

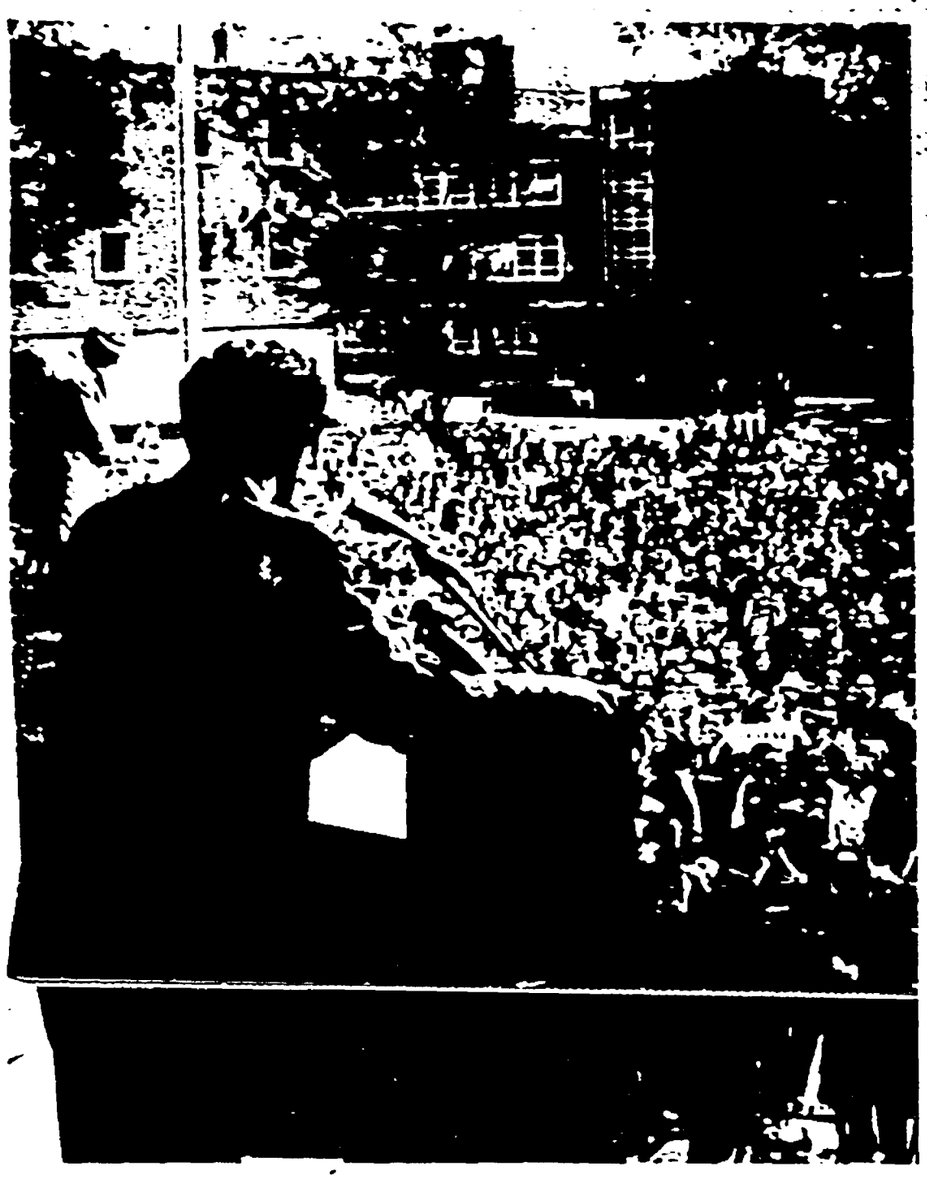
"Humphrey could have won the election hands down but for Chicago. Only toward the end of the campaign did the young people begin to support him, which wouldn't have happened if he hadn't approved of what Mayor Daley did. He should have pushed the minority plank on Vietnam also," commented Student Government President Chuck Hicks last night around 2 a.m.

"I definitely didn't support Nixon. If Wallace gets 8 million votes—we're a racist society and might as well face it."

Hicks continued, "If Nixon wins I would expect very little progress in any Civil Rights legislation. The voting shows how the Black people feel toward Nixon. Ninty to 99 per cent voted for Humphrey. Most feel Nixon is unaware and inssensitive to the needs of black people."

President of the senior class, Barry Randell, also hopes to see a Humphrey victory. He feels the choice of Agnew as the running mate of Nixon hurts the Republican presidential candidate and he is not happy with what Nixon has done in the past.

"Humphrey could handle the job with respect to the image, especially in foreign affairs. His image is one which demands respect from the world," said Randell.



"I would really have liked to see the election between McCarthy and Rockefeller," said Ed Feldman, speaker of Student Senate, who voted for Humphrey. "A big factor in the election will be how many votes Wallace gets. This will be an indication of the nation's attitude."

Sally Cloninger, president of Panhellenic, said the people had been less informed in this election. She feels many people regarded the election negatively, but "both candidates are highly qualified to run. I come from a Republican background but if I could have voted, it would have been for Humphrey because of his stand on civil rights."

Bob Kelly, president of Inter-Fraternity Council, is very pro-Humphrey and would like to see the vice-president win. He said Humphrey and Muskie have better proposals for the city problems and civil rights. "Nixon's idea of replacing Ramsey Clark as attorney general is poor. Every president changes his cabinet, but Clark is by far the best attorney general we have had in a long time."

"It is impossible to say who will win the election at this time," said Bruce Chadwick, editor of the Promethean. "Unfortunately, with the electoral system set up the way it is, the candidate the people want may not get in and there is a great possibility none of the

Sen. Edmund Muskie, the only major national candidate to visit this campus during campaign '68, attracted an enthusiastically partisan crowd of SU students. One memorable highlight of his appearance involved Judy Mage's vociferous heckling attempts. Mrs. Mage, vice presidential running mate of Eldridge Cleaver on the Peace and Freedom Party's ticket, used a bullhorn to challenge Sen. Muskie to a debate. The Democratic candidate staunchly refused, supported by most SU students in the audience.

for Humphrey by 3 a.m. was 137.

But Nixon, predictably strong in the border states, the central states and the West, remained consistently ahead in electoral votes and never fell more than a relatively few thousand popular votes behind his Democratic opponent. Percentage wise, both candidates hovered around 42%.

Ironically, George C. Wallace and his American Independent Party, though strong in the Deep South and piling up about 15% of the popular vote nationally, fell disappointingly short of expectations. Yet the 45 electoral votes accumulated by wins in Georgia, Alabama, Arkansas, Louisiana and Mississippi—coupled with the even Nixon-Humphrey split—could well throw the election decision into the house, or at least into a deal with Wallace.

Underscoring this possibility, an "enthusiastic" Curtis LeMay told supporters, "It may be that by tomorrow, the American Independent Party will be more important than any of us ever thought it would be."

Humphrey's success in pulling even with Nixon can be attributed at least in part to the high Negro turnout throughout the nation. Nearly 93% of Blacks went for Humphrey nation-wide; 97% voted for Democrats in the South.

However, Humphrey's labor support was lagging as much as 20% behind President Johnson's labor vote of 1964. This is perhaps reflected in the urban centers of Illinois, Ohio and New Jersey.

On the other hand, it has been suggested that Nixon's increasingly tough law-and-order line estranged some Democrats and independents who never liked him but were considering voting for him this time. And McCarthyites, even before the Senator's half-hearted endorsement of Humphrey, may have decided that Humphrey did indeed represent the lesser of two evils.

It is also possible that Wallace's loss of strength came from Northern workers who shifted back to their traditional Democratic party.

Yet, Humphrey may just have started too far behind and got going too late.

With the complications that crept into Vietnam bombing halt, no real force existed to bring undecided voters into the Humphrey camp. The lack of enthusiasm for both Nixon and Humphrey very likely meant a high rate of anti-Nixon or anti-Humphrey votes--hardly a type of vote that could be counted on by either side.

Still, an unprecedented 72 million vote turnout has been projected for this election, topping the turnout of 70.6 million in 1964. And it appears that the most populous state, California, will determine the next president.

Electoral College impasse puts election in house

With Richard Nixon and Hubert Humphrey running step in step and George Wallace guaranteed to win several states in the deep South, the prospect of an Electoral College deadlock looms on the national horizon.

Each state's delegation to the Electoral College is based on the combined total of U.S. Representatives and two U.S. Senators. Each delegation usually votes according to the bidding of the candidate who won the popular vote in its state. However, the electors are free to cast their individual ballots for any man who meets the constitutional requirements for President. A Republican elector from Oklahoma, for example, cast his vote for Virginia's Senator Harry F. Byrd in 1960 rather than for Richard Nixon.

George Wallace has stated he will not let the election go to the House of Representatives in event of a deadlock. His electors are under notarized oath to do his bidding. Instead, he would try to form a "covenant" (a pseudo-intellectual word for "deal") with the candidate who appeared most likely to carry out his law-and-order demands. Although this would indicate he would support Richard Nixon, it is claimed Wallace's aim is to run again in 1972. He might choose ambition over ideology and support Humphrey, figuring him to be a better target for criticism over the next four years.

Both major candidates have said they will not deal with Wallace.

If a deadlock in the Electoral College develops and fails to resolve itself, then the election goes into the House of Representatives under Article 2, Section 1 of the Constitution.

Simple arithmetic indicates Humphrey has the advantage in the House. The Democrats now hold 245 seats to the Republicans' 187. But each state would be alloted one vote and each delegation would be polled to see which candidate would receive its vote. The Democrats have majorities on 28 of the state delegations. Republicans control 18 delegations. Four delegations are evenly divided and there are three vacancies. The election results could upset the Democrat's majority.

Saigon's refusal to join the Paris negotiations have complicated prospects for a Vietnam settlement considerably. But at the base of President Thieu's stubborness may be the American presidential elections.

"Informed experts, both in the Administration and in the Nixon camp," the newspaper said, "believe President Thieu's sudden decision to boycott the enlarged Paris talks was highly political--and not just Vietnamese domestic politics, but also a venture into U.S. politics."

The Wall Street Journal said one version of this theory is that Thieu and his backers believe the Americans timed the bomb halt with the election in order to enhance Humphrey's chances for victory--a political move that both President Johnson and Hanoi would support.

Consequently, the Saigon regime "decided on a bit of sabotage to quell any public euphoria in the U.S., thus giving some advantage to Richard Nixon, whom it rates (rightly or wrongly) more likely to stand fast for its cause."

In the role of president-elect, it isn't yet clear what Nixon's policy would in fact be. According to the Wall Street Journal, some of his advisors have argued he "should keep a vast distance between himself and the peace talks" in order to "minimize his own later policy commitment to any pre-inauguration U.S. peace bids," and to absolve himself of any blame, should a final Johnson peace deal prove in the long run unfavorable to the U.S.

Nixon, however, has indicated that he may favor organizing "a united front, because if we together could knock down the idea that Hanoi is going to gain by political division in the U.S. what they cannot gain on a battlefield, this might get these talks off dead-center." Such a policy, said the Wall Street Journal, might also allow Nixon to influence President Johnson's peace bidding.

But it is apparent that Saigon would prefer Nixon to Humphrey as president. Humphrey has demanded that the Paris talks proceed without the Saigon boycotters, whereas Nixon has called the bomb halt without Saigon's assurance of peace talk participation an indication of Administration "hastiness."

Bartlett gets second term in Assembly

KENNETH G. BARTLETT

By RONI ZLOKOWER
Associate Editor

Kenneth G. Bartlett, vice president for Public Affairs at SU, will begin his second term as New York State Assemblyman from the 119th District of Onondaga County.

The incumbent Republican mustered 26,730 votes to defeat his two opponents Leslie H. Cohen, Democrat-Conservative, and Paul D. Leonard, Liberal,who gained 17,689 and 1,169 votes, respectively.

Bartlett's victory margin of 9,041 votes surpassed that of 1966, when he defeated his closest opponent, Democrat Constantine G. Marcoccia, by 7,848 votes. In the '66 election, Bartlett carried his district despite the lack of support shown for Rockefeller at the top of the ticket.

Connected with Syracuse since 1929, Bartlett was a instructor in the School of Speech until 1935. From 1935 to 1941, he was an assistant professor of radio education; from 1941 to 1945 an associate professor; and from 1945 to date, a professor of radio and television. He was dean of the adult education eivision of University College from 1946 to 1952 and vice president and dean for Public Affairs at the university since 1953.

Nixon's 10,928 vote win over Humphrey in Onondaga County combined with Bartlett's past record of service to give him his victory. Nixon's loss in New York State, however, eliminated the chance of a Republican state sweep.

For the past few years, the Republicans have held a majority in the state Senate while the Democrats have maintained the majority in the Assembly. Bartlett will be refoining the Republican minority when the Assembly convenes for the '68 session.

What to expect and what could have been expected

VIETNAM: Nixon has urged a de-Americanization of the war and a role in a postwar Saigon government for "any individual" who rejects use of force. He has called the latest U.S. bombing halt "hasty" and a failure since Saigon has thus far refused to join negotiations.

Humphrey has indicated that the U.S. should continue negotiations with the North Vietnamese even if Saigon refuses to go along with them. He also has called for a gradual withdrawal of U.S. troops and free elections in the south with NLF participation if it renounces force.

DRAFT: Nixon favors an all-volunteer army after the war in Vietnam is ended. Humphrey, on the other hand, advocates a lottery for 19-year-olds.

ARMS CONTROL: Nixon would delay Senate ratification of the non-proliferation treaty, largely due to the Russian invasion of Czechoslovakia. He feels a clear American superiority in all military facets must be achieved before the Soviet Union "could be trusted to carry out such a treaty."

Humphrey has urged prompt Senate ratification of the nonproliferation treaty and talks with Moscow for reduction of missile stockpiles. He would, meanwhile, go ahead with a limited anti - ballistic - missile deployment.

LAW and ORDER: Nixon would "appoint an attorney general who knows how to enforce the law" and would wage all out war on organized crime and drug traffic. He would establish a Cabinet-level council to coordinate Federal policy on crime, create a national academy to train local police officers and approve block grants to states for law enforcement. He favors wiretapping.

Economics at SU, Dale Tussing, enrolled Liberal who ran on the Peace and Freedom Party slate, went down to defeat with fellow peace candidates McCarthy and O'Dwyer. His proposed solution toward peace in Vietnam is based on an American withdrawal. He renounced the war as "immoral, wrong in terms of world politics, illegal, and unconstitutional."

Tussing emphasized during his campaign that our major income protection programs--social security, minimum wages, unemployment, compensation, collective bargaining--all under present systems exclude large groups of people. Black and poor people are those most often excluded, he claims.

Hanley called his victory "gratifying." He felt that his re-election showed the people confidence in him as their representative, and that the service he had attempted to render was considered by the people of Onondaga county "to be satisfactory."

Hanley supported the Humphrey-Muskie ticket throughout the campaign. During his past two terms in the House. He has supported the administration's programs, especially President Johnson's anti-poverty programs.

Declaring the need for more law enforcement as a manifestation of existing social conditions, Hanley feels the need to change social conditions rather than just improve police forces. He calls for better housing, an end to discrimination, improved medical care, and betterment of our educational system.

Hanley was elected to Congress in the 1964 general election, being part of the Democratic national sweep. He had served in 1963 as campaign coordinator for the Onondaga County Democratic Committee. In the 1966 general election, he was re-elected to the 90th Congress.

Presently serving as a member of the President's Council on Voter Registration, Hanley is a member of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee and Post Office, and Civil Service Committee and is chairman of the latter committee's subcommittee on classification. He is also a member of the Steering Committee of the bipartisan New York State Congressional Delegation.

greatly distressed at Javits' sound defeat of his opponent. Dr. Frank Munger, a Political Science professor stated that he was "not particularly pleased," with the election's outcome, but had no further comment.

There was even extravagant praise for Javits from those who did not choose to case their votes for him. Dr. Alan Campbell, newly appointed Dean of the Maxwell School, stated that he "would have preferred O'Dwyer" but added that "if all the Republicans were as good as Javits we would have a great U.S. Senate." Concurring with him was Stephen K. Bailey, present Dean of the Maxwell School.

Dr. Donald Meiklejohn, chairman of the Department of Public Affairs and Citizenship, stated that he was "not unhappy at all" to have Javits re-elected, although he himself supported O'Dwyer because of his connection with Eugene McCarthy, and his opposition to the Vietnam war.

An unexpected result of the election was the sizeable amount of support gained by Conservative candidate James Buckley, a factor of much concern to Dr. Irving Swerdlow of the Economics department.

Stating that he was "rather displeased" with the election's outcome, Swerdlow expressed alarm at what he described as the protest vote of those who prefer a stronger military policy in Viet Nam.

Holding that Javits was a "good man who warrants support," Swerdlow pointed out that "people find it hard to toss away a good man when a better one (O'Dwyer) comes along."

Both Senatorial candidates visited the Syracuse University campus earlier this year. O'Dwyer emphasized his desire for peace and his intention to work for the abolishment of national conventions in his mid-September speech. Javits, in an address to the Public Affairs and Citizenship lecture class, stressed his support for the use of a lottery for a more equitable draft system.

Poet speaks

Walter Lowenfels, editor of the popular anthology "Where Is Vietnam?" and author of over a dozen books of poetry, will read from his work Thurs., Nov. 7 at 4:30 p.m. in Grant Auditorium. The reading is sponsored by The Salt Mound Press.

Lowenfels has long been a leader in poetry of the Left. In the early '30s, as an expatriate poet in Paris, he shared the Richard Aldington Poetry Prize with E. E. Cummings. Doubleday will soon publish his newest anthology: "The Writing on The Wall," a collection of protest poetry.

Lowenfels is also acknowledged as a major editor of Walt Whitman, having edited "Walt Whitman's Civil War," (a Book of the Month Club Alternate selection), and "Selections from Leaves of Grass."

Many great literary figures of the past 50 years, from F. Scott Fitzgerald to Allen Ginsberg, have praised his work. According to Henry Miller, "It's as though Lowenfels stripped language away and left only the glowing phosphorescent fires..." Kenneth Rexroth has described his contribution as "epoch making in the evolution of American poetry."

At present, three young critics are writing book-length studies of his life and work. Vassar offers a course on his writings.

salaries and training of local police through Federal grants. He would also create programs in an attempt to curb juvenile delinquency, reduce the number of "criminal repeaters" and combat organized crime.

SUPREME COURT: Nixon, promising to appoint only "strict constructionists" to the Court, has claimed that Supreme Court decisions have "set free patently guilty individuals on...legal technicalities."

Humphrey, defending Supreme Court decisions, proposes Federal aid to courts to hire more prosecutors and more public defenders on the ground that "we need to help our courts--not attack them."

EAST-WEST: With a professed distrust of the Soviet Union, Nixon would build up the military strength of the U.S. and NATO, then enter into summit talks with the Soviets.

Urging annual summit meetings with the Soviet Union, Humphrey has called for "reconciliation and peaceful engagement" with Communist nations.

CIVIL RIGHTS: Nixon accepts open housing, but has indicated he would rather see it on the state, rather than the Federal level. He would, however, use Federal fund-leverage to end legalized segregation, but not to promote integration by busing. He would also encourage greater Negro management in businesses.

Humphrey backs open housing and the Kerner Commission proposals. He defends use of guidelines to encourage school integration.

TAXES: Nixon would try to block renewal of the 10 per cent income tax surcharge, while Humphrey would retain the surcharge if "needed to defray urban-programs costs."

Students' reactions . . .

candidates will get the electoral votes needed."

Chadwick voted for Humphrey and would like to see him win because he feels he has had experience in handling the issues of today.

Student reaction based on the slim lead of presidential candidate Hubert Humphrey early this morning ranged from confusion to definite statements pro and con.

Agnes Williams, a freshman living in Seneca Apartments, expressed one of the predominant views of the election when she explained: "I really don't know what to say. Although I'm for Humphrey, if he didn't win I wouldn't be disappointed. I just don't like Nixon at all."

Junior zoology major Mark Higginbottom also said that he hadn't thought about the outcome of the election to any great extent, and declared, "I'm for Nixon because I identify Humphrey too much with the present administration and its ideas."

But it was still an early point in the tabulation of returns. Jeffery Fuchs, a junior psychology major, said: "I don't believe Humphrey has won. I still feel that Nixon will carry the election but I would be very gratified if Humphrey did win."

"I think its terrible," declared Haven Dorm Co-ordinator Liz Crotty when asked about the possibility of a victorious Humphrey. "I don't want to see him in the White House," she continued. "Nixon is the lesser of the two evils."

Mary Bottcher, junior zoology major, said, "In a way I'm glad that I couldn't vote this year. I never really came to a decision about who I wanted to win—I didn't want any of them to win actually."

"I wouldn't like it too much," said Chris Beumer when asked her reaction to the possibility of a victory for Humphrey. The sophomore art major explained, "I just don't like his policies. I think the House will have to decide the election anyway."

Lawrinson resident Steve Sloam said, "If Humphrey gets elected, the only resort is to look at it as death before dishonor. If he does get in everyone should do as I will and call suicides anonymous."

Going from the confusing to the cryptic, one nameless junior declared, "I think Nixon and Pat Paulsen would have made a good team."

Senate victors...

Senator Javits managed to rally many elements behind his candidacy including labor, management, Wall Street, Seventh Avenue, upstate Republicans and New York City Democrats. In addition, as one Democratic Congressman observed, "The Jews will vote for Javits as if he were Moshe Dayan."

In Onondaga County where Nixon won by 10,000 votes, Javits attracted 71,854 to O'Dwyer's 61,442. Conservative Party candidate James Buckley earned 49,053 votes. The Conservative Party did better in Onondaga County than statewide.

O'Dwyer did not take to the airways until the last week of the campaign when the meagre campaign war chest purchased tough anti-Javits commercials on television and radio. Senator Javits began broadcasting advertisments in mid-September.

Despite Javits' walk-away victory, O'Dwyer's campaign against the war in Vietnam without the money or support of disgruntled party regulars, bore modest fruit.

Impasse . . .

While the House balloted to choose the next President, the Senate would vote on the next Vice President.

According to a law passed after the House contested Tilden-Hayes election in 1876, any member of the House with the concurrence of a member of the Senate may object to the vote cast by a member of the Electoral College. The supposed basis for such objection would be if an elector cast his vote for a candidate other than the one to whom he was supposedly pledged.

The Courts and Congress have never defined the "regularly given" standard of judging an elector's vote.

Young, poor, black votes do not make up electorate

"The electorate is un-young, un-poor, and un-black," said Richard Scammon, director of the Elections Research Center in Washington.

This statement contradicts cherished American misconceptions that it is vital for a politician to attract the noisy and idealistic youth vote, that the poor people swing decisive weight because there are so many of them, and that the vote of the Negro bloc is essential for election.

The bulk of American voters are middle-aged, middle-income white citizens. The number of poor people according to official classification is decreasing — by 3.8 million between 1967 and 1968 — and comprises only 13 per cent of the electorate. Fewer than half of those with incomes under $2,000 a year bothered to vote in 1964. Eighty-three per cent of those with incomes in the $10,000 and above bracket voted in the last Presidential race.

Negroes make a potent voting bloc in several large cities but nationally, of course, remain outnumbered ten to one. In addition, Negroes and long-haired youths are highly visible groups that tend to be disenchanted with the whole electoral process. In 1964 only 51 per cent of the ten million people then under 25 went to the polls.

Adults between 35 and 64 show the highest participation in elections--74 per cent in 1964.

Voter turn-out also reflects schooling. Eighty-eight per cent of all college graduates cast ballots in 1964 compared to 51 per cent of those with eight years of schooling.

One of the great old-time voting blocs was the Democratic labor union. But union members have been growing more affluent and moving to the suburbs, adopting their concern about property taxes, crime and racial issues. Labor's city-oriented machinery can't get out the vote so easily when much of the vote is beyond its reach.

For a half a century America's cities have been growing in population, and dominant in cultural and political influence. The election and census of 1960 indicate that population growth in the cities has passed its peak and is declining.

New York, Baltimore, Washington, Buffalo, Cleveland, Chicago, Detroit and San Francisco all had lost citizens over the past decade, according to the 1960 census.

The big city machines are also declining due to the disappearance of the crowds of uninformed immigrants, influenced by a party boss' bidding. The patronage of the city machine has been replaced in some instances by welfare or employment and training programs. John F. Kennedy, for example, carried Philadelphia by 331,000 votes and Lyndon Johnson won it by 434,000 votes. But Hubert Humphrey is expected to have difficulty mustering the 200,000 votes he will need to overcome the Republican vote in the countryside.

'Pop'-ulation explodes

SU's pop-ulation explodes November 8, 9 and 10 as parents receive a lengthy and enthusiastic introduction to the University.

To date 3,334 football tickets have been sold for the Saturday football game with William and Mary. The Regent Theatre reports an advance sale of 820 tickets to the Saturday night performance of "The boys from Syracuse," a sell-out, and half that number for Friday night. The Syracuse Convention Bureau, according to SU Vice President of Public Affairs Kenneth Bartlett, indicates from five to six thousand persons are expected at hotels and motels in the area.

This morning parents had a genuine taste of University life by eating breakfast and lunch alongside students in University Dining Halls.

After the William and Mary game at 1:30 p.m. in Archbold Stadium, parents are invited to open houses at all the students living centers until 6 p.m.

After dinner the Syracuse University Drama Department will stage the Rogers and Hart Musical, "Boys from Syracuse," at 8:30 p.m. at the University Regent Theatre, 820 East Genesee St. Tickets are $4.50, $4, $3, and $2. There is a $.50 discount for students.

Also this evening University Union is showing film shorts in Kittredge Auditorium in Huntington Beard Crouse at 6, 8, and 10 p.m. Admission is free.

Guided tours of the campus are offered at 10 and 11 a.m. on Saturday starting from the rear entrance of the Administration Building.

Sunday morning breakfast is served between 8:30 and 9:30 a.m.

At 9:30 and 11 a.m. Roman Catholic Mass is offered in John R. Crouse College Auditorium. Mass will also be offered at 12:30 and 1:30 p.m. in Hendricks Chapel. Protestant services are at 9:30 and 11 a.m. in Hendricks Chapel. Episcopal Holy Communion is offered at 10 a.m. in 400 Crouse College. Lutheran Holy Communion is given at 10 p.m. in Chapel House, 711 Comstock Ave. At 10:30 a.m. Flint Hall Recreation Room will be the site of a Hillel brunch.

Dinner will be served in University Dining Halls between 11:45 a.m. and 1:15 p.m.

One of Europe's most famous organists, Anton Heiler, will perform at 4 p.m. in John R. Crouse Auditorium. The Vienna organist has selected a concert of music from Bach. (See story, page 6.) Tickets are $1.50.

On Friday at a meeting in Graham Hall the Parents Association elected new officers: president, Mr. and Mrs. James W. Marble of 2029 Bellevue Ave., Syracuse; vice president, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Fuller of Parish, N.Y.

All parents of undergraduates are members of The Syracuse University Parents Association. The University invites them to attend Parents Weekend in the fall and Moving-Up Day in the spring. The first Parents Weekend was held in 1957.

The association has set up within its membership an organization called the Parents Fund Council whose mission at the outset was to raise funds for the student infirmary. The parents realized their goal of $650,000 in gifts and pledges. At the conclusion of that campaign they voted to continue the Council and raise $750,000 toward the new $11.4 million University library. More than $350,000 has been raised to date.

St. Mary's: the newest addition to Syracuse multiversity plans

Syracuse University, making room for an annually increasing influx of students, will within a relatively few years be a physical multiversity in every sense of the modern term.

J.V. Latorre, assistant to the vice president for administration and research, yesterday explained to parents in Hendricks Chapel SU hopes for future development.

Perhaps the most ambitious of these is the planned "super complex" which will replace Marshall Street with two "super blocks." Extending from Waverly Avenue to either East Adams Street or Harrison Avenue, the two blocks would include a new business area, a motel and parking conveniences.

Before this "ubran renewal" can be physically begun, however, cooperative planning among the University, the city and private enterprise must be completed; certain cites still must be bought and rebuilt by the city and then sold, hopefully to the University; and 50 additional acres must be bought, according to Latorre.

Perhaps the tardiest (besides the University Union building) of the planned developments is the Newhouse Communication complex. Previously planned for completion within the decade, phases two and three have lagged far behind schedule. Latorre said the second building will be completed within five years, and will be adjacent to University Avenue.

However, I.M. Pei, the famed architect of the first Newhouse building, has said he has too many commitments to continue on the complex.

Presently under construction are the Engineering building on the Slocum side of the quadrangle, and the Geology building, perpendicular to White Hall. A new chemistry building is also on the drawing boards, according to Latorre, and will be situated in front of Baum Hall; but, he said, the quad will not be affected.

But perhaps the most illustrative of SU's new construction is the new St. Mary's complex, located west of SU's New Left mobilizes for 'winter of discontent'

By MARK MASTERSON

The newest of terms coming out of student activist campaigns of late is "New Left." It's use livens the style of many news columns and gives added punch to otherwise nondescript offbeat movements. Not unfamiliar on this campus is SU's own "New Left," which presently is seeking student support to carry forth its plan of confrontation.

The "New Left" movement is admittedly finding difficulty mobilizing enough students to make a noticeable show of strength. Students seem reluctant to ally themselves to anything that might shake the status quo, at least for now. Consequently, "New Left" leaders have found the need to reevaluate their approach Restore and are satisfied for the present with the old "peaceful demonstrations" in the form of symbolic mock "freak-outs."

The situation probably was best explained by a Columbia University "New Left" advocate: "We all feel frustrated . . . We opened the year with the goal of shutting the school down, but we didn't do it. The administration has not been as unmovable as we thought. They made mistakes, but they recognized them and corrected them."

When the enemy is out of sight, who can fight? While not surrendering its basic aims, "New Left" loyalists have moved themselves a bit to the right in hope of attracting some of the less active liberal reformists. This movement is likely to continue as long as university policy-makers remain responsive to student suggestions and as long as students are allowed to share in policy-making decisions.

In the wake of last spring's student uprising at the Sorbonne, Columbia, Berkley and the rest, university administrators have themselves found the need to reevaluate approach methods. Across the country educators are asking: "Should sit-ins be tolerated. Should the police be called in? Should offenders be prosecuted?" More often they Pig Book '68 comes Mon.

This year's Orange Aid, commonly known as the "Pig Book," will be available in HBC the week of Nov. 11, according to co-editor Karen Wiediger.

Greek Houses that have bought in bulk can pick up their books at French Cottage Monday between 7-11 p.m.

Freshmen must bring receipts. The books will be available to upperclass for $2.

The Orange Aid, according to Miss Wiediger, has a new look this year. It includes pictures of 2,5300 freshmen, and with 140 pages, is the largest book in Orange Aid history.

A President of all the people?

Governor Rockefeller was in Syracuse the day before election and we had the chance to ask him what he thought Richard Nixon would do as President for civil rights. Would he enforce existing legislation? Would he press for more?

"I'm worried about that too," he answered. "But I hope that once a man becomes President, he becomes President of all the people."

We supported for President first Nelson Rockefeller than Hubert Humphrey. Both have shown deep convictions in the pursuit of equal rights, and both have shown the ability to reconcile conflicting passions and ease racial animosities.

Richard Nixon has no such record. At this late date we are not certain why he wants the Presidency other than to be President.

However, we wish to give him a chance to achieve harmony in the nation and to reconcile the disjointed factions. This will be a difficult task with the war in Vietnam dragging on. He has been elected without a stated policy on Vietnam other than "honorable peace" through negotiation. If negotiations fail we do not know what he would do.

Nixon has, however, demonstrated he can unite a divided party and run a highly efficient campaign. We grant him these qualities of form and shall accept his leadership toward unity, until greater substance comes along in 1972.

George Dolch

Grad president

By Jacques Lebel

What do you get if you cross a Bantum rooster with a beaver. Desipte the humorous if slightly off color image one might conjure up the answer is that you get something closely resembling George Dolch, newly elected president of the fledgling Graduate Student Organization. Any one who still views the grad student as a bearded fanatic, a deep brooding sea of irresponsibility, a "young Turk" in the moderate world of maturity had better try again. In an overwhelming show of support the G.S.O. members, representing all aspects of graduate education and interest, elected Mr. George Dolch, gray haired veteran of over 20 years of active ministry, to lead their organization.

Don't let the gray hairs fool you; George is no anachronism. This diminutive ball of fire may have been well into his intercollegiate wrestling career long before most of the present S.U. grad students were born but he can probably still take most of us on. His years of interaction with S.U. while serving as a Methodist minister in the Northcentral N.Y. area gives him contacts the likes of which no other grad student can boast yet he is as vibrant and creative as the youngest rebel that the Maxwell School can recruit.

George got his undergraduate education back in the 30's at St. Lawrence where he majored in psychology, worked to support himself, and still found time to make the wrestling team and serve on the school paper. Along with classmates like the firey Kirk Douglas, George was already developing the driving personality that characterizes them both to this day. Next George attended Boston University where he received a degree in theology and then came several decades of service to his God . . . but even more-so to mankind. In the mid 40's you might have met him in Alaska where he created from nothing a Methodist parish, a Methodist church and finally Alaska Methodist University. If he can do one-tenth as well with the G.S.O. it will be a monument to his ability.

In the late 50's and early 60's something strange happened. As a minister in the Oneida Lake region of N.Y. George found himself confusing and even agravating some of his older parishioners. In trying to discover the reason for this he found that he was relating more to the younger members of the congregation even to using their idioms in his speech and their perceptions in his presentations. The outcome of this may be the work of divine providence for George Dolch is now almost finished with his doctorate in High Education and Religion and is probably well on his way to a second career not totally different from his last . . . but significantly different.

And it is this small, gray dynamo who will represent the Syracuse University G.S.O. to the rest of the campus and perhaps beyond. What other organization can claim a president who once served as chaplain on a South American cruise . . . or who built, almost literally with his bare hands, a modern university from the cinder-block foundation on up? George Dolch will be the biggest reason the G.S.O. will be around next year. Let's hope that the second biggest reason is the support he will receive this year from the graduate student body.

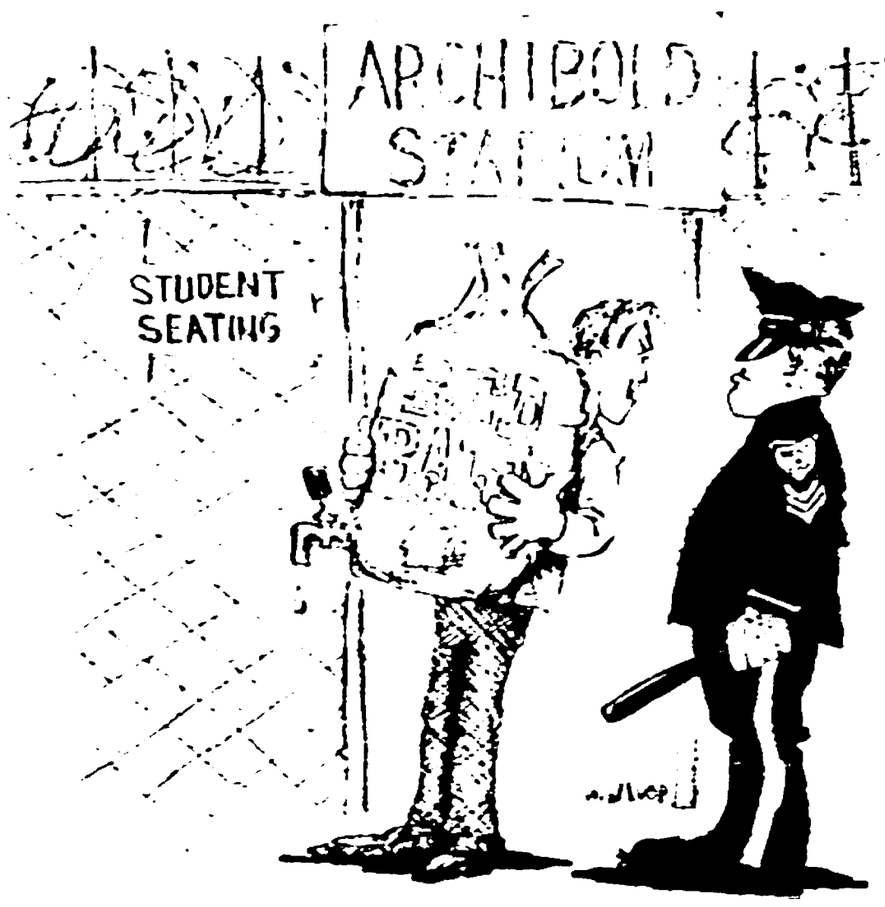
Toward efficiency

Reply from the Corner Store

I am very interested and concerned about complaints that anyone may have concerning the University Bookstores. I want very much to see cooperation and harmony between the bookstores and faculty. This can only be achieved by communication and mutual understanding.

Of course I can only speak for the "trade books," perhaps better known as "non-required" books. I do sincerely urge all professors who use recommended reading lists to submit their compiled lists in advance to assure proper delivery of books by time of need by students.

I also urge all faculty and administrative personnel to visit their campus bookstores as frequently as possible to keep up-to-date as to what is happening, to maintain acquaintances with all personnel, especially the management, to offer suggestions and ideas, and to discuss any problems or subjects of interest pertaining to the bookstores. What better way for creating ideal relations than personal contact?



If faculty and staff would come and visit us, discuss their ideas and needs with us, then problems for both faculty and students would be minimized and bookstore operations would be much smoother and more beneficial for all in the University community.

Dorm conversion

To the Editor:

I read both with interest and disgust your article about the conversion of Sadler into a women's dormitory. Let me say first that the idea is basically a good one on paper, but it is neither fair nor feasible when the conditions are considered. Just because Sadler is the same size as Flint and is next to Lawrinson doesn't mean that conditions are perfect for the conversion. There is a tunnel between Sadler and Lawrinson, so something would have to be done about that. New phones would have to be installed (girls are known to love the telephone), as would new bathroom fixtures. The money saved from these two operations might be used for improved food or extra scholarships, for example. As for the unfairness of the proposed conversion, I would like to mention that most floors in Sadler are very organized and possess a large amount of school spirit. Many present Sadlerites, I am sure, want to live on the same floor next year. This is especially true for freshmen.

Besides the tunnel, plumbing and telephone changes, there is another impractical aspect of the switch. The football players, who are fairly popular among Sadler residents, would be the first to move into Lawrinson. Because of them and the '73 freshmen, almost every Sadler resident who wishes to remain there (but is forced to move out) would have to be admitted to Lawrinson next year. If the University were to allow Sadler residents to have preference in choosing housing, then Sadler might become a women's dormitory. However, there is also the problem of allowing the present Lawrinson residents to remain there next year.

This situation can only lead to a headache for the University. We are all asked to make sacrifices in college, but this one is unjustified. The basic reason for the conversion is a first step toward co-ed dormitories, but the selection of Sadler because of its "lounge space comparable to that of Flint" and "large television room" is unfair. Sadler has a hot, tiny TV room, no TV, and a smaller lounge than Flint does. Hence, the University is attempting to impose upon us while using faulty reasons.

Howard Groopman '72

Graham A-Go-Go

To the Editor:

Few residents of Day and Flint will forget Sunday, Nov. 3 the day the 'epidemic' struck. It started to be a very typical Sunday morning, until many residents from each floor went tearing to the bathrooms, not because of hang-overs, not because they had the "flu," but because they had been poisoned from the delicious sumptuous meal they had consumed the night before.

Trying to give food service the benefit of the doubt, we talked to as many girls as possible on the floor. It seems that the afflicted girls had eaten in Graham. Those who were well had had the good fortune to eat out.

As the afternoon progressed, and fellow floormates were looking various shades of green and flushing of toilets reverberated throughout the dorm, some few had the strength to report to the infirmary to receive an envelop of pills and a bottle of white medicine, the cure.

Granted the food this year has been worse, but having it make the majority of the girls ill on every floor, is inexcusable. Perhaps this incident will incite food service to wash the dishes and cook the numerous varieties of horsemeat [illegible] bacteria (and worms) are killed.

The really sad thing about this whole incident is that this meal was quite superior to most!

find the answer not in resistance, but in reform of the university itself.

The lessons of last spring now are clear to both sides. Retaliatory force by the university only leads to more violent confrontation. On the other hand, student rebels who provoke violence are bound to cause a recation from the university more annoying than before. The solution seems to be in level-to-level communication and patient endurance on both sides.

Steps in this direction have been taken by many of the University's colleges and departments. An increasing number of faculties are seeking students' opinions and voices in policy-making.

Some, such as the history department, are allowing voting sutdents representatives into faculty meetings; others, such as the school of journalism, are creating liaison committees consisting of students and faculty members who make recommendations to the school's governing body.

Most recently, the University Senates' Committee on Students conducted open hearings on the subject of student representation in that body and participation in the campus goverance process.

Another recent show of hope in reaching level-to level communication was the annual Pinebrook Conference held the weekend of Oct. 18, in which students, faculty and administrators mediated. At Pinebrook, some 30 proposals were agreed upon. Some of them have been viewed as revolutionary by those who have heard them. However, those proposals have as yet to be turned into policy. Also, a list of the proposals so far has not been formally made public.

Should the Pinebrook experiment prove fruitless in the end, many moderate reformist will be left in the lurch and student frustration will rise. It is during such intervals that the so-called "New Left" finds its place. Otherwise peaceful students will find cause to slide over the Left, if only temporarily, and in order to bring about needed reform.

In the past 10 years the university system has seen tremendous growth. Unlike the small suburban college of the '40s and '50s, the university of the '60s has become a microcosm of urban life, as competitive and hectic as the city itself. Univeristy expansion is now at a point where it can no longer get along without cooperative planning. Practical programs brought to bear on sources of maladjustment are the order of the day.

'By George' is one-man show

Actor Adrian gives insight into George Bernard Shaw

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

The wry tongue and the piercing observations of the genius that was George Bernard Shaw were brought to life by Max Adrian Thursday night in the Regent Theater. Adrian performed, "By George," the one-man show that brought his acclaim on Broadway.

The show presented Shaw during three stages of his life, his young manhood, middle age and final years. Excerpts from Shaw's reviews, letters, diaries, and conversations were skillfully blended into an entertaining evening that also gave an insight into the complex character of Shaw.

The show depicted the beginning of Shaw's days as a working man when he was offered a position in a business which seemingly promised opportunity, a good salary and the proprietor's daughter. Shaw said, however, he liked neither the position nor the daughter and so he left.

Soon he began writing music reviews for a newspaper under the name of a friend of his. Within a year, said Shaw, that friend was the most unliked man in London. The reviews were also a strong factor behind the demise of that newspaper, said Shaw.

His early books, among them, "The Unsociable Socialist," fared little better.

"I know how to wait for success in literature but my only problem is I don't know how to live on air in the interim," said Shaw.

Shaw's career as a socialist began when he decided to rid himself of his fears of public speaking. He spoke to many civic groups and on street corners until he discovered the socialists. They offered him enough chances to practice and he espoused their cause for 12 years.

The play showed that even in Shaw's early manhood, he had a desire to burst the bubbles of pretense and convention. When he learned that evening dress was required of men at one of the London theaters, he decided he should hire an ugly servant, dress him in flannel nightclothes, put Worstershire sauce on his head, and then present him for admission into the theater as "a gentleman in evening dress."

Shaw's bold self-confidence was never so obvious as when he compared his influence on the theater to that of some of the great ancient Greek playwrights. When the American public liked one of his plays, he concluded, "The American public is made entirely of men of genius."

Shaw's observations as a drama critic were among the highlights of the evening. He described Ellen Terry, an actress he was fond of, as she played Juliet. He said that "with suberb laziness" she laid the fatal knife across her chest but made no attempt to seemingly stab herself "plainly indicating that if it wouldn't go in, it needn't."

The opinions of Shaw expressed in the show covered a wide range. He advised his wife to buy or borrow a baby rather than a poodle if she needed something to pet because by buying a poodle she would "condemn everyone to a lifetime of taking the brute out." When Shaw was asked if he had always been a vegetarian, he replied, "No, for my first 25 years I was a cannible." To Shaw, the face of one actress "looked as though it was made of sugar and someone licked it."

Max Adrian, who has appeared in the U.S. and all over Europe, literally ages before your eyes, making you believe that you are looking at George Bernard Shaw as he really was.

Max Adrian handled the demanding role of Shaw with suberb craftsmanship. He had the audience's attention rivoted on him every second he was on stage. As he addressed imaginary people, they seemed almost to be there. His timing was near-perfect, if not perfect, a critical factor in delivering Shaw's sarcastic comments.

The strongest evidence of Adrain's ability came at the end of the play as he skillfully made Shaw age before the audience's eyes.

His walk became slower and more hesitant, he seemed to need the support of the cane he used and his voice became higher and more strained until only the indomitable eyes remained. Finally the eyes closed, perhaps leaving the audience wondering if the sarcastic Shaw was as Shaw once described himself, "My greatest work of fiction."

Awakening people

Black Africa, young America get together

By RAMI KHOURI

Africa, South of the Sahara.

Culture, variety, modern cities, frightening jungles, emerging states, awakening people, great expectations, nations ripped by civil war, endless resources, energetic individuals, and the tragedy of racism.

America, vibrant youth.

Willing, educated, interested, looking for enthusiasm, begging for national direction, affluent, eager, wanting to travel beyond the shining shores, aware of injustice, inviting change, chasing adventure home.

And in 1957 the two were brought together into what is today Operation Crossroads Africa. The college students of America and Canada who travel every summer to work with the youth and leaders of African states are the essence and lifeblood of Operation Crossroads Africa.

The Rev. Dr. James H. Robinson, Black American Presbyterian Minister, conceived of this program during his first visit to Africa. 1958 saw his dream materialize into Crossroads Africa, when a group of 75 American students went to 5 New African countries.

Called by John Kennedy "the progenitor of the Peace Corps," Operation Crossroads Africa sends 250-300 young men and women to African nations every summer.

Working in groups of 10, with equal numbers of native African youth, the students engage in work-camp projects. Past students have built schools, roads bridges, houses, and in fact anything which was needed by the local communities.

The national Crossroads Africa has 85 cooperating institutions, of which Syracuse University is one. Coordinated from New York, these different "chapters" recruit students to participate in the summer programs. Syracuse, like the other 84 local organizations, has a quota of 4 students.

Gail Von Hahmann, a Syracuse co-ed in charge of our local Operations Crossroads Africa, stresses the fact that students applying are chosen by the office in New York, and not by the local personnel here. Acceptance into the program is solely on the basis of interest, and is in no way related to academic standing.

Since 1958, 14 Syracuse students have participated in Crossroads Africa, and four more will go this summer.

The annual Crossroads Africa Week will start this Monday, November 11, and continue through Saturday. An information table will be set up in Maxwell for all interested students. There one may obtain information and applications, and African students will be available for discussions.

Haskell Ward, national director of recruitment, will be featured speaker on Wednesday night at 8:00 p.m. in Newhouse Communications Center. The week will climax with a free Crossroads party in Shaw lounge, where Gail hopes students will come to hear and see the African entertainment planned.

Miss Von Hahmann is planning greater cooperation this year with the Pan African Students Organization and other such similar groups. They hope to bring more black-oriented programs to campus, and to finish a most culturally enriching year by assisting the World Affairs Council in the spring term.

Operation Crossroads Africa, born out of one man's desire to see the African continent helped into the new world, sustained by visions of colourful hands building a bridge. Black Africa and young America ... . Crossroads Africa.

Crouse College presents famed organist

On Sunday, the Crouse College Concerts will present one of Europe's most famous organists, Anton Heiler. A most versatile musician, choral director and composer, Heiler has appeared in most of the great European capitals, playing the great organs of the world's top music centers.

Heiler comes from Vienna, a city of great musical tradition, and his work is imbued with much of its musical flavor. However, after touring the western world and all of Eruope, he has absorbed the color and tradition of all music and is expert in the performance of the music of the entire world.

Heiler was appointed professor of organ at the Academy of Music in Vienna in 1945. He taught harpsichord, organ, and conducted a seminar on contemporary music. Later when organ students in great numbers flocked to the Academy to study with him, he limited his teaching to organ.

For his appearance here, Mr. Heiler has selected a program of the music of Bach. He will perform the Toccata and Fugue in F Major, the sonata No. 4 in F Minor, an excerpt from the great 18 Chorales, Nun komm' der Heiden Heiland, and the Prelude and Fugue in C Major.

After the intermission, Heiler will perform the autograph edition of "Von himmel hoch, da komm' ich her" and finally the Toccata and Fugue in F Major.

Everson offers flicks

Today at 1 p.m. Everson Museum will show a selection of experimental films in the Everson Auditorium. Total viewing time will be approximately 3½ hours.

This selection includes an hour long reel of early films of the 1920's by artists such as Marcel Duchamp, Fernand Leger, Laszlo Moholy-Nagy and Hans Richter. Experimenting with films as an art form, these artists created historic moments in the cinema which have influenced many commercial films far into the 1960's. More and more artists of the sixties are expressing themselves with the unlimited possibilities of this visual medium. Three reels of contemporary films will include "Homage to Jean Tinguely's Homage to New York," 1960; "God is Dog Spelled Backward," 1966 by Dan McLaughlin; "The Room," 1966, by Mordi Gerstein; "Award Presentation to Andy Warhol," 1964, by Jonas Mekas and "The Pop Show," 1966, by Fred Mogubgub.

the Veterans Administration Hospital. The $8.4 million dormitory center, which failed to meet the September completion date, probably will not be finished until June.

Although completed from the standpoint of being operational (students have occupied the dorms since September), the weather will postpone landscape completion.

Inside, however, progress has been made, and general reactions, according to Latorre, are favorable.

The entire complex includes a 23-story building for the elderly, a nine-story women's dorm, a 13-story men's dorm, a three-story dining hall, a 250-car garage and recreational terrace and fields. The Toomey-Abbott Towers for the elderly was built under the management of the Syracuse Housing Authority. This is the first time the University has built a complex in cooperation with the city of Syracuse.

Narrow but well-lighted corridors are a part of the new St. Mary's men's dormitory. (Photos by Haxo)

Other new construction designs in the complex makes St. Mary's an unique dorm. The men's dorm has three-men suites which are divided into sleeping rooms and big living rooms.

Dean Tatham speculated that the living rooms might make good drawing rooms for architects and other students who need the extra space. There is a possibility that the dorm may rent out drawing boards to students for use in living rooms. If there is another need more important than this one, however, the rooms might be converted respectively.

Due to the construction of St. Mary's, the suites can be converted to married student housing or single rooms can be converted to resident apartments. "This is not in the foreseeable future, however," said Dean Tatham.

Most students on campus refer to the complex as St. Mary's dorms, but technically the name is St. Mary's dormitory complex site. This name has been used because the area previously was the St. Mary's Cemetery.

St. Mary's dining, although the victim of worms earlier this semester, is a modern addition to a modern complex.

The new complex will help the University continue its "shake-down" system for cottages. Gradually, fewer cottages are being used as resident living centers as the University either removes them or converts them for academic purposes.

Some men's cottages will definitely close down by the end of first semester, said Tatham. The fate of cottages depends on their locations and conditions.

W&M heavy underdog to SU

By ED AGRANOWITZ

Syracuse returns to the friendly confines of legendary Archbold Stadium today to do battle with the Indians of William and Mary. The Indians sport a 3-4 record against light opposition and are four touchdown underdogs to the Orangemen.

The Indians have shown signs of life recently winning their last two games with VMI (20-10) and Villanova (33-12). Before that, however, they were thrashed by such powers as VPI (12-0) and Ohio U. (41-0).

These credentials, or lack of them, fail to impress Orange Coach Ben Schwartzwalder, however. "We do respect William and Mary," says Ben, "We don't take anyone lightly. They have improved vastly over the last three weeks."

Much of this improvement is a result of the fine play of sophomore quarterback Wes Meeteer. Meeteer has taken over for fellow soph Bubba Hooker, son of the William and Mary Athletic Director, and has made good on 45 of 88 passes for 538 yards and six interceptions.

Meeteer has a better than adequate receiver in split end Jim Cavanaugh. Last year as a soph Cavanaugh caught 48 passes and has 28 receptions so far this time around for 310 yards. Tight end Ted Zychowski is the number two Indian receiver with 16 grabs for 256 yards.

Senior halfback Terry Morton leads the Southern Conference in rushing with 468 yards in 128 carries for three touchdowns and 3.7 yard average. Rookie halfback Mark Pakenham aids the Indian ground attack with 374 yards in 76 carries for three touchdowns and a 4.9 mean.

Marv Levy, in his fifth year as head coach at William and Mary, has two Southern Conference Coach of the Year titles and a lifetime 20-18-2 mark to his credit.

"We're just a maturing team," says Levy, "After our opening win (14-0 over East Carolina) we had trouble for four games and couldn't score a touchdown (Indians scored three points in those four games)."

"Not being able to get that touchdown hurt us a lot psychologically," continues Levy, "but our offense came to life Saturday against Villanova."

Syracuse freshman coach Jim Shreve, speaking on William and Mary at the weekly football press luncheon Monday said, "They've improved quite a bit in the last two weeks. Their offense is young and eager, and they have a strong defense. They have good size in their backfield and have a strong running game. They beat Navy last year, and you never know."

No changes are expected in the Syracuse lineup as the Orange came away from last week's 47-0 debacle at Holy Cross unscarred. Center Gerry Vogt, injured at California saw action last week and should be ready to go at full speed today.

Paul Paolisso will again open at quarterback for the Orange after a brilliant passing exhibition against the Crusaders. Paolisso hit 12 of 18 for 122 yards and needs only to continue his current pace to break the Syracuse single season attempts (176) and completions (92) marks set last year by Rick Cassata. Paolisso now stands at 62 of 122 for 614 yards.

Joining Paolisso in the Orange backfield will be fullback Al Newton (362 yards in 77 carries), tailback John Godbolt (202 in 36) and wingback John Bulicz (158 in 31).

"This William and Mary team could beat themselves of three weeks ago by five touchdowns -- they've improved that much," says Schwartzwalder. "And our offense must cut down on their errors. Saturday we would make one good play and then follow it with a bad one. We must develop some consistency."

ED'S ITORIALS: Orange lead in all time William and Mary Series 6-0.....Indian defense has yielded only one TD pass.

Voice from the bleachers

The pool

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

The opening day Archbold crowd breathed a huge sigh of relief when the Orange tacked a final touchdown onto its total against Maryland. More than piling up an impressive score, Syracuse had beaten the odds.

Off-track gambling is illegal in 49 of the 50 states, but, if such authorities as the U.S. Attorney General and Life magazine are to be believed, the money still flows. Twice within the past 20 years major betting scandals, involving college athletes and the underworld, have blitzed the sports pages. Point shaving, as well as point scoring, became a good and easy way to work your way through school. Strict NCAA supervision now makes another repitition unlikely.

But if any bleacher fans want to take a chance on some easy money any Saturday, it is not too far to walk.

The big thing today is the football pool. If your roommate does not have a ticket, the guy down the hall certainly will. It's so easy, too. All the sports expert has to do is pick the winners and the point spreads in three games. One dollar will make you five.

There is no limit to the amount of money that can be put down on a ticket, and the payoffs increase with the number of games played. One of the better known concessionaires on campus remarked to some of his customers last week that he "just missed" a $3,000 payoff.

Fifteen games and point spreads are listed on each ticket. For this Saturday's action, local sportsmen can select from a menu ranging from Harvard over Princeton by two to Syracuse over William and Mary by 28. This means that Harvard must win by three points for the player to collect; unless, of course, he has taken the "Ties Win" option, which reduces the odds and the payoffs slightly.

Even the most pessimistic of bleacher fans must admit that the game looks very inviting — before playing, that is. But with a certain winner in your wallet, sure things turn into upsets, poor teams turn into giants and the field goal kicker misses that vital three pointer that would have beaten the spread. Then it is back to the drawing board to calculate next week's predictions, for like eating and sleeping, pool betting becomes compulsive.

There is even a pool in Syracuse for the non-betting religous fanatics. One of the downtown markets issues cards weekly, with no purchase necessary. The object here is to pick the most winners out of 15 games. If there is only one high man for the week, he collects a total prize of $1,000. Ties divide up the prize money.

The secret to this pool is to get as many tickets as possible. In that manner, anticipated close contests can be played both ways. Theoretically, every possible combination could be played by one person, if he could get enough tickets. The market people frown on this kind of ingenuity.

Just about everybody has played a pool of some kind. The weekly contest in the New York Daily News was always a favorite. The clever News always foiled its patrons, however, by including as many a five Ivy League games, knowing full well that upsets become more common as the quality of the football decreases.

Today there is a student in Boston who makes weekly phone calls to Syracuse to get the advice of a well known sportswriter, and a pre-law student in Kimmel who is positive he has a winning ticket this week. But a word to the wise--when you get up to your neck in the deep end of the pool, one bleacher fan knows just as much as another.

Beat Colgate, 18-6

Frosh take fourth in mud

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

The SU frosh continued undefeated yesterday with a sloshing 18-6 victory over the Colgate yearlings in the mud at Manley Field.

Coach Jim Shreve's Tangerines came back after a disasterous first period, in which they fumbled three times, to dominate play for the rest of the game. Colgate, forced to make up two touchdowns in the final quarter, could not generate any kind of attack against the Syracuse defense.

The Raiders led, 6-0, until the last play of the first half, when SU's Greg Allen electrified the crowd with an 82 yard touchdown sprint off a faked punt. The Tangerines added two more scores in the third period on short runs by fullback Marty Januszkiewicz.

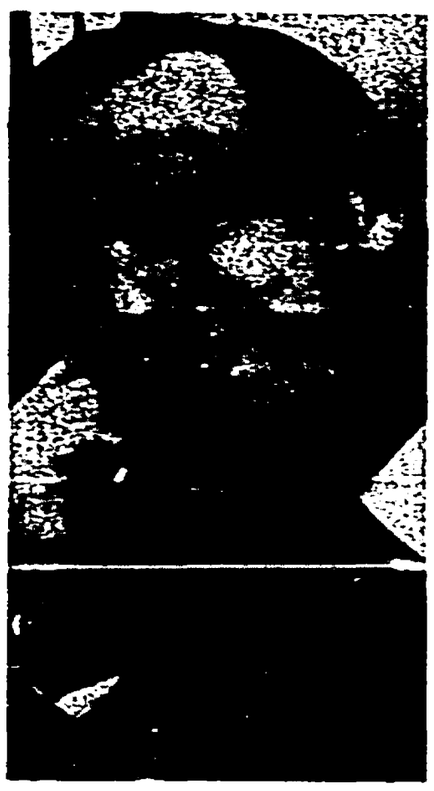
Colgate kept the game deep in the Syracuse end throughout the first quarter. The Tangerines were victimized by a roughing the kicker penalty and fumbles on their first two plays from scrimmage, the second of which gave the Raiders a first and goal on the three. Quarterback John Robertson scored from the one on the second play of the series. The conversion was foiled by a bad pass from center.

Another SU fumble gave Colgate the ball on the Tangerine 34 in the second period, but Syracuse held, and the Radiers punted into the end zone. SU was also unable to move, and Larry Hatalsky, playing with a borken nose, wint into punt formation standing on his own five.

With time running out, Shreve decided to try the trick play. Allen circled around Hatalsky from his right half position, took the handoff, and sped around left end with good blocking. The point after kick by George Bodine was slight wide.

In the second half, the Tangerine forward wall was opening mammoth holes for Januszkiewicz and tailback Dick Phillips. Syracuse maintained possession for most of the period, and scored twice on long marches.

Taking the second half kickoff, SU marched downfield on the ground, covering 62 yards in 14 plays. Januszkiewicz carried it in from the five, but again the kick was wide.
on a fullback plunge, was scored after a 46 yard march.



The game was played on a field that had turned to mud before the end of the first perid. The afternoon was so dark that the lights at Manley Field had to be turned on for the start of the second half.

N.Y. senator slates lecture here tonight

CHARLES E. GOODELL

Senator Charles E. Goodell, recently named by Governor Rockefeller to fill the senate seat of Robert F. Kennedy, will speak in Grant Auditorium at 9 p.m. tonight. His visit to SU is sponsored by the campus Young Republicans.

Goodell went to the Senate after nine years as a spokesman for liberal causes in the House of Representatives. The 42-year-old Jamestown Republican is a close associate of New York's Mayor John Lindsay.

Goodell's record in the House established him as a leader among supporters of civil rights legislation. He has worked for strong fair employment legislation, open housing and election reform.

During this year's presidential campaigning, Sen. Goodell was among the original group who met with Governor Rockefeller to urge that he announce his candidacy. He was a member of the National Draft Rockefeller Committee and was a delegate to the Republican Convention where he was Vice Chairman of the Platform Committee.

Sen. Goodell has repeatedly objected to U.S. involvement in ground war in Southeast Asia. He has warned that "This nation must recognize that all international problems are not susceptible to solution by the intrusion of American armed might."

Priest warns against a second Vietnam

By BOB ZUER
Associate Editor

Latin America may be the next Vietnam, according to a Roman Catholic priest accused of plotting an armed revolution against the government of Guatemala.

Father Blase Bonpane told an audience Saturday night in Hendricks Chapel that the same United States advisors who were in Vietnam six years ago are not in Latin America.

"It is one thing to create a disaster, and another thing to repeat that disaster," he warned.

Through the eyes of the United States, Latin America has been an area open for our direct exploitation, according to Father Bonpane. In 1823, America created the Monroe Codtrine and has since used that document more than 300 hundred times to unilaterally intervene in Latin American internal affairs, he added. Our relationship has not been a humanitarian one but one where we can get huge amounts of mineral resources and labor cheaply, he said.

To combat exploitation of the Indians and peasants of Guatemala by the government Father Bonpane and students from the National University began organizing the poor and educating them about their plight. When they first began their movement they were told "peasant organizers are shot in Guatemala."

"We wanted to be rabble rousers," Father Bonpane said. "Throughout history social change has never come from the destitute. The middle class has always been the father of revolution."

Father Bonpane said neither he nor the students felt they were interfering in affairs of the peasants. They maintained that no one in the world is happy who is sick or hungry.

The Guatemalan government saw differently, however; and last December Father Bonpane was accused of plotting an armed revolt and expelled from the country as "persona non grata."

"People in the United States like to picture the revolutionary as a screaming demagogue, but that's not true," he emphasized.

The peasants see the Guatemalan Army as their standing enemy and resent U.S. interference. He cited the presence of U.S. rifles, napalm, and helicopters as well as military advisers in the area as examples of our involvement.

The real problem in Latin America lies within a United States foreign policy based on the containment of communism, according to Father Bonpane. That policy maintains the United States knows what is best for Latin America when, in fact, we do not, he added.

Father Bonpane called geurilla warfare "ugly and difficult but sometimes quite necessary. Policies in the world depend on who's got the guns. So they (Latin American peasants) are getting the guns."

The Latin Americans have seen capitalism and are tired of it, he said. They have already made up their mind for socialism and our containment policy will prove futile unless we are willing to get ourselves involved in many more Vietnams, he emphasized.

He said capitalism in Latin America is like what Charles Dickens and Karl Marx wrote about in the 19th century. Everything there is going backwards too, he added. There is less food and land and more illiteracy than ever before, and U.S. foreign aid is not changing anything either, he emphasized.

"We have got to learn to deal with socialist countries man to man," he emphasized.

He said groups have been formed throughout North America to study how we can avoid another Vietnam in Latin America.

Court declares student innocent in drug case

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

For the first time in its history, the University Judicial Board (UJB) heard and decided a student's case involving use of drugs on campus.

In late October, a student was charged on three counts: (1) misuse of drugs, (2) use of dangerous drugs, (3) and falsification of information. Last Thursday, UJB found the student innocent on the first two counts, but guilty on the third.

"This was the most complex and difficult case the University Judicial Board has ever decided," said Paul Snyder, chief justice of UJB.

Judicial Board probation was the sentence given to the student, after the court had deliberated about six hours. In essence, the probation is a severe warning from the court, but no restrictions on the student are issued.

Snyder explained, "the student is reprimanded and informed that any further evidence of misconduct, poor judgment and unacceptable behavior will result in his being called before the board again, with the subsequent likelihood of more severe disciplinary action."

Melvin Mounts, assistant dean of men, is advisor to the University Judicial Board. He refused to comment directly on this specific case, but he made two general points, "We are pleased we have such a board in existence now, and at times we may not necessarily agree with their decisions, but this highlights the reason why we have such a board." He clarified his second point by saying that there would be no need for UJB if both the administration and the Board always agreed.

In this specific case, facts were difficult to prove. According to the court, the student said he stayed up all night to study for an exam the next day. He was studying in

Fraternity wants rules liberalized

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

Kappa Sigma fraternity, in a letter to Dean of Men David Tatham, yesterday asked that "liberal changes," in light of social privileges being made available for dormitory residents, "be extended to fraternities."

Among the requests listed in the letter, which was signed by Kappa Sig President Linwood Stockwell, Vice President Harvey Schwartz and Alumni Corp. President Robert J. Fornaro, are: visiting hours for women "of our own enforcement and choosing;" self-regulation of alcoholic beverages "within our own building;" a fraternity-regulated chaperone system; abolition of the restriction of social functions to a 20-mile radius of campus; and aboliton of the $5 registration fee for automobiles parked on private property.

"We are responsible young men," said the letter, "living in a building owned by the fraternity, subject to the regulation of our elected governing board under the guidance of our alumni.

"We have a well established system for governing ourselves, including procedures for enforcing our rules and punishing offenders, a system more involved and more effective than would be possible for a dormitory."

A relaxation of the rules, the letter suggested, would be a show of faith in student responsibility and would aid the maturing of students.

"To be dictated to in (these) regards indicates little respect for us as individuals and is, we feel, a deterrent, not an aid, to our maturing."

The letter called registration of individual social events unnecessary and labeled the chaperone and 20-mile radius rules "antiquated" and "intrusive."

The fraternity has invited Tatham to dinner next Monday to discuss the issues.

Photographer Harvey Schwartz coaxed this pose from a natural "ham" for the 1968 Orange Aid.

Coming down from the Ivory Tower?

Sometime within the next four years the debate will be renewed on the role of the university in American society. This view presumes an end to the war in Vietnam, an increase in the amount of public money for higher education—public and private—the continued shortage of funds for private colleges and universities, and continued student unrest.

It has been apparant for some time that the private universities have been growing more similar to the public universities. How does the government fulfill its responsibilities to each? What strings does the government attach to grants, scholarships, and fellowships without infringing upon academic freedom?

American universities, especially since the Land Grant Act of 1862, have rarely been ivory towers of teaching and research. Often what was taught and what was researched was related to the industrial and agricultural needs of the society surrounding the university. Mechanical skills and the latest techniques in farming were among the curriculums of the Land Grant colleges as well as Engligh, literature and history.

John W. Gardner, former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare and currently chairman of the Urban Coalition writes in "No Easy Victories:" "At the heart of any great American university there is the kind of insulation from the market place that permits reflective and creative thought. At the same time, in other parts of the university, there is extensive interaction with the rest of the society.

"I believe that those parts of the university which are already involved with the larger community are going to have to take that relationship more seriously than ever before."

We invite comment on the dual functions of intellectual separateness and community involvment assigned to today's American universities. Although student activists and some university presidents are urging greater action—the campus ferment was a major reason why Lyndon Johnson didn't run for re-election and why Senator McCarthy ran so well—the question is still open as to when the university is a gladiator in the public arena.

A matter of right

Editor's Note: The following letter was sent to the presidents of all Sororities by Faith Seidenberg, of the Syracuse Chapter of the National Organization of Women (NOW). As an attorney, who has been active in civil rights in the Syracuse area for several years.

Dear President:

I am writing as a member of N O W (National Organization for Women) to ask you not to patronize the Hotel Syracuse because they discriminate against women at their bar. In view of the fact that a woman can be served alone at a table or when escorted at the bar, you might ask whether this is not a trivial matter they are protesting.

I don't think so!

Women have traditionally been treated as little children by men, who feel they can decide what is best for "the weaker sex." The same kind of discrimination was practiced for years against Negroes under the guise that we Whites knew what was best for them. Now this is illegal. Unfortunately, womens' rights are at the same legal stage that Negroes' rights were back in the 1930's.

This is not a trivial matter.

You might never want to sit at a bar alone but you ought to have the same right as any man to decide your own fate.

This is your fight, too! It is in your interest to be treated as equal and not as inferior to men. Won't you join in the fight for full equality for women by calling or writing to Hotel Syracuse and protesting their discriminatory policies and, also, by refusing to patronize them eigher singly or as a group.

For further information, please write or phone Karen deCrow, address and telephone number as noted above or to myself.

Very truly yours,
Faith A. Seidenberg, Attorney

A modest proposal

Sans students

By Bob Tembeckjian

The vast and powerful resources of Syracuse University, after 98 years of intensive study and research, have discovered a method to operate this school without students. The announcement was proudly made in a statement to the students and faculty.

"We of the S.U. administration have long held that attendance at the university is a privilege and not a right. We feel that no one has the right to a higher education, unless, of course, he can pay for it.

"Reminded clearly of the economic side of things, a practice in which we administrators seldom indulge, we find it absolutely necessary to streamline the educational process at the university. Therefore, we have decided it would be most efficient to simply run this institution without students.

"Students make unreasonable demands upon this school. They expect to be educated. They expect to be treated as mature individuals. They expect to receive responsible service in food, health care and housing. How absurd!

"The advantages of such a proposal are obvious. Without students, professors could spend more time writing books and delivering speeches, thus adding to the fame and prestige of this university.

"Without students, we would not have the need to operate large dormitories, thus saving millions of dollars.

"Without students, there would be no need for such expensive endeavors as Food Service, thus saving us about a hundred dollars.

"Without students, there would be no fear of another Columbia.

"One should not interpret this policy as a complete rejection of students. We all recognize that this institution exists only to serve the students. It was not an easy decision to forfeit all tuition. It is only in the altruistic sense that we take this action. We sincerely believe it is in the best interest of this school to eliminate the unnecessary student element.

"For purposes of morale, however, we have decided to retain the football squad. We believe that they, more than any other random group of students, offer much to the success of the university — such as alumni contributions.

"One final comment. Since the university finds itself with greater unapplied resources and fewer commitments, we have decided that construction of a Student Union building will begin immediately following the withdrawal of the last student.

"It is with sadness and regret that we bid farewell to our beloved student body. It just won't be the same without you."

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

On Wednesday, Student Senate adopted a new preamble to the new Student Government constitution. A proposed amendment to that preamble was defeated. The amendment was essentially a "suicide clause." It said that Student Government would dissolve in the event that legislation passed by both the Student Senate and Committee on Student Life but vetoed by the Chancellor was returned to Senate, passed again, by both Senate and CSL, and vetoed a second time by the Chancellor. (The Chancellor was given the veto by the Board of Trustees, who govern the University.)

Many implications of this amendment were discussed, but the ultimate ramification of a suicide clause was overlooked.

Attendance at this university is a privilege,not a right. This is a private institution: the Trustees have final authority on any University policy. They can change existing rules and can make new ones. They do permit students to express opinion, but the Trustees are under no obligation to act as students demand.

Student Government is the duly elected body that seeks to represent the interests of undergraduates to the administration and faculty. S.G. does have authority to speak for the students, but it does not have any power to act for them. Students cannot suspend students. Nevertheless, S.G. is meaningful. It is an effective pressure group, for it creates channels of communication between the students, faculty and administration. Most students would agree that S.G. has helped students get more privileges in these last four years than in the twenty preceding years.

The suicide clasue assumes that eventually some irreconcilable issue will arise and neither the administration, faculty or students will be willing to compromise. In that case, the theory goes to get what it wants, S.G. would suicide itself, thus dissolving student volunteer service organizations, such as Traditions Commission and Student Court. These organizations would have to replaced by paid manpower, and many students doubt the University has the money to do this. Therefore, the administration would give the students what they want.

What some students may not realize is that we could be taxed to pay for freshman orientation and student judiciary boards. The Trustees could raise the General Student Fee to charge us for football and basketball tickets. Would we want to risk this? How much do the supporters of the defeated amendment really support it? Some students would run the financial risk, as well as the social and political risks involved in studentless government, because the trustees in greater student freedom. But the logical conclusion of all this is: each of us is here because we want to be here; we can leave any time we want. As long as we are here, we have to follow the rules, although we can work peacefully and responsibly to change what we don't like. Student Government is the best means we have, and it's working to serve the University. It's an open system: any student can join, suggest innovations and work constructively for change.

Maxwell lectern draws LBJ aide, Manhattan's borough president

Percy Sutton

Percy E. Sutton, Manhattan's borough president, will discuss decentralization of New York City's school system at Hendricks Chapel tonight.

Sutton will view school controversy

Percy E. Sutton, Manhattan borough president, will speak tonight at 8 p.m. in Hendricks Chapel. His talk is part of the Public Affairs and Citizenship program in the Maxwell School.

He will discuss decentralization of New York City schools.

Sutton was elected borough president in 1966; formerly he was a New York State Assemblyman. After graduating from Brooklyn Law School and Columbia University, Sutton was a participant in the Freedom Rides in the South, and also engaged in a wide variety of civic, religious and civil rights programs. He served as president of the New York Branch of the NAACP.

In 1966, he was selected permanent chairman of the New York State Democratic Convention.

Cater to ponder Nixon presidency

Douglass Cater, a former aide to President Johnson for health, education and welfare programs, will speak here tomorrow at 7:30 p.m. in Maxwell Auditorium.

Cater's topic is "Some Preliminary Second Thoughts on the Presidency." His visit is sponsored by the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs.

Cater left the Johnson Administration in October to become an adviser to Vice-President Hubert Humphrey on domestic matters during Humphrey's campaign for the Presidency.

Cater holds two degrees from Harvard University and was with The Reporter magazine, first as Washington editor from 1950 to 1963 and then as national affairs editor for a year.

He became a Johnson aide in 1964.

Think selfishly about your own career before you decide on one with Du Pont.

Be selfish. But be honest. You've put in a lot of tough years to get your degree. Your allegiance lies with a professional discipline.

Why, then, must you decide now to plight your trust to a company for life? Don't. Join a company first. If it doesn't advance you within that professional discipline, well, you're not married to it.

Many have found career enrichment at Du Pont. This comes from being handed a ball and being expected to run with it. From working with top people, from growing in a company where the opportunities are always wide open and the projects are often way out.

Many have found professional fulfillment and have built a very full, varied and happy life as "Du Ponters."

Others have found, after working at Du Pont, that their professional interest lay in teaching, in further study or in an industry that offered even wider scope in their particular discipline. All of these men left Du Pont far better qualified professionally than when they came.

So talk to the Du Pont recruiter. If he offers you something, think of it as a professional challenge, not a proposal of marriage.

Coed chosen 'Miss Kenya'

A former Syracuse University student, Josephine Moikobu, recently won the Miss Kenya Beauty Contest and will travel to London to represent her country in the Miss World Contest.

Miss Moikobu was a graduate student here last year and received her Masters Degree in Sociology. While at Syracuse she taught students destined for the Peace Corps and also taught Swahili courses.

Among her prizes for winning are the trip to London, a tour of Europe, luggage, jewelry, clothes and gift certificates from leading stores.

Miss Moikobu's home town is Mogirango, Kenya. She received her bachelor's degree in Alaska before coming to Syracuse. Quite happy with winning and not accustomed to such publicity, she commented, "I can't get used to reporters and other members of the press chasing after me constantly."

Students appointed to select SU's new Dean of Women

An eight-student committee open to both men and women and consisting of one member of each class, one transfer student, two graduate students, one of whom is in the student personnel program and Peg Johnston, chairman, will help in the choosing of a new dean of women.

The committee will aid in the selection of a dean by exploring the role of a dean of women, soliciting student opinion and offering student viewpoints on the criteria for choosing a dean. The committee may also be involved in interviewing candidates for the position.

Applications should include name, address, extension, major, class and the answers to these questions: (1) reasons for applying for the committee and (2) characteristics the applicant envisions in the ideal dean of women. The applications must be turned in by Friday to Peg Johnston at the reception desk in the Women's Building or at St. Mary's dorm.

'Too expensive'

No truth to phone tapping rumor

By JUDY CULLATHER

The rumor that University extension phones are being tapped is not true, Dean of Men David Tatham says.

The question of phone-tapping was brought to his attention at the IFC Minnowbrook conference last weekend. Dean Tatham then checked with the University switchboard, the New York Telephone Co., and University officials and says he is convinced that no such thing is going on.

Security Police explained the process of tapping to Dean Tatham as being so expensive and extensive that they would be bound to know about it.

The rumor, widespread but inconsistent, held in one form that narcotics agents were doing the tapping.

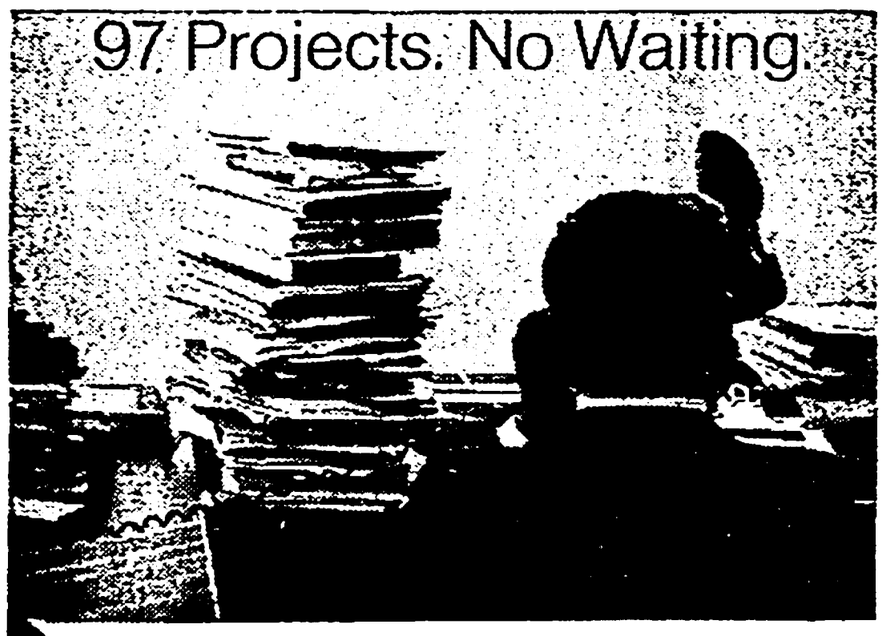
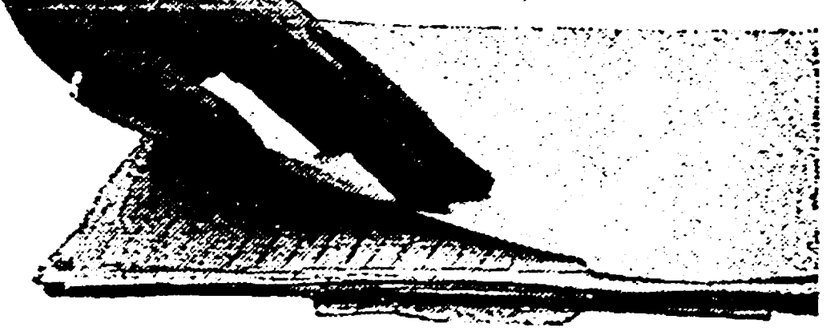
Why does a perfect size 7 look perfect only 21 days every month?



It has nothing to do with calories. It's a special female weight gain... caused by temporary water-weight build-up. Oh, you know... that uncomfortable full feeling that sneaks up on you the week before your menstrual period. This fluid retention not only plays havoc with your looks but how you feel as well. (It puts pressure on delicate nerves and tissues, which can lead to pre-menstrual cramps and headaches, leaves emotions on edge.)



That's why so many women take PAMPRIN®. It gently relieves water-weight gain to help prevent pre-menstrual puffiness, tension, and pressure-caused cramps.

PAMPRIN makes sure a perfect size 7 never looks less than perfect. Nor feels less than perfect, either.

Program for understanding

Discussions, party planned for Crossroads Week

By RAMI KHOURI

The living relationships between Operation Crossroads Africa and the emerging nations of Black Africa will be discussed tomorrow night by Haskell Ward, recruitment director of the Nation-wide and Canadian Crossroads program.

Operation Crossroads Africa is a non-profit organization which sends American and Canadian college students to work in Africa every summer. Western and African students live and work together on community projects in over 30 African states.

Joey Edwardh, Syracuse senior and former Crossroader, describes the program as "a self-help project in which American, Canadian and African students work together building schools, clincs, and just about anything else that a country requests." She helped build a recreation center in the Ivory Coast last summer.

Tomorrow's guest speaker, Haskell Ward, first went to Kenya with he Crossroads program in 1962. After graduating from Clark College in Atlanta, he joined the Peace Corps and found himself working and helping native populations in Nazareth, Ethiopia.

He studied for his Master's Degree in African studies at the University of California at Los Angeles. Since then, he has been very active within the Crossroads Operation.

In 1966 he served as coordinator of the African Youth Leadership Program. During his years of service, Ward has travelled to such countries as Tanzania, Uganda, the United Arab Republic, Nigeria, Ghana, Liberia, the Sudan, and Kenya.

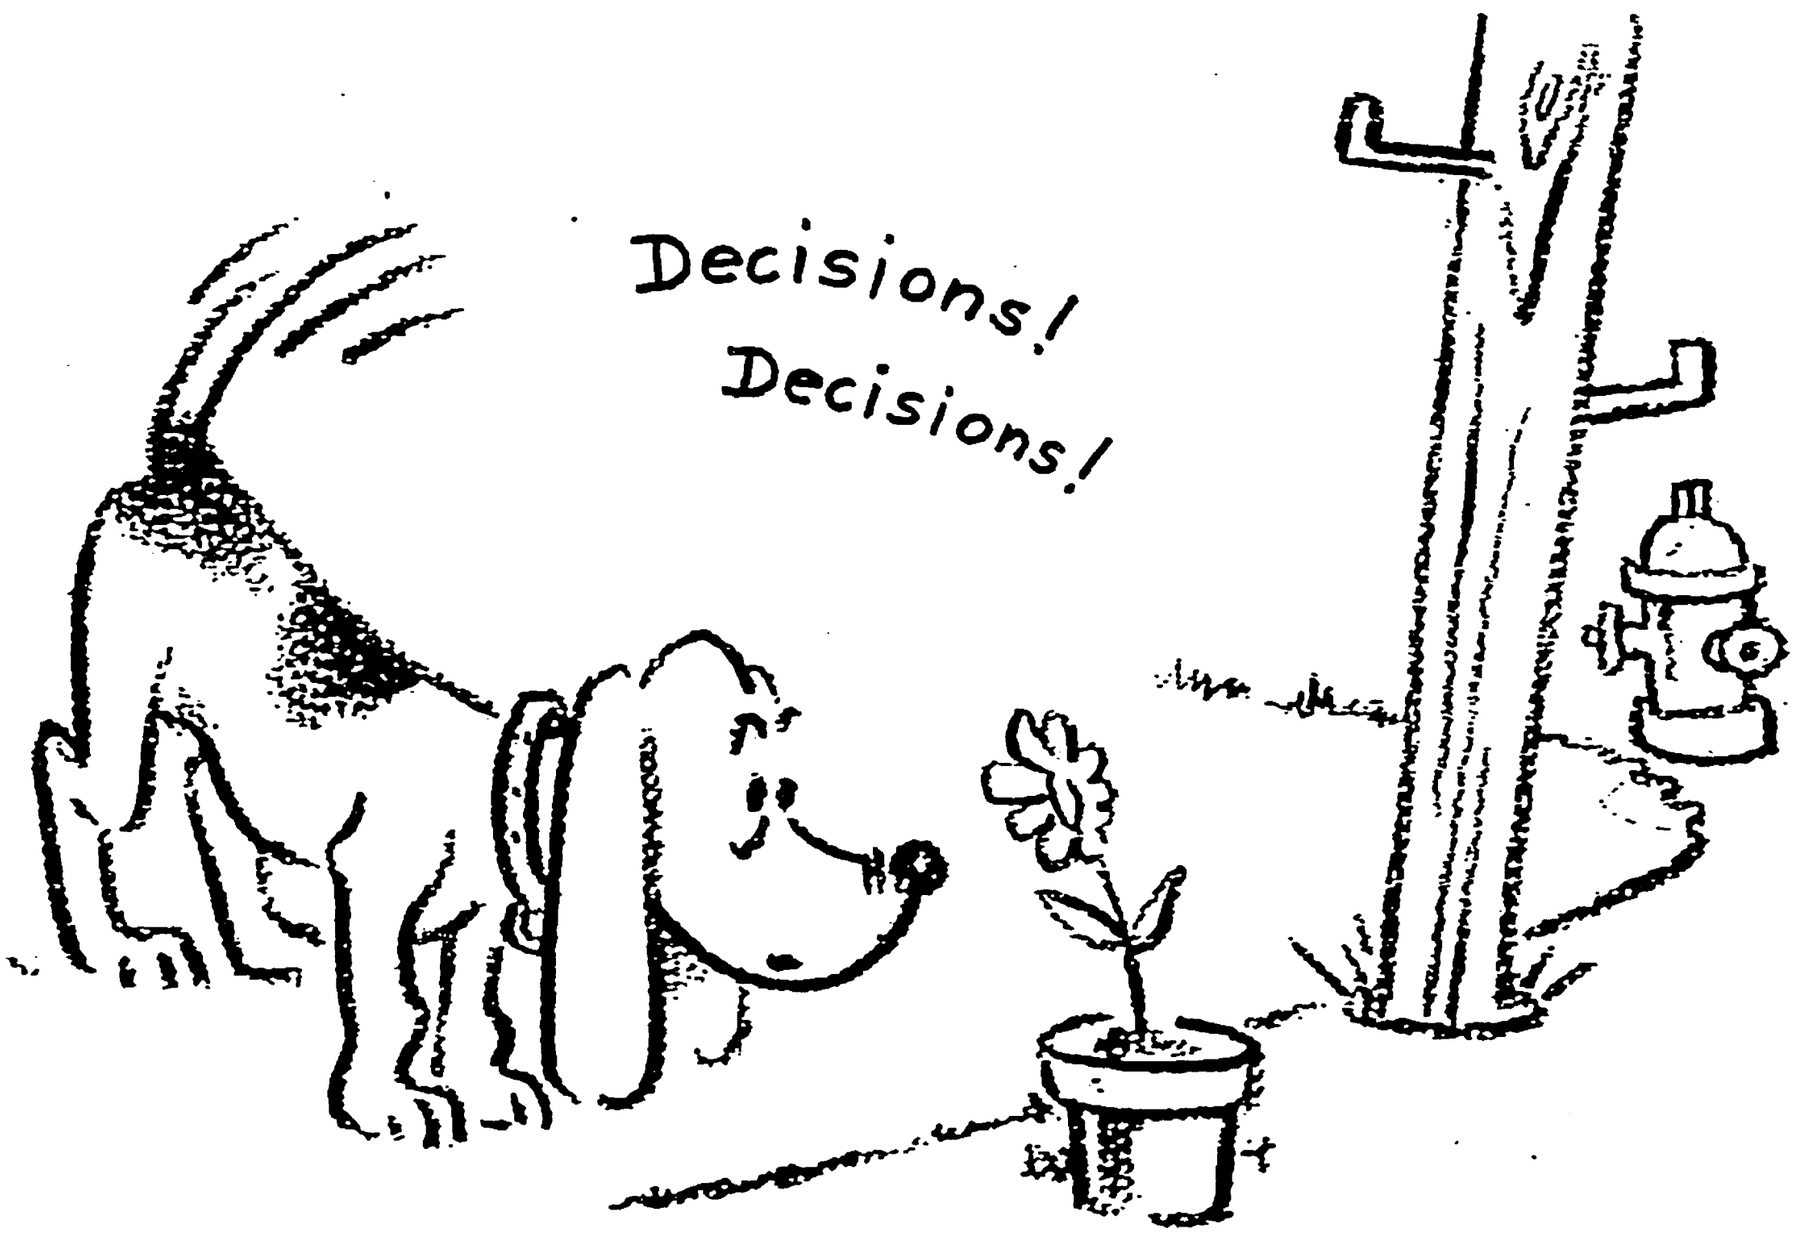
Typifying the interest participants show in Crossroads Africa, Ward actively recruits new students who would like to take part in this program. Crossroads Africa has long been concerned with social change and more precisely, the role that college students in promoting such positive change.

The work programs and camps have been found to be the best vehicle for making tangible and concrete contributions to Africa's developing needs. They serve very well to promote mutual understanding through the confrontations which inevitably result when white and black Americans work on common objects with black Africans.

Quite obviously, a summer with Crossroads Africa is not the most comfortable or leisurely vacation one may find–but it was never intended to be. Its African base was never intended to be an attraction for proselytizers of either religious causes or "the great American Way."

Haskell Ward is most interested in attracting students who show the greatest social concern. It is hoped and proven that the African experience will add an important dimension to the overall training and future career patterns of participating students.

Ward will speak tomorrow night at 8 p.m. at the East African Studies Center, 119 College Place. Crossroads Week continues through this Saturday night with the following program:



Monday through Friday - slides and information table in Maxwell

Tuesday, 8 p.m. - general discussion, slides from Kenya (E. African Studies Center)

Wednesday, 8 p.m. - Haskell Ward, recruitment director, speaks at the E. African Studies center

Thursday, 8 p.m. - general discussion, slides from the Ivory Coast

Saturday, 9 p.m. to 1 a.m. - African party, Ostrom lounge of Shaw Dorm.

Some decisions are relatively unimportant. Where you put your engineering talent to work is not.

As you contemplate one of the most important decisions of your life, we invite you to consider a career at Pratt & Whitney Aircraft. Here, you will find wide-open opportunities for professional growth with a company that enjoys an enviable record of stability in the dynamic atmosphere of aerospace technology.

We select our engineers and scientists carefully. Motivate them well. Give them the equipment and facilities only a leader can provide. Offer them company-paid, graduate-education opportunities. Encourage them to push into fields that have not been explored before. Keep them reaching for a little bit more responsibility than they can manage. Reward them well when they do manage it.

the week in HBC. Those who have lost receipts will need ID cards instead. Others may purchase the books for $2. Greeks buying Orange Aids in bulk may get them at French Cottage from 7 to 8 p.m. on Wednesday.

Editor Wiediger says she hopes to sell 5,000 "pig books" this year--over a thousand more than sold last year. Twenty-five hundred have already been paid for by freshmen and another 668 by Greek houses. Financial loss of profit on the book is absorbed by the Junior Class.

In an effort to eliminate the usual number of incorrect picture identifications in the Orange Aid, two staff members set through the picture lines at fall registration and wrote descriptions of frosh being photographed. These descritpions were then correlated with alphabetical and numerical listings of students and picture order.

While the system is not infallible, it has decreased the number of errors. According to Miss Wiediger, several mistakes have been reported, but they have been mix-ups with two frosh having the same name.

"The Orange Aid is valuable because it is the only complete record of the entering freshman class," she continued,. "We added the summaries of campus activities hoping to get them interested in something." Other innovations in the book include an advertising section, and running heads to break up solid photo pages.

Choosing the Orange Aid staff was left to the editors-in-chief. All juniors interested in working were used. Photography editor and portraitist of the cover celebrity was Harvey Schwartz. Schwartz visited a nearby farm to take his cover shots. Helping on candid photography was sophomore Clint Clemens. Frosh "mugs" were done by Rock Carbone.

In praising the Orange Aid '72 staff, Miss Wiediger called it "the most unapathetic staff you can find."

Overwhelming response

SUSKI membership growing

"It must be the thing to do" was the reponse of Leigh Kalna, President of SUSKI, after the Ski Show last Friday afternoon at the Men's gym. Although the weather was hardly conducive to thinking about snow and skiing, about 150 people turned out for a display of ski equipment and ski fashions.

Kalna went on to say, "We are overwhelmed by the membership of over 300. In a few weeks we should almost double last year's membership of 220. Our members are looking forward to the lesson package, the day trips and the trips to Vermont. In addition to the usual downhill skiing, classes will be conducted in cross country and racing. We are looking for good skiers who want to join our Keg Team."

Many beginning skiers liked the idea of SUSKI giving ski lessons at Labrador Mt. on a weekly basis. "Professional teaching corrects many bad habits," said Kalna. "Skiers who refuse to take lessons spends years developing the wrong method."

A discussion for beginning skiers will be held today at 4:00 PM in 304 HL. Dedi Lindley, an instructor from Labrador, will give a short presentation. The officers of SUSKI will then determine the best night to give the lessons. A $10 deposit will be collected. The total cost is $29.

A similiar meeting for advanced skiers will be held on Wednesday at 6:30 p.m. in 207 HL. Mark Hamlet, an assistant director in the Greek Peak Ski School, will speak.

Drug case . . .

some one else's room and an unidentified person entered the room and produced something, which the student thought was a stimulant.

The stranger left, and the student took the stimulant. The next day he began to hallucinate and lost control of himself. When he was taken to the infirmary he denied having taken drugs.

Because the student first denied having taken drugs, but later said he had, he was charged with falsification of information. Also, in the first version of his "story" he said other people were in the room with him. In his second version, he said he was alone. This is a contradiction, however, not a falsification.

This is the first drug case with which the UJB has dealt.

Fear of embarrassment is one reason why many students shy away from a UJB hearing.

Navy second season rates high at SU

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

When the American Broadcasting Company was being clobbered by its opponents in the TV ratings a few years ago, it changed tactics and came out with a "Second Season." The Middies of the United States Naval Academy, after losing five of their first six games, launched a similar program three weeks ago.

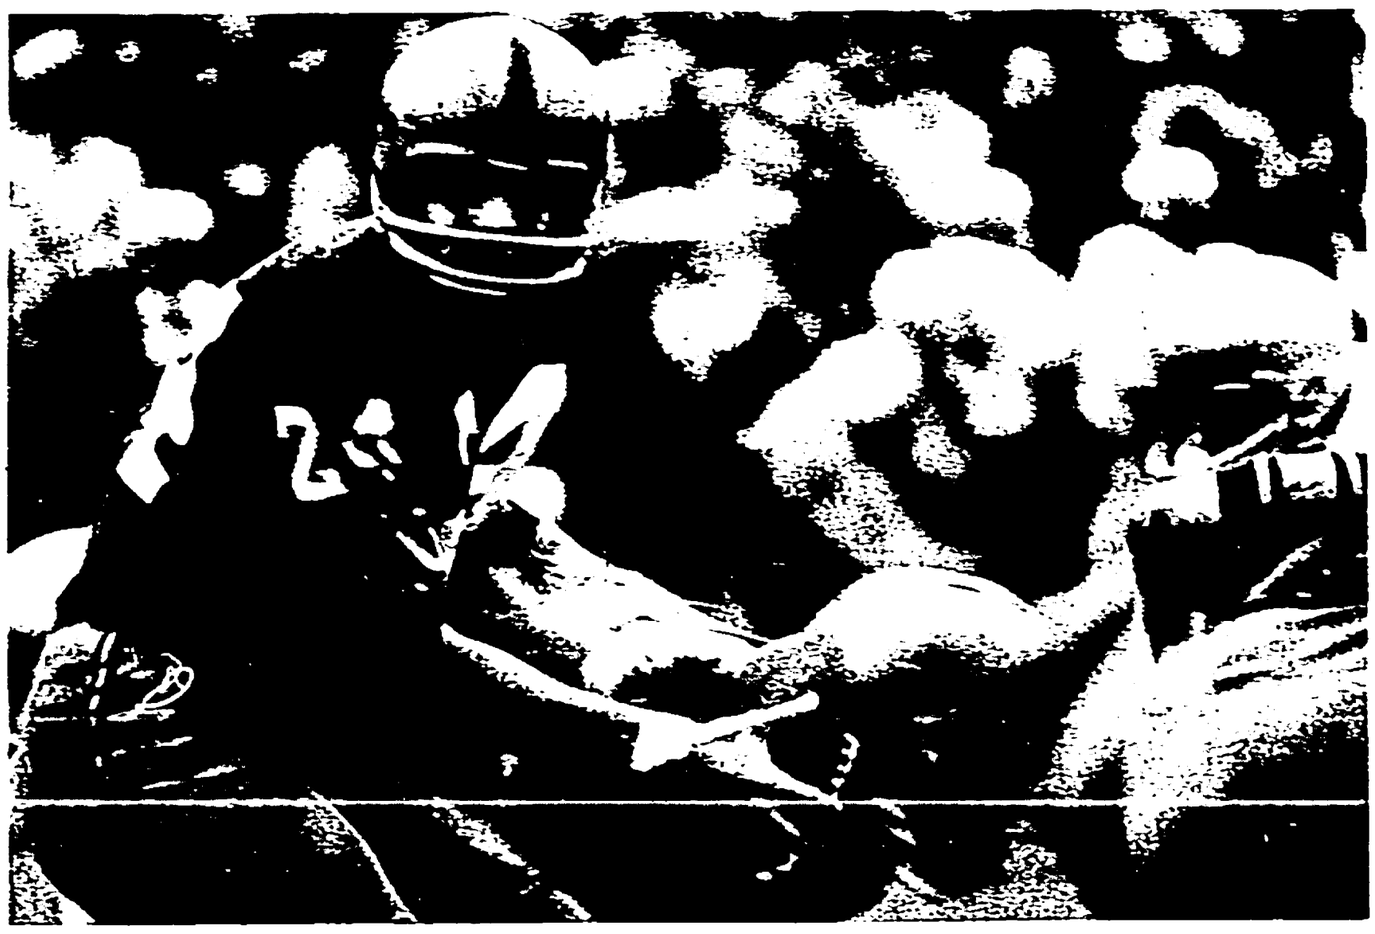
"Their 'new season' started after their dismal showing against Virginia," SU scout Joe Szombathy explained to the weekly press luncheon at the Hotel Syracuse yesterday. Since that game, a 24-0 humiliation, Navy has played "well" against Notre Dame and "excellently" in its 35-15 trouncing of Georgia Tech last Saturday. The Academy's Saturday engagement with the Orange in Archbold Stadium is its last tuneup before its big one with Army Nov. 30.

Szombathy painted a picture of an improved Navy squad, one that could be more dangerous than its 2-6 mark indicates. "They are using more sophomores later in the season," he said. "A lot of them are coming into their own."

The Navy signal caller is sophomore Mike McNallen, whose high school idol was Navy quarterback and Heisman Trophy winner Roger Staubach. So far, however, he has not played like his idol. "McNallen has improved lately," Szombathy pointed out. "He completed over 50 per cent of his passes in the last two games, with only one interception." On the year, however, he has thrown away 16 passes to the opposition.

Junior Dan Pike has established himself as the top Middies runner, after starting the year on the bench. "He's a tremendous tailback," said Szombathy. "I've seen him run over more people in three ballgames than our backs have run over all season." Pike is on the small side, at 5-9, 184 pounds.

Defense had been a problem for the Midshipmen, but they came up with a fine performance last week at Georgia Tech. The Yellow Jackets were shut out for three quarters, and ended the afternoon with minus yardage rushing. Middle guard Emerson Carr, listed at 238 but appearing much bigger, is the standout on the unit.



After the preliminary scouting reports were finished, SU coach Ben Schwartzwalder and Navy's Bill Elias took turns declaring how scared each was.

Elias, speaking on the telephone hookup, asked if the "Great White Father" was in attendance, and then said he would "test Ben's compassion this week. If Ben is compassionate, I might as well root for Syracuse."

Elias finished by saying, "Tell Ben not to worry. We're scared to death."

"Elias is a very shrewd man," the SU mentor retorted. Ben was not overly enthusiastic about the Orange chances on Saturday. "If we play like we did last Saturday, and they play like they did, we will not win the ballgame," he said.

The coach continued to be satisfied with his defense, but the offensive unit still has not stablized. "On offense, we seem to sputter and flutter," he explained. "We fumble, get intercepted or get penalized."

FADING BACK is SU quarterback Paul Paolisso, who threw his fourth touchdown pass of the year in the 31-0 win over William and Mary Saturday. On the debit side, however, were his eighth and ninth interceptions on the season. Orange passers have been intercepted 19 times in all this year. (Photo by Biggar)

The final alignment of the offensive backfield is still uncertain. "Godbolt (John) is our most effective tailback," he said. "At wingback, we're very satisfied with the work of (Lee) Castner. He could be as good or better than (John) Bulicz. Based on the blocking of (Al) Newton Saturday, we've got to rate (Mike) Chlebeck the better fullback. Both of our quarterbacks, of course, could use some improvement."

The team came out of the William and Mary win in good physical shape, but tackle John Cherondolo has turned up with a fever. "If we lose any interior linemen," Ben lamented, "we're right down the drain."

Ben then turned his attention to the defense. "The strength of this football team, if it has one, is the defensive line. Steve Zegalia, Lou Gubitosa, Jerry Beach, ARt Thoms, Ray White and Ron Womack, when he's in there, have been doing an excellent job. They rushed pretty well against William and Mary, but rushing the Navy quarterback won't be quite the same."

Schwartzwalder reflected on Navy's record, but refused to count them out. "It's not what Navy has been over the season, but what Navy will be on Saturday that's important," he said.

"I don't know if we'll be able to get up emotionally or not. If we don't, it will be a long afternoon. One thing, though: the Syracuse staff is not smug about this game."

Player of the week

Godbolt and Beach share W & M laurels

By IRA SILVERMAN

As the Syracuse Orangemen continued their late season revival with their first back to back shutouts since 1959, two players stood out in the 31-0 win Saturday over William and Mary at Archbold Stadium. Therefore, it will be necessary to bestow two Player of the Week awards this week.

Sophomore tailback John Godbolt finally began to run like everyone knew he could on Saturday, and senior middleguard Jerry Beach, who received the game ball from his teammates, anchored a defensive line that held the Indians to only 63 yards on the ground.

"In the beginning of the season I was skeptical of my running ability," said Godbolt, who gained 68 yards on 11 carries and scored three touchdowns. "I used to go just straight ahead," he contined, "but now I'm picking my holes.

This was the first time that Godbolt had ever scored three TD's in a game. Larry Csonka was the last Orangeman to accomplish this feat, doing it last year against California.

Godbolt's first score came with only 3:57 gone in the first quarter, as he went around end for 8 yards. In all, he carried four times on that drive for 37 yards, including a 23 yard jaunt on the second play from scrimmage.

Godbolt scored SU's last two touchdowns of the game with runs of two yards, in the third quarter, and 8 yards, in the final stanza. He now ranks second on the squad in scoring, with five TD's for 30 points. George Jackowenko leads with 38.

"Lightning-Bolt" did not know until Friday that he would start. "The competition was tough all week long," explained Godbolt.

"I knew that this game would determine the first string tailback," he continued. "It was in my mind all the time."

All three tailbacks, Godbolt, Ron Trask, and Billy Knox, have been seeing almost equal amounts of playing time the last few weeks. But sharing the duties did not bother Godbolt. "I knew that if I got back in there I'd do my best."

Many people were comparing Godbolt's speed to Floyd Little's at the beginning of the season, but they criticized his running style. But that seems to have come along, too.

"At the beginning of the season all I would do would be hit the line of scrimmage," said Godbolt. "But now I look for the first opening. The first touchdown against William and Mary was through the wrong hole–I went outside the end instead of inside."

Jerry Beach also had to change for the William and Mary game. After defensive tackle Art Thoms was ejected from the game Beach was forced to move over to Thom's position, while sophomore Ron Womack moved to middle-guard.

"I had had only small game experience at tackle," explained Beach. "But I had some work there at practice. Thoms, Womack, Ray White and I all change positions in practice. Also I played tackle as a sophomore."

Beach was officially given credit for 8 tackles, 6 unassisted, before he was given a rest early in the fourth quarter. But he was involved in countless others, thus prompting his teammates to award him the game-ball.

"This was my best game ever," commented Beach. "I had the most tackles I ever made. The defense was really psyched up to shut out two teams in a row."

Beach did encounter different problems at tackle on Saturday, "The alignment on the line is different at tackle," he explained. "At tackle I was one-on-one. I'm always double teamed at middle-guard. I was only doubled teamed at tackle on outside plays."

According to Jerry, "William and Mary ran pretty much what we had planned on. It did take a while for all of us to learn their blocking styles, though."

Womack also seemed to improve as the game progressed. "Ron had a shaky beginning," said Beach. "But once he learned their blocking styles he did well."

Beach had only one complaint after Saturday's game. "Please spell my name correctly," he asked. "It's spelled with a J, not a G." It is unfortunate that such a valuable senior's name has not been spelled correctly for the last four years. It took an outstanding performance on Saturday to rectify the mistake.

Bartlett denies that SU is trying to stop Utica College's state plans

Snow frustrates SU plans; more expected

A pre-winter snow storm yesterday laced the Syracuse area with one of its worst autumn barrages and drove the city's image still deeper into infamy.

The blizzard was reported to have hit near the New York City area before swirling northward, at times leaving a foot of snow in its path.

By late yesterday evening, the Hancock Weather Bureau had recorded eight inches on the ground in Onondaga County and reported that between three and six inches more were expected last night.

And, according to reports, chances that snow would continue today were put at 80 per cent. The wind, too, is expected to remain with us, drifting the snow and icing the already cold temperatures.

However, according to Dean of Men David Tatham, who said he received a rash of phone calls late yesterday afternoon, Syracuse University policy is to keep classes open unless streets are impassable and the faculty is unable to arrive.

As of 9 p.m. last night, this seemed unlikely. Police reports said most city streets had been cleared after mid-morning traffic snarls yesterday, and state police added that only Route 81 south of Syracuse remained closed. Warnings, however, were out to avoid driving if possible.

Syracuse weather causes major frustration for University members at Hancock field, where all airlines cancelled their flights. Consequently, Manhattan Borough President Percy Sutton was forced to postponed his appearance here last night. He was to speak on school decentralization and the present New York city school crisis. He has been rescheduled for before the end of November.

U.S. Senator Charles Goodell (N.Y.), whom the SU Young Republicans had scheduled to bring to Syracuse last night, also was unable to leave New York City and had to call off his speech on the hill and another downtown.

The cancellation followed news that the courts validated his seat in the Senate until 1970. Gov. Rockefeller appointed Goodell to the seat vacated by the death of Robert F. Kennedy.

In addition, cartoonist Al Capp, creator of L'il Abner, postponed a press conference at the Syracuse Press Club because of the weather.

The last time six inches or more of snow fell before the 15th of November was in 1953. Previous to that, in 1933 and 1906.

Syracuse weather is well known, and most expect the worst each fall and winter. But this escapade, catching numerous students with slippery roads and no snow tires, suggests that the city is not yet drained of tricks.

Depression to Ft. Lauderdale

The generation gap

It is sometimes difficult to explain the great chasm called the generation gap between the young and the old. This generation grew up in the public schools like any other. It discovered sex, the Establishment and the shortcomings of its parents like other generations did.

Yet it is different. It is more aware, more questioning and more critical. We have the older generation to thank in part for these characteristics.

Because of the economic success of the older generation nearly half the high school graduates today go to college. Prosperity hasn't produced any more leisure for the younger generation in which it could pause and reflect; rather it has given a greater variety of things to do and extended our horizons immeasurably. Most of our parents grew up in one town, with occasional exciting forays into the unknown of distant cities. We think nothing of going to Ft. Lauderdale for a three day spring vacation or the home of a friend at a distant college for a weekend.

In addition to geographical mobility we have the vastly productive instruments of mass communication at our service. We grew up with the television set although it is debatable whether that is any advantage. Paperback books in nearly any area of knowledge have always been available to us rather than just novels of the courtroom or flaming love affairs.

Because we have gone to the universities and colleges established and expanded by the prosperity of several generations we are better able to examine the values and motives that produced that prosperity and the resulting society.

Like every other generation we have been taught the promise of America in our elementary and high school text books. Unlike other generations we have had account after account heaped upon our consciousness of the failure of that promise.

Vietnam and assassinations at home have spurred introspection into what we really believe and what we practice. Much of the criticism has been unduly hysterical and harsh.

We tend to bemoan the mess the world is in and say a policy of our elders is supported with the blood of the younger generation. But our parents also knew the burden of war and, although World War II was fought for better reasons, the basic inhumanity and unfairness of war reached many more families and devoured many more lives.

Likewise we reject the 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. routine of a job with the big corporation. Fewer and fewer of our college graduates enter business. But at the same time we haven't experienced the travail of a great depression.

We should be critical and we should seek a more just society where each individual is granted the freedom and opportunity to express and assert himself. We should also seek to restore a sense of community to our social units whether it is a university or a city neighborhood.

At the same time we must remember if our ideas come from philosophy class and our demands for action from Public Affairs, the money that put us there comes from our kinsmen over 30.

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

In response to Mr.. Miller's letter about cheating:

Like Mr. Miller, I, too, am a student in Dr. Gibbs' Religion 215 course. I am also concerned about the disruption and cheating of those few students who occupy the "block that composes the last few rows of Maxwell 101." Unlike Mr. Miller, I am Greek.

Yes, Mr. Miller, ALL Greeks cheat! Of course, one cannot even be a Greek if he doesn't cheat! Cheating is the one quality that the Greek system is based upon, right?

On the other hand, non-Greeks never cheat, cut classes, or are dishonest in any way! It is well known that all independents have irreproachable moral standards. Independents are all without fault, right?

Is this what Mr. Miller believes? One incident that involved cheating among several Greeks condemns the entire system in Mr. Miller's rather one-sided mind. After all, one has to be Greek to cheat!

I would ask Mr. Miller some questions:

Do you always condemn a large group for the actions of one or two members?

You seem to object to their sitting together in class. Are you so anti-social that you never sit with close friends in your classes?

You say the system produces this "type of individual." Do you think all independents would appreciate it if most people considered your own bigotry representative of their beliefs?

Can you really say that every Greek is like these few?

Your reasoning is faulty, Mr. Miller. Come tell me, a Greek, that I enjoy disrupting classes. Come tell me, Mr. Miller, that I am like all other Greeks. Tell me, Mr. Miller, that I cheat.

Hugh Brown
Alpha Tau Omega

To the Editor:

Wednesday morning I had the unnerving experience of attempting to use the Ladie's Room facilities in the Hall of Languages. Unfortunately, the floor was flooded, several of the toilets were not usable, and the general atmosphere was unbearable.

Steeling myself for any unpleasant encounters with members of the faculty or administration, I decided to enter the sacred area designated for their use. What a difference! The place was spotless and all facilities were in perfect working order.

The Supreme Court decision of 1954, Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, reversed the 1895 decision of "separate but equal." It seems that Syracuse University is way behind the times. Are the student facilities considered by the administration to be equal? Moreover, in this day and age, should they be separate?

Mr. grad student

Invisible man

By Jacques Lebel

He is 20 to 40 years old, relatively healthy and on the average can drink a little more and a little better than the student norm. If male he is sexually quite active but usually on a one-affair-at-a-time basis; if female, equally active and usually agreeable to an "intelligent, no strings attached" relationship. Financially, whether because of rich parents, financial aid relating to high academic credentials or, quite often, just expert conniving, pyramided loans and do-nothing assistantships he is well above starvation.

He regularly gets up at from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m., breakfasts on beer and left over party snacks and attends his afternoon class quite hung over. After several cups of coffee and a Danish he spends a couple of hours of research in one of the obscure libraries (the Main Library is almost useless to him) and then heads to the gym for some handball, squash, basketball or whatever and sweats off from 3 to 5 lbs. After dinner at Danzer's he returns to his apartment, opens another can of beer, puts some esoteric R & B on the stereo and begins to phone numbers from the list scratched on the wall. By 9 p.m. there are from one to five couples, quite stoned, trying to decide how to divide up three rooms for the privacy of all.

Yet, he survives. Socially he doesn't get married very often but when he does it is to the girl back home when she graduates. Academically he rarely sees a "hook" and "aces" are not uncommon. More often than not he has, within the past 5 years, earned a varsity sports letter, played a musical instrument, been actively involved in some form of the arts, given time, energy and a lot of serious thought to some social issue or movement, and been referred to as "one of the more intelligent young people I've known" by someone who has known a lot of intelligent young people.

And what isn't he? He isn't weak, scrawny, awkward or unathletic. He isn't afraid of the opposite sex nor is he inexperienced with them. He isn't unaware of current affairs and in fact is well versed in topics ranging from Fran Tarkington's arm to the Donna Michelle's leg; from the principles of jet propulsion to the Indy Jet Car controversy. He isn't overly biased toward his specialty, doesn't feel he has to talk about it all the time (although he often uses its vantage point when discussing a gamut of other topics) and rarely considers his text as a satisfactory bed time partner.

If he wears thick glasses it is because of an inherited vision weakness not because he spent his childhood reading instead of getting into trouble. If he wears heavy tweed suits, wide ties and garish tie clips it is because he inherited them from his father and would rather spend his money on the latest Supremes album than on clothes. And if he is rarely seen on campus or at campus affairs it isn't because he is hiding away in some one room attic apartment too busy reading abstracts from the Chemical Quarterly to consider anything else. It is rather that he doesn't feel comfortable or even wanted on campus...and he's got something better going for him back at the apartment anyway.

You know who I am talking about: Mr. Grad Student; the invisible man. But just as he is no longer the milk toast book worm stereotype of a generation ago so shall he no longer remain invisible. This column is dedicated to him and to the ultimate elevation to his rightful role as campus leader, planner and decision maker. His interests, gripes, ideas and general slant on things will be the basis for Grad Bag columns throughout the year. His sheer numbers make him important but his education, experience and matruity make him invaluable to the campus community. He is a resource which, having waited so long to be tapped, has decided to wait no longer. Instead he has taken the initiative and has begun injecting himself into the mainstream of university life.

$3 million to go State?

Bartlett answers Mayor's charges

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

SU Vice President Kenneth G. Bartlett yesterday denied that Chancellor William P. Tolley is "trying to kill the entire effort of Utica College to 'Go State'." Utica Mayor Dominick N. Assaro made the charge yesterday in a prepared statement.

"There (has been) no effort made to discourage the (Utica) community or the college from exploring...possibilities of a merger with the State University," Bartlett said after he, Chancellor Tolley, SU Comptroller Victor Colway and Utica College President J. Kenneth Donahue met with representatives of the Utica College Foundation and others from Utica College.

Utica College, a fully accredited four-year liberal arts college, was founded by SU in 1946. Last January, college representatives met with State University Chancellor Samuel Gould to explore the possibility of joining the State system.

In February, the SU Board of Trustees said the decision to "Go State" was one that "most appropriately should be made by local citizens."

Mayor Assaro said in his statement that "this was a wise and sensible approach, and a normal approach," but he claimed that Chancellor Tolley now is demanding $3 million before letting Utica College go.

"He is trying to kill the entire effort of Utica College to 'Go State,'" Assaro said. "I see no other way to interpret the situation when Chancellor Tolley waited until the last minute and then demanded $3 million from the State University before he would permit Utica College" to enter the state system.

"As mayor of the city, I cannot sit back and let one man from Syracuse try to dictate the future of Utica," he said.

The DO is experimenting with front page layouts for papers that are greater than eight pages. We would appreciate any comments or criticisms on today's front page, which is adopted from Long Island's "Newsday." Lack of space would restrict us from using this type layout in an eight-page paper.

STEVE GILLETTE

In a meeting last month with Gould, Tolley said that "any transfer of assets (of the college) would be by sale, rather than gift," but no figure apparently was mentioned.

But an article in last Friday's Utica Observer-Dispatch, said Tolley had asked that SU be paid for its assets at Utica College.

"Reports of the demand," said the paper, "believed to be for up to $2 million to go to SU and up to $1 million to go to Utica College's Foundation Board, has touched off a heated debate among faculty and staff members at Utica College."

According to a Mayor Assaro aide, this article and a similar one earlier this month quoting a public statement by Gould, are Mayor Assaro's sources in asserting that Tolley is demanding $3 million. Neither Gould nor Tolley were immediately available for comment.

However, according to Assaro, "I will do whatever is possible to support the decision... to become part of the State University 'without financial consideration'."

He said this was the agreement made between the Utica College Foundation and the Utica College faculty on Aug. 15.

The State University board of trustees apparently also opposes any payments for Utica College, and if Utica and SU are unable to resolve their differences, the state system may instead establish a separate upper-division college in the Utica area.

"We've gone through months and months of talks and delayed our own plans," Gould said last week. "I don't think we can wait much longer."

He also said then that neither Tolley nor SU has made any formal request to the state university for any payments, but he acknowledged that Tolley "indicated there should be some compensation."

Assaro said in his statement that he has sent a telegram to Gould, declaring that "we are supporting the 'Go State' effort and will do everything possible to achieve it by January."

According to Bartlett, the State University has indicated to Tolley that it would like a recommendation from the Utica College Foundation as to merger possibilities by Jan. 15.

Referring to yesterday's meeting of officials, Bartlett said, "We came away from the meeting with the feeling that much progress has been made, and it is our understanding that representatives of the Utica College Foundation will talk with representatives of the State University in the near future.

"We regret the reported statement of (Mayor Assaro) because no such effort has been or is being made to discourage an appropriate affiliation (with the State University) should the community want it."

Syracuse University is one of 78 privately-supported colleges and universities to receive unrestricted direct grants from the Eastman Kodak Company. Syracuse received $13,206.

Grants are based on the number of graduates from the institutions who have joined Kodak within five years after graduation and are now completing five years of company employment

New members sought for Goon Squad

Traditions Commission will soon be selecting new members from this year's Goon Squad. All Goon Squaders with a 2.0 grade point average or above are eligible and are urged to apply.

Selection procedure involves a written application and an interview. Traditions Commission is looking for hard-working, enthusiastic people who have good criticisms and suggestions for new student Orientation. Greek affiliation is not considered.

Applications should include answers to the following:

1. Why are you applying for Traditions Commission?
2. What do you think the relationship between Traditions Commission and Goon Squad should be?
3. Give an evaluation and criticism of Orientation Week. Be specific.
4. What else could Goon Squad do besides Orientation Week?

Applications are due Friday, November 22, by 5 p.m. at the main desk of the Women's Building. (The due date printed on the personal invitations to each Goon was in error). The front page of the application must include the following information: name, campus address and extension, home address, accumulative and last semester's average, Goon committee assignment, and campus activities. There should be no mention of Greek affiliation.

Applications should be typed. There is no page limit. Goons may sign up for an interview date when they submit applications. Interviews will be held Monday, Dec. 9 through Friday, Dec. 13.

Car rally for next month

The Universitas Touring and Rally Association (UTARA), which conducted its second 1968 rally last weekend, has scheduled its next competition for Dec. 15.

During last Sunday's run, 39 cars left Northern Lights Shopping Center and 37 finished the route. The "Turkey Time Rallye" presented a few tricky clues to rallyists, but most competitors managed to outwit the rallymaster again.

First place was captured by Terry Norris and Alex Adams in a Camaro. They were competing in class two, for those with previous rally experience. Second place overall and class one champions were Mike Schlein and Sue Friedman in their MG-A. Class one, the most populat category, is for newcomers to the sport. Class one competitors may only use wristwatches, while class two navigators utilize maps, charts and stopwatches to traverse the 78-mile course.

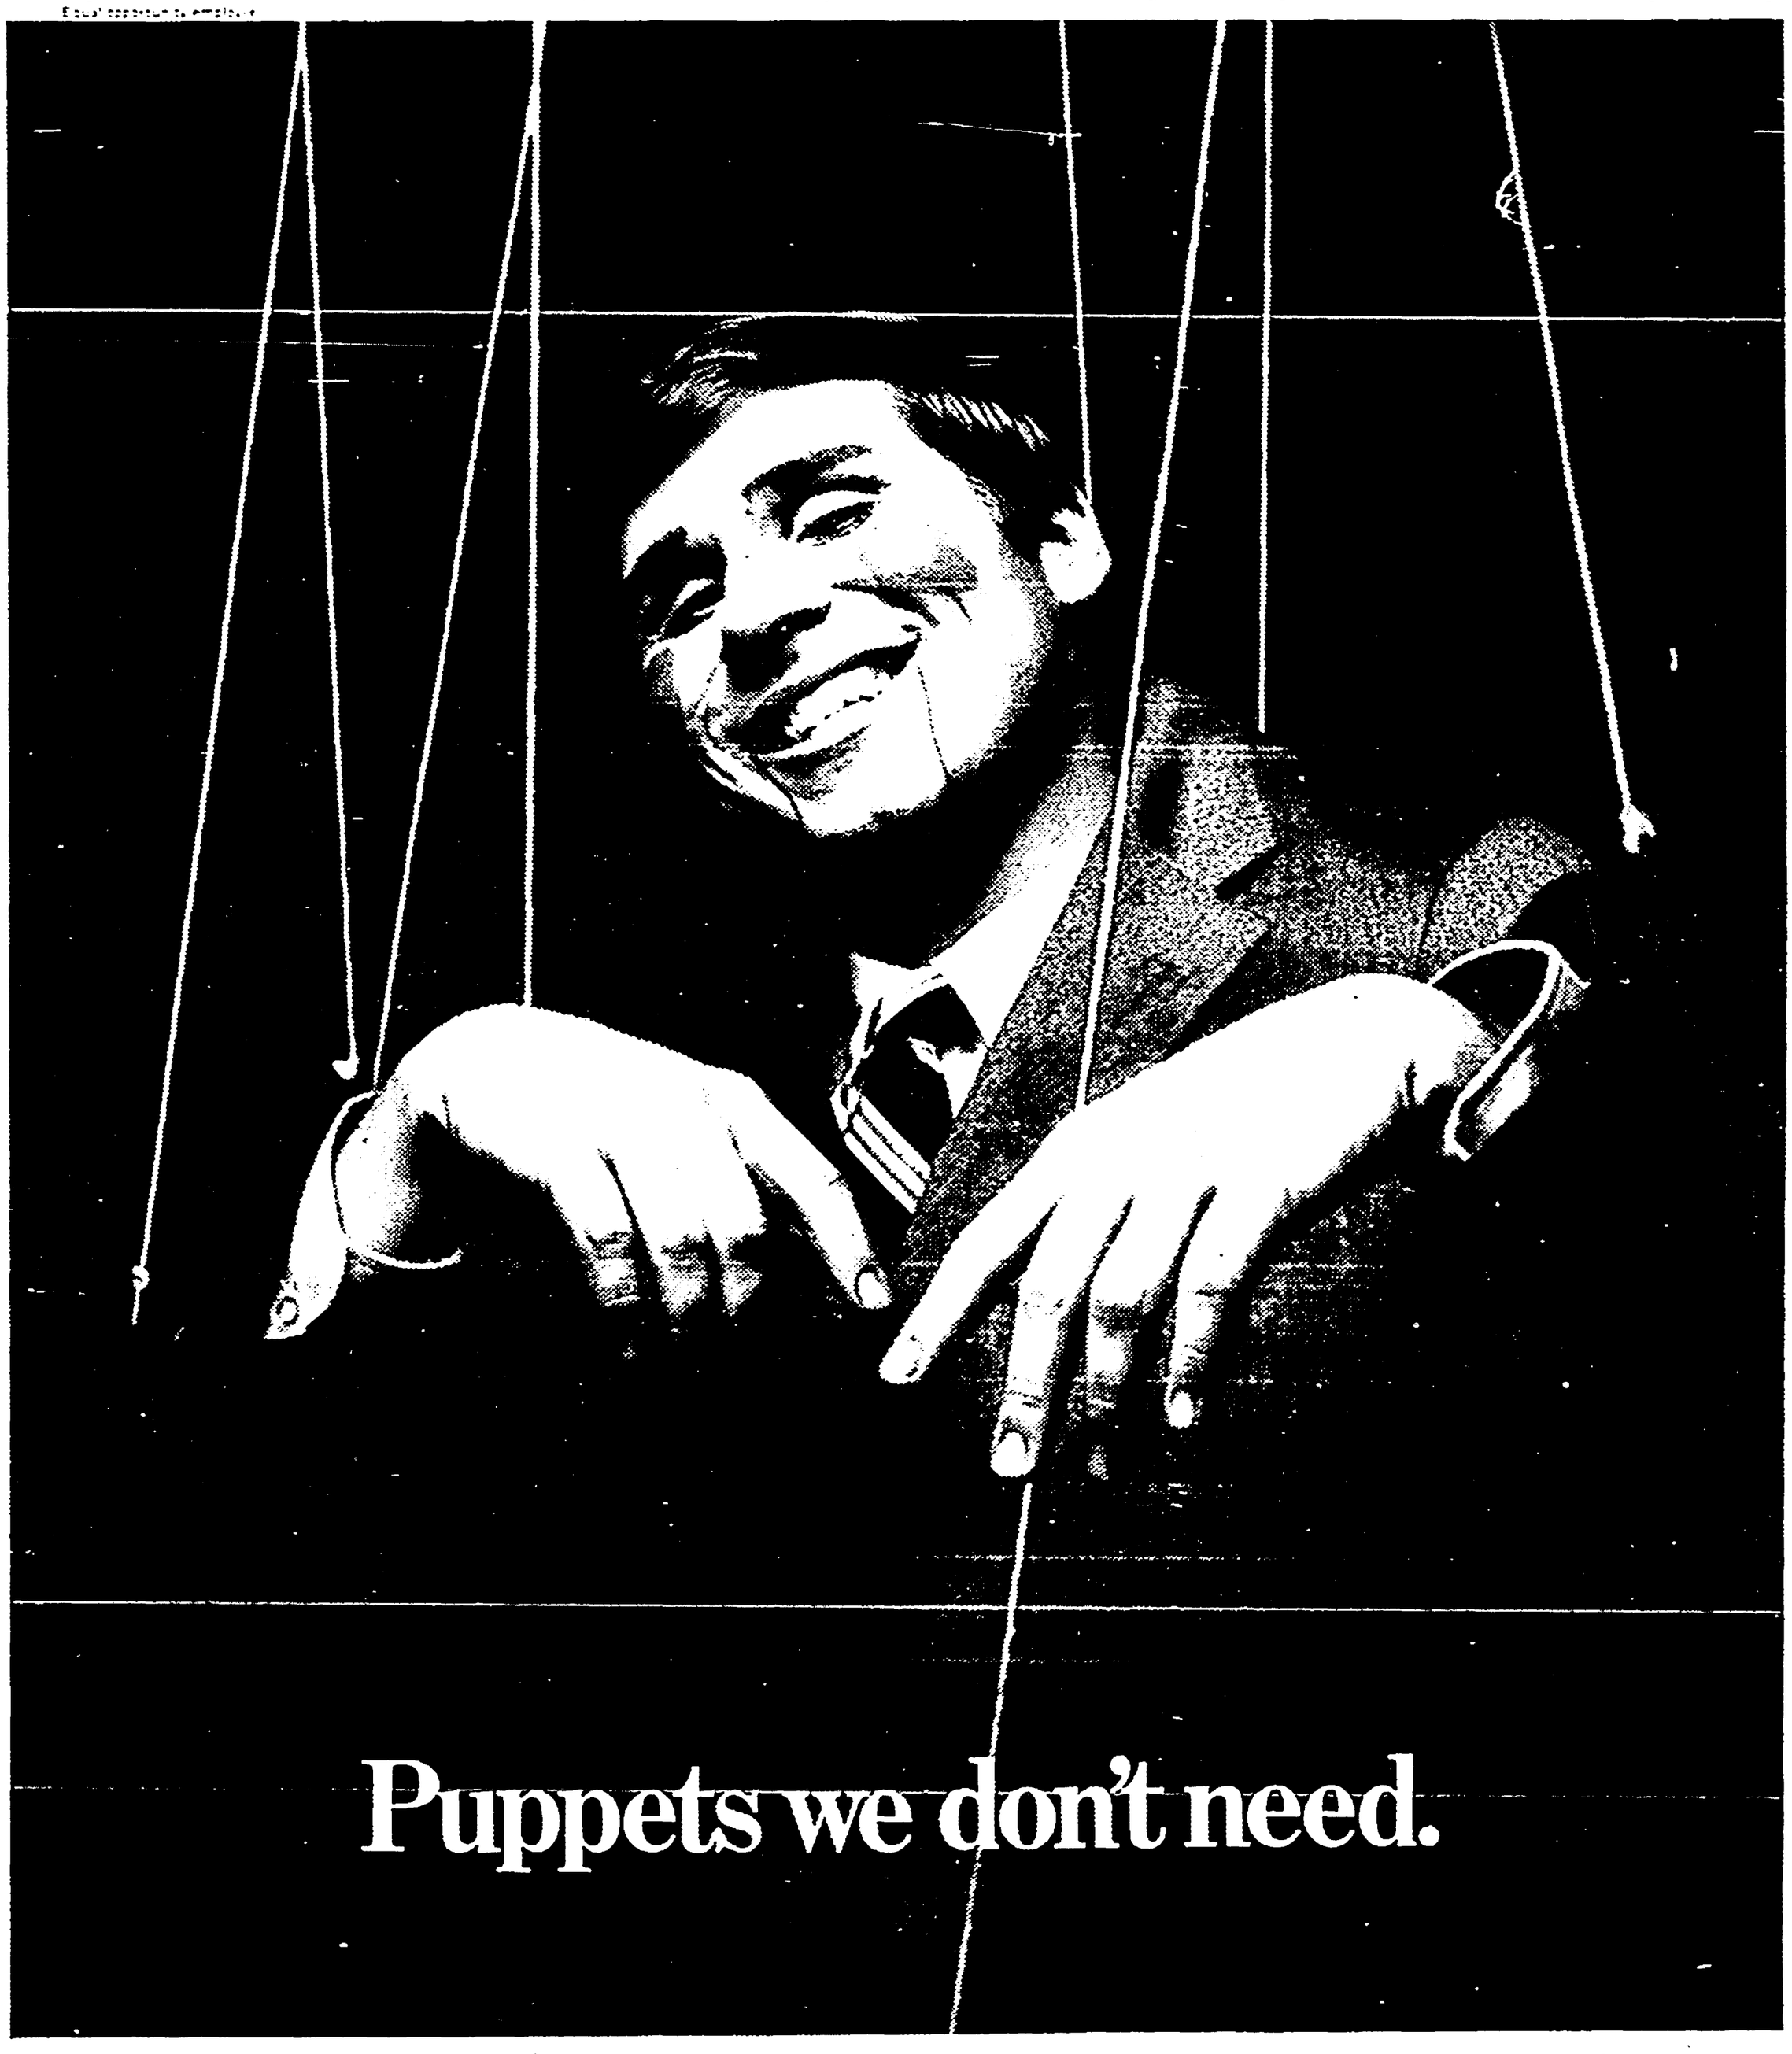
Trophy presentations and a victory celebration were conducted at Drumlins Country Club -- the final checkpoint. Sunday's turnout and the rallyists' spirit have prompted UTARA heads Gary Basile and Pete Kapcio to regard the club's future with optimism. UTARA has previously been plagued with financial difficulties.

Kapcio says, "The next rally will feature a reasonably simple and straightforward course, but with a few new aberrations to keep it interesting." It is open to students with no previous rallying experience.

Cal-Tech prof visits tomorrow

Prominent physicist to lecture at SU

Dr. Murray Gell-Mann, professor of physics at the California Institute of Technology, will give the first Jack Leitner memorial lecture Nov. 14 at 8 p.m. in the physics auditorium.



Dr. Gell-Mann is one of the world's outstanding theoretical physicists, according to Dr. Nathan Ginsburg, chairman of the physics department here. With Dr. Yuval Ne'eman at Cal Tech, Gell-Mann proposed the "SU (3)" theory, which first predicted the presence of the sub-neuclear particle Omega Minus. One of the pieces of experimental evidence that seems to show that the theory is valid was developed at Syracuse University by the late Dr. Leitner and his associates, Ginsburg said.

Gell-Mann received a bachelor of science from Yale in 1948 and a Ph.D. from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in 1951. He was a member of the Institute for Advanced Study at Princeton, N.J., in 1952 and was a visiting professor there in the 1967-68 academic year. He taught at the University of Chicago from 1952 until 1954 and has been at Cal Tech since 1955. In 1959 he received the Dannie Heineman prize of the American Physical Society; he is a Fellow of that society and a member of the National Academy of Sciences.

Leitner was appointed professor of physics at Syracuse University in 1958. He died Nov. 21, 1967, in Syracuse at the age of 36. Leitner was part of a team of scientists, working at Brookhaven Laboratory in Upton, N.Y., who in 1964 discovered the Omega Minus particle through analysis of photographs of tracks left in a bubble chamber. Discovery of that particle was described as significant in that it might be the keystone to an orderly arrangement of previously-known particles.

Funds to support the Jack Leitner memorial lecture series were donated by Leitner's colleagues in high-energy physics and by his colleagues on this campus.

Gell-Mann's lecture, "Elementary Particles?," is free and open to the public.

We happen to be involved in one of the fastest growing fields in the world.

Communications.

And because we also happen to be growing right along with it, we need people who can think for themselves when they are handed responsibility, not become confused by it.

Individuals. The kind of people to whom a challenge is a goad, not an excuse. Who won't be content to just sit around until they get a gold watch and a pension.

There's a lot to be done. Interesting, provocative work for almost every kind of engineer and scientist.

For example, in our Applied Research Laboratory, the newest sectors of theoretical and applied research in the areas of mathematics, physics, computer systems, electro-optics, information systems, and operations studies are explored.

Whether you lean toward designing electronic switching systems for our telephone companies or the development of electroluminescent devices for Sylvania, we think we have a place for you.

On one condition.

That there are no strings attached.

Credit given for tutoring

Projection '70 receives Greek gift; organizations make committments

By GREG SMITH

Projection '70, the class of 1970's grade-school ghetto child tutorial program which is now a 3-credit course in the School of Education, has obtained a $400 gift through Alpha Chi Rho.

"We found that Projection '70 was in financial straits," stated Brian Saxe, house spokesman. "We felt we could do our part in getting the organization off the ground." Saxe added, "The fraternity system is a part of the campus as a whole and should be concerned with all aspects of the campus." He believes that this should be the type of endeavor in which fraternities should become involved.

Projection '70, now known as Education 104, has a $1000 commitment from the University Religious Council (URC) and a $500 pledge from Campus Chest. According to Bob Mussey, Projection '70 director, he has sought funds from the University and has a promise from Community Chest to match any funds that the University may give.

Mussey feels that since Projection '70 is an accredited course and the tutors do pay tuition, it is not unreasonable to ask the university for matching funds for the operating budget and scholarships. "We would also like money to continue the program through the summer," Mussey said. "We haven't gotten the money for a full budget yet and are still looking around for commitments from other places."

"So far, results show vast improvement over last year," he remarked. "We haven't done everything this semester that we would have liked to have done,

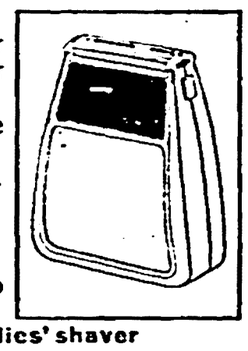
A beauty parlor you can take back to school.

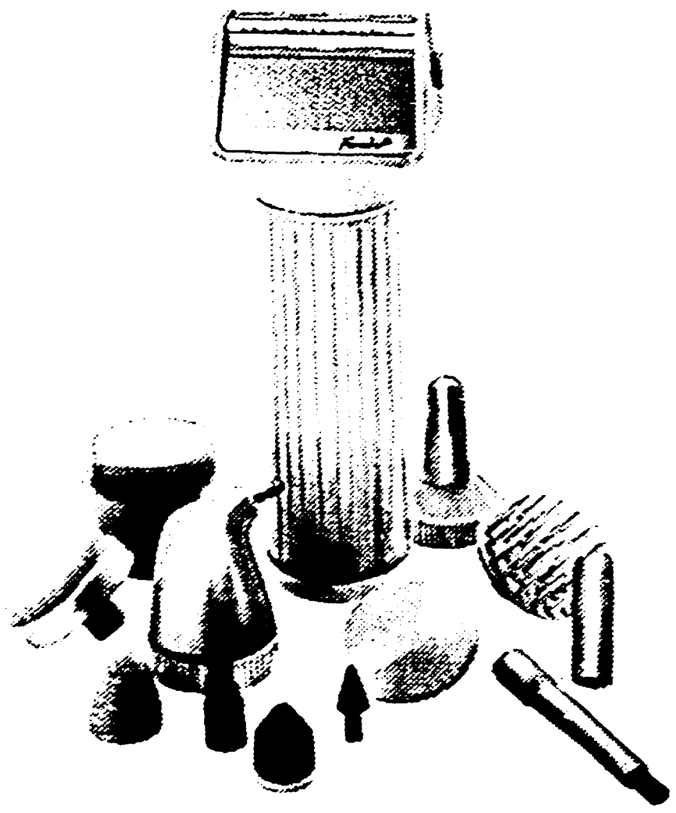
In many ways the Norelco Beauty Sachet is just like a beauty parlor.

It manicures, pedicures, massages, applies facial creams, buffs and files nails, and stimulates your scalp and muscles.



But in another way, it's more than a beauty parlor.

It also shaves your legs and underarms. And it shaves underarms as close or closer than a blade in 2 out of 3 shaves as tested in an independent laboratory. (As does the Lady Norelco 15L on the right.)



The Lady Norelco is a shaver that has two shaving edges. One for legs, and one for underarms.

It also has a 110/220 voltage selector for easy travel use.

And it's not at all expensive. Even if it shaves like it is.

but contributions such as those from Alpha Chi Rho, URC, and Campus Chest will make ours an exciting program."

Commented Mussey, "We're focusing this year on giving tutors much more training and using more professionals as a backup to improve the quality of training and tutoring." The 5 Education 104 faculty lecturers are also members of a professional advisory board which handles problems with which student coordinators are unable to deal.

Board members include: Dr. Robert Cohen, from the Institute for Community Psychology; Dr. Frank Green, head of the Reading Clinic; Dr. John Johnson, assistant professor in special education; and Dr. John Wilson, head of the Arithmetic Clinic.

Mussey continued, "The program fits in with a lot of educational reforms that are going on today. It stresses a free learning process of diagnosing problems and then solving them, rather than learning a certain body of knowledge.

"Money and organizational problems have held us back, but we're going ahead,"

Steve Gillette here in concert next Monday

Just like the weather, The Syracuse Folk Society is "Back on The Street Again!" What this means is that the Society is having another concert, and specifically that it will feature the composer of those words, Steve Gillette.

Last year, the Society's concert program was just getting under way. For its first concert the Society chose to present a relatively unknown songwriter whose songs and performance had impressed those few who had seen him or heard his record. Over five hundred people saw him, and when he was finished, the singer received a standing ovation. He was Steve Gillette.

On Monday at 8 p.m. in Crouse College Auditorium, Steve is giving a return concert. The admission is only 75 cents.

Steve is among a relatively new breed of singer-songwriters who have arisen out of the folk revival of the last six years. As a student at UCLA he gained an interest in folk music, and soon after he was composing songs with friends from his home state of California. He went on tour as a second act to several big folk acts, but his recognition as an individual did not come until he surprised the crowds and reviewers at the 1966 Philadelphia Folk Festival. Since then, Steve has been featured at almost all of the major coffeehouses in the United States and Canada, several universities, and returned two more times to the Philadelphia Festival as a major attraction.

Like many of his contemporaries in songwriting, Steve has had his music recorded by well known performers, even helping them in their search for spots on the charts. Ian and Sylvia recorded his Molly and Tenbrooks, as well as his beautiful Darcy Farrow. The Stone Ponies include his songs on each of their albums. The Sunshine Company helped make a name for itself by a highly successful single of that song mentioned in the first words of this article. Back on the Street Again. Steve has written them all, as well as several others that make up his album on Vanguard, which received high critical praise.

What is important about Steve when compared to the other well known writers of the present is his abilities as a performer. Steve has an unusually good voice, not common among writers, and also is an exceptional guitarist, who displayed his talents next to the world's finest folk guitarists at the guitar workshop at this year's Philly Folk Festival.

SU Anniversary

Committee chosen to chart colleges centennial celebration

DeWitt C. LeFevre, a ember of the Syracuse niversity board of trustees nce 1946, has been named hairman of the centennial ommittee which will plan the elebration of the University's 00th year.

Syracuse University was ounded in 1870. The official bservance of the anniversary is entatively scheduled to begin in he fall semester of 1969 and ontinue through ommencement in June of 1970.

DeWitt C. LeFevre, secretary f the board of trustees and hairman of the trustees' entennial committee, noted hat Syracuse University was ncorporated March 24, 1870, nd was chartered six days later. ts first faculty meeting was ug. 29, 1871 and the niversity opened in September f that year, with 41 students ttending liberal arts courses in a owntown Syracuse office uilding. By 1970 there will be n estimated 11,000 ndergraduates and 7,500 raduate students.

The other members of the centennial committee, all Syracuse University trustees, are:

Charles A. Chappell, chairman of the board of C.E. Chapell and Sons, Inc., Syracuse:

Burvil H. Glenn of Williamsville, professor of education at the State University of New York at Buffalo;

Paul C. Gouldin, a partner in the law firm of Levene, Gouldin and Thompson in Binghamton;

Melvin C. Holm, chairman of the board of Carrier Corporation, Syracuse;

George W. Lee, chairman of the board of Syracuse Savings Bank and senior partner in the law firm of Hiscock, Cowie, Bruce, Lee and Mawhinney, Syracuse; and Donald S. MacNaughton, senior executive vice president of the Prudential Insurance Company, Newark, N.J.

Chancellor William P. Tolley is an ex-officio member of the committee.

LeFevre, as a 1925 graduate in journalism, will be attending his 45th class reunion during the Centennial. As an undergraduate he was associate editor of the Daily Orange. Since 1952 he has been a member of the executive committee of the University's board of trustees and since 1967 he has been secretary of the board. From 1954 to 1956 he was national chairman of the Alumni Fund. He is also a trustee of Bethune-Cookman College, Daytona Beach, Fla., which awarded him an honorary Doctor of Laws degree in 1956.

In addition, 11 undergraduates have been appointed to a student advisory committee which will help plan the celebration of the University's centennial.

Members of the student centennial committee are:

President of the freshman class, Robert Tembeckjian, a student in the College of Liberal Arts,

Vice-president of the freshman class, Sherie Griffith, College of Liberal Arts;

President of the sophomore class, Leonard Conway, College of Liberal Arts;

President of the junior class, Howard Zweier, College of Liberal Arts;

Vice-president of the junior class, Bruce Derr, College of Liberal Arts;

DEWITT C. LEFEVRE

President of the senior class, Barry Randell, College of Business Administration;

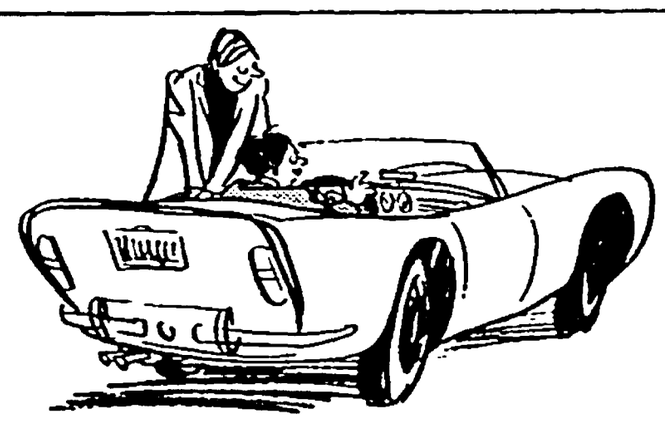
Vice-president of the senior class, Robin Erickson, College of Home Economics;

President of the Traditions Commission, Michael Sussman, a senior in the College of Liberal Arts;

Representing the Syracuse University Centennial Scholars are:

Sharon L. Wolchik, a junior in the College of Liberal Arts; and a junior in the College of Liberal Arts.

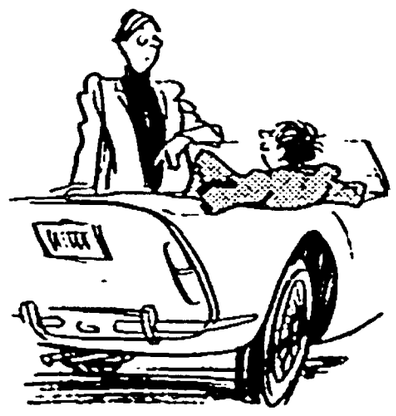
The Centennial Scholars are 30 members of the Class of 1970 chosen on the basis of academic excellence. Two-thirds of them have been on the Dean's Lists of their various schools or colleges since they enrolled at the University. Their accumulative grade average is more than 3.1 on a 4.0 scale, or better than a "B" average. The Scholars receive financial aid from the University according to their individual needs.



Two SU instructors given music awards

Two SU faculty members recently received awards from the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (ASCAP).

Dr. Howard L. Boatwright, Jr., dean of the School of Music, and Dr. Earl George, a professor in that school, were both presented with monetary grants.



According to ASCAP, "these awards are based upon the unique prestige value of each writer's catalog and the performances of his compositions."

ASCAP has presented awards annually since 1960 "to foster the cultural growth and enrichment of America's musical heritage."

Lack of awareness

Foreign students isolated involuntarily

By PATRICIA ROESCH

Is the present American college student an isolationist or is he simply unaware?

Both opinions received support in recent interviews with foreign and American students on the Syracuse University campus.

"The attitude of American students toward Vietnam, foreign aid and the United Nations clearly indicates an isolationist philosophy," said one believer. He did not elaborate.

One student defended her position by saying students are somewhat self-centered and unaware, but that this is a time in their lives when they naturally are introspective and self-evaluating.

How does the foreign student feel about his life and study in a country other than his own?

Most of them assess the numerous problems adjustments that must be made and conclude that they succeed fairly well. But a great many foreign students indicate a regret that they do not know more American students better.

Before an international student arrives in the United States he is provided with information on finances, clothing, academic routines and specific information about Syracuse University.

He must pass an English exam and have a financial guarantee. Of the 100,000 or more foreign students in the United States, 89 percent are supported by their own funds, private organizations or their own governments. The U.S. government provides financial aid for only 11 percent.

When he reaches the campus, the foreign student is ushered into university life through the International Student Office, whose center on Euclid Street is a warm, inviting, friendly place.

The 26 graduate and undergraduate International Student Guides help to link the foreign student to the rest of the campus through orientation, social events and introduction to their American friends.

Diedre Stern, president of the International Guides, says she wishes there were more interaction between American and foreign students. But she is optimistic about this because three years ago when she was a freshman, the liaison was much weaker than it is now.

"People get the idea that foreign students are isolated, off-campus. Some of them do live off-campus, but so do most graduate students."

Mrs. Virginia Torelli, assistant foreign student adviser, feels that American students reflect something of an isolationist attitude. For example, most of them do not know that they are automatically members of the International Student Origanization (ISO).

"When an event is sponsored by ISO, they think it is only for foreign students and very few Americans show up."

International Week in March is usually a big success campuswide, but this is only one week in the entire year, Mrs. Torelli explained.

"The rest of the year foreign students come and go at the International Student Center, organize their own groups, and generally stick to themselves."

Jagan Gomatam, graduate student from India, who is president of the ISO feels that the lack of interaction is not due to an inhospitable attitude of American students, but simply to the lack of awareness that the international students are here. Apart from a slight acquaintance, he feels the relationships are generally quite superficial.

An American thinks of a foreign student in terms of what his native costume looks like, his cultural differences, his dances, flower arrangements or slides of his country.

"The foreign student doesn't mind displaying these things - he is glad to," Jagan says. "But after a while he longs for something more, perhaps an interest in him as a person instead of as a foreign student."

"Suppose a graduate philosophy student is invited to dinner at the home of a General Electric engineer. After the novelty of his being from another country has worn off, they have very little in common, the same as two Americans with such diverse backgrounds."

Canada has the largest representation from a single country, claiming 88 of the 631 foreign students on campus. All the countries of Africa account for 75, 67 students are from China and 53 from India. Great Britain, Japan, Korea, Venezuela and Israel are among the large number of nations represented.

These students impart to the Syracuse University campus a sophisticated and cosmopolitan atmosphere. But one international student summed up the prevailing feeling among his friends by saying,

"The university provides plenty of facilities to meet our academic and everyday needs. But usually the personal contact with American students is meager."

Thirteen SU cadets receive grants

Michael T. Ferrara, has been chosen Cadet Commander of the 535th Air Force ROTC Cadet Group at Syracuse University. Ferrara, senior in the College of Liberal Arts majoring in political science, is the top student leader in the training program of the 265 Air Force cadets.

Ferrara previously served as flight sergeant, flight commander, and corps deputy commander in the ROTC program. He is a member of the Arnold Air Society, the senior executive council, the Inter Fraternity Council, and Lambda Chi Alpha fraternity.

Thirteen Syracuse University Air Force ROTC cadets are among almost 1,000 throughout the country selected to receive financial assistance through the Air Force Financial Assistance Program (FAP) this year.

FAP provides financial aid for selected future Air Force officers enrolled in AFROTC. It pays full tuition, fees, book allowance, and subsistance pay of $50 a month. To be considered, students must have a grade point average of at least 2.5 on a 4.0 scale, have satisfactory scores on the Air Force Officer Qualifying Test, meet medical requirements, and demonstrate high personal and moral standards. Emphasis is also placed on selecting cadets with skills and abilities needed by the Air Force.

The 13 Syracuse cadets selected to receive these benefits are Thomas P. Dinardi, Eric P. Hansen, Stuart I. Levin, Joshua L. Menter, Kenneth M. Ralph, Robert C. Wright, John F. Steve, Richard F. Walsh, William M. Muehleck, David R. Hall, Robert M. Gronner, William G. Ebersbach and William A. Wismann.

By the fall of 1970, the Air Force plans to expand its Financial Assistance Program to provide financial help to 5,500 AFROTC cadets.

Mark D. Mandel, an SU junior, recently won a scholarship for the 1968-69 academic year from Phi Epsilon Pi fraternity's national council.

The grant was awarded by the Phi Epsilon Pi Foundation, established by the fraternity to assist worthy members in need of financial aid.

SU grad students involved in new exchange program

Two SU graduate students are the first persons to take advantage of a new Exchange Scholar Program involving Syracuse, Cornell University and the University of Rochester. The program was introduced this fall.

Mrs. Emmy Clubb and Mrs. Judith Montgomery, both faculty wives, are enrolled in courses this semester at Cornell. Mrs. Clubb, a doctoral candidate in history, is taking a seminar in Chinese history. Mrs. Montgomery, completing work for a Ph.D, in American literature, is studying Faulkner and Conrad.

Each Monday noon, Mrs. Clubb, a mother of three small children, drives 55 miles to Ithaca. She spends part of the afternoon in the library and then goes to class from 3:30 to 5:30.

"It's a beautiful drive in the fall and the course is fine," she said. "Cornell has a fine Chinese history program, just as Syracuse is developing an outstanding one in South Asian history." Her husband, Oliver E. Clubb, is an associate professor of political science at Syracuse.

Mrs. Montgomery has a short trip to the Cornell campus since she now lives in Ithaca. Her husband Douglas is teaching urban affairs at Cornell this year. "The Exchange Scholar concept should be very useful for graduate students getting to a point where they are doing their own research," she commented.

The program is based on the idea of combining resources to offer graduate students as wide as possible a range of courses to avoid duplication of academic specialities and facilities. The idea is patterned after a four-year old program begun by 11 midwestern universities.

Exchange scholars pay tuition and fees at their home universities, but will receive graduate status and privileges at their host universities. When work is completed a written report will be submitted to the student's faculty adviser, who will decide whether to issue a grade.

A student needing a course unavailable at his own campus will discuss his plans with his faculty adviser. The adviser can then contact this counterpart on the campus where the course is available.

Massis changing the image of Syracuse pass receivers

By BOB GALLAGHER

The offensive ends in Syracuse's "three yards and a cloud of dust" offense, known for their wonderful blocking and wonderless receiving, have consequently been called "misplaced tackles." Tight end John Massis, with his many fine receptions this season, has helped put an end to that idea.

A tight end lines up on the offensive line right beside the offensive lineman, while the split end is six or seven yards outside of the lineman. "The job of a tight end," says the 6-2, 205 lb. junior, "is to both catch passes and to block."

Ends run basically the same patterns, such as the flag, post, hook and sprint. The primary pattern for the tight end is the drag. Massis states, "The drag is a discipline pattern. In order for it to be effective, the receiver must hold his block for three seconds, then release and go to the open area, which is to the opposite side of the linebackers' flow."

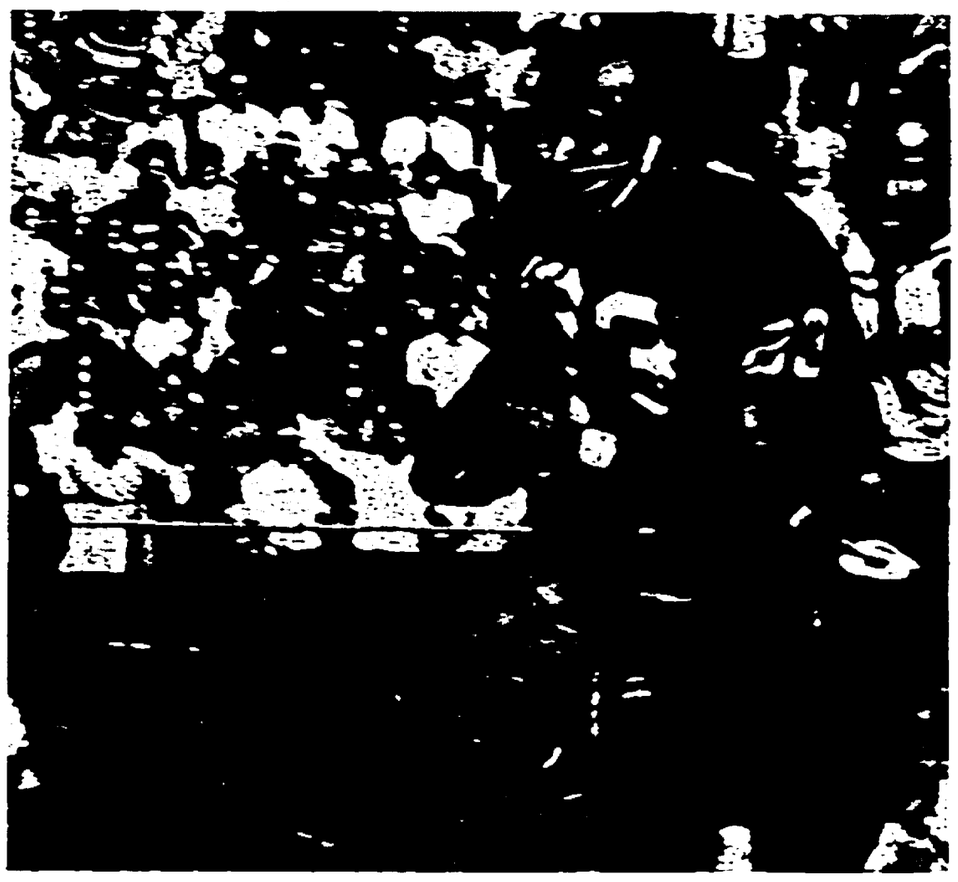
Massis doesn't feel moves and speed are of primary importance to a tight end. "The first thing a receiver tires to do is make the defender go backwards. Then he breaks away from him. The end should have the necessary steps on the defender to make the catch," he says.

A receiver is permitted to change his pass route while he is running it only if there is justification. "If the area which the receiver is supposed to go into is congested, or the quarterback is scrambling," Massis states, "he should run to the open area and hope the quarterback sees him."

Something which most ends like to do is run with the ball after making a reception, and Massis is no exception. He says, "One reason I like the drag pattern is because it gives me an opportunity to run with the ball. Since you don't have any interference, you try to run where the defenders aren't."

The tight end throws blocks both on the line and downfield. He explains, "The tight end must block the defensive end on the scissors or reverse, double team the tackle on off—tackle plays, and on some plays he must block the linebacker."

In blocking downfield Massis says, "You try to run through the man and leave your feet only when you feel you are losing him. Then you roll into his legs. The main problem with downfield blocks, is not knowing exactly where the runner is."



The best thing about blocking downfield for Massis is the chance to hit defensive backs. "They like to avoid getting hit, and it annoys them when the tight end keeps hitting them," he says.

Another responsibility which Massis has, along with the other tight end, Bill Maddox, is to shuttle back and forth after every other play. He goes from the bench to the huddle with a play from the coach.

"Coach Ben Schwartzwalder selects a play after looking at the sheet of plays, or conferring with offensive coach Bill Bell, who is in the press box," Massis explains. "We do this for all the offensive plays, although the quarterback is permitted to automatic (change the play at the line of scrimmage). He usually does five or six times during a game."

One of the reasons for the bench calling the plays, Massis believes, "Is because they have a better view of the game and can determine easier what the defense is giving us."

SU is throwing more passes this season than it ever has before. Massis states, "We have no All-American runner this season, so we are using what we have. We're not dependent on a single star, so we do anything we can to score."

Sports sidelights

The All-University Intramural Football championship game, scheduled for last night, was postponed because of the snow. It will be rescheduled for a later date.

Entries for winter intramurals must be filed in the Intramural Office before noon Monday.

Due to the failure of the ice making machine, the SU hockey club's practice has been cancelled.

The Intramural managers meeting originally scheduled for last night will be held tonight at 7 in Room 306 of Archbold Gym.

To Tommie Smith:

The gold medal is draped around your neck
you are an Olympic Champion.
you have performed greater than all others
you have cleared and demolished every obstacle.
and now on the winner's stand
————you are an Olympic Champion
a Black Champion
A Black Man.

here you are the best
but there you are only black to those who see only with their eyes hear only with their ears speak only with their mouths never with their hearts or minds never really feeling ————with their souls.

your teammate is there with you
he has excelled beside you and he stands beside you in victory both of you in your moment of conquest both of you black in your hour of triumph.

now they play the anthem of your country and you are hurt in your heart by the hypocrisy of the words you cannot reconcile yourself to believe.
you had told yourself and your people that you could not represent that which supresses you.
but you are a man first
————————a Black Man
and you realize that the Creed of the Olympic Games tells you that the true glory lies not in winning but in taking part.

you know that you are the best
no one can run two-hundred meters with you so you are here
————a winner.

and you have vowed to express with dignity the emotions which tear at you inside to show the whole world and more importantly to show your people
why you are here.
the flag of your country rises slowly up the staff the flag that stands for so much but says so painfully little you cannot stand at attention and devote your allegiance to that flag.

you raise an arm in triumph
a tightened fist of resolution clad in a single black glove your teammate similarly raises his arm and you have erected over the two of you your arch of black unity
the two of you for your people your heads, black and defiantly proud are bowed in humble introspective dignity not raised in meaningless triumph ————————meaningless when viewed in comparison to your life as a Black Man.
simple black scarves adorn your necks telling the world silently yet so profoundly:
I am a Black Man.
you wear black socks.
shoeless
and with these you tell of the sickening poverty of so many of your Black brothers.
you and your teammate stand as Champions and with the greatest of dignity you quietly express to the world that as a Black Man you can wait no longer you cannot accept the empty praise of an athletic victory

what is a gold medal around your neck
when the modest scarf beneath it rises with the clearest pride to tell them all of your greatest triumph one yet to be won

they boo you
————————standing up for what is wrong tells them of themselves and even if they confess it to themselves they can never admit it to each other you are led from the stadium a Champion and they boo you your arm is raised again in defiant expression of your tremendous pride.
you stride out through the derision out of the stadium of your athletic conquest back into the world where you fight for your greatest victory.
once again you pick up the courage that is your badge and you walk out of the stadium proudly following your beautiful silent expression of that which holds real meaning for you.
you leave an Olympic Champion
a Black Champion
a Man.

Chris Powell

'Drummer' for revolution edits newspaper for blacks

By LARRY SAMPSON

The present surge of Black Power is leaving its imprint on the Syracuse University campus in a number of ways: the Student Afro-American Society and the recently reactivated Omega Psi Phi Fraternity, for example.

But it shouldn't be surprising that a major thrust of the Black Power movement across the nation has engaged the use and power of the press. The role of the press as a stalwart defender of liberty and equality dates back to colonial America and the subsequent fight against England. And the history of American newspapers began with the partisan publications of the developing American political parties.

In spite of the controversy that surrounds Black Power, it is political as well as social, comparable to the colonists' organized desires for freedom. It is a reality on campus, and Home Town News Inc., a local newspaper often sold on campus, is part of that reality.

The Home Town News is essentially a one man operation. Chris Powell, publisher, editor, reporter, rewriteman and photographer for the eight-page publication, is what the white establishment might call a local civic leader. "Civic leader" perhaps is being overly discreet. Powell considers himself a complete revolutionist.

The nature of Home Town News reflects Powell's background. He is an ex-band leader who grew up in the black ghetto of Syracuse.

Incarceration for many black people, has been part of his American experience. He is familiar with the innuendos of the system. He knows Syracuse, its politics and its attitudes. But more important he knows the black people who live in the Syracuse ghetto and how they often survive by wit and nerve. And it is this audience to which he really writes.

Powell calls himself a "drummer" for the black revolution, not a journalist. He believes in obtaining one's rights, not pleading for them. For Powell, before there can be peace and a life of coexistence between black and white, the black man must obtain his full freedom. And this is the position of the paper. He considers the militant stand necessary for the existence and survival of the black man in this society.

Much has been said about the abrasive tone that Home Town News weekly projects. The paper's journalistic quality has been heavily criticized for its lack of professionalism and its general technical failings. But Powell is not concerned about attaining a special plateau of performance.

When talking with him about journalistic standards and rules, he makes what seems to be a spurious argument in defense of his publication. He argues that journalistic rules established by white society, by white press are only beneficial to the white press. He believes that the black press must not be content to imitate the white press, which for a long time ignored the plight of black people in America. The black press must establish its own rules if it isn't to be subdued by white norms and white interference.

Douglas Cater

Cater, former Johnson aide, explains office of Presidency

By BOB ZUER
Associate Editor

No office of government anywhere in the world has changed more rapidly in the past thirty years than the American presidency, according to a former aide to President Johnson. Douglas Cater, who left the Johnson administration in October to become an advisor to Vice President Hubert Humphrey during Humphrey's campaign for the presidency, told students and faculty last night in Maxwell auditorium the presidential office is "a sizeable bureaucratic institution" with upwards of 2,000 employees.

Cater cited the formation of the Bureau of the Budget in 1939 and the National Security Council in the late 1940's as examples of expansion. These additional posts in the executive branch have contributed to the creation of a number of American myths too, he added.

Some people believe the burdens of the President can be lessened by dividing up the office, he said. But parcelling out those duties would make it difficult to fix the responsibility for executive decision-making, he emphasized.

Still others feel the President's work load should be lightened by adding more advisors, according to Cater. But he argued this would only create more bureaucracy and would not solve anything. The President should also regularly review the functions of his office to eliminate unnecessary jobs, he added.

"With all his powers, persuasion is the chief power the President must rely on," he said.

The White House Day, he went on, demands much more time than 24 hours can offer. White House aides manage the President's time so he can more effectively use it for handling problems that arise, he added. There are few problems with instant solutions or even predictable solutions. So the aides must put "a handle" on the problem to start movement toward finding one.

Cater called decision making "a mysterious process" and said Lyndon Johnson was considered by politicians such as Hubert Humphrey and Eugene McCarthy to be the man best qualified for the presidency of only a few years back. He said it was easy to cite the Vietnam war, credibility gap, and the failure of the Great Society as reasons for Johnson's unpopularity today but added, "I am confident in the hindsight of history Lyndon Baines Johnson will fare better than he is right now."

Cater said he thought Johnson was credible throughout his term and he was really trying to do what he said he was trying to do.

"Communication remains his most difficult problem," he said, "but the credibility gap is not new."

He cited the "management of the news" charges hurled at former President Dwight Eisenhower as an example and predicted President-elect Richard M. Nixon would face similar charges.

Relate experiences in Crossroads Africa

By RAMI KHOURI

As Syracuse shivered in open-mouthed amazement last night, Haskell Ward, recruitment director for Operation Crossroads Africa, pointed out the needs and realities of emerging Africa and exactly how his organization is helping the darkest remaining continent feel its way into the developed world.

Africans are not interested in having Americans come to their country to show them "the dignity of manual labor," stated Ward. In the past the United States has sent students and others to Africa to build schools, hospitals, and roads, usually without being asked and often without being appreciated.

Crossroads Africa approaches a situation in quite a different and realistic manner. Their goals are two fold: to get American and Canadian people informed on African affairs, and to help the existing African developmental programs.

In this way, according to Ward, people go to Africa for a summer and assist in the needed development projects. But their benefit does not end with their return home, for once back here they actively work to "translate their experience" and educate the American who stayed home all summer.

Carrying the program further Crossroads Africa is interested in creating a very real link between black and white Americans and black Africans. American Negroes are now identifying with Africa in a symbolic, linguistic and cultural way.

Crossroads hopes to dispel the present myths and misconceptions which Americans hold of Africa. Such things as Tarzan, a total absence of clothes, packaged

Above and beyond affluence

What do you say when you sit down with a dozen middle-aged graduates of the Harvard Business School for lunch and they ask you about the generation gap.

One refused to believe the generation gap today was any different than ever before. Most recognized a new self-righteousness among students and a new extremism.

Not that they approved of it. They universally blanched when Chuck Hicks told them administrators around the country were finally listening to students—after Columbia.

Nor did they agree or understand student antipathy to business and careers in business. What we stated yesterday they pointed out over and over again. Without the production of ethic and profit motive the resources of this country would not have been developed. Our culture without its affluence would not have been able to build so many universities and send so many youth to college.

This is all true although it dwells upon results without questioning whether any better values might govern our society than those of the business world.

Perhaps at this point the generation gap is identifiable. We are the first generation to have been born into prosperity and matured into affluence. Perhaps we are more fortunate than our parents. Having achieved affluence, we can be certain it is not the primary object in life. This is not the only possibility. Advertising continues to create greater demands. But we can no longer argue economic necessity to excuse a life in pursuit of material goods.

Economic abundance has directly and indirectly increased our self awareness and the awareness of the shortcomings of our culture. If we are more aware and more critical, it is also true we are more involved. Our involvement should be directed toward working for a better society and few of us choose business to accomplish that. Those most actively committed to a better society such as members of SDS do not even know what they want in the place of what we've got. They only want to tear down on the assumption that whatever grows up in its place will be better.

It is this destructive self-righteousness that is the worst aspect of the generation gap. The best is that many of the pampered products of prosperity will go to work for a society that allows a maximum of individual expression without losing a sense of social responsibility.

Nature's Creation

THIS IS THE TRUTH ABOUT LIFE

The game is the same.
Nothing has changed but the name.
The greater you do for people
The greater your returns are.
This is a holy way of life.
Do you know everything living is God?
You can do right or you can do wrong.
In time you will get your Returns.
You get your pay for work you do.
Right or wrong
This is life
In the name of Love
Charity
And hope.
It is giving time now.
God bless you.

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

Here on the campus of Syracuse University we, as students, are most fortunate in being able to witness the problems and the trials of America as they confront us on the plazas and squares about campus. We have the opportunity to encounter black militants on campus corners, the Peace and Freedom Party vociferously heckling on the steps of Hendricks Chapel and anti-establishmentarians performing at political rallies for presidential candidates.

I ask how wide-spread are the concepts of these protestors? Are they not soon dropped into oblivion? The deserve to be forgotten; to be disregarded as a minority group of unconcerned publicity seekers. Their plan reaches no further then the present. To most of them the future is something obscure, vague, and not to be dealt with. I dare say most disturbances are contrived only to embarrass or antagonize the the established system with no interest for improving it. I have no doubt that their efforts are futile since answers to pertinent questions from those in authority are not forthcoming because of their inability or unwillingness to organize their thoughts and respond coherently and with mature responsibility.

We see now the results of these chaotic demonstrations by the New Left. Members of the established majority, stricken with fear and indecisiveness, turn now to the opposite extreme by supporting a bigot and racist from Alabama. Why not revert to the ultimate weapon of change--the pen, the press, and the editorial. Do not the editoral pages of "The New York Times," "The Washington Post," and the "National Observer" provide a better, more dependable means for reaching the power structure in America?

John F. Turner

To the Editor:

Recently you placed a letter in your column about the Flag in front of Hendricks Chapel.

According to U.S. Bastard the AFROTC cadets were showing mild dissent by not lowering the Flag on Friday night or Saturday. The specific day was not mentioned. I would like to inform this person that it's not the responsibility of the cadets whether they are Army of Air Force cadets to lower the Flag or for that matter raise it on the weekends. The Campus Police are supposed to do this.

It was not dissent by the cadets but neglect by the Police that the Flag stayed up during the weekend.

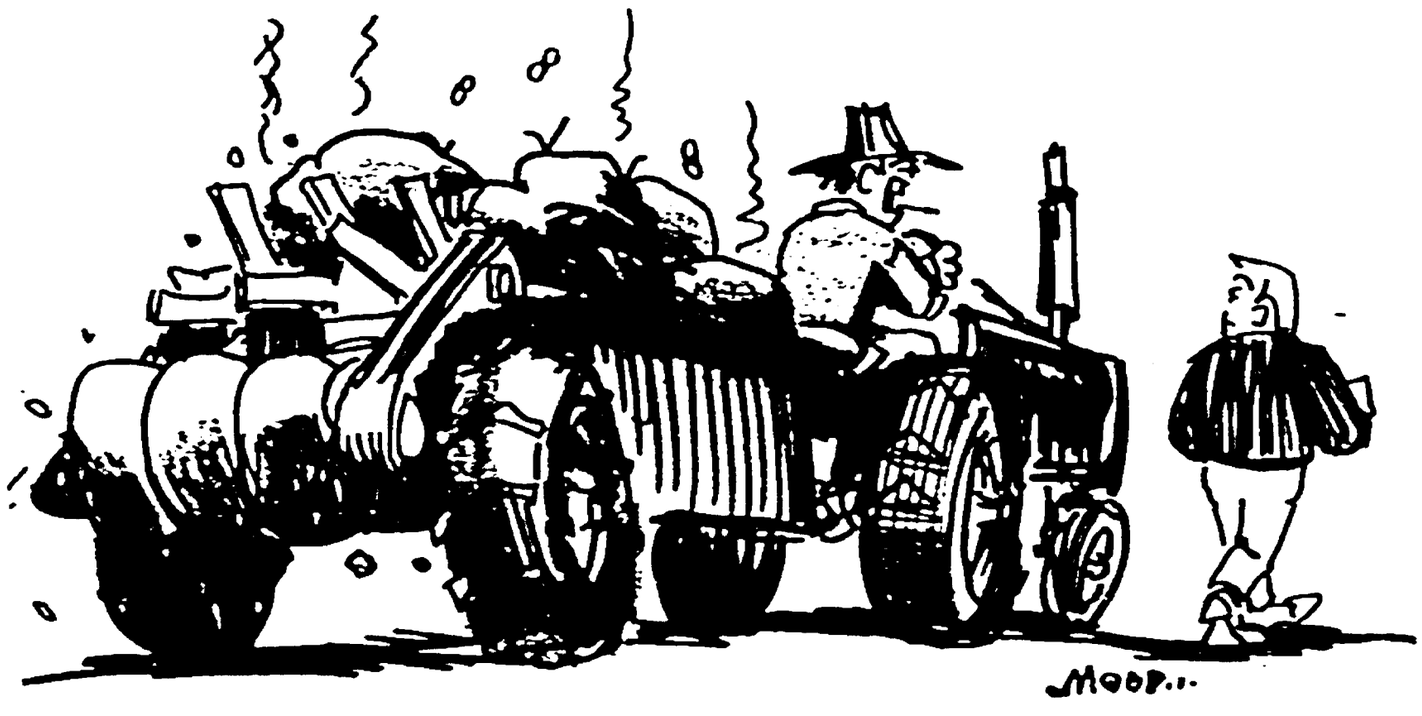
Great expectations

By Abe Wagner

Almost as great as the pre-election speculation as to who would in fact win the Presidency, is the apprehension over just who will make up the political power elite surrounding Richard Nixon when he takes office. Indeed, there is much ground for this.

As C. Wright Mills is prone to point out, the entire twentieth century has been characterized by a rising importance of this class of top level executives. By the end of the New Deal era a bargain seems to have been struct between the political and economic sectors of society, allowing for the elevation of power in the federal executive branch.



For the most part, the occupants of the White House have sought to surround themselves with capable secretaries and advisors. Franklin D. Roosevelt, once having been accused of creating a "brain trust" asked from what other part of the anatomy men would prefer to be governed. Those that have followed F.D.R. have also followed his example. Notable cases in point are the apointees of President Kennedy, and many of Lyndon B. Johnson's own selections.

In spite of his spectacular comeback and victory, Lazarus of American politics Richard Nixon has given little evidence of who will be his key apointees and colleagues in the power elite. It has been said that in his comeback, Nixon spent eight years selling the American public a 1953 Chevrolet, and this year they finally bought it. If this is so, the biggest reason for it was the advertising it got. Where Kennedy and Johnson had surrounded themselves with political analysts and Hubert Humphrey had surrounded himself with almost anybody, Richard Nixon was flanked by an organization of advertising and public relations men beyond the wildest dreams of Madison Avenue.

An analysis done during the election by CBS explored the Nixon campaign and the men that made it up. One had to look far and wide to find even one man with cabinet level potential. Nixon's first appointment, if you can call it that, was of course Vice President-elect Spiro T. Agnew. Little further can be said about Agnew's qualifications that has not already been said at this point. If Agnew is to become an integral force and an astute thinker in the next four years it will be to the surprise of many.

The most recent, and only other key appoint made by Nixon has been that of Bryce Nathaniel Harlow as Presidential Assistant for Legislative Relations, or liason with Congress. Having served with the dynamic Eisenhower Administration, Mr. Harlow has more recently been chief Washington lobbyist for the Proctor and Gamble Corporation. Holding a position titled "government relations" Mr. Harlow appears as another Nixon ad-man. Agents of special interest groups have often been appointed to governmental posts [illegible] have aspired to public acclaim, [illegible] Mr. Harlow has little to recommend.

Thus we wait with some reservation for President-elect Nixon to announce more of his incoming administration. From its tenor already set, one could expect the notorious Young and Rubicam to share in the duties of Secretary of State. We should hope not.

Say, how do I get to Food Service?

SG becomes UG!

Student Senate reports on visitation hours

By COLETTE STALLINGS

Despite a comment that student government will now be called UG, the first article of the SG constitution stating that "the name of the organization shall be Undergraduate Government" was passed by Student Senate last night.

Recent criticism of the Graduate Student Organization was cited as the reason for the change.

Commenting on article four which deals with the executive branch of UG, Speaker Pro Temp John Diamond said, "Both the executive branch and the legislative branch are doing something but neither of them know it. The power of the executive branch should be defined and an effective method of enforcing legislation should be outlined in the constitution." The article was returned to the government structures committee.

Washington Arms has been chosen to be the experimental co-ed dorm. In theory, according to Lance Wisniewski, students living in the dorm could pick two general courses "with some of the better professors" in the dorm. Wisniewski described the experimental dorm as "a live and learn center."

Displaying a dinner knife and attractively sporting a green bow, chairman of the Student Services Committee Richard Barton explained the knife was presented to him by a resident of Shaw and that "it's pointed at the Food Service."

Speaker Ed Feldman reported that 6,500 questionnaires are being circulated asking students to outline specifically what they think is wrong with Food Service. Barton commented, "It's bad. If the kids keep bothering me about the Food Service we're going to have to do something."

Student member of the committee on re-organization and reapportionment of the Faculty Senate, John Diamond, noted that student life, curriculm and program planning, student rights and behavior, and scholarship were among areas in which the faculty feels they should have a voice. They claim the administration dominates these areas now.

Concluding this report, Diamond remarked, "I used to think we were the only disorganized body on campus. We're not. The Faculty Senate is a perfect mirror of this organization."

Two women's dorms, one large mens dorm, eight fraternities, and six sororities, constituting 25 per cent of University housing, will obtain visitation hours as part of an experiment of the Committee on Student Life. Living centers wishing visitation hours should petition the committee through Cindy Bailey.

The National Student Association has established a legal rights bureau to handle any questions concerning students legal rights.

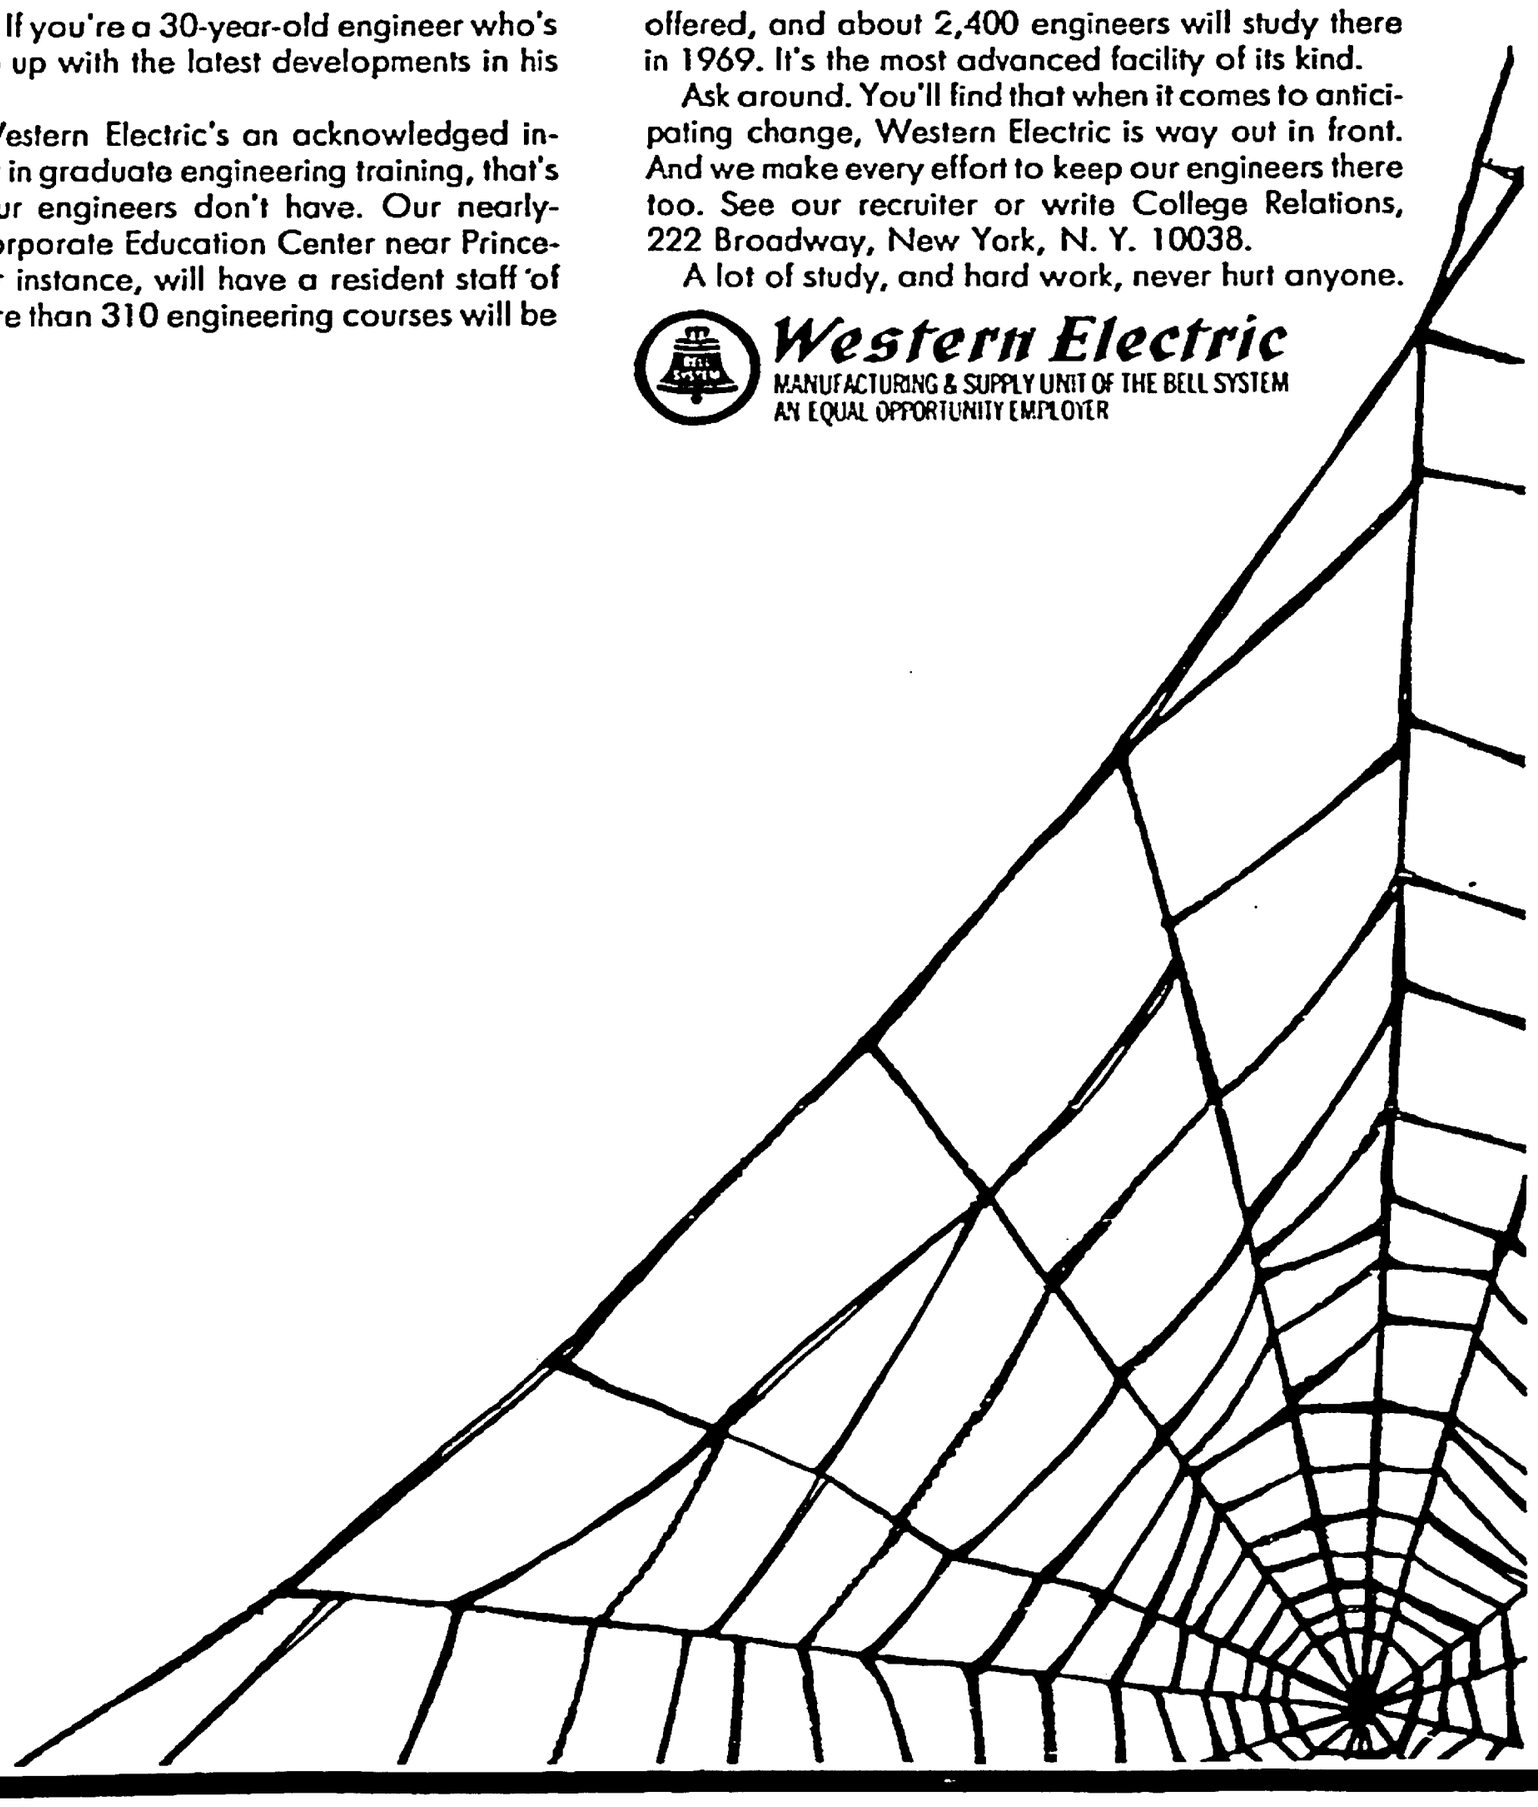
Is it possible to be passed by at 30?



Absolutely. If you're a 30-year-old engineer who's failed to keep up with the latest developments in his field.

Because Western Electric's an acknowledged industrial leader in graduate engineering training, that's one worry our engineers don't have. Our nearly-completed Corporate Education Center near Princeton, N. J., for instance, will have a resident staff of over 100. More than 310 engineering courses will be offered, and about 2,400 engineers will study there in 1969. It's the most advanced facility of its kind.

Ask around. You'll find that when it comes to anticipating change, Western Electric is way out in front. And we make every effort to keep our engineers there too. See our recruiter or write College Relations, 222 Broadway, New York, N. Y. 10038.

Fund raising drive yields new high in contributions

SU's annual fund raising drive for 1967-68 has yielded gifts of $1,556,835 from 20,636 donors according to J. Robert Tomlinson, S.U. '41, national chairman of the annual giving program. Tomlinson, president of the Barden Corp., Danbury, Conn., said results "surpassed any previous year's total in both amounts given and number of donors."

Nearly $476,000 of the gifts was in unrestricted funds. "Unrestricted dollars are the monies that each year help to balance the University's budget," Tomlinson said. "Our University, as any other university, cries out for these funds. It is our sincere hope that even more unrestricted dollars will be given in this year's appeal."

In his forward to the report on 1967-68 gifts, Chancellor William P. Tolley said: "No institution will play a more important part in shaping the future of American society than the university. And while public and private universities are both important, the freedom and autonomy of the privately endowed university give it a special responsibility for values and goals as well as for educational innovation. In a privately endowed university we can make the search for beauty and goodness as important as the search for truth. And we have much greater freedom in dealing with the ultimate questions of man and society."

HOWARD NEMEROV

Howard Memerov, a Brandeis University English professor, poet, novelist and critic, will visit Syracuse University for a week beginning Nov. 18, as a guest of the English Department's graduate writing program.

Nemerov, who has written six volumes of poetry and four novels, will lecture at 4 p.m. Monday (Nov. 18) in Kittredge Auditorium, H.B. Crouse Hall, on "Poetry and Meaning." He will give a public reading of his poetry at 4 p.m. Thursday (Nov. 21) in Maxwell Auditorium.

During the rest of his stay, Memerov will visit classes and meet students in the writing program.

Memerov is a graduate of Harvard University and has been a member of the Bennington College faculty, a Writer in Residence at Hollins College, Va., and Poet in Residence at the Library of Congress.

His volumnes of poetry are "The Image and the Law" (1947), "Guide to the Ruins"(1950), "The Salt Garden" (1955), "Mirrors and Windows" (1958).

foods, buildings and roads, are believed by Americans and are due partly to failure of the government to get involved with the African people until 1958.

Ward hopes that his program shall refute these false images and ideas, and that people shall instead start to realize that the African continent and people are most interested in developing themselves. His further aim is to insure that Americans do not once more totally fail to understand the desires and ways of a different poeple and that American involvement shall not turn into another international debacle.

Presently re-evaluating its programs, the Crossroads Africa organization is contacting ministers and national leaders in African countries to discover how they could best be assisted. They are receiving feed-back from the African people and are presently considering specific requests. The future holds more of the same youth work camps and additional services of doctors and nurses in battling health problems.

Several Syracuse students who participated in Crossroads programs in Africa last summer remarked about their experiences. Barbara Lundquist, a first year graduate student, spent two months in Lagos, Nigeria.

She worked in the Nigerian National Health Education department and evaluated its use of communications media in educating the people. Leaving this specialized post she later worked in an old people's home, setting up activities for "depressing, desolate" old folks to get them "interested and enthused."

She lived in an apartment in Lagos and noted that many rural people came into the city to get jobs. "Abominable conditions" were evident throughout the country and clean-up schemes were slow.

Barbara related how the native Nigerians knew very little about America and Americans but were always willing to entertain and please their American guests. The educated class was most inquisitive but the majority of the pelple are ignorant and have little idea of the racial tensions in the United States.

In contrast, the people are aware of the racial tragedies of apartheid South Africa and Rhodesia.

Senior Dave Rubin spent last summer in Kenya in a spot "60 miles away from any city." His group of seven boys and seven girls worked with 150 twenty-year old Kenyans in building a science lab for a school. He lived in a large mud hut.

Apartheid

Apartheid in South Africa will be the subject of "South African Essays," a two-part film to be shown at 7:30 p.m. on Fri., Nov. 15 in Kittredge Auditorium. The film will be sponsored by members of the South African Student Body and the local branch of the Zimbabwe African People's Union.

The Union is an organization of refugee students from Rhodesia. The president of the local branch is Sikhanyiso D. Ndlov, a graduate student in public administration, who was jailed by the Ian Smith regime.

A one dollar admission will be charged for the movie to raise funds for the education of refugees.

growing importance of anti-submarine warfare offers you unmatched career opportunities at U. S. Navy Underwater Sound Laboratory in picturesque New London, Connecticut

WEDNESDAY, NOV 20

You are sure to grow professionally if you join the Systems, the Research, or the Engineering Department of the U. S. Navy Underwater Sound Laboratory. The Laboratory has well-defined research and development activities in undersea warfare, a field that is important today and will become increasingly important in the years ahead. At the Laboratory you will work in areas such as complete sonar detection, attack and communications systems for submarine forces; anti-submarine detection systems for surface craft; sonar ocean surveillance systems for defense against enemy submersibles; submarine radio communication systems; optical communication systems; and underwater acoustics research. You will actually test ASW systems at sea, use deep-diving vehicles, take part in fleet maneuvers for analysis of problems in operational systems, have access to the finest equipment and instrumentation.

Starting salaries from $7,456 to $14,204 for Electronic and Mechanical Engineers and Physicists; from $7,265 to $14,204 for Mathematicians.

The Laboratory's graduate program provides part-time educational opportunities related to the employee's assignment and the Laboratory's mission. The Laboratory pays tuition and provides 50% of required instruction and travel time during the regular work day for participants attending neighboring educational institutions.

The Laboratory is located in the heart of the most historic section of New England with excellent schools, unsurpassed summer and winter recreational facilities. Career Civil Service benefits include liberal vacations, regular salary increases.

The 'News'

The abrasive Home Town News attempts to sidestep white norms and speak to the black community. According to editor Chris Powell, the message is, "Black people, learn to love black people."

Home Town News editor . . .

But what Powell is really addressing himself to is an "unjust society" and the "unequal application of laws." His disdain for the rules of journalism of the white press is a function of his disdain for society. He argues that the white man's laws are only beneficial to the whiteman. Rules and laws, he says, are made by the white man and for the white man, not the black man. The black man in America has never been allowed to self-impose his own laws. Rather the white man imposes certain laws, often for the benefit of the white majority.

Thus Powell believes the purpose of the black press is to expound revolution and eradicate an unjust society. He classifies the so-called Negro Press (Ebony, Jet etc.) as the Sambo Press, for it caters to the white man, white attitudes. The black press, on the other hand, express the anguish and aspiration of black people as black people. It does not seek to transform black people into Negroes or into "white-thinking blacks."

Accordingly, Home Town News reflects the mistrust, hate and disgust of black people, especially the black youths, who are more than impatient with the system. But the Home Town News embodies more than vituperative sallies against the system. It seeks to envelope the suffering and energy of the black community, to develop black pride and black unity. The publication tries to meet the urgent need to arrest the debilitating psychosis of self-hate. The message of Home Town News is "Black People have to learn to love black people."

Powell's publication operates autonomously of white controlling interest and support. His pages are open to all black businesses; but if a white business firm wishes to extend its marketing power in the black community through Hometown News, it must go to the Home Town News. The paper does not go to them. For Powell this autonomy of the white structure demonstrates black self-determination, Black Power.

When asked what was the major problem confronting Home Town News, Chris, recalling several threats upon his life, simply replied, "Genocide." A paper like the Home Town News is not really welcomed in a city like Syracuse.

Navy team to be at full strength

With the medical go-ahead on fullback Tom Daley (right), the Naval Academy team will be intact for its seventh meeting with Syracuse Saturday in Archbold Stadium.

Daley, a senior from Milwaukee, suffered injuries to his rib cage in the Middies' 35-15 triumph over Georgia Tech. The doctors said, however, that the ribs were bruised, and not fractured.

Daley will probably start at fullback for the Navy, joining quarterback Mike McNallen, a sophomore, tailback Dan Pike, a junior, and flanker Karl Schwelm in the backfield.

Navy's defensive standout is Emerson Carr (left above), who is the starter at middle guard. He is listed at 238 lbs., but looks a lot heavier, according to SU's Joe Szombathy. If he did not have his naval commitment, he would be a definite pro prospect.

Annapolis somehow escaped the snow this week, although they did have to work inside Tuesday because of rain. Syracuse, of course, has been forced into Manley Field House for the duration of the week, if not the season, by the snowstorm.

Archbold is currently being dug out but game conditions on Saturday will be poor, which should aide the Artic-trained Orange.

Bob Bancroft backing line from both sides now

By MIKE WEBER

Whether operating from his weak side linebacker position or doing a running commentary of SU football films for fellow Sadler Hall residents, Bob Bancroft shapes up as a cut above the crowd.

Bancroft, who hails from North Abbington, Mass., has been a mainstay in the SU defensive alignment for the past season and a half. Last season, as a strong side linebacker, and this year moving to the weak side, Bancroft has seen a lot of action.

"Last year, I started cold," comments Bancroft. "That is, I hadn't played much linebacker as a freshman, since I came up here as a fullback. So, I was in there, learning while playing."

Bancroft says the switch he has made this year was quite a challenge.

"Last year, as a strong side linebacker, I lined up to the side of the flanker. I was really a helper-man, aiding the halfback and safety on my side. Now, I line up on the weak side, away from the flanker. That means I often have to cover a back one on one."

He feels that strong side linebacker was the place to learn, because of reduced responsibility.

"Every mistake I made last year could be covered up by someone else on my side. Now, if I make a mistake, it could mean a touchdown."

When asked to compare team attitude before and after the California fiasco, Bancroft replied emphatically, "This is the same ball club. You can't make the mistakes we made against California and win. We know that. Very simply, we were embarassed.

"Now we are ready to move again," continued Bancroft. "Our defensive line has been great the last two games. That helps me and the other linebackers so much. Jerry Beach and Ray White have been doing a fantastic job. Not only have they been cutting down interference, but they've made the tackles as well. The whole line has been great."

Bancroft also commented on his own improvement.

"I'm now able to pick up and read plays better. I am able to go with the flow now that I can recognize what is developing. I used to waste a lot of steps, but lately, I've been correcting that. However, in the William and Mary game, I must admit I regressed somewhat."

One other question concerning the SU defense has been the absence of Tom Hermanowski, out with an injured leg. Bancroft credited the play of Gary Bletsch and Duane Walker with filling the void.

"To tell you the truth, I haven't noticed that either one has been in there," admits Bancroft, "and that's great cause it means they've been doing their job. They haven't made any big mistakes while filling in. Now they're starting to talk to the linebackers, which really helps on diagnosing plays."

One quite touchy point which has plagued the SU team lately has been the booing of quarterback Rich Panczyszyn.

"The people just can't be thinking," Bancroft says, "Booing like that eats up a person and really upsets the whole team. This year, I really thought the students were behind us all the way. After hearing them boo like that, you kind of wonder."

"I wish they would stop and think what it's doing to Rich," he continued. "He never admits it but you can tell. He's not playing as well or as much as he hoped, and that alone is enough. Football is half his life. When he hears his own fans boo him, what's he supposed to think? I wish the pelple would put themselves in his shoes. He doesn't deserve it. It really upsets the whole team."

"I really enjoy it. At first, I was leery. I didn't know how to go about it. But, now, it's fun. I love football and it's great to see the students enjoying it too. I want to share my interests with anyone who wants them," he explains.

"We'll have to stop their running game. Dan Pike has really developed into a fine back and a pass catcher. But, if our line can stop their running, I think we'll do all right."

Sports Editor's mailbox

Gil Gillespie's poem is not complete. He wisely does not continue to express the true spirit and essence of the Olympics. When one understands the spirit of the Olympics, then one can understand why Tommie Smith was punished.

Athletes from all over the world get together every four years to compete in many fields of athletic, not political, endeavor. Sportsmanship and athletic excellence are stressed. There is no place for political protest at the Olympics, no matter how valid such a protest may be.

The International Olympic Committee demanded that the United States Olympic Committee punish Tommie Smith and John Carlos. The fact that Negroes in America are not first-class citizens is irrelevant. The fact that they used the Olympics to protest is relevant. This is what the IOC was concerned about. We can never allow politics to play a role at the Olympics. Think of what could happen in 1972. The Olympics could turn into a political forum for all sides. There are enough political problems in this world without turning the Olympics into one.

Gillespie also states that the American flag stands for so little. But remember Mr. Gillespie, after realizing what the Russian, East German, and Cuban flags stand for, George Foreman disagrees with you.

Chickens try again

DO will face team of Pros

Football madness is about to descend upon Tolley-Town once again. The fabulous Daily Orange Chickens, the pride and joy of Central New York football fans, will take on the highly touted Promethean Piggys tomorrow at 3:15 p.m. at the Women's Building.

The Chickens, looking to recover from their stinging 19-12 opening loss to WAER's Wolves will open with basically their same lineup.

They will again rely on the aerial wizardry of Ham Biggar, the receiving of Ed "Hands" Agranowitz and the savage blocking of mild-mannered Mike Weber.

Leading the Piggy attack will be stocky mentor Bruce Chadwich, onetime Sports Editor of the SO. When it was made public that the DO-Pro clash would take place, scores of Syracuse varsity athletes volunteered to play for the Chickens, in an effort to get a shot at Chadwick.

In his days with the DO, Chadwick was known to arouse controversy at times, and also take several good-natured literary swipes at Orange ballplayers. "I'd give up a year of eligibility to play against him," says one SU gridder. "My pleasure would know no bounds if I were give n the opportunity to render him unconcious," remarks another.

"We'll stick to what's been working for us," says Biggar, quarterback of the Chickens, "but we're not going to take the Piggys lightly. Chadwick has survived a couple of lynch attempts by SU athletes, and they're going to be tough."

Newly appointed Chicken assistant coach Agranowitz offers another possible problem for his squad. "Ira Silverman has done some work for the Pro, and his eligibility is up in the air," says Agranowitz. "If he should chose to play for the Piggys, it would hurt us considerably -- he's the best damn waterboy we have."

It is no secret around the Chicken locker room that Silverman wants out. He was annoyed when the DO sports page listed him as 5 ft. 7 in., 200 lbs., last month, where in actuallity he is a svelte 5 ft. 7 in., 194 pounder.

"Who needs the aggravation?" asks Silverman. "I'll publicly announce my decision 10 minutes before game time."

As usual, the proceeds from the game will go to the University Union Building Fund. If the weather is favorable, the famous Marching Chickens will perform at halftime. The Marching Chickens, generally acknowledged as the finest band east of Watertown and south of Mattydale, combine musical pageantry and precision choreography.

Student discount tickets will be available at the gate. The first 3,000 fans will be admitted free of charge.

If the current weather holds, the game will be rescheduled for the Orange Bowl on Jan. 1.

Building bridges Between generations

The book "Democracy and the Student Left" by ex-diplomat George Kennan is essentially about the generation gap. It is a reprint of the article "Rebels without a Program" that appeared in the Sunday New York times magazine, the student response to that article, and Kennan's answer to the students. In short it is a dialogue between a sixty-four year old member of the Establishment and the radical college students.

Kennan views these students as preoccupied with the affairs of the passing world. They are obsessed with the ills of society and intent on correcting them, filled with intolerance and ready to employ violence.

Their intolerance is a manifestation of their self-rightous confidence they shall perfect mankind -- tomorrow.

This is their major error, according to Kennan, who blames the ills of society upon "the weakness and imperfection" of all human souls.

Furthermore, their confidence in there own morality leads to total permissiveness and the belief that all restraints should be lifted from mankind. This view, Kennan says, threatens the basic order that holds society together and allows people to live together.

The student response to these views was neither extreme, totally emotional, nor intolerant. Most were reasoned arguments trying to show the shortcomings of Kennan's attack.

Many said the detached, Ivory Tower university didn't exist. Even if it did, the draft and questions of life and death were pressing upon students without time for careful analysis or detached examination.

Instead the university was a cohort of the power structure, the establishment that functions beyond the reach of democratic processes. The students were cynical about the establishment because they claimed that it had pushed them around for years. "The Viet-Nam situation has...gone on so long that we are the first generation in history that is able to view itself as sausages endlessly being fed into a meat grinder."

In addition there is an undercurrent of fear. The commandment "You can't trust anyone over thirty" indicates the system corrupts those who have been exposed to it long enough.

We wonder, fellow students, if these are the battle lines of the generation gap. Where do you stand?

Realizations

By Paul Finkelman

With Hubert Humphrey's defeat the Democratic Party must examine itself from within and prepare itself for future elections by developing new ideals, new goals, a new party structure and most importantly, new leadership. It must thoroughly review and analyze the last election in order to understand why Humphrey was unable to carry the "old-co-alition" as well as the independent votes, when nationally, Democratic candidates other than Humphrey did well.

Firstly the Democratic Party must realize that it can never have a repetition of Chicago. Although bossism may never be totally removed from American politics, it should never be allowed to openly control a city and a convention, as it did in Chicago. The Chicago convention, more than any other single event, is responsible for Humphrey's defeat. If the Democratic party is to regain the White House in 1972 it must totally purge Mayor Daley and others like him. It must also be prepared to repudiate the convention, especially since the American people have already done so.

Secondly, the party must realize that the "old co-alition" that FDR forged is no longer viable. The Party should begin to rely on Southern progressives, not Southern conservatives, who have apparently become American Independents or Republicans. In the North the Party must stop taking Black votes for granted. While it is doubtful that Humphrey could have carried the deep South, his failure in the Northern Industrial states like Illinois and Ohio might well be due to a lack of interest on the part of Black voters. The Party must therefor give Blacks a bigger share of the pie, which means more Black convention delegates, and more Black candidates. It is absurd that there is only one Black Senator in this country, and he is a member of the "conservative" Republican Party.

The Party must also find a new way to pick its leaders. The present Convention system is an anachronism that must be eliminated. Future convention delegates should be picked in primaries so that the power in the party rests with its members and not with a small group of bosses.

The new leaders of the Party must not be apologists for the incompetence of past leaders. In the primaries the party regulars warned the bosses that they and the nation did not want Hubert or Lyndon this year. But the party bosses ignored the results of the primaries and Hubert went down to defeat, while anti-administration Democrats won across the nation. The new Party leadership must not come from men like Hubert Humphrey, John Burns, Lyndon Johnson and Hale Boggs, but from men like Harold Hughes, Allard Lowenstein, Ralph Yarborough, and J. William Fulbright.

The new Party must be led by vibrant, young, progressive men who can forget the past. Its economics must not be from Keynes, but from Myrdol. Its enemy must not be World Communism, but American Racism. Its leaders must not be old bosses, but young progressives. Its source of inspiration must not be FDR and the New Deal, but Gene McCarthy and New Politics. Its goals must not be economic recovery and stability, but economic equality and social revolution.

Paul Finkelman

Letters to the editor

Reason for no program

To the Editor:

As a member of the egotistic, publicity-seeking, New Left, I would like to respond to the editorial and letter in Thursday's DO. You accuse us of having no program, but even our mere beginning of a method of transforming America into a reasonably healthy place is far superior to the rehased liberal programs that the DO and the U.S. establishment have come up with. The old policies do not attack the basis of the power of the corporate-governmental elite which makes the basic policies of this country; without attacking that basic power, the realities of racism, authoritarianism, and imperialism in this country will not be changed.

As long as we in SDS don't have a detailed program, the establishment press will call us infantile anarchists; should we decide that a detailed program is necessary, and draw one up, you will call us dogmatic communists. We lose your game whichever way we play, so we'll design our own game. You won't scare us into your liberal embrace with threats of George Wallace. We're going to keep on with the struggle.

Up against the wall, perennial moderates.

Town meeting

To the Editor:

We would like to call to the attention of the Styacuse University community the fact that on Monday evening, November 18, 1968, at the War Memorial, a 'town meeting' called by County Executive Mulroy, and by the Committee of Social Welfare Services of the County legislature, will be held concerning the vital issue of the present welfare system. The alleged purpose of the 'town meeting' is to hear the pros and cons of the present system. We have reason to believe, considering the conservative nature and complexion of the community, that the direction the hearing will take will be an open attack on the existence of the welfare system as it now stands. This system is blatantly in need of reform; however, the fact remains that reform, though vital, is not imminent, and that what is essentially at stake in this particular hearing is the authorization of a forewarned deficity, amounting to approximately $300,000, which may necessitate the welfare recipients of Onondaga County being deprived of food and rent for the month of December.

This tragedy must be avoided, and one way of forestalling this event would be for as many of us as possible to appear and voice our opinions pertaining to the current deficity, a possible state takeover of welfare costs, a guaranteed minimum income, and any other issues we felt relevant.

Can we allow this group to dictate, by default, the policies which will cause severe hardship and deprivation for thousands of people who will be without food and rent if we don't speak out?

Balancing the budget does indeed save money, and is no doubt commendable in an abstract sense, but how justifiable is this compared to the anguish and loss of dignity which would result if it were implemented?

Senate investigation

To the Editor:

Recently one member of the Student Senate decided to investigate and clean up the two campus political parties. While I feel that good parties are necessary if we are to have a representative student government, I do not feel that the action taken by the Senate committee and its chairman has been in the best interest of the Syracuse students. It appears to me that the chairman is either terribly naive or trying to get his name in the paper - so I will not use it.

One reason given for reorganizing the parties was to give independent students a fair say in the choosing of candidates.

I would suggest to independents that they unite and work together with the Greeks to improve Syracuse University and not pressure the Greek dominated parties to pretend that they are not Greek. Come on Fred! improve what is really wrong with the parties, whatever that is.

Sincerely,
Robert P. Kelly

Personal foul? WHAT personal foul!?!

SDS 1968 theme: campus take-over

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

Mark Rudd, the militant head of Columbia University's Students for a Democratic Society, will be on the SU campus Tuesday.

Rudd, who was suspended last year during the Columbia disorder, is a leader of SDS's apparent 1968 theme: campus take-over. He spurred the explosive take-over of buildings at Columbia last spring, paralyzing that university for five weeks.

However, Rudd, who is being sponsored by SU's chapter of SDS at 8 p.m. in 307 Hall of Languages, does not confine his protest to the university.

He and other SDS adherents consider the protest to have wide political and social implications, and last spring at Columbia often sought to broaden the demonstrations to embrace Columbia's surrounding community. In fact, in an October 1967 "Position Paper on Strategy for the Rest of Year," the details (but not the principles) of which were later scrapped, Rudd listed two basic goals:

1. The "radicalization" of students, showing people the connection in the liberal structure, showing them how our lives really are unfree in this society (and at Columbia), getting them to act in their own interest; and

2. Striking a blow at the Federal government's war effort ("resistance").

"The two goals," he said, "are intimately connected in a theory-practice relationship with the university and will become conscious of their own interests and needs and the way the university acts against them, corrupting and distorting education in a bewildering variety of forms (paternialism, complicity with the war, career orientation, pedantry, bureacracy)."

Rudd's immediate goal in October 1967 was to end university complicity with the war, forcing ties with the Institute for Defense Analyses, NROTC, CIA, recruiting and other contracts to be severed.

By April 1968, however, termination of the Morningside Gym construction had become another motivation for immediate action.

The disruption that followed caused an estimated $300,000 in damage and led to a general student strike, the end of the gym construction and the arrest of 720 people--including Rudd, on charges of riot, inciting to riot, criminal trespass and criminal solictiation.

Rudd has said a radical is one who "doesn't accept that war or slums have to exist." His commitment to direct and militant action is illustrated by a letter to former Columbia president Grayson Kirk:

SDS's Bob Tomposky is confronted by "dissenting" students. SDS is sponsoring Mark Rudd here Tuesday night.

"If we win, we will take control of your world, your corporation, your university and attempt to mold a world in which we and other people can live as human beings. Your power is directly threatened, since we will have to destroy that power before we take over."

A newsreel of the Columbia strike will precede Rudd's appearance, according to Bob Tomposky.

Planned for February

Kimmel project makes union a reality

By TRISH MURRAY

If construction by the physical plant department continues on schedule, SU will have its long-awaited student union by February.

Work began this week on University Union's Kimmel Project, a $150,000 temporary union facility located in the basement of Kimmel Dining Hall.

Blueprints for the area show a snack bar, a meeting room, three offices and a bar, which will serve only beer. Student suggestions from the 1966 Future Union Building Survey were incorporated in the plans.

The firm of King and King Architects designed the facilities, with assistance from students Ray Cooke and Larry Fung.

The center will include movable panels and a portable stage to alter areas for various functions. Concession rights have not yet been determined, but the facilities may be student operated.

The Kimmel project is flexible enough in its design to adapt to students' needs while serving as a test of what facilities are necessary for a permanent structure.

University Union had been searching for a location for some time when Jim G. Carleton, dean of student services, offered several available areas last spring. Kimmel was chosen because it requires a minimum of construction, is near the quad, and is central to several large dorms, Greek houses and cottages. It is also more than 200 feet from an academic building, so alcoholic beverages may be served.

Kimmel will not be Syracuse's first temporary union. In 1937, the Club Sahara, a "dry" night club, opened in the basement of Slocum. It was converted to a university eating area during World War II, because of the shortage of men on campus.

The nurses' recreation club on South Crouse was used briefly in 1946, and the next year a more elaborate union and diner opened in the renovated Pi Alpha Chi house at 405 University Place. This "permanent" union was razed in 1952, after plans for Watson Dormitory were announced.

Since that time, UU activities have been conducted in various locations: movies in Kittredge and Gifford, bull sessions in the Colonial Room, the Place in Machinery Hall and empty cottages, meetings in Chapel House, and dances and mixers in whatever space was available. Union will be able to bring its scattered programs under one roof in Kimmel.

Kimmel Project Director Ira Kurzbaum believes that a temporary student union will provide valuable experience both for University Union and for the university community.

"Kimmel is a pilot project," Jurzbaum emphasized. "We're still working for a permanent student union building, and at Kimmel we can experiment with planning and management ideas to be used in that building."

More importantly, UU hopes that Kimmel will give students a place of their own, where they can go between classes and relax without being pressured to buy food.

Kimmel will also provide a sorely-needed meeting place where HBC hangers can mingle (if they want to) with the Chapel Steps and Physics Building Breezeway crowds.

"We have 4,100 square feet, about the size of Kimmel Dining Hall. There will be room for movies, small concerts and lectures," Kurzbaum said, "and other organizations will be encouraged to use the Kimmel facilities. We want this to be a place where students can meet faculty members informally. That's the whole idea of Union--to bring everyone together."

Perlman to receive Salzberg medal here

Nine former recipients, including U.S. Secretary of Transportation Alan S. Boyd, will attend the 20th annual Syracuse Transportation Conference and the Harry E. Salzberg Memorial Lecture on Monday (Nov. 18). The all-day event will be climaxed by the award of the Salzberg Medal to Alfred E. Perlman, president of Penn Central, for outstanding contribution to the field of transportation.

Perlman will deliver the Salzberg Lecture as part of the evening program which begins with dinner at 7 p.m. in the Hotel Syracuse. All events will be held in the Hotel Syracuse. Perlman's topic is "The Regulatory Gap."

John W. Barriger, president of the Missouri-Kansas-Texas Railroad, will be the main speaker at the luncheon session scheduled for noon. Don Armstrong, president of the Transportation Club of Syracuse, will preside at the luncheon.

Eight of nine earlier Salzberg Medal winners will deliver papers during the conference. A ninth, Secretary Boyd, will attend the dinner and lecture.

'Me and DellPlain'

Senate committee investigates campus politics

"It had to do with me and DellPlain."

Testifying before the Senate Committee on Political Equity (SCOPE), last night Dick Oster, president of the Greek Independence Alliance (GIA), explained the allotment of dormitory funds for political parties.

Ten percent of a dorm's monetary allocation may be used to support a political party, according to standing rule. Last year $120 of DellPlain's $1,000 allocation was legally used for the support of GIA, according to Oster.

"It's just a stupid word called tradition."

Oster went on to describe the GIA process of balancing a party ticket according to race, religion, and sex.

Gilda Harris, a Negro, was generally accepted as GIA nominee for SG Vice-President last spring. But when Charles Hicks bolted the Campus Alliance Party (CAP) after being defeated as nominee for SG President and was nominated for the office by GIA instead, Miss Harris withdrew her name from nomination becuase her previously recognized qualifications were not as important as not having two Negroes on a ticket.

Opening discussion on the party system, Charles Babcock, editor of the Daily Orange, noted, "It obviously hasn't worked well."

"Even if you had a perfect election, you've got lack of interest among students and lack of support on the part of the administration. I don't think mechanics have a great deal to do with it."

Student Government is " a machine without a purpose." It "really doesn't have a role to fulfill."

"Purpose" presently consists of Greek house aspirations towards "coveted" titles. But "you've got to drag the independents into it" by "giving the government a purpose that relates to the independent," according to Babcock.

Babcock suggested using part of the student fee as campaign funds for any student wishing to run for an office. "You have to try to draw different factions and people into the election process, try to remove petty corruptions, and improve the system by making it as democratic as possible."

The more parties there are, the better."

Professor to display 12 oil paintings here

Dr. Giuseppe M.F. diRoccaferrera, professor in the SU College of Business Administration, will exhibit 12 of his oil paintings of 16th and 17th century musical instruments on Sunday, Nov. 17 in the Crouse College lobby. The exhibition is to coincide with a 4 p.m. concert by England's eight-member Elizabethan Consort of Viols, a group of vocal and instrumental performers.

In the diRoccaferrera paintings to be shown, a clavichord made in 1503, a viol da gamba made in 1590, mandolins, violins and lutes are shown in arrangements with other appropriate antique objects such as glassware, candlesticks and books. Most of the highly detailed paintings show a single piece of fruit which diRoccaferrera calls "a sort of artist's signature."

For each of his works diRoccaferrera has written a historical description of the objects that appear in it. His extensive study of antique instruments was recognized by Combs College of Music in Philadelphia in 1965 when it conferred on him an honorary degree of Doctor of Music.

diRoccaferrera has done about 40 paintings featuring antique instruments in several museums and at La Scala in Milan. His work has been shown in Turin and Milan, Italy, and in Gainesville, Fla., New York and Philadelphia. Educational television programs shown in Florida, Georgia, Tennessee and New York have used the paintings to illustrate programs about musical instruments.

diRoccaferrera is professor of Operations Research in the Quantitative methods department of the Syracuse University College of Business Administration. Before he came to Syracuse University in 1965 he taught at Turin University in Italy, New York University, the University of Florida and Wharton Graduate School of the University of Pennsylvania. He is the author of several books in his field.

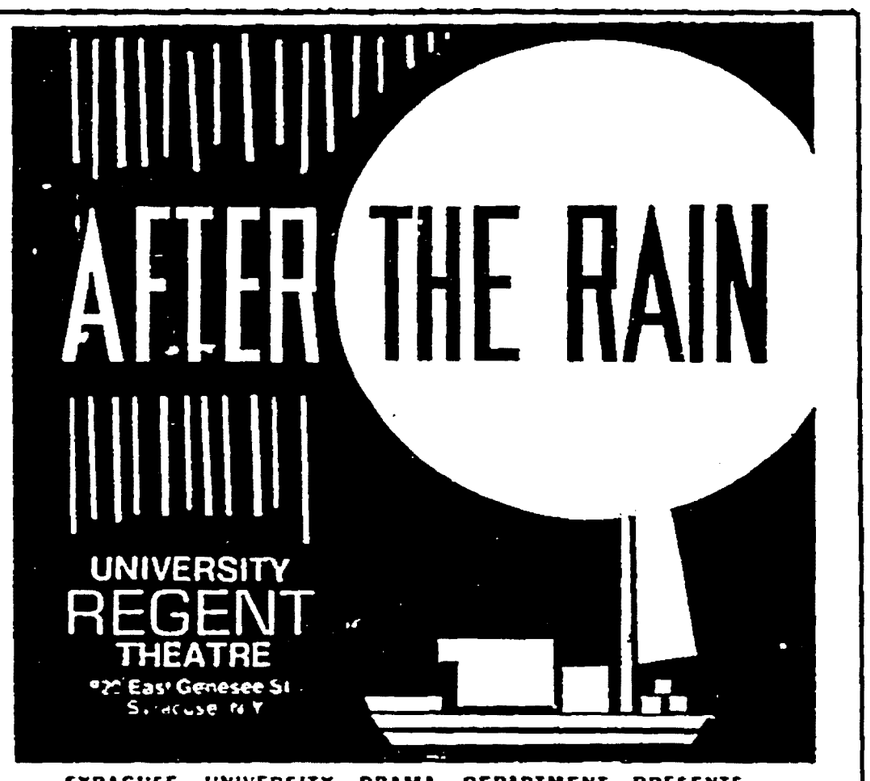
Contact lenses can be heaven . . . or hell. They may be a wonder of modern science but just the slightest bit of dirt under the lens can make them unbearable. In order to keep your contact lenses as comfortable and convenient as they were designed to be, you have to take care of them.

Until now you needed two or more separate solutions to properly prepare and maintain your contacts. You would think that caring for contacts should be as convenient as wearing them. It can be with Lensine.



Lensine is the one lens solution for complete contact lens care. Just a drop or two, before you insert your lens, coats and lubricates it allowing the lens to float more freely in the eye's fluids. That's because Lensine is an "isotonic" solution, which means that it blends with the natural fluids of the eye.

Cleaning your contacts with Lensine retards the buildup of foreign deposits on the lenses. And soaking your contacts in Lensine between wearing periods assures you of proper lens hygiene. You get a free soaking case on the bottom of every bottle of Lensine.

It has been demonstrated that improper storage between wearings may result in the growth of bacteria on the lenses. This is a sure cause of eye irritation and in some cases can endanger your vision. Bacteria cannot grow in Lensine which is sterile, self-sanitizing, and antiseptic.

Let your contacts be the convenience they were meant to be. Get some Lensine, from the Murine Company, Inc.

Fighting Apartheid

Party head seeks majority in Rhodesia

By RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

Human rights and dignity: for some, these are inherent in their status as citizens; for the four million Africans under the regime of Rhodesian Premier Ian Smith they are agonizing by their absence.

Sikhanyiso Ndlovu is a soft-spoken Rhodesian graduate student, Chairman of the student branch of the Zimbabwe African People's Union (ZAPU). It is the purpose of this party to gain African majority rule of a government completely dominated by the nation's quarter million white people.

He is cheerful, animated, with his speech unmarred by bitterness towards the government that imprisoned him for seven months, and which carries out Apartheid policies towards the people for whose rights he is working.

In an interview yesterday, he explained some of the aims of ZAPU as well as its history and organization.

Essentially, students such as Ndlovu are attempting to inform Americans of their nationalist movement while attending universities here. One of their roles is "unofficial diplomacy" in order to influence American foreign policy in their favor, according to Ndlovu.

He explained that ZAPU is the "oldest movement in the nation's political history" and that because the party has been banned by white regimes, it has had to keep changing its name over a period of years.

Members of ZAPU refer to their country as Zimbabwe, which is its original name prior to British colonization. It is their contention that this name should be restored.

Like most African nationalists, Ndlovu contests the original right of the British to colonize in his country, and feels that "by the very nature of their being foreign" their claim to power was illegitimate, as is that of the present regime. "We want to rule our country."

"We want immediate African majority rule on the basis of one man, one vote," he continued. The fifteen black representatives in the Parliament are, in Ndlovu's words, "puppets—window-dressing to show that Africans are participating." The black people may vote only for certain candidates placed by the government.

Ndlovu emphasized his party's neutrality towards both Cold War blocks. "The policy of the party is non-aligned, we will receive assistance from all. Even if the devil helps us, we will take it," he laughed.

The element of nationalism is strong here, seemingly the dominant emotion. "If we send students to the USSR or to America to study, we go as Africans," he said. "We are African in thinking and in government. We believe in learning—and synthesizing in our own way what we have learned."

It is one of Ndlovu's tasks to try to find ways of bringing Rhodesian students to America to study. Scholarships are currently difficult to obtain from the U. S. government.

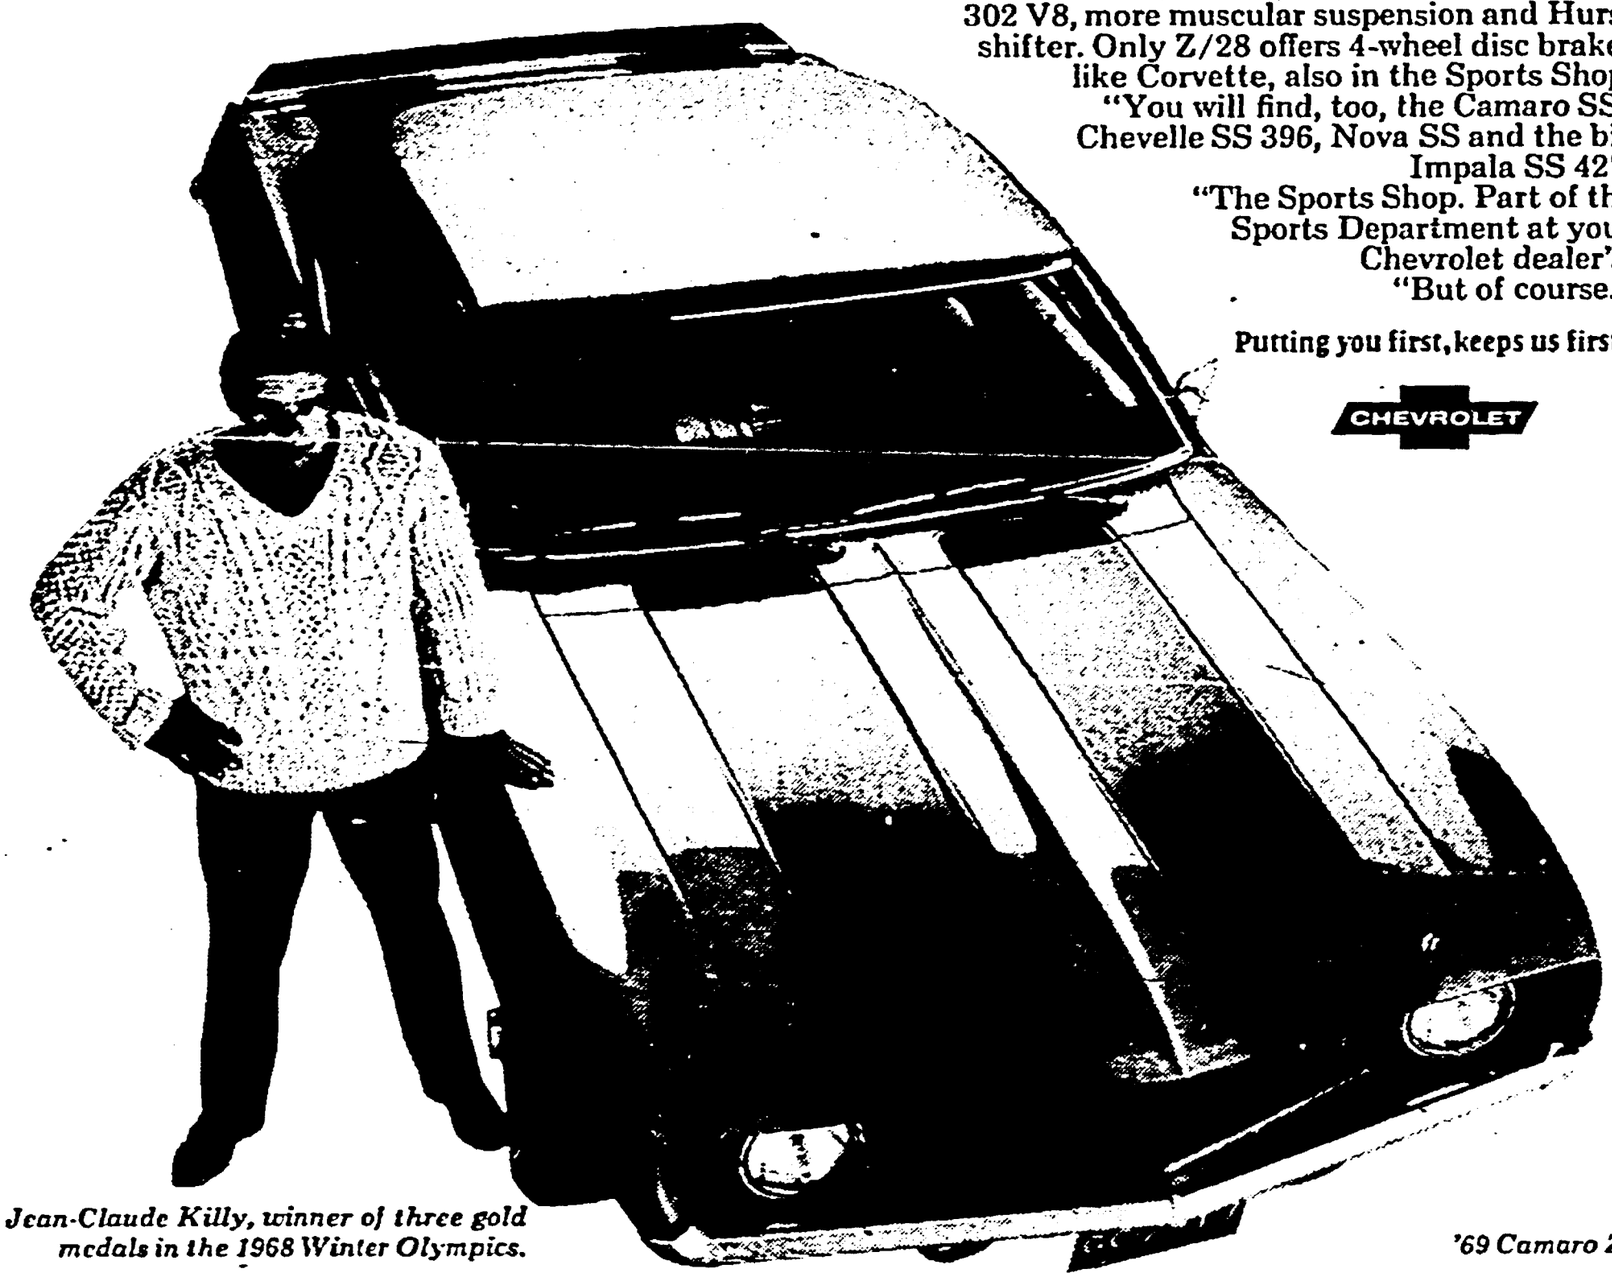
Ndlovu and other members of his party contend that it is an "impossibility to take over the country by constitutional means." What then, are they going to do to achieve their end?

"It is not what we are going to do; it is what we are doing," he smiled, gesturing to emphasize his point. "We are having an armed revolutionary struggle." It is his belief that his party "does not want soldiers" but urgently wants U.S. support materially and morally in its struggle.

Ndlovu explained that "some whites are supporting the African cause in Rhodesia, but they are not courageous, like the caliber of nationalists who is prepared to sacrifice to attain goals," he said.

"When we take over the government," he said, "there will be no reprisals against the white people. They will be free to compete in a democratic system, but not to perpetrate racism. "We cannot say that the white people are not racists," he said. "This government would not be in power if they were not racists."

Ndlovu himself has felt the reprisals of his participation in ZAPU. In 1964, he was jailed without a trial for suspicion of political activity. After one month in prison, he was sent to a concentration camp for six months.



In August of 1968, Ndlovu addressed a committee of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights on the treatment of political prisoners within the

In the speech, he said that it was "a displeasure for me to come and testify to your UN committee about the prison and concentration camp conditions...in Rhodesia. We are not seeking better prison and concentration camp conditions; we want an immediate African majority rule government which shall reverse all the racists.

Nixon progeny uphold adults' misconstrued image of youth

In the Presidential campaign this year Richard Nixon used the presence of his two daughters, Tricia and Julie, and his future son-in-law, David Eisenhower, with great effect. They were particularly effective in a time when students and young people in general seem to be tending toward a semi-hippie way of life, with long hair and beards, with disrespect for the establishment and military service, with sexual mores different than those of the older generation, with entirely different attitudes toward the "American way of life." These three young people, so closely associated with the Nixon camp, garnered the respect of many Americans primarily because, first, it gave them faith again that all American youth weren't "bad," and, second, they hoped that these young people in the White House would set an example for all American youth to follow.

There are, however, some problems now that this image has become somewhat instituted as a result of the Nixon victory. The first problem is that the Nixon threesome (inclusing David) are not really typical of American youth and thus present a deceptive impression to hopeful parents. While the majority of American students are not hippies, they do resent and object to the establishment, the war effort, and the draft. The majority does protest (whether against the war or against bad food and antiquated regulations in dormitories), the majority also goes out and gets plastered on occasion, the vast majority has sexual experience before marriage, a very large number try drugs at least once.

Yet all of this does not coincide with the image that parents often have of their children, an image that will now seemingly have reinforcement from the White House.

Aside from the fact that the image does not coincide with the reality of American youth, there is a question of whether or not this particular image should be a goal, whether it should be the one for students to aim for or toward which parents should guide their children. I would contend that it is not.

I can't think of any particular objections to Tricia, Julie, and David, and probably would never be comfortable in a "hippie" world, which might be considered as the other end of the spectrum. But it is also fairly obvious that the "hippie" end of the spectrum is where things are happening. It is among the long-haired and bearded set that much student creativity and originality finds its roots. It is at this end of the student spectrum that a very large proportion of change on our campuses and in our society has originated, change which the majority of students has accepted as being good. It is at this end of the spectrum that our customary American hypocrisy is beginning to get its long deserved repudiation.

Tricia, Julie, and David are nice kids. There are, however, a lot of other nice kids with new ideas, constructive things to do, great energy, and a sense of direction, but nice kids who live in an entirely different world and who cannot possibly fit into the image presented by the Nixons. And yet these others, a clear majority, in all likelihood will often be compared to the Nixons and not fare favorably in the minds of many older Americans.

Richard Nixon kids took to the campaign trail this fall. But their image may be unrepresentative.

Students' 'nation' to help in studying foreign culture

By COREY SANDLER

An attempted overthrow of the government of Starehe was crushed late Wednesday night, according to informed sources. President Martin Coneys staved off a threat to his regime by a coalition of dissident tribesmen, dissatisfied military leaders, and members of the opposition Radical People's Party (RPP) — thought to be aided in some manner by the Russians. The United States has reaffirmed it's support of the regular government of the fledgling African nation.

Hold it! Don't go running to your almanac to look up the location of Starehe. And don't bother your Congressman yet. It's all a game.

Starehe is a not-so-independent protectorate of Peter French, located at the East African Studies Building on Comstock Avenue. Starehe exists for a few hours every year as an exercise in understanding the workings of Non-Western culture.

Wednesday night, French and 25 members of his Political Science 370 course (Non-Western Government) met to re-activate the dormant country for a night. Students were assigned to various positions similar to those which might exist in a newly established country. They were given detailed "scenarios" explaining the role they were to assume.

The overthrow or continuance of the government, under the rules formulated by French and his wife, Grace, is determined by a complicated point system. Various factions within the country, such as the military, the majority and minority tribes, the RPP, and the president and his cabinet are given points. The objective of the opposition is to gain more than half of the points (through bargaining, deals and threats). The President, of course, tries to remain in power.

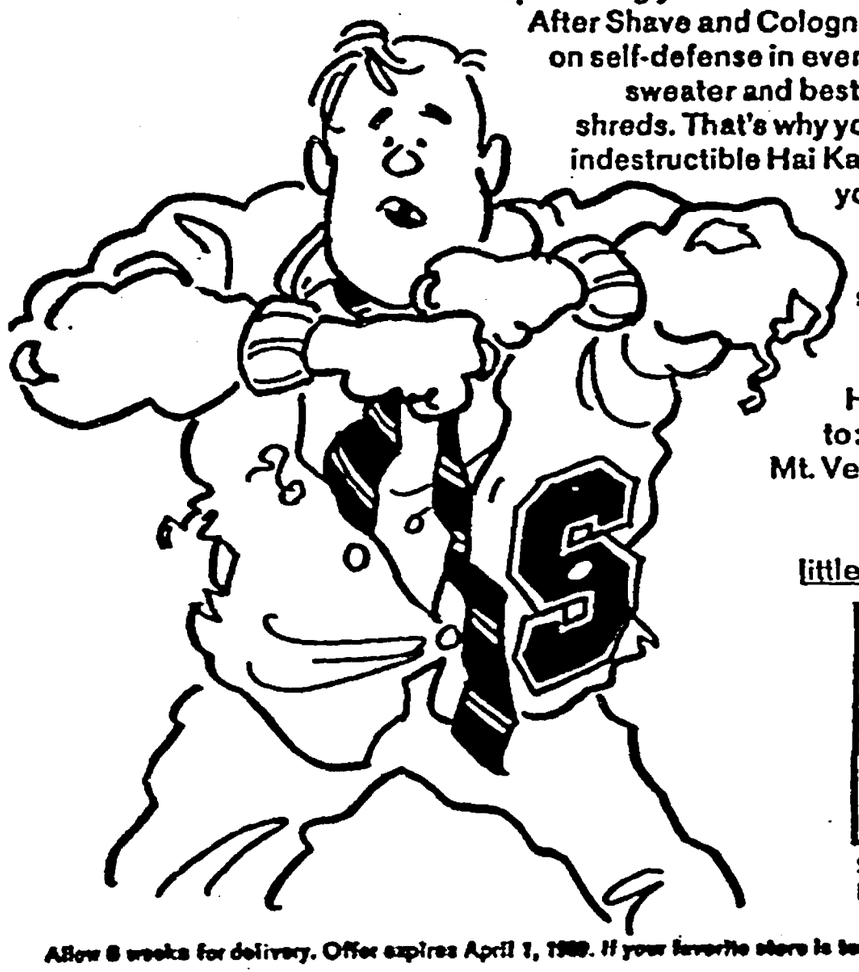
President Martin Coneys was cast as the "Father of the Country." Believing in democracy, he nevertheless was distrustful of the United States. The idea of socialism was appealing, but a trip to the Soviet Union had shown the mythical Chief Executive some fallacies of the system.

Leaders of the attempted take-over were the officers of the Radical People's Party, Kathy Fennelly and Harvey Schwartz. The group is described in the script as a "militantly socialist organization." The party is described as not Communist. It is, however, sufficiently radical as to be in a not-so-secret alliance with the Soviet Union (the RPP and the Russian Embassy shared the same office, and took turns tapping the President's phone calls on an extension phone).

Schwartz plunged completely into his role. He arrived dressed in an old Army fatigue shirt, combat boots, beret, a bullet on a string around his neck and an evil gleam in his eye. Schwartz and Miss Fennelly decorated their office with several cartridge belts and a surplus gas mask.

The attempted coup, seemingly assured of success, failed at the last minute when President Coneys called a private, close-door session with his Permanent Secretaries, who were all but set to turn against their boss. They emerged from the conference room pale and shaken, to cast the final, deciding votes in favor of the current administration. President Coneys had maintained his power.

The next few weeks will be spent in trying to make some sense out of this total confusion. Until then, perhaps a moral can be drawn for any potential revolutionaries. Starehe is a Swahili word meaning "Don't trouble yourself."



Loweth appointment

He has served as a public relations representative for the safety services division of the Onondaga Chapter of the American Red Cross and is a member of the United States Marine Corps Reserves.

Lower voting age gaining popularity

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

The chances that 18-year-olds will soon be granted the right to vote have increased remarkably over the last two years.

Many high political officials--including President Johnson, President-elect Richard Nixon, Vice President Humphrey and New York Gov. Rockefeller--have publicly endorsed such an act.

In the past, however, the suggestion has met stiff resistance, particularly on the state level. In New York, for example, proposals for reducing the voting age have been annually rejected for 16 years.

But, according to most public opinion polls, the majority of Americans now favor a lower voting age.

Since 1939, when 79 per cent opposed suffrage at 18, 19 or 20 years of age and only 17 per cent favored such franchise, the lower ages have gained rapid support. In August 1965, a majority of 57 per cent favored while 39 per cent opposed, and by April 1967, that number jumped to 64 per cent.

In addition, in a poll conducted last year on the SU campus, 63.9 per cent of the respondents favored a lower voting age, while 36.2 per cent wished to retain the 21-year requirement.

Arguments for 21

Historically, the 18-year-old's vote has been a wartime issue, and presently is strongly aligned to Vietnam. "Old enough to fight, old enough to vote," the slogan goes.

But, say those advocating the traditional voting age, such an argument is specious. Physical maturity, they say, is quite different from political and social maturity.

"To my mind," U.S. Rep. Emanuel Celler of the House Judicial Committee has said, "the draft age and the voting age are as different as chalk is from cheese. The thing called for in a soldier is uncritical obedience, and that is not what you want in a voter."

"The argument for lowering the voting age to 18 is 90 per cent emotionalism and political opportunism," a New York University professor of education has said.

"Eighteen to 21," said Celler in a Congressional speech, "are mainly formative years where youth is reaching forward to maturity. These are the years of the greatest uncertainties, a fertile ground for demagogues."

Eighteen-year-olds are also said to be unable to fulfill certain duties and responsiblities concomitant of citizenship, which the right to vote implies.

"Just to mention one," pointed out writer George W. Lyon in a recent magazine article, "the duty, none too pleasant, of serving on juries in both civil and criminal cases."

To mention another, a person under 21 cannot legally enter into a valid contract. In other words, say spokesmen for the older voting age, lowering the age would confer political rights and responsibilities upon minors--"persons not generally considered to be sufficiently mature to be held fully responsible for their actions," according to Doris W. Jones of the Library of Congress History and Government Division.

Nor do those in favor of retaining the 21-year voting age accept the spectacular rise in the nation's educational level as a valid argument. They contend that the responsible exercise of the franchise is not primarily a matter of academic training, but of judgment derived from experience.

The voting booth, conclude these spokesmen, should not be considered a training ground for citizenship.

Arguments under 21

Practical experience with an 18-year-old minimum in the United States is limited, but, conceded Miss Jones, that experience demonstrates that it can work satisfactorily.

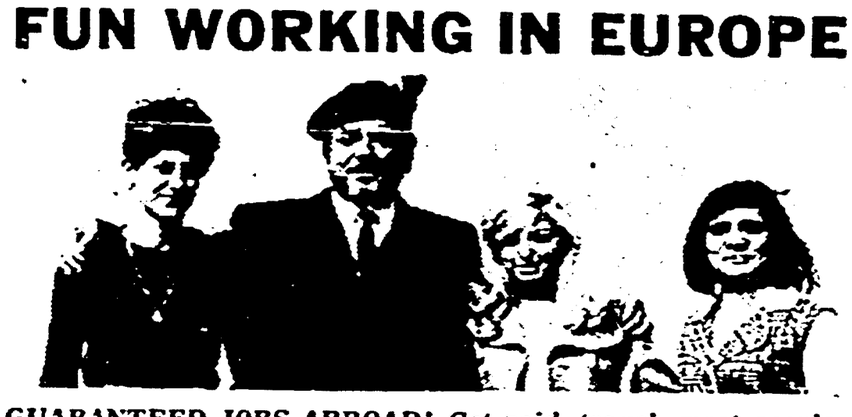
But in the years before 1966 and 1967, majority support for the 18-year-old vote was unorganized and, as a 1966 Moderator magazine article said, "often faint of heart."

And, said the article, "It is difficult for a politican to find a practical reason to really work to lower suffrage requirements. Young people pack little political power. They certainly have no organized economic power. The potential social power of youthful enthusiasm and honesty is a difficult intangible to translate into practical gains."

But, suddenly in 1968, these arguments appear obsolete. Youth's political power has been demonstrated repeatedly on the nation's campuses, and the "social power of youthful enthusiasm" lifted the campaigns of Eugene McCarthy and Robert Kennedy.

Strong in the 18-year-old voting age drive has been Dr. Alan K. Campbell, who will become dean of Maxwell in February. He has insisted that education has equipped young people with the ability to vote wisely.

"Education is described as unrelated to the 'real world,' " he said at the 1967 State Constitutional Convention. "But education is concentrated experience. It is the means by which each generation builds on the knowledge accumulated by those who have gone before."



Advocates of the lower voting age argue that those between 18 and 21 do in fact share the burdens of government. "They pay taxes," said Campbell, "they serve their country in the armed forces, the Peace Corps and Vista; they drive the nation's highways, their lives are regulated by literally thousands of statutes."

Backlash caused by recent campus disturbances has perhaps hurt the chances for an 18-year-old vote. But, said Campbell, "The young are not championing communism or any other ideology.

"Rather than reject their requests, we should welcome them into the body politic and inquire how we can do what they ask rather than say no because of who is making the request."

Concert Group to offer changes

By MELODY HOWARD

"The formation of an All University Concert Committee is a step towards centralization and sophistication in concert planning at Syracuse," according to committee chairman Joe Nicoletti. A former University union concert chairman, Nicoletti submitted a proposal to affect just such a move to the Social Committee last April, but it was tabled, and remained unpassed until this year. The purpose of the group is to coordinate and advise all organizations that will be running concerts and to help solve some of the problems of concerts that have arisen in the past two or three years. They shall try to investigate ticket sales techniques, help plan concerts and book groups, and have already probed the feasibility of switching from the present method of giving performers a flat fee to one of giving them a percentage of the gate. This move has been recommended to the Social Committee, and is now awaiting action by them. But, it is important to note that, although the AUCC shall try to advise individual groups as much as possible, the concerts shall remain in the hands of the organizations sponsoring them.

One major change hoped to be affected by the AUCC is the centralization of all concert-giving groups, so that no one class or organization will be sustaining a loss; Nicoletti stated, "It is impossible for an organization to run a week-end on this campus any more--support is needed by other groups." By pooling their resources, the AUCC hopes to eliminate competition between groups who might have wanted to sponsor the same performers for different programs.

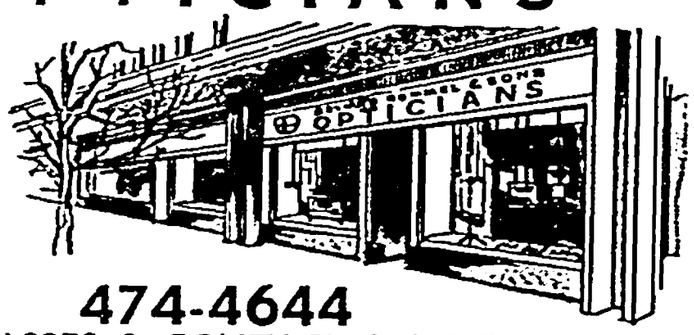
Another phase of their plan will be to review past laws made by the Social Committee to see where they can find a basis for establishing a precedent in certain situations. An example of this would be deciding what to do in the event that a group does not show up for an engagement. There is no established policy of how to deal with this at present, but the AUCC hopes to be able to set one up.

They also would like to re-examine past concert programs to see why they have failed or succeeded. As chairman Nicoletti put it, "We are establishing ourselves in general terms and will start by reviewing concert plans for this year."

The AUCC is made up of seven members: a representative from each class, one from the University Union, one from Greek Week, a representative-at-large that will be chosen by application, and their faculty advisor is Mrs. Stafford.

Folk singer Steve Gillette is giving a return concert Monday at 8 p.m. in Crouse College Auditorium.

Steve Gillette to perform Monday night



Just like the weather, The Syracuse Folk Society is "Back on The Street Again!" What this means is that the Society is having another concert, and specifically that it will feature the composer of those words, Steve Gillette.

Last year, the Society's concert program was just getting under way. For its first concert the Society chose to present a relatively unknown songwriter whose songs and performance had impressed those few who had seen him or heard his record. Over five hundred people saw him, and when he was finished, the singer received a standing jovation. He was Steve Gillette.

On Monday at 8 p.m. in Crouse College Auditorium, Steve is giving a return concert. Admission is 75 cents.

Later life Steppenwolf sound to bust open here

A tall, lean man in a flowing shirt and dark glasses stands gripping the microphone, foot tapping imperceptibly, spitting notes and words that pound the corners of night.

The man is John Kay, lead singer, second guitarist, harmonica player, composer and focus of Steppenwolf, one of America's hottest rock bands. Steppenwolf's sound, rapidly rising in popularity across the nation, will come to the War Memorial here on Wed., Nov. 20. Tickets are on sale at the SU Corner Store.

Steppenwolf's success story is the sort that tends to substantiate a belief in reincarnation, and in an earlier life, John Kay and Company seemed to be jockeying for first position in the Who Cares? race.

In that incarnation the band was called the Sparrow. Its life span was limited. The Sparrow earned the respect of fellow San Francisco musicians, but being a "musician's musician" is death. Personality conflict made it final: The Sparrow disbanded quietly.

In mid-1967 came the reincarnation as Steppenwolf, when John Kay, organist Goldy McJohn and drummer Jerry Edmonton moved to Los Angeles, adding two friends — bassist Rushton Moreve and guitarist Michael Monarch — to make five again. (Later, Nick St. Nicholas, another former Sparrow, replaced Moreve on bass.)

They went into a garage in Hollywood and rehearsed five hours a day for six months, and then, upon signing with Dunhill Records, went into a studio and cut their first album in just four days, a feat rare in this, the Day of the Overdub. They were ready and they knew it.

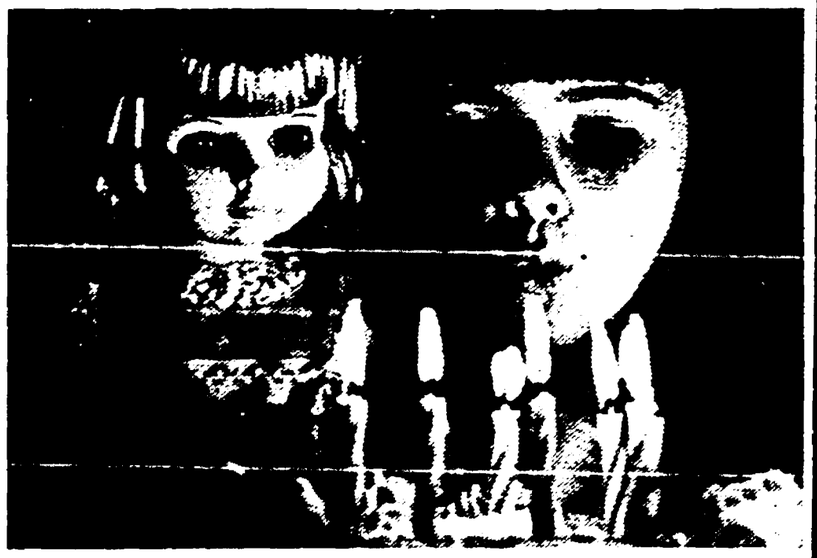
So was the public. Their single, "Born To Be Wild", went to Number Two nationally, their first album, "Steppenwolf," to Number four, both earning gold records. Another single, "Magic Carpet Ride," sold 40,000 copies the first day, and another album, "Steppenwolf the Second," sold 200,000 copies the first two weeks. Club owners and concert promoters, meanwhile, began offering Steppenwolf as much as $7,000 to sing their songs each night.

The way John Kay tells it, the music of Steppenwolf began with "Hootchie Kootchie Man," a blues classic. "We were playing other people's tunes," he says, "and we got bored, so we took some of the old tunes and, keeping in the friendly blues element, updated the lyrics." Thus, "Messin' With the Kid," another blues classic, became "Tighten Up Your Wig."

The next step was a logical one: they remained faithful to the "friendly blues element," and wrote their own songs with a message that was totally Steppenwolf's.

John believes that the young, urban whites are becoming heirs to the blues tradition because many Negroes either can't or won't sing blues any more: "Now that white musicians really have something to sing the blues about, like the bomb and Vietnam—all the destruction crippling lives on both personal and sociological levels — they have a valid reason for creating a few blues standards of their own. Previously, white musicians could only produce second-rate versions of Negro blues, but the current world situation has changed all that. Now everyone has something to cry about."

With these words, Steppenwolf begins to sound like the character in Hermann Hesse's novel of the same name. The novel is German (so is John Kay) and it translates into "the wolf of the Steppes," a man who is searching constantly, a man alone against society.



It is this approach to life and music Steppenwolf's fans identify with. So the tall, lean man in the flowing shirt and dark glasses becomes a spokesman, and although the audience may not believe in reincarnation, they certainly believe in Steppenwolf.

Role defined

Exec branch of SG in need of reform

By LOUIS JACOBS

An assassination attempt on Student Government's (SG) executive branch has dramatically shown the need for reforms in the executive part of the new SG constitution. Abolishing the executive was considered in hearings by the Student Senate Government Structures Committee.

Charges that the executive branch did not do anything, the elections procedure was corrupt and a waste of time and money, and that a committee type government established in Student Senate would produce better results than the present government were aired at last week's meeting.

John Ross, chairman of Government Structures Committee, explained the decision maintaining the executive branch but adding a steering committee and other reforms as giving the executive three major roles.

The executive should coordinate student government, act as a voice of the student body bringing proposals to the administration, and finally after passage enforce and execute new rules. The coordinating device for the executive was introduced in the hearings by Peter Del Giorno, president of the Campus Alliance Party.

A steering committee chaired by the president of SG and consisting of leaders from other branches of SG, class government, and large organizations would oversee SG. "The SG president should be the embodiment of the student body, and the steering committee the personification of organization in student government," Del Giorno said.

In answer to charges that elections are worthless, several witnesses including SG's current president, Chuck Hicks, noted that many benefits derive from the spring campaigns. Elections bring out ideas, promote interest in student government, and give a popularly elected officer as a symbol to both the student body and administration.

John Diamond, speaker pro tempore of Student Senate, is pushing for less duplication and more coordination between the legislative and executive branches. He feels the executive should initiate policies for student government, all investigative work should be done by Student Senate committees, and upon approval by Student Senate the executive should make the policies realities.

"Until that time, (when reforms are made) I see no reason for existence of the executive branch," Diamond said. Those reforms are being made in committee hearings and on the senate floor.

The next open committee hearing is Monday night at 7:30 p.m. in 204 HL. Both the executive and legislative parts of the new Constitution will be discussed.

Student research, contemplate and discuss as SU begins selection of next Chancellor

The Student Committee for the Selection of a Chancellor is indeed operating. Since its first meeting seven weeks ago, the eleven-member committee has taken action on nominations for a new chancellor and has set the groundwork for further proposals.

As one part of a tripartite committee the student branch works on its own, as well as integrating with the faculty committee and the trustee screening committee. The two student members on the trustee screening committee--a committee of three trustees, two faculty members and two students--have full voting privileges.

The whole tripartite committee reviews all names submitted by the faculty, administration and students. Each separate committee has presented criteria for a new chancellor and questions to present to the nominees during interviews. The student committee is now involved in researching vital problems on this campus.

The candidates, interviewed separately by the students, will be asked to discuss these problems and possible solutions pertinent to Syracuse University.

Further topics of student committee discussion are tenure for the new chancellor, an evaluation of the power structure of SU policymakers and a national quota system to fairly accomodate university applicants.

SCSC is also planning means of continuing to function after the new chancellor is chosen. Probably the committee will become a standing committee of the Council on Student Life and maintain a liason between the chancellor's office and the student body.

All those students who originally applied to SCSC are being notified of an executive council, in which all will participate. This enlargement will help ease the burden of research, add breadth to ideas and aid in the perpetration of SCSC as a relevant committee.

The committee has attained a rapport with the trustees. If this relationship continues, then the students of this university will indeed have achieved some amount of student power.

To prove that students are responsible enough to be involved in university policies, SCSC encourages questions and suggestions from all interested students. Students have an equal right to submit nominations.

Today, there is a new collection of love poems and lyrics by America's most interesting young poet.

Great rain of 1969

Play depicts man's self-government after encompassing earth disaster

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

If a flood were to cover the earth next year, its survivors would probably create a small totalitarian society. That prediction is made in the play, "After the Rain," according to Lisel Flashenberg who directed the first Syracuse production of the play. That production can be seen tonight and tomorrow night at 8 in the Regent Experimental Theater.

The play takes place in the future and concerns 11 political prisoners who act out the roles of survivors of the great rain of 1969.

"One of the survivors convinces himself he's God and the other survivors are most willing to accept him as that because of their insecurities," said Miss Flashenberg. "In the society they create, individualism is not allowed. People have to conform to rules.

"The society fails because it doesn't take the human element into account. It fails to acknowledge the idea that people have feelings and can't be forced into a mold. You get the idea that this type of dictated-conformity society has no real chance of survival."

She said the author, John Bowen, implies that such a totalitarian society may exist today in countries besides Communist nations.

DON BRINK

"After the Rain" calls for a new style of acting, ensemble acting, according to Miss Flashengerg, and that style is one reason she chose to direct the play for her Master's thesis.

In the play, 11 of the actors are on stage and active throughout the performance. The actors work together and there is no one lead, according to Miss Flashenberg.

"The actors had to learn to give as well as take," she said. They learned they were not on stage to make themselves look good, but to make the entire production look good. In a play that calls for ensemble acting, no one lead can save the show if the rest of the actors are bad.

"An actor is naturally an egotistical person and wants to stand out," said the director. "You have to make him realize that he'll look good if everybody else looks good too."

Ensemble acting, according to her, is the artistic goal for any group of actors because it involves a fine, intergrated performance from each actor.

Futuristic costumes made of vinyl and electronic music with dubbed in "1984"-type comments are among the special effects of Miss Flashenberg's production of "After the Rain."

The cast consists of 12 Syracuse University drama students. Most of them are juniors and seniors who have been in other university productions.

BARBARA BLOCK

The play itself was first produced in London in 1966 at a theater known for exposing new talent, the Hampstead Club Theater. It then moved to the West End, which is the American equivalent of Broqdway. After that run, it played on Broadway for two and a half months.

Among other plays Miss Flashenberg has directed have been, "The Wax Museum," "Mask of Angels," and Harold Pinter's play, "The Room." She spent four months in England doing research on Pinter and described his work as "realistic, bare and compressed."

Her aim is to act with a good repertory company. She has had roles in such SU productions as, "Only When I Laugh," "The Country Wife," and "The Father." This summer she played various leading roles in summer stock.

"Acting and directing give insights into each other," she said. "The more you learn about the theater, the more it helps."

Magazine wins $$$

The poetry magazine Maps has received a grant of $750 from the National Endowment for the Arts for "The Tree in the Fire," a poem by Joanne Kyger which appears in the current issue. John Taggart, a member of the Syracuse University English department, is the magazine's editor.

"The Tree in the Fire" will be included in the American Literary Anthology Number Two to be published this year by Random House, along with a history of the magazine written by Taggart. The magazine is partially financed by Syracuse University.

A third issue of Maps, to appear shortly, will be a memorial to John Coltrane, jazz saxophonist. The poems, by South American, French, Spanish and U.S. poets are responses to Coltrane's music.

Your story about our Fun Shirt of Creslan® may win it.

Based on a letter from a sweater-shirt enthusiast who claimed that the Fun Shirt of Creslan acrylic fiber has changed his life, we decided to hold a contest.

Don't tell us how sophisticated or color-terrific our fleece-lined, sweater-type Fun Shirts are. Or how they're pleasure-bent on softness (even after endless washings.) Or even how economical they are (you can buy three Fun Shirts for the price of one sweater.) Merely tell us about the dramatic way it changed your life and how much fun you're now having as a result. The best answer in 25 words or more gets the two hundred and fifty.

You don't have to buy a Fun Shirt of Creslan to enter. But we think you'll have a hard time resisting them after you've seen them. Send your entry to Fun Shirt Contest, American Cyanamid Co., 111 West 40th Street, New York, N.Y. 10018.

All entries, contests and ideas submitted become the property of American Cyanamid Company and may be used for any purpose. None will be returned. Entries must be postmarked on or before midnight, December 1, 1968. Enter today. Just follow these simple rules: 1) Enter as often as you wish. However, each entry must be mailed in a separate envelope. No purchase necessary. 2) Entries will be judged on the basis of originality, suitability and aptness of thought by an independent judging organization whose decision will be final. No correspondence will be entered into concerning entries. 3) The contest is open to all residents of the United States except the employees and their immediate families of the American Cyanamid Company, its advertising agencies and the judging organization. Contest is subject to applicable Federal, State and local regulations. 4) Liability for Federal, State and local taxes imposed upon the prize is the sole responsibility of the winner. 5) The prize winner will be notified by mail on or before January 1, 1969. 6) Name of winner may be obtained upon request by sending a self addressed, stamped envelope to Parapet & Associates, Inc., 2 W. 57th St., New York, N.Y. 10019.

Navy to sink or swim in snow

By IRA SILVERMAN

The curtain will come down tomorrow at 1:30 on SU's 1968 home football schedule. The Orangemen will be facing the Middies of Navy, with a five game winning streak in Archbold Stadium on the line, including four of four this year.

Both teams should be at top strength for the encounter, which will be the sixth meeting for the two schools. SU leads in the series, 4-1, but lost last year at Annapolis, 27-14.

John Cherundolo, who was a question mark in the beginning of the week because of the flu, will start, although he may be a little weak from the illness. Tom Daley, the Middies fullback, will also start. It was feared earlier in the week that he might have had cracked ribs after Navy's win over Georgia Tech, 35-15, but they proved to be only bruised.

Wholesale changes can be expected in the Orange starting backfield tomorrow, according to offensive coach Bill Bell. Both Paul Paolisso, at quarterback, and John Godbolt, at tailback, will start again this week, but Mike Chlebeck will probably replace Al Newton at fullback, with Lee Castner taking over for John Bulicz at wingback.

"Chlebeck has really come along the past few weeks," said Bell, "and he will probably start, although Al Newton will see plenty of action, too.

"Castner may also start at wingback," he continued. "He's put back-to-back good games together for the past three weeks. He deserves a chance to start."

John Godbolt, who rushed for three touchdowns last week in SU's 31-0 win over William and Mary, may see more action this week than he has in past weeks. "We'll play it as we go concerning Godbolt," commented Bell. "We'll probably keep him in there a little longer than he has been. Johnny's out in front right now for the tailback position, and the rest have to catch him."

The other two tailbacks, Ron Trask and Billy Knox, will also see plenty of action, according to Bell. "Bill Knox has started to come around in the last few weeks," he said. "But Ron is still bothered with his injured foot."

Paul Paolisso, who has completed 70 of 128 passes so far this season, including 4 TD's, will probably remain in the game for long periods, as he did last week. "Our choice of quarterbacks will depend a lot on field position," explained Bell, "but I expect we'll stay with Paolisso as long as we did last week."

Bell also expects that substitutions in the offensive backfield will be made in spots, rather than in groups, as the coaching staff had done earlier in the campaign. With Dick Bidlack back in action at wingback the SU backfield seems strong and deep.

The defense, too, will be back to normal for Navy. Jerry Beach will again open at middleguard, with Ray White and Art Thoms at tackle, and Lou Gubitosa and Steve Zegalia at the ends. Ron Womack, who so ably filled in at middleguard when Beach was switched to tackle after Thoms was thrown out of the game, will be ready to step in whenever needed.

Navy uses a multiple offense system, therefore it is not easy to know which formation or play they will use in a specific situation. "They are a difficult team to prepare for," commented Bell, "because they do use those multiple offenses."

Middie coach Bill Elias is expected to start a sophomore, Mike McNallen, at quarterback. So far this season, McNallen has completed 101 of 230 passes for 1175 yards and 6 TD's. But he has been intercepted 16 times.

Leading rushers for the Naval Academy have been halfback Dan Pike (80 carries for 360 yards), second-string halfback Jeri Balsly (55 carries for 204 yards) and fullback Tom Daley (65 carries for 193 yards).

Bill Newton, at split end, and Mike Clark, at tight end, head the pass catching corps. Newton has grabbed 25 thus far with Clark adding 21 and 2 TD's. Flankerback Karl Schwelm also ranks high in receptions.

IRA's IDEAS—Orange have two straight shutouts, but haven't had 3 in a row since 1942...Newton still leads all rushers with 399 yards on 83 carries, for a 4.8 average.

Run in New York Monday

Grieve sends 13 to IC4A meet

By LARRY CENTER

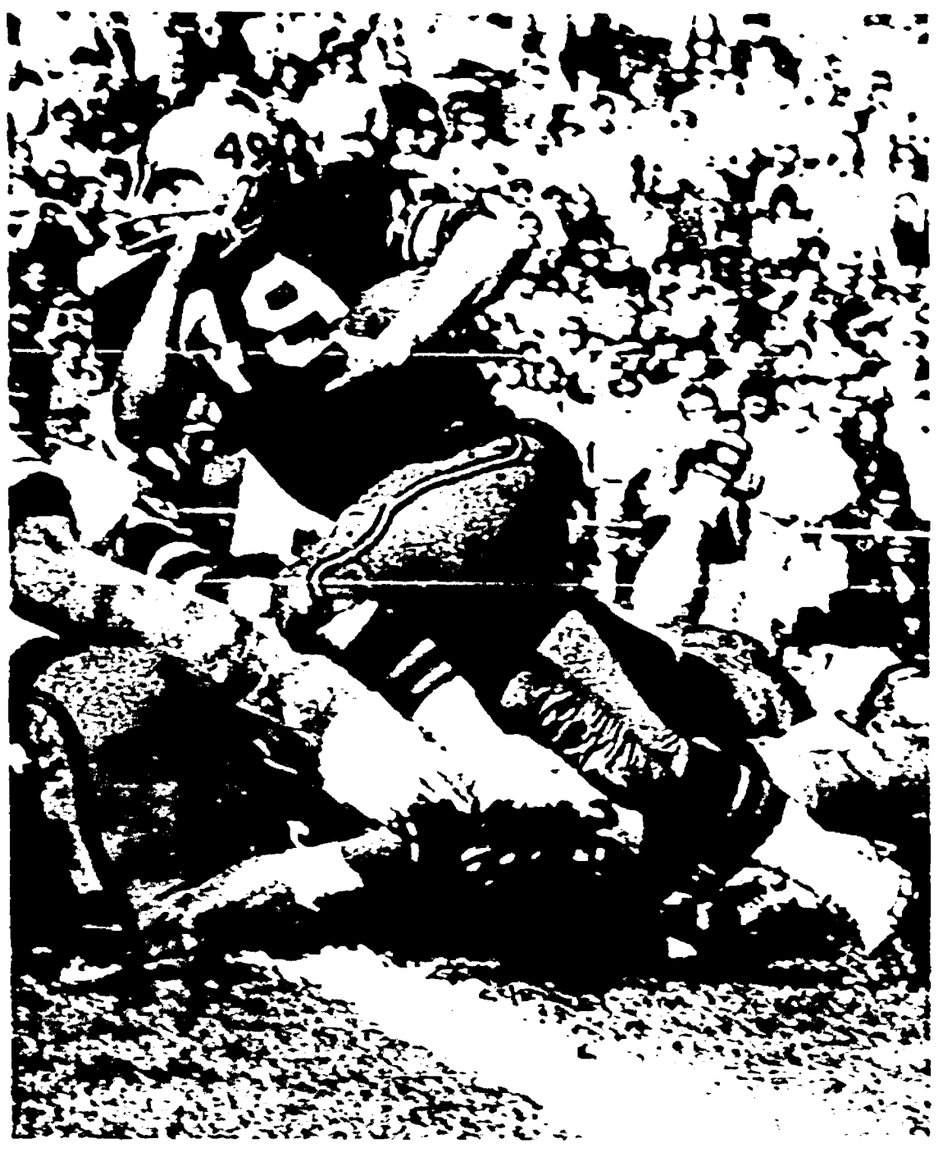
The Syracuse University freshman and varsity cross-country teams will be competing against the best in the East when they journey to New York City this weekend to run in the annual IC4A Cross-Country Championships on Monday.

Coach Bob Grieve will be sending 13 runners to the meet. Representing the varsity will be Larry Zuller, Dave Crans, Dale Parfitt, Don Kunz, Phil Riposo and Bill Swift. Frosh harriers will be Bob Quinlan, Mark Sandberg, Chuck Eckerline, Tom Stoyan, Steve Scmitt, Bill McCoy and Bob Trimmer.

Villanova, the defending champion, is ranked the favorite in this year's meet, to be run at Van Cortland Park in the Bronx. Grieve said the Wildcats "will get quite a fight from Harvard, Penn State, Pitt and Yale."

The coach comments that the course "is noted for being a tough course, real hard on anybody who hasn't seen it before. But our kids from New York City ran it a few times in high school, and some of the others have also, so we won't be walking into it blind."

The great difference between this meet and regular season meets is the quantity and quality of the field. Grieve says, "There are 72 member colleges in the IC4A, and each team is allowed to enter seven men. The University class, which we're in, has 37 members, and the college class, 35. With so many runners, it's real difficult to score."



Last year Syracuse did not take a full team of at least five men, so they did not score. The first five finishers for each team count in the point standings, with the lowest-scoring school the winner. There are five team prizes and the first 15 runners get medals.

Grieve rated Zuller and Parfitt as SU's best chances for medals in the varsity race, to be run Monday afternoon. Quinlan and Sandberg are potential high finishers in the freshman meet that morning.

However, the field will be very tough. The coach says "Donelly from Villanova, Stageborg of Georgetown and Hadfield of West Virginia all are great. Richie, from Pitt, is better at two miles than anybody in the field, and has run a 3:58 mile. Then there's also Martin Liquori from Villanova, who made it to the finals of the 1500 in the Olympics."

Grieve felt the snowstorm and cold weather that has hit the East will not affect the race's outcome. "The weather doesn't favor anybody. It's the greatest equalizer in all athletics."

The team will be leaving Sunday and will walk over the course, five miles for the varsity and three for the freshmen, Sunday afternoon. They will return immediately after the varsity race Monday afternoon, which gets under way at 12:30.

Correction

Yes, it's happened! A mistake was made on the DO sports page. Two small but unfortunately very important paragraphs were omitted from Mike Weber's story on Bob Bancroft.

Bancroft came off sounding as if he enjoyed the booing of teammate Panczszyn. Not a chance!

Preceding the paragraph beginning with a Bancroft quote, "I really enjoy it. At first I was leery..." was to have been a lead in.

What Bancroft was in fact discussing was his commentary on SU football films which he makes for Sadler Hall residents each Monday night.

The final paragraph in the story beginning "We'll have to stop their running game..." again was left naked without its lead-in.

Bancroft was answering a question concerning the upcoming Navy encounter as he sees it.

The unfortunate error was made by the printing staff so no editor can be hung this time.

So, sorry Bob. We goofed and we apologize.

Sports sidelights

The football game between the Syracuse frosh and the Red Knights of Manlius Academy, scheduled for this afternoon, has been cancelled. This is the second time the game has been washed out, and it will not be played this year. The Tangerines have finished their season with a 4-0 record.

The big match between the DO Chickens and Promethean Piggys has not been cancelled yet. A decision will not be made until field conditions are checked just before game time, which is 3:15 p.m. today at the Women's Building.

The Hockey Club will hold its first practice on Monday night. Meet at the corner of Comstock and Waverly at 9:30.

Tolley lauds students' assistance to ghetto

Syracuse University has at least 70 programs aimed at closing the gap between the "advantaged" and "disadvantaged," Chancellor William P. Tolley said Friday in his report to the board of trustees at its semi-annual meeting at Hotel Syracuse.

Dr. Tolley reported that early in the fall semester the University began compiling a summary of its activities covering "The University and the Disadvantaged." To date, he said, the summary "discloses 70 specific programs directly aimed at closing the gap between the so-called 'advantaged' and 'disadvantaged,' some directed to the Syracuse community, specifically, and some more generally directed."

In his report, Tolley took special note of several "highly effective" programs with underprivileged children conducted on a volunteer basis by students.

He said "Projection '70," a program sponsored by the junior class, provides remedial tutoring on a one-to-one basis, several hours a week for more than 100 inner city children.

"The project was so successful in enriching the education of the student tutors, as well as providing a service to the community, that it has now been established as an elective course in the School of Education, open to freshmen and sophomores," Tolley said.

The Chancellor also noted "Operation Volunteer," in which students interested in community service are referred to the Syracuse Volunteer Center, where they are assigned to work in one of 35 participating agencies in the city.

In "Operation Link," about 35 students serve as "big brothers" or "big sisters" to youngsters from the inner city area. "Each student develops a close personal relationship with one or two children, and together they plan activities which may range from playing football to visiting museums."

He said two requirements for upgrading the quality of education in inner city schools are better teaching and a more effective learning environment for students. He said the Urban Teacher Preparation Program is aimed at producing better teachers. "Experience in urban school systems has indicated that not all 'good' teachers are necessarily effective in dealing with youngsters who come from disadvantaged backgrounds."

Improving the learning environment is the aim of the Croton-on-Campus program. Tolley said "the University and the city schools established in 1967 Croton-on-Campus as a demonstration and research program for approximately 300 fourth, fifth and sixth grade Negro students who attend a previously 'de facto' segregated school (Croton) and who, for the most part, live within a housing project close to the campus. The children attend classes in the campus school for one-half day, and spend the rest of the day in their regular classrooms at Croton School."

Tolley said special emphasis is placed on communication skills, behavioral sciences and Negro history.

He said faculty members are volunteering their services in a program called "Operation Shoestring." College-level course work is offered to high school graduates in Onondaga County.

SU suffers deficit, decreased enrollment

Syracuse University finished the 1967-68 fiscal year with a deficit of $284,758, Francis A. Wingate, vice president and treasurer, reported Friday at the semi-annual meeting of the board of trustees.

"While several other well-known privately endowed universities in the northeast as large or larger deficits, this fact hardly improves the palatability of our results," Wingate conceded.

Syracuse University last reported a deficit at the end of the 1947-48 fiscal year, amounting to $160,781.

Enrollment at Syracuse University for the first semester is 24,348 compared with 24,468 a year ago. Chancellor P. Tolley said in his report to the board of trustees

"Uncertainity with respect to Selective Service status, the increase in tuition and competition from community colleges and State operated colleges were among the factors affecting student enrollment this year," Dr. Tolley said.

He gave this breakdown of Syracuse enrollment: Graduate level, 7,588 in 1968 compared to 7,608 last year; undergraduates (excluding Utica College, State University College of Forestry at Syracuse University and University College), 8,969 this year compared to 9.005 last year. Enrollment in the College of Law, 343 this year compared to 320 a year ago. Utica College, 3,141 this year compared to 3,171 last year.

Dorms to test parietal hours for committee vote in February

By BOB DAVIS

A new phase of student life is being experimentally introduced to Syracuse University. In this experiment, visiting hours are being obtained by various dormitories.

With these visiting hours, living centers would be open to both men and women. Individual dorms will choose the exact hours. Approximately 20 per cent of the undergraduate population will eventually be involved. The size of the experiment is being kept small, to make it easier to evaluate the net worth of the program.

To obtain visiting hours, a dorm must submit a petition to Standing Committee Three, which is part of the Council on Student Life. This committee is composed of student leaders, who act as a liaison between administration and students. They are empowered to grant visiting hours on an experimental basis

The petition that is submitted specified the days there will be visiting hours, the exact hours and the mode of punishment for violaters of the rules. There are differences in the petitions of each dorm.

The introduction of visiting hours is an attempt by administrators part to decentralize the authority to make all their own rules concerning dormitory life.

Dean of Men David Tatham said that visiting hours are more liberal than open houses, because now the open house will be "institutionalized on a permanent basis."

There will be a new atmosphere in the living centers with visiting hours. In these dorms, men and women could relax together in the dormitory rooms.

There was a similar experiment last year, in which dormitories were granted parietal hours, which also opened some dorms. There was great confusion, however, as to what this term actually meant. In addition, no records were kept on how many people used the open dorm and the administration could not evaluate what the best time and days were.

This year, Standing Committee Three will keep records, and in February the committee will make a quantitive analysis to determine whether visiting hours should be extended to the rest of the campus.

Participation and behavior will be two of the major determinates as to whether the visiting hours program will be a success or failure. There is a general feeling that the students, on a whole, will not break the rules on alcohol and other matters. If only a few individuals break the rules, they probably will be dealt with by some judicial body in the individual living center.

Dean Tatham has said visiting hours, "aren't a license to break the rules and regulations of Syracuse University."

Seek SU support for 'sour gripes'

By JEAN HAVENS
Associate Editor

According to the grapevine, the gripes of California migrant workers may result in a boycott of Syracuse grocery stores and, possibly, SU Food Service.

Legislation entitled "Migrant Labor Strike and Boycott Support Bill" will go before Student Government Wednesday night for consideration. The bill proposes that SU students declare their support of the efforts of the National Farm Workers Organization to help win collective bargaining rights for California migrant workers.

The proposal also calls for student participation in the Onondaga County boycott of table grapes by not buying or eating table grapes in the coming months. This boycott, sponsored by the Onondaga County Friends of Farm Workers, may involve the SU Food Service should table grapes be served in University dining halls during the duration of the strike.

The table grape dispute evolved from the fact that the National Labor Relations Act specifically excludes farm workers from its collective bargaining provisions. The workers must therefore win the

Institutional inertia strikes

We collided with institutional inertia again in the case of a student who petitioned to waive a required course in the Journalism School.

A professor had advised the student to drop a required course and petition to waive the requirement. The petition was made out and signed by the professor who was also the chairman of the department. It was submitted to the dean of the Journalism School.

Two days later the dean took the time to write on it: "If you drop this course, drop your enrollment in the school."

Tempted by this sage advice, the student nevertheless desired to know why dropping a course should merit dropping his enrollment in the school. The dean explained that if the course was dropped, the student wouldn't have sufficient hours to graduate.

The student said he had arranged to take a senior seminar course in broadcasting on an advanced credit basis.

"Who do you think you're kidding?" asked the dean. "You're a newspaper major aren't you? That stuff won't do you any good."

We submit for the dean's consideration the idea that if a student does not need to take required courses and waives them with the permission of the instructor, and departmental chairman he should broaden his understanding of his field and its instruments.

In support of this novel proposition we quote: "Mass communications--newspapers, television and radio stations, magazines, books, and the allied areas of advertising, public relations, photography, graphic arts, literacy--is a field requiring intellectual maturity and an extraordinary breadth of information." These wise words come from the School of Journalism catalogue, "Message from the Dean."

Likewise, we cite: "A free press must be fortified with greater knowledge of the world and skill in the arts of expression." These words, mounted on the wall of Newhouse Communication Center lobby are by Samuel I. Newhouse.

Emphasis on education

Retain the D.S.S.

By Donald Kline

When a graduate student matriculates into a Doctoral of Social Science program within the Maxwell School he aspires, with much hard work and a little luck, to acquire a package of understanding and competence containing both contents and a label. The contents may be viewed as the large amount of interdiciplinary flexibility; the label is the D.S.S. degree itself.

There is currently before the Maxwell faculty a proposal to change the label on the package from D.S.S. to PhD. A large and strong-feeling minority, myself included, resist this change. In addition, we hold varying degrees of fear that the contents of the package, too, will be subtly altered--slowly at first, then more rapidly to conform wotj tje "badge of respectibility" whlch is the PhD.

Many of the D.S.S. candiates accept and laud the intent that the degree be primarily teacher-oriented. Can a superior teacher generally be a superior researcher? This is the type of question which may have helped to precipitate the first riots at Berkeley. Were and are undergraduates being exposed to effective teaching?

In the recent collection of essays on higher education entitled Campus 1980, John Gardner, former Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, expresses concern with the increasingly obvious deterioration of undergraduate teaching; he seeks to restore the "status" of teaching. I seek to retain the status symbol of the D.S.S. In the same volume, William Arrowsmith, professor of classics, arts and letters at the University of Texas, takes to task administrators and faculties alike for "the present state of affairs-a vast educational enterprise built entirely upon a caste of learned men whose learning has no relevance to the young." I would tend to moderate the absolutes but concur with the intent of this thought.

But, Professor Arrowsmith goes on to advocate scrapping the emphasis upon scholar-teacher and separating the teaching and research functions. This the D.S.S. program attempts to a degree. Yet, substantial improvement could be made in the "package" without changing the label.

A most fertile area for such improvement within the program is the dissertation. In many cases this excercise is not relevant to the development of teaching competence in the social sciences: if I had my "druthers" I would want alternatives. For example, instead of the production of large tomes which collect dust on 6th-level library shelves, I should like to option to create from "scratch" a true interdiciplinary course which incorporated the responsibility and opportunity to teach it at the undergraduate level. Egad! What an understanding this would be. And since much of the rhetoric surrounding this proposed label change is concerned with "tool" requirements, especially those of research, I should think that here would be a teaching "tool" of vast relevence, excitement and commitment.

To expose the "alienated" undergraduate of today to a course entitled City which attempted to meanifgfully cut across the traditional, artifical, and formal barriers known as the diciplines would precipitate exciting breakthroughs and stimulate greater incentive for bettering the classroom experience. Such a course could take a "tri-dimensional" approach: history would be the first or temporal dimension; geography would be the second or spatial dimension; and anthropology-sociology-economics-psychology-political science would be the third or substantive dimension.

This, then, is one subjective and emphatic viewpoint of the philosophy of the D.S.S. If, as Campus 1980 seems to suggest, the first consideration of any institution of higher learning in the future is to be the interests and needs of the students, then radical changes would seem to be in order--changes toward more flexibility, increased teaching excellence and greater joy and ecstasy within the educational process.

If the warning flags before us now as hoisted by Berkeley and Columbia are not heeded we will surely find the communications crisis growing apace with all accompanying consequences. In no small way the concept of the D.S.S. is a weapon to be used in bridging the growing gap between the student and the real, interrelated world of [illegible], issue, person and crisis. The stakes are very high. The D.S.S. label must not be compromised. This badge of an innovative, educational aristocracy must be preserved.

Letters to the editor

Police actions

To the Editor:

The uniform of the Syracuse Police Department was disgraced at the Syracuse-Navy game and the gap between the city police and the Syracuse students widened a little more. Perhaps this could have been easily avoided.

I heard once that rookie policemen are told to ask themselves two questions when they confront a problem. First, they are to judge the SEVERITY of the problem. Second, they must judge whether they can HANDLE the problem THEMSELVES.

When an occasional snowball was thrown from the west stands to where a group of Syracuse Indian maidens were standing, a noble policeman decided to protect them by standing in front of the girls. He became a target. Snowball throwing is part of winter and Syracuse, whether it be in Archbold Stadium or College Place. Those girls probably expected an occassional snowball. Syracuse men will always throw snowballs at Syracuse women.

Yet, policemen began entering the stands and ejecting students from the game. Most of those students returned shortly thereafter to their seats, bragging of escaping from the police. The police began losing control of the situation at this time and a psychological war between students and police was created.

I would not judge this problem as severe and would not have expected police involvement. The noble policeman who tried to protect those girls should have realized that the "attacks" from the stands would have probably stopped when the second- half began. We will never know whether the situation would have "naturally" worsened to justify police action.

There was one policeman who seemed to be enraged and he began carrying on a one—man crusade to rid Archbold of snowball throwers forever. Eventually, his fellow policemen were joining him....more as a gesture of unity rather than a logical thinking. The students, seeing that the police had lost control of themselves and the crowd, began to antagonize the police.

This was a real shame. Sincere admiration should go to the police. They do a job none of us have the guts to do. If we get mugged or robbed, it is the police whom we call to fight our battles. Five or six years from now, those Syracuse men sitting in the west end zone, will have families and property. Snowballs will not protect them. The police will do it. I blame those students involved for losing their own rational thinking. If the college students of today are so mature, we should have kept our heads even if the police appeared to lose theirs.

Thus, as we entered the second incident, we found irrational police battling irrational students. The second incident began with less than three minutes left in the game. The students were going to attempt to tear down the iron goal posts at Archbold, an American football tradition which occurs at the end of every concluding home game of the season.

It was obvious that the police were too outnumbered and they could not handle the problem. They tried, however, with clubs and fists.

Perhaps the motives of these policemen at Archbold was to prevent injury to people and damage to the goalposts. Isn't it ironic that, in spite of their involvement, there still was personal injury and that the damage to their reputation was 10 times greater than the damage to the stadium.

Revisions begin

Hicks, Portnoy overruled at SG constitution hearings

By VIC LIVINGSTON

The Student Government (SG) Government Structures Committee, considering revision of SG's constitution, last night passed a motion making the vice president of SG president pro tempore of the Student Senate, a largely ceremonial position.

This action rejected pleas of SG President Chuck Hicks and Vice President Jeff Portnoy against constitutional revision and further limitation of the vice president's powers.

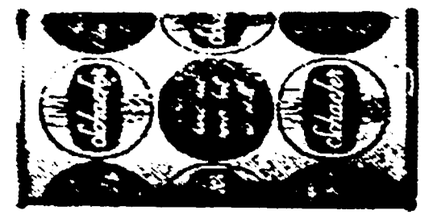
Both Hicks and Portnoy had proposed that the vice president become speaker pro temp of the Senate, an important position. Also, they urged constitutional revision be terminated, pending hearings by the faculty senate on the initation of a University government, encompassing students, faculty and administration.

Craig Baumgarten, a member of the committee, emphasized the need for independent student government and increased student participation through a new constitution.

Portnoy, however, felt that the urgent issues of student concern such as the cutting rule, visiting hours and board contracts would be delayed by weeks of debate on the vague issue of constitutional revision.

Portnoy stressed the need for a strong vice president with independent constitutional powers.

"Either do away with the office of vice president or have the vice president elected with the president, avoiding ideological differences. If the vice president continues to be independently elected, he must be given specific constitutional powers. If he is not given these powers, we should change the way in which he is elected, or eliminate his position."



CHUCK HICKS

With the motion passed by the committee, the move for constitutional revisions for SG has begun. Their actions have dimmed the prospects for an all-enveloping University government.

"The proposed new constitution," Portnoy said, "will be dead before it is written. Many of the prosposals are a carbon copy of the present constitution. While the committee is spending time revising, the faculty senate is holding hearings to revamp entire government structure."

"To rewrite the constitution is a waste of time and effort when so many other issues must be discussed."

The amended constitution, when out of committee, will be presented to the Student Senate for consideration.

Student Senate

Student Senate will meet Wednesday, Nov. 20, in Maxwell Auditorium at 7:30 p.m. This will be the final meeting before Thanksgiving Vacation. The agenda includes: committee reports, study of Student Government's executive branch, new business and announcements.

'New Morality' conference opens here

The problem of birth defects and infanticide, one of the many dilemmas rising from the conflict between scientific progress and ethical considerations, will be examined at 7 p.m. tonight in Maxwell Auditorium by Dr. Leroy Augenstein of Michigan State University.

Dr. Augenstein's speech is part of the "New Morality" conference being sponsored by the Association of Women Students this week.

For the past two years, AWS has sponsored conferences dealing with aspects of sex and morality. This week's conference examines more general topics of morality.

Thursday night, members of the Syracuse University Nursing School will discuss natural childbirth at 7 p.m. in Maxwell auditorium. Alice Reynolds, an instructor in the nursing school, will lead the discussion.

Dr. Augenstein is a professor and chairman of the department of biophysics at Michigan State. A writer and lecturer on science and ethics, he serves as a research specialist for Michigan State's "Great Issues" television series.

SUSKI will feature Jim Heuga visit tonight

Tonight SUSKI will host Jim Heuga, considered one of America's finest skiers. Among his long list of honors are: a 1964 Olympic medal, a 1967 Medal in the World Cup Championship in the Giant Slalom, and Europe's most coveted event, the Arlberg-Kandahar Race.

At the age of 25 he has been skiing for 23 years. His racing career started at the age of 5. The past nine years he was on the U.S. Ski Team.

Heuga has skied for Squaw Valley, Calif., but has not skied in the East very often. This year he will become familiar with New York State as Director of the Ski School at Song Mountain in Tully, N.Y.

Members of SUSKI and anyone else who wants to join will hear some of his interesting stories and see one of his racing films. The meeting will start at 7:30 p.m. in 117 Lyman. A new lesson package at Song Mountain will be introduced. Members must bring a $10 deposit for lessons. All new members are welcome.

Students see conflict in race ideals

"Whites fail to realize that they have created the black ghetto, and their job now is to help the black man break out of it," explained Betty Hubbard, president of the Student Afro-American Society, (SAS), at a Black Power seminar in DellPlain last Thursday.

Joe Clore, another SAS speaker, condemned police forces as "an occupying army." Clore said blacks will do everything they can to protect themselves from the police.

In a lengthier statement, SAS Vice President, George Weldon described the feelings and intentions of today's educated blacks. "We want to bring about change ourselves; we don't want the white man to lead us," he ventured. Weldon also mentioned that "white liberals don't realize the differences between themselves and blacks; they live happily within the power structure, which excludes blacks."

"The black man is revolting," said Weldon, "because of a conflict in ideals. The United States Government sends black soldiers to fight in Vietnam to defend freedoms which they don't possess in southwest Georgia and Harlem. The socially undesirable conditions promoted by rascism haven't been erased, and alienation is still much in evidence in the ghetto."

In concluding, Mr. Weldon reminded white America that at present it is biding time in dealing with "a severe situation." He added that the "black man cannot do this alone"—that concerned whites must assist in promoting social change.

right to organize, farm by farm. So far, 11 of the largest wine farms have recognized the National Farm Workers as the workers' bargaining agent. Attempts to win recognition by the table grape farms have resulted in the strike and nationwide boycotts.

A recent campus visit by Uenuciano Olijuin, a member of the United Farm Workers Urbanizing Committee, brought the plight of the farm workers to the attention of SU students. He explained that the California grape strike is almost four years old now, having veen initiated in 1965.

The proposed SU bill states: "Almost all of the farm workers in the United States live in poverty. The median income in California (where conditions are better than most other states) for farm worker families is around $2,300 a year, and this figure includes income earned by the children of many of the workers."

We encourage job-hopping. We do try to keep it intramural—within Du Pont that is—and we do have a more formal title for it, "planned mobility."

Saylor Gilbert, CH.E., V.P.I., 1962, tells it like it is.

It only means we don't put you in a training program. We put you in growth jobs—to help you get to the top of your field the way you want to get there.

"Take a good look around you, and you'll see people at Du Pont who've had a lot of movement through very different kinds of jobs. There's no doubt that this diverse experience helps you. For example, I had four assignments concerned with different aspects of polymerizing, casting, stretching and finishing our polyester film base."

"Having had all this, I feel I was better prepared for my present position of training supervisor. But aside from the fact that variety can help you, I believe most people just like a change after working at one job for a period of time."

Your Du Pont recruiter will be a guy like Saylor... Ask him about planned mobility—or anything else you'd like to know about Du Pont. Mailing the coupon is the surest way to get in touch with him.

Updated 'Antigone' stars SU's drama students

By JIM WOOLSEY

Jean Anouilh's adaptation of Sophocles' "Antigone" will be this semester's Reader's Theater production. Directed by Dr. Ray Irwin, associate dean of the School of Speech, the production will be offered Nov. 22 and 23 at the New Theater of the Regent Complex.

Lenore Canter stars in the title role. She is a senior in the School of Speech, majoring in drama. Other characters include: Howard Roller as Creon; Cassandra Morrow as Ismene; Serhij Hoshowsky as Hawmon; and Eve Epstein as the nurse.

Dr. G. F. Reidenbaugh, chairman of the drama department, portrays the chorus, replacing the 12 persons used in the Sophocles version.

Although Dr. Irwin will not say Anouilh's version is better than the original, he describes it as "more appealing." Sophocles' "Antigone" was "monolithic and ritualistic. All the characters are giants," he says. "The Anouilh characters are more human and complex."

Although the plot line remains basically the same--one of youthful rebellion against the Establishment--Anouilh made it contemporary by references to guns, sports cars, cigarettes, and the like.

Along these lines, director Irwin has arranged settings that will fit into practically any time period. In addition, tuxedos will replace togas for male readers, and Ismene will be clad in Mod fashion.

This version of "Antigone" was first done in Occupied France during World War II. The Nazis identified the Creon, and accepted the theme of the play to be the necessity of following orders and rigid discipline.

The French, on the other hand, took the part of Antigone., seeing the play as a realization of their plight under the Germans and the necessity for rebellion.

FRESHMEN: If you had your picture taken for the Orange Aid you have paid for it. If you did not pick it up last week you may still get in Wednesday from 7 to 9 p.m. in French Cottage, 408 Walnut. Bring your receipt of ID card. Greek houses who have bought in bulk may also pick up their books at the same time.

IF YOU WANT to reach information operator at SU dial 4113. Dialing "O" will only slow down the process.

ENGINEERING OPPORTUNITY

If you want iron-clad security and a very narrow job, stop reading. But, if a ground floor opportunity is part of your dream and you recognize that engineering means security, we are right for you. We are a yearling R. & D. firm with good business commitments. We need an EE circuit designer, preferably one who has some expenience. Your first job here would be the supervision of two field service engineers who will operate and maintain airborne IR and ground support equipment, plus modifying the gear and conceiving improvements. You would also assist in new developments. Future work will involve creative requirements in electro-optical and electro-mechanical devices. The average EE works for the average big company in the average corner. You may count on a competitive salary with us as a mere starting point.

Strong passing for West Va.

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

The Syracuse-West Virginia series has always been marked by bruising, hard knocking football, so it may appear a little strange when the two teams open up the airlanes for Saturday's game at Morgantown.

West Virginia is 6-3 on the year, and alum Ben Schwartzwalder may withhold his endowment when he sees how they have achieved that record. The Mountaineers rely on sophomore quarterback Mike Sherwood, who thrust aside two upperclassmen for the starting job, and then broke, or will break, most of the game and season passing records for the school.

"Sherwood is the best passer we will have to face this year," Schwartzwalder admitted to the weekly press luncheon yesterday. The Bellaire, Ohio quarterback has thrown 245 passes this year, with 139 completions for 1886 yards and 10 touchdowns. He has had 10 intercepted as well.

"We have to throw the ball more than we would like to, because of our weak offensive line," explained WVU coach Jim Carlen. "Mike's only a soph, and he still makes a lot of errors, like costly interceptions and losses."

"We must stop this team's passing attack," warned SU scout Chuck Fogarty. "Their offensive line is weak and immature, so they don't have a strong running game."

Carlen has an extremely young team, with only one senior on the defensive unit. The star on defense is middle guard Carl Crennel. Teams have resorted to double or triple teaming him, yet he still leads the Mountaineers in tackles.

SU should be a heavy favorite for the game, but Ben still hates to play his alma mater. "We have won down there," he points out, "but it's never been easy."

Penn State

Anyone interested in going to the Penn State game by bus (Dec. 7) should call Arty tonight at X2753. (If no answer, call X3529 and leave a message.) The cost of the bus is $9.00 and the cost of the ticket is $6.00. There are only 10 spaces still available. The bus will leave early in the morning on Saturday and will start back for Syracuse a few hours after the game.

Navy post mortem

Ben praises 'mental attitude'

By LARRY CENTER

Right after Saturday's 44-6 trouncing of Navy, coach Ben Schwartzwalder said in the locker room, "Football is a game of mental attitude, and today we had it. We were really a football team today, in spite of our errors."

Yesterday the coach elaborated on his satisfaction with the victory: "Football isn't a game of perfection, but as far as hitting, a basic ingredient, goes, we had it to a greater extent than for any other game this year."

Although Syracuse has beaten other teams by bigger scores, Ben gave greater significance to this win because of Navy's potential. He said, "Navy had Georgia Tech down 35-0 before winning 35-15, and Tech had beaten Auburn and Miami, two fine teams. As far as I was concerned, that 20-point spread was ridiculous."

He explained, "They're a fancy-dan team, but they're intelligent. You can't let them get the jump on you or outhit you. You have to beat them at the basics."

He said the team had made "an overt effort" to establish the running game because the "boys were getting soft, especially the line, with all that pass protection."

Ben answered the critics who for years have accused him of being afraid to pass. He said, "Georgia Tech threw 57 passes against Navy, but you can't have an offense without running. A team that just throws can't win consistently--they're bound to have a bad day where interceptions or a strong pass rush can kill them." I'm not underemphasizing the passing game, but you have to have both, and our running had been hurting."

By the second half, Syracuse had a pretty good book on the Middies, and was able to open up a bit, with the passing helping the rushing game. Ben admitted that Navy's pass defense is inferior to their running defense, and said, "You might wonder why we didn't go to the pass more. We were trying to develop something, a basic. So if we had passed sooner, we might have scored more, but we had a good reason for doing it the way we did."

The coach was happy with most of his backs. He said, "Al Newton ran more effectively than he has since the UCLA game, and Chlebeck and Knox, who had those two touchdowns, are both coming along well. Lee Castner has improved steadily and is really emerging."

Tailback John Godbolt hurt a hip in the game, and his status for Saturday's game with West Virginia is not known yet. If he can't start, Ben has a choice of Knox, Ron Trask, or Dick Bidlack, who ran well Saturday.

The defense won't get any rest this Saturday at Morgantown, however. In the Mountaineers' Mike Sherwood, they go up against one of the leading passers in the country.

Player of the week

Baby Bull and Galloping Gip spark SU win

BIG AL NEWTON cracks over Navy's Emerson Carr for additional yardage. Newton and Cliff Ensley share Player of the Week honors.

By MIKE WEBER

As predicted, the Orangemen sunk the invading Navy, 44-6. Two of the big reasons why were fullback Al Newton and defensive safety Cliff Ensley. These two stalwarts are co-players of the week, as named by the DO.

Ensley becomes the first gridder to be named twice during the year, while Newton earns the laurels for the initial time.

"The Gipper" seemed to be all over the field Saturday, either harassing pass receivers or running back punts with reckless abandon. He intercepted one pass to set up an SU score and returned seven punts for 146 yards, including a touchdown jaunt of 76 yards.

"I felt real good out there," commented Ensley. "That punt return really came at an opportune time. They still had a lot of spirit, since we only led 7-0."

Ensley's scamper, a beautiful broken field piece of running, was the game's turning point.

"When I turned the corner on the left, I started slipping," continued the senior safety. "But when I got my balance, I looked up and saw about five blockers. Then I figured 'here we go.'"

Newton was named because of his bull-like running. The soph fullback picked up 98 yards on 16 carries for a 6:1 average. He also scored on a two-yard plunge.

"I really wanted a hundred yards," Newton admitted. "There were so many places I could have gotten them it makes me mad."

Newton had been edged out of his starting job by Mike Chlebeck and set out to regain his lost position. "I was down when I found I wasn't starting," Newton said. "Mike played the first two series and then I went in. I felt really good and I figure this is my best game ever."

Newton also had a personal reason for putting on his best show against the Middies. "Last year, we played their frosh in the morning and beat them. We were in the stands when our varsity lost and they really gave it to us. They laughed and jeered. I really am so glad we won the way we did."

Ensley said the entire team was emotionally ready for the big effort they produced Saturday.

"The team was really psyched. We get like this only three or four times a year. You can't say why, but you can tell it's there. We had to prove something to ourselves and coach Schwartzwalder. I think we did," he explained.

Newton echoed his teammates sentiments when he said, "The line was really great. They were 'up' and their blocking showed it. Andy Fusco really took care of (Emerson) Carr. Carr is supposed to be a potential All-American, but he didn't do much Saturday."

"The Gipper" felt he and the rest of the secondary had one of the finest games they've had in a long time. "Maybe it's because their receivers were slower than others we have faced. I felt like my feet were moving in the right direction all the time. I'm not the fastest guy in the world, but I really thought I was moving Saturday."

Ensley said the entire defensive secondary was working together well, "picking up a man if he got past one defender. Everybody put all out."

"Big Al" picked up 64 yards in the second quarter, ripping off five and six yards at a chunk. He blasted 29 yards off tackle on one run and needed but one block to set him free.

"I blew it myself," he commented. "If I had cut toward the sidelines, I could have picked up the block I needed. But I tried to run through the defender. I guess I've been watching too many pro games on television."

Newton and Ensley will lead their fellow Orangemen into West Virginia this Saturday to take on the Mountaineers. The game will offer another opportunity to the still bowl-hopeful SU squad.

Mark Rudd

Former SDS leader at Columbia University, Mark Rudd, spoke last night to a group of SU students. With the help of a film he told the story of the revolt at Columbia last spring.

Rudd shows film; Grant taken over

By RONI ZLOKOWER
Associate Editor

The crowd which rallied last night to hear Mark Rudd, radical student leader from Columbia University, staged their own minor "building seizure."

In order to accommodate their number, the group moved in mass from an HL classroom to Grant Auditorium in the law building, filling that hall to capacity. The potential strength of the group went untested however, as no opposition was met. The hall had previously been declared "not for student use" to the SDS organizers of Rudd's visit.

The evenings film which explained the background and showed the movement of last spring's Columbia University campus takeover was described by Rudd as being "not only completely biased but also completely the truth."

The film was produced by a group of commercial filmmakers, most of them amateurs, and all of them radicals or activists.

The group's purpose in producing the documentary was to relate the action "in front of the cops and not behind them and to show the people who really did the thing."

The film opened with former Columbia University President Grayson Kirk saying "the modern University is the cradle of our nation's future."

The seizure of the campus followed, showing how students, faculty members and people in the neighboring community had united to rock "Kirk's cradle."

Action was centered on the teardown of the fence around the proposed Morningside Heights gymnasium to be built in the adjacent Harlem neighborhood and moved on to the takeover of the entire Morningside Heights campus.

Clearly demonstrated in the film was the brutality used by the police in clearing the mostly passive rebels from the buildings. Scenes showed armed and helmeted police dragging, assaulting and clubbing nonresisting students during the May 21 "bust."

Rudd explained that the takeover proved to University administrators: 1) Students no longer wanted to be produced and sent out into society; 2) Students would no longer accept the paternalistic attitude of the University and 3) the demands of the students had to be taken seriously.

The students were not after "student power" as the mass media had presented, Rudd pointed out. Their two basic demands were focused on the need to wipe out both racism and imperialism. These two demands brought about the call for the university to end the construction of the Morningside gym, and to break all university affiliation with the Institute for Defense Analysis.

The gym became a symbol for the students and the black community of the

Speeded settlement

Bartlett's committee sought school strike facts

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

A six-man state legislative committee that included SU Vice President Kenneth G. Bartlett, a Republican Assemblyman, "without question speeded up the settlement" to the New York City school strike.

"None of those involved in the negotiations wanted the state to intercede," Bartlett said yesterday in an interview. "There appears to be no question that the committee had a salutory effect in getting back to school a million kids and 57,000 teachers."

The committee, created last Thursday, included Sen. Clinton Dominick, Sen. John Marchi, Sen. Basel Paterson, Assemblyman Bertram Baker, Assemblyman Leonard Stavisky and Bartlett. The committee did not enter the negotiations, but interrogated the participants in the crisis, including Mayor John Lindsay; Albert Shanker, president of the teachers' union Rhody McCoy, unit head of the Ocean Hill—Brownsville Demonstration School District; State Education Commissioner James E. Allen Jr.; and City Superintendent of Schools Bernard E. Donovan.

"We were a fact-finding team," said Bartlett, "and talked to these people on a person-to-person basis."

The basic question now, said Bartlett, is how the people in the Ocean Hill community react to the decision. "We're most hopeful that the Ocean Hill residents will try out the solution."

"This was one of the most tense and dangerous situations I've seen," he added. "The feelings were deep, and if we hadn't come to a solution, I feel confident that very serious disorders would have resulted."

"It is most gratifying that it has all ended so far in a reasonably promising way," Bartlett said. He added that he is "hopeful" that both sides would give the seven principals and three teachers involved in the dispute full process of law to see if they were legally or illegally appointed th their Ocean Hill district positions, and that the solution "will be given a fair opportunity."

Birth defects conflict: science versus ethics

Dr. Augenstein

By BETTY SCHUYLER

Dr. Leroy Augenstein, chairman of the biophysics department at Michigan State, spoke to AWS members last night in Maxwell Auditorium on the "New Morality."

According to Augenstein, the new morality does not encompass free sex and the removal of moral restriction, but concerns the conflict between scientific advancement and ethical practice. He emphasized that today's youth must examine science and critically examine their values.

Augenstein's lecture included a discussion of scientific alternatives to birth defects. At this time, scientists have two options when confronted with the possibility of a deformed child, he said. They can examine the dominant and recessive gene composition of the prospective parents and predict the odds of a birth defect or they can chemically manipulate defective genes to insure a normal, healthy child.

Since the prediction method is not always accurate, Augenstein feels that chemical manipulation is the trend in the future and will be scientifically safe and feasible within the next 25 to 50 years. In the future, it will be possible for doctors to remove a fetus from the womb, examine it for deformities and if the fetus is normal replace it in the womb. Doctors will also be able to place the fetus in a controlled environment, or "test tube womb," to insure a healthy child.

Parents will be able to choose the sex, height, weight and intelligence of their child before conception, and it is already possible to remove a portion of the embryonic fluid from a

Information

If you want to reach an information operator at Syracuse University's switchboard you should dial 4113. Dialing "O" for an operator will only hamper the process.

Ila G. Christoff, chief operator, said establishing an information extension is part of the University's preparation for Wide Area Telephone Service (WATS) which will probably go into effect late next month. Under the WATS system, SU will lease telephone lines to various parts of the United States and University operators will place long distance calls. WATS operators will be reached by dialing "O."

"We must clear the switchboard for WATS, so we set aside a separate extension for University information calls," Mrs. Christoff said.

A different role for universities

Perhaps student conviction that a generation gap exists is related to their experience in the classrooms of the universities. The central role of American universities has been to prepare students for definite roles in business, government and the established professions. But many of us as freshmen do not come here to be molded for a narrow role in society.

There is more interest in such programs as the Peace Corps, Vista or social service oriented vocations today and less interest in business and traditional ladders to success. There is also more uncertainty in many students on their career goals and broader aspirations.

These trends, if genuine, reflect basic changes in values or at least a breakdown in the universality of former values and a quest for better ones to replace them.

If indeed there is a search for values and an attempt to penetrate the established ethics to see what they actually stand for, then many of us look to the university to assist us in this quest. If the university is preoccupied with training another engineer or mathematician, lawyer or doctor, newspaperman or public administrator, then the great questions will not only remain unanswered but will never be raised. Furthermore, students can look to their university and see science being applied for the government—mainly for the military and only modestly for the poor or the racially oppressed.

The belief in a chasm between the young and the old is re-enforced when students see how the university operates in our society. Yet the university is in transition. It cannot be characterized as a totally vocational institution in pursuit of the American dollar.

Chancellor William P. Tolley two days ago before the Board of Trustees lauded the fact that Syracuse University has 70 programs to help the disadvantaged and urban problems. This is a modest departure from the doctrine of strict intellectual detachment in dealing with social problems that is the characteristic of the older university. He advocates limitations upon such departures and strikes the balance by excluding action by a university whose "prime purpose (is) social protest and partisan action..." as he stated last spring before the Board of Trustees. We agree a balance must be struck and recognize that the Chancellor, in attempting to find such a balance, is not stagnant in his view of the university. Although we do not expect the university to descend into endorsing Presidential candidates or fighting with the mayor's office, we would like to see Syracuse University assume a more critical view of society and speak out on some of the great and non-partisan issues such as civil rights or, as we requested last spring, the war in Vietnam.

Free spirit speak to my mind, not to my heart.
I need only understanding,
Not sensitivity or love.
I am stable of presence, tell me I'm true.
Touch me not beyond the point of understanding.
Leave me as I am. For I can live as I am
But can not be what you propose.
I fear you as I could fear only God.
Leave me ingenuous, ignorant, if ignoble, yes.
But I can go on. I can get through the day.
I can wade through the muck. I can persevere.

What offer you me?
Why, how, when could I know the truths
You exemplify?
If I let go, If I play your game,
What if I really let you reach me, hold me,
Touch my weakness, know my essence,
If I give in to your love, and devour it,
If I give you me.....
I will be alive, won't I?
I will be as I was when a child.
I will love you,
now,
Spirit speak to my heart of truth.

Changes in attitude

Absolutes

By Abe Wagner

The introduction of trial visiting hours, even on a limited scale, marks a new chapter in the social progress at Syracuse. University administrators have been careful to explain that the intent of such hours differs clearly from the connotation of "parietal hours."

A meaning generally given to parietal hours is, that during such times the actions of students within their own rooms is totally beyond the jurisdiction of the University in loco parentis. The philosophy of the new hours simply extends the traditional approach of open houses, allowing for more meaningful contact between male and female undergraduates.

Despite appearances to the contrary, there is reason to see a true change in philosophy behind this trial. In the days of open houses, it almost seemed that they were tacitly allowed, and never really encouraged. When one used to go over to the ominous "Women's Building" to register such a function, one was likely to meet with the reply, "but you just had one last week or was it the week before, why do you need another one." Above all, there seemed to be an understanding that contact between the sexes within their respective living centers was anything but a 'right' and by no means desirable.

The trial proposed by Standing Committee Three appears to recognize that there may be some merit in allowing such activities and there are possibly desirable consequences to be obtained. The thought may even have crossed their minds that visiting hours may be one right of a responsible student body.

The trial currently being implemented appears on its face a reasonable one. Allowing each living center to submit its own trial plan is in keeping with the growing trend toward decentralization of dorm life. By limiting the scope of the experiment to 20 per cent of the total undergraduate enrollment, Committee Three hopes to keep the trial to a size that can be efficiently analyzed.

One possible criticism comes from the nature of the proposed analysis. Present plans call for a predominently quantitative look at the trial next February, including hours, number of visitors, etc. What may be overlooked in such an analysis is that implemented rights, freedoms and privileges can never be looked at from the viewpoint of use.

If such line of reasoning were to be followed, our right to a free press might depend upon the number of newspapers we publish; our freedom of religion dependent upon the number of people attending church. You cannot compromise absolutes.

Similarly, if mature students are to be granted the right of visiting hours, their use of them must be independent of the privilege, provided the stiuplations of propriety continue to be met. If only a handful of students avail themselves of the opportunity, it is nonetheless their right.

Standing Committee Three might do well to keep this in mind when the time for retrospect draws near.

Letters to the editor

School spirit

To the Editor:

Never throughout my many experiences in sports, have I ever seen a more ugly situation than that which took place late in the fourth quarter of the Syracuse-Navy football game. Keeping with true football tradition, the devoted fans of the Orange surged into the end zone to tear down the goalpost in the waning minutes of the game. At that point, the outcome of the game had been decided, and both teams were content to have the clock run out as fast as possible. However, the stadium "rent-a-cops" decided to clear the area. Of course, this met with the obvious disapproval of the highly partisan crowd. The act of tearing down the goalposts is one which comes but once a year, and takes place on every high school, collegiate and professional gridiron in the country. Why should Archbold be different? As the Daily Orange suggested recently, the fans could show more enthusiasm by "supporting all the players, and by tearing down the goalposts."

When the fans met the "police" resistance they responded by throwing snow at the stadium security guards, and then by having a snowball fight among themselves. Yet the guards felt that being the target of a snowball or two, was enough provocation to bust into the crowd wielding their nightsticks across the heads of students. Some students in the crowd were bloodied from the totally unnecessary violence, while others luckily escaped unharmed.

We cannot in the future condone such belligerence on the behalf of the police. These students were not the lawbreakers who seize university buildings, but rather typical spirited young men acting in the American tradition.

To the Editor:

Jacques Lebel's description of graduate students (11/13) is quite possibly a very good description of Jacques Lebel, and quite possibly a very good description of Jacques Lebel's circle of friends, but I'm not at all sure that I like his proposed new stereotype any better than the old. Unless Mr. Lebel can produce some randomly sampled poll data to support his generalizations, I think it behooves the Daily Orange to inform the members of the faculty that the playboy image does not apply to those of us who are currently scheduled for comprehensive exams.

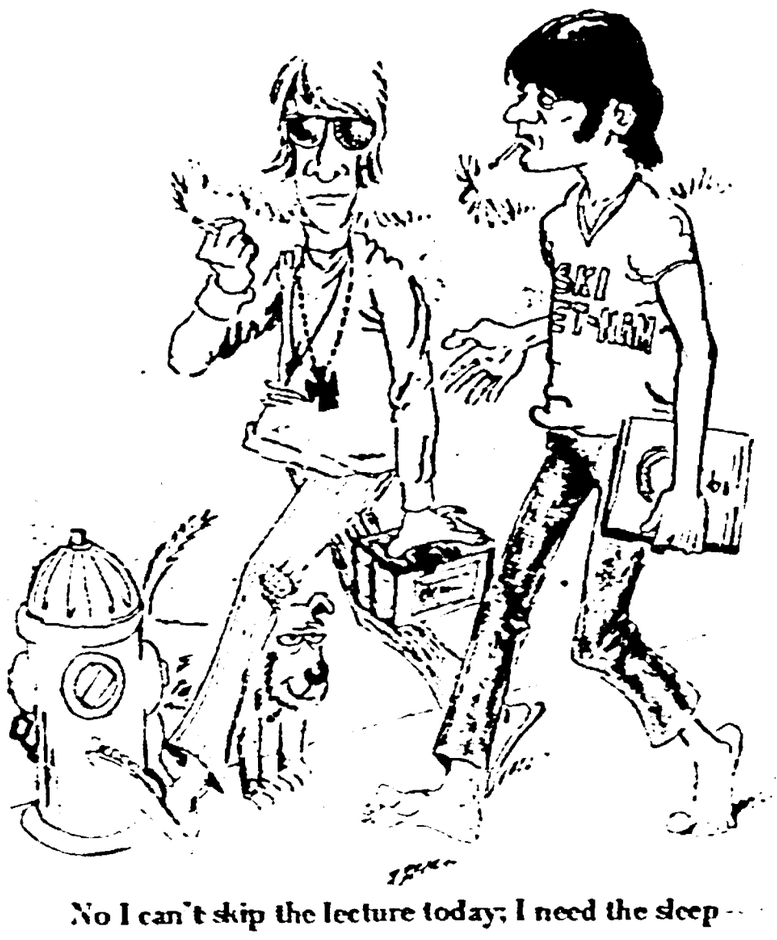
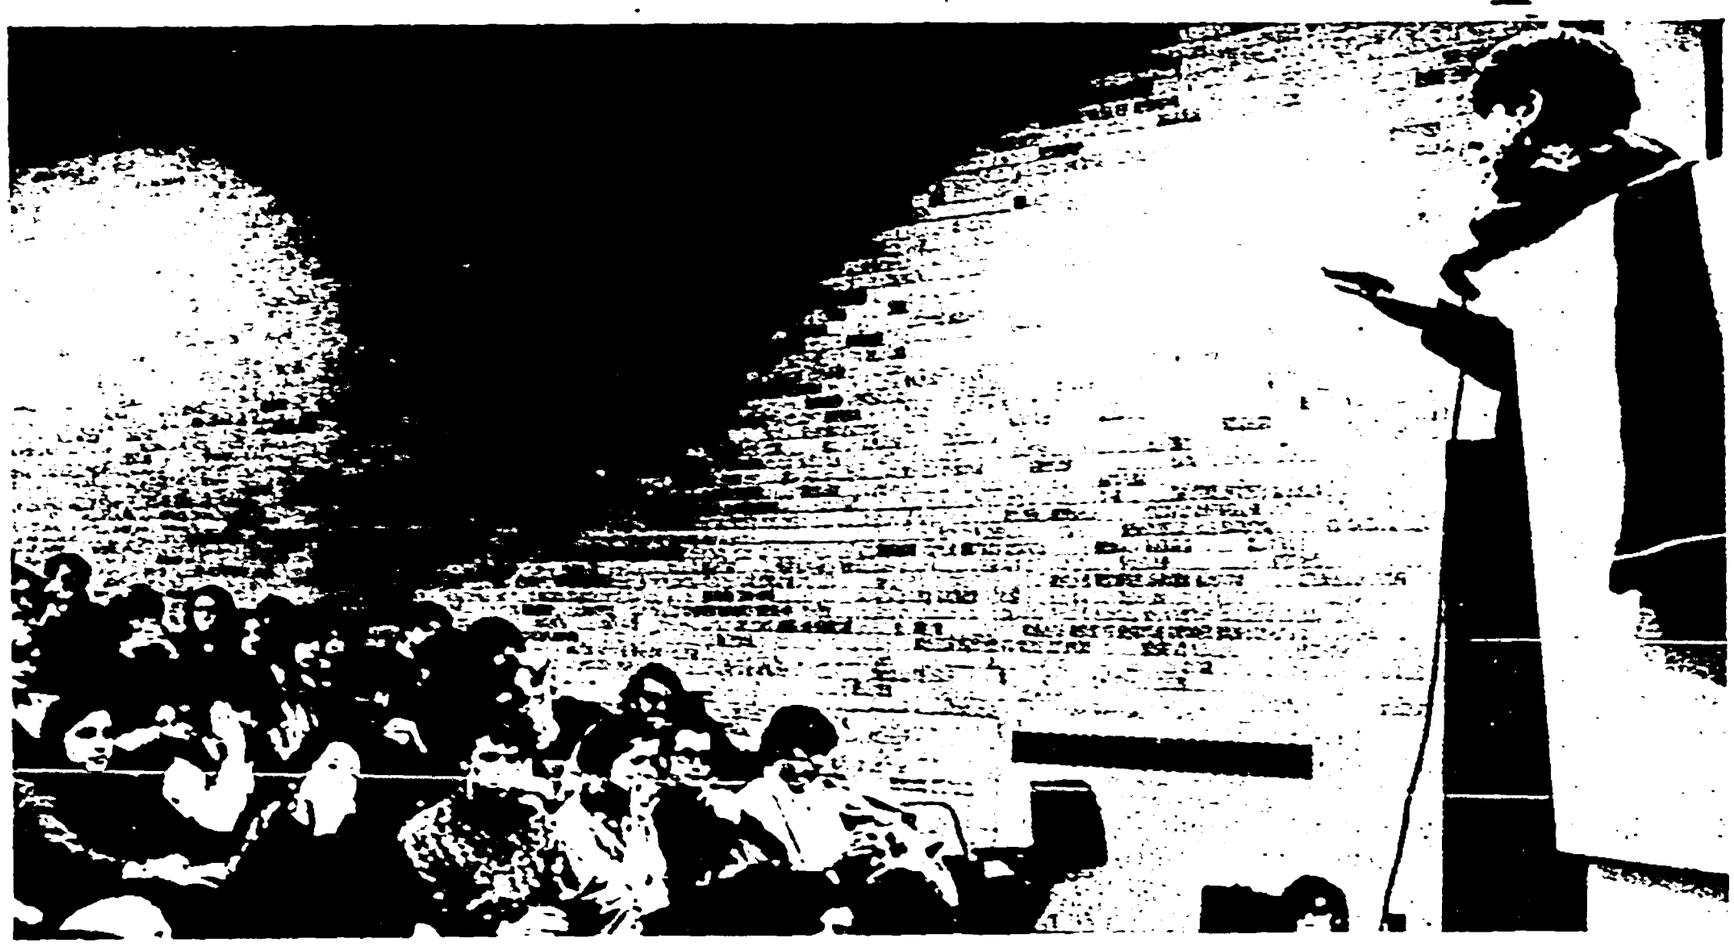
To the Editor:



Take the story of a man who marries a tall, luscious, 118 lb. blond. He excitingly hurries her off to a motel, finding that, in the raw, stripped of her padded this and her phony that, she only weighed an untempting 98 lbs.

There was a man who spent more than $12-million on a campaign, building an image. Millions of people, bewildered by this image, went out to vote. The image won.

Now, the image and the people are standing at the threshold. Once in, will the people find a man stripped of his image, something less than they expected, or desired, or needed?



The man, his image and his people, are facing each other.

university's "racist exploitation of the neighboring Morningside Heights area."

The Institute for Defense Analysis served as the symbol of all the work Columbia and other universities do in support of U.S. foreign policy and the war in Vietnam.

Rudd explained that the information found in President Kirk's files would present a true picture of American history. "Our courses and history books don't tell us what is really going on." Kirk's information tells us that the university has the right to condemn buildings in the surrounding slums for its own expansion.

"The only thing to do with the capitalistic university which is a reflection of our society" is to destroy it Rudd said.

"Our country is falling apart from its own racism and the democratic channels of government will not change anything."

"If we were savage in our takeover it was because we were fed up." The slogan "up against the wall" was used throughout the seizure as a sign to the "liberals, administrators and "establishment" that the students wanted fulfillment of their demands and amnesty and were not willing to negotiate.

Movable Crowd

A capacity crowd moved from a classroom in the Hall of Languages to Grant Auditorium last night to hear Mark Rudd speak. Students for a Democratic Society, the group which sponsored Rudd, had previously been told the auditorium could not be used. However, no opposition was met when the audience reassembled there.

SG roles to be redefined

By LOUIS JACOBS

The controversy of Monday night's Student Senate Government Structures Committee meeting over the role of the Student Government (SG) vice-president underscores one of the basic goals of a new student government constitution.

A new constitution must solve the problem of communication between the executive and legislative branches of government. These two branches maintain competition instead of some harmonious relationship, and student government suffers from the lack of cooperation.

Student Senate will discuss the executive part of the constitution tonight, but many of the changes directed to bring the two discordant branches together will be written in the legislative guidelines.

The general concept of a central steering committee which would divide areas of responsibility among all campus organizations will not appear in the executive part of the constitution.

Proposed changes for the offices of vice-president and treasurer will provide for a greater interaction of the two branches. Making the vice-president an officer of Student Senate will create some communicative link.

If a student tax is developed, then an appropriations committee chaired by the SG treasurer would include senators and organization treasurers. By relating the two branches in such ways, much of the competition would be eliminated.

Student leaders wish to redefine and clarify the roles of the executive and legislative powers. According to the proposed format of the new constitution, the executive will be charged with innovating ideas, bringing ideas changed into laws by the legislature to the administration, and after passage executing these new rules.

The legislature would refine suggestions from the executive through research and argument until a crystallized version was passed by senate and given to the executive to finish the policy-making process.

This philosophy and other issues, particularly the grape strike support motion, will be discussed to night at 7:30 p.m., Maxwell Auditorium in Student Senate.

Birth defects...

pregnant woman to analyze cells for gene deviation in the fetus period.

With 8,000 deformed births per year in teh United States, Augenstein stated that three choices now face the public. Current medical practices can be continued, resulting in ony out of 10 birth defects which are kept alive. The "survival of the fittest" theory can be revived which implies mercy killing of seriously defective new borns, or manipulation of henes can be practiced.

The ethical questions involving these choices cannot be underestimated according to Augenstein. "We believe in our society that once a child is born it has all kinds of rights and privileges. Also we say that once a child is conceived it has legal rights. Now the question becomes, should the unconceived have rights? With the new capabilities comes the new question that we couldn't have asked 10 years ago."

"You had better not wait until the day the decision has to be made to sort out your values," stated Augenstein. The new morality involves the social responsibility of each American to future generations. Augenstein ended the lecture by quoting Edmund Burke "All that is necessary for evil to triumph is for good men to do nothing."

Should the United States allow marriage between persons who both possess two defective genes which will be passed on to their children? With the onset of gene manipulation it will be possible to improve the human race. Scientists can genetically produce a stronger, more intelligent being. So this morally right or are we playing God? Should we allow a positively identified defective fetus to be born, or should we allow abortion in this case?

Medal awarded to Chancellor

SU Chancellor William P. Tolley was awarded a Salzberg Medal Monday night in a surprise climax to the 20th annual Syracuse Transportation Conference and Harry E. Salzberg Memorial Lecture held in the Hotel Syracuse.

The honor was voted Tolley by the Salzberg Circle, founder and Lecturers, who expressed their "appreciation for your intense interest in the Salzberg program, and thus to transportation education."

The citation expressed "pleasure in having you as a friend," and inducted him into the Circle "in recognition of your twenty years of devotion to transportation progress."

The text of the citation told Tolley "your devotion to the Salzberg program is only one of the many reasons why the founder of the Salzberg program, and the Salzberg Lecturers, wish to be counted among the many groups who have, in recent months, exercised the privilege of expressing their gratitude to you and their admiration of your. Having served Syracuse University for a quarter of a century, you recently survived a period in which your many friends declared open season upon you--a period in which those skilled in language searched their imaginations for words which would express what the name of William Pearson Tolley means to Syracuse University, to education, and to intellectual advance."

Nine former recipients of the Salzberg Medal, including U.S. Secretary of Transportation Alan S. Boyd, attended the transportation conference. Also receiving a medal this year was Alfred E. Perlman, president of Penn Central Railroad.

Perlman delivered the Salzberg Lecture as part of an evening program which included a 7 p.m. dinner attended by Secretary Boyd. Also speaking during the day were John Barriger, president of the Missouri-Kansas-Texas Railroad, and Don Armstrong, president of the Transportation Club of Syracuse.

No ceremonial position

Senate creates office for SG vice president

John Ross, chairman of Student Senate's Government Structures Committee, has challenged several points in yesterday's Daily Orange article about the executive branch of the proposed Undergraduate Government constitution.

According to Ross, "both the president and vice president of Student Government proposed that the V.P. be made Speaker Pro Tempore to act in a communicative role between the branches.

"The Speaker Pro Tempore," Ross continued, "is an overseer to all Senate actions and heads the secretarial branch, a job that occupies quite a bit of time. The committee felt that adding this to the V.P.'s current duties would prove to involve too much work.

"The committee therefore resolved that a new office, President Pro Tempore, be established for the vice president in Senate. The committee fully intends to invest this position with all of the communicative and functional duties proposed by members of the executive branch (member of speaker's cabinet, ex-officio member of all senate committees, overseer of all legislation and official executive representative to Senate.)

"It will be no means be a 'ceremonial position,'" Ross stressed.

"On the subject of an all-encompassing University Government, the committee is trying to create a structure in which an Undergraduate Government would have the autonomy necessary to deal with those problems that concern only undergraduates, while still representing the students' views on a University Senate," Ross commented.

"We believe this to be the only practical method of dealing with a changing governmental structure," he concluded.

SU officials cite donors contributing toward cost of HBC outdoor mural

Syracuse University officials yesterday paid tribute to the patrons who made possible Ben Shahn's Sacco-Vanzetti mural on the east wall of HBC.

Frank P. Piskor, vice president for academic affairs and dean of faculties, officiated at the unveiling of a dedicatory plaque honoring Richard Evans III, a former SU student.

Evans was enrolled in the College of Business Administration at Syracuse from 1959 until 1961. After serving two years in the U.S. Army, Evans was readmitted to the College of Liberal Arts in 1964. He died in a motorcycle accident in 1965.

Shahn's 60 by 12 foot outdoor mural depicts events of the sensational trial and execution of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti in the 1920's. The mural was designed and executed in Chartres, France, under Shahn's direction and then transported to Syracuse.

Contributing to the cost of the mural dedicated to the memory of their son were Mr. and Mrs. Richard Evans II. Evans, an art collector, is president of Lee Dyeing Co., Johnstown, N.Y.

Also contributing were Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Schulman of Gloversville, N.Y. Schulman is a collector of Jewish and Biblical themes by contemporary painters and sculptors.

ENGINEERING OPPORTUNITY
If you want iron-clad security and a very narrow job, stop reading. But, if a ground floor opportunity is part of your dream and you recognize that engineering means security, we are right for you. We are a yearling R. & D. firm with good business commitments. We need an EE circuit designer, preferably one who has some expenience. Your first job here would be the supervision of two field service engineers who will operate and maintain airborne IR and ground support equipment, plus modifying the gear and conceiving improvements. You would also assist in new developments. Future work will involve creative requirements in electro-optical and electro-mechanical devices. The average EE works for the average big company in the average corner. You may count on a competitive salary with us as a mere starting point.

Playtex·invents the first-day tampon™
(We took the inside out to show you how different it is.)
Outside: it's softer and silky (not cardboardy).
Inside: it's so extra absorbent...it even protects on your first day. Your worst day!
In every lab test against the old cardboardy kind... the Playtex tampon was always more absorbent. Actually 45% more absorbent on the average than the leading regular tampon.
Because it's different. Actually adjusts to you. It flowers out. Fluffs out. Designed to protect every inside inch of you. So the chance of a mishap is almost zero!
Try it fast.
Why live in the past?

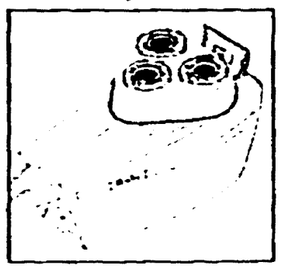
A shaver that gives almost twice the shaves per charge is worth some study.

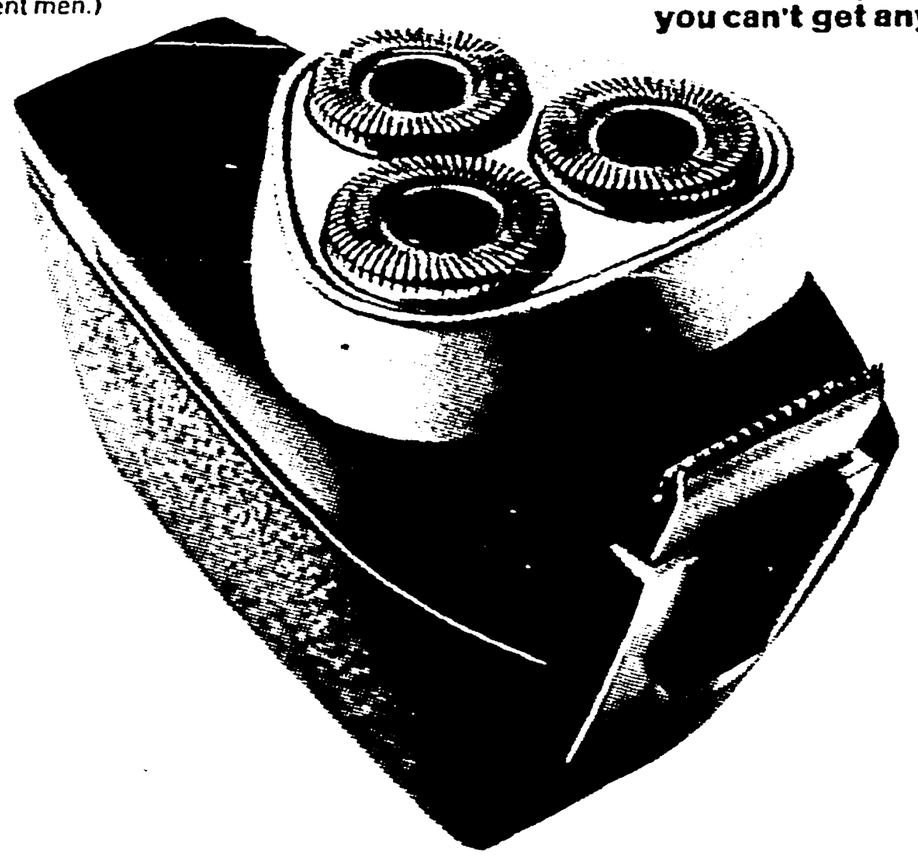


Our Rechargeable 45CT (below) gives you 3 weeks of close shaves on a single charge. (Which is nearly twice as much as any other rechargeable.)

And it gives you the choice of using the cord, or not.

It also has a lot of things in common with our new Tripleheader Speedshaver™ 35T.

Both shavers have 18 rotary blades set in three new 'floating' Microgroove™ heads, that follow the contours of your face.



And they both shave you as close or closer than a blade in 2 out of 3 shaves. (As tested in an independent lab by some very independent men.)

They also have some extras that make shaving a lot easier. A separate pop-up trimmer, snap-open cleaning, a handy on/off switch, and a 110/220 voltage selector for travel use.

Whichever you choose, you can't get a closer shave.

Olympic medalist speaks; stresses enjoyment over style

By DOUG GARR

Olympic skier Jim Heuga highlighted the Suski ski club meeting last night in Lyman Hall. After showing a fifteen minute movie of ski competition, Heuga spoke to over 200 ski enthusiasts on Song Mountain's upcoming plans including a special lesson program with Suski members.

Heuga will be the director the the Song Mountain Ski School beginning this season. Equipped with a staff of over 20 instructors, he will offer a $20 package deal including five lessons and unlimited Wednesday night skiing for the entire season.

Leigh Kalna, Suski president, introduced Heuga after preliminary remarks about Suski's plans for this season. Heuga presented a movie of international ski competition in the giant slalom at Vail, Colorado last winter. In that competition, he finished second to France's three-time Olympic champion, Jean-Claude Killy. Heuga was named the skier who contributed most to American skiing in 1967.

In a brief address to the ski club, Heuga emphasized his program will include all skiers, from beginners to advanced. He intends to create racing competition with at least eight other colleges in the Central New York area.

The 155-pound bronze medalist said that most college ski teams were weak because of football emphasis and added that he would like to help the Syracuse ski team wherever he could.

Heuga said that he intends to de-emphasize technique, implying that skiing is a sport for enjoyment. "I retired from racing because it was eleven months of training a year. I want to go out and ski for enjoyment and see if I really like the sport." The nine-year member of the U.S. Ski Team has been racing since he was five years old.

After addressing the meeting, Heuga answered questions from the audience for about ten minutes. His concluding remarks centered around the United States' chances in future international competition.

"I've often been asked if we'll ever beat the Europeans. The answer is we'll never beat them. The Europeans are professionals in a true sense as they never have any financial worries or school obligations as we have in the United States," said Heuga.

He cited an example showing the amateur level in this country. "Billy Kidd (Olympic silver medalist for the United States in 1964) still hasn't paid for two broken legs he received in competition."

Heuga has the highest regard for amateurs in today's sports competition. He emphasized the need for open competition between professionals and amateurs in ski racing much like was initiated in tennis this year.

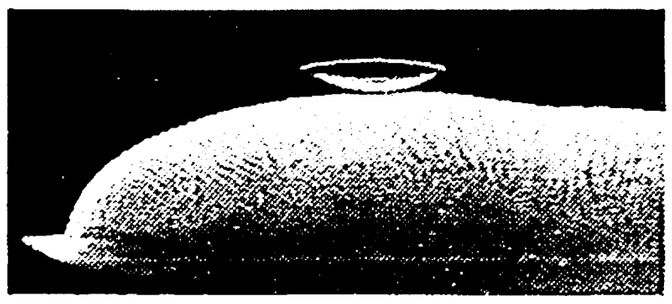
UU selling new button

University Union is selling a new button and invites its owner to let it stand for anything he feels. It depicts a tiny building labeled "Syracuse University Union Bldg."



"You might call it a social comment on the University," said Jerry Tartarian, UU chairman. "But like a work of art, I'm willing that the individual gets what he wants out of it."

The buttons are on sale at the book store and from UU board members for 30 cents. They are being sold as part of a UU fund raising drive that will also include a dance and a radio marathon scheduled for the weekend of December 13.

FRESHMEN: If you had your picture taken for the Orange Aid you have paid for it. If you did not pick it up last week you may still get in Wednesday from 7 to 9 p.m. in French Cottage, 408 Walnut. Bring your receipt of ID card. Greek houses who have bought in bulk may also pick up their books at the same time.

Give your contact lenses a bath tonight

In order to keep your contact lenses as comfortable and convenient as they were meant to be, you have to take care of them. But until now you needed two or more separate solutions to properly prepare and maintain your contacts. Not with Lensine. Lensine is the one lens solution for complete contact lens care.

Cleaning your contacts with Lensine retards the buildup of foreign deposits on the lenses. And soaking your contacts in Lensine overnight assures you of proper lens hygiene. You get a free soaking case on the bottom of every bottle of Lensine.

It has been demonstrated that improper storage between wearings may result in the growth of bacteria on the lenses. This is a sure cause of eye irritation and in some cases can endanger your vision. Bacteria cannot grow in Lensine which is sterile, self-sanitizing, and antiseptic.

Just a drop or two of Lensine, before you insert your lens, coats and lubricates it allowing the lens to float more freely in the eye's fluids. That's because Lensine is an "isotonic" solution, which means that it blends with the natural fluids of the eye.

Let your contacts be the convenience they were meant to be. Get some Lensine, from the Murine Company, Inc.

New organization to inform students about draft alternatives

A new organization has been added to the draft resistance movement at Syracuse University.

The organization, the Syracuse Draft Counseling Service, created with the help of Students for a Democratic Society, and the American Friends Service Committee, aims "to provide complete and accurate information about alternatives to the draft," according to spokesman Doug Schryber, an SU senior.

"We find that many men are drafted or enlist or volunteer for militiary service because they don't know the various alternatives such as physical, hardship or occupational deferments," he said. "We have decided to undertake about six projects aimed at providing better information to SU students and to the community."

Draft counseling is not entirely new to SU. Roger L. Fink, an SU English instructor, for example, last year provided such services in the People for Freedom and Peace office.

The Counseling Service, however, which said it will meet tomorrow in 307 Hall of Languages at 8 p.m., appears to be a broader effort to "inform the people about the draft."

For a month, according to SU graduate student Martha Westover, students and townspeople have been passing out draft information cards to young men going for pre-induction physical examinations.

Mrs. Westover, an organizer of the project, said the Syracuse induction center processes about 100 men from the middle third of New York State each day. She claimed that "most of the men are grateful to receive the information. Many do not know that they might qualify for a deferment or even that alternatives to the draft do exist."

In addition, the Counseling Service plans to run draft counselor training courses. About a dozen have already started a course, run with the help of the American Friends Service Committee.

On campus, the Counseling Service plans to "make a greater attempt to provide draft information and counseling." A draft information table will be set up on a regular basis, according to Mrs. Westover.

"Several faculty members and students already are doing draft counseling on an informal basis," she said, "but the Counseling Service plans to organize and advertise a larger counseling program."

The Counseling Service also is undertaking two non-campus projects. The first is contacting men in the military with a newspaper called "Vietnam GI." The paper is put out in Chicago by GI's returning from their tour of duty in Vietnam. The aim, according to Mrs. Westover, "is to provide GI's with both first-hand accounts of the war and military life and to give them information on ways to get discharged from the military."

She said the paper will be passed out to servicemen at the Syracuse airport and at area military bases.

The group said it also is starting an "I—A project." This involves contacting men who have been reclassified as I—A (eligible for military service) by Syracuse's two draft boards.

Chancellor

The Student Committee for the selection of a new Chancellor has made forms available for any student wishing to make a nomination for the position of Chancellor. These forms may be acquired from Ray Rafalik in Apartment 21, Lehman Hall or Mary Lou Leary at Kappa Alpha Theta, 306 Walnut Place. The presidents of the following dorms also have the forms: Sadler, Lawrinson, St. Mary's, Watson, Dellplain, Booth, Flint, Day, Shaw and Haven. The nomination blanks should be filled out as completely as possible and returned to Ray Rafalik, Chairman of Science Teaching, Lyman Hall via campus mail by Dec. 1.

Why Can't You Control Your Memory?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique for acquiring a powerful memory which can pay you real dividends in both business and social advancement and works like magic to give you added poise, necessary self-confidence and greater popularity.

According to this publisher, many people do not realize how much they could influence others simply by remembering accurately everything they see, hear, or read. Whether in business, at social functions or even in casual conversations with new acquaintances, there are ways in which you can dominate each situation by your ability to remember.

To acquaint the readers of this paper with the easy-to-follow rules for developing skill in remembering anything you choose to remember, the publishers have printed full details of their self-training method in a new booklet, "Adventures in Memory," which will be mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Memory Studies, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 173-41N, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

one iota

Some college students don't care an iota about future security. But the smart ones care a lot of iotas.

You've got to be hip to the future. You're not going to be in school forever. It makes sense to plan now by investing in a life insurance program that can provide the foundation for a solid financial structure.

Provident Mutual has a program tailored to college students. The earlier you start, the less it costs, and the more security you'll have a chance to build.

So stop by our office today. Or give us a call, and let's talk about it. We'll tell it to you straight . . . no Greek, honest.

Unbeaten Frosh a close-knit unit

By FRED KRAVER

"This freshman group had the best attitude, they worked harder, were tougher and wanted to learn more than any group I've ever had," said freshman football coach Jim Shreve. "They were also the most dedicated."

The highly successful 4-0 season is the fifth undefeated year for Shreve in 10 years at Syracuse. His overall record is a fantastic 36 wins, five losses, and one tie.

Things did not appear hopeful for the Tangerines when their opener against Manlius was rained out October 4. The game was never replayed. It was rescheduled for last Friday, but snow forced the scrubbing of the game entirely. "It was a disappointing cancellation," said Shreve. "We were ready for Manlius."

They had to play their first game against Navy, a traditionally tough team, at Annapolis. The result was a 14-7 victory.

"We moved the ball beautifully," explained Shreve, "and the defense had a great game. It was our best frosh performance ever at Navy." The score is deceptive, because among the Tangerines' difficulties was their lack of game experience. Rich Phillips, a back, was a standout at Navy.

Next, the Tangerines faced a weak group of Army Plebes. Said Shreve, "We played real fine football. It was an explosive game in that we had long, breakaway runs." The score, 47-0, illustrates that. The offensive line was excellent, and backs Marty Januszkiewicz and Greg Allen began to surge.

The Buffalo contest shaped up as one of the frosh's toughest. The mark of a great team is the ability to rise to the occasion, and SU mauled Buffalo 60-0. "They hit us harder than any other team," Coach Shreve pointed out. "Our physical power and strength, gained by lifting weights, simply overpowered Buffalo." The defense continued to be phenomenal.

Colgate was the next opponent who staggered away from the Tangerines, 18-6 victims. The game was played in six inches of mud.

Overall, Syracuse outscored the opposition 139-13. They rushed for a total of about 1500 yards, while allowing only 200 yards on the ground, and intercepted 12 passes, to only two picked off by the enemy.

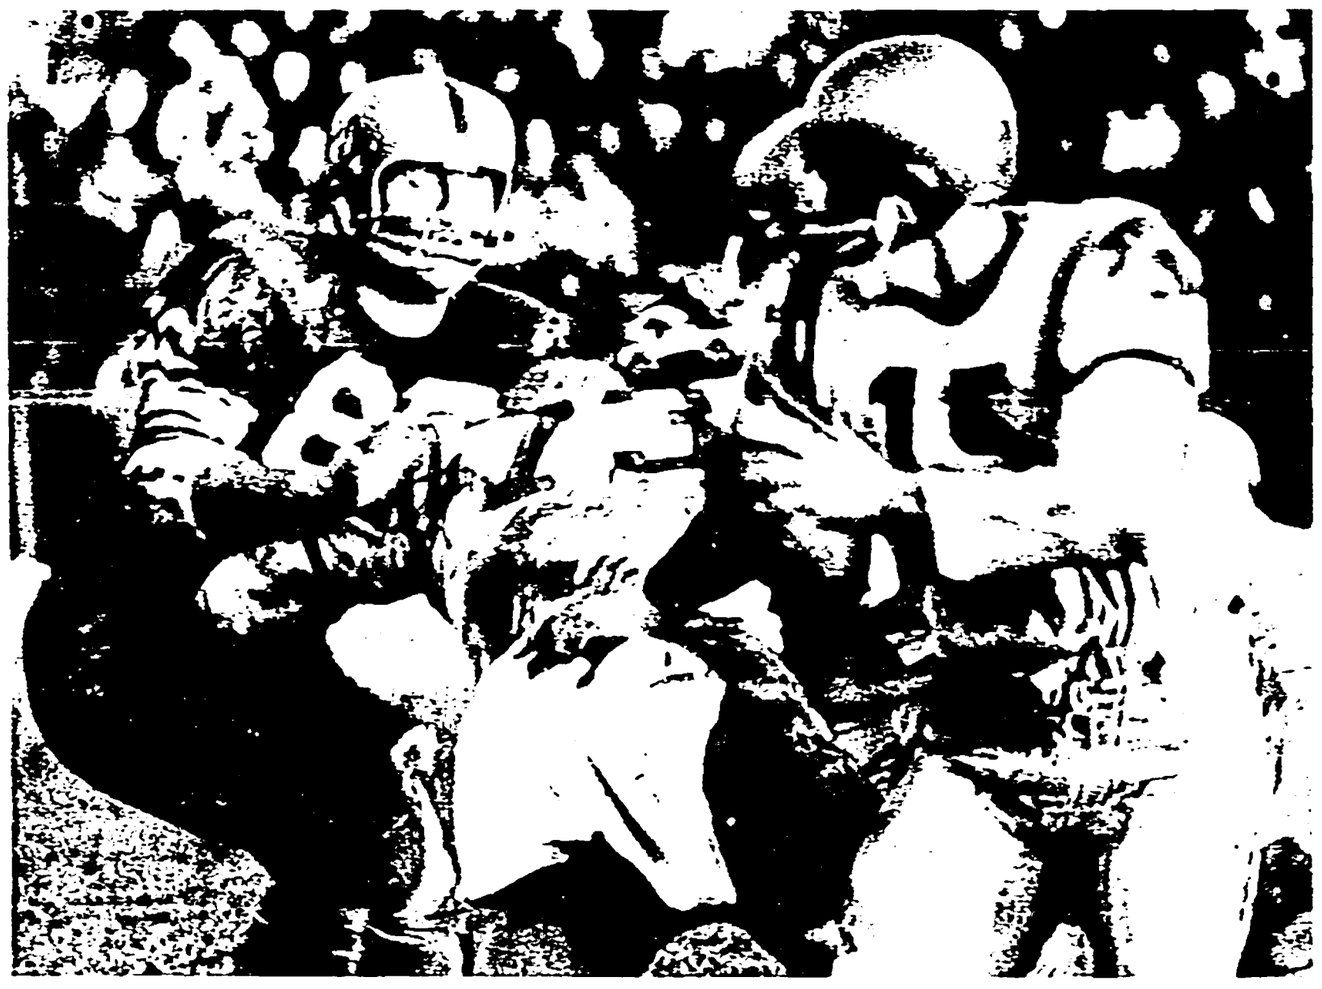
The defense gave up only two touchdowns. The second tally, Colgate's was the result of a Syracuse fumble on its own two yard line.

Fine varsity potential lies in the secondary, particularly Dennis Finnigan and Tom Meyer, both of whom had four interceptions. In the Navy game, the defense was vulnerable to short passes, because the secondary was playing off their men, fearing the long pass. "We improved after the Navy game," Finnigan pointed out.

Middle guard Ted Lachowitz, and tackles Howie Goodman and Len Campolieta also have fine potential. Linebackers Ed Berry and Clark Yingst are included in that group. Yingst, an A student in high school, received Coach Shreve's praise for having a photographic memory. His ability to recognize offenses, and adjust the defense accordingly, was extremely valuable to the team. "The defensive system at SU is flexible," Yingst explained, "but fairly easy to adjust to."

The excellent offensive line was the hub of the SU attack. Doug Auld, John Lobon, Joe Ehrmann and Ross Sposato all have good varsity potential. Backs Januszkiewicz, Allen and Phillips were very impressive.

"Januszkiewicz," said Shreve, "is aggressive, mean, tough, and fast."



On Allen: "Fine temperament, great competitor, extremely versatile."

On Phillips: "Good potential...improved more in eight weeks than any other back."

One of the team's few faults was the airial attack. "I blame it on myself," said Shreve. "We didn't have time to improve the passing during practice." Ray Jarosz, however, was a standout end.

The running game was the team's most potent weapon. "The line was fantastic," said Januszkiewicz. "We made the best of the holes they provided," Allen added. "You can't pick out anyone on the line," explained Lobon. "We were a unit."

Coach Shreve summed it up. "I'm very, very pleased. The boys worked very hard, and had a tremendous attitude. They were fantastic."

Booing

To the Editor:

I heartily agree with Bob Bancroft, concerning the way the fans are treating Rich Panczyszyn.

I am an avid sports fan, and I can appreciate the high emotion that a fan feels, but booing (especially a member of your own team) is altogether uncalled for.

It is true Rich is having a tough year, and no one realizes it more than himself, but so is Frank Ryan of the Cleveland Browns. Does that mean that they are bad quarterbacks?

I have heard comments from many of my friends saying Panczszyn should have his scholarship taken away and that number 44 should not be worn by Rich Panczszyn. But for a man like Ben Schwartzwalder to have such faith in a kid, he must possess some pretty high credentials, which he showed in earlier games, before the booing set in.

Having the confidence of teammates, fans, and, most importantly, oneself, is half the battle, especially in the game of football.

Let's start acting like Syracuse University students and fans should act - with dignity.

Olympics

To the Editor:

I too am an ardent believer in the purity of the Olympic Games, and wholeheartedly agree that Olympic competition in no place for politics. As sympathetic as I am towards what Negroes are trying to do, Tommie Smith and John Carlos were unforgivably disrespectful to the meaning of the Olympics as well as the American flag.

As Mr. Wallace suggested,"The fact that Negroes in America are not first-class citizens is irrelevent. The fact that they used the Olympics to protest is relevant." The sanctions imposed upon Smith and Carlos by the United States Olympic Committee at the request of the International Olympic Committee were felicitous and just.

It must be stressed — that black athletes are second-class American citizens is totally irrelevant. It is indeed inconsequential that black athletes, who do bring honor and prestige to the U.S. can not reap the rewards of their labor and fully partake of American freedom and liberty.

It is irrelevant that they as black athletes, representing the ideals of America, are more than likely to encounter difficulty in obtaining adequate housing here in the States. It is irrelevant that most Americans are not prejudiced, but do not desire to have a black family live next door. It is irrelevant that black athletes are allowed to participate in track and field events, while their brothers and sisters are denied the opportunity to participate competively in the arena of employment. The black athletes are wlecomed on a track field to represent their country, while countless blacks are coldly recieved in personel and employment offices.

To "prostitute" the meaning of Olympic Games for the purpose of protesting political and social injustice is moral heresy of true sportsmanship and competition. "Legalized prostitution" of black athletes, and black people is shameful, but nevertheless irrelevant that is, if you are white.

Unsung hero

Tackle Fusco has important job

By DOUG GARR

Andy Fusco is one of the unsung heroes of the Syracuse football team. He plays offensive tackle and usually the only publicity he receives is criticism when he doesn't do his job.

The backfield gets all the glory in a big win, and the offensive linemen get all the blame in a big loss.

The 6'1", 245 pound junior has an important job—opening the holes for the backfield and providing protection for the quarterback when he passes.

"We catch hell on Monday after the coaches review the game films," he says, "so there's a lot of pressure to do your job well on Saturday.

"When the backs don't gain big yardage, everybody blames the linemen. When you make a good block, though, there's a lot of personal satisfaction."

Andy psychs for each game by reviewing films of SU's opponents during the week. Tuesday and Wednesday the linemen work on the "sleds," but all week long they are getting ready mentally.

"In playing line, personal pride gets you psyched. The most important thing is gaining the respect of your teammates. When you do that, you've accomplished something."

Andy's hometown is Roselle, N.J. He played offensive and defensive tackle and was all-state in his senior year. He received about ten scholarship offers and narrowed his choices to Syracuse and William and Mary. He chose Syracuse "because it is rated high academically and has a tougher schedule than William and Mary."

In playing line, Fusco tries to limit his mistakes each game. Football is so specialized and complex today that the team making the least individual mistakes will ultimately win.

"There are two kinds of mistakes that a linemen can make—physical and mental. The physical mistake is when you miss a block, and the mental when you block a man the wrong way that a play is going."

Playing the line is not just hitting the opponent, emphasizes Fusco. A lot of defensive linemen make good second efforts so it is important that his opposing lineman is contained until the whistle is blown.

"The hardest hitters aren't always the best blockers. Position blocking is very important also," he points out.

Andy says that a lineman feels worst when the defense penetrates on a pass play and throws the quarterback for a big loss.

"If Paul or Panz gets creamed when they're about to throw, I really feel like a bum." When the quarterback gets dumped, the coaches only have the offensive line to blame. "We feel good when we open a hole for a long gain, though."

Fusco insists that the football team only takes one game at a time, but hinted that they have been pointing to the big one at Penn State on December 7th. Presently, the Nittany Lions are third-ranked nationally and will be the toughest team that the Orangemen will face.

"This game means our whole season. We still have to beat a real good West Virginia team this Saturday, but it's tough not to look ahead," he says.

According to Andy Fusco, if the offensive line hits like they did against Navy, the Lions will get a run for their money in University Park next month.

TACKLE Andy Fusco has been a starter in every game of this, his junior year on the Hill.

Bishop's son dies

Jon Sherman's 2 worlds: drugs, orthodox religion

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

Close friends and classmates stare numbly as they ponder how the two worlds of Jonathan Sherman might relate to his mysterious, pre-dawn death yesterday.

The 19-year-old sophomore was found, covered with snow, beneath an uncompleted overpass near Erie Boulevard East and Catherine St.

Jonathan Sherman, in a photograph taken last year.

Although the Medical Examiner termed the death "accidental from head injuries," police refused to rule out the possibility of homicide.

Chief John F. O'Connor disclosed that his investigators are considering two theories: that the student fell or jumped from the overpass, or that he was assaulted.

Robbery has been ruled out as a motive, O'Connor revealed.

"Evidence indicates that the deceased had a deep emotional problem and a concern for others," O'Connor added.

Jon Sherman's two worlds combined the religious orthodoxy maintained by his father, Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, and an art student's impulsive realm of experimentation and discovery.

These disparate influences were recalled yesterday by a shocked group of friends here at SU.

David Hearne, his roommate for both terms last year, remembered learning through long conversations "how greatly Jon disagreed with his father's religious tenets.

"He just couldn't indulge in the strict ceremony and traditions which the Bishop stressed," Hearne explained.

His roommate and friend echoed others' opinions as he recalled Jon's "very friendly and outgoing manner. He got along with everyone on our floor, but also spent a lot of time alone -- just thinking.

"He never wanted to impose his problems on others and always tried to resolve them himself," Hearne reflected.

Al Forray, one of Jon's roommates this term, was roused from sleep and interrogated by detectives early yesterday morning about the victim's grades, girl friends, despondency and possible drug usage.

According to Forray, "Jon would be the last person to commit suicide. He mentioned once that it was a giant cop-out."

Forray also mentioned, "Jon would be very satisfied to just sit for hours by himself and think. He often took long walks to think about life."

Four Walnut Place cottages, seven others to be vacated

By ETTA FIELEK

Jean Crawford, dean of women's housing, last night presided at a "cushion-the-blow" meeting of cottage residents and head residents to discuss potential second semester cottage closings.

The purpose of the meeting was to dispell rumors being circulated concerning the choices of the doomed cottages and to answer any questions about procedures. Dean Crawford said that it is essential to close cottages almost every February to consolidate University resources and facilities and to cut overhead costs.

The problem this year, according to Dean Crawford, "is intensified by a drop in overall enrollment as well." With the 50 vacancies now existing in resident halls and the 100-150 more that will exist at the end of the semester, "it would not be economically feasible," she said, "to operate resident halls, regardless of size, when there are too many vacancies in them."

The only cottages which are now definitely known to be on the list for closing are those on the 400 block of Walnut. Their location, which is adjacent to the side of the proposed new library, would subject them to construction noise all through the semester. Another consideration is the need for parking spaces near the site.

Buzzy Kis, AWS housing chairman, emphasized that AWS "has no means, legal or illegal, to fight the cottage closings, since people were told of the possibility of closing at room sign-up, and a statement to that effect was put on room forms."

There are 19 women's cottages now open, of which, excluding the four on Walnut, another seven or eight must be vacated. Announcements of the remaining cottages to be closed will be made the week after Thanksgiving.

Dean Crawford attributed the number of vacancies at the end of the semester to marriages, students going abroad, graduations and people leaving school. Their primary responsibility, she said, in assigning rooms for the second semester, will be the people returning from aboard, the members of Alpha Delta Pi sorority, who will return to University housing after recolonization of this chapter, and the uprooted cottage residents.

There is no set formula in determining which houses will be closed. The physical condition of the house is taken into account, along with the frequency and severity of maintenance problems. The types of spaces available within a living center will also be considered to provide types of spaces in line with those in demand. "Three out of five requests for room changes now on file," according to Dean Crawford, "are for single rooms." We would think twice about closing a resident hall with a large number of singles.

In answer to a question raised by Cindy Bailey, president of AWS, concerning disruptions of the visiting hours experiment by cottage closings, Dean Crawford said that, too, might be taken into consideration

Portnoy:

'Pre-registration won't be implemented in near future'

By BETH HILLSON

"We won't see preregistration at SU," said Jeff Portnoy. "It won't be implemented in the near future. There's too much opposition, especially in the College of Liberal Arts."

In a dual role as member and speaker, Portnoy answered questions on preresigtration and "dead week" at the regular meeting of the Student Government Executive Council.

Scheduled guest speaker Registrar Edwin Smith was unable to attend the meeting for personal reasons. Portnoy, vice president of Student Government, has worked closely with the registrar on the two topics since May and filled in for Smith.

The registrar is not the stumbling block to preregistration, Portnoy pointed out. He emphasized the Liberal Arts College is the deterrent. Dean Cope stressed that there are so many drops and ads in the College of Liberal Arts that preregistration would cause a phenomenal amount of paper work for the department, Portnoy reported.

The expense of obtaining computers and cards to use in preregistration is too much, he said. "Syracuse doesn't have the money to spend on such a project."

Portnoy discussed plans he and Smith had to use the computers on hand for the few days needed to preregister. However, the University would not appropriate the $1100 needed.

The proposal which is now being considered is to mimeograph 8,000 copies of the courses being offered for the spring semester. These will be passed out the week students return from Thanksgiving vacation. Students will be asked to check the courses they plan to take next semester.

A working force of SG executive members will be at the major dining halls on campus during the evenings of Dec. 3-5 and in the lobby of HBC during the day.

"Every student will have a chance to fill out a form," Portnoy said. "From there the number of students planning to take a specific course will be submitted to their respective departments."

In this way Portnoy hopes that the proper number of sections will be available in each course at registration.

The system is geared not so much to upperclass students, many of whom have preregistration within their specific majors, but to freshmen and shophomores who take many of the large survey courses.

"This system is not the least bit scientific, but it's the best we can do for now," stated Portnoy.

He also spoke of a "dead week," or study week, which is prior to finals. During this week there would be no regular classes. However, the faculty seems much opposed to this idea, according to Portnoy. Their feelings seem to be

Kennan's order vs. student dissent

George Kennan notes in "Democracy and the Student Left," "My generation of students——that of the 1920's——felt no need to exert itself on behalf of the Southern Negro or the urban poor."

He wonders why this generation is different. Is it really more idealistic and courageous than generations past? He is swift in answering his question.

"The speed with which the focus of student concern has switched from the Negro of the rural South to the Negro of the urban North and then to Vietnam, and then to the disciplinary regime of the college campus, suggests. . .that the real seat of discomfort lies not in the objects that attract these feelings but in some inner distress and discontent with contemporary society that would find other issues to fasten to. . .if the present ones did not exist."

In this manner he touches the genuine answer to his question and then flees. The issues students raise and the objects of their concern, he claims, are irrelevant because they would create others if the existing ones were solved. They would be motivated to create others due to their own psychic turmoil and inner distress, which is the real problem, isn't it?

This view conveniently avoids the issues raised by students. It does seem evident that the commitments of some students are less enduring than their general passion. However, a nationwide survey by Educational Testing Service on student protests reported the following: 38 percent of the 859 colleges that answered the survey experienced protests against the war in Vietnam. Thirty-four per cent reported protests against dormitory regulations. Civil rights issues accounted for protests at 29 per cent of the institutions.

Although it is possible that protests at individual colleges jumped from issue to issue, these figures indicate an abiding concern over militarism in our society, racial discrimination and authoritarian administrations. Furthermore, they reflect merely the actions of the activist fringe and not the convictions of the moderate majority. Although Kennan acknowledges he is writing about a minority he implies the majority secretly approves or sympathizes with the minority.

He even agrees the issues students raise concerning race relations and the war in Vietnam are legitimate but contends their manner of raising them poses a threat to the order of our society. In this view he reveals his preoccupation with the order.

We prefer to dwell upon the intimate connection between social order and social justice and point to Russia, which Kennan has observed so astutely before, as an example of where students are orderly at the irreparable cost to man's sense of justice.

Sweet dreams

"Milhous"

By Bob Tembeckjian

It has been two weeks since the election of Richard Nixon, and for the first time the story of how he spent election morning has been revealed. However, the identity of my informant cannot be revealed for purposes of security.

"Ohh. No! Ohh. Ughhhhhh!"

"Milhous! Wake up, Milhous! You're having a nightmare."

"My God, Pat, I dreamt it again. The same dream I've had for eight years. I dreamt that Eisenhower kid was marrying my Julie."

"Dear, that was no dream. He is."

"Oh, no! But that's not all. I dreamt about Spiro, too."

"Again? What was it this time? Last week you thought he said 'If you've seen one slum, you've seen them all.' Before that it was 'I have difficulty imagining myself a national leader.'"

"Pat, that was no dream. He did say those things. Last night was worse. I dreamt he went on national television and said 'I got my job through the New York Times' when he knows very well it was through Strom Thurmond."

"Well, Milhous, he could have said a lot worse."

"Wait. I'm not through. He did. He also said I was a great checkers player and that anyone who enjoys something as American as checkers deserves to be President. He said Hubert Humphrey would 'slush around' as President but that no one could expect to get any slush from Dick Nixon."

"Was that the whole dream?"

"No, Pat. There's more. I dreamt something more horrible. I dreamt that I carried every one of the fifty states."

"What's wrong with that?"

"Well, you know that George Washington was the only president to unanimously win the Electroal College. Well, I thought I'd be humble and allow him that unique honor. So I addressed the 539 electors, saying that, in respect to Washington's greatness, one of them should not vote for me."

"Why, Dick, that's beautiful. What happened?"

"They all thought they'd take the initiative and all 539 voted for Hubert. So I lost unanimously."

"Well, maybe he'll give you a cabinet post."

Doctor of Social Science

Help or hindrance?

In 1946 when the D.S. Sc. program was begun at the Maxwell School, it represented the forefront of innovation in graduate education. At a time when the term Ph.D. was synonymous with strict requirements and total rigidity of program, the D.S.Sc. offered to the academic community the opportunity for interdisciplinary work at the doctoral level, for flexibility of course and tool requirements and for training as a college teacher, as well as for the scholar with interests in cross-disciplinary research. The D.S.Sc. program has maintained its function as an innovative force in higher education with a process of continued evaluation and evolution. As an example, in 1963, the program expanded its academic prupose to encompass the training of professional specialists considering careers in government, business and industry, as well as in all phases of higher education.

During the period since 1946, and partially due to the influence of such programs as the D.S.Sc. and its graduates, the Ph.D. degree has become more flexible. No longer are tool requirements fixed arbitrarily at two languages, nor, at Syracuse, fixed by the Graduate School. Each department now determines the tool qualifications needed for its students. The Ph.D. degree, as offered by Syracuse University and universities across the country, is liberalizing within its structure to allow for interdisciplinary programs. The need felt in 1946 to be identified by a distinctive and different title, that of Doctor of Social Science, is no longer felt by those individuals interested in striking out upon an academic trail of their own definition. The number of doctoral degrees offered in the United States other than those titled Ph.D. have diminished in recent years rather than grown, not because academic life is returning to acceptance of the rigidity of the Ph.D. of 1946, but because the title Ph.D. now is synonymous with the term Doctor in American academia as the challenge of change has been accepted and accomplished within this title rather than without. The end result of the changes within American academia is felt by many to have left those who hold the degree in the position of explaining why, with the current structure and flexibility of the title Ph.D., they hold the title D.S.Sc., and "What is a D.S.Sc., anyway?"

The question of title change has been one argued by D.S.Sc. faculty staff and students for many years. There has been strong opposition to the change in the past with the argument that the Ph.D. is too rigid. Recent changes in the Ph.D. have shown this not to be the case, and leading faculty members such as Dean Bailey and Dean-designate Campbell are now convinced that the distinct title may be a hindrance rather than a useful distinction in the near future.

Students in the program have been quoted as being split on the issue of change of degree title. The inference made has been that this split has been approximately even. To approach the truth of this assumption, these writers took it upon themselves to conduct a telephone survey of all D.S.Sc. students living in Syracuse who were at home on the evening of November 19, 1968. The question asked of these students was: "If I had my choice of degree title, either D.S.Sc. or Ph.D., understanding that the change would require that I be responsible for two broadly defined research tools or one with high proficiency, drawn from a listing which would include the following (listing of courses being considered for fulfillment of the tool requirement), I would (a) choose to retain the D.S.Sc. or (b) prefer to receive the Ph.D." When completed it is anticipated that the sample will include 100% of those students living within the Syracuse area. At the time of publication, utilizing those calls made on November 19th, which reached 62% of the D.S.Sc. students on campus, 75% preferred to receive the Ph.D. and 25% wished to retain the D.S.Sc.

It appeared that the feeling of the majority of the students was that the need for a distinctive title had passed, and that it would be to their long-run advantage to receive the Ph.D. title. Those against the degree change stated as their primary concern the loss of flexibility which might follow. Attached to the proposed change in title are two other changes in the program structure. The first deals with the social science core which would be modified to allow for more individual flexibility. The second change would be to enlarge the concept of the tool requirement away from the traditional language or statistics concept which in the past could be required by the student's advisory committee, to include work in other relevant research techniques such as: Symbolic Logic (Phil. 175G), Survey Methodology (Soc. 325), Storage and Retrieval Systems (Hist. 305), even Studies in Iconography (Art History 202).

Thus those who argue for the change from the degree title Doctor of Social Science to Ph.D. in Social Science argue not from weakness or insecurity, but from an attitude of strength and innovation. We see in the title D.S.Sc. no longer a functional distinction. While it does not represent an unbearable hindrance, the distinction is no longer necessary. The interdisciplinary social science program at Maxwell will continue to be innovative, continue to be progressive, continue to be different from the disciplinary programs with all of the strengths that this infers. The change is recommended not as a step backward, but as one forward in the progressive tradition of the program.

UG backs grape strike; CAP head a non-student

By COLETTE STALLINGS

The Undergraduate Government last night declared its support of "the table grape strike and nationwide table grape boycott" at Student Senate.

Along with the declaration, a resolution was passed stating that UG urges students to "actively participate in the Onondaga County boycott of table grapes," and "to join the picket lines being set up around Syracuse stores which are continuing to sell table grapes during the period of the strike."

Senator Peter Hoffman suggested that since "the people of Syracuse are not particularly well disposed to the students of Syracuse University," students should participate in organizations but not actively in picketing.

Graduate students Dennis Chaffe and Edward Ruhe presented the resolution to senate and pointed out that as in the case of the civil rights movement in the South, "If students don't do it, it will not happen."

Ruhe explained that at the present time the Peace and Freedom Party, the Students for a Democratic Society and the University Religious Council have agreed to join in picketing.

Also in the resolution was demand that Food Service "discontinue serving table grapes in any form during the duration of the strike."

Reporting on the University Senate, Speaker Ed Feldman stated that the Curriculum Committee of the University Senate voted to eliminate ROTC from the Liberal Arts curriculum. In the future, academic credit will not be given for any ROTC course.

According to a University Senate spokesman, however, the decision was to eliminate ROTC from the College of Liberal Arts but not until another place for it can be found.

In a surprise action, Speaker Pro Tempore John Diamond,

JEFF PORTNOY

...SG Vice President

reading a letter from Assistant Dean of Men Melvin Mounts, reported that Peter DelGiurno, president of the Campus Alliance Party, is "not currently enrolled as a student," and therefore not qualified to hold office.

A motion by Jeff Portnoy, vice president of UG, that the UG vice president be elected automatically with the UG president, thus making it impossible to split the ticket, was defeated. The election procedure for all officers will be included in an elections article of the UG constitution, which will be written by the Senate Committee on Political Equity (SCOPE.)

Giving his weekly report, chairman of the Student Services Committee, Richard Barton, remarked, "There's nothing new except bugs in Shaw, in the duck, I believe."

This week, displaying two water glasses, Barton appealed that something must be done about the sanitary condition of eating utensils. He explained that the University of Maryland solved a similiar problem by invoking Federal food and drug laws.

had "about being a burden on other people."

Diane Lornzen, a junior in one of his art classes, also observed that "Jon seemed to be thinking a lot about things. He stayed alone during the class breaks and was very quiet."

Another acquaintance of the dead youth was Ray Mickelic, a sophomore Forestry student who withdrew from SU after a drug incident this term. Mickelic, contacted by the Daily Orange at his home in Pennsylvania, recalled how Jon visited him in the infirmary after his adverse reaction to a hallucinatory drug.

"He just dropped by to wish me well. He told me things weren't as bad as they probably seemed. I never really knew him that well and was surprised that he would go out of his way just to visit me," Mickelic commented.

One very close friend who spent long hours with Jon before his death disclosed yesterday that the victim "had been using marijuana and LSD, at least since his freshman year." The student revealed his name to the Daily Orange, which agreed to withhold it from publication after confirming his close association with the dead youth.

Two Daily Orange reporters visited Jon's apartment yesterday afternoon and observed the disarray of a police search. Amid the clutter of artist's supplies and overflowing ashtrays, two paperbacks seemed to symbolize the incompatibility of Jon's life.

Lying beside each other on his desk were The New Testament and J.R.R. Tolkein's Lord of the Rings.

Library grads plan new group

By KAREN MAGNUSON

As the College of Library Science changes to keep pace with an increasingly science-oriented society, the students apparently do not want to be left behind.

At a meeting two weeks ago, plans were germinated for an association of Library Science graduate students, called "Concerned Librarians of University Training." The foundation of this group was encouraged by the enthusiasm of the present dean, according to the members of the association who were interviewed yesterday.

The needs for greater identity and changes within the School of Library Science have been widely felt. An appointed steering committee met to formulate recommendations to the group. Members of this committee include Arthur Young, Amy Dougherty, Pamela Struble, Thomas Bonn.

The stated purposes of forming this organization are manifold. First, the executive structure of CLOUT will consist of a triumverate of associated chairmanships in order to represent the ideas of the group. CLOUT also will attempt to be "in the forefront" of representation for the entire university, both grad and undergrad, with the primary function of improvement of library facilities.

Second, CLOUT hopes to instill greater spirit and cohesion within the School of Library Science. CLOUT also will try to define academic complaints, concerning course content, the quality of instructors, lack of grad student participation in grad student affairs, nonavailability of source material

In an interview with the steering committee, Thomas Bonn said that CLOUT feels a "need for a voice in the positive direction," a voice which will express those "unexpressed feelings of need of reform."

UU to present Kimmel project plans

Future 'little home'

Excavated Kimmel Basement, to become UU's "little home" Jan. 27, 1969, is the subject of a UU presentation tonight at 7 in the Kimmel Lounge. (Photo by Haxo)

For a long time SU students have heard that UU is You. Now there is a chance to prove that You are UU.

The Development Board of University Union is sponsoring a series of presentations to inform the campus community of what has been accomplished on the Kimmel project and to find out from students what they feel is needed in Kimmel.

The project is an excavation in the basement of Kimmel dining hall which, on January 27, will open as a little uu building, hopefully paving the way for a big, multi-million-dollar UU Building.

The key concept in the planning of Kimmel has been flexibility. The office space can be changed, the stage is moveable, the lounge can be converted by moveable panels into lecture areas, and even the atmosphere can be changed by the use of projectors on the walls.

Kimmel is a testing ground for a permanent union building, and it is up to the students now to decide how they feel the space should be used.

The first presentation will be tonight in the lounge of Kimmel Dormitory at 7 and will demonstrate through models, slides and blueprints what steps have been taken thus far in the planning. Project director Ira Kurzbaum will be on hand to explain what kind of programs will hopefully take place in Kimmel. Kurzbaum has already said that the facilities will be open to other organizations besides UU.

Engineers, Mathematicians: At NSA, our successes depend on yours.

Because of the nature and scope of the National Security Agency's mission, our successes are in direct relation to your achievements.

At NSA, we are responsible for designing and developing secure/invulnerable communications and EDP systems to transmit, receive and analyze much of our nation's most vital information. The advancing technologies applied in this work are such that they will frequently take you beyond the known and accepted boundaries of knowledge. Consequently, your imagination and resourcefulness are essential qualifications for success.

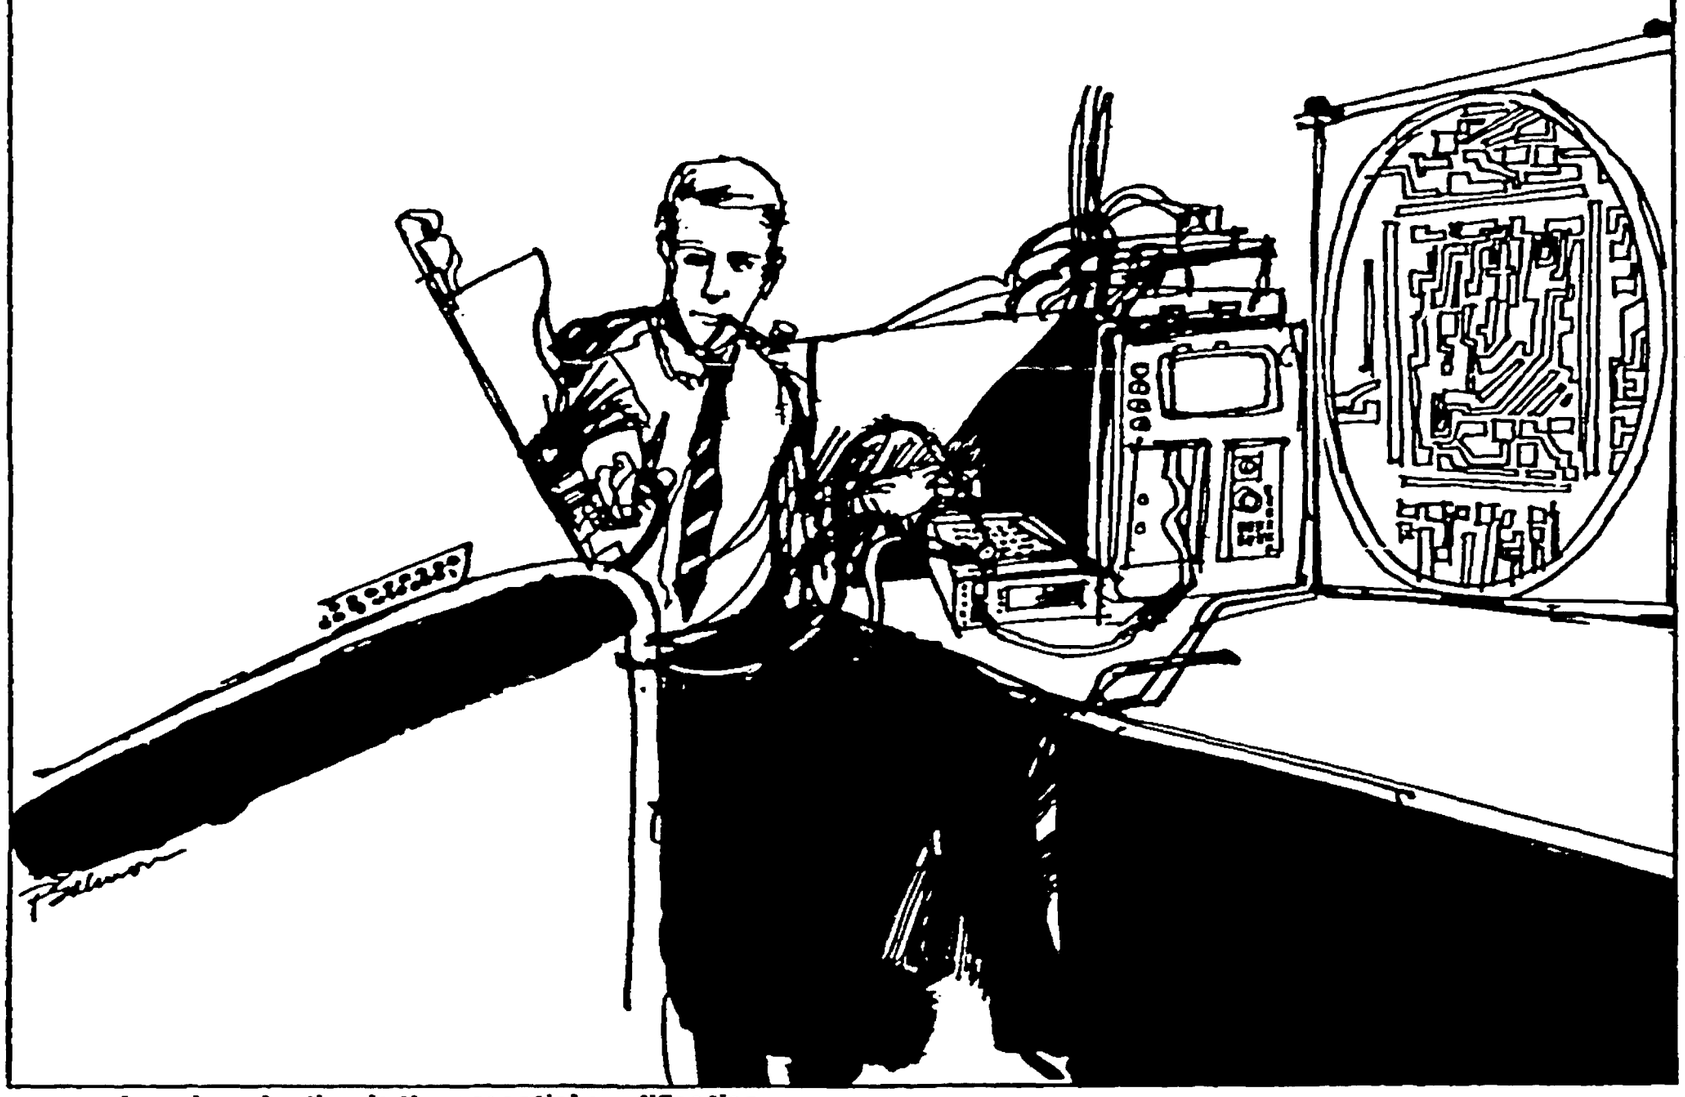
The Career Scene at NSA

ENGINEERS will find work which is performed nowhere else . . . devices and systems are constantly being developed which are in advance of any outside the Agency. As an Agency engineer, you will carry out research, design, development, testing and evaluation of sophisticated, large-scale cryptocommunications and EDP systems. You may also participate in related studies of electromagnetic propagation, upper atmosphere phenomena, and solid state devices using the latest equipment for advanced research within NSA's fully instrumented laboratories.

MATHEMATICIANS define, formulate and solve complex communications-related problems. Statistical mathematics, matrix algebra, and combinatorial analysis are but a few of the tools applied by Agency mathematicians. Opportunities for contributions in computer sciences and theoretical research are also offered.

Career Benefits

NSA's liberal graduate study program permits you to pursue two semesters of full-time graduate study at full salary. Nearly all academic costs are borne by NSA, whose proximity to seven universities is an additional asset.



Starting salaries, depending on education and experience, range from $8845.00 to $15,000.00, and increases will follow systematically as you assume additional responsibility. Further, you will enjoy the varied career benefits and other advantages of Federal employment without the necessity of Civil Service certification.

Check with your Placement Office for further information about NSA, or write to: Chief, College Relations Branch, National Security Agency, Ft. George G. Meade, Md. 20755, Att: M321.

Make plans to 'Drop-In' this Friday

By NANCY NAGAMATSU

A "Drop-In" designed to unify the freshman class is scheduled from 8 p.m. to midnight this Friday at the Women's Building.

The function will consist of a dance, talent show and unlimited beer for one admission price.

The Cross Section will provide the live entertainment and the talent show is slated to include comedy acts, folk songs and four student bands. Prizes will be awarded for the best acts in each category, an opportunity for freshman floors to earn Bill Orange points.

Rich Garfein, chairman of the class' Social Committee, feels "the Drop-In is a great function for all frosh to become better acquainted." The Drop-In is also open to upperclassmen.

Preregistration . . .

unanimous that students will just take an extra week for Christmas vacation rather than coming back to school to study.

Though the faculty has no actual say on either dead week or preregistration, Portnoy speculated that the registrar would not pursue any proposal that did not seem favorable to it.

The modified dead week in which three one-hour review sessions or one three-hour session would be offered in each course is the likely proposal now. At the discretion of each department, instructors would offer these, optional sessions, which students could attend when they return from vacation.

Portnoy explained that a New York State law requiring that 15 weeks of classes be held each semester prevents lengthening intercession in 1969. The only solution would be to start classes the day after Labor Day. Both faculty and students are against this plan, Portnoy pointed out.

Though intercession begins on Friday, Jan. 24, according to the school calendar, no finals are scheduled after Wednesday, Jan. 22.

"We have the same time for intercession that we always have," Portnoy said.

Migrant workers gaining strike and boycott support

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

Pickets from Syracuse University will be marching in support of the California grape pickers strike from today until Saturday. The picket lines, which are receiving support from several campus organizations are aimed at the Regional Market in downtown Syracuse, a produce mart, and A&P supermarkets on East Fayette and Wescott Streets.

According to Ed Ruhe, coordinator of the SU Friends of Migrant Labor, all stores being picketed this weekend have been contacted several times with requests to stop selling California table grapes while the California strike is on. He claimed that the regional A&P headquarters has also been visited in an effort to persuade A&P to remove table grapes from all their stores.

The University Religious Council executive committee Tuesday night announced its support of the grape boycott and strike and is now getting volunteers for picket lines from their membership. Hendricks Chapel Dean John McCombe expressed great concern over the plight of the migrant worker in this country and also gave his support to the boycott.

The picket lines are also receiving support from the SU chapters of the Peace and Freedom Party and Students for a Democratic Society (SDS). Judy Ardito of PFP said, "We're supporting it." She added that PFP wasn't actively recruiting marchers.

"Involvement is up the the individual."

In addition to the Syracuse picket lines, A&P stores in New York City, Buffalo and Rochester are all being picketed this week. Other stores in the Syracuse area may be targets for marchers at a later date.

Offered in spring

Students plan for ethnic course

By LARRY SAMPSON

The curriculum and course content of the new experimental student run course, Relations Between Black and White In America, is currently undergoing intensive preparation. The three credit course, which was approved yesterday by Faculty Senate, will seek to examine black-white race relations in America.

The course, which will be offered in the coming spring semester, is experimental, governing three simultaneous experiments. It will be comprised of six sections, each section containing only 15 students and one student teacher. These six sections will be grouped into three typical experimental protopypes. Two sections will use simulation gaming techniques. This primarily involves setting up social stiuations in the classroom to generate spontaneous student reaction.

Another two sections will place a great deal of importance upon "mixed media," the use of audio-visual material to present course curriculum. The remaining two sections will operate as "inner directed groups," stressing self direction by the students as a unit.

All three types of classes will seek to animate and enlist greater student participation and involvement. The various sections will meet twice weekly, with a general lecture for all sections once a week. Several personalities such as Jim Turner, a prominent black student leader who engineered the black student protest at Northwestern last spring, are being asked to participate in the courses' lecture series. Other hopeful speakers will include Juluis Lester, author of "Look Out Momma, Black Power is Gonna Get Your Momma;" Dr. Kenneth Clark, author of "Dark Ghetto" and John Williams, who wrote the successful novel, "The Man Who Cried I Am."

As originally conceived, the course also will involve the training of 40 student discussion leaders for the 1969 fall semester. Students interested in becoming discussion leaders will be screened by the course's planning and coordinating committee: Craig Baumgarton, Stan Hunterton, Gene Kane, Howard Zwier, Charles Paine, Greg Williams and Larry Sampson.

Any student interested in this aspect of the course is asked to submit a typed resume of themselves. The Resume should include the following:

1) Full name, local address, telephone or extension number, class and major.

2) An annotated bibliography of important works dealing with the area of race relations, that the student has read.

3) A brief paragraph or two describing why the student wants to take the course and why he would like to be a discussion leader. This should include any experience as a group leader or participation in organized symposiums or discussions.

4) A succinct essay in which the student is asked to pick four or five dates he feels has been important to the development of race relations in the United States and discuss the reasons for his choices. The length of the essay should not exceed more than two pages.

The resumes may be submitted to Dean Swerdlow's Office, Maxwell, Greg Williams, St. Mary's, room 612, or Craig Baumgarten, Dellplain, room 251. The resumes will be followed by interviews with the planning committee.

Doc OKs Godbolt, Zegalia for West Virginia Saturday

By MIKE WEBER

The trainers are resting this week in Syracuse and West Virginia. Neither team suffered any serious loss to the injury villian last weekend and appear to be in top shape for their clash in Morgantown.

John Godbolt, speedy tailback for the Orange who suffered a bruised hip against Navy, reports that he "feels fine" and is "ready to go."

Backfield coach Bill Bell said, "John has been running free in practice and feels okay. But with the weather here, practice will have to be indoors all week. So, we can't tell how he'll react to contact. We'll just have to wait and see."

Defensive end Steve Zegalia, who suffered a mild concussion in the Navy rout, is reported to be in fine shape. He will start against the Mountaineers.

The only regular who will probably not see action is defensive halfback Tom Hermanowski. Gary Bletsch and probably Duane Walker will continue to fill his spot, which they have done well to date.

"Tom just isn't ready yet," commented Bell. "He won't be playing in all probability."

West Virginia has no players nursing burises and in fact will have a starter returning from the injured ranks. Bob Gresham, first-team tailback who has been out for three weeks, will return to his starting berth.

Bell had some comments on the performances turned in by his backs against the Middies.

"Al Newton turned in a really heartening game. His shoulder appears to be 100% healed and his blocking improved noticeably."

Bell said that John Bulicz and Lee Castner will continue to alternate at wingback, bringing in plays as they do their shuffling act. "Both boys will alternate with Bulicz starting. They'll see equal action as they did against Navy," Bell said.

Castner, who is a standout performer of Ed Carlin's wrestlers, recently cracked the regular ranks. Bell had some comments on his development as a running back.

"I'm very pleased with Corkey's progress," said Bell. "He's a real solid performer who has improved as much as anybody in the back field."

GRID NOTES: Place-kicker George Jakowenko broke the SU record for most points-after-touchdown with his five-for-six effort against the Midshipmen. Upperclassmen may remember Alex Gousseff, who put 24 place kicks through the uprights in 1966.

The Syracuse defensive backfield also tied an Orange record of most pass interceptions in a season, 19.

New coach, high hopes for SU cagers

By ED AGRANOWITZ

First year Syracuse basketball coach Roy Danforth will be pointing his club towards an improvement of last year's 11-14 record when the Orange visit Cornell Dec. 4 in the season opener.

To say that Danforth faces a massive rebuilding job would be a mild understatement. Gone are last year's top four scorers, Vaughn Harper, George Hicker and Richie Cornwall (graduation) and Wayne Ward (extra curricular activities.) Number five scorer Ernie Austin won't be able to suit up until second semester because of grade problems. Bob McDaniel, who led the frosh in scoring and rebounding, will miss the entire season due to academic difficulties.

Add to this the toughest schedule in years, with 10 of the first eleven games being on the road, and you have the reason why Danforth isn't talking NCAA finals.

But Danforth is used to winning, as his 16-0 and 15-1 records with the SU frosh for the past two seasons attest. "Right now our only strength is our tremendous attitude and desire," says the rookie mentor, "this club is young and has almost no experience."

Most of the team's limited experience belongs to 6-2 junior John Suder, who returns at one guard spot. Suder scored five point five points a game last year, but makes his biggest contributions to the team in the ballhandling and defensive areas.

Opening in the backcourt with Suder will be 6-4 junior Gerry McFadden, a Dodge City Junior College transfer. McFadden brings a 20 ppg average to Syracuse and should ease the blow of Austin's loss somewhat.

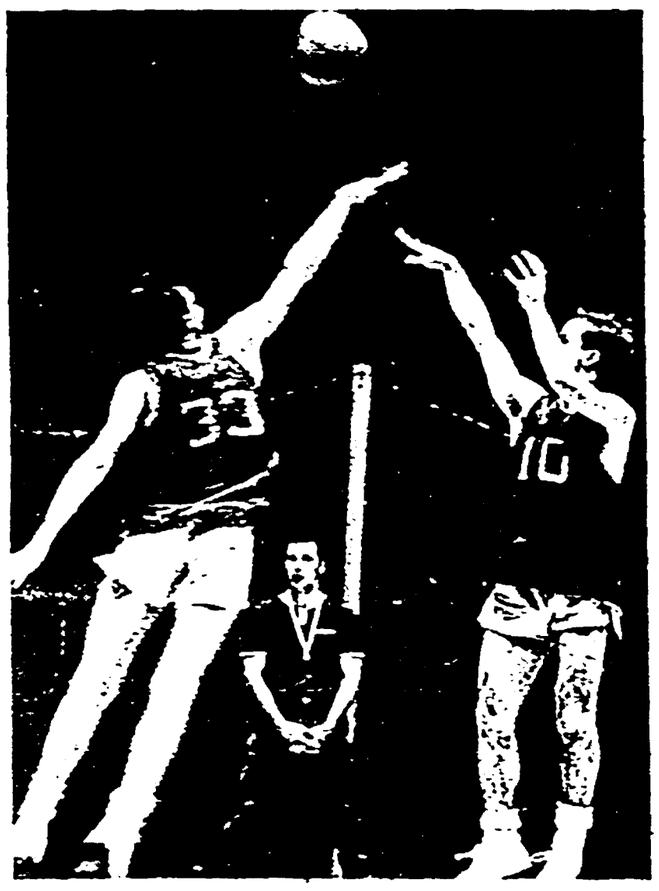
The starting forwards are junior Bill Case and senior Bob Kouwe, both 6-4. This pair saw only limited action last year, but have impressed in recent scrimmages.

The key to the Orange's success will come in the form of 6-11 sophomore center Bill Smith. Smith threw in 21 points per game for the frosh last year, and was the squad's number two rebounder.

"If Smith has a great year, we will have a good season," says Danforth, "but we can't expect him to carry the load himself. Our forwards will have to help off the boards."

Rebounding will be crucial to the Orange offense this year, as Danforth plans to have the team running. "Smith will make the fast break go if he can get us the ball," continues the coach, "he also runs well and will fit into the running game."

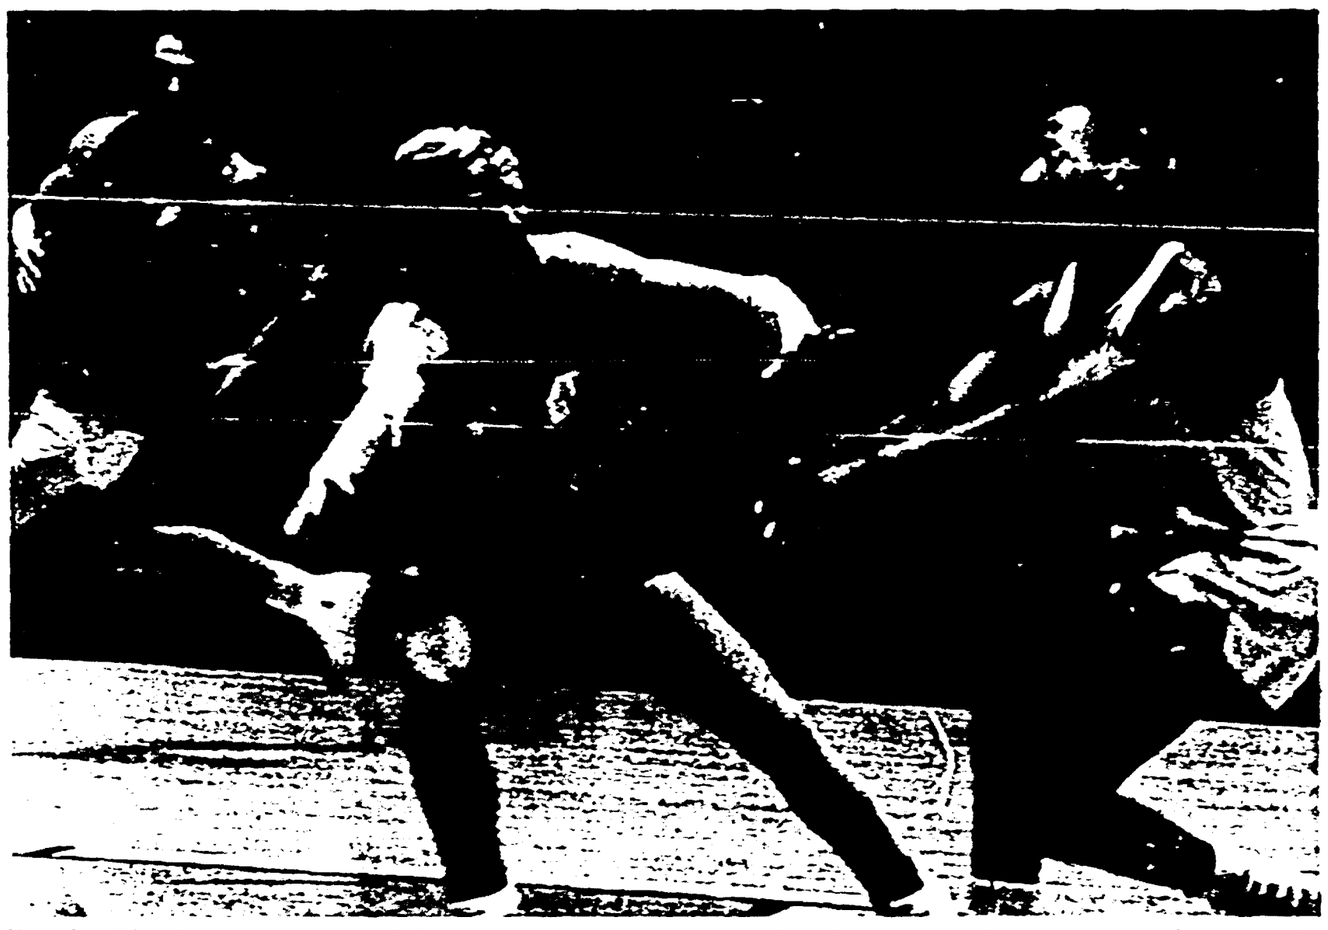
Another key man in Danforth's plans will be 6-7 senior Dave Aldrich, the backup center. "Smith will be more effective if we give him an occasional rest," Danforth explains, "and he also has a tendency to get into foul trouble, so Aldrich will play a lot."



In past years, inconsistency has marred Aldrich's play, but Danforth likes what he has seen so far this year. "Dave has been looking real good lately," he says. "He seems to have more confidence and is playing excellent defense."

In addition to Aldrich, Danforth has several quality reserves on hand. "We'll substitute according to the type of team we're playing," says Danforth. "Bob Clary (6-2 junior) is tough on defense and an excellent runner. Tommy Green (6-0 soph) is a better shooter and ballhandler and should be effective in pattern-type games."

"At forward we have Frank Hamblen (6-3 senior), David Harmon (6-4 junior transfer) and Bill Finney (6-4 soph)," says Danforth, "Hamblen is a very smart and heady ballplayer and will be valuable when the action gets hectic. Harmon is a tremendous leaper and a good runner, but must improve on defense. Finney is a good shooter."



Danforth doesn't anticipate any one player dominating the scoring for the Orange this year. "We should have a balanced attack, because everyone scores differently," he says, "Case and Kouwe shoot well from the corners and behind picks, Smith is tough inside, McFadden can shoot and drives well, and Suder can hit from outside."

The key to the season in Danforth's eyes will be the first eleven games (Cornell, Niagara, Fordham, Kansas St., Kansas, Brigham Young, to name a few.) "If we can pull a .500 record on all of those early away games, we could have a good season," says Danforth. "We're sure gonna get baptized pretty quick."

VOLUNTEER. Ernie Austin (right) grounded for a semester because of academic troubles, is out on his own practicing with the team. "Ernie will help us greatly when he comes back," says coach Roy Danforth. Until then, however, the Orange will have to go through the first part of a rugged schedule without him. (Photo by Clemens)

Students show endorsement of strike action by forming picket line in early morning hours

Mark Rudd

Mark Rudd, chairman of SDS at Columbia, appeared on campus Tuesday and filled Grant Auditorium with curious on-lookers and his sympathizers. After showing a film of the Columbia upheaval last spring, he told the crowd: "The only thing to do with the capitalistic university which is a reflection of our society is to destroy it." The Cox Commission Report on the Columbia disturbances noted that SDS in 1967 suffered a "generation gap" between senior members who wanted a program of public education and "younger members, whose influence later became ascendant, (who) found the major appeal of SDS in the promise of confrontations with the Administration." Jonathan Sherman

Staff members of the Daily Orange have spoken with close friends and associates of Jonathan Sherman since yesterday. What has continued to emerge is a picture of a sensitive and considerate human being. They say that he and his father enjoyed a close relationship, Jonathan having a high regard for his father and Bishop Sherman taking great interest in his son's art work.

They note there were many aspects to his personality and that he may have encountered many conflicts within himself. The Daily Orange staff wishes to acknowlege that no human being could be summed up in 20 column inches of newspaper type.

We also hope all members of the University community will be more sensitive to the pressures and conflicts of students and the unfortunate effects they may have.

Student unrest

An interesting parallel exists between student unrest and disorder today and similar student unrest during the early 1800's.

The American college at that time tended to be supported by the church. The church represented most of the learning of that day and the denominational colleges taught theology and trained young men for the ministry. As the frontier pushed West, the churches followed, each competing to establish its right to disseminate the truth as it saw it.

The colleges offered a rigidly adhered to curriculum of philosophy, theology, dead languages and mathematics.

These colleges ignored the changing society around them. The country was developing a national economy and industrializing. It was using science in the higher levels of agriculture and industry but the colleges still taught natural law.

Thomas Jefferson wrote to a friend at Harvard in 1823, "there is one (practice at Harvard) from which (the University of Virginia) shall certainly vary . . .That is, the holding the students all to one prescribed course of reading . . .The insubordination of our youth is now the greatest obstacle to their education. We may lessen the difficulty perhaps by avoiding too much government . . ."

In 1823 a disturbance occurred at Harvard resulting in the expulsion of over half the graduating class. Six student rebellions arose at Princeton between 1800 and 1830. The students then were seeking a more secular education including law, teaching and natural science in keeping with the needs of the changing society about them.

Today student dissatisfaction appears motivated by two related factors. One is that the curriculum really doesn't provide what they are seeking, which is more than preparation for a narrow role in society. The Cos Report on the severe academic upheaval at Columbia noted: "the kind of education offered by our colleges and universities has not changed as sharply as the interests of the most vocal and energetic students."

The other factor is the university environment itself which seems more protective and paternal in some respects than the high school and home society the students have just left.

Although we deplore the violence suggested by persons such as Mark Rudd and the unreason implicit in his statements, we do believe all members of the university community must confront the changes in society and adapt our education to them.

Need for study

The police play football

By Paul Finkelman

There was no great political issue, as there was at Chicago. There was not great academic issue, as at Berkeley. There was no great moral issue, as at Colombia. But the situation was the same. A group of students had gathered and that made them fair game for the police. The police formed a wedge, unsheathed their clubs, readied their fists, and attacked. Students were bloodied, injured, and arrested by Police who apparently had no control over their tempers and no facility to judge the situation with any degree of intelligence or rationality.

The attack on the students at the football game last Saturday is just another incident in the growing number of incidents of police brutality and over-reacting.

The police might say that they were provoked into action because the students threw snowballs at them. Why didn't the police just throw snowballs back? It certainly would have been a more intelligent reaction than breaking heads. Some students were knocked unconscious. Others were arrested. One had his shoulder broken. All this for snowballs and an attempt to tear down the goal posts? Who are the cops kidding? Why didn't they use their pistols? or at least tear gas? Surely they have some left from the water fight last year.

Police and their defenders say that we shouldn't attack them because no one else is willing to do their job. The question is, is it their job to beat up kids? It is true that the police are poorly paid and have a tough job. But that doesn't justify their constant attacks on students at universities and Blacks in ghettos.

What is needed, however, is not merely a condemnation of the police. Rather, we need to study our police problem and work to change the system.

If police are underpaid, then let's raise their salaries. Give them good salaries so that police forces can attract good and competent men. Also, as Dick Gregory commented, with good salaries the police won't be subject to bribes because they will have well paying jobs to lose if they are caught.

Also, police should be psychologically screened before they enter the force. Policemen should not be agressive, brutal, and irrational men who take out their frustrations on kids and Blacks while standing behind a badge. They should also be screened so they will not be bigoted reactionaries who work closely with the KKK in the South and the John Birch Society in the North.

Finally, police should be trained in social work, psychology, and general inter-personal relations as well as in criminology. In special areas they should learn special skills, such as Spanish for work in Spanish Harlem.

Besides training and salaries, other aspects of the change in the system should revolve around the job of a policeman and its relation to society as a whole. If crime rates are so high, let the police concentrate on preventing crimes and not on persecuting students and Blacks. One wonders which is more beneficial to society; harrassing hippies on "M" street or fighting organized crime in the central city. When tons of heroine are coming into NYC daily, why is it that only campus marijuana pushers are arrested on narcotics charges? Maybe no one else is willing to do their job, but at least the police themselves should do their job.

Until such changes come about, scenes like last Saturday will continue. One final question that must be asked: If the University always assumes a position of "in loco parentis," why did it hire city police to beat up its students?

The grad thing

A review

By Jacques Lebel

Friday, Nov. 15, was the first Grad Thing of the year. The structure was merely that one bar in the greater Syracuse area was designated "it" for the night and everyone would congregate there to mix or not mix as their desires directed them.

Right from the start certain things were clear. First, few people were actively going to mix. Instead they would sit together in parochial groupings and let any pathological mixers come to them. Second, of the one third of the group that was female, at least half were not graduate students. Finally, it was obvious that the physical structure of Lee's Restaurant didn't exactly lend itself to milling about and interacting.

Nevertheless it was profitable. In one corner a Russian instructor was telling a girl from grad psych all about motivation. At a table near the front a Higher Ed grad was coaching a girl from grad journalism on which card to lead in a bridge game made up of herself, two male grads, and a junior interior design coed with lovely long hair. The Maxwell Graduate Student Association president was collecting names and phone numbers of undergrad girls with the expected bureaucratic efficiency, while off away from the crowds the Graduate Student Organization Vice President fondly discussed "strategy" with one of his GSO co-ed committee chairmen.

As usual, the big groups that ten to make grad things happen were in force. Maxwell was well represented as were Social Work, Library Science, Business and the ubiquitous undergrad husband hunters. Of course many other departments were represented as well. Couples left who didn't come in together...that suggests success. As time moved on and more refreshments were consumed interaction increased...more success. Finally, when the "Thing" ended, there was another party that everyone was invited to that lasted into the wee hours of the AM (actually, 7AM isn't such a wee hour). Success!

Yes, social chairman Donna Harrington of the GSO, it was a success. The grad student doesn't want musical chairs and charades. What he wants is to know a place where a lot of other grads will be so that he can go there and do his thing...whatever that might be. If every few weekends you could just let us know where the watering place will be we'll arrive and let out our anxieties and frustrations as circumstances permit. If the GSO can serve us in no other way than this (plus, perhaps, getting us better football seats next year) it will be doing a great service.

Support for grape strikers growing

By COREY SANDLER

Some twenty-five hardy Syracusans braved freezing temperatures and snow early yesterday morning to picket the Central New York Regional Market in support of the California Grape Pickers' Strike. The group, including a dozen SU students marched from 4 A.M. to 8 A.M. The demonstration was the first of a series planned for the next few days by a group calling itself the Onondaga Country Friends of Farm Workers.

Nancy Sargent, a junior, was among the marchers at the wholesale market. Miss Sargent is the president of the University Religious Council, which recently endorsed the strike action. "Many of the truckers did not realize that their union had formally supported the position of the farm workers. A point was made, and perhaps more significantly, some of the truck-drivers were made aware of the facts," she said.

Later yesterday, goups of pickets from the Diocese of Syracuse, the National Council of Churches, the Syracuse Labor Council, and Syracuse University students planned to march at two local A&P food stores. The A&P was not singled out as a special offender, but rather because it is a national organization and would serve as a focal point for the boycott actions.

The marchers did not block the entrances. The orderly lines marched near the stores to inform the patrons of the store about the strike.

Neil Rosenfeld, a graduate student in Anthropology and one of the strike marshalls, explained the strategy of the march. "The only way you're going to accomplish anything as far as the Grape Strike is concerned is through the consumer. You can't tell people not to buy food—but if they go into the store and make it known to the manager that they're not going to buy any grapes, and explain that they feel the grapes should be removed, the manager will be forced to act."

Rosenfeld explained the reasons for his participation in the strike. "America is a country. You don't just live in Syracuse without feeling some sympathy for someone in California or Chicago, or anywhere else. It's a large country, but we're all Americans. However, you can't force anyone to go out in the cold weather and picket. It's a personal thing."

Many local clergymen have announced support for the movement, and some are expected to march. Included are Reverend Harvey Bates, the co-Chaplain of the United Campus Christian Fellowship, and the Reverend Frank Halfe, Methodist Chaplain at SU. Rev. Bates told of his reasons for aiding the group. "This strike has been going on for a long time and these people need our help. It's not very complicated."

The coalition of protestors plans to picket the two grocery stores today and tomorrow from 9 A.M. to 9 P.M. Transportation and information can be obtained by calling 478-1343.

SU Senate invites letters to faculty

By CONNIE KOMAREK

Last week, University Senate conducted a series of hearings during which representatives of various campus organizations made their views known to the faculty. However, in a university the size of Syracuse, it is impossible to hear everyone's criticism of and suggestions for improving the system.

Dr. Lillian Mohr, a member of the hearing committee of University Senate, said, "The faculty cannot even be sure that the 'representative of a group' is not just voicing his own opinions."

To augment this system and to give all students an opportunity to make themselves heard, University Senate is initiating a "feed-back system." Letters written by students and sent via campus mail to room 300, Slocum Hall, will be reviewed by members of the faculty.

The faculty would like to know what really concerns students. They would like to know how the student would achieve a greater representation of himself in this university. The University Senate, Dr. Mohr said, "does not believe that students are apathetic. It is affording students a chance to demonstrate their interest, and, the greater the response to this, the more likely corrective action will be taken."

Feedback will be operating for the next few weeks and all letters received during that time will be given careful consideration according to Dr. Mohr.

Opinion

Alternatives to despair

By BOB TEMBECKJIAN

Five years ago today, the 35th President of the United States was assassinated. Consequently, documentaries on his life and eulogies on the occasion of his death have been written and delivered. And men everywhere have publicly declared the necessity to change the pervasive attitudes that claimed his life. Men everywhere have publicly dedicated themselves to the completion of the tasks left undone by his death.

But it might be well to ask ourselves just how far we have come since November 22, 1963. We live in a nation which allows poverty to spread despite the hungry cries of those with inadequate food and shelter. We live in a democracy which compels its citizens to bear arms by the mere virtue of our birth on a piece of property called the United States. We live in a society that awards medals to men who have killed in the "legality" of war while we jail those who refuse to disobey one of God's holy commandments. We live under a system which still discriminates against men because the color of their skin happens to be dark.

But we have not even learned the most fundamental lesson of John F. Kennedy's death. For men of peace and freedom are still assassinated, and gun controls are not affected. Yet the tragedy of this situation is that the people seem to passively accept it. When will men learn that the killing of a Vietnamese man is just as wrong as the killing of a presidential candidate?

Despite the perpetuation of poverty at home and around the world, there are those who look for ulterior motives when the hungry ask for bread and the oppressed ask for freedom. There are those who would visit violence upon other countries while ignorantly wondering why there is violence in America. And there are those who are content to say "we have begun to effect change; we have begun to solve our problems." But that is a dangerous, blind appraisal of this country's people. It is no longer adequate to say "we have begun." For we may have built a home of an unsuspecting person in another. While we may feed a hungry child in Appalachia, we have orphaned another in Vietnam.

And what do we expect to gain from all this? Killing does not add to prestige. Destruction does not enhance image. Bombing does not destroy the truth. The preservation of lives is more important than the preservation of American "image."

Yet too many would believe that peace is intangible, that freedom is incalculable. Too many would believe that submitting to the moral responsibility of helping each other is synonymous with submitting to the Communists; that the "American way of life" would be impaired and vulnerable were we to temper our attitudes with a little more compassion. Too many would believe that we can never attain complete freedom as long as the Communist threat is potent; that we must not endanger our own people's freedom by unnecessarily weakening ourselves by not demonstrating our military capability.

But the freedom of all is imperiled when the freedom of one is denied. In that sense, who among us is free? Who among us is secure while the bonds of human oppression still exist in this country as well as around the world? How many of us are quick to neglect the human rights of others by advocating war as a necessary means?

"Peace need not be impracticable," said President Kennedy, "and war need not be inevitable...Our problems are manmade. Therefore, they can be solved by man. And man can be as big as he wants. No problem of human destiny is beyond human beings. Man's reason and spirit have often solved the seemingly unsolvable - and we believe they can do it again."

We have no alternative but to try.

SUGGESTED FOR MATURE AUDIENCES

Orchestra, Grim perform at Crouse

Rounding out the first half semester of Crouse College concerts, a performance by the Syracuse University orchestra under the baton of Professor Louis Krasner will be presented this Sunday at the Crouse auditorium at 4 p.m.

Krasner has selected a program of wide interest, and will spotlight two music school instrumentalists as soloists. Wayne Leupold, a graduate student seeking a masters degree in organ, will play the Toccata Festiva, opus 36 for organ and orchestra by the American composer Samuel Barber. Elizabeth Szlek, a senior music student majoring in flute, will open the program with Mozart's Concerto No. 1 in G Major for flute and orchestra.

After the intermission, Krasner will conduct the orchestra in the Symphony No. 5 by Dmitri Shostakovich. This work, one of the most exciting of the great Russian Symphonies, offers a challenge in technique, musicianship and symphonic balance.

Next concert in the Crouse College series will take place on Sunday, Dec. 8 when Geraint Jones, harpsichordist and Winifred Roberts, violinist, join in a recital of chamber works.

Jane M. Grim, a senior, will give an organ recital on Saturday, Nov. 23, at 8:30 p.m. in Crouse Auditorium.

The program consists of works by Handel, Bach, Pinkham, Honegger, and Wildor. Assisting her in the Pinkham, under the direction of Dr. Don Smithers, are George Coble, Ray Rother, Peter Seidel, Steven Weinstein, Tony Jacovik, and Robert Maloney.

Miss Grim studies at the School of Music with Mr. Donald Sutherland.

Both performances are open to the public, free of charge. Campus parking is offered for all Crouse concerts.

Battle against discrimination

Board of 1950 continues investigation of clauses

By JEAN HAVENS
Associate Editor

Discrimination on the SU campus has been the object of an 18-year battle which has at times waxed extremely vocal and is currently being fought in comparative silence by the Discriminatory Clause Board.

Presently headed by Dean of Men David Tatham, the board was formed in 1950 following the proposal of a bill, which the DO dubbed "an anti-discrimination bombshell," by Men's Student Government (MSG) president Lee Taub.

Taub's bill proposed: "1. All campus organizations at present shall have 2½ years to strike out any discriminatory clauses in their constitution, charter or by-laws."

Also, "2. No organizations shall be approved in the future on the Syracuse campus with these restrictive clauses in their constitution, charter or by-laws."

Shortly after this request was made, an MSG sub-committee and a Women's Student Government (WSG) special committee on discrimination were both reported to be considering separate bills.

The DO reported on April 20, 1950, that both student governments had passed anti-discriminatory bills. The WSG bill defined "discriminatory clause" as "any clause which restricts membership or eligibility for office on the basis of race, religion or national origin."

Both bills contained sections which stated: "A board shall be formed consisting of the presidents of the Inter-Fraternity Council, Panhellenic Association, Dean of Women, Dean of Men, a faculty representative of the honoraries, a faculty member elected unanimously by the board, one independent elected by the MSG assembly and one independent woman elected by the WSG council. The Dean Of Men shall be chairman."

The MSG bill declared that the board would consider stronger enforcement measures, receive reports from all recognized campus organizations and make an annual progress report on discrimination.

The board was also the object of the Discriminatory Clauses Act of 1951. Two pertinent sections of this legislation required "nationally affiliated organizations which discriminate to report annually to the board" and urged such organizations "either to achieve home rule on the matter of discrimination or to eliminate the national discriminatory clause."

Following this well-publized flurry of concern, things were fairly quiet until 1961 when the DO reported the proposal of Assistant Professor George Wiley that the Greek system "as it exists here" be dissolved because of its "lack of progress toward eliminating racial and religious bias."

"Neither the students nor the administration are enough concerned with the problem," he said. His charges were answered by the acceptance of international students as social and board members of various Greek houses.

Wiley reacted with: "Hurrah for a very small step in the right direction. There is still a long way to go. Foreign students always get special treatment. The minute somebody says there is prejudice against them, the administration puts pressure on the students to do something. This is not done in the case of Negroes."

The board prevailed, however, and quiet once again settled over the SU campus. Progress reports appeared in 1963 DO articles as Dean of Men Earle W. Clifford stated "Twelve Hill fraternities have removed national discriminatory clauses since the first annual report of the SU Anti-Discriminatory Clause Board in 1952," and also "no Hill sororities have written discriminatory clauses."

Jim G. Carleton succeeded Clifford as Dean of Men, and Tatham succeeded Carleton. With Tatham at the helm, the board continued to seek out what he called "sub-rosa discrimination" by both fraternities and sororities. It's main concern in 1966 was with restrictive cl... general which forbid local Greek chapters to accept men and women on the basis of race, religion or national origin.

Chapters were urged to gain "local autonomy" from national organizations and in September of that year, the DO reported that "one campus social house has received permission from its national organization to use different standards of membership locally; a second chapter is expected to gain that favor."

Tatham considered the gaining of the waivers as a "first step" in the anti-discrimination campaign. He felt the next step to be "evidence that the chapters are working as hard as possible within their national organizations to end restrictive clauses altogether."

In an April 1968 Herald Journal article, Dean Tatham was quoted as saying "over the past 18 years the board has made considerable progress and I can say all discriminatory clauses

Society's loss

College graduate draftees have tripled

By JUDITH SCHLESINGER

"The drafting of college students is throwing a monkey wrench into our system," according to Dr. Irvin Swerdlow, associate dean of the Maxwell School. Dr. Swerdlow commented on a New York Times report that the number of college graduate draftees has more than tripled since graduate deferments were abolished last July.

Dr. Swerdlow pointed out that the induction of college graduates is causing the loss to society of its most skilled members. "If we have to have a draft," he continued, "it should be used as a constructive force, one which could provide educational services desperately needed by many people in the U.S." He cited practical vocational training as an example of one possible service.

Speaking of the effect of the draft increase on the graduate program at Syracuse, Dr. James Harrison, executive for graduate programs, said, "It hasn't affected us that much yet, although there are now more women with fellowships." However, he cited the problem that many other university's graduate schools overestimated the effect on enrollment and over-recruited. "If Harvard takes 100 more men," he explained, "Syracuse might have had two of them."

When asked whether he thought the loss of graduate deferments would discourage college seniors from applying to graduate school, Dr. Harrison replied that the only ones who would really be affected would be those who would have applied primarily to evade the draft.

Dr. Peter T. Marsh, chairman of the history department, said, "If this measure were adopted for the purpose of equalizing the draft system, it is not entirely unjustifiable. I do not believe in eugenics, or killing off the dumb ones to save the smart ones."

His advice to the student considering or attending grad school: "Try to forget it, if possible. Make your plans regardless—and hope."

Sutton speech rescheduled

Percy E. Sutton, Manhattan borough president, has been rescheduled to speak at Syracuse University Tuesday (Nov. 26) at 8 p.m. in Hendricks Chapel. Sutton was to have visited campus Nov. 12, but his trip was postponed by a snowstorm.

His talk is part of the Public Affairs and Citizenship program in the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs. Sutton's topic will be decentralization of New York City Schools.

He was elected borough president in 1966; formerly he was a New York State assemblyman. After graduating from Brooklyn Law School and Columbia University, he was a participant in the Freedom Rides in the South, and also engaged in a wide variety of civic, religious and civil rights programs. Sutton was president of the New York Branch of the NAACP.

Sutton's lecture is open to the public without charge.

TV raters at SU

The A.C. Nielsen Co. (the T. V. rating people) of Chicago is conducting a "corporate recruitment survey" on the SU campus as well as 70 other colleges and universities throughout the country, to enable businesses to judge the quality of their recruitment programs.

In this 2-month survey, students who have signed up for job interviews with various companies are asked to complete a two-part questionaire at the Placement Center. The first part consists of six questions to measure the students' attitudes toward the company being interviewed, and is to be left in the collection box at the center. Part two is to be completed and sent directly to Nielsen (via a postage paid envelope) after the student has had a job offer and/or a visit to the company.

Democrats need change from within

From the day of Eugene McCarthy's defeat at the Democratic Convention, a number of his former followers and others hopefully awaited a Democratic defeat in the Presidential election, assuming that defeat would bring about the much needed reorganization of the Democratic Party. The younger groups were the most persistent, mainly students, glibly assuming that the "Republican Year" would force the Democrats to stumble over each other in their hurry to reform themselves.

This has not and will not come to pass, however, for several reasons. The "Republican Year" didn't turn out to be nearly as disastrous as expected, with Richard Nixon winning by only a small margin and the composition of the House and Senate hardly changing at all. The Democratic Party bungled along at its usual pace and suffered only slightly from an American excess of Johnsonism and not really from party division or disorganization. From that point of view there is little more stimulation for change than in 1966 or 1964.

A question never answered by those hoping for reform is exactly WHO is going to do the reforming. Even if there had been a very bad Democratic defeat, it is unlikely that the old party stalwarts were going to jump up and change their ways to suit young liberals. The key undoubtedly lies with a change in personnel in the Democratic Party ranks, an infusion of new blood and new ideas into the party itself.

The problem to be faced here is that such an infusion takes time, effort and dedication. There are many ranks in party organization, and the time involved to move through them to a position of power involves years, rather than months or the period of one campaign. Many young people do not understand this in a comprehensive sense. They refuse to face the fact that one reformer starting today in the organization may not be able to gain a position of real power in a county for 5 to 10 years. What, then, about the country?

Yet, despite the time involved (or perhaps because of it?) many of those demanding reforms are still standing on the outside of party organization looking in, possibly shouting, but otherwise doing nothing. From this they should expect nothing.

A traditional charge against American young people is that they have been apathetic about the political process. This is borne out statistically, at least in terms of voting records where the 21-25 age group has the poorest record for showing up at the polls, with slightly more than 50%.

Some students continue to work for smaller activist parties (although numbers have decreased here since the election) but the American two-party system has weathered 180 years of fringe parties because there are advantages to it in addition to its many faults. It seems highly unlikely that it will be changed in the near future. Therefore, any change in American politics must come from within those two parties. And for such change to come about, those demanding it must take part in the organization of those parties.

Drawings displayed at Lowe

Gropper's art reflects contemporary problems

A retrospective exhibition of the works of William Gropper is on display at the Joe and Emily Lowe Art Center at Syracuse University until Jan. 1. More than 100 drawings and lithographs, and paintings in oil and gouache, represent Gropper's career as political cartoonist, illustrator and artist.

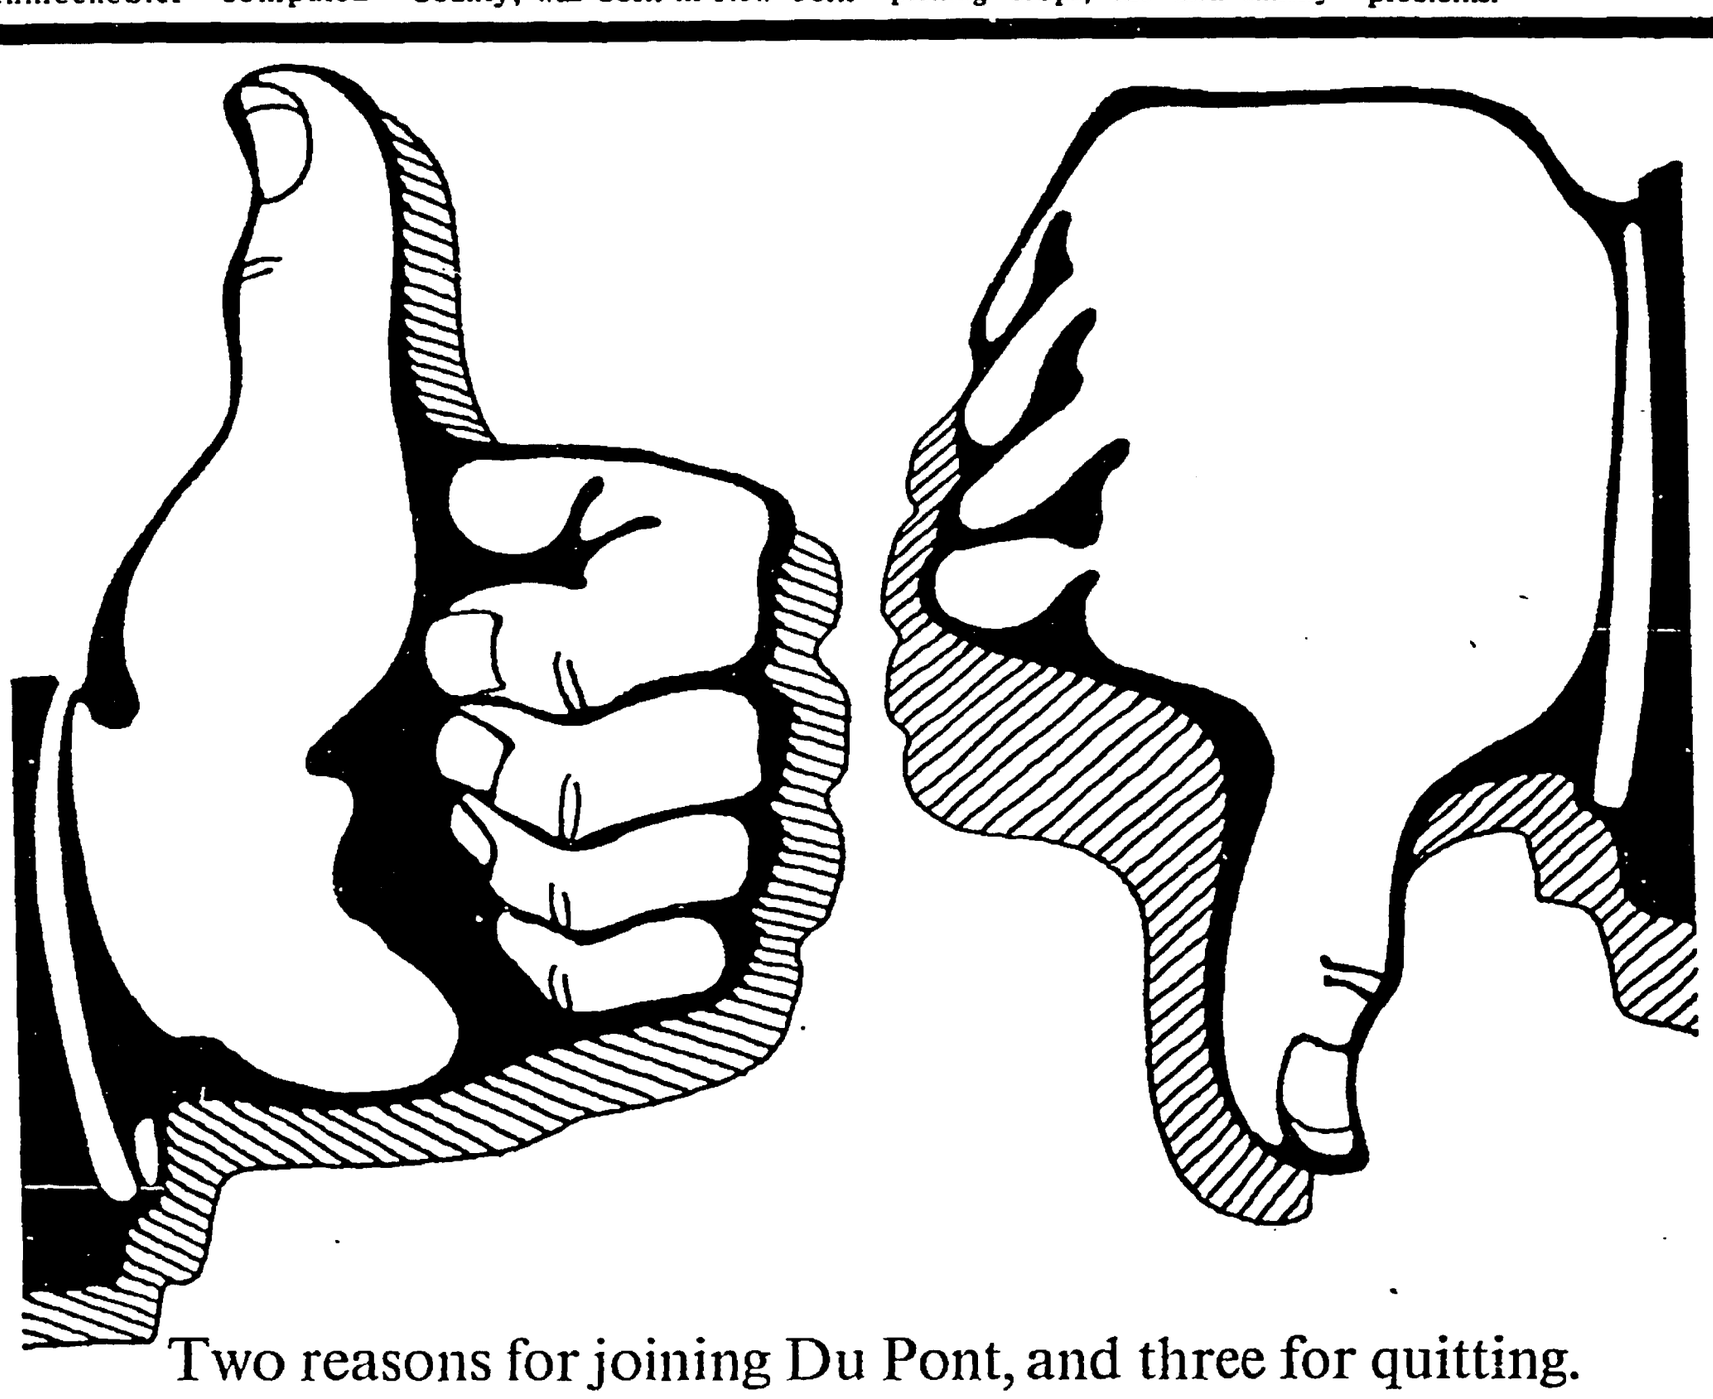
"The exhibition is the first recognition of Gropper's preeminence as a social commentator who, at age 70, is still a good artist and a productive one," Laurence Schmeckebier, dean of the SU School of Art, said.

Schmeckebier compared Gropper's achievement to that of Ben Shahn whose mural depicting the Sacco-Vanzetti case is on the main campus at Syracuse University. "Gropper was a popular and respected exhibiting artist and one concerned with contemporary problems," Schmedkebier said. "He did not join mass demonstrations, but used his art to protest injustice, dictatorship and brutality. This is in the tradition of great artists like Grosz, Orozco, Daumier and Goya."

Gropper, whose home and studio are in Westchester County, was born in New York City and early became associated with liberal causes. In 1920 he was staff artist for the New York Tribune. Later his drawings were published in newspapers and magazines. By 1935 he was well known as a cartoonist.

But, although he had been painting since 1921, he was unknown in this field until his first exhibition in 1936. His paintings are now in the collections of the Metropolitan Museum, the Museum of Modern Art and the Whitney Museum.

"He has concentrated on people -- people picketing or working in sweatshops or picking crops, fat and skinny ones, the mighty ... and the oppressed," August L. Freundlich, director of the Joe and Emily Lowe Art Gallery at the University of Miami, wrote for the Gropper exhibition catalogue.



"Gropper is one of the leaders of the older generation of American artists who have been ignored, discredited, even ridiculed by a younger generation for their realism and political involvement," Schmeckebier said. "These younger artists, basically romantic, personal and abstract, avoided uncomfortable problems.

Lambda Sig Taps Seven

Lambda Sigma Sigma, junior women's honorary, completed its membership for the class of 1970 with the selection of seven coeds.

Tapped recently were Barbara Brinckerhoff, Helen Dworttzky, Diane Gregory, Helene Macdonald, Marsha Smilkinson, Sharon Wolchik and Barbara Woods.

Two reasons for joining Du Pont, and three for quitting.

1 Du Pont offers open-end opportunity. You don't go into a training program. You go to work—in a series of growth jobs that broaden your base for professional progress and help you find the specific field you want to grow in. We call it "planned mobility."

2 Du Pont works at the outer limits. Sure, everybody claims they do the far-out research. But Du Pont is a world leader in research with the money and the engineering capability to translate ideas into commercial products. If you have a profitable idea, we have what it takes to make it work; and we have a special bonus plan to reward you for it. So Du Pont people grow, personally and professionally. Even men who leave Du Pont often do so because of the professional growth they experienced at Du Pont.

Mark Rudd Speaks at SU

(Photos by Clemens)

Mark Rudd, Columbia SDS chairman, outlined the seizure of the Columbia campus last spring to a capacity audience in Grant Auditorium Tuesday. "If we were savage in our takeover it was because we were fed up," he told them.

In October 1967 Rudd completed a position paper on how to halt Columbia's complicity with the Vietnam war. His first point called for a "radicalization of students—showing people the connections in the liberal structure, showing them how our lives really are unfree . . .We can never force the university to submit to our demands unless we have behind us the strength of the majority of students on campus."

His last point called for "A sit-in at Low Library which, after one day, turns into a general student strike. The University capitulates."

'Congratulations, Mrs. Jackson'

Coeds recall abortion experiences and effects

By CAROL CARSON

"The doctor smiled at me and said, 'Congratulations, Mrs. Jackson, you're going to have a baby.' Up until then, I'd been playing the happy newly-wed, anxious for a baby. But then, I froze.

"Before that, I think I had him fooled, but I think he knew I wasn't married just after he told me. I made another appointment and then went back to my dorm to call my boyfriend."

"Mrs. Evelyn Jackson" is one of three girls who agreed to tell their stories of abortion to the Daily Orange. Their identities have been disguised. They could easily be any one of an unknown number of SU coeds who have undergone illegal abortions.

Evelyn was a sophomore when she became pregnant. Her boyfriend was a senior. He has graduated and is now in grad school in another part of the country; Evelyn is not at all certain that she will graduate.

All the time she was pregnant she kept up with her school work, but when the abortion was over, she completely withdrew from the world that she had known.

When she told her boyfriend about the doctor's verdict, they discussed marriage. But neither felt they were mature enough to handle the responsibility. They both believed that marriage should be a lasting thing, and they were not sure enough about their feelings toward each other to take such a step.

They had been dating for about five months, having intercourse for about a month and a half. Before Evelyn met Ron, she had been a virgin.

When they ruled out the possibility of marriage, they considered Evelyn having the baby and giving it up for adoption. But she, more than Ron, ruled out that possibility. "I couldn't bear the thought of giving it away after all that time. And then there was my parents. I couldn't possibly face them. It would hurt them so much.

"I wanted to talk to a minister or a doctor or somebody, but I was afraid to. I didn't know if they'd arrest me or tell my parents or what. And I didn't even think of talking to someone from the University. I was afraid they would throw me out of school and send me home.

"I didn't want an abortion, but there really didn't seem like any other way."

Evelyn and Ron tried to find someone in Syracuse who could help them, but the people they talked to said the abortionists in Syracuse were "butchers."

"I got scared. I didn't want to die, and I wanted to have kids eventually. We were almost ready to give up, when Ron called a friend from home. He gave him the name of a doctor there, so we called and made an 'appointment.'

"I don't know what we would have done if we hadn't gotten his name. I guess I would have disappeared. I thought of what it would be like to go someplace and tell everyone I was a widow or divorcee. Then I could have the baby and keep it."

A suburban house

The abortion cost them $600. It was done in a suburban, three bedroom house. They went at night, and while Evelyn was in the bedroom having the abortion, Ron sat in the living room. There was a color television set and several magazines.

"The doctor—I guess he was a doctor—picked us up and took us there. But I still can't figure out how he got away with it, because he had a lot of neighbors. I don't know if he was married. We were the only people in the house."

"When it was over, he gave me some pills and told me to see a doctor when I got home. That really scared me. I didn't know what the doctor would do when I told him, but there didn't seem like there was any way to hide it from him, and I wanted to make sure I was all right."

One of the girls in Evelyn's dorm suggested a doctor who proved to be sympathetic.

"He was really great. For a little while, I felt like I was going to have a nervous breakdown, but I went to see him a lot, and he talked to me and helped me to get back on my feet.

"And Ron was great too. We really got a lot closer. He's not going to school here now, but we keep in touch. The only problem is that I didn't snap out of it quickly enough, and I flunked three courses.

"My parents wouldn't let me go to summer school, because I had to work, and they were mad at me. They thought I flunked because I was just goofing off. But I did all right spring semester, and I think I should have a decent average this year, so maybe they'll let me go next summer. I'm really lucky that I didn't get thrown out of school last year."

Not so lucky

Linda, a former SU student, was not quite as lucky. She had an abortion a year and a half ago when she was a freshman. She failed two courses first semester, and another one second semester, and was asked to "withdraw" from the University.

"Maybe if I told someone, they would have let me stay, but I really don't know."

Linda is from Syracuse, and she is working at a downtown department store. She has an apartment now because her parents haven't quite forgiven her for flunking out of school. school.

"They don't know about the abortion. I didn't think it was any of their business. Besides, they wouldn't have helped me.

'I didn't love him'

"I couldn't marry the guy. I didn't love him. Maybe I thought I did, but I don't really know. I felt like a big deal at college, and I guess I just acted stupid."

"He wasn't much help, but he did give me some money. One of my girlfirends gave me the name of this guy, and she went with me."

The abortion took place at a downtown hotel, but when it was over, Linda realized everything hadn't gone just right. She didn't go to a doctor for a month and a half though, and by that time, she had an infection.

The doctor managed to cure her. He told her she was lucky that it hadn't been worse, or she would have been dead by that time.

"I guess it was stupid not to have gone sooner. But I think I'm OK now.

"I don't know. I was kind of messed up before this thing started. I don't mean physically. But I really needed help. Maybe that's why I got pregnant. I think I probably did it on prupose. But then it didn't do any good, because my parents never found out. But I think maybe they suspect something.

"It wasn't too hard to hide it from them. I just went off in a corner and sulked. We never talked too much, so they didn't think anything about it."

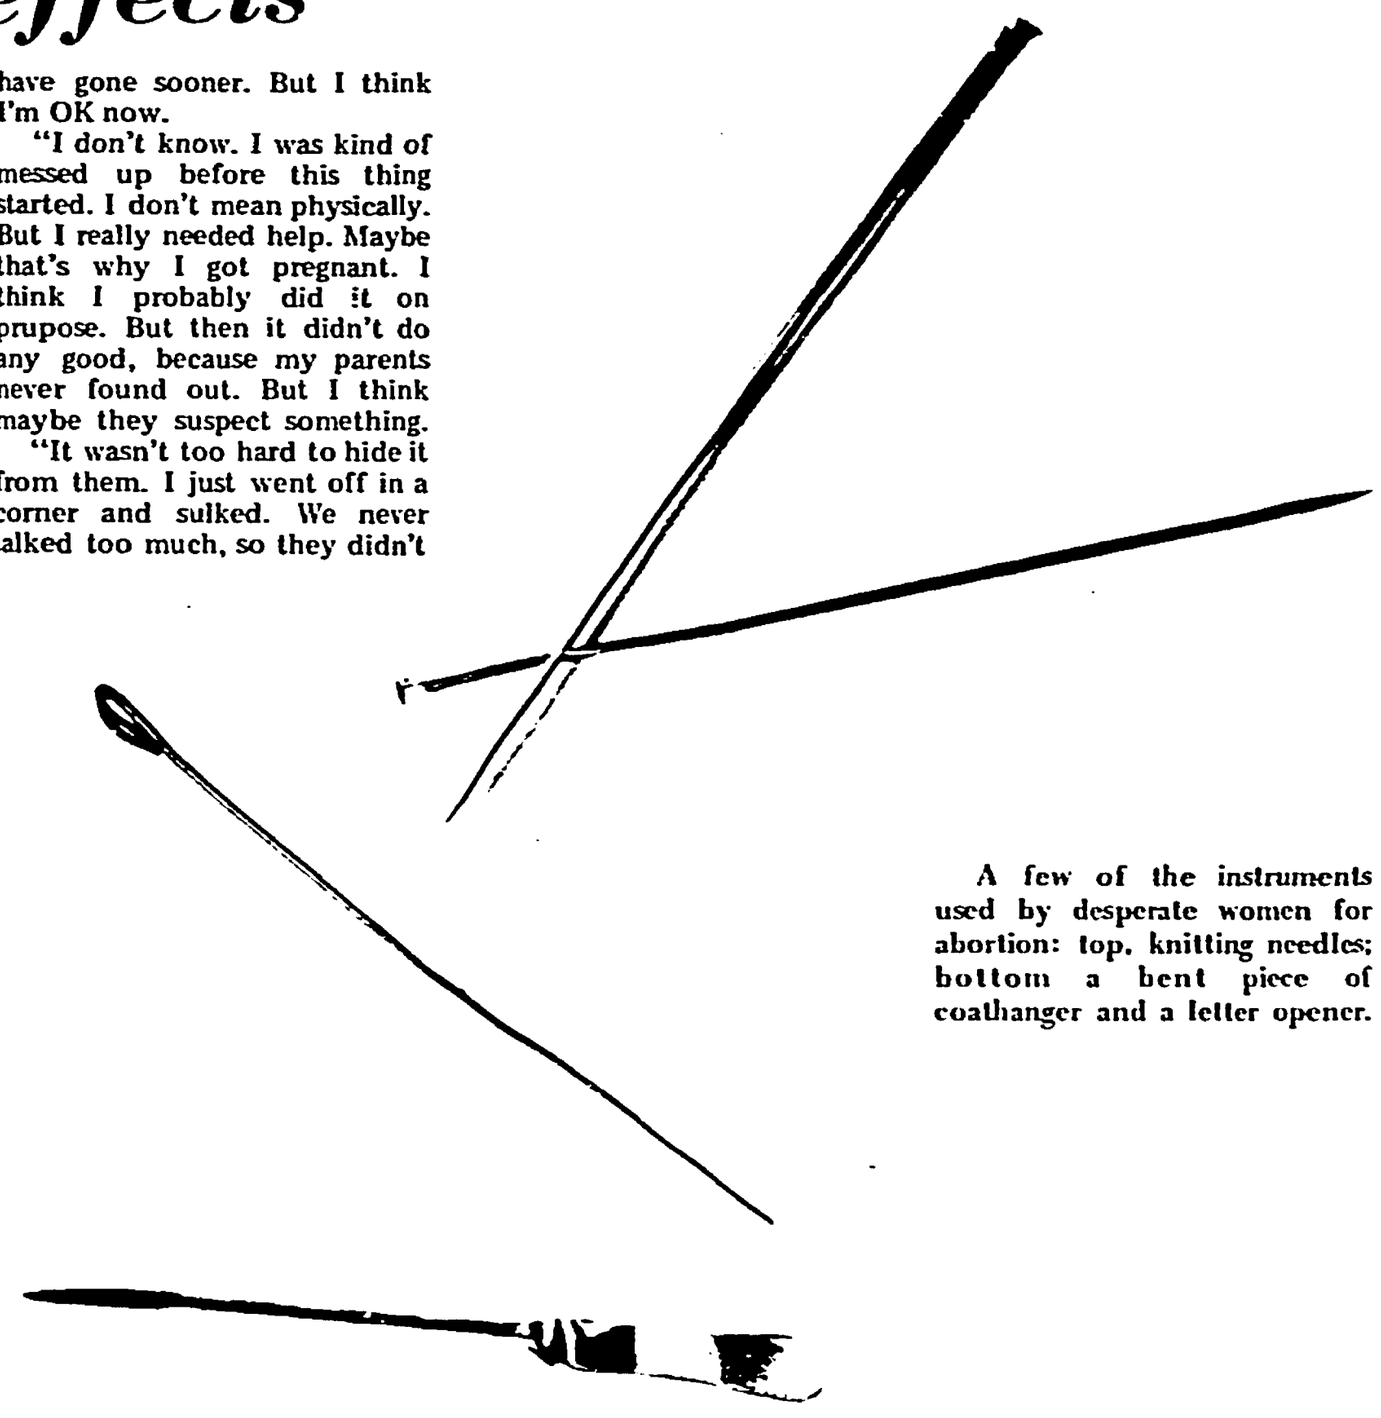
"I wish it had been done in a hospital. Maybe then I wouldn't have gotten the infection. And they might have had someone I could talk to. For a while, I thought I might really go off the deep end, and I wanted to go to a psychiatrist, but I was afraid the school would find out."

Marriage planned

Sue, a senior, did go to a psychiatrist after her abortion. She and her boyfriend are planning to be married and they want children, but now she is afraid.

They are both from New York City, and she had her abortion there. Her fiance had a friend in medical school; he performed the operation.

"I never want to see him again. But maybe I'll get over it."



It's been six months since she had her abortion, and she still has nightmares.

"I don't care if my parents find out. I've never tried to really hide it from them. Probably they know, but they just aren't admitting it to themselves. I wish they would. It would make everything a lot easier."

She is afraid to have children, because every time she sees a baby, she thinks of the abortion, and of her guilt.

"I can still see the apartment (where the abortion was performed) and I can remember every detail. But I don't want to. There was no anesthesia. That was really unfair. If there had been, maybe I wouldn't remember so much."

"I don't know if the answer is legalization. I'd still have my guilt, but maybe it wouldn't be so bad."

Coeds speak on abortion

By JANICE LESNIAK

Should abortion be legalized? Syracuse University coeds proved overwhelmingly in favor of liberating the stringent laws on abortion in a telephone survey yesterday, with only one girl in twenty responding negatively. Opinions ranged from "definitely, for everyone" to "only in certain cases."

The most conservative answers came from those girls who had been raised as Roman Catholics (the Church does not allow abortion in any circumstance), but they felt that in the case of rape, abortion should be permitted, both legally and within the Church.

One Catholic student, a sophomore in teacher education, said abortion should not be legalized "for any tramp in the streets, or for a girl who's screwing around with her boyfriend. If she gets pregnant, that's her tough luck. But it is better to have an abortion if you've been raped." She felt that in such a case, a girl's pride must be considered. "I'd be embarrassed if I were raped and got pregnant," she said, "ashamed that people would wonder if I was really raped or not. And it's easier to forget the rape if there's no child to remind you of it."

Other students found abortion permissible "in families where there are enough children already" or where the mother may be physically harmed if she had the baby. One senior believes "no one has the right to tell a woman whether or not she should have a baby. If she doesn't want one, it's not good for the kid."

Another coed declared that the "emancipation of woman" gives her the right to have an abortion, whether due to "rape, underage, or an honest mistake."

More than half of the girls were concerned about the plight of the unwed mother-to-be. She often does not want the baby, or is not prepared to care for it properly.

Others cited the agony an unwed girl goes through when she becomes pregnant and must face her parents. They are often forced into having illegal abortions under unsanitary conditions, and for this reason many students feel that "legalized abortions would take some of the strain off the student and the parents."

Most of the girls feel it is fairly easy to have an abortion, especially if a girl has the money to pay a doctor's fee or go to Puerto Rico, and because "someone always knows someone who knows someone." Although they agree it is difficult to find anyone in Syracuse to perform the operation, professional abortionists can be contacted in Ithaca, Cortland and New York City.

Opinions were varied on the severity of emotional effects due to abortions. One senior knows a girl who had bad effects after the abortion, but said "she was emotionally unstable anyway." Others agreed with a freshman's statement that "abortion isn't pleasant, but it does take away the worry."

A criminal act?

Abortion laws and resulting conflicts

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

Should abortion laws be liberalized? Just last night the American Public Health Association joined the ranks of the American Medical Association, the American Psychiatric Association, the American Civil Liberties Union, and the Planned Parenthood--World Population, by announcing its support of the repeal of restrictive abortion laws.

An individual is now liable to presecution under the criminal code in most states if she obtains an abortion, unless it is performed to save the mother's life.

In a formal resolution the APHA said "restrictive laws should be repealed so that pregnant women may have abortions performed by qualified practitioners in medicine and osteopathy."

Medical abortions has been "safe" for about 100 years, but public controversy over the law regarding abortions has only arisen relatively recently. Legal abortions are medically safe, but the latter ones are often dangerous to the mother's health.

Under what set of circumstances can a mother receive a legal abortion in the United States?

Thirty-nine states permit abortions only if they are necessary to save the life of the mother. Despite the urgings of authoritative organizations and the increased publicity on this controversy, only three states have recently expanded their abortion laws considerabley.

California, Colorado, and North Carolina now permit abortion to preserve the life or the health of the mother; in cases of rape and incest; and if there is a substantial risk that there will be a serious physical or mental defect in the new-born baby (excepting California).

The present controversy over the legalization of abortions in the United States began in the summer of 1962 when a pregnant mother feared the birth of a deformed baby because she had taken Thalidomide, a drug which can deform fetuses. To avoid criminal prosecution the woman intended going to Sweden where the laws are more liberal. At this time the press began to publicize the debatable laws.

One main issue underlying the controversy over the abortion laws is the predicted health of the new-born baby. Most associations support a legal abortion if medical authorities predict that the child will be born with either physical or mental defieienceis.

The health of the mother is another controversial aspect. Most states permit abortions only if the pregnancy endangers the life of the mother. In some cases, however, it is possible for the pregnancy to endanger the mother's physical or mental health, but not her life.

Many times women who were raped request abortions.

There are also situations where it is not economically feasible to have another child. and, of course, there are always cases when the mother "accidentally" becomes pregnant, but does not want another child because of her age.

"The APHA urges that access to abortion be accepted as an important means of securing the right to spacing and choosing the number of children wanted," reads the APHA resolution.

The Planned Parenthood--World Population maintains that the decision to have an abortion is between the woman and her physician. "This decision should be made with full knowledge of the woman's personal situation and with consideration of her social, economic and cultural environment."

Many nations have more liberal laws on abortions than the United States. The Scandinavian countries, for instance, permit abortions under these circumstances: in the case of a potentially defective child; and out of consideration for the mother's living conditions - a consideration that can be narrowly or broadly interpreted.

The nationally different legal aspects were investigated in the book "The Terrible Choice: The Abortion Dilemma," based on the proceedings of the International Conference on Abortion. According to these reports, a Swedish doctor explained that the purpose of their laws "was not to grant these women legal abortions, but also to get in contact with them to be able to help them with different social aids and medical treatment, and to give contraceptive advice. In those cases where these measures were not sufficient, abortions were granted, and it is always stressed that this is an emergency solution."

The Soviet Union, Bulgaria and Hungary permit abortions upon the request of the mother. Poland, Yugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and Japan also permit abortions under broad circumstances.

With the wider availability of legal abortions in these countries, have illegal abortions diminished? They have, but they still exist for a number of reasons: some women do not receive permission; some resort to illegal abortions due to bureaucratic delays; and some refuse to reveal their private matters to official records.

In 1962 the American Law Institute submitted a proposal to the states for the liberalization of the abortion laws. The proposal was prepared after a 10-year study of the abortion dilemma. It still deems "unjustified termination of pregnancy" a crime, but lists circumstances when abortion would be legal: (1) when there is a risk that the pregnancy will endanger the physical or mental health of the mother; (2) when there is the potential possibility that the child will be born with either a grave physical or mental defect; (3) when the pregnancy resulted from rape (including statutory rape of girls under 16), incest, or other felonious intercourse.

In the past legislature of New York State, a reform bill of the abortion laws was defeated. The delegates voted to accept recommendations of their 100-member board of directors, however.

Presently, New York State is operating under an 85-year-old abortion law which permits legal abortion only if the mother's life is endangered. Last December a bill to amend this law was filed, but was defeated.

The American Civil Liberties Union last week urged the New Jersey legislature to repeal the criminal sanctions dealing with abortions. The ACLU said that any efforts of the state to limit the right of abortion might violate the U.S. Constitution.

Possible areas of Constitutional violations are invasion of privacy; denial of due process; denial of equal protection; and respecting an establishment of religion in contravention of the First Amendment.

Early United States law ruled abortion illegal after "quickening" -- usually about the sixteenth week of pregnancy, where fetal motion is felt. The laws were silent on the abortion dilemma before the quickening period until the middle of the nineteenth century. Abortion was then ruled illegal at any time, with exception when the life of the mother was endangered.

According to Charles C. Dahlberg M.D. and practicing psychoanalyst, doctors have a certain legal amount of discretion in determining the proper operations for patients.

He does not intend this statement to be interpreted as if the doctor is "above the law," but Dahlberg clarifies, "an interpretation of the law becomes the duty of the physician in every instance of possible abortion that comes before him."

Today, even the most permissive laws do not permit abortions after "viability," unless the mother's life is to be saved. Viability is the term used when the fetus is capable of surviving outside of the womb, usually around 26-28 or more weeks old. At this point the fetus is usually considered a live human being.

There is controversy over this determination of when a fertilized egg becomes a human being, however. The Catholic belief, for instance, is that a human exists from the moment of conception.

"From the thirteenth century to the middle of the nineteenth century all but one of 79 Popes accepted this theory of delayed animation," states Lader, Parents Magazine. "Not until 1895 was therapeutic abortion condemned as unlawful by the by the Vatican."

A four-month, six-and-a-half inch fetus in sac. In three months, legal viability--the point at which the infant could survive outside the fetus--will be reached.

The great dilemma

Abortion: professional or moral matter?

By DIANE WEATHERS

For the physician, the topic of abortion is a rather complex one, entailing many problems. Not only must he constantly act in accordance with the standards of his profession, he at the same time must try to live up to the dictates of his conscience. One who has tried to cope with this dilemma is Dr. John Hagen, a noted obstretician and gynecologist at Upstate Medical Center, who for several reasons, feels that the abortion laws should be liberalized considerably.

One objection raised by opponents to the liberalizing of abortion laws is that abortion is the destruction of human life. Such an objection is unanswerable, according to Dr. Hagen. At the present time, there is no medical definition of what consititutes human life, nor is it possible to discern at what point human life begins. Most doctors do agree that during the first three months of pregnancy, the foetus is for the most part an "unrecognizable" mass of cells. It is during this time that an abortion can be performed with a relatively small chance that complications will arise.

After three months, some sign of heartbeat occurs and it also may be impossible to make a sexual distinction of the foetus. This stage is referred to as the "period of viability." The point is, however, that no ture definition can be made because so much depends upon one's point of view.

According to Dr. Hagen, an abortion is a relatively simple operation. The procedure is very similar to a "D and C" (or "scraping," as it is sometimes known) that is a normal operation among many women. In the layman's terms it would be considered merely a "cleaning" out of the uterine area. In the case of pregnancy, provided that the operation is performed during its early stages, that is, before the "period of viability" and with a competent doctor, no serious complications should arise. As Dr. Hagen pointed out, however, hospital-like conditions must exist: everything must be sterilized and extra blood plasma should be available in case hemorrhaging should take place.

It is because so many illegal abortions do not take place under hospital-like conditions that so often serious infection or death

'The Terrible Choice'

Book finds abortion studies clouded by lack of statistics

Due to the nature of the subject, statistical information on abortions is, of course, sketchy.

"Such figures as do exist," according to "The Terrible Choice," a study based on the recent International Conference on Abortion, sponsored by the Harvard Divinity School and the Joseph P. Kennedy Jr. Foundation," are derived solely from questioning a sampling of women by asking them how many live births they have experienced, and how many abortions they have had."

One five-year study, conducted from 1957-62 and concerned strictly with legal, or therapeutic, abortions revealed that there were about two therapeutic abortions for every 1,000 deliveries.

"Based on this ratio," said the book, "and extending it to about 4 million yearly deliveries in the United States, the ratio would tell us that there are about eight thousand therapeutic abortions performed in American hospitals every year."

Illegal abortions

But obtaining information about illegal abortions is far more difficult. Studies have suggested that there might be in the United States from 200,000 to 1.2 million abortions per year--"an extremely wide variation indeed," the study noted.

And particularly lacking is information describing the practices of four major groups in the United States: the Roman Catholics, Spanish-speaking people, rural people and Negroes.

Additionally, it is not known whether increased use of birth control measures have lessened the need for abortion.

"The general sssumption has been made," said the study, "that the greater the contraceptive knowledge, and the greater the effectiveness of the contraceptive, the smaller the need for abortion would be; but here again no evidence has been adduced to substantiate the assumption."

Easier to obtain are the number of deaths resulting from abortion. According to the medical panel at the International Conference on Abortion, 247 deaths resulted from abortion in the United States in 1964, and 235 in 1965.

Although these include deaths from spontaneous miscarriages and legal therapeutic abortions, "the vast majority occur as a result of illegal abortion," the panel said.

And how many annually die from abortion with the fact going unrecognized or unreported is impossible to determine. But all the doctors at the conference agreed that a total of 500 abortion deaths per year "would be a reasonable figure--based on current data." The greatest number of these, according to conference data, come from three of the most populous states. Of the known deaths in 1965, 49 (23 white, 26 non-white) were from New York; 39 (25 white, 14 non-white) from California; and 15 (8 white, 7 non-white) from Michigan.

Yet, as "The Terrible Choice" points out, these statistics do not "fully describe who gets the abortions and who dies from them."

Wealthiest and safest

"It was generally agreed that in the United States it is the wealthiest who are most likely to get the safest abortion, and that this abortion, if performed in a hospital, is most likely to be done for alleged psychiatric reasons."

This is in part because the wealthier are more likely to get private-patient service than the less wealthy, who get the ward services of non-profit hospitals, the study said.

And perhaps more important, according to panelist Dr. Andre Hellegers of the Georgetown University Hospital, "The private white patient is more likely to register for prenatal care early in pregnancy, so that abortion is still possible. On the other hand, nonwhite or ward-service patients are more likely to seek prenatal care after the twelfth week when abortion can no longer be performed by simple dilatation or curettage."

One study reported by "The Terrible Choice" indicated that "private patients register before the twelfth week of pregnancy with seven times greater frequency than ward patients."

Municipal hospitals

In addition, the book pointed out that "not only does the white private patient know where to go, when to go and whom to go to, but there is little doubt that she is more likely to have the funds to obtain a legal abortion when all other circumstances are equal. Municipal hospitals, subject to the scrutiny of the public, are much more likely to be strict in their interpretation of the abortion laws.

"The wealthy are more likely to find a physician who, for a fee, will perform an illegal abortion, and who will do so competently."

Thus, the study points out, although it appears that the poor get fewer abortions than do the wealthy, as many as eight times as many Negroes in New York City die from abortion than do white women.

Abortion dilemma...

results. As the situation exists now, a "safe" abortion is possible only to those who have the money.

New York City and Baltimore are only two areas in which the rates for abortion are the highest, but the operation itself is most often safe. There are some who can afford to fly to Puerto Rico or to one of the Scandinavian countries where abortions are relatively easy to obtain.

A good abortion, then, is open to the wealthy, but this is not always the case for the poor. Dr. Hagen feels that our abortion laws tend to further discrimination practices in our country. Not only must the poor women often be forced to bear a child against her wishes, but if it is a case of illegitimacy, she must also bear the social stigna attached to it.

Dr. Hagen emphasized this aspect as being the one which warrants most the need for legalizing abortions.

Dr. Hagen feels, as do many in the medical profession, that the New York State abortion laws are also somewhat archaic. Therapeutic abortions are allowed only if there is a danger of the loss of the mother's life due to her pregnancy and for which there can be no medical treatment for. According to the doctor, there is at present no such threat to a pregnant woman's life (with the exception of cancer of the cervix) which cannot be treated sufiiciently in a good hospital.

Dr. Hagen pointed out that the pressure on the doctor in Syracuse may be even greater than it is in other areas of the state. Most of the city hospitals have committees which must review each case before a therapeutic abortion may be performed in that hospital. Dr. Hagen said that these committees have tended to be somewhat conservative, and therefore few legal abortions have been done in hospitals in the Syracuse area.

Faced with a problem second only to that of the woman who for various reasons may want an abortion, the doctor, regardless of his personal views, is very much concerned with the very question of abortion. The pressures on him come from many sides. Not only must he at times unwillingly go along with laws that he views as unjust, but many times he is forced to deny his help to those who ask him, knowing that his inaction may be the indirect cause of the loss of someone's life. Even though pressure constantly is put on the various state legislatures for them to change existing abortion laws, Dr. Hagen feels that it will be a long time before abortion will be regarded as a right.

Eleven-week fetus with its arms and legs raised. In one week, this fetus will reach the stage of "quickening." After this point, doctors can no longer perform abortions by the relatively simple method of dilatation and curettage.

Opinion vs. principle

Priests disagree on abortion stand

By DIANE WEATHERS and ANGUS TWOMBLY

"Innocent life is inviolable." This, stated Rev. Norman Kolb, is the basic principle which is held by the Roman Catholic Church and it is this principle on which the Church bases its stand on abortion. Father Kolb believes that one cannot talk merely in terms of set "principles," but must consider the individual situations which may modify these principles.

Father Kolb, who is with St. Theresa's Parish here in Syracuse, is working at present towards his Master's degree in journalism. He criticized those members of the clergy who insist on always relying on traditional principles. The problem of abortion, like other problems, cannot be handled in a vacuum; debate is necessary.

Father Kolb is personally opposed to abortion but he does not feel that he or any other member of the Church hierarchy has the right to impose his moral theology on the people. One of the basic tenets of a pluralistic society is freedom of choice and so he believes that the ultimate decision must be left up to the individual.

This concept of freedom of conscience is one on which Father Kolb feels the Church has said too little. As a priest and as a counselor, he believes that he can only be a mediator, and while he could never tell anyone who came to him for advice that abortion would surely be the the solution to their problem, neither could he say that they must not consider it.

In reference to the issue of abortion and the pill, Father Kolb feels that the Church has placed too great an emphasis on these problems rather than on social problems. While he didn't deny that such problems should be of importance to the Church, such matters are secondary to those such as peace and brotherhood. Nowhere in Christ's Sermon on the Mount, Father Kobl mentioned could he find any reference to how one must structure his marital life.

The Catholic Church, according to Father Kolb, takes a stand on abortion and makes it known what its position is. The one who must decide which action to take, must be the individual, for it is he alone who must be responsible for his actions.

Rev. Charles Borgognoni, Roman Catholic chaplain at SU, adhered solidly to his church's stand on abortion. But, while Father Kolb said one cannot talk merely in terms of principles, Father Borgognoni disagreed saying, "The minute you abdicate principles, it becomes a matter of opinion."

Father Borgognoni holds abortion to be "absolutely wrong." In special cases of rape, incest and a mother declared unfit, he still describes abortion as "murder." Who declares the unfitness?" he questioned. "This is discrimination."

The Roman Catholic church holds that from the moment of conception, a human life exists and to perform an abortion would be to contradict the Divine Law "Thou Shalt not kill." "The only time the church's view could change would be if someone could prove that the fetus isn't a human being," conjectured Father Borgognoni.

When it comes to a decision for or against abortion, Father Borgognoni said, "Ultimately, it is a personal decision. I can only give advice. I cannot...stand over and guard and protect a girl from abortion. She's free to follow her conscience. All the church can do is tell her it's wrong."

In practice, official Catholic policy forbids abortion at any point. Ethicists of other traditions, however, are likely to be influenced more by pragmatism and "cultural relativism," and what they see as a willingness to lessen needless physical and spiritual suffering.

Many ethicists wish to weigh conflicting values in the abortion decision--not sanctioning abortion without regard to the circumstances or reasons offered, but weighing these against potential physical and spiritual suffering.

Most of these ethicists therefore regard present abortion laws of most states as too restrictive; some would make abortion a matter of private decision by the people involved; others would still have it subject to some legal regulation.

But because the abortion question asks that we define human life and its beginnings and then to put a measurable value on it, the conflict between different ethical viewpoints is difficult to resolve.

Student Senate amends dining hall dress code

Dress rules for University dining halls have been amended, according to Dick Oster, chairman of the Dorm Life Committee of Student Senate. The problem was brought to his attention after several girls were turned away from Sunday dinner last weekend because they were wearing slacks.

According to Oster, students have the following option. Men can wear a decent pair of pants with any of the following: sport coat and tie; coat and sweater or a sweater. Women may wear a dress or a skirt or slacks with a blouse, sweater or shirt. Turtle necks will be considered decent attire but sweatshirts will not be permitted.

"By passing these rules we have left the decision up to the individual student," said Oster. "The code has not been abolished but the choices given cover every possible article of clothing."

The proposal first came before Student Senate in a note from the Council on Student Life. CLS, according to Chuck Hicks, voted in favor of not supporting dress regulations in dining halls and recommended that Student Senate take action to that effect.

After Senate passed the new rules CLS supported them. "Those rules are now in effect," said Hicks. "The individual dining halls can have regulations if they wish but they are not mandatory throughout the University."

The style of 'reading, in theater

Lenore Canter shines as Antigone

By PATTI WILLIAMS

A gripping performance was given by Lenore Canter as she played the title role in the dress rehearsal of "Antigone" last night in the Regent Experimental Theater. The Jean Anouilh version of the classic Greek tragedy is being presented in a Reader's Theater style by the Syracuse University Speech Department. The production is playing tonight and tomorrow at 8:00.

Antigone is the daughter of Oedipus and is the sister of Polynices who joined an army that attempted to seize Thebes. He died in battle. The ruler of Thebes, Creon, decreed that the body of Polynices be left unburied as a warning to other rebels, and that anyone burying the body be killed. The play is the story of Antigone's attempts to bury the body of her brother so that his soul will have its eternal rest and not wander forever.

Miss Canter used a defiant stride, a gripping motion of her hand, and a rigid posture to suggest the fierce spirit of Antigone. However, the thing that gave her performance a compelling mystery and fascination was the way in which she used her eyes and voice. Her dark eyes burned into Creon as she defied him. They had a sparkling light of their own as she reminisced about her childhood in one happy scene. Cat-like, they slashed and darted when she insolently mocked Creon.

The ability of Miss Canter created one problem in this production: she was so strong and compelling that other actors were apt to become scenery around her. Cassandra Morrow, as Antigone's sister, Isnene, and Serhi Bohdan, as Haemon, Antigone's fiance, both gave sensitive, thoughtful performances but they usually lacked the strength to capture the audience's attention while Miss Canter was on stage.

The one player who was able to hold his own while Miss Canter was around was Howard Roller, who played Creon. He relied on near-perfect articulation and a booming voice to give force to the role of the king who believes he is setting a needed example in a city filled with potential rebels.

Another problem of this production was the use of the scripts, with which the actors were not consistent. Miss Canter looked at hers only once or twice while Miss Morrow looked at hers almost constantly. Roller seemed to strike a happy medium, looking at his at appropriate moments so the audience was just aware enough of its presence.

Whether the scripts should have been used at all is questionable. The aim of using a Reader's Theater style, that of calling attention to the words of Faculty Senate favors open sessions

"The ordinary business of this Senate will be conducted in sessions open to all members of the university community." This is the resolution recently proposed by the University Faculty Senate.

Hearings on the subject of open meetings was the task of a special eight member group selected by the Senate's Committee on Students, headed by George G. Stern, professor of psychology. Although the initial proposal for open sessions was made last spring, the problem of criteria for membership had to be solved.

After deciding that the meetings would not be restricted, the committee dealt with the problem of defining "all members of the university community." It decided that this would mean any personnel connected with the university in any capacity whatsoever, which would also include food service employees.

Since the proposal calls for the amendment of the bylaws under the section for Meetings in the Constitution, the voting could not take place at the same time as the resolution was proposed. Consequently, the Senate will not vote until December 18, but informed sources disclosed that the general drift is in favor of the proposal.

When this proposal will go through, it will allow reporters, among others, into the sessions. Radio and TV personnel will be decided upon for each individual meeting, and the Senate will reserve the right to exclude anyone from the meetings for the sake of discretion on certain issues. At times, newspaper, radio, and TV staffs may be restricted to perhaps ten minutes before the meeting begins and after the meeting is over, but not the session itself. However, closing of meetings, or like limitations, will be rare occurrences.

Foreign faculty notes U.S. students and their universities with approval

By RAMI KHOURI

Among Syracuse's large and varied faculty are some 50 highly interesting members referred to as our "foreign faculty." Having travelled the world and much of the United States, these few have only fine praise for the American student and his university.

Perhaps our best known "international" mentor is Professor Gabriel Vahanian, director of Graduate Studies in Religion. Sitting in his book-cluttered office, Dr. Vahanian radiates the French culture he was raised in and exemplified.

"A teacher is better off in America than France, and not just in terms of money," he states frankly. Our world-known religion professor comments on the freedom of American professors, which is not available in his home country of France. He enjoys his position at Syracuse very much, mainly because of "the carte blanche I was given here."

One of the truly great men in his field of religion, Dr. Vahanian is critical of the path that the educational system in France is taking. He states that there is presently an "Americanization of the French system, and unfortunately they are imitating the bad aspects of American universities."

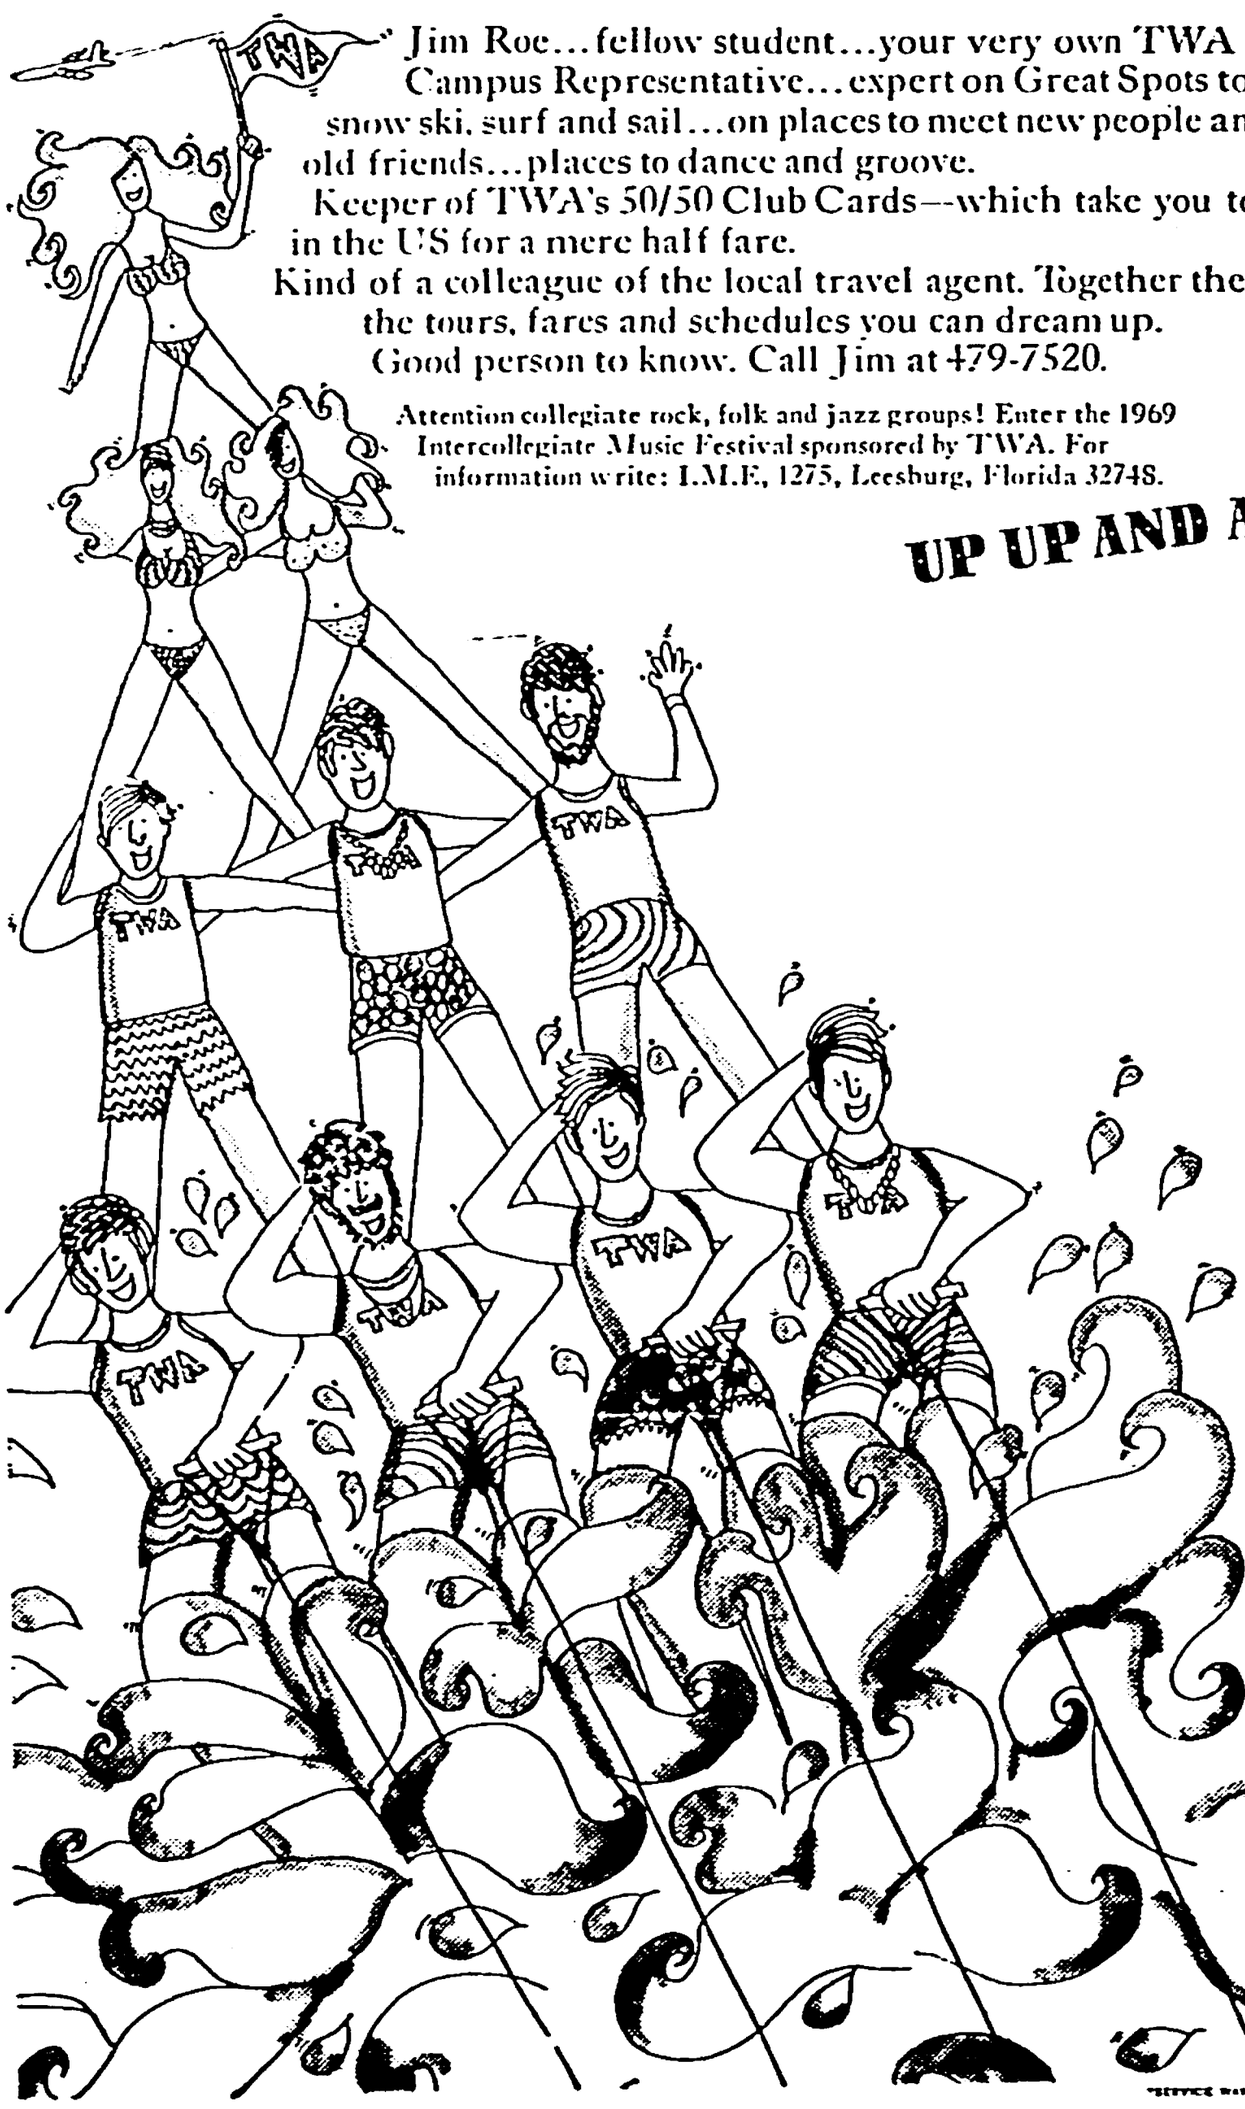
Coming from a small city in southeast France, Valence, Dr. Vahanian obtained his many degrees from Grenoble, The Sorbonne, Paris, and finally Princeton. He taught at Princeton for 3 years before coming to Syracuse in 1958.

Having been in the United States 20 years, he is "open to the future, and the future is wherever I happen to be." He enjoys the United States and Syracuse very much, being pleased with the facilities and conditions, and, of course, his students.

In the same office with Dr. Vahanian is another Frenchman, Daniel Patte, here for his first year as an instructor of religion. Mr. Patte, also from Valence, studied in France, Geneva, and Chicago. He had the rather unique experience of teaching high school students in the French Congo for 2 years.

Mr. Patte, who is as charmingly French as the cross of Loraine, says in his beautifully-Frenched-English American students take education for granted, and thus do not work as hard as the Congolese youth or the French university students. After a stay in the United States for several years, Monsieur Patte would certainly like to return to teach in France.

One floor under the religion department, and one floor away from a most unflustered HBC lobby, is our Romance language department, complete with its beautiful French and Spanish instructors and highly diplomatic professors.



One young French instructor, a delightful young woman form Poitiers, thinks that the Syracuse campus life is "just wonderful." She was at first surprised by the casual attitude students show teachers and once found them impolite.

A Master's candidate, she commented on the smoking, gum chewing and particularly the yawning that she first encountered in her classes. Compared to the rigid, frigid relationships between students and faculty in French universities, the American casualness and close contact is very appealing to her. She sympathizes with the American student of the great deal for assigned work he has, such as term papers, regular tests, quizzes, etc.

Crossing to South America, and moving across the quad to the library, there is another very friendly and charming woman who teaches Portuguese. Mrs. Eleonora Francisconi, a native of Brazil, is here with her husband for one year. A graduate of Rio

New encyclopedia boasts SU works

Eight faculty members from Syracuse University were selected to contribute to the new "International Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences," a 17-volume reference work that represents seven years of scholarly collaboration by 1,505 social science specialists from 33 nations.

The eight million word work re-evaluates the basic work done before the 1930's and surveys the important developments since that time. All of the principal disciplines are covered, including anthropology, economics, geography, history, law, political science, psychiatry, psychology, sociology and statistics.

Syracuse University contributors, by department, are: Program of Eastern African Studies: Professor Aidan Southall; Department of Political Science: Professor Bertram M. Gross; Department of Political Science and Public Administration: Professor Dwight Waldo; Department of Psychology: Dr. Edward J. Murray; Department of Sociology: Professor Jack D. Douglas; Department of Sociology and Anthropology: Professor Lawrence Krader; Youth Development Center: Dr. Blanche Geer; also Professor William C. Lehmann.

Why does a perfect size 7 look perfect only 21 days every month?

It has nothing to do with calories. It's a special female weight gain... caused by temporary water-weight build-up. Oh, you know... that uncomfortable full feeling that sneaks up on you the week before your menstrual period. This fluid retention not only plays havoc with your looks but how you feel as well. (It puts pressure on delicate nerves and tissues, which can lead to pre-menstrual cramps and headaches, leaves emotions on edge.)

That's why so many women take PAMPRIN®. It gently relieves water-weight gain to help prevent pre-menstrual puffiness, tension, and pressure-caused cramps.

PAMPRIN makes sure a perfect size 7 never looks less than perfect. Nor feels less than perfect, either.

Grande do Sul University in Brazil, she teaches a Portuguese language course and works in the library archives. After degrees are finished here, the Francisconi family plans to move to California for more studying, and finally back to settle in Brazil.

The History department in Maxwell has a most distinguished gentleman as its chairman, another of our international guests, Dr. Peter Marsh. Perhaps not as "foreign" as others, Dr. Marsh is a Canadian native who has studied in both Oxford and Cambridge in England, and one whose captivating international flavor comes out as easily as his lectures on English History.

According to Dr. Marsh, the United States "is where the action is, as far as universities and education are concerned." He has great praise for the American student, especially in social involvement. As opposed to British and Canadian students, America's cramming youth is "agonized" by the Vietnam war and racial injustice at home, and has shown a "dimension of concern."

Obviously pleased to be here, and exhibiting the enthusiasm and vitality his country's hockey players are known for, Dr. Marsh has found American students to be slightly smarter than their world counterparts. American Universities, according to him, do not have "the same broad spectrum of very smart and very dumb students" found else where, but America's students are much more in the same bracket, intelligence wise.

[illegible] present Discriminatory [illegible] Board includes SG [illegible] Chuck Hicks, AWS [illegible] Cindy Bailey, Panhel president Sally Cloninger, IFC president Bob Kelly, Dean Tatham, Dean Smith and a representative either of the faculty or alumni.

Its purpose remains the same, to investigate discriminatory practices in fraternities and sororities. Hicks explained that all types of on-campus discrimination, not just the Greek-oriented kind, are considered by the board, for discrimination of any kind reflects on the University.

"If a student feels he's been discriminated against, he can complain tothe board and an investigation will be held," Hicks said. Current board plans call for a reevaluation and broadening of power.

The board is also planning on reviewing the procedure established by Panhel for the investigation of discrimination charges against sororities. Houses, Hicks explained, may be practicing discrimination even though their charters do not specifically contain discriminatory passages.

More than music

Sunday concert is result of work, tedium, trauma

By MARC S. BALKIN

If you attend the University Orchestra concert this Sunday, chances are you will sit back, enjoy the music, and let it go at that. But have you ever stopped to think what goes in to the making of a polished performance?

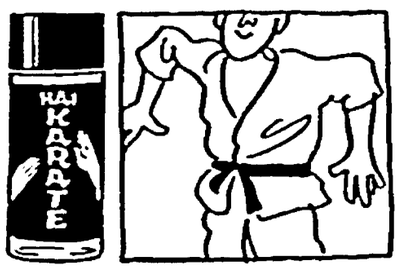
At a large university like Syracuse, orchestra players are not all music majors. One is just as likely to find a chemistry or physics major in the group in addition to the many music majors. Not all music majors are instrumental specialists–some are in the fields of music education, musicology and theory and composition. In the University Orchestra, you will find a player for almost every instrument seen on today's concert stage, including such instruments as celesta, harp, bass clar clarinet and contra-bassoon.

Conductor of the University Orchestra is Louis Krasner, professor of violin, viola, and chamber music. He was born in Odessa, Russia and later came to the U.S. and studied at the New England Conservatory. He has performed as concertmaster of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, and also premiered the Berg and Schoenberg Violin Concertos. He is the holder of many honors, among them a position on a national committee for the arts. Professor Krasner's knowledge and experience help the orchestra achieve a high standard of performance.

Louis Krasner

Full orchestra rehearsals are conducted each week on Wednesday nights. Sectional rehearsals for strings and winds are held on Monday evenings and Friday afternoons, respectively. It is important to realize that no credit is given for participating in the orchestra, and therefore the five to seven hours a week that a student spends rehearsing are given up from his free time. This excludes individual practice on his part and practice time in general. In addition to practicing, the music student must do homework for his academic courses, providing him with a rather difficult schedule.

At rehearsals, much time is spent in checking the intonation of players both individually and in ensemble, and in playing the works over and over again to build up confidence and competency. Indeed, rehearsals can become boring, if not tedious, at times, but only by carefully rehearsing each bar and line of the piece can an acceptable performance be created. This is primarily the responsibility of the conductor, to make sure players come up to his performance standards. But players have to take pride in their ensemble, and if they do not learn their parts, the performance will suffer for it.



Many interesting things happen at rehearsals that are not seen during performances. For one thing, rehearsals can be miniature wars, where, for instance, a virtuoso horn player may engage the conductor in a heated argument over how loud he should play. There have been many lesser disputes over whether a passage should be played with one style of bowing as opposed to another, or who will be allowed to play certain solo passages. At other times, one can find a few members of the brass section reading "Playboy" during their rests, or perhaps a bored percussionist eating a chopped liver sandwich while waiting for his single cymbol crash to come up. A violinist's string might break, the sharp sound of which will send the entire group into hysterics. And once in a while, Maestro Krasner will smile impishly and tell the orchestra a humorous anecdote about the arguments he had with his conductors. And finally, there is the setting up and taking down of all the chairs and stands on the stage before each rehearsal. In the process, a prima donna instrumentalist is relegated to the tasks of a menial laborer, all because there is not enough rehearsal space in Crouse.

In spite of all the rehearsals and trauma a University Orchestra member must endure, he is rewarded by the feeling of pride and accomplishment he receives after a good performance.

the author, was lost as the actors developed their own characters. The audience was emotionally rather than intellectually involved.

This style might have been a successful addition to the modernized touches Anouilh added to the play through modern dress, slang expressions, and references to cars and liquor. That style might have made us more aware of the theme of the play: man should not interfere in matters that only God should decide. On the other hand, the emotional appeal of the usual scriptless acting style might have created a more personal involvement in the play.

SU Israeli Club opens

By IRA SILVERMAN

A new Israeli Club opened this week to provide an Israeli atmosphere and services to Syracuse University students. Rabbi Milton Elefant announced the venture yesterday, indicating that the club, located at 409 Euclid Ave., will be available on Tuesday and Thursdays from 4 to 6 p.m.

The club was organized under the leadership of Aharon Kfir, who is president of the Israeli Student Organization at SU. One of the club's objectives is to provide a place where literature, current magazines and Israeli recordings can be made available. An informal atmosphere will prevail at the club, with debate among the members encouraged.

Information regarding various summer programs in Israel and Israeli institutes available to American students will also be attainable at the club. Some of these additional activities include Sherut La'am, a year-long service program for college students, Volunteers For Israel Program (VIP), a six-month program for volunteers in Israel, and the Ulpan Programs, which include a kibbutz ulpan for six months or a city ulpan for five months.

Peace

Peace and Freedom Party Regional Conference will be held in Syracuse Sunday, Nov. 24 beginning at 11 a.m. at 116 Standart Street and moving to the Chapel House at 2 p.m. Douglas Dowd, economics professor at Cornell University, will speak. A discussion of perspectives for the movement and workshops on reaching particular constituencies for the Thanksgiving PEP convention in New York City will take place. For further information call 478-6278.

Entrance exam

All those taking the "walk-in" Federal Service Entrance Examination on Nov. 23 please report to Gifford Auditorium at 9 a.m. rather than Grant Auditorium.

Black press display featured at Newhouse

An exhibit of American Negro newspapers and magazines is on display at the School of Journalism, Newhouse Communications Center, Syracuse University. It includes a rare issue of Frederick Douglass's Paper, whose editor escaped from slavery via the Underground railroad to Rochester. The exhibit was assembled in connection with what is believed to be the first course on the black press offered in this country.

Material on the black press formerly was included at Syracuse in a course on The Specialized Press. This semester, however, the journalism school scheduled a separate course devoted exclusively to Negro press. It embraces newspapers, magazines, advertising and public relations. The course deals with historical background, management problems, training, recruitment, vocational opportunities and other aspects of Negro publications.

Dr. Wesley C. Clark, dean of the School of Journalism, said: "Interest in the black press developed to the point where the School believed it should enlarge its attention in the area."

Prof. Roland E. Wolseley, chairman of the School's magazine department and teacher of the course, has studied the black press for years and has dealt with it in books, as well as in articles for Negro Digest, The Crisis and other publications.

"Inquiries came from publishers of Negro publications and from several other schools of journalism," said Wolseley. "We expected a small group to elect the course. Instead we have 20 persons enrolled."

Ben's boys face his Alma Mater

By LARRY CENTER

Coach Ben Schwartzwalder is going home tomorrow, but he isn't looking forward to it at all. A West Virginia graduate of 1933, Ben returns to his old school not to renew old acquaintances, but to play football, and he knows his alumni status won't merit any favors.

Syracuse will be opposing a West Virginia team that has compiled a 6-3 record, including three shutouts. Linebacking Coach Chuck Fogarty, who scouted the Mountaineers, says, "A true indicator of their potential is that they played a good game against Penn State, losing by only ten points. They can rise to the occasion against a good team."

The game could mainly be a battle between the great Orange defense and strong Mountaineer passing attack, since Ben has called quarterback Mike Sherwood "the best passer we'll see all year" and WVU coach Jim Carlen has countered with "Syracuse is the strongest defensive team we'll see all year."

Fogarty made it a point not to rule out the West Virginia running game. He said, "The pass is their biggest threat, but it is complemented by an improving running attack, with two fine runners, Jim Braxton and Bob Gresham."

Sherwood has three fine receivers in Braxton, Wayne Porter and Oscar Patrick, who has grabbed 48 for 751 yards and five TD's. He is also getting improved protection from his line, which Fogarty says "is maturing. They really impressed with their performance in the second half against Villanova. They were really kicking out hard."

The Mountaineer defense is centered around the team leader, senior linebacker Baker Brown, and junior guard Carl Crennel, who received All-American ratings as a soph. Fogarty says of Crennel, "He's quick and aggressive and reacts immediately. Every team uses two or three blockers against him." He added, "their secondary is impressive, only giving up four TD's through the air all year."

The West Virginia offense will have a tough job on its hands. The Orange defense goes into the game as the second best rushing and overall defensive unit in the nation, giving up 204.4 yards a game and 72.5 on the ground. In the last three games, they have been directly or indirectly responsible for six touchdowns.

The usual front five and three linebackers will start tomorrow. Fogarty says "Bob Schoonmaker has a bad ankle, so Don Dorr and Bill Smith will see more playing time."

The secondary will again be led by Tony Kyasky and Cliff Ensley, both of whom had thefts last Saturday. Ensley only needs one more to tie the career SU record of 13, held by Ray Perkins. The unit needs one interception to set an all-time Orange single-season mark of 20.

Now that the offense established a strong ground game last Saturday, the Orange will go back to the balanced attack that has helped all year. Carlen says, "They're more versatile. Try to stop their running game and they'll throw. You make the adjustments and they'll start running. Its not Csonka, Csonka, Csonka anymore."

Carlen lamented about Syracuse's many fine backs, "who can all hurt you." Paul Paolisso will again be at quarterback, with Al Newton, who had a great game against Navy, and Mike Chlebeck alternating at fullback. John Bulicz and Lee Castner will share time at wingback. John Godbolt bruised his hip last week, but should be ready at tailback.

If they complete six passes for 70 yards, the '68 Orange will become the "passingest" team in All Ben's years on the Hill.

Fencers and gymnasts hit by graduation, lack good depth

By GINA BELL

The problem of replacing graduating seniors is an annual headache for every coach, and coaches Paul Romeo, of the gymnastics squad, and Alexander Dako, of the fencing team, are no exception. Each must face the coming season minus their outstanding competitors from last year.

Romeo, who lost two men who could compete in five events apiece when Dennis Engle and Art Lynnworth graduated, feels that "the team this year is lacking depth. Losing those top seniors left us hurting."

Although he admits that the team will be weak in the floor exercise, horizontal bar and long horse vault events, he is enthusiastic about three individual standouts whom he hopes will place high in the Eastern Championships in March.

Senior captain Ernie Santangelo, who specializes in the long horse vault, is expected to compete in three to five events each meet. Sophomore George Stalter is promising on the still rings, and Tony DeStefano, also a sophomore, is outstanding in the side horse event.

"I'm building my team around these three boys," Romeo said, looking forward to a season of stiff competition in the tough Eastern Intercollegiate League, which includes perenniel gymnastics powers like Temple and Penn State. Romeo, who is credited with initiating the gymnastics team at Syracuse in 1947 and who has coached his teams to many championships in the past 20 years, hopes to improve on last year's 2-6 record.

Dr. Alexander Dako has lost several key fencers from his squad, but is nevertheless optimistic about his team's chances to better their last year's 3-6 record. "I hope for good progress this year, because I have greater depth in the team than ever before," he said.

According to senior co-captain Peter Lai, the strength of the team will lie in the more rigorous training schedule which is being followed this year. "Last season we did poorer than we should have because we didn't practice hard enough. This year will be different: we're really pushing, and with the potential we've got, we should have a much better team," he explained.

Syracuse is placing its hopes in the skill of several individuals in the use of the three traditional fencing weapons to accumulate points against strong squads from Cornell and Penn State.

Vern Stevens, a senior and Lai's co-captain, is expert with the sabre. Jim Kuhn, another senior, is exceptionally good with the foil, and was last year's North Atlantic Champion. He is the only fencer that Syracus has ever sent to the national competition in Detroit, where he finished 13th in the nation. The squad has no standout in the epee, or duelling sword classification, but sophomores Phil Connors and Fred Gaske are expected to fill the gap in their first season of varsity competition.

Dako reported that this year's turnout of freshman fencers was the largest in years; the squad now numbers 14 men with varying degrees of experience.

Key wrestlers return

Carlin hopes to keep team healthy

By ADAM DAWSON

Wrestling coach Ed Carlin can only forsee improvement for his squad this year. "Barring any repeat of last year's rash of injuries," he says, "this year's team could be real good."

One of the causes of this statement is that 24 boys are out for the team, making it the largest in recent years. The squad includes only three seniors.

In the first of the ten weight classes, Carlin has junior Ralph Mannaker, who took a second in the Coast Guard Tourney last year. Then he injured his knee and was lost for the season.

At 130 pounds, co-captain Joe Palmieri holds down the starting berth. He is also a junior.

The first stringer at 137 pounds is a sophomore, 1968 Eastern Freshman champ Richie Haagen.

At 145 pounds, Carlin has a problem many coaches wish they could have. He has two top quality wrestlers ready for duty. Senior Eric Greenberg and sophomore Doug Garr provide Carlin with his delightful problem.

As of Wenesday's wrestle-off, sophomore Ray Boland has the inner edge at 152. However, co-captain John Terboss is only a step away from the starting berth. Senior Jim Rosell provides added depth.

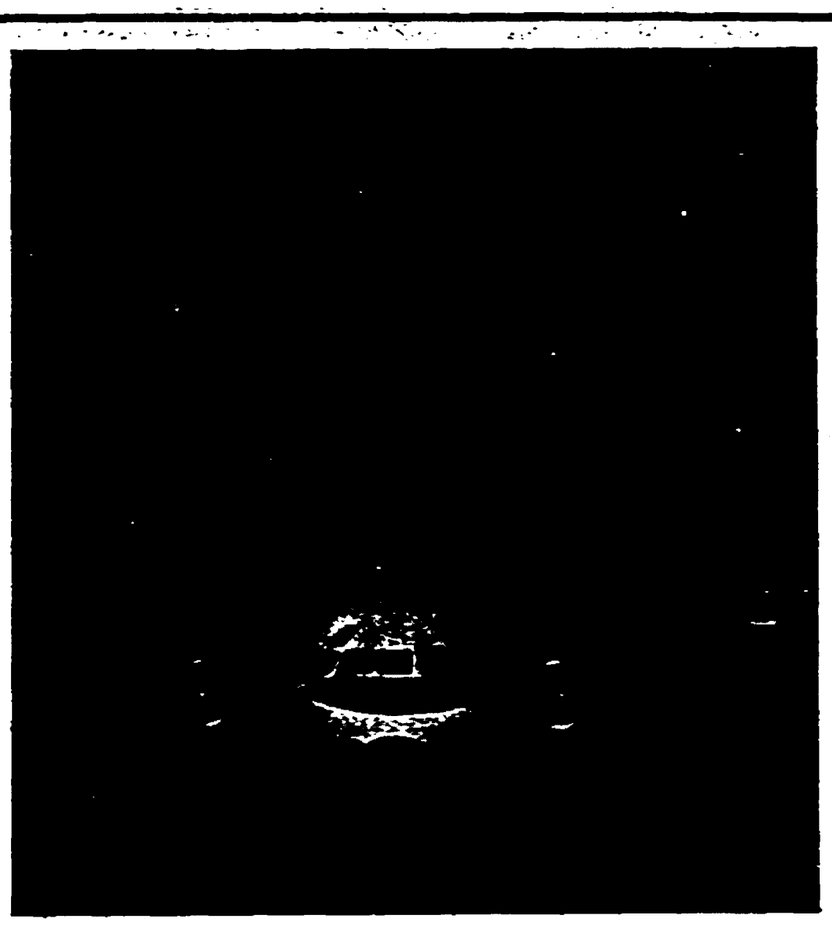
The 160 pound weight class finds Woody Barry, another sophomore, holding down the starting berth. Glenn Bateman, presently nursing an injury, will give him some competition.

At 167 pounds, junior Steve Parker has recovered from the knee injury that sidelined him last year.

Vin Paolano, Lee Castner and Bob Rust form an excellent trio to take care of the 177 and 191 pound weight classes. "The fact that Bob and Lee don't report until after football is over, and wrestling has already started, makes Vinnie's presence an early season necessity," explains Carlin. The heavyweight class is in the hands of Jerry Beach, who missed most of last season with a broken leg.

The team opens their regular season by travelling to New London on December 8th for the Coast Guard Tourney. This meet is followed by dual matches with a group of tough opponents, consisting of Temple, Navy, Cortland, Lehigh, Army, Penn State, Ithaca, Pittsburgh, Cornell, Springfield and Colgate.

These dual matches are followed by the Easterns and the Nationals in early March.



The team has a unique confidence in itself. Says Doug Garr, "we are going to be going places this year; we'll be damned good."

Co-Captain Joe Palmieri voiced the squad's attitude when he says, "It's a good team because all the juniors have a year's experience, the three injured starters are back, we have that fantastic crop of sophomores and the real veterans (the seniors.) The guys have lots of desire and determination, and we'll go far."

One SU student gazes wistfully from his jet before winging his way back to the routine of overdue papers and uncompleted assignments--neglected during a brief Thanksgiving respite. One thing this student could give thanks for was his presence in a plane rather than in an auto mired below in hopelessly snarled traffic. In one instance, returning students and hunters converged in a massive bottleneck on New York's soon-to-be-completed Route 17. Westbound traffic below Roscoe remained constipated for hours, as hundreds of upstate collegians passed the time with card games and other assorted diversions. (Photo by Clemens).

Hearing to be held for SU tax lawsuit

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

A Preliminary court hearing will be held tomorrow to ascertain the facts involved in the lawsuit of tax exempt land which SU has filed against the City of Syracuse.

A series of seven lawsuits, one filed each year since 1963 when SU was denied tax exemption on property purchased for dormitory and academic purposes, are involved. The University has not filed for 1969, however, because the tax rates have just been determined and are not yet compiled.

Director of Real Estate, Prof. William T. Burch, explained that the University is asking for two points from the City: (1.) the return of the money paid to the City over the six-year period on the properties which were "erroneously assessed;" and (2.) a change of SU's property assessment.

For the six-year period the University is asking for the return of $461,252. The decision as to whether the City has erroneously charged the University will be determined in court, probably in January.

"We feel they (the City) have erred in not including all the education facilities of SU. We ask that they revise the tax roles of 1968-69," said Prof. Burch.

Joseph Falcone, deputy to the Commissioner of Assessment and Finance, explained that the assessment controversy is "the question of all students in the particular buildings." He said that the properties could only be tax exempt if they were used solely for educational facilities.

The case reflects the plight of many medium-to-large cities: too little money. Although city expenses keep growing, its tax base is decreasing as the population continues its flight to the suburbs.

The properties involved include Vincent Apartments, the Corner Store, Roosevelt Apartments and Ambassador. Portions of these properties have been used for purposes other than educational. Sometimes families still lived in these areas, or portions have housed Peace Corps groups.

In 1924, however, SU filed suit against the City for the same reasons. In its decision, the court declared that when a property is not used exclusively for a specific purpose, "then such lot or building shall be so exempt only to the extent of the value of the portion so used." Consequently, the property can be partially exempted from taxation, with the amount depending upon the extent the building is used in its specific purpose.

Concerning point two, SU is asking that its assessment values be changed. It is presently assessed at $28 million, but University officials believe this figure should read $29.4 million.

Art School makes plans for early registration

By JOHN WISINIEWSKI

Students in the School of Art will pre-register for their spring semester courses. The pre-registration is an attempt to solve the crowded classes and schedule conflicts that caused friction within the school earlier this year.

The date and procedure for pre-registration will be determined next Wednesday at a meeting of the faculty.

Dean Laurence Schmeckebier emphasized the importance of student cooperation for the successful program. "The responsibility rests with the individual student to make an appointment with his or her advisor prior to registration," he said. "In this way, the student will know which courses he is required to take, and how a balanced schedule of class hours can be arranged.

"In the past," Dean Schmeckebier noted, "students were reluctant in seeking the guidance of faculty members in their major field of study." He urged greater student initiative in the future in asking advisors for help.

Barry Randell, senior class president, who met with dissatisfied art students and documented their grievances Oct. 1, submitted a report to the Dean of Student Services, the Registrat and the Vice President for Academic Affairs. It noted the following pg problems: "Overcrowded sections due to too few sections in required courses and studios. . . Scheduling conflicts in required courses . . . Courses closed on the first day of registration . . . The Art School at present has a vastly less adequate advising system than the rest of the University.

He met with University administrators and Dean Schmeckebier and suggested the alternative of pre-registration.

"Everyone was cooperative. Most of the art students didn't think we'd be able to get anywhere with the administration. But administrators and the dean (of the School of Art) listened and were willing to make changes," said Randell.

Randell also suggested the formation of a student

Procedure questioned

Forestry school forces withdrawal?

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

Earlier this fall, a student in the forestry school claims he was forced by the administration to withdraw from school. He had taken a drug inducing hysteria and delirium and hours later was admitted to the student infirmary.

The student claimed the drug was legal, but was told by the forestry school's Director of Student Services, Harrison Payne, who visited the student in the infirmary, to report to his office for disciplinary action.

At his first meeting with Payne, the student, who wishes to remain anonymous, said he was given the alternative of withdrawing from the forestry college, or else the school would "suspend or expel me for an indefinite period, which means I would leave school in 'bad standing,' thus making it harder for me to return or enroll in another school." The student said that Payne told him that if he withdrew he could "return easily in September of '69 if he conformed a little better and proved that by working." The reasons for leaving would be "personal."

The student also claimed that simultaneous to being told to withdraw he received notice that he was being closed out of his dormitory housing.

After talking to Payne, the student said he was offered help by the Legal Rights Committee of the National Student Association. This committee in turn called on Dr. Samuel Fetters in the law school who agreed to talk to Payne. Dr. Fetters counseled both Dean Payne and Dean Jahn of the Forestry College that the student was being denied any form of due process in this matter because he was "constitutionally entitled to a disciplinary hearing" before having to withdraw.

HARRISON PAYNE

Fetters also managed to have the student's room foreclosure temporarily halted.

Both Fetters and the student claim that not until Dr. Fetters called Payne was the student offered a disciplinary hearing, but for several reasons the student didn't stay in Syracuse for a hearing. He claimed that his father had been threatened with unfavorable publicity should the case go to a hearing, and that the proceedings would look bad on the student's record.

Fetters, in a later interview, pointed out the risks that would have been involved in a disciplinary hearing. He said a disciplinary committee "doesn't know anything about procedure" and "if you lose there you need a suit in federal district court which is both expensive and complicated."

Dr. Fetters speculated, however, that the student would have had a good case at the hearing. If a student is being suspended, he "must be guilty of an offense. It's doubtful what the offense was here. He wasn't charged with anything."

Evidence indicates that the student's consumption of the drug could not lead to any charges. The student identified the drug he had taken as "Asthmador," a brand name for a powder that is burned to give off beneficial inhalents for asthma patients. The student instead claimed he took the drug internally, but even so, Dr. Marty of the infirmary said it was "medically impossible" to determine what drug he had taken.

To determine if the student had been denied the opportunity of a disciplinary hearing, Dean Payne was interviewed. He was reluctant to talk about the specifics of the case, but indicated that the drug incident was not the sole reason for the student's withdrawal. He said there had been other violations during the student's time here, but gave no more information and listed no charges.

"I'm not about to crucify anyone, but to help them," he added. "When other students don't know the facts, they are quick to condemn."

The student admitted that he had smoked pot several times before he was involved with the drug incident, but said that was his first time with drugs. He also had been on academic probation for one semester, but had never been officially charged with anything else.

Dean Payne was not willing to divulge how he had presented any alternatives to Pre-registration for the School of Art

The initiation of pre-registration in the School of Art is an excellent example of institutional change to accommodate the needs of students. We have twice editorialized on the complaints of the Art students this year. Now we must acknowledge the improvements worked out by the Administration, especially Allen Splete, assistant to the dean for Academic Affairs, the Dean of the School of Art, Laurence Schmeckebier, and Senior Class President, Barry Randell.

The original grievances against the School of Art included: overcrowded sections, scheduling conflicts of required courses, courses closed on the first day of registraiton due to lack of control over course sign-up lists, registering for classes that later jettisoned several students to alleviate overcrowding, an inadequate advising system and unbalanced schedules.

First, Dean Schmeckebier has pointed out that since Art students are not assigned advisors during their sophomore, junior and senior years and follow a pre-determined curriculum their freshman year, they should seek out an instructor in their major or go to their department chairman for scheduling advice. The first move is up to the students.

Second, pre-registration will minimize scheduling conflicts and mix-ups that have an art student going to class once on one day and for twelve hours on another. Pre-registration is a necessity in a school where students must spend so many hours working in classrooms and labs and consequently must pattern their schedules carefully.

Third, pre-registration will not solve all the grievances. The School of Art administration says it cannot find additional competent instructors in Illustration and Costume Design so overcrowding of these classes may continue. The School of Art of course must also work within the limitations set by its budget.

Even so, an improvement has been effected in the School of Art by reasonable men working together. Dean Schmeckebier, furthermore, has encouraged continued communication between his office and dissatisfied students. May all downtrodden, frustrated students take note.

Letter: visiting hours

I would like the opportunity to clear up some misconceptions created a few days ago by an article on visiting hours. It is easy to excuse, however, because communication in general has been a problem through our process of securing visiting hours in dormitories, experimentally.

Last spring Lawrinson and Dellplain were allowed by the Council on Student Life, to institute visiting hours for a three month period at which time they would be evaluated. This fall the program was reinstated indefinitely. Based on the seeming success of these living centers and the necessity for a wider experiment in order to judge the merits or demerits of visiting hours, the Council established standing committee No. 3 which would "review and process proposals."

The C.S.L. has a very vague but flexible jurisdiction. As a committee composed of students, faculty and administrators, we are allowed to approve minor policy changes and experiment with major policy changes. This being a major policy change it required a definition of what constituted an experiment on this issue. An administrative decision was made allowing for 20-25% of the undergraduate resident population to participate, proportionately distributed among the different sizes and types of living centers. After this step was taken several weeks were spent in deliberation on our objectives and the proper way to implement them. Three weeks ago we started hearing proposals as they were handed in. That week five women's cottages, Kimmel-Marion, one fraternity and Haven were passed. The following week all men's large dorms were heard and Dellplain, Lawrinson and Booth were passed along with Barclay and Merrill. As of now our quota is filled and no more living centers, with the possible exception of St. Mary's which is a category onto itself, can be included in the experiment.

In the choice of these units many factors were considered: the quality of the proposal and the presentation of it, also the type of the dorm, the number of residents and the classes represented. The students on the standing committee as well as the faculty and administrators found obvious difficulty in making such difficult choices but our limits were so severly imposed on us that we had no alternative.

Defense of police action

By Elliott K. Wicks

Anyone who attended the Navy football game and stayed in the stands at the end rather than surging on to the field will recognize that Paul Finkelman's description and analysis of the clash between police and students in the game was totally lacking in objectivity and accuracy. His blanket condemnation of the police is unjust and irresponsible. He begins with an emotionally charged statement which is clearly designed to stimulate antagonism toward the police: "A group of students had gathered and that made them fair game for the police. The police formed a wedge, unsheathed their clubs, readied their fists, and attacked." The statement clearly lacks objectivity. But what is more important is that it is untrue.

There was certainly nc planned, organized attack on the students by a group of policemen. What did happen was that five minutes or so before the game was over several hundred male students climbed the fence surrounding the field, rushed to the goalposts, and tried to tear them down. The six or seven policemen who were near the goalposts responded by pushing the students back and chasing them into the stands, from whence they were pelted by a barrage of snowballs. The action was repeated another time but with the result this time that a section of the fence was torn down as the student stormed the field. At this point, the vastly outnumbered police, evidently recognizing that the iron goalposts could not be torn down, left the students to their antics.

Admittedly, from the stands it was impossible to see all the action on the field, but from my vantage point at no time did I see any police officer use his night stick. One rowdy student was forced to the ground and led off, and many were pushed, but this can hardly be called police brutality. Perhaps some few officers were unnecessarily violent in their response, as Mr. Finkelman claims, but even if that is true, his indiscriminate charge of "police brutality" is completely unjustified.

Mr. Finkelman obviously starts with the assumption that the students were within their rights to try to tear down the goalposts at the end of the last game of the home season. Since when has this become an inalienable right, especially before the game ends? Besides being a rather childish action in a day when college students are becoming known for their concern about important things like civil rights, U.S. foreign policy, and student participation in university governance, the attack on the goalposts, had it been successful, would have caused costly damage to University property.

The responsibility of the police was to protect University property and to keep spectators off the field while the game was in progress, and they were clearly carrying out their duty in trying to stop the students. In view of the fact that the officers were vastly outnumbered and were being abused and ridiculed by students in the stands as well as on the field, they should be commended for the restraint which they showed. To expect a few men, being rushed by hundreds of students and pelted with snowballs, to act without any emotion is to expect what is impossible and therefore unreasonable. By far the majority of the officers acted in a responsible and reasonable way, using only the degree of force that was necessary to push the students off the field. One might argue that it should have been obvious to the police that the iron goalposts could withstand the student attack, but if that was so obvious, why did several hundred students think they could succeed in tearing them down? The police concern for possible damage to University property was clearly justified: a large section of the fence was destroyed.

Mr. Finkelman's article is objectionable not just because it is inaccurate and unobjective, but because it destroys the effectiveness of his altogether laudable plea for improvement in the quality of police forces in American cities. His recommendations for higher salaries to attract better men and improved training for officers are desirable and should be supported by all Americans who favor just enforcement of the law. All of us can agree that there have been many instances of police brutality in recent times, but to compare the incident at the game with the travesty in Chicago is grossly unfair and does nothing to make responsible students sympathetic to Mr. Finkelman's recommendations.

If the quality of law enforcement is to be improved, respect for the role of the police is essential. Unwarranted attacks on the police in general can only hinder just enforcement of the law.

Human rights dialogue

Closer campus-ghetto relationships urged

By COREY SANDLER

Student Government executives Chuck Hicks and Jeff Portnoy met yesterday with Frank Render, Onondaga County Human Rights Commissioner, to discuss the role of the University in the ghetto community of Syracuse. The meeting was the third in a series of dialogues between students and members of the mayor's office.

There exists, according to Portnoy, a serious rift between the residents of the Fifteenth Ward and the University. The people regard SU students as transients who come into their community to tell them how to live. Many of the students of the University look upon the ghetto people as guinea pigs for their research papers. The students should realize that the residents are people too," said Portnoy. The student who spends an hour or so a week working in the ghetto in service projects and feels that he understands the people - that he knows what is going on, is mistaken, according to Rights Commissioner Render. Render and the University representatives, including a member of the Dean of Men's staff, Mr. Frank McCree, formulated a plan to involve students with people.

Syracuse University owns property in the ghetto. This includes houses, occupied and unoccupied, and undeveloped land. The land was purchased or given to the school for future expansion. No tenants have as yet been evicted by the University according to Render.

"What we'd like to see is the University giving up some of the property it owns in the ghetto and allowing students to live there. This way they will be able to work within the community. It would be like VISTA—a University—sponsored VISTA," said Portnoy.

Hicks and Portnoy suggested other ways of involving ghetto residents with campus activity. Hicks proposed a change in the University policy of limiting sale of concert tickets to students. According to Portnoy, "it sort of makes the University out to be a separate entity when it doesn't allow non-students to buy tickets to campus activities." He suggested city-wide sale of tickets to cultural events as a good means of community involvement.

Also cited at the meeting was a lack of communication between the Ward and student leaders. "Sometimes students come up with valid plans for working with the ghetto, like Projection '70, but they fail to consult any community leaders. They try to force the plans on them," Render said.

Single party may be temporary solution to campus problems

By MARGARET ALLAN

"Scrap the whole thing," advised former Greek Independent Alliance Party president Scott Weiner last night, commenting on the two-party system as it now exists on campus.

Continuing in his testimony before the Student Committee On Political Equity, Weiner suggested that a single party might be a temporary solution to the "ridiculous party system we have here now."

"Every April, Syracuse University divides up like a summer camp when campaigns start," Weiner stated. "What we need is a complete synthesis of ideas through a political system of undergraduates."

"Merge the two parties into one, although it seems horribly undemocratic." Weiner suggested that such a merger would eliminate cutthroat practices between parties and yield a better crop of candidates.

When questioned about past campaign practices, Weiner, also president of the freshman class last year, indicated that "deals are always made."

However, he denied offering financial or political aid to freshman candidates this year, asserting to the fact that such perspective campaigners need only advice.

"Advice was all I ever gave," Weiner declared.

Committee Chairman Fred Tuccillo drilled Weiner on the disappearance of the Daily Orange during political campaigns last spring, the tearing down of political posters, and convention practices.

Weiner announced that he and his friends "got a big laugh" from the attempted newspaper swipes. Any calamities which may have arisen from the alleged attempts to document the press were unknown to him.

"Except for a few instances, I think attempts to keep up political posters were sincere," Weiner noted. He blamed the removal of posters on individuals rather than parties.

The withdrawal of Negro Gilda Harris from nomination for SG Vice-President at the GIA convention last year was, according to Weiner, "one incident I shall never forget."

The belief shared by GIA members that two Negroes on one ticket would point to that ticket's defeat, he stated, was not due to party prejudice.

"This is campus prejudice," not to be blamed on the parties, said Weiner.

"Any party tries to get voter appeal; two Negroes, I feel, couldn't win," he added.

Earlier this week Interfraternity Council president Bob Kelly and Mike Silverman, GIA's campaign manager, said no racial implications were involved in the decision of Gilda Harris to decline nomination after GIA's nomination of Chuck Hicks.

organization within the Art School to serve as "an effective sounding board for student opinion."

Dean Schmeckebier expressed interest in the group, and said, "I would urge and support such an organization at any time." He hoped the student organization would help establish a closer student-teacher relationship in the Art School. "The group could also participate in dialogues with other schools within the university," commented the dean, "and take part in exhibits and other creative functions of the Art School."

The dean noted that the ideas of pre-registration and a student organization are not new concepts in the Art School. "We've attempted to install a system of pre-registration in past years. We hope student cooperation will make it successful this year," he said.

With regard to the proposed student organization, Dean Schmeckebier said similar groups exist now within the various departments of the school. However, the dean explained that he would like to see an "all-Art School organization" to aid in satisfying the needs of the students.

Tatarian plans for experimental Union headquarters in Kimmel

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

University Union is building a temporary student union because funds for a permanent union were so inadequate that they were useless, according to Jerry Tatarian, president of UU. He said there is about $330,000 in UU's building fund. The temporary student union in Kimmel will cost about $150,000.

"The figure of $150,000 is a drop in the bucket to build a union," said Tatarian. "To build a passable union would cost $7 million. To build a good union would cost $10 million. The money for a union isn't useful when it just sits there while students lack facilities.

"The union in Kimmel is by no means a substitute for a union building. It's going to allow us to experiment. We'll try to find out what things in a union will work and what things won't."

The popularity of facilities and services offered by the temporary union will help determine their roles in the permanent union, according to the president of UU. He siad UU members will learn how to handle various situations, such as those encountered while serving beer to students.

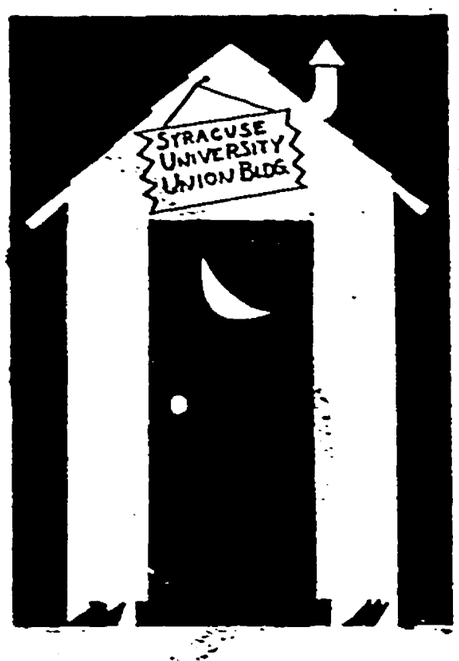
The temporary union, Tatarian said, will become a coffee house or a nightclub when a permanent union is built.

In addition to UU's fund for a union building, Tatarian said a fund of $7,400 exists for an interfaith center which is to be part of the union building. He said the fund was started by university chaplains.

Tatarian

"The idea was that it was easier for religious groups to raise money than University Union and the money for an interfaith center could partly supplement funds for a union," the president of UU said. "The religious center of course was also planned as part of the union because of the importance of religion at Syracuse.

"However, there will not necessarily be an interfaith center in the union since this summer Hendricks Chapel was fixed up and since several religious groups are building their own facilities. The religious groups are interested in getting something fast."



Money for a permanent union building, "could come at any time now," he said. He attributed that prediction to the fact that the university has received the money needed for the library and thus it can concentrate on soliciting funds for a student union.

"If we don't have the money within the next three years, we'll never have a student union," said Tatarian. "It's now that the pressure for the union is strongest. The need for it is greatest now because of the closing of cottages and because of the construction of dormitories like St. Mary's so far from the heart of campus.

"The students are losing places where they had real group exchange. Dormitories only have lounges that are never used."

"Students and teachers need more places for contact," he said. "HBC lobby is too small for all the people who want to stand and talk. The union in Kimmel should help alleviate some of this problem."

Membership in UU has doubled since last year, said Tatarian. He attributed the increase to a change in the structure of UU and to the fact that several architecture and art students are helping design the temporary union.

The change in structure involved the creation of three UU executive boards, while only one existed formerly. The three boards are a programming board, a development board and a union policy board. The constitution was also revised to include faculty and university representatives on UU boards.

Several interior design and architecture students have joined the UU ranks to assist the architects designing the union in Kimmel.

Other students with suggestions as to what they want to see in the temporary union should attend one of the upcoming presentations UU is giving to explain to students what the union in Kimmel will consist of.

"The kids should let us know if they have any suggestions," said Tatarian. "It's not too late to change the internal features of the union in Kimmel."

Committee never needed before would include student member

the student when he first came to his office, but he did say that he had immediately offered the student the possibility of a disciplinary hearing. The student and Dr. Fetters claim the offer didn't come until after Fetters had called Dean Payne.

Speaking of general disciplinary procedures, Payne said that if an offense is not serious, he prefers to take care of it within his own office. The student is, however, "generally given that alternative of a disciplinary hearing, or else he can go to the University Judicial Board." Payne indicated that most disciplinary matters had been handled in his office.

When asked what exactly a disciplinary committee would consist of, Payne pointed out that he "never needed this sort of thing" before but it would be a committee chosen by him, consisting of faculty members and some representative of the student body, possibly someone recommended by the Student Government president.

Much of the confusion and conflict over what actually did happen when this student faced Dean Payne probably occured because the forestry school has no standard prescribed disciplinary procedure to use with its students. In "Rules and Regulations," given to every forestry student, nothing is written about discipline, other than that used for academic troubles.

When a student is in disciplinary trouble, it is from the forestry administration that he must learn of his alternatives. He gets them in any form at the discretion of the dean. There is no standing committee to hear his case, and he has no say in its choosing.

What is lacking is some formal procedure, written out step by step and distributed to the students. As Dr. Fetters pointed out, a student should be given answers to questions like: "What is the prescribed conduct and the range of penalties for violating it?"

If there is to be a disciplinary committee, its make-up should be established in writing. Students should know who is on it, and perhaps would like a voice in deciding.

It if is going to be suggested that a student withdraw, he should be told some good reasons why. He needs specific charges to defend himself against. An open disciplinary hearing would insure a procedure free from administrative coercion.

Reflecting on the plight of the students, Dr. Fetters said, "when the accusation process starts to move against a student, he must realize that he has certain rights and doesn't have to abide by unilateral decisions of someone in the administration. He has certain rights and should be advised of them."

"Usually the more serious the charge," he added, "the more summarily the student is dealt with."

We encourage job-hopping. We do try to keep it intramural—within Du Pont that is—and we do have a more formal title for it, "planned mobility."

Saylor Gilbert, CH.E., V.P.I., 1962, tells it like it is.

It only means we don't put you in a training program. We put you in growth jobs—to help you get to the top of your field the way you want to get there.

"Take a good look around you, and you'll see people at Du Pont who've had a lot of movement through very different kinds of jobs. There's no doubt that this diverse experience helps you. For example, I had four assignments concerned with different aspects of polymerizing, casting, stretching and finishing our polyester film base."

"Having had all this, I feel I was better prepared for my present position of training supervisor. But aside from the fact that variety can help you, I believe most people just like a change after working at one job for a period of time."

Your Du Pont recruiter will be a guy like Saylor.. Ask him about planned mobility—or anything else you'd like to know about Du Pont. Mailing the coupon is the surest way to get in touch with him.

New method

Computers personalize job recruiting on campus

A new method of recruiting seniors and graduate students for industry and the professions has been instituted on more than 800 campuses this fall by a company called COMPUJOB.

Headed by two dropouts from the Wharton Graduate School of Business Administration, President Tanfield Miller, 21, and Vice President Edward M. Swan, Jr., 27, claim that COMPUJOB, paradoxically, uses computers to make recruiting more personal. Briefly, its system is as follows.

Questionnaires are distributed to students on campus to be filled out and returned to COMPUJOB. These have been planned to pto provide an extensive and realistic description of individual educational background, occupational and locational preferences and, significantly, personal goals. Using computers, COMPUJOB then matches students' qualifications to the particular specifications made by its widely diversified clients. Clients then get "profiles" of the students who seem to be most interested in working for that type of employer.

There is no cost to the student. Questionnaires come in their own postage-paid, pre-addressed envelopes addressed to COMPUJOB, 1100 Connecticut Ave., N.W., Washington, D.C. The client pays, contacts students directly and coordinates with college placement offices.

Geared to serve both large and small employers, COMPUJOB's immediate benefit is to help make the on-campus personal interview more meaningful. Through the COMPUJOB "profile" system, both the employer and the applicant meet knowing that each is interested in the particular characteristics of the other.

COMPUJOB expects to eventually have information on more than 50 per cent of those graduating students who will enter the labor market next year. Small colleges are not neglected. In the past, high cost prohibited industry from sending recruiting representatives to these schools where students urgently need the exposure COMPUJOB now can give them.

Miller and Swan started COMPUJOB last year while graduate students at Wharton. Miller did his undergraduate work at the University of North Dakota; Swan, at Tufts. At Wharton they worked together on a computerized recruiting project for their thesis, found it so successful they left school to put it in oerations as COMPUJOB, INC. Their initial capital totalled $860. Their first client was Jos. E. Seagram & Sons, whose personnel director tried first to hire them.

"Our aim," says young President Miller, "is to give employers brains not just bodies, and to give students a better chance at jobs that best suit their education, skills and personality. We used our own system to hire all our COMPUJOB personnel. It's worked."

Sawyer raps

Political science professor Michael O. Sawyer will talk with students in today's UU Bull Session at Hendricks Chapel.

The "only Republican in the Maxwell School," Sawyer has been active in state and local party politics. He is former vice-chairman of the Onondaga County Republican Party, and was the executive director of the Committee on Bill of Rights and Suffrage at the state Constitutional Convention.

The Bull Session will be held at 4:00 in the Colonial Room of Hendricks Chapel.

Crossroads

The deadline for applications for Operation Crossroads Africa has been extended to Friday, Dec. 6. They should be given to Mrs. Bell in Hendricks Chapel.

Those who have already applied please check with Mrs. Bell at ext. 2903.

Tuition won't increase again for school year

Despite a reported $284,758 deficit, SU apparently does not plan to increase tuition again this year.

According to a Syracuse Herald-American article last weekend, Chancellor William P. Tolley "gave assurances that no further increases are planned for the current year." Tuition was raised $200 in April to a total of $2,000 a year.

Instead, the article said, SU administrators are cutting back expenses one to one-and-a-half percent in an effort to avoid a potential million-dollar deficit in the 1968-69 budget.

Since the 1968-69 university fiscal year is only five months old, specific figures and cuts are not available. "But," said the article, "Tolley said expenses are being cut back where possible because of a possible deficit of $750,000 to $1 million in the $68.6 million budget."

The chancellor indicated that it would be March or April before "we know where we stand."

The article added that at least part of the university's fiscal difficulties can be attributed to the competition of the growing State University, and SU's efforts to match the educational program offered by that tax-supported institution. Increased salaries and fringe benefits in an attempt to keep professors has been one result.

Other problems include cuts in the federal research funds, which have been an important source of income for many private universities like SU, but which have been reduced by the Vietnam war; a backlog of deferred maintenance that has required dipping into discretionary funds; and high expenditures for "auxiliary activities" such as heating, fund-raising expenses and the

Honors

FRESHMEN AND SOPHOMORES: information and applications for the Liberal Arts Honors Program are now available in 108 HL. A 3.0 average is a minimum requirement. See Mrs. Christoffel for further information.

4 students awarded

Several Syracuse University students won awards at the Annual Broadcasting Clinic which took place at SUNY at Geneseo recently. By receiving five awards, SU had the largest single number of trophies for one school in the competition, in which more than 25 colleges and university radio stations were represented.

Seven members of WAER's staff attended the conference and four students won awards.

Laura Hand received the first place honor in women's announcing for radio while Roberta Chizzini received a second place award in that category.

In the men's competition, Elliott Schwartz took the first place award in television announcing and also received a first place award for an original radio editorial on the electoral college.

Bob Sikorski won the third place award for men's television announcing.

The annual competition is sponsored by the Division of Speech in cooperation with the Broadcasting Club of SUNY Geneseo.

Each winner received an eight-inch gold microphone trophy.

Pinebrook II

Pinebrook II Conference will be held Saturday, Dec. 14 from 10 to 4 p.m. at Drumlins. All student participants of Pinebrook I are requested to pick up their invitations and Pinebrook I report in Dean Carleton's office before Friday, Dec. 6.

Film grants

In its continuing encouragement of student film making on the Syracuse University campus, Film Forum is pleased to announce the establishment of three new grants to student film makers. Each of these grants is for $250 and the competition will be open to any student currently enrolled at Syracuse.

A committee composed of Timothy Wilson, of the Center of Instructional Communications; Martin Fass, coordinator of public information for University College; Richard Cressey, of the C-T Film Center in Syracuse; and the Rev. Norman O. Keim, Hendricks Chapel, will judge all proposals and award the final grants.

Proposals listing ideas, full plan of action, and available technical resources should be submitted to the Rev. Norman O. Keim, Hendricks Chapel, by January 5, 1969. All rights to completed films will remain in the hands of the film maker. There will be no restriction in subject matter.

Capable, ambitious students invited to apply for membership in College Honors Program

Interested and capable freshmen and sophomores are invited to apply for membership in the Honors Program of the College of Liberal ARts. At present there are 130 freshmen and 80 sophomores who have been selected as members of the Honors Program. After the first semester of the freshman year acceptance as an Honors Candidate may be granted at the end of each semester, up to the beginning of the junior year, on the basis of college performance, faculty recommendations, and the student's application. Freshmen and sophomores not yet in the Honors' Program now have the opportunity to apply.

The Honors Program is designed to provide special educational opportunities for those undergraduate students who show promise for genuine academic achievement and who give evidence of an ambition to develop their intellectual abilities to the fullest.

A "B" cumulative average is minimum requirement, but faculty recommendations, the nature of the courses taken, and the student's personal statement also weigh heavily.

All students who are interested may pick up the application blanks in 108 Hall of Languages. All applications must be completed before Christmas vacation. Mrs. Christoffel, Administrative Assistant to the Honors Program, will be glad to answer any questions.

Hearing . . .

Syracuse University has 502 properties on the tax rolls in the City.

Sororities and fraternities also pay full taxes, totaling to $112,641. Dormitories are tax-exempt. Several years ago Cornell tried to stipulate Greek houses under the same conditions as dormitories so that they, too, would become tax exempt, on the grounds they house all students. Cornell lost the case, and even if the house is rented from the University, full taxes must be paid.

Green Orange at Cornell tonight

By ED AGRANOWITZ

The Syracuse basketball team will attempt to rebound from last year's 11-14 season when it invades Cornell's Barton Hall to open the 1968-69 campaign with the Big Red tonight.

The experience-thin Orangemen will be facing a veteran Cornell squad which boasts four returning starters from last year's 14-11 club.

SU rookie coach Roy Danforth will open with juniors John Suder (6-2) and Gerald McFadden (6-4) in the backcourt, senior Bob Kouwe and junior Billy Case, both 6-4, at the forwards, and lanky soph Bill Smith (6-11) in the middle.

The two men which the Orange must stop are seniors Hank South, a 6-3 forward, and Walt Esdaile, a 6-5 center.

Danforth plans to employ both man-to-man and zone defenses to combat this pair. South scored at a 17.9 clip last year, despite being slowed by a knee injury. "South is one of the best forwards in the East," says Danforth. "We'll probably use McFadden or Kouwe on him."

If the Orange go man-to-man on defense, the task of guarding Esdaile will fall on Smith's shoulders. "Esdaile is 240 pounds of educated meat," says Danforth. "He knows how to use his weight real well."

In all probability, however, the Orange will open with a zone defense. In a double scrimmage against Princeton last week, SU dropped the opener by 19 points playing man-to-man. Smith did well against the Tigers' potential All-American center Chris Thomforde, but the short Orange forwards were unable to stop Princeton's John Hummer.

In the second game, Roy's Boys switched to a zone, held Hummer to no field goals, and upset the Ivy power by 14.

Top scorers for the Orange in the two sessions were (unofficial totals), Smith (23 and 22), McFadden (9 and 24), and Kouwe (12 and 14).

"We learned a lot about our team in the Princeton scrimmage," said Danforth. "We had difficulty matching up, and it looks like we'll have trouble when we play teams that take our men to the basket."

"Cornell is a team that rebounds very well offensively," continued Danforth, "and they will also have the home court advantage, as well as we?? as a game under their belts." The Big Red opened last week and downed Colgate.

Besides South and Esdaile, first year Cornell mentor Jerry Lace has at his disposal veteran guards George Chapman (6-3) and Paul Frye (6-0), and returning forwards Gregg Otto (6-4) and Bill Schwarzkopf (6-5).

"This game will tell us a lot about ourselves," says Danforth. "If we play as well as we have looked in practice recently, I think we can beat them."

Orange Bowl bound

No. 3 Penn State has deep and powerful team

By MIKE WEBER

The year 1968 may well be remembered as the year of the Lion as far as Eastern football followers are concerned. Penn State's Nittany Lions are currently riding the crest of a 16-game winning streak and show no signs of collapse on the way to their Orange Bowl date with Kansas.

Joe Paterno's crew has been able to pull out the clutch games, win easily when opponents were not up to par, and run up incredible scores although trying to keep them down.

In their most recent encounter, Penn State destroyed Pitt, 65-9. Paterno commented almost apologetically, "We did everything we could to keep the score down."

The Nittany Lions have two 1968 All-Americans on their roster in Ted Kwalick and Dennis Onkotz. Kwalick has caught 27 passes from his tight end slot and tallied two touchdowns on aerials and one on an end-around play.

Onkotz was named to the defensive squad. SU fans will remember his 47 yard touchdown run with an interception last year, which put the game out of reach of the Orangemen.

The 6-2, 205 pound junior had pilfered four passes through the first nine games of the season, returning one all the way. He has also returned 10 punts for 118 yards.

Offensively, the Lions shape up as a fantastically well-balanced squad.

Charlie Pittman, who tallied once in last year's ballgame, is the bread and butter man. He has gained 915 yards in 172 carries for a 5.32 average and 13 touchdowns.

Bob Campbell, who runs from the other halfback slot, is the author of one of college football's heartbreak stories. After a fine sophomore campaign, Campbell injured a knee in the third game of 1967 and was lost for the season. This year, a shoulder separation kept him out of several games, and only a miraculous recovery has made his comeback a reality.

Despite his injures, Campbell has gained 531 yards on 103 attempts and has reached paydirt five times. His 5.15 rushing average ranks right behind Pittman among Penn State regulars.

The fullback slot has been filled by Tom Cherry, but his injury suffered against Maryland has given Don Abbey some playing time. Cherry has carried 76 times for 271 yards and three tallies while Abbey has lugged the pig 36 times for 159 yards and three td's.

The PSU signal caller is Chuck Burkhart. The junior quarterback has attempted 158 passes and has hit on 78, five resulting in touchdowns. He has reached the 1000 mark in yards passing with his performance against Pitt.

The interior line is composed of captain John Kulka, Tom Jackson, Warren Koegel, Charlie Zapiec and Dave Bradley. With an average weight of 225 pounds per man, they rank with the biggest lines the Orangemen have faced this year.

Onkotz leads a defense which has surrendered just 94 points, an average of 10.4. The line averages 221 pounds a man and features two all-East candidates in Mike Reid and Steve Smear. Reid was named to the ECAC first team in 1966 but missed last year due to a knee injury. Smear was voted the most improved player in spring practice this year. He improved on a 1967 performance which netted him participation in over half the Penn State defensive plays.

One of the defensive backfield standouts is Neal Smith. A transplanted linebacker, his play at safety this year has been "really fine" according to coach Paterno.

After reviewing the strong points of the 1968 edition of Penn State football, Ben's Boys will be hard pressed to derail the PSU express from its goal in the year of the Lion.

Swim team features depth; opens at Buffalo Saturday

By BOB GALLAGHER

Possessing its best depth in many years, the SU swim team, with eight returning lettermen and some promising sophomores, opens its 68-69 season this Saturday at Buffalo.

Like Hercules, this year's mermen will be noted for their strength. In comparing the present squad with previous ones, coach Jon Buzzard states, "We're strong in every event, and the team is the most versatile in years."

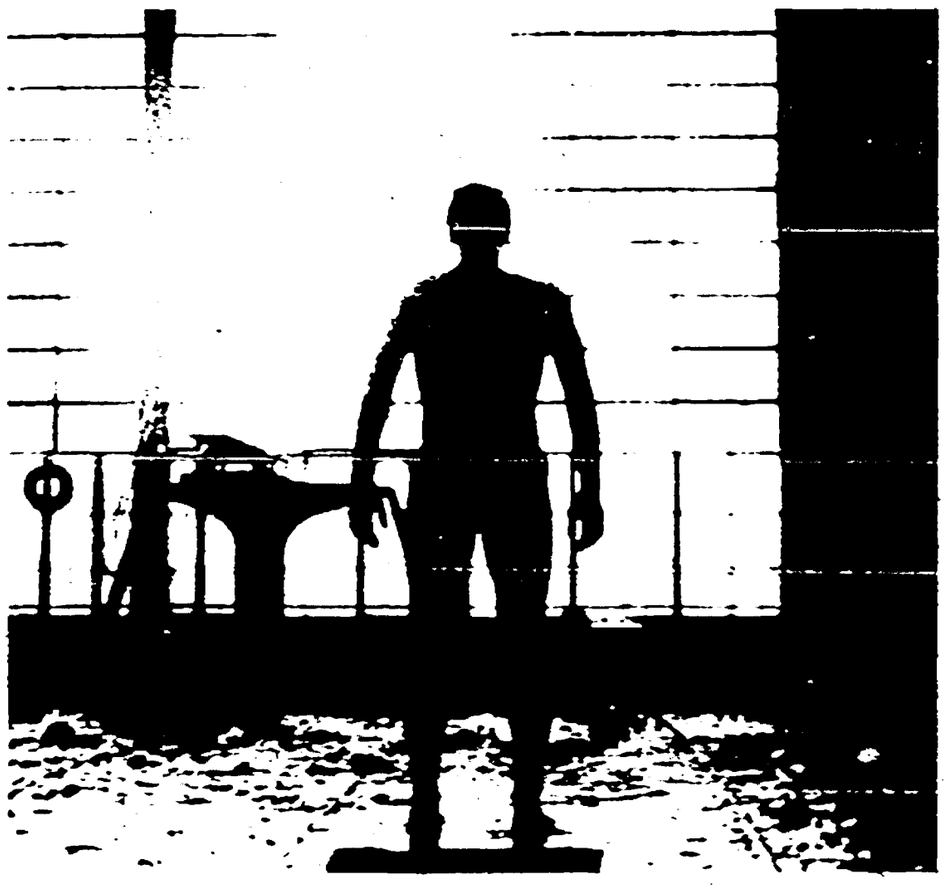
Buzzard stresses the value of the versatility by explaining, "It will prevent opponents from getting to know where every man will be placed, and therefore gives us an opportunity to surprise them.

"In the past," he continued, "the team was small and there wasn't enough to move men around. We used the same format in every meet."

This season the mermen will be lead by captain Peter Schacht. The freestyler is a senior and set three university records in his specialty last season. He set the times in the 500, 1000 and 1,650 meter freestyles.

There are five other fine freestyle swimmers. Senior Dave Crockenberg, who swam the anchor leg on last year's 400 medley relay whom Buzzard describes as a "very fine swimmer who is really going to go this year." Two juniors, Marv Schwartz and Jim Stein, are also expected to perform well. Schwartz held the university record in the 1000 meter freestyle, and is rated right behind Schacht, according to Buzzard. Stein was on the 400 meter freestyle relay team which won the Upper New York State Championship.

Larry Shulman and Walt Braswell, both sophomores, are the other two freestylers. Buzzard is very pleased with the "great improvement which Shulman has shown in the last year." Last year Braswell was on the freshman 400 meter freestyle relay team.



Junior Ross Prossner and sophomore Chip Thiele provide the Orange with great depth in the backstroke. Prossner holds the university record in both 100 and 200 meter backstroke, and is described by Buzzard as "an outstanding sprinter." Thiele held the record in the backstroke and was on the frosh undefeated medley relay team.

The breaststroke, with senior Al Comly and soph Rob Sinnott, is also a strong point for this year's squad. Comly owns the university records for both the 100 and 200 meters. Sinnott swam the 200 for last year's frosh.

Two sophomores, Chuck Lanphear and Jim Klein, will swim the butterfly this season.

Last year Lanphear swam on the frosh 400 medley relay and the 100 meter butterfly.

Tommie Skuce and Jeff Keck will be this season's divers.

"Skuce," Buzzard said, "has great potential, and gets tremendous height on all his dives." Concerning Keck, Buzzard states, "He has shown great improvement and is going to help give us balanced diving this season."

In analyzing the nine meet schedule, the coach feels the strongest opposition will come from three teams. "Bucknell, Colgate and Cornell are all strong teams and we will need strong improvement against them," he said. Each of those teams defeated SU last year.

The frosh swimmers also open their seven meet campaign this Saturday against Buffalo.

Vol. 67, No. 46 Syracuse, New York, Thursday, December 5, 1968 10 Cents

It's back to studying for three weeks until Christmas vacation, which begins Dec. 21, and Daily Orange photographer Clint Clemens is taking advantage of SU's library facilities. He caught this pair (on film) while wandering around the main library maze, searching for a way to get out.

Report of UC merger refusal is questioned

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

Chancellor William P. Tolley yesterday questioned a report that State University Chancellor Samuel B. Gould has rejected a merger proposal between Utica College and SUNY.

A story, which appeared in the Tuesday issue of the Syracuse Herald-Journal, reported that Gould said, "The agreement negotiated by Syracuse and the Utica campus two weeks ago 'is not acceptable in its present form.'"

Boyd E. Golder, former Utica mayor and president of the Utica College Foundation Board described the SU-UC agreement as only a "first offer." The agreement went to Gould in the form of a report on UC's assets and liabilities, but the proposal's content has not been revealed.

Gould was named in August to head a joint UC faculty-foundation committee to negotiate with SUNY.

Chancellor Tolley said in answer to the story, "We have complete confidence in Mr. Boyd Golder. He has been a trustee of the State University and is thoroughly familiar with the operations of the State University. He is also chairman of the Utica College Foundation. Any comment prior to his mid-December meeting with Chancellor Gould is premature."

However, early last month a Utica newspaper reported there was pressure on SU and UC to come up with an agreement. Gould was quoted then as saying, "We've gone through months and months of talks and delayed our own plans. I don't think we can wait much longer."

The State University Board of Trustees apparently opposes any payments for UC and if Utica and SU are unable to resolve their differences, the state system may instead establish a separate upper-division college in the Utica area.

An official close to the negotiations values the Utica College campus at more than $17 million. But, he said, "By the time the State University could build equivalent facilities, at the present rate of inflation, the cost would be between $22 and 25 million.

"In addition, Utica College has a strong faculty, a superb library and a fine student body. The savings in time by the acquisition of Utica College would be as important as the savings in money," he continued.

UC was established in 1946 as part of the outgrowth of the SU extension program and the demand of returning veterans for access to a college education.

It has developed into a liberal arts institution with 1500 full-time and 2200 part-time students, a faculty of 90 and a campus of 174 acres.

In February the SU Board of Trustees authorized the UC Foundation to proceed to take all steps necessary to secure an independent charter for Utica College from the Regents of New York State so that a local Utica College Board of Trustees could make the final decision with regard to the college.

'SU is finest on globe,' but students are not so sure

By CHARLES SHAPIRO

"Syracuse University is just the best place in the world to receive an undergraduate education...and it's the finest university on this globe." This was the "simple proposal" which political science professor Michael O. Sawyer presented to a group of about 50 students in an informal discussion yesterday evening.

Sawyer outlined the basic differences between the "great universities in the world," noting that most were public or state schools while there were also "a few pretty impressive church-related universities," and the Ivy League schools. Then, in reference to greatness, Sawyer proposed "but there are four or five schools in the world," including SU, "which manage it by magic."

"It may not last long, but while it lasts, it's great."

"I defy anyone to come to SU and tell what it's like, or say what the typical student is," said Sawyer, submitting that Syracuse's greatness was the result of the remarkable diversity here, a diversity he places "a very high premium on."

Mentioning that "some kids in this school are not very bright," and yet others "had board scores that could get them into any school in the country," Sawyer also noted that students here "are interested in every conceivable thing."

Observing that SU is populated by students from all 50 states, married students, foreign students, "the library group, the art group, the Bonneville group, the lonely and the ones that can say 'hi' to 2,000 others," Sawyer accurately suggested "the whole gang is here."

Adding to this the "range of talented interests of the faculty," Sawyer proposed, "Anything you want is at this place--you just have to reach out for it.

Stating that he could think of no exceptions to his proposal that "SU is the finest University on this globe," Sawyer asked the group if they could find any.

The arguments most strongly raised were that the classes were too large, the faculty too busy and the administration's policy too "partriarchical, anachronistic, and sinile" in regard to student autonomy.

Sawyer conceded these points, but stated that having a busy faculty was better than the alternative and that he thought that the policies here were not that much different from that of other good schools.

Sawyer, in his conclusion about "crazy, diverse, mixed up, magic Syracuse" said that "If even one-quarter of the things I said are true, then you should ask yourself why you're not happy, why you're not delirious with delight, in case any of you aren't." I think any number of us go around missing the things that are at this place."

Work of late James Fraser

SU to have statue of Lincoln

A statue of Abraham Lincoln will be erected on Friday, Dec. 6 between Maxwell and the Administration Building. It was created by late sculptor James Earle Fraser, who also designed the buffalo nickel.

At 8:30 a.m. the statue which has been cast in bronze will be lowered into place.

Letters, sketches, manuscripts and statues of Fraser's are being collected at Syracuse University and a portion of his autobiography appears in the December issue of American Heritage magazine. The excerpt, " A Dakota Boyhood," is the first publication of any part of the autobiography.

The manuscript was among the Fraser material given to the University last year by his sister-in-law, Mrs. Oliver H. Sawyer. She has also given $50,000 to establish a memorial to Fraser and his wife, Laura Gardin

Martin H. Bush, assistant dean for academic development at SU said Mrs. Sawyer's gift "will help Syracuse University develop the collection, which promises to be one of the finest teaching tools on the campus."

The editors of American Heritage, in a foreword to "A Dakota Boyhood," wrote: "If one were to start making a list of things that unmistakably say 'America'...one would come very soon to the old buffalo nickel."

Fraser, who was born in Winona, Minn. in 1876 moved to the Dakota Territory when he was four. He became a student at the Art Institute of Chicago and went on to the Ecole des Beaux Arts in Paris. Later he was an assistant to Augustus Saint-Gaudens and eventually became one of America's most famous sculptors.

The foreword goes on to say, "But always his early years on the Dakota prairie exerted a powerful influence over his imagination. This influence is reflected in Fraser's most famous works--the statue of an Indian warrior called The End of the Trail, the statue of Theodore Roosevelt as a Rough Rider in front of the American Museum of Natural History in New York City and, of course, the design for the buffalo nickel."

The excerpt from the autobiography, published in the magazine as An American Heritage Original Document, describes the coming of spring to the prairie. In it Fraser says at one point: "I had so often heard people say that the poor Indian would be driven into the Pacific Ocean that one day it sparked in my mind the idea for an equestrian statue--The End of the Trail. The buffalo nickel was also the product of those early years."

The Forestry student disciplinary case

A young man formerly in the School of Forestry is now at his home in Pennsylvania after being, as he claims, pressured into withdrawing.

In many cases the administration of the State School of Forestry or the SU Dean of Men will advise a student to withdraw voluntarily so that "forced expulsion" will not go on his personal record, making it easier for him to be readmitted or admitted to another school at a later date. In short, for his own protection a student may be advised to withdraw.

However, in the case of the School of Forestry a student reported yesterday there was no specific charge against him that could normally result in suspension or expulsion. So the issue is whether he was pressured into or voluntarily chose withdrawing.

The Director of Student Services of the Forestry School, Harrison Payne, said a student is "generally given that alternative of a disciplinary hearing, or else he can go the the University Judicial Board."

The student who recently withdrew claims he was offerred a disciplinary hearing only after Dr. Samual Fetters took an interest in the case and reminded the Forestry School that Constitutional rights might be involved. At that point the Forestry School was processing the cancellation of his board contract, indicating their assumption that the matter was settled.

Although a student generally is given the alternative of a disciplinary hearing, Director Payne also said, "We never needed this sort of thing..."

It is obvious the disciplinary procedure of the Forestry School is up to the discretion of the Director of Student Services or a disciplinary committee to be chosen by him. Such a procedure scarcely insures that a student will be presented with the evidence and charges against him or that he will have a chance to appeal those charges.

What is needed is a set procedure and a standing disciplinary committee so that a student assumed guilty will have a chance to prove his innocence.

Crouse College Beautification

By Marc Balkin

Walking up the hill from St. Mary's to the main campus, I glanced at Crouse College's spires towering toward the sky thinking, "It's really quite a nice building." But something was bothering me. It was in my mind, and I wasn't quite sure what it was.

Later on that afternoon, I realized what bothered me about Crouse. First, the view of the building is blocked when seen from almost any angle except the front by prefabs; Second, that a parking lot seems an absurd thing to surround the building with. The question arises, why not renovate the building to its former granduer?

When I went into Crouse, I found some of the music and art students in the lounge, and asked them what they thought of renovating the building and beautifying its surroundings. Most of them thought that it would be very nice to do that, but with a shrug peculiar to Crouse College, and to music students in particular, they indicated that they thought I was a little crazy for suggesting it.

It is not difficult to see how these shrugging students developed this attitude, one where they really don't care much about anything. If you had to attend classes in a building whose average temperature is about 85 degrees, and practice in rooms constantly maintaining a 90 to 97 degree temperature, you might become apathetic too. Would you like to spend hours every day in a building whose walls are painted a drab purple and dark blue, and whose entire atmosphere is nothing short of dreary?

It might not be too bad an idea to try to brighten up the place. This can be done simply by repainting the dull walls, with lighter, brighter colors. Next, portions of the original woodwork which have been covered up with paint should be restored to their original varnished condition. A great deal of the flooring in the building was also beautiful varnished wood, but someone thought that keeping this wood clean and polished was too hard a job, and so decided that keeping tiles clean was easier. Why can't these tiles be taken up, the wood restored, and then partially covered with carpets which can be easily cleaned? The dull and uninteresting "art treasures" (facsimilies, of course), which are supposed to decorate the building should be replaced with brighter, more interesting ones. Much of the dismal atmosphere could also be removed with the addition of better lighting.

Most of the comments about the floors and walls can be applied with equal weight to the classrooms. But if anything should be mentioned, it should be the problem of the practice rooms. These little cubicles are perhaps the worst places imaginable to practice in. They are eminently unsuitable for the purpose. The heat is a large problem, since one can lose five to ten pounds in perspiration during each practice session. Opening a window (if you are lucky enough to find a room that has a window) usually helps a little, but after several minutes the room is too cold for practicing! The total effect is very discouraging, for extreme heat during physical and mental activity is not conducive to achievement.

Finally, floodlights should be discreetly placed to illuminate Crouse at night, transforming its appearance from a dark, foreboding castle to a building of lofty beauty. Large buildings are more beautiful without all kinds of clutter at their bases.

If enough people become dissatisfied, maybe the Administration will listen. Sitting around and complaining and not trying to do something will not improve Crouse; action might.

Abortions I

To the Editor:

In reference to your November 22, articles on abortions, let me add that the laws in the state of Maryland have been changed so that therapeutic abortions are legal if a physician or psychiatrist states that a continuation of pregnancy would [illegible]use the physical or mental health of the patient to become worse. This does not mean that the girl has to claim she will commit suicide or be insane.

Having personally experienced the problems of getting my girlfriend an abortion, I know that if we did not reside in Maryland we would have most certainly found someone to do an illegal operation even though the risks to her health would be much greater. In any event, having a legal abortion performed greatly reduced the emotional problems resulting from guilt.

It is, therefore, my firm belief that all states should adopt more liberal abortion laws, as Maryland has.

A Student

Abortions II

To the Editor:

In a DO article on the recall of abortion experiences last week (Friday, November 22nd), several SU coeds expressed: (a) ignorance of the existence of SU counseling facilities, (b) fear of expulsion from school, and (c) fear of parental anger.

As a former counselor, I am dismayed that our students are either unaware or unresponsive to the sources offered by the Psychological Services and Research Center and the staff of the Dean of Men and the Dean of Women. Are these services unknown to our students or do they refuse to utilize them? To what extent are these services used? Should Syracuse University have a service facility, such as a Counseling Center, which can offer personal, vocational and educational counseling to a substantial number of students? It would appear that SU is not now meeting an essential student need for professional counseling. It is my hope that both the student need for counseling services and the faculty-administration planned action to meet these needs will be further publicized.

Mentors

To the Editor:

In your article "International Mentors" (Nov. 22, 1968) you wrote that I said: "American students take education for granted, and thus do not work as hard as Congolese youth" until that point you are right: that's what I said. But you go ahead and write: "or the French university students" which statement I cannot make . . . because I think American students are actually working harder than the French students namely because of the great deal of papers, tests, quizzes . . . .

This larger freedom given to the French students in the organization of their work certainly allow lazy students 'to take it easy' but it is also the opportunity for the good students to be engaged in deeper personal researches.

Stolkin Hall

Physics Building lost it's name and $1.2 million donation

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

It was almost called Ralph Stolkin Hall. But even before Stolkin, a former Chicago industrialist, filed for bankruptcy in July, SU knew it was experiencing another case of financial frustration.

Stolkin, in October 1962, pledged $1.2 million to the University, when his daughter was a student here, and reaffirmed the pledge in the fall of 1963 and again in the fall in 1967.

The money was to go toward the $3.3 million Physics Building, which was completed in June 1967. According to Chancellor William P. Tolley, however, Stolkin never paid a penny to the school.

Instead, the university had to dip into the Syracuse Plan's unrestricted funds for the money. "We didn't have to go into debt or borrow," said Newell W. Rossman, vice president for development, yesterday in an interview. "The money was available in the funds of the Syracuse Plan. But it was money we could have used for something else, like the new library."

The University is now attempting to get the pledged money through the Federal District Court which is hearing Stolkin's bankruptcy suit. When he filed, the former industrialist listed his assets at $26.3 million and his liabilities at $26 million, and asked permission of the court to reorganize his financial affairs.

The University then filed a $1.2 million claim in the same court, where Referee Elmer P. Schaefer is hearing the bankruptcy suit.

Construction on the building began before Stolkin's financial plight was known. "When the building was approved, we went ahead," said James LaTorre, assistant to the vice president of administration and research, yesterday.

In a sworn affadavit, Tolly told the court on Nov. 12 that Stolkin made the pledge in October 1962, and that the university was relying on this money for the bulk of the private funds that, with a National Science Foundation grant, would finance the building.

This grant, however, was contingent on the sum being matched by private contributions, and when Stolkin's pledge failed to materialize (and if the university's court claim fails), the University had to draw on its unrestricted fund in order to get even this.

According to a Chicago Tribune article last month, the chancellor attached to the affadavit six letters which he wrote to Stolkin about the pledge, none of which Stolkin ever acknowledged. Tolley also said Stolkin never gave a written pledge to the university, although he was asked to do so.

Stolkin had planned to pay the gift in $100,000 annual pledges, over a 12-year period, the chancellor said.

Officials apparently still believe the university's chances of finally getting the money is good. "We're very hopeful," Rossman said, "that things will work out."

The Physics Building has been standing for more than one-and-a-half years, but its finances have been a cause of concern for the administration. A $1.2 million pledge by a former Chicago industrialist failed to materialize.

Senate appoints Barton Elections Commissioner

By COLETTE STALLINGS

Lacking other nominees, the Student Senate last night accepted Richard Barton as Elections Commissioner. Speaking of Barton, who was not present, Speaker Ed Seldman said, "He's chairman of the Student Services Committee, has never been in a political party, and is now at Boston Theological Seminary looking into graduate school. He's holy and ...."

Having accepted Barton as commissioner, the senate nominated Andrew Winning, Joanne Fox, John Diamond and Fred Tuccillo for membership in the committee.

Giving his qualifications for the position, John Diamond, speaker pro tempore of senate, noted that he was chairman of the first elections commission. He said that at that time, "I called the whole thing a farce, which I still believe it is, but sometimes you have to put up with a farce. I know the parties and how they run."

Winning was elected on the fifth ballot of the first series.

Commenting on Fred Tuccillo, senator Gerry Horn said,"He's almost running a vendetta against the political parties. His opinions just might be a bit colored because of his work on this (SCOPE)."

Diamond was elected on the next ballot.

The elections commission creates all rules concerning undergraduate government elections and sees that elections are handled according to these rules.

According to Gerry Horn, chairman of Government Structures Subcommittee on Clubs and Student Organizations, only 19 of 160 student organizations have submitted constitutions to the committee. "We are the overseers of every club and every organization at Syracuse," said Horn. An organization that has not submitted a Constitution will be denied the use of University facilities by the registrar."

A resolution that all constitutions now on file be automatically resubmitted was passed despite Horn's appeal that organizations be required to call and ask that their constitution be resubmitted.

Working on a project for the construction of a central bookstore, Student Services Committee reported that Vice-President and Treasurer Francis A. Wingate is in favor of such a project. According to a committee member, "We just need money and space."

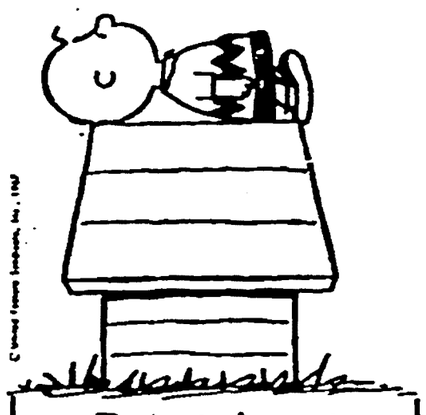
PAPER TIGERS NEED NOT APPLY.

Thanks, but they're just not our type. Young engineers who join us are expected to move in on some rather formidable programs... with alacrity and lots of gusto. And a willingness to assume early responsibilities on demanding assignments is an attribute which we welcome warmly. It's the kind of engineering aggressiveness that has brought Sikorsky Aircraft to dominant stature in a new world of advanced VTOL aircraft systems.

If our criteria parallel your outlook, you'll find an excellent career environment with us. You would enjoy working (with a select group) on exciting, full-spectrum systems development. And you can watch your talent and imagination assume reality in such diverse forms as Heavy Lift Skycranes—Tilt Rotor Transports—High-Speed VTOL Commercial Transports—and much more for tomorrow.



Does this responsibility stir your imagination? Then you probably should be with us. There's ample opportunity for innovation in: aerodynamics • human factors engineering • automatic controls • structures engineering • weight prediction • systems analysis • operations research • reliability/maintainability engineering • autonavigation systems • computer technology • manufacturing engineering • information systems • marketing ... and more.

And your career advancement can be materially assisted through our corporation financed Graduate Study Program available at many outstanding schools within our area.

Consult your College Placement Office for campus interview dates, or for further information, write to Mr. Leo J. Shalvoy, Professional and Technical Employment

Aims to inform

SU effort to help Biafrans now organized

By ELLEN BILOFSKY

Syracuse University efforts to aid Biafrans are now organized. The Syracuse Biafran Relief Committee, a standing committee of the URC, according to chairman Pat Berry, has two main aims: to inform people about the situation in Biafra and to collect money to aid the Biafrans.

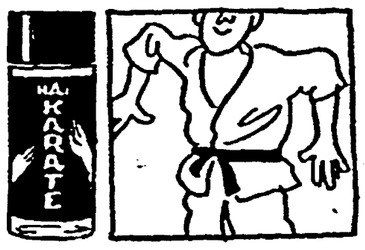
"The thing to stress is the very great need and terrible suffering that's going on. We just want people to be aware of it," Miss Berry said. She mentioned carbohydrate starvation and other diseases which are killing the Biafrans. Although there is starvation in the Northern part of Nigeria as well, the Committee is concentrating on Biafra where they believe there is greater need.

Miss Berry emphasized that the Relief Committee is non-partisan and is "...interested in helping the people who are suffering needlessly," rather than in the political aspects of the situation.

In keeping with its aims, the group has scheduled a teach-in for Monday, Dec. 16 at 7 p.m. in Hendrick's Chapel. The feature speaker will be The Rev. Peter Hughes, a member of the Holy Ghost Missionaries. The Irish missionary-priest, who spent five years working in Biafra, has just returned to this country to collect funds. The money will be used to send doctors and to buy seedlings.

A problem has been caused by air-lifting non-native food. The Biafrans are not accustomed to it, thus aggravating the situation. Therefore, the money collected will be sent to a priest at a nearby relief station, the island Sao Tome, and the food will be pruchased there.

The Biafran Relief Committee hopes to have Mr. Rev. Hughes speak on radio and T.V. and at various places in Syracuse. He will conduct a mass at St. Andrews in the city.



Because little has been done about Biafra in the Syracuse area, the Biafran Relief Committee's aim of awareness is vital to the organization's success. "We have a lot of informing to do," Miss Berry said.

Spirited cheerleaders

SU's spirited freshman cheerleaders paid their own way to the freshman basketball opener at Cornell last night. This marked the first time a freshman squad has cheered at an away game during recent years.

The highly-psyched group will also provide its own bus fare for a trip to Penn State this Saturday, where they will join varsity cheerleaders to support SU's eleven.

Members of the frosh squad were selected earlier this term after auditions before varsity cheerleaders.

Under the leadership of Captains Steve Lebow and Pam Pindell, the squad has become a close knit group of ten freshmen. Other members of the squad include: Candy Boutin, Jeanne Kovalac, Ann Schlutter, Toni Zajick, Chris Baird, Pieter Tapscott, Chris Glynn, and Gary Jacob.

Hicks appoints assistants to share SG exec role

To give himself more time to "communicate with the student body," Chuck Hicks, Student Government president, has appointed three executive assistants to share his work load. They will have the power to make decisions in Hicks' name.

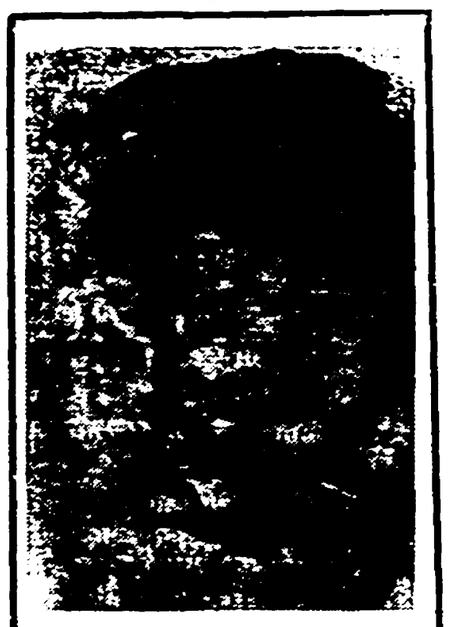
Working for Hicks to place more student representatives on faculty committees within various academic departments will be junior Geff Ries. Hicks said he has "worked with Ries since his freshman year and knows he is capable." Ries can be contacted at Delta Upsilon fraternity.

Gordon Morrell will be a liaison to SG's Executive Council and will also work with Claine Capizzi on a "free university" program proposed for next semester. The "free university" would be a series of non-credit night courses taught in fields of student interest not now included in SU curricula.

Morrell, a sophomore living in St. Mary's, was chosen by Hicks for his performance as Watson Dorm president last year.

Freshman Mark Snyder, also living in St. Marys, will represent Hicks in his seat in Student Senate. As Hicks' liaison to Senate, he will channel informaton both to Hicks and the Senate. Hicks characterized Snyder as having "ideas very much like mine.. He's willing to question things."

Hicks said that by delegating this power, he will have more time to "go around to dorm council meetings and committee meetings to what we're doing in Student Government.



"SG has to branch out and get more people involved. We already have more people working this year than in any other."

SUSKI meets

SUSKI will have a short meeting tonight at 7:30 p.m. in 117 Lyman. Payments for the Song Mountain lesson package and the Snow Ridge trip will be collected.

All members and those interested in joining the club who want to participate may make payments at the meeting. The fee for the lessons is $20 and $6 for bus transportation.

The day trip to Snow Ridge is Dec. 14. The fee of $9.50 includes transportation and lift ticket and can be paid at tonight's meeting.

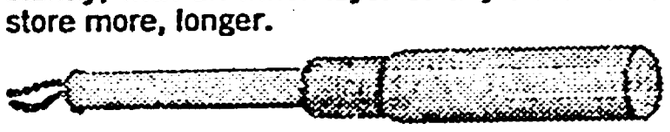
$10,000 budget for Senior Ball to provide big entertainment

A $10,000 budget for the Senior Ball to be held on June 6, the night before Commencement Exercises, has been approved by the University Budget Committee. The ball, to be held at the Three Rivers Inn, will be open to seniors and their families.

For $5 apiece, guests will hear singer Lou Rawls and comedian David Frye and be provided with dance music throughout the evening. Dinner and drinks will be optional and paid for individually.



Expenses for the ball will include a $7,000 fee for Rawls and $2000 for Frye. Publicity costs and agent's fees complete the budget.

Senior class president Barry Randell is hoping to get a capacity crowd of 1300 for the ball. He said the ball will be in lieu of a senior weekend.

"We haven't had a ball in several years. I hope this year it will be successful because it will be only two days after exams instead of the usual week. This year we also have name talent, the only way to make this affair successful and enjouable to both students and their parents."

Faster absorbency. Longer protection. That's the extra security you get with new Meds, the only tampon with this double-protection design: an outer layer of larger fibers that absorb instantly, with an inner layer of tiny fibers that store more, longer.

Comes in the first gentle, flexible plastic applicator.

Orange Cagers lose to Cornell, 93-81

IN OR OUT??? Two casualties of SU's 23-6 loss to West Virginia are doubtful performers for Saturday's big game at Penn State. On the left, defensive end Lou Gubitosa (91) leaps up to deflect a pass, as middle guard Jerry Beach (68) charges in. Gubitosa, also pictured at the right, has less chance of recovering in time from his injured leg than senior Beach does from his hip ailment. (Photos by Biggar)

By DOUG GARR

ITHACA, N.Y.—Cornell's basketball team opened up a 29 point lead in the second half and easily defeated the Orangemen, 93-81. The Big Red were trailing only after the opening tip-off and fell behind 12-7. After that, it was all Cornell as 6'3" Hank South scored 34 points to pace the winners.

Syracuse, which seemed to have problems all evening, did have two bright moments, however. With 1:42 remaining in the first half they cut Cornell's lead to six points and went into the locker room with only a nine point deficit, 46-37.

The Orangemen also staged a late rally with 6:04 remaining in the game. Behind 86-57 they scored 18 straight points, but the game was already out of reach.

The SU cagers were forced to shoot from the outside during most of the game and just didn't hit. The Big Red controlled both of the boards and contained sophomore center Bill Smith with little trouble.

Although Bill Smith was frequently double-teamed he did manage to score 20 points to tie for the SU scoring high with Billy Case.

Aside from the Orangemen's poor outside shooting they also had a very poor free throw percentage. They made only seven of 20 foul shots for an extremely low 35 percent.

The Orangemen managed to lose the ball to the Big Red 15 times on turnovers, but the Cornell squad gave it back 14 times also.

The Cornell cagers played an excellent rebounding game with Bill Schwarzkopf, Hank South and Walt Esdaile leading the game with over 10 rebounds each.

the scoring for the Orange was transfer student Gerry McFadden with 16 points. Cornermen John Suder and Bob Kouwe had 12 and 10 points respectively.

Following the game high total of 34 by Hank South was Bill Schwarzkopf with 18 points. Walt Esdaile scored 16 and Greg Otto chipped in with 14.

The Syracuse squad used a man-to-man defense and later switched to a 1-3-1 zone to try and contain the hard driving Big Red. The Cornell cagers managed to penetrate the SU defense and also controlled the offensive rebounds so they managed to get two and three efforts on every play.

It was a disappointing debut for rookie Coach Roy Danforth and the locker room after the game was a picture of dejection. It seems that things can hardly get worse after an 11-14 season, but Coach Danforth knows that he has a long rebuilding season ahead. This is even tougher to face when almost the whole first half of the season is on the road.

After watching the Big Red cagers pile up an insurmountable lead, the Barton Hall crowd watched the home team commit a technical violation by having six men on the court. This error drew only cynical laughs from the Ivy rooters as the Orange fans sat dejectedly.

The SU cagers travel to Niagara Falls next Saturday night to meet Calvin Murphy and the Purple Eagles. Last year the exciting Murphy set a Manley Field House scoring record as the Eagles easily beat Syracuse. The Orange, however, evened things up at Niagara by edging them 50-49 in overtime.

Frosh win opener, 88-81

By ADAM DAWSON

ITHACA, N.Y.—The SU frosh basketball team survived a late Cornell rally to win their season's opener, 88-81. Coach Bill Vesp's Tangerines featured a well rounded attack that saw all five starters hit for double figures. Guard Greg Kohls with 23 points and Gil Guerrero with 20 were the scoring leaders for SU.

Before the game it looked as though the tremendous height advantage of the Cornell team would dominate the smaller Tangerines. However, as Coach Veso said, "The boys outhustled a much taller Cornell team to make up for the disadvantage."

The Big Red frosh had two starters taller than SU's tallest player, 6 ft. 4 in. Ken Gray.

For the first ten minutes of the game, the Tangerines made a few mental errors and Cornell captured an early lead. However, at the ten minute mark of the first half the Tangerines began to jell and opened up a 44-38 half-time lead, a lead that they never relinquished.

Early foul trouble for the Big Red's two tallest players, Hart and Gregory, hurt the team.

The second half started with the bigger Cornell team controlling the boards. This advantage gave them two and three shots on every play. Despite this advantage Paul Pitrowski and Ken Gray managed to grab countless key rebounds and with 11 minutes left, the Tangerines led 63-52.

Cornell's big gun and the game's leading scorer, Rick Amato seemed unstoppable, but he fouled out with 30 points.

With 6:05 left, and Cornell behind by nine points, they made a last ditch effort. However, key baskets by Guerrero, Gray and Kohls kept the Tangerines' lead respectable.

Gray finished the game with eleven points, while Pitrowski netted 18. Gary Rainbow hit for 13 and Jim Ryan had three.

"The Tangerines played an excellent game with a tremendous amount of hustle which made up for their lack of height. In the games to come, you'll see a well-disciplined, fast, hustling ball club," said victorious rookie Coach Vesp.

Students to pay for seats

Field House plan revised

Guaranteed seating for students attending Orange home basketball games this winter is assured under a new plan announced by Athletic Director Jim Decker.

Under the plan, all students (any student eligible for football tickets is eligible for basketball) may purchase a book of tickets for the 10 home games to be played in Manley Field House. The charge is $2.00, which covers the cost of printing and distribution.

The number of seats reserved for students will correspond to the number of books of tickets sold. Thus, if 4,000 books are sold, 4,000 seats will be set aside for student seating for all games.

"The plan will make it possible for us not only to insure the students of seats, but also will allow us to know just how many general admission tickets can be placed on sale for public consumption," said Decker.

With no way of gauging the number of students who planned to attend games, several early season games last winter resulted in overflow crowds. More than 7,300 jammed into the 6,200 field house for the opener against George Washington last December. In an attempt to provide students with seats, general admission sale to the public was stopped.

Late in the season, however, poor student turnouts resulted in many empty seats that could have been sold.

Books of tickets will go on sale in the ticket office in the men's gym on Monday. The ticket office will be open from 11 a.m. until 5:30 p.m. Monday through Friday and on Dec. 16-18. Students must have their ID card to purchase the books. After the 18th, books will remain on sale at the ticket office in Manley Field House.

Individual game ticket prices are $3.00, $2.00 and $1.50 a rise from last year.

Decker also revealed a slightly new seating arrangement for Manley. The new layout will result in a rise in capacity of almost 2,000, and will also bring the fans slightly closer to the action.

The running track that circled the court in past years will now go around the main section of general admission bleachers, on the south side of the floor. These seats, which remain approximately the same in number, will be a few feet nearer to courtside than in the past.

The bulk of the new seating will be added in the end zones. These seats prove popular with the students because of their proximity to the players. They will now extend much further back.

A few seats have also been added at the back of the reserved sections on the north side, pushing the front row of those seats closer to the court as well.

The students' ticket book will entitle them to any seat in the general admission area, thus accomodating both those who like the end zone seats and those who prefer the sidelines.

But SG president Chuck Hicks claimed last night that the Administration has violated an agreement not to change ticket arrangements without first consulting with SG. This is the first he has heard of the new policy, he said.

"I think the University is using the students," he said. "I urge every student not to buy a ticket until we get some communication and straighten this matter out. At this point, I see no further use for me even to be on the Athletic Board.

'After Chicago'

Objectivity essential for modern press coverage

By ELLEN NIMMONS

Diverse responses and reflections were voiced this week by faculty representing the mass media following the release of the foreword and summary of a report on violent demonstrations at the August Democratic convention in Chicago.

The report had been compiled by a 90-man task force under a contract with the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention and Treatment of Violence, and included sections concerning coverage and treatment of news media during the convention.

The question as to how media can provide responsible coverage of mass demonstrations and riot conditions was not faced for the first time in Chicago; events there, did, however, focus new attention as to the duties and rights of a responsible press.

The press is entering an era which "Newsweek" suggested may be tagged "After Chicago"; for, as Newsday publisher Bill Moyers pointed out in a recent article in "The New Leader," "at Chicago our journalists discovered with brutal clarity something they have been trying to cop out on for years–that far from being the detached, cynical, objective reporters of journalistic legend, they belong on the same marquee with all the other players in the modern human drama."

Members of the press, said Moyers, have traditionally thought of themselves as akin to Don Quixote's ideal historian: "exact, truthful, and absolutely unprejudiced, so that neither interest nor fear, dislike nor affection, should make them turn from the path of truth."

But there they were—"Dan Rather being felled by a karate chop, Walter Cronkite dropping his cool to denounce 'thugs' and the news team of one magazine even wearing protective helmets."

"Telling it like it is" was the consensus at SU's School of Journalism concerning the news media's responsibility on coverage. Despite unanimity concerning this objective, however, responses on how this was attainable, and reasons for its necessity, were varied.

Cathy Covert, associate professor of journalism, termed the newsman's primary responsibility "to his profession." His responsibility, she said, was threefold: "to his editor, his public, and to history." She emphasized that "the necessity to know (for the public) is essential," and stressed the importance to history, of the reporter's position.

"No one else," she said, "will ever be in the same position as the reporter. He has a responsibility to posterity."

Accuracy, lack of bias, and the necessity not to incite the circumstances on which he is reporting are termed essential responsibilities by Andre Fontaine, associate professor of journalism.

"The press functions as a watchdog on government, as well as a bridge between the people and government," Fontaine said. He stressed the interrelationship of the press and government and the responsibility of the press to act in both adversarial and explanatory roles.

The media's function as a public servant is central to its responsibility. Thomas A. Richards, assistant professor of

Drugs

A drug conference is being planned at SU for this spring in order to educate students on the benefits and dangers of drug use. One of the dangers is the bust which caught up with about 150 students during the week before Thanksgiving. The conference hopes to encourage a dialogue on drug use.

Handling of drug problem needs change, says NSA

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

One hundred fifty students were busted during drug raids on campuses across the nation during the week before Thanksgiving.

That is one of the facts which was presented at the drug conference sponsored by the National Student Association (NSA) last week. Several Syracuse University students attended, including Peter Friedman, who is now working to set up a conference at SU next spring.

The conference, which was paid for by the National Institute of Health, revolved around what NSA called the "problem" of drug use by students.

Friedman feels it is "acutely necessary for all members of the student body to attend the conference in the spring. Everyone should know about drugs even if he doesn't use them."

In line with the conference Friedman is working with a committee which hopes to be able to set up legal and medical offices along with an educational program on drugs to help people understand the facts about drugs and their use. The medical office would be similar to a student mental health center which would assist those who are in trouble with drugs.

"The drug problem should be handled not with a punitive but with an educated point of view,"said Friedman.

NSA feels the same way. Part of its policy on drugs is "that the colleges and universities should encourage open and honest dialogue on the facts, implications and possible dangers and benefits of drug use."

According to NSA this should be done in four ways: establishing methods for the dissemination of information on drugs and their use through the university health service; permitting free advocacy of changes in drug laws by students and faculty; educating without waiting for special cases to arise; and including information concerning drugs in the classroom curriculum.

Friedman said the SU branch of NSA would probably form a policy on drugs similar to that of the national organization. The national policy has several parts including academic jeopardy.

NSA believes the universities should refrain from jeopardizing the status of any member of the academic community on the basis of exposure or conviction of drug usuage.

The conference which Friedman is setting up will resemble the state-wide one. Topics generally discussed are the medical, legal, historical and sociological aspects of drug usuage upon the individual and the society.

University-city relationship discussed by Mayor Walsh

By BOB STRUGATZ

William Walsh, mayor of the city of Syracuse, in a recent interview with Paul Stavis, head of WAER's Debate Forum, discussed the relationship between the city and Syracuse University.

When asked how he would characterize the relationship, Mayor Walsh stated that there is a good "town and gown" relationship and that the city and the school cooperate on many matters.

Offering some examples of this cooperation, Walsh stated that it is a tradition for the mayor of Syracuse to be a member of the Board of Trustees of the University. Also, approximately a half dozen petitions have been submitted by the city for Federal aid in utilizing the resourses of the University Research Cooperation, and in general, the city is working toward development and improvement of the entire University Hill area.

However, the mayor stressed one point over which the city and the University disagree, and that is the issue of tax exemptions. He explained that the University has already been granted thirty or forty million dollars worth of tax exemption, but is disputing the city over another half-million or so. Walsh went on to say that about 33% of the city of Syracuse is tax exempt, and the only other financial source the city has is from state and federal aid. However, the mayor implied that the amount of money now in dispute is so nominal in comparison to the amount already exempted that the issue should be easily settled.

When approached on the issue of how the city will handle campus disturbances, such as last year's water riots and the DOW Chemical demonstration this year, the mayor stated that the city is prepared to offer the University any police, fire, or other municipal forces that are necessary, if the university requests them.

The mayor also discussed in his interview the recent demonstrations at Central Tech High School in downtown Syracuse. There have been racial disturbances there, and several students have been knifed and beaten on school property. The primary problem was that the mayor had been taking some remedial steps which the students were not aware of and consequently they blamed the government for being apathetic toward the situation. The mayor met with several of the students from the school and explained that action had been taken, a form of this being corridor guards in the school. The mayor hopes that he will not have to resort to police guards, as those which exist in some Rochester schools.

The entire interview with Mayor Walsh will be broadcast over WAER on December 16th.

Parking area set

By the end of Christmas vacation there will be parking on College Place, according to Jeffrey Portnoy, vice president of Student Government (SG). The arrangement has been agreed upon by the Syracuse Transportation Commission and Syracuse University officials.

The parking is a direct result of a mayor's meeting which was held with SG officials and Joe Rice, transportation commissioner.

One hour parking will be allowed along the west side of College Place, except for the bus zones. This is to allow people to go to the library and "the reason for only an hour is to assure a turnover," said Portnoy. Eventually meters will be installed but signs will be placed along the street at the beginning.

Several meetings have been held with city officials, according to Portnoy. "We had hoped from the beginning that a dialogue between city officials and students would be opened up," he said.

Boycott basketball ticket fee

Yes. It's true. The Athletic Director, Jim Decker, and his cohort, Andy Geiger, are putting you on.

Two dollars for basketball tickets? To guarantee seats for students? We don't believe it either.

Not only is it chintzy on its face but the whole thing was brought about underhandedly. Basketball seating falls within the jurisdiction of the Athletic Board on which sit two Student Government representatives. They would have opposed charging students with all the vigor at their command.

At least one Student Government representative has been at each Athletic Board meeting this year. Charging students for basketball seats was never brought up. Chuck Hicks and Jim Striker learned about the new "service" over WAER and in the DO.

This pattern was established last year when the Athletic Department initiated a parking charge without bringing it before the Athletic Board. Students had no say in the matter. It was merely instituted and everyone conformed to it.

Let's consider the effects of the new plan. The initial $2 fee will discourage students from going to basketball games, especially those who don't go to every game. Those who attend just two or three games, if they don't purchase a ticket book, will pay more at the gate since individual seats cost $1.50, $2 and $3.

The obvious result, whether intended by the Athletic Director or not, will be a reduction in the number of students attending basketball games. It will therefore increase the number of general admission tickets.

Even if it did cost $8,000 to print and distribute 4,000 ticket books, the Athletic Department would make money off the additional general admission seats. (If it did cost $8,000 to print and distribute 4,000 ticket books, the cost would have made the plan unfeasible.)

We urge students to boycott the $2 ticket fee until the greatest sneak thieves since Maury Wills answer some questions.

Becoming informed

Frosh interview

By Bob Tembeckjian

During Orientation Week, Syracuse University instituted an experimental program in which a handful of freshmen girls were interviewed by members of the administration. The girls were asked questions which would indicate their knowledge of campus activities, and they were informed of several university regulations which had to be honored in the name of tradition. The following is an excerpt from one such interview.

Administrator: Well, come in. How do you do?

Freshman Girl: Fine, thank you. I'm really happy to be here. I know I'll just love...

Adm: Now there will be none of that in this school, young lady.

Frosh: What? I was only about to...

Adm: Yes, I know all about people like you. You must be from New York. Life will be different here. You can bet on that. For one thing, there won't be any permissiveness here as there is in New York! You must be in at 12:00 each weeknight and 2:00 on weekends. We don't tolerate loose living on this campus! Is that understood?

Frosh: I thought this was an interview, not the third degree.

Adm: Don't get indignant with me, young lady! We also do not tolerate indignance from insignificant freshman girls Who do you think you are?

Frosh: Who do I have to be to say something?

Adm: I'll ignore that ridiculous remark. Now, where was I?

Frosh: Curfews. May I ask why that rule is enforced? Is 12:00 the bewitching hour when all men turn into werewolves and all girls turn into passion-crazed lust-seekers?

Adm: I won't listen to talk like that! Just don't get smart with me. We're only trying to protect you. We're working in your best interests. First comes a date, then a kiss; then it's too late! But if you're in at 12:00, nothing will happen.

Frosh: Oh, I get it. Plum loco parentis. What can happen after 12:00 that can't happen before?

Adm: Don't get logical with me. There's no room for that at college. I can see we're going to have trouble with you.

Frosh: Well, I guess if I have to be in by 12:00, at least my date and I can sit in the lounge and talk.

Adm: Didn't you read the catalog? No men are allowed in women's lounges after curfews. Why did you come to this school, anyway?

Frosh: I read the catalog.

Adm: Listen, Miss, if I have to warn you again about impertinence, I'm going to have your admission revoked. Is that clear?

Frosh: Why? All I want is a little latitude. Don't the parents have enough confidence in the upbringing they've given their kids to allow them to come in when they choose? Don't they trust the kind of job they've done? I just don't understand. Or is it that the alumni don't want SU to lose its respectability by displaying some confidence in the people they've admitted?

Adm: The parents and alumni have nothing to do with this. I think I'm going to refer you to another advisor. I can't handle you anymore. Whatever happened to the nice,polite, unquestionning girls we used to admit?

Frosh: They're probably the ones who are now sending their kids here while demanding the strict curfews they themselves never enforced because they wanted to retain the "love" of their kids.

Adm: What are you driving at?

Frosh: I thought college was a release for students. After speaking with you I'm beginning to think it's an escape for parenis.

Adm: I've had it with you. "Release," "escape," - what do you think this is, a prison? Don't think everyone has your attitude. There are some who are perfectly willing to sign in and out all day long so we know exactly where they are at all times. Err, in case an emergency arises. You know.

Frosh: Oh, I see. Of course, freshman boys aren't likely to have emergencies, so they don't have to sign in and out. I get it! Well, I'm hungry. I think I'll go to the dining hall and eat.

Adm: You can't. It's 2:00 now and the hall won't be open until 4:30.

Frosh: You mean I have to be told when I can eat, too? Well, I guess I'll go over to the Student Union building and relax.

Adm: Frosh, you've got a lot to learn.

Lincoln statue

The placing of the Abraham Lincoln statue next week on the lawn adjoining Maxwell and the Administration building marks a big symbolic step. Closing the gap between the numerous progressives and patrons of the New Left that inhabit Maxwell and many of the conservative stalwarts that man administrative posts to the right will be the great mediator Lincoln. A more appropriate place to put Mr. Lincoln could hardly be found.

Perhaps the symbol of Lincoln, who above all sought the middle ground between violent and opposing forces will serve to inspire those who stand apart on other issues, in another age. The constant reminder of a man who said so little and meant so much, among men who now say so much and mean so little may have an influence beyond our power to comprehend. Welcome to Syracuse Mr. Lincoln.

Newhouse repairs

Another first in maintenance technology seems to have been scored by workmen here. In response to a leak in the Newhouse roof, workmen have passed up the obvious alternative of repairing the leak and installed a drip pan and pipe to carry off the leaking water.

In an effort to draw due attention to their innovation, they managed to drop a large piece of debris on the head of one photo journalism student. As his friends carted him off to be X-rayed, they did indeed notice the new repairs. Congratulations, boys.

Stop the grapes

In a show of support for the California grape strike, several students and faculty have urged Food Service director Ursala Pettingail to stop purchasing California grapes. After three weeks, the only comment to come forth has been "Students don't like grapes, we don't buy very many of them." Further, for some unknown reason, the decision on whether or not to purchase California grapes has been left with Dean Kenneth Bartlett, Vice President for Public Affairs. We would urge food service patrons to stop eating grapes altogether, and make Dr. Bartlett's choice an easy one.

Crazy, mixed-up, magic Syracuse,
Turned-on in academic robe.

Gee-whiz!
Sure, our classes are too large.
Sure, our faculty's too busy.
Sure, our administration's senile.
But there's one guy who keeps us dizzy;
Turns us on; makes us delirious;
Concedes our criticisms, wryly-serious.

And when we feel we're over-fathered,
Tells us, "It's the same at Harvard."
When tracking down instructors makes us pale,
Informs us that, "It's just like Yale."
When we begin to perceive through glasses darkly,
He tells us, "Be thankful you're not at Berkeley."

So who is it who turns us on?
Who makes us delirious with delight?
And who is friend of Church and State?
Who is friend of left and right?
And who is friend of friend and foe?
Who is friend of pro- and anti-?
Who is pied-piper of us all?
And how does he manage to keep his sanity?

Who is this Mr. Syracuse,

Visiting hours

To the Editor:

I find the administration position on visiting hours somewhat absurd. The idea of an experiment with only a few of the living centers, the percentage does not matter, is a terrifying piece of reasoning. Two possible causes occur for this nonsensical situation.

1. The administration may assume that 25% of the student population will give an accurate picture of the entire population within the dormitory system. This seems to follow from a consistent position; specifically, all students may be impersonally lumped into a few stereotypes, or perhaps only one. This hardly seems a suitable way to deal with people; the percentage is irrelevant with this kind of an attitude.

2. As Cindy Bailey indicated in Tuesday's edition, great attention was paid to the presentation of each dorm. This would indicate a more acceptable attitude respecting the individuality of each dorm and its constituent members. Hindered by the restriction to 25% of the student population, this recognition of individuality must be ignored in a move inconsistent with principle. All dorms, as circumstantially distinct situations, deserve to be tested on their own performance, not that of their fellow students. In forcing this treatment of a test of responsibility, the administration is cheating; I can only wonder how this same administration would regard a student who decided to have a friend take some other kind of test for him. The inherent non-sequitur of the double standard is obvious. Are we to view the administration with contempt for this brand of cheating?

Somewhere in this absurd jungle of administrative reasoning, a gross inequity is being perpetrated on the population within the dorm system. I have always expected to take my own tests; I hope I do not understand why I am now being denied the privilege.

Vacation

To the Editor:

It is bad enough that Syracuse University is still wallowing in the absurd, archaic, two semester, essentially three credits- per-course system which is rapidly becoming totally inconsistent with today's goals in education. But this year the university is taking full advantage of one of the many abuses inherent in the system, vix. running first semester into second. What on earth is the big rush?

Finals start one week after vacation (How to take the fun - and purpose - out of Christmas vacation!); they end on Friday, Jan. 24; and registration is the following Monday. Where is the breathing room? It is a must, if for no reason than to muster up the courage necessary to face S.U. registration, that paragon of inefficient bureaucracy, which is enough to unnerve the calmist, most collected of us all. There is no appreciable sense to the whole situation. Can nothing be done? Does anyone care? Make some noise if you do.

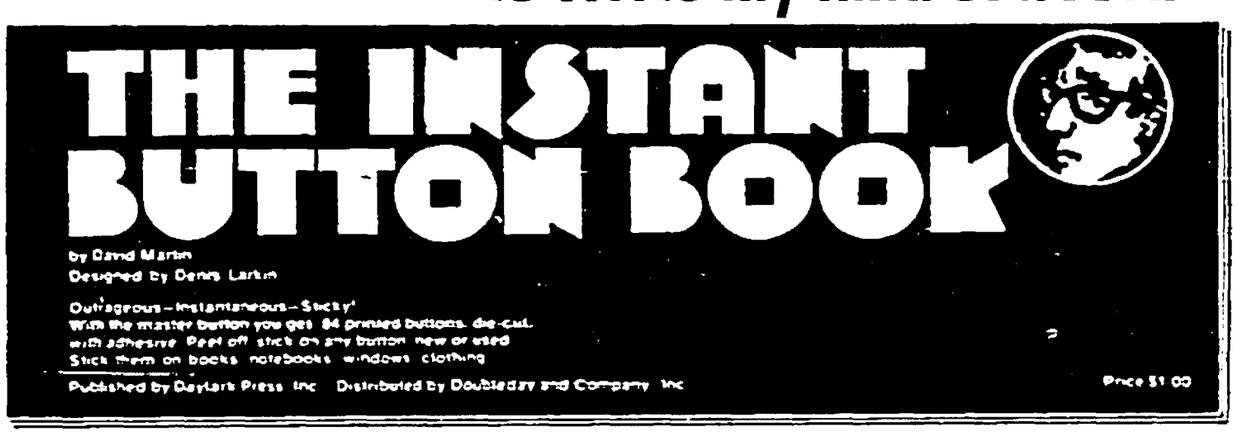
Christmas giving

To the Editor:



Christmas is that time of year which seems to draw every charity to your front door looking to you for their existence. Most, if not all, are worthy of your contributions, and because of your helping hand, are able to carry out their fights against disease, poverty, and ignorance.

But one charity seldom meets its quota. It is called the RED CROSS. Its plea rings loud and long every season, but few hear it.

This season, give of yourself and not your wallet. Give your time and not your pay check. Give a pint of blood and give a gift of life. You'll never miss it. Take the first step and call the RED CROSS today for an appointment. You'll be helping them fill their bank.

"Fortunately, I possess two of each."

When THE INSTANT BUTTON BOOK ripped off sales of 14 copies in Seal River, Maine and 22 in Bladder, Arkansas I knew that it wouldn't be long before the literary public would be screaming for more. Hence, my second book of hilarious button sayings, which after much hair searching and soul pulling I decided to entitle SON OF THE INSTANT BUTTON BOOK.

Each button saying is printed on pressure sensitive paper with a tenacious, sticky backing. You get a blank button to stick them on, or you can stick them on any non-protesting object. Some of the sayings will make you angry. Some will make you laugh. All will make you sick if you eat them. None will grow hair.

You can pick up both books for a dollar each at some book stores. Others may throw you out.

Trepel speaks against present party system

By MARGARET ALLAN

Appearing before the Senate Committee on Political Equity, (SCOPE) last night, Joseph Trepel cited incidents connected with campus elections last spring.

Daily Orange snatchings, damage to cars and wire jamming occured at a time when, according to Trepel, "people were affected almost to the point of fanaticism."

An advocate of the one-party system recently proposed by Scott Weiner, Trepel noted the futility of campus-wide elections as they were presently run.

"The administration just loves to watch us play these games," he said in reference to campaigning. However, he indicated the "games" played last spring closely resembled military tactics.

"A political party must be able to act in a responsible manner with the campus behind it," he declared, "and until this happens we're militating against our own cause."

Among considerations given to some of last year's candidates, Trepel listed clothing, cigarette brands and general appearance.

"This is the way people vote," stated Trepel. "This is why we should abolish campus-wide elections."

There appeared to be some disagreement as to Trepel's status, although he claimed to be "present GIA President."

Mike Silverman announced later in the meeting that the "views and statements of Joe Trepel do not represent the executive council and members of GIA." He stated that Trepel had resigned his post.

Silverman continued to make proposals for a revised political nominating system.

He suggested the formation of eleven districts, each of which would hold a caucus for the purpose of hearing the speeches of prospective candidates prior to the nominating convention.

Sub districts, by Silverman's plan, would be formed. Although all members of the party would be present at the convention, the districts would be represented by spokesmen.

According to Silverman, the convention would have to be run efficiently due to the time factor existing at the convention and the number of party members present. Each party member would have a vote in the convention.

Silverman stated that a disadvantage to the proposed one-party system was that power groups would form within.

Press coverage . . .

photography, put it this way: "We must serve the public, be honest in this service, and take care not to distort the news."

That the problem of distortion in the coverage of mass events becomes central in view of the difficulties involved in determining the course of events was generally agreed upon.

Intentional distortion, such as the staging or faking of seenes for photographs prompted strong criticism, as well as some qualification.

"A reporter guilty of staging or faking should be fired—stripped of rank, and put on Devil's Island" said Fontaine. "He is committing two crimes: one journalistic, and one civic. As a journalist, he is guilty of manufacturing a situation—and not presenting the truth. As a citizen, he may be shirking his responsibility to maintain law, public order, and public safety.

Robert L. Kerns, assistant professor of photography, although emphasizing the necessity to get the "best, and the truth" of the news, pointed out the difference "between setting up a shot and using direction to obtain a better, and more representative photograph."

The importance of objectivity in the reporting of news was stressed by many faculty members questioned.

Edmund C. Arnold, professor of graphic arts, siad: "There are no new techniques for reporting—the reporter must report the facts, keep out of the situation physically, and report it objectively. His job is not to make value judgments."

Arnold charged that a small segment of the press, and much of the television media lost their objectivity in the coverage of the Chicago convention.

"The television reporting was lousy," he said, "the media's creation of rumors on the convention floor, and editorializing were completely out of place."

Miss Covert, however, praised the television coverage of the convention: "The injection of evaluation added depth and texture to the reporting. The TV media has been too bland for too long."

She pointed out that the nature of the television media especially lent itself to this injection of evaluation, in that "there is a personality directly connected with the expression of the news." She also added, that no conclusive opinions could be formulated concerning the convention coverage until years to come. She said, somewhat ruefully: "and then, all freshness, and immediacy, will be lost."

Admitting that the nature of the medium created major problems, A. William Bluem, associate professor of television and radio, vigorously defended television coverage of the convention.

"We are journalists, working in a tradition. The television medium is more vivid, and more responsible; it frames the sight, and the sound and motion of an event."

Television, says Bluem, "tells it like it is, not the way they (the public) want to hear it."

Control of television broadcasts had been advocated by Assistant Professor Richards, who said "I'm pro TV, but it would be a public service for TV to delay broadcasts of this type of violence for two hours. I fear that the public is not ready for instant TV."

"A control is not the cure," said Bluem; "Television must recognize that it is an art form. it must learn to be reserved in its presentation—the creation of an aesthetic distance is necessary."

Joseph A. Taylor, lecturer in news reporting, pointed to television's inability to remain inconspicous in its coverage of the news. "Television happened to be involved most strongly in the difficulties in Chicago," he said. "With the lights and equipment necessary for television coverage, it is almost impossible for the television media to remain unnoticed; they then become makers of the news."

Due to the catalystic effect of the television camera's presence, Taylor said, "Less conspicuous equipment will be better."

Concerning possible television bias, Frederic A. Demarest, associate professor of photography, and head of the photography department, said: "The media appeared to be anti-administration. But I'm not sure they were wrong. The coverage now looks very fair in view of the report on the Chicago violence as I understand it."

More conclusive opinions concerning media's coverage of the convention are virtually impossible pending release of the complete report. Due to the Government Printing Office's refusal to print the report, curiosity as to the body of the report may have to wait until its scheduled publication in book form.

Fair elections and open membership required

New constitution poses group problems

By LOUIS JACOBS

Not every student organization will meet the constitutional requirements set by student senate. Two fundamental changes from previous constitutions emphasize open membership and democratic means of electing officers.

Senate granted automatic resubmission of last year's constitutions on file but over fifty organizations have not yet filed a constitution. Any group whose constitution does not meet the basic stipulations will be prohibited from using campus facilities.

The issues of open membership and democratic elections have elections have been passed over in many organizations. Government Structures, by reviewing all constitutions, will safeguard students on campus from discrimination on levels above obvious membership requirements, such as those of the Women's Athletic Association.

Coupled with discrimination has been the problem of officer determination in many groups where students have complained of undemocratic practices. Student senate in setting these standards acts on behalf of students denied the full freedom of association and equal chance for leadership.

All constitutions must also include in the amendment clause that senate will be notified of any changes. Students who experience unfair treatment from an organization should report to senate such practices for there is a viable penalty.

Through an agreement with the registrar of campus buildings, any organization not listed by senate will be unable to use campus facilities for meetings, films, dances, etc. This "police power" gives senate some lever to enforce legislation and also brings a definitive power to the students.

In the past, student senate has passed laws but had a problem in enforcing and executing new regulations. University administration has in this case provided senate with a power which had previously been reserved to administrators.

Students through senate can reform their own organizations and control that particular area of student power. Some groups cannot rely on previous constitutions to meet the senate requirements and must either submit a good constitution or else move off campus.

This Monday, the Government Structures committee will study all constitutions now automaticly resubmitted and any other constitutions brought before the committee.

Significant social change depends on attitude

Demonstrations have been used well in recent years to bring issues to the attention of America's press and public. They have also been used to bring about some changes in policy. These changes have not been radical, for the most part, but they have been changes in the direction hoped for by those participating.

The marches, sit-ins and boycotts through the South under the guidance of Dr. Martin Luther King are the obvious example. A limited goal was set in each case and tactics were chosen which would serve to reach that goal. But overlying the whole series of demonstrations was the most important aspect of the civil rights movement of which they were a part: to create an atmosphere of acceptability and tolerance among the majority of Americans.

This atmosphere was probably the most important part of Dr. King's movement because, as was stated, the immediate changes themselves were almost minor in character. What was sought was an attitude change in America around which other changes could accumulate and increase of their own accord. In retrospect, this approach seems to have had some positive effect. The basic concepts professed by most Americans were the ones employed by the demonstrators: peaceful marches, the right to free speech and assembly, non-violent resistance, all of which were difficult against which to raise sympathy. Consequently, American attidudes did begin to change.

Attitudes are based primarily on "emotional" and perceptual knowledge, however, and not on "reason." They do not respond quickly to presentation of fact. But today's demonstrators no longer seem to be interested in analyzing attitude change, possibly because they are not concerned with it or even aware of it.

Such demonstrators are usually young, and their attitudes are flexible. They are already suited to change. The "facts" seem obvious to these demonstrators and they expect all Americans to see those facts just as clearly and to respond immediately to them. But since attitudes could not have responded quickly and did not, the demonstrators have turned in their impatience to more violent methods in an attempt to obtain those changes seen to be necessary.

Real change in society is very dependent on attitude, however, whether recognized or not, and attitudes are still changing in the wrong direction. Reaction to violent demonstrations has not been one of fear and an increase in the urgency to change, but instead has been anger and a growing tendency to stand pat. The atmosphere created is not one of tolerance and willingness to compromise. Instead it is one of support for those prepared to use force to stop demonstrations which are seen as irritating, dangerous, and often aimless.

Thus, today's demonstrators seem to be working against their own professed goals. They are not bringing about change in society but are isolating themselves from it. They are not eliminating police brutality but instead are giving Americans reason to ignore it or even support it. They are not bringing an end to racial discrimination but instead are diverting attention from it to "law and order."

A change in American attitudes and subsequent social change would seem much more likely if there was increased awareness of and emphasis on the emotional aspects of change and less on the simply physical appraoches to it.

SG begins mock pre-registration Tuesday in attempt to tailor courses for students

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

A mock pre-registration for the student body will be held next Tuesday through Thursday to remedy some of the shortcomings of our present registration system. Jeff Portnoy, vice president of Student Government, said the compiled results will be examined for two indications: 1. to project the number of students in a particular course, which will allow the registrar to schedule the necessary number of sections; and 2. to show what size room is needed for these courses.

During these three days of next week, a work force will be set up, headed by Jay Everson, which will be prepared to accumulate the necessary information from the students. Booths will be manned in HBC from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m., and all major dining halls will be canvassed from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m.

All of the courses offered by the University will be numbered so that students merely have to refer to the list, then indicate the courses which they plan to take. Booklets will be available in each registration area so students can easily find their courses. No time listings will be made on the anonymous sheets.

Approximately two or three thousand registrants are necessary to make the service workable. "This survey does not have the force of law, of course," added Portnoy. "But we do have the registrar's support."

Courses omitted from the schedule are those in the fine arts and math departments. Desired courses in these areas may be written in on the student lists, however. Graduate courses and basic required courses will also be eliminated from the procedures.

To make the process an easy one for the student, he should check his school catalogue for: 1. the list of courses by the "old" numbers of last year, which will be used; and 2. determining the particular courses which he should take.

The mock pre-registration is sponsored by executive branch of SG.

Portnoy's original plan proposed the workings of the IBM system to make the analysis more complete. It was modified by a lack of funds, however.

Committee will study frosh life

The Interdorm Council has created a Freshman Committee "to explore all facets of freshman life at Syracuse and to try to make it better," according to committee president Robert Morse.

The committee will meet today at 4:30 p.m. in 214 HL, and all interested freshman are invited, according to Morse. The work will include " a lot of research," he said.

"We want to get an insight into what the freshmen are thinking about," Morse said in defining one of the committee's goals.

Questionaires and "advice to help better integrate the freshmen into the campus and eliminate apathy that seems to pervade the upper class" are other projects, he said.

A TGIF will follow the meeting, at which Peg Johnston will be a speaker.

Chi O slates faculty coffee

The Upsilon Alpha chapter of Chi Omega sorority will have its annual faculty coffee Monday from 7 to 8 p.m. in the campus chapter house, 1003 Walnut Ave. The faculty-student coffee is "a representation of the kind of cooperation and inspiration between faculty and student which can enrich the learning process of Syracuse University students."

Computerized program

Job placement agency RE-CON to begin application drive next week

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

RE-CON, the second computerized job placement agency to become active on the SU campus, will start its drive for applicants among seniors and fifth-year students next week. The program is directed by the local National Student Association, part of the executive branch of Student Government. It has an official SG endorsement.

Senior Diane Hinderstein, coordinator of the program, said that brief questionnaires will be mailed to off campus seniors and fifth year students, and distributed on campus for others. The completed questionnaires are to be mailed to RE—CON'S New York headquarters where the applicant's data is fed into a computer and matched with job openings.

The RE-CON program, growing out of the Wharton Graduate School of Business Administration, offers both permanent and summer job placement. Data questionnaires are available to undergraduates at the SG office and from Diane Hinderstein.

RE-CON's recruiting will coincide with that of COMPUJOB, a Washington, D.C.-based program started by two Wharton dropouts. RE-CON's questionnaires will allow applicants to specify the size of the firm they wish to work with, the geographic location and major job requirements.

There is no fee involved in this program. RE-CON's profits come from contracts signed with firms submitting job openings to the computer service. NSA will receive 25 cents for each completed questionnaire from Syracuse received at the New York headquarters.

NSA and RE-CON have a national contract which gives NSA's endorsement of the program. Individual contracts are also signed on each of the NSA campuses agreeing to coordinate RE-CON's job matching operation. The SU contract will be signed by SG.

When asked how he viewed such computer programs, George Abbott, director of SU's placement center, said he is "not opposed to any system of this type per se. I have no objection to our students using them."

He added that COMPUJOB forms are available at the placement center now and Diane Hinderstein reports the RE-CON questionnaires will also be distributed there.

When asked if he considered the computer programs a threat to the service provided by the Placement Center, he said, "not at all."

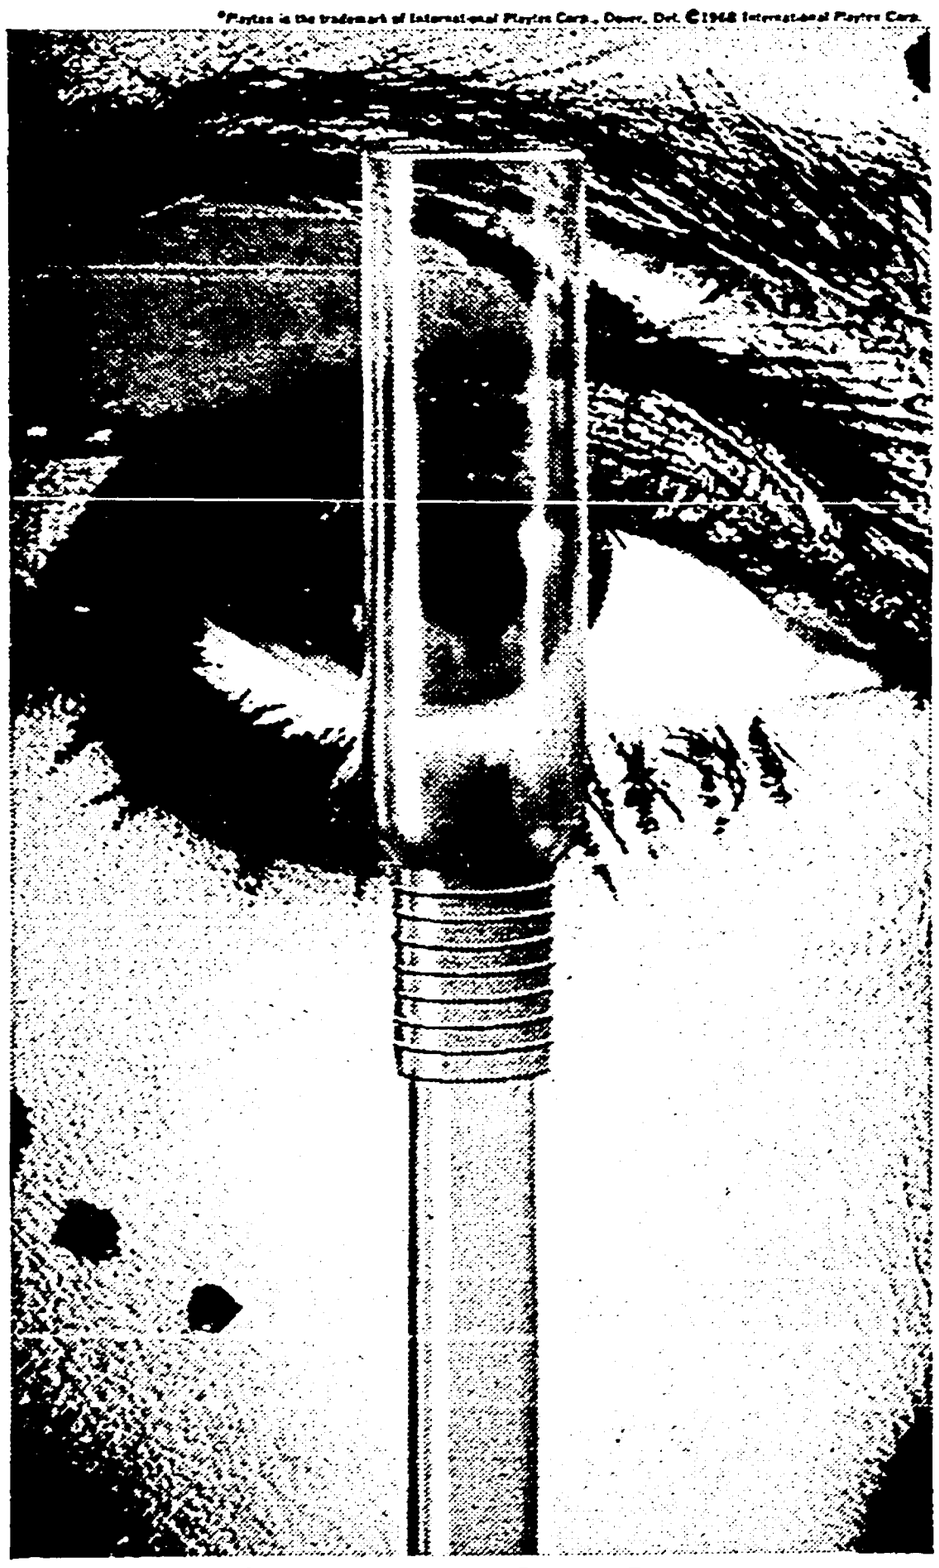
Three more cottages will be closed

By HELENE MACDONALD
Associate Editor

Three women's cottages on S. Crouse Avenue, whose names have not yet been released, have been added to the list of cottages that will be closed at the end of this semester.

Jean Crawford, director of women's residence, said that more cottages would be closed until the 200 vacancies in other living centers are filled. She expected to notify the head residents in the cottages involved today, but could not because clearance for the closing had not been received from the University Housing Committee.

After the inhabitants of closed cottages have been notified, Miss Crawford will visit each place to explain room selection for next semester, movings, and answer any questions the girls have.



Residents of cottages in the 400 block of Walnut Place already knew that their cottages would be closed to make room for the construction of the new library. Walker is vacant now; Smalley, Heffron and French will close at the end of this semester. Charles' fate depends on how far the construction extends.

Famous duo will perform here Sunday

One of the most famous names among British musical artists is that of Geraint Jones, organist, harpsichordist and conductor of the English Chamber Orchestra. Equally well known is his wife, Winifred Roberts, violinist and partner in sonata recitals. Crouse Concerts will present this couple — Sunday at 4 p.m. in the Crouse College auditorium.

Jones, a close friend of the great harpsichordist Ralph Kirkpatrick, has made several tours of this country as soloist as well as in recitals with his wife.

Sunday's program will feature the music of Tartini, Bach, Mozart, Joseph Gibbs and finally another Mozart. The opening work will be the A Minor sonata of Tartini, followed by Bach's A Major and then the Mozart in F Major, K. 376.

Concert here tonight

Peter, Paul, Mary: 'Why we sing'

Peter, Paul and Mary strum into Syracuse again for another concert at the War Memorial tonight at 8:30 p.m.

With the current release of their ninth album, Late Again, the trio celebrates its eighth performance year. During this year, Peter Yarrow, Paul Stookey, and Mary Travers have not only sung to well over a half million people in concert, but have reaffirmed to their audiences their basic belief that folk music is a beautiful, emotional way to communicate one's love for people.

It is this belief which identifies Peter, Paul and Mary and has been expressed, unchanged, by the trio since their first appearance at the Bitter End in Greenwich Village, New York.

When the three singers first met in Mary's village apartment one evening during May 1961, the only thing they had in common was the knowledge of the same lyrics and melody of "Mary Had A Little Lamb." However, it only took that one evening for them to discover that they had found what each had been searching for: an identity in musical expression. Peter, Paul and Mary found that they shared the same enthusiasm for folk singing and that folk music had held the same special place in each of their lives since they were teenagers. Communicating ideas and beliefs through music was the catalyst that linked these three separate personalities.

Peter

"We could have made three times as many albums as we actually did, but we don't go into a recording session until we have 12 songs that say the things we want to say. Then it's another six months or so to polish them until the songs are really together."

–Peter Yarrow

With the unique beauty of their three voices as a foundation they began to work hard to develop initial rapport into a single unit, a single sound. For the next seven months, Peter, Paul and Mary wrote and rewrote arrangements, rehearsed and shaped the sound, style and most important, the expression of the trio. This expression is made through songs that are valid social commentaries reflecting some aspect of the condition and feelings--whether joyous or poignant--of mankind. These songs may be as old as 200 years, or as young as 200 hours, with the ink barely dry.

The first step from the rehearsal stage was to The Bitter End. From there, dates followed at The Gate of Horn (Chicago), the hungry i (San Francisco) and The Blue Angel (New York). From a few hundred fans, their admirers swelled to thousands.

In the spring of 1962, their first recording titled simply "Peter, Paul and Mary," was issued. Within three months it soared to the top of the hit charts. Single hits from this recording–"If I Had A Hammer" and "Lemon Tree"–assured their success. Following the acclaim of this initial recording, the trio went on tour and broke attendance records in almost every major concert hall in the United States, playing six concerts a week for six consecutive months.

Behind these three voices that blend so well into a single musical expression are three people whose backgrounds and temperaments differ markedly.

Peter Yarrow has perhaps the most varied personality within the trio. Intensely fascinated by a wide range of subjects, such as music, painting, architecture, physics, psychology, Peter has now co-produced his first movie, "You Are What You Eat." This multimedia "happening" captures on film much of the youth scene of today, reflecting Peter's own involvement in expressing currently changing social values.

By the time he graduated from Cornell, Peter was thinking seriously of a career in folk music. He had begun playing the guitar and singing in high school and had been president of Cornell's folk music club. He appeared on the first television folk-music special, "Folk Sound USA," and participated in the Newport Folk Festival. The young bachelor already was a successful solo performer when he met Mary Travers and Paul Stookey.

Mary

"There is a vision we share with you in our music. If it has proved successful, it is not, I believe, because it is OUR vision, but because it has been everybody's all along."

–Mary Travers

Paul Stookey recalls vividly his "discovery" of singing when he was an 8-year-old singing along with his father one day while riding along in a convertible. A native of Baltimore, Paul had formed his own rock-and-roll combo by the time he was 14. A friendly personality and wry sense of humor gave him a wide reputation as a comedian when he attended Michigan State University.

To the trio he brings not only a steadying influence, but also a boundless and keenly satiric wit.

A tall willowy blonde with a tall, willowy voice, Mary Travers has been singing folk songs since kindergarten days. Born in Louisville, Mary moved to New York with her parents (both writers) and grew up in Greenwich Village.

By the time she was out of her teens, Mary has been a member of a chorus, a folk-singing group called "The Songswappers," and had appeared in the chorus of a short-lived Broadway musical, "The Next President." She married, gave up her career for four years, and devoted her time to her first daughter, Erika. When she met Paul and then Peter, music returned and now dominates her life--when she isn't being a mother to Erika and to Alicia, her second daughter.

Peter, Paul and Mary began their great success with a gold record earned by the high sales of their first album. The second album, "Moving," brought them another gold record as did two other subsequent albums. Hit single songs further strengthened their popularity: "Puff (The Magic Dragon)," "Blowin' In The Wind," "Don't Think Twice, It's All Right," "The Times They Are A'Changin."

A deep sense of social and political involvement in the affairs of the nation has resulted in their participation in the second anniversary celebration of the inauguration of the late President John F. Kennedy, their performing at a White House dinner given by President and Mrs. Johnson in honor of U Thant, and their active aid to Senator Eugene McCarthy in his bid for nomination as the 1968 Democratic Party presidential candidate.

A desire for social justice and social peace is supported by their participation in activities in support of the civil rights movement, and their known devotion to humanitarian causes led to their participation in this year's presentation of the Joseph P. Kennedy Foundation biennial awards.

Peter, Paul and Mary often sing about their own feelings but most often they sing of the feelings of others. Their songs reflect individual feelings about the condition of man–his problems, his successes and his challenges--and within the context of musical communication, they join hands with their audience.

Paul

We'd been together for an hour
It seemed like seven years had passed
And we had barely scratched the surface of what it was
That used to matter

Lions heavy favorites

SU, Penn State in 46th meeting

By MIKE WEBER

Syracuse invades University Park, Pa., tomorrow to do battle with third-ranked Penn State. The Orangemen have nothing to lose, while the Nittany Lions could see their flickering national championship hopes thoroughly snuffed out.

It will be the 46th renewal of the rivalry which dates back to 1922. Each team has been victorious 20 times with five ball games ending all even.

Penn State is unbeaten in nine games this year and has not lost since bowing to UCLA, 17-15, in last season's third tilt. What is often overlooked is that the Nittany Lions came within three points of having an unbeaten season last year. A two- point loss to UCLA and a 23-22 nipping at the hands of Navy spoiled the bid.

The Orangemen could prove the spoilers this time around. Coming off a stunning 23-6 upset at the hands of West Virginia, Ben's Boys should be primed and ready. A win in this, the big game for both clubs, could give the gridders a triumphant second season, while affording them sweet dreams until next fall.

As far as injuries go, the Orange could be hurting. All-East defensive end Lou Gubitosa appears to have no chance of playing against PSU. He suffered a leg injury against West Virginia and has not recovered sufficiently.

Jerry Beach, who was tabbed for honorable mention on the East all-star squad, is also a question mark for tomorrow's encounter. Defensive back Tom Hermanowski, who has been missing from the wars for some time, will probably sit this one out also.

At University Park, the word is go. Bobby Campbell has fully recovered from all the maladies that have beset him the past two years and will be going all out in his next-to-last game.

All-East halfback Charlie Pittman got much needed rest the past two weeks, and he too will be primed for the big push. He carried the ball only nine times against Pitt, but scored on three successive efforts.

Joe Szombathy, who has been hot on the Lion's trail as a scout this year, feels that even as number three in the nation, Penn State is underrated.

"Penn State is by far the number one team in the country," says Szombathy. "They are so well-balanced and have good personnel all around."

Szombathy feels the area in which Penn State has made the greatest advance is their offense. Led by quarterback Chuck Burkhart, the Nittany Lions have tallied 309 points thus far.

Szombathy comments, "Burkhart has become the take charge guy. He's leading a more varied attack and is the man on the spot."

Of All-American tight end, Ted Kwalick, Szombathy summed up his feelings in four words. "He can do everything."

Head coach Ben Schwartzwalder had his usual pessimistic outlook on the game--but maybe this time for a good reason.

"They just don't make errors," moans Ben. "You try to concentrate on stopping their running game and then leave their passing game open."

He also bemoaned the recent failings of his defensive line. After being ranked number two in the nation in rushing defense, the front wall broke apart in Morgantown.

"Our defensive line, which used to be our strong point has just faded," admitted Schwartzwalder.

Ben said the only game strategy he has will be to "control the ball and be able to move it a little."

Penn State tutor, Joe Paterno, expressed complete amazement following SU's loss to West Virginia. He said, "It's difficult to believe that Syracuse was licked that badly."

However, Paterno, who sports a 22-7 record since arriving in University Park in 1966, was quick to add, "That alone will make our job all the tougher against Syracuse."

Kickoff for the nationally televised encounter will be 12:05 with air time scheduled over the ABC network, Channel 9 in Syracuse, at 11:45 a.m.

Rich and glorious

SU-Penn State tradition

By GINA BELL

The invitations to the important bowls have been issued, and the Heisman Trophy winner has been chosen. The AP and UPI polls have the Top Ten schools virtually cemented in their places in the ratings, and everyone knows who's going to win the Lambert Trophy. What's more, Ben Schwartzwalder has long since clinched his 19th consecutive winning season.

As a casual observer, you might point out that, except for the dramatics of January 1, football season is, for all practical purposes, over, and therefore Syracuse, going against undefeated Penn State tomorrow, has nothing much at stake. If you're this casual an observer, though, don't let a loyal Syracuse fan hear your blasphemy.

Nothing much at stake? Just The Game, that's all. Just Ben's slight 10-9 edge in his 20-year feud with the Penn State coaching staff. Just SU'S revenge for last October's defeat before a Homecoming crowd. Just the lead in a bitter rivalry of 46 years' standing. That's all.

Although for many years Syracuse's primary rival was Colgate, the Penn State game has always been an important one, and when Colgate copped out in 1962, the Penn State contest gained ascendency as The Game--the game which usually decided who won the Lambert Trophy, who was supreme in the East, who received the bowl bids.

The rivalry, a logical one, considering the histories, traditions and propinquity of the schools, is now in its 46th year, and the 20-20-5 count shows how evenly matched the teams have been over the years. Traditionally, season records are meaningless in the game, and the teams have such a healthy respect for each other that neither can enter a game confident of victory.

The series opened in 1922 at New York's Polo Grounds, and the scoreless tie which resulted was an indication of the type of dogfight which fans could expect annually. Syracuse took an early lead in the series record, losing only three of the first 16 games, but its victories and defeats were by such narrow margins that neither team could ever claim superiority. Large point spreads were the exception, not the rule: in 1934, an SU 16-0 victory was a cause for special celebration, since it was the first time either team had won by more than a touchdown. Even in 1959, the Golden Year, Syracuse won only by a 2-point margin.

Strong State teams in the late '30's and the '40's gave them a chance to even up the record, and in the process of doing so, they inflicted four consecutive shutouts on the hapless Orangemen. After Ben's take-over in 1949, Syracuse came back into its own, and reigned supreme during the Brown-Davis-Little years, while State racked up victories in the years when SU lacked a stellar back, keeping the record balanced.

Besides being what one SU captain of the 1920's manfully referred to as "the usual ding-dong battle" (is that really what he meant to say?), the SU-PSU game has been known to set precedents. In 1929, Syracuse lost a close game 6-4 because State, after several heroic goal-line stands, took advantage of an "automatic safety" rule which allowed them to stall by regaining possession of the ball after consecutive safeties had been scored. After this game, officials recognized the flaw in the rule, and amended it to its present form.

The intensely personal nature which the rivalry has taken on in the past 20 years is illustrated by a traditional story. In 1956, Syracuse was the first team to shift its defense, a play which was intended to suddenly change the blocking alignment. The signal for the play was a sharp word, like "Hut!" or "Shift!". Before one game, Penn State coach Rip Engle complained to the refs that Syracuse used the signal to pull Penn State offsides, since it resembled State's starting count. The refs went to Ben with Engle's protest. Needless to say, he wasn't too pleased, but being cooperative, asked for a solution. The ref advised him to change the signal to a soft word, and so Ben turned to his center and asked him what his girl's name was. The center said, "Sally," and since this was obviously "soft," it was considered suitable for a signal. To this day, when the team shifts defense, the signal is Sally. Of such is legend made.

The Game has evolved into a coaching contest, a matching of wits in a gigantic chess match in which a team cannot be certain of victory until the final seconds have run out. It is strictly a football rivalry, though, and is accompanied by little of the student hysteria which marked each Colgate game.

Danforth and Murphy to meet again as SU seeks first win

By ED AGRANOWITZ

Coach Roy Danforth takes his comeback minded Orangemen to the land of the falls tomorrow to do battle with the Purple Eagles of Niagara.

Eagle coach Frank Layden also a rookie faces a semi-rebuilding year with the graduation of 6-8 center Manny Leaks, and good scoring forward Greg Hudecki.

Layden will start a lineup of five juniors, and despite the loss of these two key performers, his team returns intact.

The team comes in the form of 5-10 lightning fast, high leaping, baton twirling, twine tickling All-American Calvin Murphy.

6-6 Bob Churchwell will succeed Leaks at center for Niagara, with 6-5 Steve Schafer handling one forward spot. Mike Brown, a 5-10 ballhawk, will return in the backcourt, along with 6-2 Joe Russell.

Murphy at forward? That's where the King of the Falls will open tomorrow night.

The Orange are likely to go man-to-man against the Eagles, as they have done in past years.

That means that 6-2 John Suder, an old friend of Murphy will open in the key defensive role again tomorrow. Suder guarded Murphy twice as a freshman and twice last year, with the Orange winning three of the contests.

In the past, several Oragne guards have taken turns hawking Murphy, but it was Suder who held him to a career-low of 13 points when the Orange won a slow-down contest last winter.

What are Suder's reactions to another meeting with the Eighth Wonder of the World? "I don't think there's a player in the country who could stop him one on one," says Suder. "It's just a matter of chasing him constantly and trying to pressure him into mistakes. It's a real chore."

Speaking for his mates, Suder feels that the 93-81 licking the Orange took from Cornell in the opener will have no effect on the team's tremendous spirit. "This is one team that won't get downhearted no matter what happens," he said. "I know we can come back."

WAER will air both games of the basketball doubleheader at Niagara tomorrow night. The frosh game will start at 6:30, with Steve Klein handling the play by play. The varsity contest, with Lee Shavanian and Bill Loweth, will follow at 8:30. Between games will be a special basketball program.

The SU swim team will be at Buffalo tomorrow, while the wrestling squad travels to the Coast Guard tournament.

'Frustration' hampers students' policy work

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

The six student members of the Council on Student Life (CSL) yesterday said they were suspending meetings with the council's administration and faculty members, thus in effect temporarily dissolving the year-old council.

Frustrated by "sitting back and letting ourselves be lied to, used and manipulated by the powers that be in this university," they demanded that the council's role and powers be clearly defined before the meetings resume.

In a statement to the four faculty and four administration members of the council Friday, the students asserted that "we want a true statement of the power of the council. We want an end to the stalling and manipulation...We want a final straight answer on just where everybody stands within the scheme of the university and we want this final answer to be final."

ED FELDMAN

The recent basketball ticket controversy, in which it appeared that the Administration had gone over the heads of students, probably precipitated this latest round of administration-student noncommunication. But the "frustrations" apparently have been smoldering since the beginning of the school year.

The council, when created last year, was called "a major link" between the students and administration. It was thought to be the vehicle for the students' voice in university policy-making. AWS president and council member Cindy Bailey said last spring that "this linkage of communication gives the board jurisdiction to experiment major policy changes."

But she qualified her optimism, warning that "it depends on next year's actions for its strength and power."

The student members now have charged that the administration has frustrated their initiatives in establishing a living- learning center, visitation hours, a coed dormitory, food service investigations and an optional meal plan and a substantive change in Rule One and the en loco parentis policy that they say creates "discrepancies between the treatment of men and women on this campus."

"But our major gripe," said Ed Feldman, author of the student statement, yesterday in an interview "is that the Administration has been basically dishonest." Three other student members--Joey Edwardh, SG President Chuck Hicks and Miss Bailey --also claimed yesterday that the Administration "has not been honest" in telling them what the powers of the CSL actually are.

The students had "assumed" that the council's decisions would be subject only to the veto of Chancellor Tolley, and that not only would their voices be equal to those of the administration and faculty members, but also that the council's decisions would receive priority over the Personnel Deans' offices, such as the offices of the deans of men and women.

Such power, said Miss Edwardh, was implied by the make-up of the council, which includes Dean of Women Marjorie Smith, Dean of Men David Tatham, Dean of Student Services James G. Carleton and

Basketball ticket fee temporarily suspended

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

The two dollar fee for this season's home basketball tickets has been temporarily suspended by the Athletic Department.

In a release last night, the department indicated that "a total of 5,000 books of season basketball tickets will be available to Syracuse students under a new plan drawn up Monday afternoon. In addition, there will be no charge for the tickets as originally planned."

All students eligible for football tickets will be eligible for basketball tickets as well.

Booklets containing tickets for the ten home games will be available by presenting a student ID at the Men's Gym ticket windows "starting at 11 a.m. today. The ticket office will be open through Thursday from 11 a.m. until 5:30 p.m. and again on Monday at the same time." After Monday, students will have to pay the two dollar fee.

Tickets were to be available yesterday, but Dean of Men David Tatham suspended sales because of the controversy surrounding the charge.

In a statement yesterday, Tatham said, "This is an unfortunate situation where everyone had the best intentions but things didn't work out as planned. I am grateful to the Athletic Department and Student Government representatives who took all day today to work out the alternative plan."

Student Government Vice President Jeff Portnoy, Jim Striker, ticket commissioner and Rich Stone conferred with representatives of the Athletic Department yesterday morning in a meeting arranged by Dean Tatham over the weekend. There they discussed three proposed solutions to the ticket crisis that were drawn up by Portnoy, Stone and SG President Chuck Hicks earlier.

Then yesterday afternoon, Hicks and Portnoy met with Dean Tatham and Assistant Dean Melvin Mounts to reach a final solution. At that meeting Hicks said Tatham "cooperated beautifully with us."

Hicks seemed satisfied with the ticket decision. "I think it's fair. It's okay as long as students are given an adequate amount of time to pick up tickets. All you need to do is walk in and get a booklet."

Hicks said that students having problems obtaining tickets because of sickness, student teaching, lost ID, etc., should contact Jim Striker so "something can be worked out."

The Athletic Department also indicated that "extra help will be on hand at the ticket windows" to facilitate any large demand for tickets. Tickets will be transferable to anyone with an ID card, but a student may not obtain tickets for anyone but himself.

The department said it "regrets the inconvenience to those students who showed up Monday to purchase their tickets."

Hicks indicated that he did not intend to let the controversy die with this temporary solution." As far as I'm concerned, the charge is out

Utah senator presides

Model City Program brings hearings to SU

By DOROTHY NASH

Federal government stepped down to the grassroots level yesterday as Syracuse University was the scene of a U.S. Senate Committee hearing.

Frank E. Moss, senator from Utah, presided as the Special Committee on Aging heard testimony on the issues and problems concerning the elderly in the Federal Government Model City Program.

Hearings on the subject began in Washington, D.C., last July and have since been held in Seattle, Wash., and Ogden, Utah. From Syracuse the Senate Committee will proceed to Atlanta, Ga., where hearings will be concluded in January.

Syracuse, recently accepted as a potential Model City after having been rejected on its first application, received a planning grant of $166,000 on Sept. 6. It was selected as a site of the Committee hearings because "Syracuse is a good representative of the northeastern United States" and also is a good representative of goals the Model Cities Program wants to accomplish.

"Our hearings have made it crystal clear to me that the Model Cities Program has caused much soul-searching and hard work among officials and everyday citizens in communities of all sizes in all parts of the nation," said Sen. Moss in his opening remarks at St. Mary's dorm.

Joining Sen. Moss at the hearing was New York Senator Charles E. Goodell. Commenting on the local involvement of the elderly in the Syracuse Model City Program, Goodell called for active participation of the elderly with the community agencies that will be organizing and developing the plan.

"Coping with improved living conditions of our elderly in Syracuse will call for new ideas and new approaches to planning for action. It will call for a recognition that our senior citizens will 'tell it like it is' and want 'a piece of the action' too. What is clear is they want to participate; they want a voice in decisions affecting life in the community."

Witnesses' testimony

Witnesses offering testimony on the usefulness of the program to the elderly included city and county officials as well as residents from Almus Olver Towers, a housing center for the elderly in Syracuse, and Walter M. Beattie Jr., Dean of the School of Social Work here at the University.

Several questions were dealt with in their various aspects by the witnesses who participated as panel members.

The first witness was Roy D. Simmons, president of the Common Council of Syracuse, who outlined briefly the projects in housing, health, recreation and employment which are currently being developed or are already available to the senior citizens of the community.

John W. Hildebrandt, commissioner of Urban Development for the city, presented the status of the Model Neighborhood in Syracuse and some suggestions as to how to "reach and involve the senior citizens of that area." He sighted housing as the major problem affecting the aged.

"While the proportion of the housing supply represented by substandard housing has decreased, principally as a result of the removal for highway or renewal development, the continuing deterioration of the housing supply is nevertheless a significant problem."

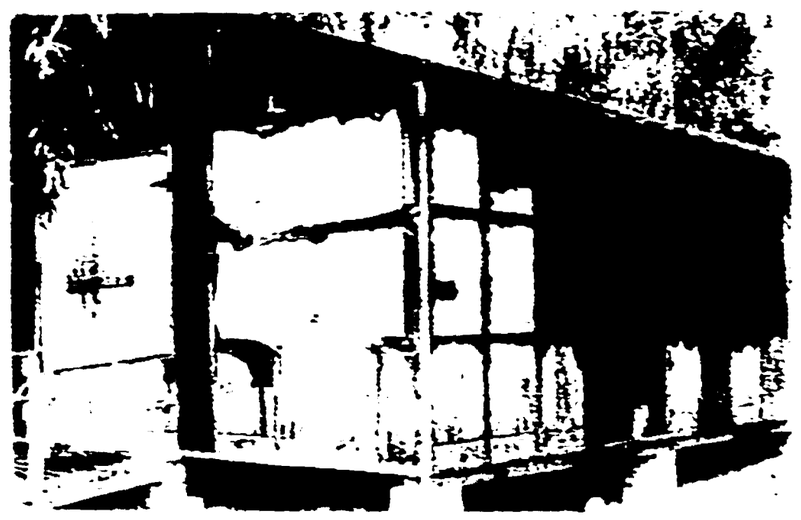
CSL meeting

The Council on Student Life has scheduled a meeting at 8 p.m. Thursday in 207 HL. All interested students, especially the leaders of campus organizations, are urged to attend.

Thanks for the fair deal



We would like to thank the Administration, particularly the Dean of Men, for taking the trouble to listen to student complaints about the $2 charge for basketball tickets.

The new plan is a fair one since there is a genuine problem of predicting how many students will appear at each game. Requiring students to pick a ticket book, while not indicating the fluctuations from game to game, will indicate the hard core of basketball-goers who plan to attend.

The Athletic Director was amiss for not making certain the student representatives on the Athletic Board knew and approved of the plan, as agreed upon last year. But the fact remains that the former Student Government President, David Kelso, and the ex-Athletic Commissioner, Andy Lubin, approved of the original $2 fee. There was no communication of this approval to Chuck Hicks, for which the Athletic Director cannot be held responsible.

May the basketball games, which have had two bad starts, fare well from now on.

Grape gripes

"The bunkhouse is sufficiently repelling. The only person who comes to see us is the good Father. He hears confessions and says the rosary. We are ashamed for him." These former army barracks, dilapidated by use and weather, were abandoned many years ago and then more recently requisitioned for Nationals (Mexicans) and American grape workers.

Due process in the Forestry School

The Board of Trustees of the State University of New York adopted on May 31, 1967, some guidelines for student disciplinary cases that should be relevant to the State School of Forestry at SU.

In section 3, "The Need for Due Process, the guidelines state: "Where regulations govern student disciplinary proceedings, they should reflect the basic concepts of procedural fairness and should make certain that no student shall be expelled or suffer other major disciplinary action...for any offense, other than failure to meet required academic standing, without being first given appropriate advance notice of the charges against him and a hearing before an impartial body...While a formal judicial hearing is not required, the hearing should give...full opportunity to hear both sides of the issue in considerable detail."

If the School of Forestry had followed these guidelines in the case of the student caught using a supposedly legal drug who "voluntarily withdrew" recently, there would be little question about the circumstances leading to his withdrawal.

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

I would like to reply to the anonymous letter in the D.O., in which a student tells of how his professor would not accept his word that a death in the family prevented his taking an examination. The author expresses surprise that the "older generation" seems to consider student morals decadent.

Of course, only a few self-rightous students would try to deny such a claim. For example, it is well known by the faculty and administration that students are degenerate sex maniacs. For this reason, "boys...are not allowed in girls' rooms," and vice versa. This rule exists because, "The administration and faculty are wise enough to realize which will lose when sex and the honor system compete under such circumstances." How could the word of a student be accepted for anything in light of such behavior?

The above quotes are from the SU publication "Parent Perspective" for Autumn 1968. This bulletin is being mailed to parents of SU students accompanied by a letter asking for money to construct the new Bird Library. Should such contributions be viewed as votes of support for the "wisdom" of faculty and administration attitudes?

Part one — what we remember

CSL demands

Editor's Note: The following is a statement written by Edward Feldman with the following members of the Council on Student Life: Cindy Bailey, K. Christopher Mudd, Jerry Tatarian, C. Joey Edwardh, and Charles Hicks. It was read at the Council meeting on Friday, December 6th and then given to Dean of Men David Tatham, acting chairman. Part one contains a statement of the conditions leading to current demands of CSL members.

For the past three months we, the students of the Council on Student Life, have sat in meeting after meeting trying, in our own way, to advance the standard of existence of the Syracuse University undergraduate. (I do not say living, for I can not call existing under a system of rule more autocratic than most dictatorships "living.") We students do not claim to be, or even try to be revolutionaries, but we are sick and tired of sitting back and letting ourselves be lied to, used, and manipulated by the powers that be in this university; all under the cloak of pseudo-interest and cooperation.

We look back on all the wonderful ideas and ideals with which we greeted our first few meetings. We remember the idea of a living-learning center. We remember all the work done by the student members of the committee: the running around, the visiting of dorms, the accumulation of opinions of faculty and students, the work done in finally presenting this information to the committee, and the enthusiasm that the students seemed to have over the prospect of the project being started next semester. Then we saw our hopes and dreams destroyed as the project was put off until "possibly" next year. No offer of compromise was presented; no prior warning of this action was given. All that was offered was the deception of letting students work their guts out on a wild goose chase.

We remember the idea of experimenting with visitation hours. We remember the work done in DellPlain and Lawrinson last year by a group of interested and responsible students. We remember coming to the Council with a proposal for extending the visitation hours to the whole campus. But, no—we have to experiment first. So we proposed an experiment on a campus-wide basis with time being the variable factor. No, that was not quite good enough. We proposed an experiment picking out various living centers as being representatives of their type; this was cut down to 25 per cent.

We accepted this as the best possible compromise we could hope to get. This was then further restricted by the elimination of freshman women from the experiment, thereby making it nothing more than a token appeasement to the students. All this restriction being done outside the council makes our meetings useless and ridiculous.

We remember the coed dorm. We remember running between the personnel deans and being referred one to the other until we became so frustrated that we felt like quitting the whole project. Then we remember how the idea has been stalled and stalled until it, too, might be considered next year.

We remember the work done on Food Service. Day after day we hear complaints about the food, the service, the uncleanliness of the utensils. We ask for passes to investigate and are told that this is impossible when it was done last year with no problems. We ask to see the books, we are promised the books will be open. Then we are told that there are no figures; we establish that there are such figures (and we sit back amazed at our own stupidity to have believed that the figures did not exist) and demand to see them. We are asked who we are to make such a demand. We remember showing the heads of Food Service filthy glasses and utensils and then have to sit back and listen while they question our honesty.

We remember questioning the discrepancies between the treatment of men and women on this campus only to be told that they do not really exist, and that if they do it is for the benefit of the students.

We remember the discussion of rule one last year and how we tried to modify it only to find it virtually the same. We asked that the "established procedure" be codified and are assured that they are and will be distributed to the personnel deans and students, but are never told if they are.

We remember a meeting of Dean Carleton and the new student leaders last year at which the leaders were assured that there would not be a charge for basketball games. We are told that the new charge for parking will be investigated. We now see this being totally ignored as the students are told that they must buy tickets.

Drumlins property purchased by SU for future needs

Syracuse University has agreed to purchase the 265-acre Drumlins property at the southeastern edge of the city, Chancellor William P. Tolley announced yesterday.

Victor J. Colway, the University's vice president for business management, said the purchase price was in excess of $2 million, with the closing scheduled for April 1, 1969.

Commenting on the agreement, chancellor Tolley said:

"The fine facilities of Drumlins with two excellent golf courses, dining rooms, and swimming pool will continue to operate as they have in the past. The properties will continue on the tax roll and become part of the University's endowment. They will not be a drain on the current operation of the University but will be treated as a long-term investment by the Finance and Investment Committee. We hope there will be no loss in patronage because of the change in ownership. The acquisition of the Drumlins property from the Burlingame family was made possible by the generosity and help of a number of alumni and friends.

"In our long term planning we have always felt it was important to acquire the Drumlins property to protect it against unwise development and keep it as a land bank for future needs. It adjoins our present property and rounds out our land holdings to the south of Colvin Street.

Colway said taxes on the Drumlins property will continue to be paid.

Frosh exec studies grievances

The Freshman Class government announced two new programs which were discussed at their last Exec Council.

The Freshman Grievance and Action Committee, formed with the backing of the Interdormitory Council (IDC), and co-chaired by Bob Morse from IDC and temporarily by Freshman President Bob Tembeckjian, is to conduct an open hearing on Thursday, in Hall of Languages.

The purpose of the committee, according to the chairmen, is to investigate all facets of freshman life, to hear and act upon grievances by members of the class, and to propose recommendations to the university concerning areas such as parietal hours, curfews and housing - recommendations which reflect the freshman point of view.

The other program is a discussion series which will, it is hoped, involve professors and graduate instructors. The proposed format is to have a professor lecture some evening on his particular field of concentration, then distribute those in attendance into several discussion groups led by grad instructors. The sessions would be open to any who were interested. Freshman Class officers are working to organize the first such lecture-discussion program before the Christmas vacation.

President Tembeckjian commented that "these two programs, I hope, will get the freshmen more involved in this school. I think we can change the unfair rules of this university, such as curfews and visitation hours, if we develop a sense of unity among the class. And I think we can change the indifferent attitudes many people have toward freshmen.

Tembeckjian went on to explain that freshman government wants to be more than a "social body.

completely. A proposal will be presented to SG to come to a permanent agreement for both basketball and football tickets." He said Jim Striker will be sampling student opinion before Christmas to help him arrive at a proposal. Hicks said there was no discussion of the football situation today.

He described Dean Tatham's role today as that of a "mediator who gave us a lot of cooperation."

The background to the small fee for baskerball tickets was given in a statement from Dean Tatham's office. "In January of 1968, David Kelso, president of SG and Andrew Lubin, student athletic commission, served on a subcommittee of the athletic governing board which was seeking a solution to the annual problem of seating at basketball games.

The subcommittee's unanimous recommendation was that a small charge be made for basketball seating coupon booklets. Chancellor Tolley accepted the recommendation only on the condition that it was acceptable to the student body. The subcommittee assured that it was, but it was agreed that the recommendation would be subject to confirmation by student members of the athletic governing board whose terms were to begin in late spring, 1968."

The specific question of the recommendation did not appear on the agenda for the two fall meetings of the board, which includes student representatives and representatives of the Athletic Department.

When asked why the proposal never came up to the new governing board, Hicks said "that's where the basic conflict is. I assumed that because we didn't bring it up that the new policy was in effect."

He said the announcement of the fee last week came as a surprise. "I knew I was supposed to approve it, and had no idea that they were going through with it. I first heard it over the radio."

CSL hang-ups . . .

Hendricks Chapel Dean John McCombe.

This power was somewhat more explicitly delegated by the council's charter, which states:

"The Council on Student Life is established by the chancellor on the recommendation of the Board of Trustees. The council shall determine, within the policy limits set by the board of trustees, the regulations and procedures governing student activities and social life. The council may recommend modifications of policy in the student activities and social life area to the Board of Trustees through the Chancellor...."

A more precise definition was avoided for the sake of "flexibility," the students said, "but now it's gotten to the point where the personnel deans and even the personnel deans' staffs can veto the council."

A case in point, said the students, was the visitation hours experiment, which the students proposed to the council on a campus-wide basis. But, they said, the Dean of Women's staff, under what Miss Edwards called the "archaic" assumption that it must "propagate the roll of women at SU," arbitrarily cut the experiment to 25 percent of the students and eliminated freshmen. The students said they don't object to the Dean of Women's disagreement on visitation hours, but that the matter should have been resolved by the council, not by the Dean of Women's staff.

"Students were under the opinion that our decisions would be basically final," said SG President Hicks, "but now it seems the CSL can't make decisions. So we decided we're wasting our time playing these games."

The next move, said the students, is up to the administration "to make an honest statement as to where the council stands." Dean of Men Tatham agreed yesterday that there is "a need for greater structuring and definition, purpose and authority of the council, but no one assumed at the outset it would be a perfect instrument."

The council, he said, "is going about its work in the wrong way" by attempting to directly involve itself in investigations, then trying to evaluate the findings in a "detached manner."

He added that "I don't think it desirable that the council or any of its committees strong-arm anyone. There was serious concern, for example, in the Dean of Women's office regarding visiting hours for freshmen women. No matter how serious disagreement over the proposal was, the Dean of Women is still responsible for freshmen women."

According to Tatham, "The council's routine business will continue. If the students don't appear at the next meeting, there won't be a quorum...I think that what they say is that no new business will be initiated."

But, said Chuck Hicks, "I think CSL is dead."

Think selfishly about your own career before you decide on one with Du Pont.

Be selfish. But be honest. You've put in a lot of tough years to get your degree. Your allegiance lies with a professional discipline.

Why, then, must you decide now to plight your trust to a company for life? Don't. Join a company first. If it doesn't advance you within that professional discipline, well, you're not married to it.

Many have found career enrichment at Du Pont. This comes from being handed a ball and being expected to run with it. From working with top people, from growing in a company where the opportunities are always wide open and the projects are often way out.

Many have found professional fulfillment and have built a very full, varied and happy life as "Du Ponters."

Others have found, after working at Du Pont, that their professional interest lay in teaching, in further study or in an industry that offered even wider scope in their particular discipline. All of these men left Du Pont far better qualified professionally than when they came.

So talk to the Du Pont recruiter. If he offers you something, think of it as a professional challenge, not a proposal of marriage.

AWS to be evaluated

Floor and house presidents will get a chance to voice their opinions on the function and purpose of the Association of Women Students (AWS) Wednesday night when the assembly will try something different and break up into discussion groups.

Most assembly meetings consist of the dissemination of information and little dialogue between the presidents and AWS exec. At this meeting, each president will go to the appropriate group (large dorm, medium-sized dorm, cottage or sorority) and evaluate AWS on the basis of what it does for that type of living center.

From the discussion, AWS hopes to get some insights on what, if any, reforms are needed in its structure.

Hearings call for more attention to elderly

Goodell's questions

Answering and commenting on the testimony given by each witness, Senator Goodell questioned Hildebrandt on the housing decrease. To the question of a housing slow-down over the past eight years, Hildebrandt admitted that a decrease in substandard housing was not a solution to the problem because it was simply forcing more people into fewer housing units.

"I think there have been conversions of substandard units accomodating a certain number of people--legal conversions or otherwise," said Hildebrandt.

Representatives of the Family Service Center, an agency instrumental in the Model Neighborhood of Syracuse, presented testimony as a panel, discussing such problems as jobs for the aged, transportation, and youth involvement. The Center operates as an adjutant to the SU School of Social Work.

Speaking on the panel was Bruce Thompson, a graduate student social worker. Suggestions were made by him and Mae Cora Wright, a program worker, that efforts be made to keep the elderly active and participating in their own programs; to insure transportation to the aged; to promote youth involvement with the elderly of the community; to staff more efficiently the Family Service Center.

A second panel was composed of Jacob C. Lattif, with the Syracuse Housing Authority, John Frantz, from the Metropolitan Development Association of Syracuse and William D. Johnson, representing Community Chest.

Increased funds

Latiff stressed the need for increased funding of housing projects while Johnson proposed that public housing be used to accommodate the needs of the elderly.

John Frantz, in an eloquent statement which was praised highly by Sen. Moss, delivered a few piercing stabs to the proposed budget for the project. Syracuse had applied for $180,000 and received only $166,000 which he said was insufficient.

Frantz also mentioned the habitual alienation of the aged as a major problem to any program for the improvement of present conditions.

"This American distaste for old age is a sociological phenomena at least as significant as racial discrimination."

Sen. Moss lauded Frantz's statements as the "sort of criticism we want on record to act upon in planning such programs."

Transportation problem

Transportation, a problem discussed by each of the three panels, again came up with the discussion of physical and mental health needs of the aged.

The Reverend Charles J. Fahey discussed the limited funds of the elderly, as well as other considerations in serving them.

Dr. William Beattie, in giving a report of the Syracuse Social Service efforts, touched on some of the subjects mentioned by the panel representing the Family Service Center as well as the concerns of the School of Social Work and its projects and operations.

Senator Moss said the information given, together with the suggestions offered, would be of "great help" in developing the Model Cities Program and providing for the needs and interests of the aged in areas such as Syracuse.

Grad students set meeting to air representativeness

The Graduate Student Organization (GSO) of Syracuse University will conduct its regular Senate meeting tomorrow night at 7:45 in Maxwell Auditorium.

GSO, formed this year, is made up of 63 elected Senators. Fifty-four of these represent degree-granting programs within the areas of the humanities, the social sciences, sciences, engineering and the professions, with nine Senators-at-large currently representing special interest groups on the graduate level. (At-large delegates are elected by the Senate upon presentation of a petition, signed by 50 graduate students outside of the prospective delegate's program, and after a statement by the prospective delegate as to why he believes his interset group deserves representation.)

Representativeness is a key word in the organizational philosophy of GSO. Through its system of departmental representation, and its provision for the seating of at-large delegates, the Organization seeks to represent the graduate student on all levels.

To date, the Organization has been officially recognized by the Graduate Deans and the Board of Graduate Studies.

Professor Theodore Denise of the Department of Philosophy and chairman of the Board's special committee for official recognition of GSO, will present a report to the Senate at the meeting on the Board's reaction to his report concerning the Organization.

Also on the agenda is a report from GSO's Senate Committee on Assistantships and Fellowships by Committee chairmen Henry Anna. This Committee has been working on the problem of securing Regents awards for graduate students next year. These awards, withheld and then reinstated at the beginning of this year, are to be suspended next year.

The meeting, at 7:45 p.m. in Maxwell Auditorium, is open to all graduate students.

Expert advice

Ski tips to be given here

By LEIGH KALNA

(Editor's Note: Leigh Kalna is president of SUSKI)

The weather around Syracuse this winter is starting to get people psyched about skiing and, there is still time for the novice skier to prepare for the coming season. Before going on the slopes for the first time, some preliminary steps must be taken. Jack Charles of Joe Charles and Sons Ski Shop, Fairmount Fair, will be here tonight to give some expert advice. Following his talk there will be a ski swap for used equipment.

The starting point for skiing is the equipment. It must be stressed that safety is more important than an economical purchase. Skiing demands equipment properly adapted to each skier's needs.

The first piece of equipment to consider is the boot. It should be of a good quality and most important, it should fit. After the boot is laced or buckled, the foot should feel secure. A boot that fits properly will prevent a substantial number of injuries, frostbite and fatigue and enhance a skier's ability. Don't be afraid to put a few dollars into the boot.

A second item of importance is the binding. In selecting a binding, stay away from convenience and cost factors; the only consideration should be safety. The key is the binding's ability to release on various types of falls. A good release binding will prevent injuries.

Almost last on the list is the ski. The quality of a ski for a novice is not important. The average beginner will seldom tax the limits on the cheapest skiis. Until a novice advances to the intermediate stages, inexpensive skiis are sufficient, unless he is unusually heavy. Almost any ski pole will do for beginners.

More critical than skiis is the mounting of the binding. Improperly mounted bindings cause as many injuries as unsafe bindings and poorly fitted boots.

Another item of importance is the safety strap--probably the least expensive piece of equipment, but necessary. Most ski areas insist that everybody use them to prevent skiis from escaping. A loose ski coming down a hill is very dangerous to people below.

Vacation buses

The Association of Graduate Business Students is sponsoring round-trip holiday bus service to New York, Boston and Philadelphia. At least one bus will operate between Syracuse and each of the three cities.

Buses are scheduled to leave the Syracuse University campus at 1:30 p.m. Dec. 20 and return Jan. 5.

Round trip tickets are priced at $18 (New York), $20 (Philadelphia) and $22 (Boston). The cutoff date for reservations is noon of Dec. 16.

Interested students are asked to contact Tony Watt, president of the Association of Graduate Business Students, at 446-5172; Dane Hahn, 472-6874; or the Association Office, third floor of Lubin Hall, extension 2962.

Watt said, "This is not a money-making proposition but rather an attempt by the Association to provide low-cost transportation to Syracuse University students."

3 cottages named for closure

Jewell, Berwald and Tilden cottages have joined the ranks of women's cottages that will close at the end of the semester, according to Jean Crawford, director of women's residence.

French, Root, Wilson, and Genesee on S. Crouse Ave. and Smalley and Heffron on Walnut Place head the list of cottages to be closed. The nine cottages account for 172 spaces, although there are vacancies in them.

Miss Crawford is not sure how many cottages in all will be closed, depending on the number of vacancies in dormitories at the end of the semester. "We will go as far as nine, if not farther," she said.

All of the residents have been notified, and Miss Crawford will visit each one to explain room selection for next semester.

Some men's cottages will be closed and more are to be added to the list, but John W. Rade, director of men's residence, could not be reached regarding this matter.

Controversial "Virginia Woolf" to be starred by 3 SU students

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

When the Syracuse Little Theatre production of Edward Albee's controversial drama, "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" plays at the Regent Theatre Dec. 13 and 14, three Syracuse University students will comprise the cast of four. The students are Rona Lee, Howard Roller, and Jenny Maybruck.

Rone Lee, who last June received a B.S. degree from the University Drama Department, is engaged in graduate studies toward a Masters Degree in speech and is currently an instructor in the department of Oral Interpretation. As an undergraduate she was President of the Boar's Head Dramatic Society, was named Outstanding Student in the School of Speech, was a member of The Senior Women's Honorary, the Professional Speech Fraternity, and was named to Who's Who in American Colleges and Universities. She has appeared in the Drama Department Productions of "Arms and the Man," "The Feiffer Revue," "As You Like It," "Blood Wedding," "Snow White," and "The Private Ear." She also worked professionally with the Syracuse Repertory Theatre. Miss Lee will play Martha.

Howard Roller, a senior in the Drama Department, was seen this year as Falstaff in "The Merry Wives of Windsor," and as Creon in "Antigone." Previous roles include Hamm in "Endgame," Major Petkoff in "Arms and the Man," Kent in "King Lear," Duncan in "Macbeth," the father in "Blood Wedding," and the Priest in "Tiny Alice." Last season Roller was also seen as a working apprentice with the Syracuse Repertory Theatre. He will play opposite Miss Lee in "Virginia Woolf" as George.

Completing the trio of students is Jenny Maybruck who will play Honey. She is a junior in the Drama Department who has studied at the American Academy of Dramatic Arts and has appeared professionally with the Westport County Playhouse and the New York Shakespeare Festival. Miss Maybruck is familiar to Syracuse audiences for her roles in "Blood Wedding," "Pinocchio," "The Feiffer Revue," and "Macbeth."

The fourth member of the cast is Kent Crawley, a drama instructor at Onondaga Community College who will portray the part of Nick, Honey's husband.

The production, directed by Alan Reichel, will have an 8:30 p.m. curtain. Tickets are $2.50, $3.00, and $3.50 with a 50 percent discount price for University students.

Orange could not 'pass' to sixth win

By ED AGRANOWITZ

The 1968 season was a series of ups and downs for the football Orangemen, the latest in the latter category being Saturday's 30-12 debacle at Penn State.

The preseason line on Syracuse was great defense, questionable offense. The offense had the wrong answer to too many of the questions and the Orange slumped to 6-4 after back to back 8-2 campaigns.

The Orange turned in a strong performance in their opening 14-10 loss to Michigan State. They followed that heart-breaker with consecutive romps over Maryland, UCLA and Pittsburgh.

Then disaster struck. In the most significant game of the year, the Orange were humiliated, 43-0, by California. "It was never the same after the California game," said one player. "We just fell apart."

SU did come back to record consecutive victories over soft-touches Holy Cross, William and Mary and Navy, but when a fired-up West Virginia team took an early lead, it was all over. Then Penn State outclassed the Orange, and it gave coach Ben Schwartzwalder his worst won-lost season since the 5-5 1962 club.

The year wasn't a total loss, however. Underclassmen dominated the lineup, and the outlook for next year should be bright.

Several players also salvaged individual honors. Captain Tony Kyasky and Art Thoms, touted pre-season as All-American material, were both named to the second team by the two wire services, and to the All East team.

Lou Gubitosa, at defensive end, and safety Cliff Ensley both received All-American honorable mention, with Gub making first team All-East and the Gipper second team. In addition, Ensley captured two AP Eastern Defensive Back of the Week titles. Honorable Mention All-East recognition went to Jerry Beach, Ray White, and John Massis, who set a single season receiving mark.

One problem that plagued the Orange this year was the inability to play catchup football. "It was really a frustrating season," said Al Newton, the team's leading rusher. "Once we fell behind, we couldn't get moving."

This weakness was exemplified against Penn State, when the Orange were forced to surrender the ball 12 times on punts. Puzzling is the Orange's failure to throw a pass in the third quarter, when they were struggling to get back into the 24-0 game.

"We tried to throw early and we were ineffective," Schwartzwalder told reporters after the game. "And why pass when you don't have field position?"

Why not roll over and play dead while you're at it? The Orange fought hard and even rolled up a few first downs against Penn State's rugged defense. But Ben refused to throw, and Syracuse helped the Lions kill the clock.

Ben's past philosophy on passing has been "When you throw a pass three things can happen, and two of them are bad (interception, incompletion)." But when it is apparent to the opposition that you are going to run, run, run, there are four things that can happen, and three of them are bad (no gain, fumble, clipping or holding penalty.)

Well, maybe next year.

Ups and downs

By MIKE GREENSTEIN

The Athletic Department's plan to charge for basketball games, which has already been altered, may have been unfair in action, but it was right in principle.

Last year students flocked down to the Field House for the first few games of the year, setting an attendance record in the home opener against George Washington. Because of this, outside sales for remaining games were cut off.

In typical fashion, however, the students gave up on the team after the big post-Christmas slump. The general admission section became over half empty, and games became the equivalent of ants crawling on the floor of the Grand Canyon.

Now students will be able to pick up free coupon books. Probably few of them will, since the team has lost its first two games. But if Chuck Hicks and his cronies miss this last chance to show their strength, they don't deserve another.

It was a long season for the Orange football team, in more ways than one. At the same time, it was a fairly predictable year.

Coach Ben Schwartzwalder warned in September that 1968 would be a year for rebuilding, and the roster backed up his claim. Only one senior was listed in the starting offensive lineup, only five on defense. Sophomores were starting in too many places, and sophomores are prone to making mistakes.

Then the narrow opening loss to Michigan State and the convincing wins over UCLA and Pitt thrust the young Orange briefly into the Top Ten. But State finished with only five wins, while UCLA had three and Pitt could manage only one.

Schwartzwalder, quite correctly, never grew enthusiastic about his personnel. Against teams like Holy Cross and William and Mary the mistakes may not show, but against California and Penn State they become fatal. When the Orange lost, it was because of basically sloppy football: fumbles, interceptions, missed blocks and tackles, penalties and mental failures.

But since the errors are so basic, they can be corrected through experience, which the sophomores got plenty of in the latter stages of the season. Next year at this time, Penn State might be crating up the Lambert Trophy and sending it back to the Hill.

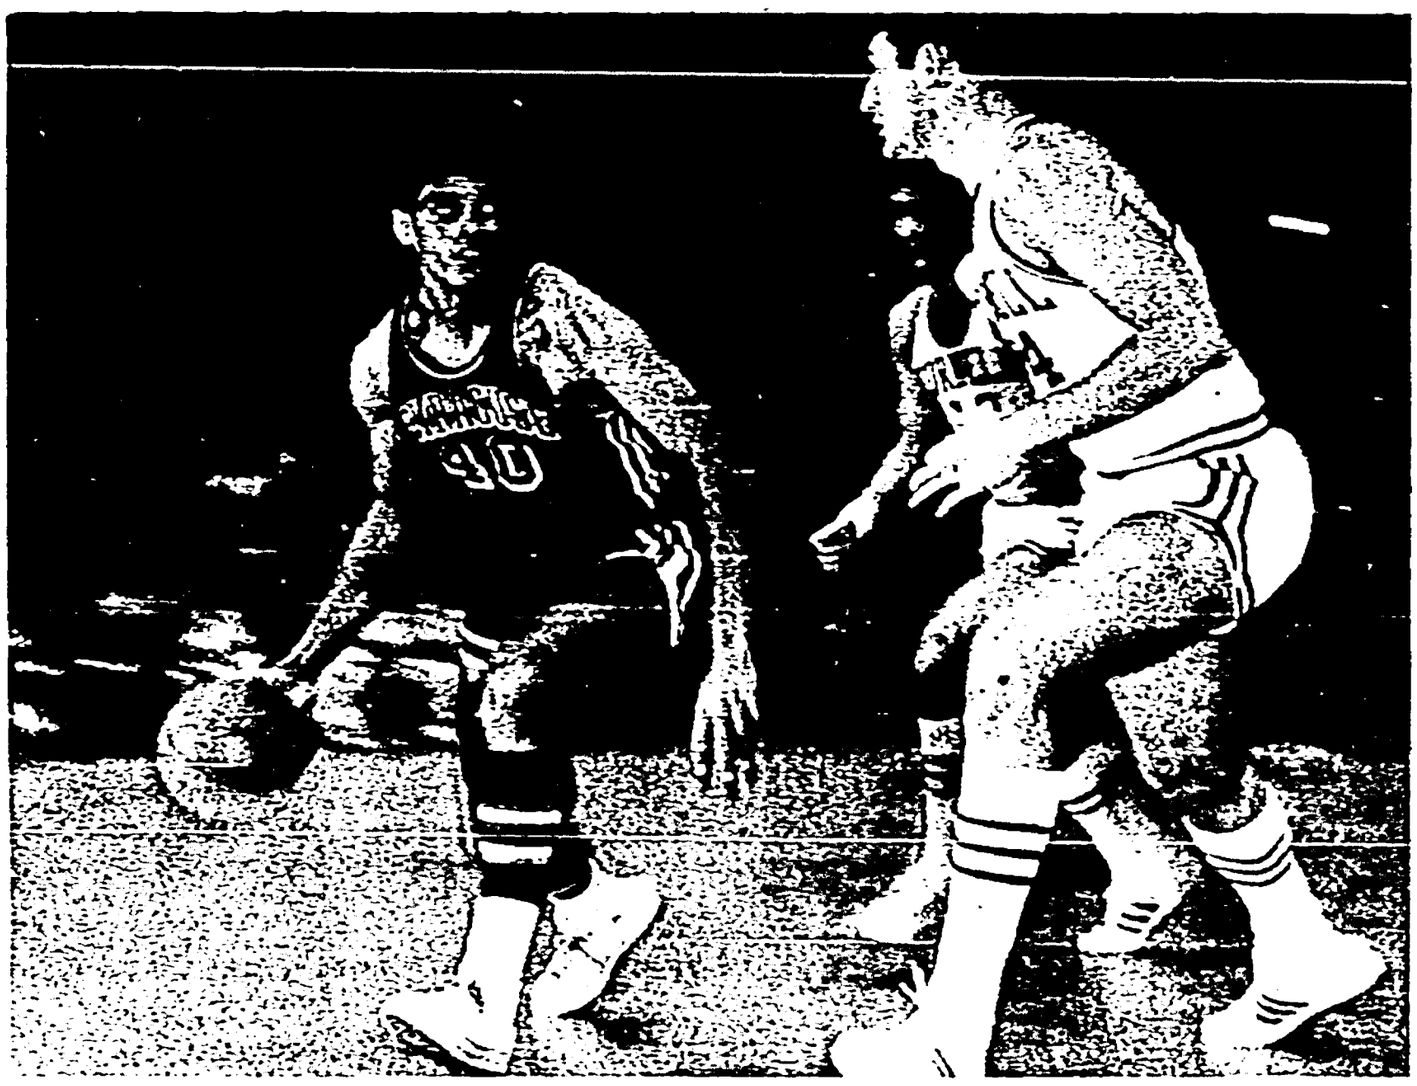
While the football season was hardly an artistic success, financially it was very profitable.

The Orange began way back on Sept. 14 in the blistering heat of East Lansing, while people in Syracuse sat back in their air conditioned living rooms, sipped gin and tonics, and watched on TV. They finished last Saturday in the Arctic bursts of University Park, while people in Syracuse sat back in their heated living rooms, sipped hot rum grog and watched on TV. The result was two losses and nearly $300,000 in television money.

The Penn State games was originally scheduled, as always, for the middle of October, but the American Broadcasting Company's tinkling overtones made fine fiscal sense to both schools. ABC, however, tried to be coy about the whole thing.



"Television can't be blamed for everything," an ABC release said. "The main reason that the SU—Penn State game is now scheduled for Dec. 7 instead of Oct. 19 is that Sue Paterno, wife of Joe Paterno, is going to have a baby sometime in October, and she doesn't want to miss it."

If the date was changed because of a pregnancy, one might conclude that, for Syracuse fans, the result was an abortion.

Four new names appear on the 1969 football schedule. The opener next year is against Iowa State, usually a doormat in the Big Eight, but a team that improved considerably this year. Wisconsin, winless in the Big Ten, will entertain the Orange next year in Madison. Arizona, another new face, featuring the wide open game of the Western Athletic Conference, visits Archbold on Nov. 8.

The final newcomer, Kansas, is a team to be reckoned with. Big Eight champions and nationally ranked, they will pit their wide open offense against Penn State in the Orange Bowl on New Year's night. The game will give SU fans a chance to assess the capabilities of two of next year's sterner opponents. The way it now appears, Penn State's crippling defense and balanced attack will stop both Kansas and criticism of Eastern football in the Orange.

Swimmers, wrestlers win but Murphy shoots SU dead

Competition in basketball, wrestling, and swimming for Syracuse this weekend resulted in two wins and one loss.

The loss was in basketball, to Niagara's Purple Eagles and Magnificent Calvin Murphy, by a 118-110 score. Murphy, the 5-10 All-American guard, tallied a personal career high total of 68 points.

Mr. Calvin Murphy (ballplayers of Calvin's caliber earn the title "Mister," like "Mister Robertson") was phenomenal, hitting 24 of 46 field goal attempts, and 20 of 23 from the free-throw line. In the first half, he scored his 1000th varsity point, and was presented the basketball for this honor. Murphy then put the ball away, and threw in another 44 points on the road to 2,000. Orange coach Roy Danforth described Calvin: "He's like good wine. He gets better with age."

The brightest part of the evening for Syracuse was the performance of 6-11 sophomore pivotman Bill Smith. Almost overlooked due to Murphy's heroics was Smith's 41 point effort. "He was phenomenal, both offensively and defensively," Danforth pointed out.

Syracuse was never really out of the ball game. Their shooting had professional credentials: 64 per cent from the field, 85 per cent from the line. However, they were hurt badly by 31 turnovers, which was partially due to Niagara's effective full-court press.

Danforth was very unhappy with the team's rebounding and turnovers. The turnovers resulted in 44 Niagara points, and the Orange were out-rebounded 58 to 44.

On the brighter side, the rejeuvenated Syracuse wrestling team tied for the team title in the tough Coast Guard Tourney.

The grapplers shared the crown with Northern Illinois University, beating out such outstanding wrestling schools as Lockhaven and East Stroudsburg.

Individual titles were won by sophomores Vinnie Paolano, at 177, and Woody Barry at 160. Junior Steve Parker also took a first at 167, while senior Eric Greenberg took second at 145.

However, Coach Ed Carlin paid dearly for his share of the crown. He lost John Terboss (torn ligaments) and Richie Haagen (separated shoulder) for the entire season. Also, Ralph Mannaker (pulled back muscles) will be out until after Christmas vacation.

Meanwhile, at Buffalo, the Syracuse swimmers were trouncing Buffalo 71-33. It was the first meet for the swimmers.

Particularly outstanding were Pete Schacht and Tom Skuce, who got university records in the meet. Schacht swam the 1000 yard freestyle in 11:50.4, and diver Skuce amassed a point total of 264.45, for the new records.

SU won 11 of the 12 events, Buffalo capturing only the 400 freestyle relay. Winners include Chip Thiele (200 individual medley), Chuck Lanphear (200 butterfly), who also teamed with Dave Crockenberg and Rob Sinnott to win the 400 medley relay. More winners are Jim Stein (200 freestyle), Ross Possner (50 freestyle), Larry Shulman (100 freestyle), Fred Mapes (200 backstroke), Marv Schwartz (500 freestyle), and Al Comly (200 breaststroke).

The freshman swimmers also triumphed, 60-42.

The plight of Biafrans will be discussed during a teach-in Monday evening. Sponsored by the Syracuse Biafran Relief Committee, the teach-in will feature The Rev. Peter Hughes, a missionary who spent several years in Nigeria. (Photos from the Office of Information, Catholic Relief Services.)

Priest discusses Biafran crisis

The Rev. Peter Hughes, a missionary of the Holy Ghost Church of Ireland, will discuss the Biafran conflict at a teach-in Monday at 8 p.m. in Syracuse University's Hendricks Chapel.

"The purpose of the teach-in will be to inform Syracusans about what is happening in Biafra and to raise money for Father Hughes," said Stevie Street, a freshman in the School of Art and a member of the Syracuse Biafran Relief Committee, the sponsor of the teach-in. The conflict broke out in May 1967 when Biafra, formerly the Eastern Region of Nigeria, declared its independence from Nigeria.

Hughes, who spent five years in the former Eastern Region, is raising money to send medical teams and seedlings to the war-torn African country. "By sending seedlings he hopes to help the Biafrans permanently replenish their food supply," Miss Street said.

On Sunday Hughes will speak at St. Andrew the Apostle Roman Catholic Chruch, 124 Alden Ave., Syracuse. Monday afternoon he will visit local high schools, asking for their financial support.

The Syracuse Biafran Relief Committee was started in October by Patricia Berry, a sophomore in the College of Liberal Arts. Miss Berry is also co-chairman of the International Student Guides, the orientation committee for new foreign students at the University. "I started the Relief Committee because I thought it was about time that people began to realize the desperate situation that is occurring in Biafra," she said.

Also speaking at the teach-in will be Emmanuel Anise, a doctoral candidate in political science, president of the International Student Organization and a resident of the Western Region of Nigeria; Frederick Morton, a graduate student in history and a former Peace Corps volunteer in Biafra, Julian Friedman, associate professor of political science at the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs; and Josiah Osuagwu, a doctoral candidate in education and a resident of Biafra.

The teach-in is open to the public without charge.

Roff suggests change; new election commission

By MARGARET ALLAN

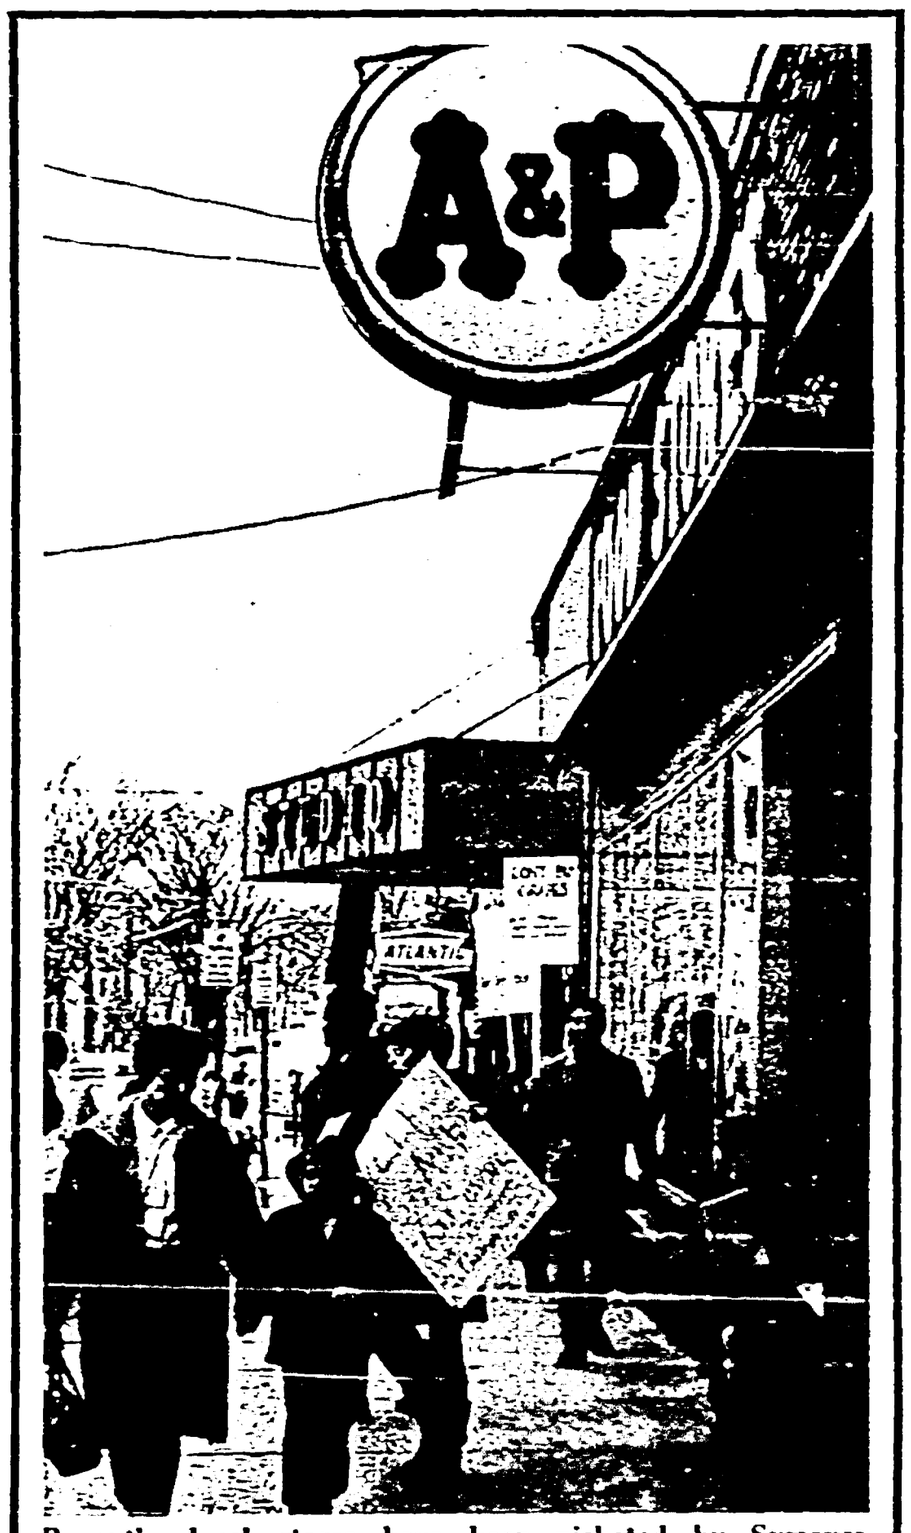
John Roff, Government Structures Committee chairman, last night presented recommendations concerning elections procedures to a gathering of Senate Committee on Political Equity (SCOPE) members.

"I think the elections commission should be scrapped as it is now," Roff advised. He continued to advocate the establishment of a credentials commission to review potential officers. The commission would be elected by a two-thirds vote of Student Senate, and it would automatically become an elections commission at the appropriate time. Those present at the meeting debated whether the appropriate time was spring or fall.

During elections, each political party would be permitted to send a designated number of members to meet and vote with Roff's proposed election commission.

In discussing requirements for nomination, Roff stressed that the candidate should not be on probation of any kind, and that he should present a petition containing 25 signatures.

Senate Speaker Ed Feldman, commenting on proposed articles for the new constitution, indicated that "specific shouldn't be included" in the constitution because "a constitution lasts."



Feldman stated that the specifics should be left to the powers of legislation, thus leaving the constitution flexible.

According to Feldman, the revised constitutions recently submitted by the two campus parties, CAP and GIA, are of little use.

The new CAP constitution provides for a district system which functions through caucuses, and the GIA revisal established a system of direct voting. Both constitutions are intended to undermine the power of the Greek system in elections by basing party membership on individual students.

Feldmen observed that individuals could be manipulated by Greek houses during elections regardless of the new constitutions submitted by both parties. He blamed this on the unwillingness of the "average independent schmo" to be involved in campus elections,

Cottages

Girls react to closings

Although they're unhappy, girls living in cottages that are closing are generally resigned to moving out at the end of the semester.

Residents of Heffron, Smalley and French cottages at the end of Walnut Place realized that their cottages would be closed when construction plans for the library were announced. Many of the cottages affected are upperclass cottages and residents expected them to be closed.

A resident of Root said philosophically: "They were very fair about notifying us. If it had been at the middle of the semester, it would have been different."

Calling the move "understandable," and "more expedient and economical for the university," most of the girls accept the closings and are considering other places to live.

"However, the Mount is unappealing," a resident of Genesee pointed out.

Those girls living in cottages along College Place haven't been notified whether their houses will definitely be closed. Many of them feel that the uncertainty is almost as bad as being told they have to move.

Barbara Gurman, president of Jewel, said its residents - all freshmen - will find out Thursday night if it is being closed. "We're not sure of anything, but we're very upset," she added.

A similar reaction came from Berwald, another all-freshman cottage on College Place. According to Rea Eidenbaum, they have become a closely knit group and want to stay together.

"We're at the bottom of the list," she said, "but we're all disturbed about what might happen."

Residents of Tilden, an upperclass cottage on College Place, "don't like indecision" and want to be told if they're going to be closed.

"I resent being moved," a junior stated. "I chose to live with my

Police arrest non-student on charges of selling LSD

A 20-year old non-student was arrested yesterday in Grover Cleveland dormitory on charges of selling LSD.

A warrant for the arrest of Michael McDonald had been out since Sept. 28 for the felony. Police received a tip that McDonald was in Grover Cleveland and made the arrest at 4 p.m.

According to officials, McDonald had speed and marijuana in his possession at the time of the arrest. Two other non-students were in the room at the time and they were apparently living there.

Marijuana was also found in the room and police assume it belonged to students.

An investigation is pending and the information will be brought before the Grand Jury which meets in January.

Beyond the final answer

"We want a final straight answer on just where everybody stands within the scheme of the university and we want this final answer to be final."

Thus wrote Ed Feldman in the protest of the students on the Council on Student Life printed on this page. The students undoubtably deserve some explanations and clarifications from the administration. Yet they should be warned that the final answer may not be final.

In addition to being a protest against double talking and perhaps some double dealing, the statement is also a protest against the bewildering nature and complexity of a modern university. Cardinal Newman would roll over in his grave with amazement at the demand that the final answer be final. It took him 464 pages of small type just to explain "The Idea of a University." Jacques Barzun would likewise scratch his head in amazement. It took him a mere 287 pages to describe where the American university is today and where it might be tomorrow.

The complexity, especially in the decision-making process, is due in part of the nature of the university. While it is hardly an Ivory Tower rule by reason, the weight of reason at a university is greater than elsewhere. Decisions are not always made arbitrarily. Committees are appointed by the magic formula of student, faculty and administrator. Studies are made, experiments conducted, results debated and recommendations proposed.

Reason may not rule this process, but it does draw upon many kinds of expertise and consults those directly involved, groping for a rational decision. And in a process it is difficult to pinpoint when the scales of decisions began tipping towards negative or positive.

Not only is the nature of the university bewildering, its organization is complex. The charter of the Council on Student Life states it may regulate student life within the limits set by the Board of Trustees. The Council may decide visiting hours are an aspect of student life it may regulate. The Dean of Women, on the other hand, may consider visiting hours for freshman women a violation of policy set down by the Board of Trustees. The result is the Dean of Women, perhaps with good reason, modifying a decision for the Council.

It would seem such differences could be worked out at Council meetings-the Dean of Women sits on Council.

At the same time it should be remembered that SU is undergoing an administrative reorganization, further confusing where authority lies. Unraveling all the delegation of authority from the chairman of the Board of Trustees to the lowliest resident advisor is nearly impossible. In addition, the Chancellor is close to the plan and may not wish to approve long-term policies that would bind his successor. So the final answer of where everyone stands may not be final.

Letters to the editor

Incense burning

To the Editor:

Recently some of us, the residents of Vincent Apartments, had the pleasure of being introduced to the Assistant manager of the apartments through a dittoed notice posted on the main entrance of our unit. Beside the welcome introduction, there was an interesting comment on the policy of the university which very neatly mentioned the fact that incense burning was prohibited because of its "offensive" smell and it being a "fire hazard."

I can't help but chuckle and shake my head at two of the most ridiculous reasons I have so far heard about the burning of incense. To some of "us" the burning of incense is one way of making the apartment feel like a home away from home. On the other hand, to some of "you" it might be a way of deodorising an offensive and prohibited smell and action. Whatever the individual reasons, one thing is more than clear, that a notice like that steps on individual freedom and moreover exhibits a lack of tolerance for individual differences. I fail to understand why the authorities do not prohibit the smoking of cigarettes which definately have an offensive smell and are a fire hazard. Is it because they smoke them? I wonder.....

Name Withheld

Visiting hours

To the Editor:

I find the administration position on visiting hours somewhat absurd. The idea of an experiment with only a few of the living centers, the percentage does not matter, is a terrifying piece of reasoning.

1. The administration may assume that 25% of the student population will give an accurate picture of the entire population within the dormitory system. This seems to follow from a consistent position; specifically, all students may be impersonally lumped into a few stereotypes, or perhaps only one. This hardly seems a suitable way to deal with people; the percentage is irrelevant with this kind of an attitude.

2. As Cindy Bailey indicated in Tuesday's edition, great attention was paid to the presentation of each dorm. This would indicate a more acceptable attitude respecting the individuality of each dorm and its constituent members. Hindered by the restriction to 25% of the student population, this recognition of individuality must be ignored in a move inconsistent with principle. All dorms, as circumstantially distinct situations, deserve to be tested on their own performance, not that of their fellow students. In forcing this treatment of a test of responsibility, the administration is cheating.

Somewhere in this absurd jungle of administrative reasoning, a gross inequity is being perpetrated on the population within the dorm system. I have always expected to take my own tests; I hope I do not understand why I am now being denied the privilege.

Michael A. Allen

Part two—a sense of frustration

CSL demands

Editor's Note: The following is the second and final part of a statement written by Edward Feldman with the following members of the Council on Student Life: Cindy Bailey, K. Christopher Mudd, Jerry Tatarian, C. Joey Edwardh and Charles Hicks.

We are told that our attendance is a privilege and not a right, but we do now demand our rights. We demand the right to be treated as we are-mature individuals. (I, myself, am 21. I can drink alcohol in any state in the union-but not Syracuse University. I can live, eat and associate where I want, with whom I want, when I want in New York State, but not Syracuse. I can vote on who will govern me and base this vote on policy, but I have virtually no say in the policy of Syracuse University.) We demand the right to have our say, and to be listened to. We ask that the administration get off their collective butts and intiate some social changes without the students having to push for them years on end. We ask that the administration show how much they are really interested in our development by helping us develop our own government and organizations by giving us the benefit of their experience, or do they want us to continue to make the same mistakes and remain ineffectual?

Thus, we ask what we are doing here; and right now the only answer we come up with is: being manipulated, being used, being lied to, and wasting our time. We are sitting here knowing full well that when we have to go back to our constituencies we must face the humiliation of having failed them, a humiliation which is only surpassed by the humiliation we ourselves feel for having let this go on for so long. We look at Columbia and Berkley and now realize why. We loot at Watts, Detroit, and Newark and can now understand how individuals can become so frustrated with attempts to improve their position within a system that they feel the only solution is to destroy the system before it destroys you. We sit here realizing that the only thanks we may get is the knowledge that we were not here just to get good recommendations for grad school, but knowing that nothing was accomplished and that we should not expect thanks, for there is nothing to be thanked for. We are sitting around a table in a supposed-powerful council. Yet, this power is not and has never been defined. Attempts to do so are either thwarted or delegated to the next meeting. All we have to show is our conclusion that the power of the council changes when the administration wishes it.

What do we want? We want the start of an honest dialogue. We want a true statement of the power of the council. We want an end to the stalling and manipulation, an end to the intellectual dishonesty that permits our being frustrated and thwarted "f[illegible]." We want a final straight answer on just where everybody stands within the scheme of this university and we want this final answer to be final. We just want the respect due us as students, student leaders, and has human beings. We want to be able to live rather than exist at Syracuse University.

roommate and some friends. I like the location and am very unhappy about the whole thing."

"We've been speaking to Dean Crawford and our parents are writing letters protesting the situation," she continued, "but we can't make any more definite plans until we find out what's happening."

Another junior who dislikes "the smothering babysitting atmosphere of a large dorm" is "very opposed" to the closing. She "could see reasons for closing the cottage if it were in need of repairs, but it isn't and the girls have made many improvements in the interior."

Many of the girls in Tilden might demand apartments if the cottage is closed. Kathy Kern, vice president, said its residents are a "working unit with the girls showing a quiet, deep loyalty to the cottage."

Tilden's president, Carolyn Blenmke, reflected the feelings of many of the girls. "We don't want to be closed, but when you sign up for a cottage, you take it on the hope it won't be."

'Maelstrom' to flood campus early next year

An idea for an SU literary magazine called "Maelstrom"— a whirlpool or irresistable force — won the approval of the Board of Publications yesterday.

The proposal was made by Don Bredes, a senior creative writing major and former managing editor of the Daily Orange from Huntington, Long Island.

Bredes said he expected the new magazine to be composed of about 85 per cent short stories, poetry, art work, and photography with the remainder creative commentary — book reviews, editorial and non-fiction comment.

"We want to give to this campus' literary talent a stimulating, recognizably consistent magazine....We propose to give Syracuse University a new literary magazine with a new sophistication, a new look and a new name," said Bredes' proposal to the Board.

He hopes to put the first issue on sale during registration or the first week of classes. "We're hoping for three issues next semester — definitely two."

The exact appropriation from the University to "Maelstrom" is still uncertain, pending the return of the Board's permanent chairman, Dean of Student Services, Jim G. Carleton. The figure was placed at $2,000 at yesterday's meeting.

Editor of the Promethan, Bruce Chadwick, proposed that the Board of Publications approve integrating literary material with his weekly publication. With a subsidation from the University, Chadwick said he would add five or six pages of literary material each week under a glossy cover and with color.

Bredes has the following staff members: Tom Ahearn, production manager; Louis Jacobs, business manager; Harvey Schwartz, executive editor, Ellen Kochanski, art director; and Stephani Sussner, manuscripts editor. "We're interested in as much freshman and sophomore help as possible — in art work, lay-out and creative writing," said Bredes.

"Our lay-out will be conservative, classic. We feel that good lay-out is invisible, leading the reader so smoothly through the copy that he doesn't realize he's following a plotted course. We don't need any wild effects because it tends to compete with content," said his proposal.

Marty denies flu epidemic

By RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

Holding fast to the tradition of a sheltered academic environment, Syracuse University has been by-passed by yet another of society's scourges.

Despite an increase in the use of Student Health Service facilities since Thanksgiving, its director, Dr. Frederick N. Marty, vigorously denies that there is an epidemic of Hong Kong flu on campus.

"Although there has been an increase in respiratory infection, typical for this time of year, it can not be called an epidemic," he said.

"An interesting thing that frequently happens is that after a holiday we have a greater number of patients," he continued. "This is due to exposure to bugs in a different environment." Despite the higher instance of illness at present, Dr. Marty feels there is no real danger of an influenza epidemic.

He further said that blood tests done in Syracuse hospitals have not revealed any of the Hong Kong flu that is presently widespread in some areas of the country.

Marty explained that symptoms of the flu include fever, chills and a terrific backache. "Very few of the students we have seen have anything like that," he said. "Practically all of them are better at the end of 48 hours."

The Hong Kong flu, when it hits a susceptible person, lasts "for at least four days. Very few cases we have seen have lasted so long," he added.

Explaining that the nature of the influenza virus changes over a period of years, Marty said that the Hong Kong flu was a variety of "what we called the Asian flu 10 years ago."

"No one yet has anything for these new strains," he said. "It is time consuming to make them, and the first available usually goes to the armed forces."

Marketing at IBM

"You help company presidents solve their information handling problems."

"It's a lot of responsibility. And if you need help, you always get it," says Earl Andrews. "Because your success is the company's success."

Earl earned his B.A. in Political Science in 1967. Today, he's a Marketing Representative with IBM, involved in the planning, selling and installation of data processing systems.

Earl joined IBM because he felt the career paths were very clearly marked. "You don't have to be a technical genius to fit the job. You get the training. Then on-the-job experience. Before you know it, you're out on your own."

Works with top management

Earl works mainly with small companies—distribution houses, manufacturers, printers, warehouses, electrical supply houses and similar organizations. "I deal with top management," he says. "It gives me a lot of satisfaction to realize that I'm trained to know what this president or that vice-president is trying to learn. I help him solve his information handling problems."

Earl's experience isn't unusual at IBM. There are many marketing and sales representatives who could tell you similar experiences. And they have many kinds of academic backgrounds: business, engineering, liberal arts, science.

They not only market data processing equipment as Earl does, but also IBM office products and information records systems. Many of the more technically inclined are data processing Systems Engineers.

Check with your placement office

If you're interested in marketing at IBM, ask your placement office for more information.

Or send a resume or letter to Paul Koslow, IBM Corporation, Dept. C, 425 Park Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022. We'd like to hear from you even if you're headed for graduate school or military service.

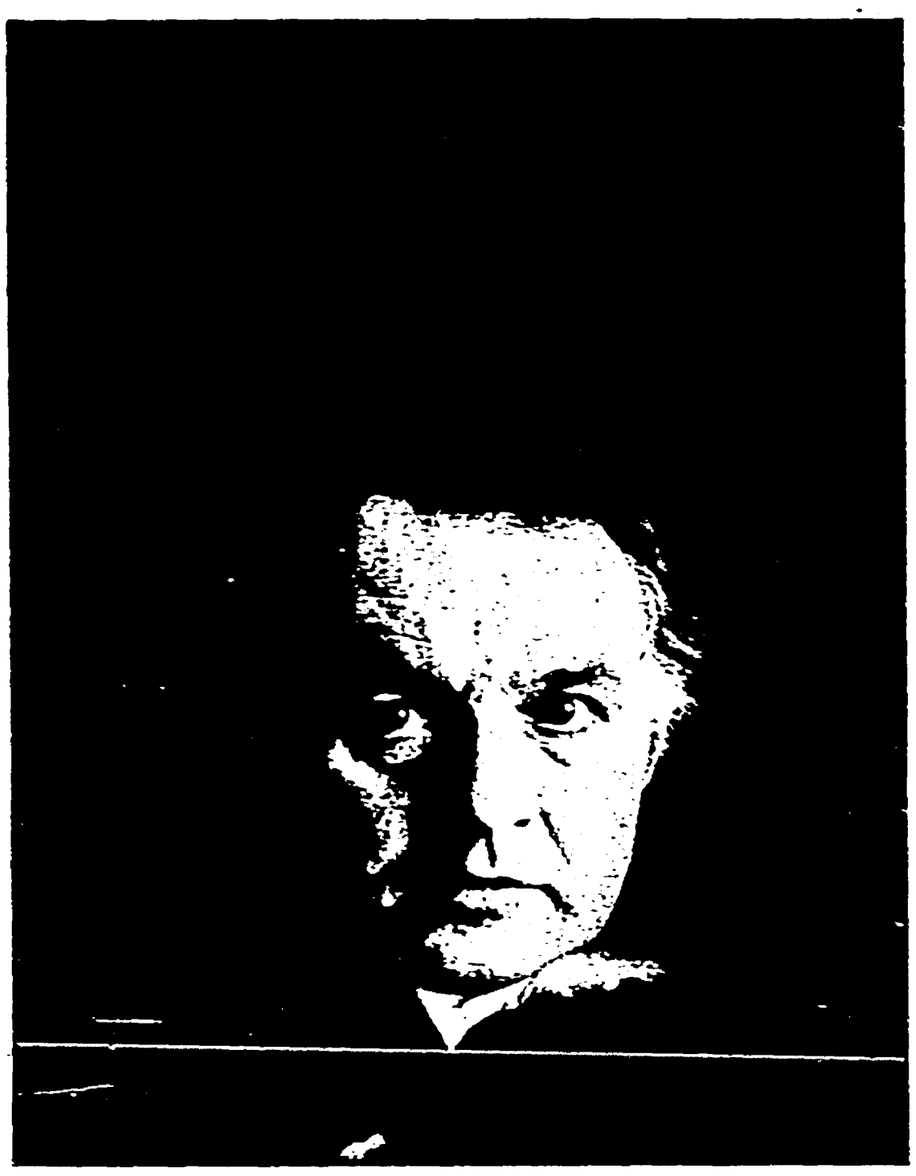
Film Forum plans visit by Steiger



Film star Rod Steiger will visit Syracuse University early in February during a week-long retrospective of his work, the Rev. Norman O. Keim, director of Film Forum, announced today. Steiger will be accompanied by his wife, actress Claire Bloom.

Keim said it is hoped the new Steiger film "The Illustrated Man," based on Ray Bradbury's book, can be shown during the retrospective tentatively scheduled for Feb. 2 through 8. This is the first movie in which Steiger and Miss Bloom appear together. There will be a different film each night, probably at Gifford Auditorium in H.B. Crouse Hall.

The films are still being selected but Keim said he would like them to include "The Pawnbroker," Steiger's own favorite; "Teresa," his first, made in 1951; "The Mark," the 1960 British film about a child molester in which Steiger plays a psychologist; "On the Waterfront." "The Loved One," described by Keim as "one of the biggest underrated films in recent years;" "In the Heat of the Night," for which Steiger received an Academy Award; "Al Capone" and "Dr. Zhivago."

Jason Squire, a Syracuse University senior majoring in television and radio, is coordinator for the Steiger retrospective. He made the contact with Steiger's representative in New York. He also arranged Henry Fonda's appearace on campus last spring. Members of his committee are Barbara Prinzivalli, a graduate student, and Marian Peck and Harold Sanderson, undergraduates.

Keim said Steiger and Miss Bloom probably will be on campus for parts of two days, Feb. 6 and 7. Steiger leaves Feb. 15 for a year abroad during which he will play Napolean in the de Laurentiis film "Waterloo."

Research Corp. to examine SU food

By BOB DAVIS

Did you ever wonder if the SU food you ate was fit for human consumption? Well, you are not alone. The S U Research Corporation is also trying to find out.

The S U Research Corporation is an independent research corporation, supported by industrial and private grants, and is run by the Board of Trustees of Syracuse University.

One of the divisions of the S U Research Corporation is the Life Science branch. This division conducts research in biology and is hired by Syracuse University to inspect its dining halls.

The Life Science division inspects the dining halls monthly. They will also make inspection tours if Dr. Fred Marty, the Director of Student Health Service, decides it is necessary.

Dr. Marty will call a special investigation if he finds, " an increased incidence of illness." An increase in the number of cases of diarrhea and vomiting will usually warrant an additional investigation. The S U Research Corporation looks for "organism, salmonella and e. coli staphylococci," according to Dr. Marty.

About four years ago, before the S U Research Corp. was hired, there was a mild outbreak of salmonella. The infection might have been caused by an unsanitary food handler. The food handler never came back, so it could not be definitely be proven.

The investigations are headed by Dr. Richard Russel, who is the Manager of Analytic Services, Lab Science Division of the S U Research Corp. Dr. Russel will conduct his next investigation on either "Thursday or Friday."

Dr. Russel inspects every dining facility on the Syracuse campus. He makes sure that Food Service follows the regulations of the United States Public Health Service Standards for restaurants.

Syracuse University hired the Research Corp. to make sure that its dining halls follow county and state regulations. The county officials accompany Dr. Russel when he investigates the dining halls.

Dr. Russel says the objective of his inspection is "to teach the people what they should do. The policing role is secondary."

Dr. Russel says that there have been "no gross violations of safety of sanitary standards." He says that the University has "some of the finest equipment, if not necessarily the finest people." Dr. Russel says that it is his job to "educate these people."

When Dr. Russel inspects the dining halls, he looks to see if the food handlers are wearing plastic gloves and hair nets. He checks to see that the refrigeration is adequate and that the hot plates are at least 150 degrees.

If Dr. Russel who says "the University is trying to do a good job," finds anything wrong, he makes reccomendations to solve the problem. Earlier this year some dishwashers were broken, and Dr. Russel recommended that they be fixed. They are now working properly.

Dr. Russel emphasizes that his inspections are "professional." He gives the same tests that any professionally trained sanitary engineer would give.

The biggest complaint that the student at Syracuse has concerns the taste of the food. Dr. Russel does not investigate these charges.

while noting that the Greeks are experienced and interested because of the desire to keep up the reputation of their houses.

Those present at the meeting pursued the issue of the value of a primary ballot. In advocating the electoral procedure, SCOPE chairman Fred Tuccillo noted that each student could "vote under a minimum of pressure."

Feldman, in maintaining that the system already existing is "the best and easiest for Syracuse as it is now," argued that the primary would splurge on "time, money and effort." He apparently felt that, until students become more involved in campus politics, a new system would not be necessary.

In discussing methods of interesting more students in campus elections, Feldman suggested that students be shown what SG has already accomplished.

"People don't care about the means, they care about the ends," Feldman noted.

In supporting the primary system, Tuccillo indicated his committee was "not concerned with results." He stated that their aim was to give the individual a "muscle."

Cartoons for library

Gerry Sturm, editorial cartoonist for the Syracuse Herald-Journal and Herald-American since 1940, has donated 40 of his original drawings to the Syracuse University library.

Most of the cartoons comment on local, state and national political events of the last eight years. Sturm plans to add to the collection, according to Philip F. Mooney of the library's manuscripts division.

Sturm, of Fayetteville, also paints. His works in watercolor, polymer, pastel and oil have been exhibited by Anchor Galleries at Three Rivers, Onondaga Hill Free Library,

Seven days a week

St. Mary's receives visiting hours

Seven day a week visiting hours were granted to St. Mary's on Monday during a meeting of standing committee three, the arm of the Council on Student (CSL) dealing with visitation hours.

Earlier this year the committee established a limit on the number of living centers which could participate in the visiting hours experiment. By granting the privilege to St. Mary's the quota would have been exceeded.

It was therefore necessary for the representatives of the complex to present evidence the two dorms were functioning as a complex and would provide valuable data that would be important for future visiting hour plans.

Arguing on behalf of St. Mary's were Ed Barron, president of the men's dorm, Ira Kurzban, Linda Brewster and Golda Shapiro.

In a joint petition submitted to the committee by Barron and Peg Johnston, president of Inter-Dorm Council, it was pointed out that the information will be gathered by the two dorms and will be valuable since there may be two other coed complexes next year, Sadler-Lawrinson and Day-Flint.

After considering the petition the members of the committee, Dean of Men David Tatham, Dean of Women Marjorie Smith; Cindy Bailey, AWS president; Bob Kelly, IFC president; Sally Cloninger, Panhel president and Miss Johnston voted to grant the visiting hours to St. Mary's.

Previously this year the committee granted everyday visiting hours to several other living centers including Kimmel, Marion, Booth and Dell Plain. Lawrinson was granted weekend visiting hours.

Standing committee three was set up to "review and process only applications for visiting hours on an experimental basis and evaluate the results with the consideration of a major policy change," said Miss Bailey.

No other living centers will be granted visiting hours until after the evaluations, which will begin in February.

Flu . . .

Consequently, Marty deemed his preventative suggestions for remaining healthy to be "awfully prosaic."

"Avoid excessive fatigue, maintain a balanced diet and stay away from sick people." He added even if there were any threat of an epidemic, because of the incubation period of influenza, its peak would be at the time school is to be closed for Christmas vacation.

Christmas

Those wishing to volunteer a few hours work to the Christmas Bureau should contact Robin Erickson at x3793 or 3451. The bureau serves as a clearing center for the receiving and distribution of holiday gifts to the needy and underprivileged in the Syracuse community.

UNSTOPPABLE?? Possibly, when SU's 6-11 center, Bill Smith, extends his height all the way up, no opposing center will be able to touch him. That was the case here against Cornell when he pushed his jump shot high over the outstretched arms of the Red's Walt Esdaile. Smith has been high scorer in both of the Orange defeats, but still has taken too few shots, which is part of the Syracuse problem thus far. (Photo by Biggar)

Orange wants to Ram home its first triumph

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

Still winless Syracuse will face undefeated Fordham tonight in New York as the local basketball season enters its second week.

The first seven days of the campaign have seen a big ticket controversy on the home front and two consectutive losses on neighboring upstate courts. While the Athletic Department was gracefully backing out of its announced $2 ticket charge, rookie coach Roy Danforth's team was kicking away its first two games on the road. Now that the ticket situation is settled, Danforth hopes the team will settle as well.

Although they are undefeated, the Fordham Rams still may be fair game for the Orange. The opposition they have beaten has been mediocre--Roanoke, Yale, and Seton Hall--and they are also laboring under a new coach.

The new Ram head is Ed Conlin, a former Fordham standout who put in a stint with the Syracuse Nationals of the National Basketball Association. Conlin succeeded long-time Ram coach John Bach, who packed up his pressing man-to-man defense and moved to Penn State. Syracuse will get a chance at him in the home opener a week from tonight.

Conlin has inherited some good players from last year's 19-8 team, which went to the NIT. His top player so far is 6-5 forward Art Starrs, who is leading the team with a 14.7 per game scoring average. He also has good height up front with 6-7 Den Witowski and 6-8 John Zanzalaii. The problem is at guard, where 5-10 John Burik and 6-2 Bill Mainor are inexperienced and vulnerable.

Danforth will go with his regular starting five for the Rose Hill contest. Bob Kouwe and Bill Case will start up front, with Bill Smith at center and Gerry McFadden and John Suder at guards.

Although the Fordham weakness at guard indicates outside shooting as a weapon, Danforth would prefer to see the ball worked into Smith in the low post more often. The 6-11 sophomore is averaging 31 points a game thus far, with a field goal accuracy rating of over 73 per cent. Case, with 14.5, McFadden, with 14 and Kouwe with 10 points per game are the other Orange in double figure averages for the first two games.

The major downfall for the team thus far has been turnovers. SU lost the ball 21 times against Cornell, and 31 against Niagara. "If we don't become more disciplined, we may go to the Army style," says Danforth. "Pass the ball 10-15 times before taking a shot."

The Orange had better come alive against Fordham if they want to get a quick win under their belts. This weekend they go out to Kansas for the Sunflower Tournament, where they must play Kansas and Kansas State on successive nights and the competition will be rough, with Olympic star Jo-Jo White, is ranked tenth nationally by UPI.

Fordham still elects to play its home games in cozy Rose Hill Gym on its Bronx campus, rather than play in Madison Square Garden like their crosstown neighbors at NYU. SU now leads in the series, 16-13, but the Rams are always tougher at home.

First of two parts

Grid season: the coach speaks his mind

By BOB GALLAGHER

With a 3-1 record after four games the 1968 Orangemen were flying high, climbing up to a number 10 ranking, but a loss to California started a downfall which culminated a crash against West Virginia and Penn State.

The Orange had been shot down in their last two regular season games for the first time in coach Ben Schwartzwalder's memory. What effect did this and the rest of the season have on the coach? What will the coaches try to do now? How will the future be effected?

In summing up his feelings Schwartzwalder stated, "It's not the end of the world. There is no head hanging or 100% despair." After two 7-3 seasons and two 8-2 seasons, a feeling of complacency might have developed. Schwartzwalder commented, "Maybe we were complacent, but we're not complacent now."

The coaches are concerned about the low note on which the season ended. "It would be a real tragedy," the coach stated, "if the players weren't concerned too. I hope losing the last two games hurt us enough to want to improve and come back conscientious and in good shape."

The coaching staff has its work cut out in preparing for next season. Their first task is to make sure the players don't slack off on the books. Schwartzwalder said, "After the season there is a tendency for a letdown, and to take time off academically. We don't want this to happen, and possibly lose somebody."

The area where the most work lies is in execution. "The execution of basic fundamentals, blocking, tackling, throwing and catching," the coach stated, "must get better. At times this year we lost the desire to hit, and this must stop."

The final chore for the coaches is to instill determination, enthusiasm, poise and character into the team. The coach said, "We must get enthusiasm and an all-out effort on the part of a lot of boys. Lack of poise and character this year was why we had such a poor record on the road, but experience will help in this area."

Next season appears to have many difficult tests for the Orange and without improvement there could be many failing grades. "To play offense takes poise and know-how, which is taught to the players," Schwartzwalder said. "Last year we lost nine regulars on offense through graduation, which left quite a void." This will be avoided next year because the whole offensive unit will be returning except for wingback John Bulicz. "The offense should be better," the coach explained, "because they have a year of experience. They will have to carry the defense in the beginning."

A loss which couldn't be avoided is a void created by the loss of six regulars on defense: captain Tony Kyasky, Gerry Beach, Cliff Ensley, Jerry Ruccio, Art Thoms and Steve Zegalia. The defensive unit was supposed to be the strength of this year's team.

"The defense," Schwartzwalder stated, "had to play good solid football for us to win. When they did, as against Navy, we won, but when they let down we lost."

The coach said, "To play defense you need athletes who want to hit and are aggresive. They hit and go to the ball." There is a definite task to find replacements for those who are graduating. "The question is do we have enough athletes and character to take over for the seniors. The challenge," he added, "is to find six better ones."

Sanford's crew pushes on through cold winter

By GINA BELL

You just can't convince an oarsman that crew isn't the most demanding sport around, especially if part of the daily workout involves shoveling snow off the stadium steps so that he can enjoy the crisp, clean, 5 degree winter air as he runs up and down the stairs with a 30 lb. weight around his neck.

Varsity coach Bill Sanford, with the help of Gary MacLachlan, frosh coach, has designed a winter training program for his rowers which has reached a level of intensity unsurpassed in other years. According to Sanford, this program, which involved daily rowing in the tanks, weight lifting and running, has been successful enough to place the crew at the point where they were when they completed indoor training last year, although the program has been in effect only a month.

It's a satisfying thing to be able to say that you're two months ahead of last year's schedule, and Sanford is enjoying it. "The situation is better this year," he said. "We rowed out most of the technique problems in fall practice, and we doubled our rowing mileage to 406 miles by marathon rowing. Now we're toughening up, both physically and mentally."

One of the major problems Sanford faces during the winter is keeping the crew enthusiastic throughout the long months indoors. "They get mentally tired in the tanks, but I think they'll forget that as soon as we hit the water." He added that good fall times, as well as creditable performances in the two fall races, serve as incentives to keep the rowers faithful to the program until spring.

Sanford is concentrating on endurance training this year. "We're rowing in the tanks more than we have in the past. We need to stress endurance over speed, because we get off the water early in the fall and get back on late in the spring. We've got a new rowing technique this year which uses a longer, more efficient stroke. Now we'll be able to row longer without stroking very high."

Sanford noted that the rigors of the program have caused several lukewarm rowers to quit. He is pleased with the core of 22 varsity and 23 frosh oarsman that remains. "The guys who have stuck it out this far are in it for keeps. They've got an incredible will to win," he explains.

In addition to daily workouts, the coach has his crew on strict training rules: no smoking, no drinking, no eating between meals, no late hours. "I'm trying to arrange it so that their bodies are functioning on a schedule," he says. "This way, they can easily throw off the punishing effects of a race." He added that academically, it is advantageous to have such a schedule, because it enables them to study when they are not physically exhausted.

One of Sanford's headaches is the Fat Boys' Club, which is made up of overweight rowers and is so well organized that it has officers. The coach feels that "fat" orasmen do not always pull their weight in the boat, and so he constantly pressures them to reduce. He is also concerned with the conflict which arises when Greek houses have their Hell Weeks during training. "I question the assumption that athletics and fraternities are compatible," he said, voicing his annual complaint.

Refusing to make any predictions about the crew's spring performance, Sanford still let a glimmer of optimism creep into his voice: "This year, we really mean business!"

SG Exec and Senate back student tax plan

By ANDRIJ BILYK

and COLETTE STALLINGS

The Syracuse University student will soon decide in a campus-wide referendum whether he wants to tax himself an additional five dollars per semester.

Student Government exec council last night approved the fee, which was proposed by SG president Chuck Hicks. Less than one hour later, Student Senate unanimously added its approval to the bill.

The $50,000 that the fee would raise will comprise, if also passed by the student body, the Student Activities Fund under a Student Finance Board. It would be completely free of University control.

"The Students Activities Fee which we propose is not the $50 student service fee which the University charges," said Hicks. "That money is used for the infirmary, shuttle buses, security, for the dogs and to fix rooms. Student organizations are the last to be considered."

The bill will be presented to the student body in a referendum Wednesday, Dec. 18.

Speaker of the Senate Ed Feldman said that if the referendum is passed, "Dean Jim G. Carleton has repeatedly assured that it could be implemented next semester." According to Hicks, Carleton has said the present SG operating budget will remain in effect.

For a complete report on last night's Senate meeting, please turn to page 6.

Hicks explained that the five dollar tax, which is to be paid at registration, will enable the Student Government to support student organizations, provide at least one free concert and a variety of small ones at reduced rates, support dorm councils, the University Union, and offer additional services such as Projection 70 and guest speakers.

The Student Finance Board, which is to be used for allocation purposes only, is to consist of the SG Treasurer as Chairman, one faculty member, two senators chosen by the Student Senate and three treasurers from campus organizations--on a yearly rotating basis.

Organizations, according to Hicks and his SG treasurer, Ross Starek, will still retain their University budgets but will be able to apply for additional funds from the Student Finance Board. March 1 has been set as the deadline for student organizations to apply for these funds.

This student tax or activities fee has been approved by the now dormant Council on Student Life and has met with favor from the Board of Trustees, with the condition "that the student body approves."

The Student Government Exec also discussed the poor student response to a pre-registration survey which ends today.

"Survey sheets are available at all the dining halls and at HBC. It doesn't take long to fill one out. We want to insure that every student gets in the class he wants," said Chuck Hicks, adding, "It's the student's own fault if he hasn't taken advantage of this service."

Tatham's statement on CSL

Following is Dean of Men David Tatham's statement on the Council of Student Life controversy.

DEAN TATHAM

There has been some misunderstanding apparently concerning veto power of the Dean of Men and the Dean of Women on the Council of Student Life. I plan to assure the members of the Council on Student Life that the Dean of Men and the Dean of Women will have one vote like everyone else on the council and will not have special approval power.

On one issue last year and one this year the personnel deans for reasons that seem not to have been properly explained to the council nor discussed by the council were empowered to set limits. In the question of visiting hours, however, this power was surrendered to standing committee no. 3, though the awareness of this was not very great.

The work of standing committee no. 3, which in my personal opinion has been valuable, was no doubt hampered by failures of communication at certain junctures.

This points up one of the problems of the council. It has tended to become deeply involved in the nitty-gritty of issues and consequently has not had the time nor the practiced perspective to tackle the greater problems.

The details of visiting hours probably should have been worked on by the Inter-Dormitory Council with final review and decision by CSL. CSL must begin to tackle the greater issues of student life at the University; for example: an exploration of the quality of life for members of minority groups at the University.

I would hope that the council would work more closely with existing student, faculty and administration organizations, giving them direction and helping to shape the typical experience of Syracuse.

It is my understanding that some of the members of the council seek to have a meeting within the next few days. On the agenda for the meeting will be some of the issues which have been raised during the past week.

Meiklejohn does his thing at St. Mary's gathering

By ELLEN NIMMONS

Dr. Donald Meiklejohn, head of the Public Affairs and Citizenship department last night did his thing for a small group of students at St. Mary's floor 2.

He asked questions.

Dr. Meiklejohn had been invited to speak as a part of the floor's activities. Faculty members are frequently asked to act in this capacity, usually speaking to the subject of faculty-student interaction.

If the girls of St. Mary's 2 and their guests expected such a speech from Dr. Meiklejohn, they were disappointed. For Meiklejohn, who, in the conduction of his classes, prefers discussion to lecture, took full advantage of the small group to ask questions of his own.

Meiklejohn was not there, he said, to speak, but to "initiate a conversation — during which I will be most happy to listen."

He had planned to "speak to the civil rights situation — which can be a gloomy subject — in the knowledge that often the gloomier the things, the more fun they are."

But it was not around civil rights that conversation centered. Instead, it turned into topics ranging from the honors program, classes, courses, instructors and advisors, to mass communications, television and obscenity.

A relatively high number of honors students were present, and Meiklejohn, as a member of the Honors Council, was both aware of, and interested in learning more about their problems.

The honors seminar, a one-credit, required course, for all honors students, was the subject of much criticism.

In way of answer to their complaints, Meiklejohn stressed that "People will listen to students," and said: "The honors program ought to push the faculty to improve the courses."

Dr. Meiklejohn urged that students should try to convey their complaints, suggestions and proposals to the faculty and administration.

DR. MEIKLEJOHN

He said: "Why not go and talk to the department chairman?" Achieving what you want out of the University can often be a matter of initiative."

Visitation hours: who determines them?

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

Visitation hours, perhaps more than any other issue, has brought the dissent within the Council on Student Life (CSL) to a head.

Part of the problem is a lack of the definition of powers--who has the last word in formulating such a policy change as visitation hours? It is also a case of noncommunication, different members assuming they have priority in decision-making, but not letting other members know it.

The student members of CSL claim that they have been frustrated in a number of attempts to establish new programs at SU. This is the first in a series of articles investigating these claims.

The initial charter of CSL states the council can recommend major policy changes and institute minor ones. Last year DellPlain and Lawrinson dorms were given visitation hours and were to be evaluated at the end of the year.

According to Cindy Bailey, president of AWS and chairman of CSL's standing committee no.3 (set up to work with visitation hours), there was no formal evaluation of the program, but it was generally considered successful.

This year visitation hours were reinstated in the two dorms by the administration. Because the experiment was successful last spring, many students were anxious to start visitation systems in their own dorms.

"When student members of the CSL were informally considering the expansion of visitation hours, they expected to establish them for a certain period of time and then evaluate them," said Miss Bailey.

"But we were told it should still be on an experimental basis," she continued.

At that time the issue came before the council. Becuase certain things had not yet been determined, standing committee no. 3 was established. Miss Bailey met with Dean of Student Services Jim G. Carleton, who is also chairman of the CSL.

According to Miss Bailey, Carleton insisted that the standing committee decide the guidelines and establish the plan for visitation hours. He also conceded that he could override the decision.

"This was the start of the run-around," said Miss Bailey. "The standing committee wanted to remain flexible in order to have different types of dorms in the experiment, but a limitation was set, which was so binding that the flexibility suffered."

Because the installation of visiting hours throughout the campus would be a major policy change, a period of experimentation has to take place, according to administration officials. Therefore, visitation hours were limited to 25% of the student population.

(Only in the end was this quota exceeded by including St. Mary's complex. It was agreed by the committee to go over the limit since this was the only dormitory complex in the program.)

But according to Miss Bailey, Haven Hall was the start of the real controversy. The committee accepted the dormitory's petition and passed the proposal that Haven be part of the experiment. However, Haven includes freshmen girls.

"Dean of Women Marjorie Smith was against the proposal, because she didn't like the idea of freshman girls being included," said Miss Bailey – a claim that Dean Smith later denied.

After that meeting, Peg Johnston, a member of the committee and president of Inter-Dormitory Council, and Miss Bailey met with Dean Smith. They were told the staff was against freshman girls being included in the experiment, but that it was willing to compromise.

A compromise, which said freshmen girls would be included in the experiment if a letter of notification went to their parents, did result from the

The charges on visitation hours

The Daily Orange is attempting a detail by detail investigation of the blow by blow account stated by the student members of the Council on Student Life. We take their charges seriously because the Council in its original conception meant to us that students would have a clear and identifiable part in the making of decisions that affect students.

The student members claim their part in the decision making is unclear and subject to the maneuvers of the administrators. If such claims are true, the implications are serious. The supposed last resort for a student voice would stand naked of meaning.

Let's examine a specific charge on visitation hours. The statement of the students printed on this page during the two previous days said: "We proposed an experiment on a campus-wide basis with time being the variable factor. No, that was not quite good enough. We proposed an experiment picking out various living centers as being representatives of their type; this was cut down to 25 per cent....This was then further restricted by the elimination of freshmen women..."

Standing Committee Three, chaired by Cindy Bailey, of the Council, voted on the decision to limit the experiment to 25 per cent of the campus and reported this vote to the Council.

Freshmen women were not eliminated from the experiment. The Standing Committee, appointed by the Council, voted to send letters to the parents of freshmen women involved in the visitation hours experiment, requesting parents who did not want their daughters to participate to send notice to the Dean of Women. The Dean of Women has further modified the letter sent to parents so that such objecting parents have to notify only their daughters and not the Dean of Women. Thus the students will operate following their parents' wishes on an honor system, unenforceable by the Dean of Women.

Chairman of Standing Committee Three, Cindy Bailey, was not notified this modification was made nor told why it was necessary. Although the original charge by the Student members of the Council was mistaken, we question why the Dean of Women took it upon herself to further modify the letters to parents.

Misplaced priorities?

Drumlins

By Abe Wagner

The purchase of the Drumlins complex by the University with endowment funds described "in excess of $2 million" raises some major questions about priorities and policies of investment.

Speaking about the Drumlins purchase, Chancellor Tolley mentions that "in our long term planning we have always felt it was important to acquire the Drumlins property to protect it against unwise development and keep it as a land bank for future needs." But, if we are to believe previous descriptions of University development and expansion, the primary thrust will be from the present campus down toward Genesee Street, with expansion in the Drumlins at best a secondary consideration. To commit over $2 million in endowment resources, at a time when these resources are in short supply, to investments like this leave a big question of priorities.

It must further be considered that as an endowment investment, the University can expect an annual return on its investment. A general critisim made recently by McGeorge Bundy of the Ford Foundation is that university endowment investments in general tend to be conservative and show a low rate of return, in the 3 to 4 per cent range. An exception to this general rule pointed out by Bundy being some of the top flight private institutions such as Harvard, whose investment policies yield a rate of return more commensurate with the economy as a whole.

It can be shown that almost random selection of blue chip stocks produces an annual return greater than the endowment investments of American universities. To this end, a substantial portion of the Syracuse endowment has been invested by professionals in income producing securities.

If the Drumlins purchase is to be at all considered as an income producing investment, it remains for the University to show a return in Drumlins equal to that currently available in prime securities.

A second area of major interest concerns the private golf club associated with Drumlins itself. Rumor and "common knowledge," if they are to be believed, hold that Negroes have in the past been denied admission to the private golf club, and Jews have been admitted only on a token basis.

Extensive research in his area by Benjamin Epstein of the B'nai Birth Anti-Defamation League shows that a majority of private clubs descriminate on this basis, but such policy is most always of a de facto nature. Thus, little evidence can be offered other than actual membership roles (if available) and heresay.

Since these clubs are of a private nature, it is their legal right to operate in this manner.

It seems a matter of course however that when a club becomes the property of an institution such as a major University, policies like this would cease. Beyond the rights of a private club, a university and its holdings are bound by a higher moral committment. Thus far the only statement made with regard to Drumlins is that current operations, implying all current policies, are to be continued. An answer to this vital question must be forthcoming.

Thus, with little fanfare and prior discussion, SU has made a major firancial committment to a purchase which is at best controversial. Whether or not such a controversy over the priorities and ethicacy of the Drumlins purchase will arise remains to be seen, but a reasonable explanation for the purchase needs to be made.

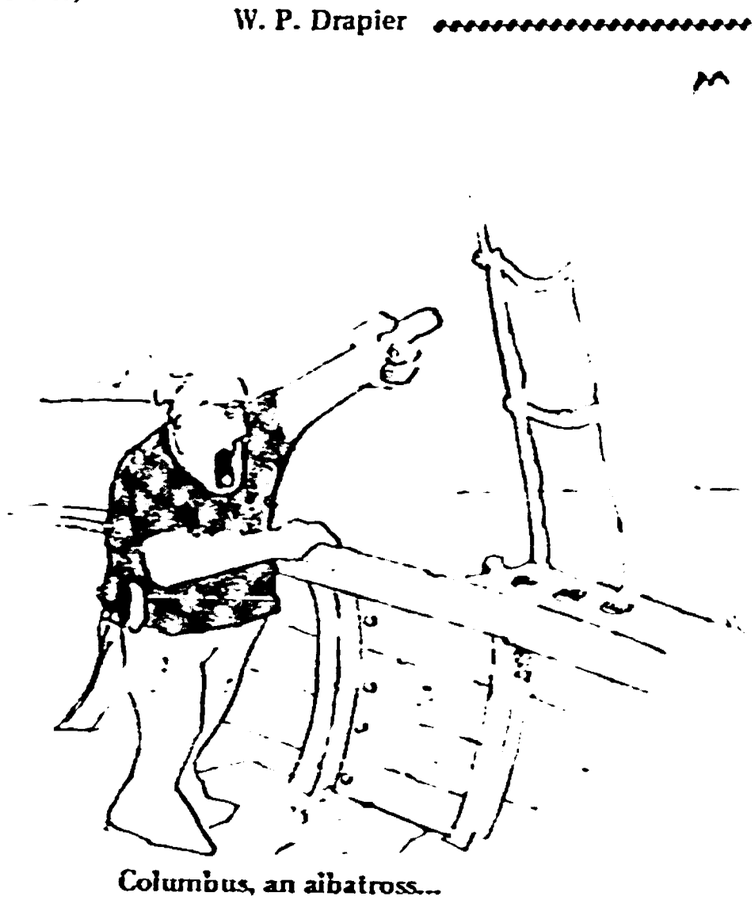
Football socialization

A modest proposal

By W. P. Drapier

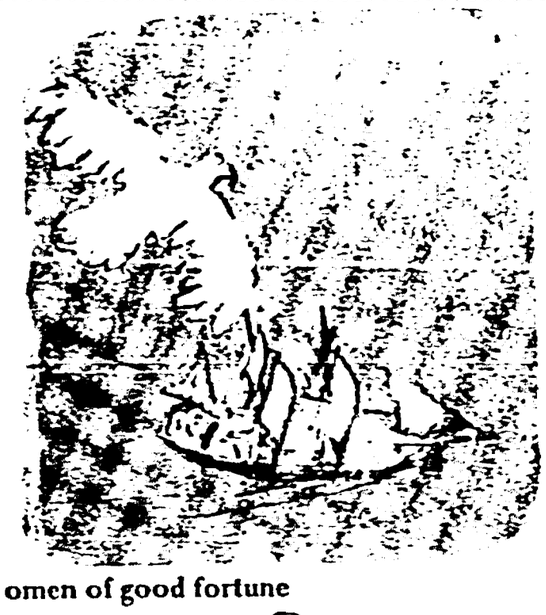
The past weekend has provided me with the opportunity to observe a shaded portion of the football oriented, social circle. At a well known establishment, (which is commonly referred to as TC), several of our other boys in uniform set merrily about to liquidate their remorseful loss on the gridiron. The activities varied from purse snatching to a swearing contest, as it seemed, and were enjoyed mostly by our paragons of physical prowess. Although this merriment was indeed mirth provoking (with the exception of the girl who had her purse stolen), it was indeed also a very serious blemish on the reputation of football at our institution. To avoid open scandal, and ridicule, I hereby propose the concept of allowing the players to have alcoholic beverages in their dorms. Many players are in agreement with me, as I have witnessed remnant evidence. Not only would this idea cut down on the parking problem at local taverns, but it would also create a sense of unity; for a team that drinks together, sinks together, so to speak.

While being allowed to fraternize with one another, drinking in their dorms would also inspire various tests and contests of physical ability among players. As we all know, it is not difficult to convert an easy chair into a tackling dummy, nor is it impossible to run a sweep around end and scamper into the closet for paydirt. The extra point conversion may hamper the game, but by removing a section of the ceiling, and using those old, dust ridden bookshelves in their rooms, the construction of a simulated end zone may be accomplished with little or no difficulty. If football is not the game to play after hours (you know, the all work and no play bit), then perhaps a more gentlemanly game, such as tennis may be used as a replacement. By stretching a series of tied bedsheets across the room, a net can be constructed. As for a ball, a discarded beer can may be used (surely one would not use it for a pencil holder), and upon becoming dented, the can may be re-discarded or thrown at an opposing player.



Through the sheer genious of common ingenuity, games like these can be played (though I doubt that any one of our athletes have waited for my suggestions) and thoroughly enjoyed, right in the comfort of their own home. Let no one person talk to me of other expedients to this problem of our restless youth, such as stricter enforcement of the rules governing the athletic code, punishing violators of town ordinances, finger printing of athletes (in case of a would be, "freak," misdemeanor) nor simply refusing to serve drinks to Ben's Boys (could this be why they are referred to as boys and not men, or is it because of an allitterative nicety?). This proposed method of containment can be the only way to prevent further blemishes on the skin of their "all-American boys" type complexion, for indeed they are all Americans. Myself, I stand nothing to gain from this, for I smoke cigarettes, have a trick knee, and only one arm. Your servant,

W. P. Drapier



Quotation

"This closeness of connection between the character of a society and the character of its education cannot be too strongly stressed. Schools and colleges are not something apart from the social order to which they belong. They are that order trying to prepare its youth for participation in its own activities. And a society can only teach the hopes, the knowledge, the values and the beliefs which it has."

meeting. This was later compromised a bit further, according to Miss Bailey, and it is now necessary that parents not have any objections to the experiment.

"We were not against forbidding visitation hours for freshmen, but we have to inform the parents of changes in the living centers," said Dean Smith in an interview yesterday.

"There are many times that the committee members have felt a real necessity to ask if they have any real power," said Miss Johnston. "We always have to ask the powers that be what are our decisions and what are not."

Because the lack of answers to this question sometimes results in frustration for the committee members, it appears that definintions will soon have to be determined as to where the powers actually do lie.

Visiting professors will examine current literary criticism here today

A humanities symposium on Current Modes in Literary Criticism will be conducted between 2-5:30 p.m. today in Grant Auditorium.

Walter Sutton, an SU English professor, will discuss "Criticism Today" as the program's introduction.

Professor Eugene Donato, from the State University of New York at Buffalo, will deal with "Subject and Interpretation in French Critical Theory."

Cornell University Professor David Grossvogel will speak on "Phenomenological Criticism."

New York University's Anthony Zahareas will discuss "Americo Castro and the Philosophy of Literary Criticism." The NYU professor, who has published a book and several articles on medieval and modern Spanish literature, will review the polemical reactions that have arisen around Castro's application of existentialist and 'italist theories to Spanish culture and literature.

The use of psychology in literary criticism, a mode especially predominant in the United States, will be represented in the final paper by Professor Leonard Menheim (University of Hartford), editor of The Hartford Studies in Literature.

Following a coffee intermission at 3:30 p.m., the above speakers will participate in a round-table discussion. Professor Sutton will moderate and C.L. Barber will join the panel. Barber, a professor at the State University of New York at Buffalo, is the author of Shakespeare's Festive Comedy and the recipient of the George Jean Nathan prize for drama criticism.

According to Daniel P. Testa, chairman of the Humanities Lecture Committee, today's symposium "is an attempt to present a sampling of critical trends which have significantly come to the fore in the last two decades. Some of these currents have developed independently of the so-called school of New Criticism, and some have emerged as a constructive reaction to it.

J-Council meets tonight

All students taking courses in the School of Journalism are asked to attend the Journalism Council meeting today at 7:30 p.m. in 200 Newhouse.

In the past, the Journalism Council has been a standing board for examing student dissatisfaction within the J-School. It also organized and planned many social events for journalism students and faculty members. Such an event was Journalism Day, when members of the school spent a spring day picnicking and playing soft ball.

Tomorrow's discussion will be informal, but the agenda includes a study of what role the Journalism Council should play in the lives of students. If a sufficient interest is expressed, social functions may be planned.

Some decisions are relatively unimportant. Where you put your engineering talent to work is not.

As you contemplate one of the most important decisions of your life, we invite you to consider a career at Pratt & Whitney Aircraft. Here, you will find wide-open opportunities for professional growth with a company that enjoys an enviable record of stability in the dynamic atmosphere of aerospace-technology.

We select our engineers and scientists carefully. Motivate them well. Give them the equipment and facilities only a leader can provide. Offer them company-paid, graduate-education opportunities. Encourage them to push into fields that have not been explored before. Keep them reaching for a little bit more responsibility than they can manage. Reward them well when they do manage it.

And your decision is made easier, thanks to the wide range of talents required. Your degree can be a B.S., M.S., or Ph.D. in: MECHANICAL • AERONAUTICAL • ELECTRICAL • CHEMICAL • CIVIL • MARINE • INDUSTRIAL ENGINEERING • PHYSICS • CHEMISTRY • METALLURGY • MATERIALS SCIENCE • CERAMICS • MATHEMATICS • STATISTICS • COMPUTER SCIENCE • ENGINEERING SCIENCE • ENGINEERING MECHANICS.

Misunderstanding

CSL profs urge students to remain to clarify powers

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

Misunderstanding and a lack of communication are among the causes of the present controversy within the Committee on Student Life (CSL), according to CSL faculty members.

"There is no clear delineation of an exact policy line for the council to follow," explained Prof. James Weeks of the College of Law. He said the council's original mandate is somewhat vague and ambiguous.

At the crux of the problem, perhaps, is the definition of power. Jim G. Carleton, dean of student services, is the designated chairman of the CSL. He has the authority to authorize the implementation of some of the CSL proposals without prior consultation with Chancellor Tolley.

Dean Carleton took a two-month leave of absence, however, to work on a thesis. During this time Dean of Men David Tatham chaired the council. Before Dean Tatham could approve some proposals, however, he must consult with Dean of Women Margaret Smith. This change in authority, some of the professors indicated, has caused confusion within the council, especially with the students.

"The question where the final powers lie has been debated over three thousand years," offered Dr. Michael O. Sawyer.

Chemistry Prof. Benjamin Burt said the student members of CSL presented a letter explaining their grievances last Friday (which was published in the D.O. earlier this week.) The meeting was dismissed shortly after the reading of the letter so there was no opportunity for discussion.

Burt emphasized the need for discussion at the next CSL meeting--which student members say they won't attend; but Burt said he has not been personally told that they won't.

Prof. Weeks also proposed that the students remain on the council so that a clarification of their mandate can be determined. Although he did not attend Friday's meeting, he believes that the students feel that a "sifting agency" of deans has intervened in the proposals sent to the chancellor. "I don't think it has in fact occured," said Weeks.

Weeks explained that the decision-making process takes time, but there is "student impatience" for the implementation of change. "There is no move afoot to undercut the council," he added.

Ascertaining that the CSL has made and is making progress, Burt recalled the liberalization of the alcohol rule initiated last year. Now the CSL is initiating the experimental stage of visitation hours in dormitories.

It was also pointed out that the CSL is only in its second year of operation and it is still in an experimental stage. "If the students remove themselves from the committee, they are removing one good opportunity to have an ear of the administration," said Prof. Weeks.

Student Senate approves fee

By COLETTE STALLINGS

Student Senate last night unanimously approved a bill "for the enactment of the Students Activities Fund of $5 for undergraduate students per semester."

Reading from a prepared speech, president of undergraduate government Chuck Hicks said, "A lot of organizations on this campus cannot function without assistance." Hicks pointed out that the $50 general student fee covers a long list of services, shuttle buses to fixing chairs, and that student organizations are last on the list to receive funds.

The bill will be presented to the student body in referendum Wednesday, Dec. 18.

Speaker Ed Feldman said that if the referendum is passed, "Dean Carleton has repeatedly assured that it could be implemented next semester." According to Hicks, Dean Carleton assures that the present UG operating budget will remain in effect.

Commenting on his recent action in the Committee on Student Life, Feldman said, "Students on this campus...have been used, manipulated and lied to, and we're tired of it."

Speaking before Senate on the necessity of the physical education requirement, director of women's physical education Lucille Verhulst said, "There seems to be a hierarchy of values in which things of the mind are way up here, and things of the body are way down here."

But having been assured by assistant chairman of physical education for men, Peter Cataldi that "the state of New York recommends that phy. ed. be included as a requirement but does not require that it be," Senate passed a resolution urging Faculty Senate to "eliminate the physical education requirement from Syracuse University."

John Ross, chairman of government structures committee, reported that University Union, Kimmel/Marion, Young Republicans Club, Hillel, Scabbard and Blade and Spanish Club constitution have been rejected by the committee.

According to Ross, the Hillel constitution was rejected because it provides no democratic means of electing officers and has a prejudiced membership policy. Because Hillel provides services to "the University at large for money making purposes," and varies the prices of these services for members and nonmembers, an open membership policy is important, he said.

"Because in my opinion Mr. Cope's presentation is very lacking," academics committee chairman Jean Danziger said, "Brian Cook and I are writing a kind of thing to include the pamphlet that advisors get."

Meiklejohn . . .

A switch in conversation brought discussion to the somewhat broader area of television, controls and obscenity.

"Television," he said, "introduces a monopoly into what had previously been free enterprise." In many ways, it is taking over from newspapers."

As the subject swung back to education, Meiklejohn pointed to the opinion that the student learns more from other students than from his classes.

In reply to student reaction against courses and teachers and the disillusionment that was expressed by some, Meiklejohn concluded on an optimistic note.

"I certainly would not give up. You can find people you can talk to here. You can also find good teachers."

Fordham wins 77-62

Orange continue skid as Rams romp

By ED AGRANOWITZ

Syracuse's John Suder threw the basketball into the stands last night to protest a call, was slapped with a technical foul and ejected, and the Orange's hopes for their first win of the year went flying away quickly thereafter.

Fordham rallied to overcome a ten point first half Syracuse lead to win going away, 77-62.

Bill Smith got things rolling with an early three point play for the Orange, who started the game with five quick turnovers. Smith hit for 9 points in the opening half, as Syracuse sped to a 20-10 advantage, and took a 30-27 cushion into the locker room.

With Smith drawing three first half fouls, Dave Aldrich opened at center for Syracuse in the second half, and led the Orange to a 40-31 bulge with six quick points. But soon Aldrich, too was in foul trouble with four, and it was all Fordham.

The Rams then proceded to rip off fourteen points, being interrupted only by baskets by Frank Hamblen and Gerry McFadden. Frank McGlocklin converted the technical foul on Suder to tie the score at 44 all, and Dennis Witowski's layup midway through the half put the Rams ahead to stay.

Backcourt John Burick, scoring 12 of his 14 points in the second half was primarily responsible for putting the game on ice for Fordham. Three field goals by Burick helped the Rams build a ten point lead and the Orange were finished for the night.

SU did manage to close within six again, but Smith fouled out with Fordham up 64-56, and the Rams promptly ran it to 72-56.

The Orange finished with a field goal percentage of 37%, as compared to Fordham's 40%. Syracuse's figure was far below the 64% mark they posted in the slugfest at Niagara.

Smith again led the Orange scorers with 16, far below his two game average of 31. Suder, with 9 points, and Aldrich, with 8 were the only other Orangemen to approach double figures.

For the Rams, five players hit doubles with Witowaki and Burick leading the pack with 14 each.

The Orange will fly from New York to Kansas for the Sunflower Doubleheader with Kansas and Kansas St. this weekend. The loss left the Orangemen at 0-3, and the Rams 4-0.

ED'S ITORIALS: The Orange had Fordham's two big boys, 6-5 Art Starrs, 6-7 Den Witowski and 6-5 Frank McGlocklin on the ropes with four fouls each, but couldn't put them out.....George Hicker assisted with the WAER broadcast.....BEEP made it possible.

TENDER LOVING CARE. Frosh basketball coach Bill Vesp implores his Tangerines to seek a better score from his vantage point on the bench. Tangerines short in inches, but make up for it with hustle

By LARRY KRAMER

The freshman basketball squad, plaqued by a severe lack of height, has countered with an amazing amount of hustle in notching victories in their first two outings. The wins were by scores of 88-81 (Cornell) and 81-80 (Niagara).

"Our overall agressiveness and hustle, as well as a tough defense, made the difference," commented Tangerine coach Bill Vesp.

Vesp went on to say about the squad, "They're starting to learn how to work together, and they won't need much more time to gell. I've been trying to stress defense."

In both of their outings, the Tangerines have given away at least three inches a man in the height column. When asked about what he does to counter this disadvantage, Vesp replied, "We press a lot, cut the passing lanes, and play in front of the big men. If we're behind a big man when he gets a pass, it's almost a sure score."

This year's squad has to fill big shoes. Last year's Tangerines finished with a 15-1 record under the direction of the now varsity coach, Roy Danforth.

The tallest member of the frosh team is Ken Gray. Gray stands 6-4 and comes from Huntington, N.Y.

Unlike most other teams, the frosh play with two forwards and three guards, because of the lack of height. Sharing the forward spot with Gray is either Gary Rainbow of Jim Ryan, both local boys. Their heights respectively are 6-1 and 6-2.

Starting in the backcourt are Paul Piotrowski, 6-3, from Utica, N.Y., Gil Guerrero, 6-1 from Toledo, Ohio, and Greg Kohls, 6-1, from Hyde Park N.Y. Kohls is the team's leading scorer, tallying 23, and 21 points respectively in the first two tilts.

Vesp explained the unusual style of play in this way: "We don't concentrate on offense at all. I believe that an offense will take care of itself when it is supported by a good defense. We concentrate on boxing out all the big men, and utilizing the fast break as much as possible. We also concentrate on making the best shot possible, because if we miss the first one there's not too much chance of any more."

Another problem Vesp has to face is the lack of scholarship players. He only has four to work with: Gray, Piotrowski, Guerrero and Kohls. Outside of these four, only 18 more showed up to try out.

"We're only carrying 12 ballplayers. I'm sure that there are many more boys in the school with talent who just didn't find the time to come out. We could have a few more if they were there," Vesp said.

Another major problem encountered was the need to switch Piotrowski and Guerrero to guards from the forward positions they played to in high school.

"The change involves more than most people think," said Vesp. "It's all new to them. They have to be taught the moves of a guard. Both are coming along very well."

Two other boys who have seen action are George Straub and John Alley, 5-11, hails from LaGrangeville, N.Y.

Unlike their football counterparts, the roundballers start their schedule with the varsity. This season coach Vesp has expressed pleasure over the schedule. "It's a good slate, and it'll be a tough one," commented the first-year mentor.

Players look to next year

By BOB GALLAGHER

The 1968 football team went from being hot in August to being cold in December, not only in degrees of temperature but also in degrees of effectiveness. With the exception of the UCLA and Navy games, the 6-4 season was as thrilling as kissing your mother, as the Orange squeezed little else which was easy to swallow out of the long season.

Such a season, although not terribly poor by most standards, taught many lessons. How much was learned by the players and how are they going to put it to use to enrich the future?

Coach Ben Schwartzwalder believes, "This is not the end of the world, but the time for a beginning." Junior guard Dave McCard states, "I hope we get better. Through this season the team has become a closer knit unit." Al Newton, sophomore fullback, thought it was a "frustrating season. We'll have to do better to improve on this season. We didn't really beat anybody."

"This season will give us the lift we need to do well next year," says one player. "A lot of mistakes were made this year which won't be tolerated next year. They were learning mistakes, and everybody should have learned." Defensive tackle Ray White, a soph, sums up the value of the season by stating, "You remember it, which makes you want to work harder."

In looking into the football future the schedule must be taken into account. With next season's rugged slate, the Orangemen can't count on easy teams, so improvement will be necessary. Schwartzwalder says, "We play three bowl teams: Kansas, Penn State and Arizona, next year, so we must improve ourselves. There will always be one good team on the field next season." One player added Iowa State and West Virginia to the list of tough teams which the Orange must face.

The players themselves realize they have a task in front of them for next season. "All the guys are going to work harder to regain respectability," McCard says. He looks for an improved offense, because "after playing together for a season, each of us knows knows more about the others capabilities." Newton believes, "We have a tough task and will have to sacrifice to turn the tables next season."

White states, "It's good to lose. You don't like it, since you play to win. This makes you want to improve. The team improves as each individual improves. "He also feels the team will get better because of the experienced ball players it will have. "A year of experience," says another player, "gives the team poisee,, which must have in order not to get shook up, and so it can come from behind." He also feels the offense and the defense must both play well for a successful season.

The best time for improvement to begin is during the off-season. It gives the players a chance to work on their physical shape. Schwartzwalder states, "We have to get faster, tougher and stronger." This is to be accomplished by voluntary workouts at the Field House, beginning in the second semester. The sessions will consist of running for speed, weight lifting for strength and basketball or handball for quickness. "If the kids feel it's worth it," says the coach, "they will work hard at it, because athletics is something you have to go at with intensity."

If all the players are willing to pay the price to improve, and with the hear of experience, the Orange will be juiced up, which could cost their opponents in 1969.

Paul Stookey and company (Peter Yarrow and Mary Travers) strummed into Syracuse for another Peter, Paul and Mary concert at the War Memorial last Friday. The group has been singing together since 1961 when they first met in Mary's Greenwich Village apartment. "We could have made three times as many albums as we actually did, but we don't go into a recording session until we have 12 songs that say the things we want to say. Then it's another six months or so until the songs are really together," remarks Paul. For more pictures on Peter, Paul and Mary, please turn to page 5.

CSL charges on Food Service

In investigating charges by student members of the Council on Student Life that no figures are available for the earnings and expenses of Food Service, the Daily Orange found that they were true.

The figure for earnings of auxilliary enterprises such as Athletics, SU Bookstores, and Food Service is available in one lump sum but no breakdown of the figure can be obtained. A detailed breakdown of the income and expenses of Food Service would be necessary for the Council to form intelligent plans for more flexible student contracts.

We are certain Dr. Wingate did not intentionally mislead any member of the Council. Dr. Wingate tends to think and speak in a brusque, direct manner (he briskly answers his phone, "F.A. Wingate speaking") dealing with the matter at hand and no other. This manner gets things done in terms of the budget but does not necessarily promote good relations with students asking questions about Food Service figures. Dr. Wingate tends to answer the question asked, rather than pausing to figure out what the question meant to ask.

As he stated today permission must come from the Chancellor for the appropriate records of Food Service to be shown to the CSL members. We hope he will grant such permission or, at a minimum, explain why the records must remain closed.

Sports raps

By Jacques Lebel

Ever try to play a little basketball at the gym? Forget it! Gym classes have it all day and then intramurals all night. The smaller gym upstairs? That is where the wrestling team practices and even when they aren't working out their mats take up half the floor while the ROTC gestapo goose-steps all around the other half. If occasionally you do get a free basket you fight with a hundred others for a shot (half of whom are not SU students) and then hit the shower room only to find that either they are out of equipment to exchange (as usual) or the guy in the cage has taken off for another hour and a half coffee break (also as usual). If you want to play basketball...join the "Y".

******

And speaking of intramurals, did you know that intramurals are open to grad students? You probably didn't because intramurals are publicised about as much as the Soviet Union's defense strategies. They sneak in the fall sports meeting well before any grads (and many undergrad dorm floors as well) can organize enough to enter teams. By the winter and spring meetings they can't cut us out quite so well but one dinky notice in the gym hallway is usually the extent of advertising and for those grads to whom the gym isn't convenient or for those of us who avoid the gym for reasons stated in the item above the news doesn't get through. Finally, changing the system from within is useless. The only access is the Intramural Council which is made up of students and has power over intramurals...as long as it doesn't suggest changes that might force the intramural administration to spend some time in its office for a change.

Due process

To the Editor:

In reading over Angus Twombly's article of Wednesday, December 4, I note, among some inaccuracies that Mr. Twombly could not have prevented, the interesting generalization by Professor Fetters that "When the accusation process starts to move against a student, he must realize that he has certain rights and doesn't have to abide by unilateral decisions of some one in the administration. He has certain rights and should be advised of them."

Usually the more serious the charge the more summarily the student is dealt with."

This is an interesting generalization which seems to me not to apply to Syracuse. Reporter Twombly or others might have some interest in getting varying opinions on the question all of which amounts to my suggesting that I am willing or discuss a view contrary to Professor Fetters.

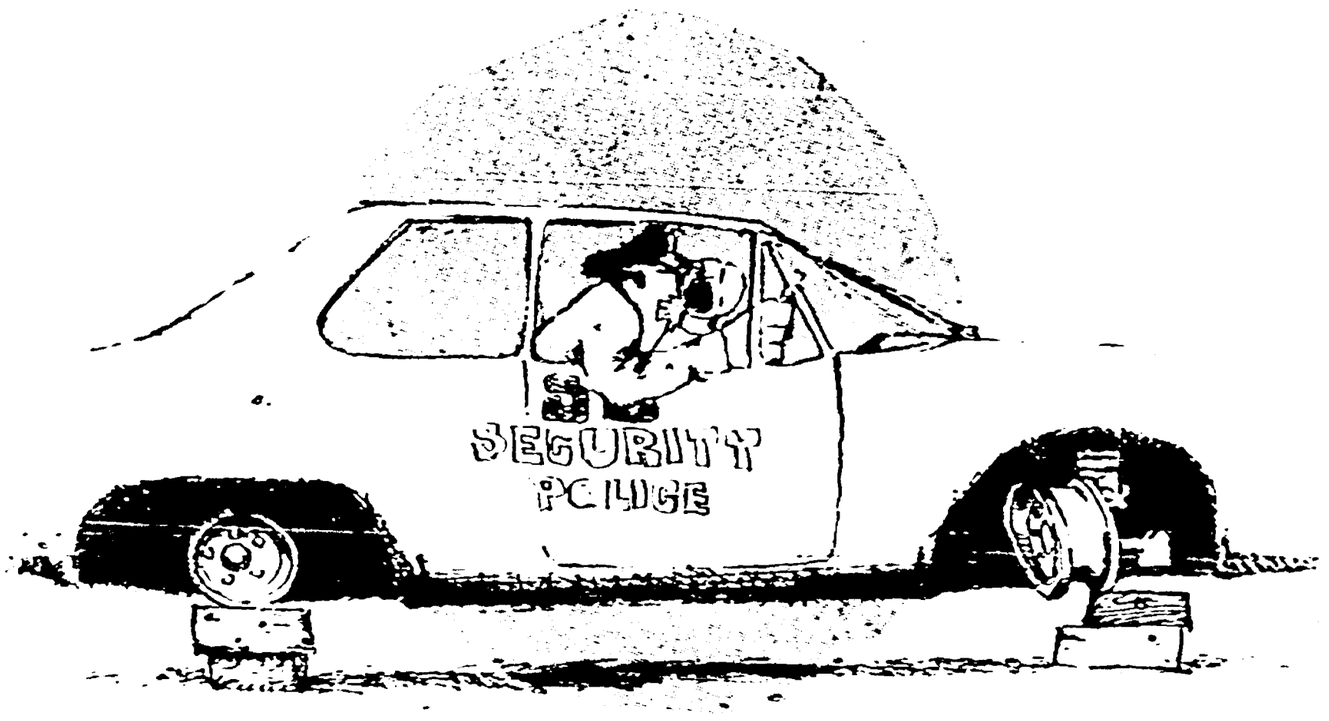
Bus service

To the Editor:

Students who use the shuttle bus to the campus from Married Student Housing and the Field House, at 9:45-9:55 a.m. weekdays, and who want improvement in the service, should write or telephone: Jim G. Carleton, Dean of Student Services, Administration Building, Syracuse University, ext. 3728.

In response to a letter from me, Dean Carleton has gone twice to the Field House at that time of day to observe the situation and has asked for and received passenger counts for several days during the month of October. My letter described the crowded conditions and conveyed to him the information that the mechanical stress on the bus due to overloading is a hazard to riders.



The bus company can add buses only at the request of the University, with which it contracts to provide the service. Because he has received only one complaint, Dean Carleton has decided not to request additional buses.

Counselling

To the Editor:

As a student it disturbs me a great deal that some students evidently have no idea that there are excellent counselling services on this campus for the asking. Any one of the many chaplains of all the faiths do counselling, as well as the Dean of the Chapel. Whether you have a desperate problem or one that needs a willing ear and sound advice, these men are ready and able to help any student who needs them. Naturally they regard anything told to them in conference as in the strictest confidence. Th[illegible]ntained by their separate faiths for the benefits of you—the students.

'Guilty, no action' ruled by UJB

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

The University Judicial Board (UJB) last night set a precedent for the determination of punitive action in its decision of a case involving the violation of an SU housing rule.

The determination of whether the UJB should take action on students who have violated University rules is based on five questions: Are any persons hurt? Are any persons inconvenienced? Have any federal, state or local laws been broken? Are there any harmful results? Has anything been damaged?

If a University rule has been violated, but none of the above points pertain, then the UJB will declare the violator "guilty, no action," according to the newly established precedent.

The landmark case which confronted the court involved four SU students charged with violation of a rule which permits women in men's rooms only at registered social events.

All four students were decided guilty as charged by the court. No action was taken on three of the students, however, and the fourth received an official reprimand.

Accerding to the court, two girls and one boy went to the boy's room after sledding in early November to heat some soup. The boy called a friend of his from another dormitory and invited him over to his room. The other boy came, unaware that girls were already in the room. While the four of them were there the floor resident advisor found them.

The girls claim that they were unaware of a rule infraction for two reasons: 1.) The host had not indicated that they were doing anything wrong; and 2.) the girls assumed visitation hours were in effect because of recent publicity. Jean Crawford, director of women's residence, later stated that the facts concerning visitation hours were confusing.

The court declared the girls guilty, however, because "it was their responsibility to determine what exactly the rule is. Ignorance is no excuse in this case, as the girls had available means of finding out."

Because the student who had been invited to the room had stayed there he "condoned and participated in the activity," said the UJB.

The student who had invited the three persons into his room pleaded guilty and was found guilty by a unanimous court. He received an official reprimand which serves as a severe warning but involves no action.

"This decision is made in the light of a liberal and modern atmosphere which has pervaded University policies," read the court's opinion, written by Stephen B. Huttler, a sophomore.

"Stern punishment afforded to these four students for having a 'soup party' would simply be out-of-line with the confidence

Buddhism is a latent but unrecognized bond

By MARK MASTERSON

Buddhism is a latent bond among 12 million South Vietnamese, often forgotten, if not ignored, by the United States.

Kenneth W. Morgan, religion professor at Colgate University who, since 1935, has periodically lived and taught in Asiatic countries from Japan to Laos, touched lightly on this subtle but serious side of Vietnamese life Wednesday night.

To a small group of interested listeners at Watson lounge, Morgan unraveled his thoughts.

He sees Vietnam as a country "demoralized and practically shattered" by war. Had the United States promoted early negotiations between Buddhists and Catholics in the South, he implied that perhaps Vietnam would be a step closer to unity today.

Considering the assassination in 1963 of South Vietnamese President Ngo Dinh Diem, Morgan hinted at the "real" power behind his death, which eventually led to a major U.S. military buildup in that country.

Vietnam, a country of about 12-million Buddhists, was and still is controlled in the South by a Catholic minority, explained Morgan. The Buddhist majority, had come to feel that Diem, a Catholic, was intent upon suppressing them.

"One thing you must understand:" he inserted, "Never give a religious group the feeling that they are being pushed to the wall."

Morgan referred to instances under the Diem government when Buddhists were prevented from displaying banners in the streets of Saigon as they celebrated their major religious festival. Unofficial public gatherings are illegal in S. Vietnam, he explained.

Delving deeper into Vietnamese history, the professor recalled the "solicitous attitude" toward Catholicism exhibited under French rule. The French did not recognize Buddhism as a religion in Vietnam. Thus, a very strong Catholic tradition matured.

While Catholics, although a minority, are an organized political power, Buddhist tradition prohibits direct involvement in politics. "The ideal of the Buddhists," said Morgan, "is to be an advisor to the politican, letting him do the dirty work."

However, the present government in S. Vietnam is not representative of the Buddhist majority, according to Morgan.

"There is nothing about this government they can say anything good for," he asserted. "Thus, the Buddhists are disillusioned and disaffected and withdrawn."

In his contact with the S. Vietnamese, Morgan had detected a strong and universal Food Service seen as 'manipulation' victim

By PAM TAYLOR

The aura of mystique surrounding the Food service controversy is another example of "administrative manipulation" and proves that "the administration has something to hide," charged Joey Edwardh, chairman of the Council on Student Life (CSL) subcommittee to investigate Food Service.

Food Service, according to CLS student members, is one of the issues beginning to erode student-administration relations.

Investigations began last year, resulting in three alternative board plan proposals: first, board contracts without breakfast; second, board contracts without weekends; and third, the option of not taking University board at all. According to Miss Edwardh, the adoption of any one of these plans is contingent on a release of the financial records of Food Service.

"At the end of October, we met with Vice President F.A. Wingate, who at the time was head of Food Service, and he said the figures didn't exist," said Miss Edwardh.

"The next meeting, he couldn't divulge any figures," she continued, "without first speaking to Dean Tatham or the Chancellor."

According to Miss Edwardh, if there is a profit being made, and if this profit goes to University projects not directly related to Food Service, then students paying board are paying more for the growth of Syracuse than those excused from board payment, notably the Greeks, commuters, and graduate students.

She suggested that a transfer of the profit to the student fee could possibly clear up this iniquity, but added, "without the figures, we cannot evaluate alternative systems."

"We are questioning our power to investigate. It amazes me that the Dean's staff thinks students really don't have any gripes," she said. "We have better things to do than strike Food Service."

An ex-officio member of the committee and Chairman of Student Services Committee Richard Barton seemed somewhat more optimistic about the investigations.

The student members of CSL claim they have been frustrated in a number of attempts to establish new programs at SU. This is the second of a series of articles investigating these claims.

"My primary concern is to create a report that will cover horizontally and vertically all considerations of Food Service at Syracuse; to create a large and comprehensive document, so that alternative plans can be evaluated by the council," he said.

Barton and his committee are distributing over 6,500 questionnaires to undergraduates in the major dormitories regarding the conditions of Food Service, and would like to see concerned and interested students.

Official investigations will be handled by a research corporation, headed by Dr. Ralph Russel.

Stephen K. Bailey

Bailey will try welding academics, public affairs

By BOB ZUER

After eight years Stephen K. Bailey's tenure as Dean of SU's Maxwell School is about to end.

Bailey resigned his post as of Feb. 1 but leaves SU Wednesday, when he travels to Albany and two days of conferences with the New York State Board of Regents. On Friday, he and his successor Dr. Alan K. (Scotty) Campbell begin a five-week tour of East Africa and South Asia. Purpose of the trip is to introduce Campbell to the numerous contacts with whom he will deal in those areas.

When the pair returns Jan. 27, Campbell will assume his duties as the new dean and Bailey will begin his new job at the Syracuse University Research Corporation (SURC). Bailey has been dean since 1961.

At SURC, Bailey will develop what is called "Policy Institute." The new operation will attempt to "bridge the gap between the academic world and the world of public and international affairs," according to Bailey.

Through the program Bailey hopes to tap the talents of faculty and students from all areas of the university and coordinate them toward solving real issues in the world. He cited a need for tackling the modernization problems of underdeveloped countries abroad and problems in the cities at home as two of his priorities.

Bailey will work with a small core staff (two to four yet to be announced) who will maintain contacts outside the university to find out what problems need solving. All the actual work will be done by the academic resources of the university, he said.

In his new position Bailey will work with all facets of the university as they relate to public affairs. In his present position he has been working only with the social sciences.

Today's problems require complex analysis, according to Bailey. The "Policy Institute" will provide a rubric for bringing university task forces together, he said. It will also make possible "educational feedback" in the form of credit and non-credit courses here, he added.

Bailey said he resigned because of a personal "need for a new challenge" and not out of disappointment with the Maxwell School. A dynamic institution such as Maxwell "shouldn't be stuck with one leader for more than a decade," he added.

Bailey did not take the credit for Maxwell's accomplishments during his tenure, however. He credited Campbell and the faculty for increased interest in metropolitan studies. He commended the one-third of the faculty and the scores of graduate students involved in establishing the East Africa and South Asia programs. And, in particular, he commended the steady improvement in the quality of the six social science departments under their respective chairmen.

A great future lies ahead for Maxwell because of its rich tradition, according to Bailey. There are strong departmental traditions but in the past there has been a capacity to work together, he emphasized. There also are no "deep ruts" that faculty are "stuck in," because they are not afraid to experiment, But as to the actual direction in which Maxwell will move in the future, he said, "You'll have to ask Scotty Campbell about that."

The Gap

The Gap, by Richard Lorber and Ernest Fladell, 178 pp. McGraw—Hill Book Company, 1968.

By TOM BROWN

A bald, 42-year-old advertising executive and his long-haired, pot-smoking nephew agree to spend a summer together. Purpose: to write a book about the generation gap.

Such a book, they decided, called for a special type of research. To enhance their collaboration, the co-authors (Richard Lorber is the one in sandals and Ernest Fladell is the one in the Brooks Brothers suit) each introduced his own way of life to the other.

Lorber, an honors graduate in art history at Columbia, showed his uncle how to handle a hookah and economize a reefer. Fladell, in turn, invited the youth to sip martinis with a client. The two relaxed at Fladell's swank suburban estate and at a student apartment Fladell called a "giant ashtray."

Throughout the summer of 1967, they traded opinions on drugs, war, sex, and life in general. Each speculated on what made the other tick.

Common diary

The book that evolved from the camaraderie takes the form of two interwoven diaries. It provides plenty of first-rate character description, but it fails to zero in on the generation gap per se, if, by the gap, we mean a breakdown in communication between young and old.

This book, in fact, describes the reverse situation: an experiment in continuous interchange between young and old.

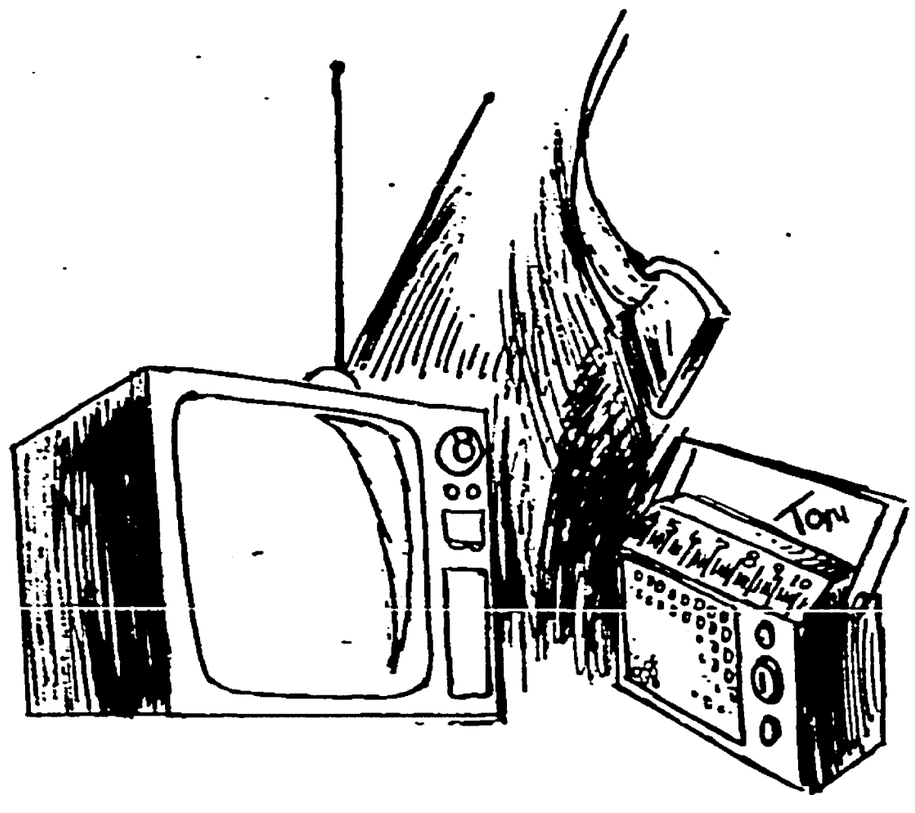
"We have talked a thousand hours together," says Fladell. "And even, these past few years, when Richie began to think of me as 'warm' rather than 'cool', he still stopped by frequently for long visits and intimate conversations."

Thus, the authors suffer no lack of dialogue; their "gap" is only a disagreement about values and life style. It's not a trivial conflict, of course, but it should not be mistaken for the total silence (or static) that often divides generations.

Tense summer

Still, the book is relevant to its title. Even if Ernie and Richie communicate well enough to write a book together, their joint diary reveals it was a tension-filled experience.

When, for example, Richie received a 1-A classification, he begins thinking about emigration to Canada. His uncle sympathizes with him, deplores the war, but still asserts that Richie should not leave the country "under any circumstances." Fladell also notes, "For one irrational moment I couldn't help taking some satisfaction in seeing Richie's smugness shattered..."



Social concern?

The uncle has trouble fathoming the depths of his nephew's concern over Vietnam, racial strife and other social problems. He is disappointed when Richie insists on asking a businessman why his corporation is not protesting the war. According to Fladell, "Business and politics don't mix."

Mosaic medium

McLuhan celebrates impact of technology on warfare

War and Peace in the Global Village, by Marshall McLuhan and Quentin Fiore. McGraw-Hill Book Company, New York. 1968

Editor's note: Miss Covert is an Associate Professor of journalism in the Newhouse Communications Center.

By CATHY COVERT

You may never get to the text of this one, which explodes in your hands, a small black-covered volume blaring white titles amid flashing red-violet bolts of lightning.

Obviously stung by charges that he must take to print to demolish printing, McLuhan has recently set out to make his books as electronic as possible. This one acknowledges not only a co-author but a "coordinator," one Jerome Agel presumably responsible for making the medium a mosaic.

One follows the type somewhat distractedly, one's attention diverted by pictures (Napoleon on horseback, Einstein sticking out his tongue), cartoons, posters, medieval tapestries and running marginalia derived mostly from "Finnegan's Wake." Also Eliot, Yeats and Sen. Thomas Dodd.

Obviously the book is designed to be experienced to surround the reader with sensation, to confound the linear uses of type with as much non-linear environment as can be crammed between two quite ordinary buckram boards.

The message itself-when one finally disentangles it from the embellishment-is not all that different.

McLuhan has returned to his old and only stand, proclaiming the end of the linear age, the imminence of the electronic age, the triumph of new technology and the consequent re-birth of the global tribe.

A slightly different theme may be dissected by the persistent reader however.

Here McLuhan celebrates the impact of technology on warfare, and through warfare on the changing social and cultural scene.

One entire section, for example, is devoted to the natural history of the stirrup, a remarkable advance in technology which put man firmly astride his charger, made possible the battle of Hastings, and eventually (says McLuhan) produced the whole new structure of feudal society.

New technology, he asserts, produces anxiety, disquiet and a loss of the sense of identity. Warfare, in McLuhan's world, becomes the vehicle of search for this identity-lost-through-technology.

Thus radio in the 20's produced a massive depression as "the result of switching the vision of a whole population from visually conceived objectives to the total field of polarized energies that automatically goes with radio and auditory space." World War II was fought to rescue us from that depression.

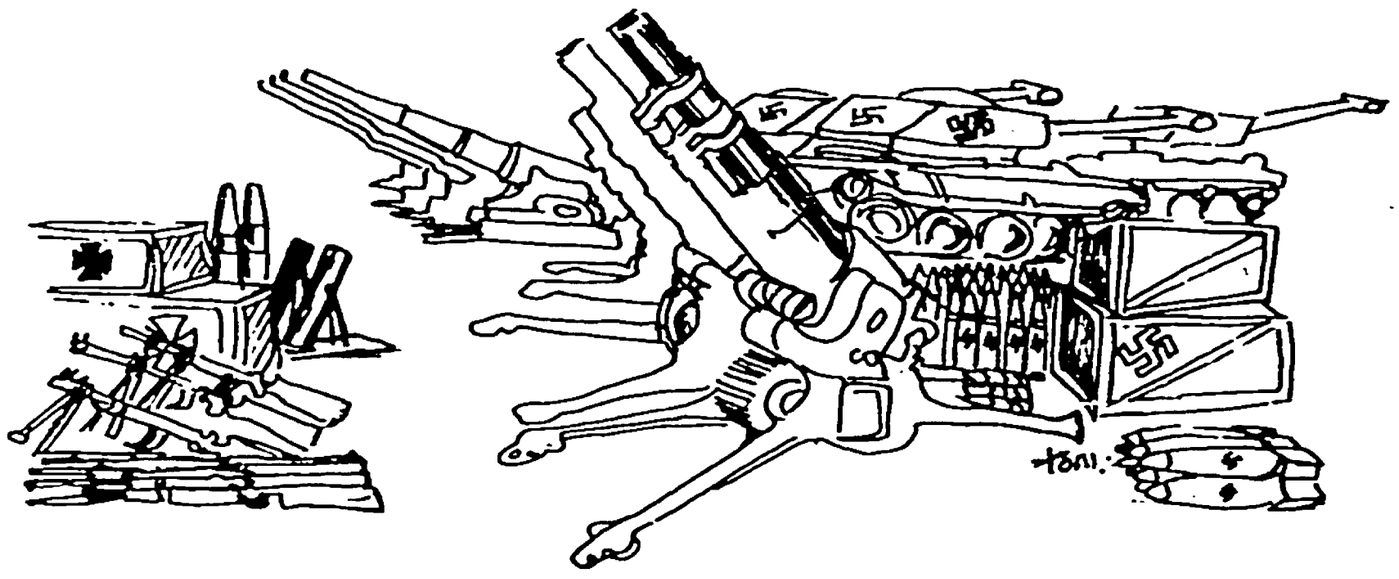
We are now engaged in our first television war, and the main actions of that war are being fought on the living room screen. It is customary among print-journalists to conclude a McLuhan review with a witty put-down. This writer abstains.

It's just possible he's right.

'House of Krupp'

History disarms Manchester's approach

By CHUCK STOFFEL



"The Arms of Krupp" is a monumental work: monumental in scope, monumental in research, monumental in size, but lacking monumentality in its perspective. William Manchester writes not as biographer of Germany's first family for four hundred years but as a political enemy trying to gain revenge.

One feels the personality of the Krupps as precise as the pieces of the steel they made. All of them are methodical, eccentric people with no human emotions. This I find difficult to accept. Somehow the dimensions of love and friendship are lost as the Krupps strut through this volume with the precision of a Krupp anti-aircraft gun.

He has involved himself with the members of the family and through his study of them we can see the rise of the Krupp empire. We gain an understanding of the origins of big business and of the big business of war. Manchester traces the family history from Arndt Krupp's arrival in Essen in 1587 as a small merchant, the marriage of Bertha and Gustav by Kaiser Wilhelm II in 1906, the making of Big Bertha, the cannon that could fire across the English Channel, Alfried's trial at Nuremberg as a war criminal, and finally to the death and dissolution of "die firma" in 1967-68.

I have only one complaint with Manchester's approach to history. He has done a tremendous job of researching the subject but he leaves much to be desired as a narrator. He talks as if he were prejudiced against his topic. He takes his findings of the Krupp family and makes the mistake of implying that they apply to all of the German people. Manchester makes statements at times that are uncalled for and unsubstantiated. I feel that in this respect Mr. Manchester exceeds his bounds as a nonfiction writer. Reading blanket statements such as Krupp aided Hitler to gain power so he might increase his fortune by selling weapons to all the powers in an arms race leading to war, lead me to question much of what Mr. Manchester has to say.

He slanders the German people several times in the work-all in unsubstantiated generalities. For example: "all Germans eat like gluttons." This I find both unnecessary and untrue in a work of history. William Manchester has tried so hard not to involve his thoughts in the book that his personality dominates.

The (generation) Gap...

Richie, on the other hand, cannot understand how his uncle can be wrapped up in the affairs of his ad agency when the '67 urban riots are at their peak. Fladell does take notice of the riots, though, and is saddened.

Richie, of course, is happy. He sees the disorders as a way for the black community to declare its independence of the whites. At one time he shared the pro-integration sentiments of his white-liberal uncle, but now has opted for black power.

The ex-CORE member states, "I understand exactly how the blacks have been driven to violence after observing so many whites filling their souls with the vicarious thrill of a social cursade. White men ride at the head of the civil rights movement in big cars fueled by Negro gas station attendents."

impressionable? Once he tries pot, he becomes (almost) an advocate of its use.

In regard to sex, Fladell holds high the banner of monogamy, but admits to suffering temptation. (His main misgiving about marijuana, before trying it, was that it would make him lustful.) Richie contemplates eventual marriage, but since his intended has gone to Iceland for a year of study, he has no qualms about indulging in frequent one-night stands.

On these and other issues, nephew and uncle have differences of opinion that the reader would expect. What is interesting, however, is that these differences grow less pronounced as the summer wears on.

Why? Not because Richie changes his mind about anything, but because his uncle turns out to be rather open-minded--or is it

After meeting a number of Richie's hippie-like friends, Fladell decides that they are human, too. In fact, he enjoys their company.

The new morality isn't all that bad, he concedes, and, yes, maybe there is something to be said for renouncing the world of suburbia.

Lorber, in contrast, is not a bit pliable. He continues hating the bourgeoisie. Strangely enough, he retains his friendship for his uncle, only so long as Fladell stays within the role of a slightly hip elder. But when his uncle seems to be making it in Richie's own world, the youth admits resentment.

Ironically, it is the older author who comes across as the more tolerant and experimental in his approach to life, while Richie admits to a certain "exclusive insularity."

Their attitudes are reflected in their writing styles. Fladell has a sprightly, gee-whiz tone. His enthusiastic prose resembles ad copy designed to sell the younger generation to the middle-agers.

Lorber's writing is more perceptive, but rather humorless. He is candid about himself, but neither apologetic nor defensive. He is not out to sell himself to anyone. This stance, though admirable, sometimes makes Lorber appear more dogmatic than he may actually be.

The book, in sum, lacks balance. Lorber's way of life receives the lion's share of attention. Only occasionally does Fladell discuss his own life, and then only in vague, defensive terms.

He is more interested, it seems, in trying out his nephew's mode of existence than in telling us about himself. His reticence is not surprising, in view of the preoccupation with youth found in Fladell's Madison Ave. stamping ground. But it disappoints the few of us who wonder exactly why, at summer's end, Fladell returns to the straight life.

Poetry follows youthful development

Vivid imagery, color depict 'Rituals'

Rituals: A Book of Poems, by Douglas Eichhorn, 31 pp. The Salt Mound Press, 1968, $1.35.

By NANCY SARGENT

A Douglas Eichhorn poem is almost a ceremonial form as it evokes images of events apparently out of its author's past and as it provokes a very immediate and personal experience for its reader.

"Rituals," the title poem, indicates the pattern of development suggested by the total collection. The childhood recollection begins "I always felt uneasy when mother washed her hair."

Here the little boy himself, whose perception Eichhorn represents so vividly, describes the scene and his own action in it:

"Blue eyes sealed tight as jars,
And a batch of suds, like foam on the beach in March,
She knelt bare-breasted on the green wooden chair,
While I poured, dutifully, pans of water
Down her white neck and hair."

The picture, with the figures outlined as strongly as in a child's coloring book, is filled in with major color. The blue eyes, although shut, and the green chair are envisioned effortlessly. So, too, the chair and the pans which hold the water are solid in the imagination. The poem continues and recounts "that day I went fishing on my own."

With the background of a man's sensory knowledge, Eichhorn realizes accurately the boy's own thoughtful movement.

"What trout could resist a worm,
Wriggling like the tongue of a red-lipped whore?
I gripped its gills; wrapped the gut around my wrist
And yanked. The fish went limp.
I laughed out loud at the blue sky."

Again, here is a distinctness of the primary colors. Arresting, as Eichhorn offers his reader complete momentary vision, yet moving, as one picture quickly replaces another, the poet's verse gives a full description assuming far more than a child's retention span, but also avoids the complexity and confusion of adult shading.

The poem has to end with "I laughed out loud at the blue sky." This is a young boy's natural reaction. It is the talent of Eichhorn which lets him make immediate the simple response.

Not all of the poems recreate pictures from youth, however. Another poem, "Written on a Journey Northward," in four lines does preserve the unclutteredness of boyish insight, but does so as it unfolds an older person's hope for rediscovering lost warmth with his lover:

"Love, if we try hard again to care,
We could conceivably make it back;
It's much too cold to go on from here--
The ice is too thick, too hard to crack."

The way blocked by frigidity and the failure of continued care is shown without drawing in or even less crayoning the colors on signposts. The simplicity possible for a poet who in his maturity has not lost the discerning eyes of youth is significant here and throughout the volume.

On the front cover of the collection is a fairly faint photograph of a little boy in a wagon. A glance at the picture puts the lad into the reader's mind; but such a hazy image is not replicated in Eichhorn's poetry. "The path well beaten by Buster Brown, where kids test out their new Keds" is as awakening as the cold northward road the lover rejects.

The reader is moved to participate with Eichhorn's images as they are both pictorially and poignantly compelling. And in their clarity and simplicity the path down which to move with them is obvious.

Universities as 'closed corporations'

Research activities displace ivory tower

By CAROL KEPPLER

The Closed Corporation: American Universities in Crisis, by James Ridgeway, 273 pp. Random House, $5.95.

Ralph Nader recently wrote a book depicting the horrors of unsafe automobiles. His "Unsafe At Any Speed" became a modern day muckraking diatribe on the American motor vehicle manufacturers. James Ridgeway's "The Closed Corporation: American Universities in Crisis" has all the makings of another such expose, but without Nader's rhetorical expertise.

Few people may have known about the structural weaknesses of the early Corvairs, but more people seem to be vaguely aware that something is fundamentally wrong with our American universities, particularly in their relations with business interests, the federal government, and the general public.

The sit-ins and riots on campuses during the past two or three years suggest to the public that all is not well. Ridgeway documents some of the specifics of the university's complex and conflicting interests.

Ridgeway's major theme appears to be that universities are too involved with non-teaching activities. Professors are primarily concerned with their consultant work, their federal grants for classified or non-classified research, and their personal corporations.

Universities are interested in the size of their investment portfolios, their growth potential and their annual budgets. Trustees are directors of corporations interested in developing and marketing the latest federally-funded, university-researched invention and discovery. Trustees and university officials sit on the boards of directors of mutually advantageous businesses and industries.

Today's typical university is quite different from the old ivory tower myth. "The modern institution of learning is likely to be interlocked with a defense-system laboratory or AEC installation, located near the campus and surrounded by a sprawl of companies begun by professors who developed with public funds in the university's laboratories the products they now sell for private gain."

Students are an almost forgotten aspect of the university environment. "The undergraduates, for their part, lie in holding pens, off the labor market, providing the rationale for financing the university. The older graduate students, of course, provide cheap labor pools, useful for keeping the undergraduates in hand and for assisting the senior professors in carrying forward their inquiries both within the university or in some private company."

If Ridgeway's book does nothing else, it does provide students across the country with causes for riots, or at least for criticism. For students whose university is not specifically mentioned as being involved in a variety of complex conflicts of interest, enough evidence is provided for students at such universities to seek out the "skeletons in the closet."

While Ridgeway has not stated his sources of information, he has provided much food for thought and discussion and perhaps even some critical and reforming action.

Winter bleakness

Syracuse setting for 'Letting Go'

By JIM GIES

Philip Roth's books seem to go with winter. They are bleak, biting, and often depressing, but they have scenes as warm as bed on a Sunday morning.

"Letting Go," his first novel, is more interesting than the later "When She Was Good." Maybe it's because "Letting Go" has a broader scope, more urbane characters and a university setting. "When She Was Good" is concerned with small-town life, which is, at times, pretty small.

Two of the main characters in "Letting Go" are on the faculty of a university English department -- it might easily be Syracuse University. In fact, the feeling of being in the Hall of Languages about 5 p.m. on a winter day pervades much of the book.

To be really comfortable in a novel I like to know the setting. Not just the setting as the author describes it, but a place I can feel and remember. (For some reason, Lillian Hellman's "The Little Foxes" was set in the orchard behind my parents' home.) For me, "Letting Go" happens in Syracuse – Gabe Wallach has a dingy apartment on South Crouse; Paul and Libby live in one of those dilapidated prefab units on East Colvin; Martha lives on Harrison St. and is a waitress at the Far East.

Roth is a first-class writer. He manages to be precise yet vague. For example, he describes a living room: "We were surrounded on all sides by pale blue carpeting and very low furniture. The room appeared to have been decorated with a special eye out for the comfort of aerial creatures. There was a lot of flying space over our heads, but if you happened to be a simple biped you had to chance it with your ankles through a Scandinavian jungle of coffee tables, throw cusions, and potted avocados."

The people who inhabit his blue-carpeted room are drawn with a similar mixture of precision and vagueness.

Roth is only 35 years old and he has followed the creative writing teacher's advice to write about what you know. His main characters are as young as he is; they are involved in university life, as he is -- the jacket says he is on the faculty at Stony Brook. His big novels are probably still to come. In the meantime, "Letting Go" and "When She Was Good" are two of the best pieces of fiction around.

'Crisis at Columbia'

Value ambiguity remains

Crisis at Columbia, by The Cox Commission, 222 pp. Random House, $1.95.

By CHARLES WALTER

When the Cox Commission Report on the disturbances at Columbia last spring was first published, it was acknowledged as a bona fide investigation rather than a whitewash. The report pans everybody.

Ex-president Grayson Kirk, like every dead horse, receives a thump or two—for authoritarianism, running the university like a business and failing to communicate with faculty and students. Students were recognized as concerned about pressing social problems but their wrists were slapped for lack of self-discipline and use of force. The Ad Hoc Faculty Committee enlarged the tragedy, said the report, by threatening to interpose themselves between students and police and thus delaying the call of police.

Everybody lost at Columbia.

This is true in a national sense also. Education has been the panecea of America. The problems we can't resolve today we can surely solve tomorrow through "education." The growth of our state university systems providing low cost education and state scholarship programs enabling the less privileged to go to college reflect the distinctly American pursuit of equal opportunity.

That is why Columbia seared into the national consciousness. It was the cataclysmic rejection of a basic American faith. Or so most Americans and the police seemed to view it.

Actually education had lost this aura long ago among those who had experienced it. American youth who had been prepared all through high school for college found the reality gravely disillusioning compared to the image set upon an Ivory pedestal by their parents, teachers and guidance counselors. After four years the disconnected courses taught by graduage students and professors whose true interest lay outside the classroom did not add up to an "education" or anything else but disconnected courses

Yet a great deal could be salvaged from this if a student was conscientious and self-disciplined. What caused greater disillusionment was the structure and operation of the University itself.

Students of this generation actually believe democratic processes are the best way of making decisions and granting authority. Current supposed democratic processes in the larger political world are not necessarily esteemed by students because they seem corrupt. The ideal democratic process remains the sought after goal. Yet what happens when students seek a share in the decision making process?

"At a time when the spirit of self-determination is running strongly, the administration of Columbia's affairs too often conveyed an attitude of authoritarianism and invited distrust," said the Cox Report Perhaps students today are behaving differently because they still believe what they were taught. Then they look at the modern university and see its connection with business and the Defense Department (at Columbia it was the IDA) and its detachment from the problems of racial injustice, the impoverished, and especially the war in Vietnam, as moral issues.

The Cox Commission Report perceives many of the sources of student unrest. One of its main observations urges the liberal community to react against those who employ force.

But Columbia and Chicago also showed that the liberal community mobilizes in support of the radicals when the radical's chief allies, the police, start hitting them over the head.

The ambiguity over values-what is the purpose of education and the university, what means are legitimate to protest the war, what is the basis of law, morality or whoever happens to have the most power-is more widespread than the Cox Commission realizes. As a document to clear up the ambiguity, it offers few guiding values.

Technology vs. humanism

Fromm offers alternative

The Revolution of Hope: Toward a Humanized Technology, by Erich Fromm, 192 pp. Harper and Row, 1968, $4.95.

By ABE WAGNER

In the "Revolution of Hope," which Fromm himself describes as his most important work since "The Art of Loving," he offers an alternative to the "sterility and alienation of our times."

Written as a response to the situation of American society in the year 1968, the book addresses itself squarely to the current condition of society. Dr. Fromm is convinced "that we are at a crossroads: one road leads to a completely mechanized society with man as a helpless cog in the machine; the other to a renaissance of humanism and hope." The latter road Fromm describes would serve to put man's well being as the master of technology.

Famed psychoanalyst Eric Fromm has, in the past twenty some years, managed to produce a remarkable series of books, seemingly interrelated and each one appearing more significant than the one before.

For those in society who are not entirely sure what the key issues actually are, Fromm seeks to clarify them, stating the dilemma of our times. The book is aimed at both young and old who find themselves trapped by technology and sharing a common concern for the "modern industrial man...trapped in meaningless work and compulsive consumption."

In our present society, Fromm finds that ideologies and social realities have misused many valuable ideas and "coopted" them to support the status quo.

This does not mean that many of our current ideas are without merit. Fromm makes a special point to the younger generation not to "belittle traditional thought" for even the most radical development of society must maintain some sense of continuity with the past.

Fromm bases his optimism for the future on several factors. First, the social system as it now exists can be better understood if we connect the individual "Man" with the entire system, studying the effects the system has on man. Besides introducing the human factor, Dr. Fromm finds an increasing dissatisfaction with our present way of life — with the passiveness and boredom with life that has inspired actions such as the McCarthy campaign of 1968.

More generally, he finds that the traditional ideologies have lost much of the appeal they once had. The distinctions of "left" and "right," between "communism" and "capitalism" that once captured the minds and souls of the masses no longer do so. What is needed to sustain a new hope for society is a revolution based on a new orientation, a new philosophy "which is centered on the priorities of life — physically and spiritually — and not on the priorities of death."

The movement which Fromm describes is intertwined with the ideas of activation, responsibility, and participation -- those very concepts which are the earmarks of a humanized society.

Differing from some of his other works, Fromm puts forth concrete proposals for the humanizing of society and the impiementation of his movement, including a National Council called "the Voice of American Conscience" and small, de-centralized groups of concerned citizens.

What Erich Fromm has produced in total is a work both stimulating and refreshing. It is seldom, indeed, that one can make a realistic assessment of the crisis of modern man, and find such a real possibility for man to reassert himself and make society human once again.

Correspondents journey for peace

Two raise cry of anguish

Mission to Hanoi, by Harry S. Ashmore and William C. Baggs, 369 pp. G. P. Putnam's Sons.

A cry of anguish is the inevitable response of any sensitive person to Ashmore and Baggs' "Mission to Hanoi."

How is it that double dealing and secret dealing have come to characterize our foreign policy decisions? Where do men such as Fulbright find the personal and moral commitment needed to continue to criticize, without effect, the Vietnam strategies of a Johnson presidency?

Ashmore and Baggs originally went to Hanoi to discuss the possibility of the DRV (Democratic Republic of Vietnam) attending a conference on Southeast Asia sponsored by the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions. While obtaining State Department clearance for the January, 1967 visit, the authors were asked to make a number of inquiries in Hanoi on behalf of the State Department.

In March and April of 1968, Ashmore and Baggs returned to Hanoi to further delineate the efforts needed to end the war.

In both instances the highly successful and conciliatory documents with which the two American journalists returned were discredited and treated only lightly.

At no time did Rusk or Johnson evince any desire to speak with either Ashmore or Baggs about their discussions in Hanoi with officials of the DRV.

Ashmore and Baggs feel that America's foreign policy was largely the reflection of one man's personality — Johnson's. His lack of Senatorial experience on foreign policy issues, his wheeler-dealer style of politics and his lack of humility were reflected in Johnson's personal version of foreign policy. Johnson's inability to find a non-military solution to the Vietnam problem cannot be blamed solely on the restiveness of America's military establishment.

The key is Johnson's ego: "...he does not intend to be the first American President to lose a war. So he turned to a Texas-style effort to wheel and deal the United States out of Vietnam in terms at least equivalent to those of President Eisenhower obtained in Korea...If he could just whip 'em a little bit, and make 'em admit it, he would guarantee he would be generous on the settlement.

Johnson had help, of course, in bulldozing Congress and the bureaucracy into continued escalations. One base of support was the military's eagerness to test their new machines and strategies. Another was Secretary of State Dean Rusk who had made a commitment to military containment long ago.

America's front porch extended all the way to Asia. Johnson and Rusk share the same fundamental views on the sanctity of America's front porch and how to protect it best. According to the authors, "more....than any of his predecessors, Lyndon Johnson has managed to reduce high government policy to the first person singular."

This has had dire consequences regarding America's policy in Vietnam. The exposure of Johnson's wheeling-dealing tactics has created disillusionment and criticism by administrative officials, Congressmen, journalists, and the public.

Besides contributing to the condemnations of President Johnson, Ashmore and Baggs', account also adds doubt to the ability of the American political system to handle its foreign and domestic affairs.

Even assuming our ideals

The emphasis on Johnson's personality and its effects on foreign policy must be enjoyed by all those who feel that personality is the important variable in any analysis of political areas. While Ashmore and Baggs certainly seem to make a strong case for Johnson as an example of such a theory, they do not consider any other personalities and their policies--Fulbright, Kennedy, Eisenhower, Roosevelt--in such a light.

This book blames Johnson for the continued military efforts in North Vietnam and the deadlocks in Paris. Hanoi has been interested in peace negotiations and has talked fully with Ashmore and Baggs. Their conditions did not seem implacable to the two journalists until they encountered the Johnson maneuverings in duplicity and secrecy.

Even Johnson's speech to the nation on March 31, 1968, was an exercise in duplicity for it was accompanied by intensified bombing in Vietnam. To the American public, the book illustrates that matters in Washington are definitely amiss.

Should the second Johnson president have been impeached for his conduct of the Vietnamese war is a question the reader cannot help asking at the conclusion of this book.

SDS seeks to liberalize dorm living

By RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

About fifty members of Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) met last night to search listlessly for a focal point of their discontent.

Plans for dormitory independence day, designed to protest the lack of parietal hours in St. Mary's dormitory, were abandoned when the dorm was granted seven day visitation hours early this week. Bob Tumposky, SDS president, commented that the administration "cut the rug out from under us" on the St. Mary's issue. "We are sort of in flux," he said.

Essentially, SDS is trying to mobilize students to protest living center regulations. Efforts are aimed primarily at the women's dorms because the organization considers them to be "not as liberated" as those of the men's.

So far reaction to publicity announcing protest meetings has not been good. According to one member, "there is a lot of discontent on campus and no one specific issue."

Last night's meeting added credence to this observation as attention jumps restlessly from one issue to another.

It touched briefly on food service, and then went to the plight of the girls whose cottages are being closed at the end of this semester. Neither seemed to suffice as a mobilizing issue.

Eventually discussion drifted to the problems of extending the influence of SDS on campus.

"We must find out what students are talking about," Tumposky remarked. He also stressed the importance of "avoiding a psychology of failure."

The possibilty of organizing SDS members into teams of two or three to go into dorms and discuss complaints with residents was considered. One coed countered that girls in her dormitory "asked if SDS was a new sorority" when they read notices of the organizations's meetings.

The only definitive plans made were those to continue the picketing of downtown supermarkets who are purchasing grapes from California. An announcement was made that a bus will leave the SDS office Saturday at 10:00 a.m. to carry members to the scene of the picketing.

'The Beatles'

Simplicity fundamental in new album

By JOHN WISNIEWSKI

For those who think "Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band" should set precedent for future Beatle LP releases, "The Beatles" (Apple SWOB 101) will provide disappointment. The Beatles have abandoned the musical complexities which permeated the widely heralded "Sgt. Pepper" in favor of the structural simplicity of their early style.

Paul McCartney indicated that the group will soon make a stage comeback to include several U.S. concerts this spring. The album provides ample material for such live performances.

Despite its relative simplicity, "The Beatles" required more studio hours (over 300) to complete than "Sgt. Pepper" did. Unlike "Sgt. Pepper," the songs in "The Beatles" do not contribute to a unified whole. Each song stands alone, exhibiting rockdom's influence on the group. Some cuts are obvious and deliberate "pinches," while others are subtle references to other artists.

There is the Presley-like "Yer Blues" and the Dylanesque "Rocky Raccoon." "Back In The U.S.S.R." does not parody the Beach Boys--it shows the Californians how their material should have been done in the first place. Donovan might just as well have sung "Blackbird" and "Mother Nature's Son." And Tiny Tim is the target of "Honey Pie."

The Beatles cover a vast range of moods. They go from the melancholy tones of "While My Guitar Gently Weeps" (George Harrison's best effort to date) to the happy-go-lucky sound of "Ob-La-Di, Ob-La-Da." Contrast the sexual suggestiveness of the hard-driving "Helter Skelter" to the innocence of gentle "Julia."

John Lennon's lyrics do not approach the achievement of "I Am The Walrus," but they still convey thoughts free of pretentions. If there is any message to be conveyed, it is one condemning violence. Lennon sarcastically says that "happiness is a warm gun." "The Continuing Story Of Bungalow Bill" takes a poke at America's gun-toting society ("He's the all American bullet-headed saxon mother's son").

The album is not without its shortcomings. "Revolution 9" barely makes it as head music and "Wild Honey Pie" is less than amusing. The highlight of the LP is Harrison's fine guitar work (especially on "While My Guitar Gently Weeps").

"The Beatles" certainly ranks with "Music From Big Pink," the Butterfield Blues Band's "In My Own Dream" and the the Electric Flag's "A Long Time Comin'" as a few of the year's better rock releases.

"What we're trying to do," said Lennon in "Rolling Stone," "is rock and roll with less of your philosorock because rockers is what we really are. That's what this new record is about."

which has been demonstrated by the Administration and faculty and which we strongly feel is not misplaced," it continued.

The court's opinion offered proof of the liberal atmosphere of SU by noting three changes in the last year: The modification of Rule One "to provide for the modern rights of due process;" the allowance of alcoholic beverages on campus at registered social functions; and the creation of the Council on Student Life.

UJB also heard another case last night involving the violation of the same University Housing rule, but a decision has not yet been deliberated.

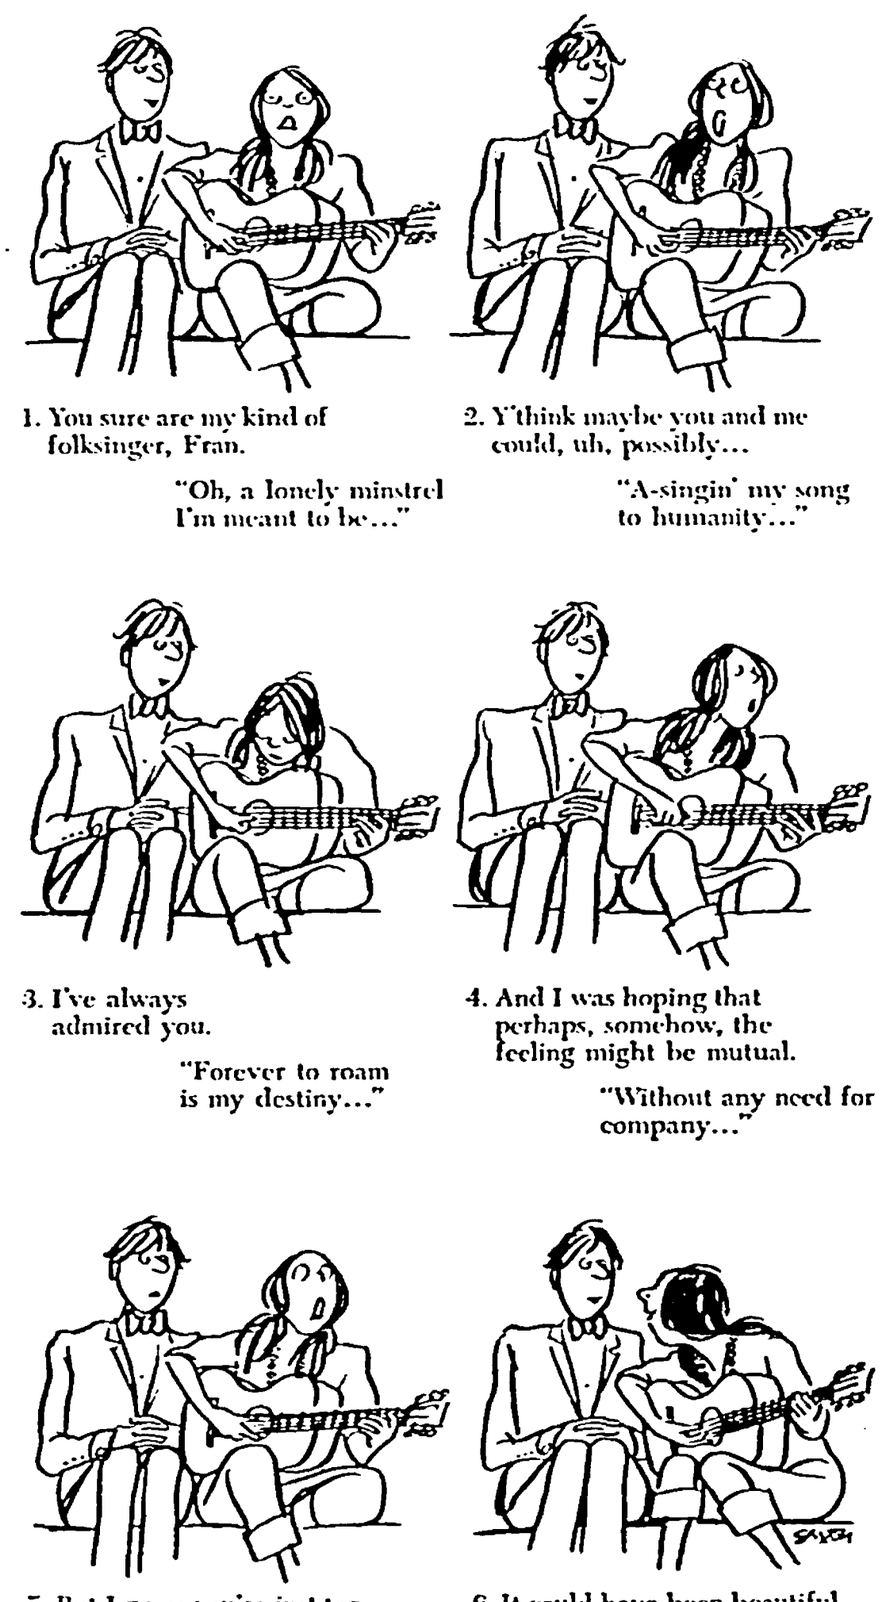
Money and integration lead to problems in new arrangement for school system

Currently being considered in the city of Syracuse is a new arrangement for the elementary school system. The new plan would involve four "campuses" in quadrants of the city, each campus being eight separate schools of approximately 540 pupils per school, located around a common hub.

Each of the campuses would have a computer to speed up and significantly add to evaluative processes in elementary education. The modern facilities and centralized location would provide many more opportunities for both students and teachers than can be found in any of Syracuse's current schools or possibly even in any other American school system today.

The educational advantage is not cut and dried, of course. As with anything that is innovative, objections to the plan have arisen seemingly based on criticism of what is claimed to be unnecessary changes and unneeded or unwanted aspects in the plan. Other objections arise from those who decry the possible end to the neighborhood school, fearing that some drastic event will befall their child while being transported by bus. The projected cost of the system has also been widely criticized.

The campus plan unquestionably would offer an education of much higher quality to the children of Syracuse than they are now getting in the current dilapidated system or in any modernization proposed for that system. Many mothers still come out adamantly opposed to it, however, and many Syracusans have supported that opposition. Why?



Two major elements seem to be the true motivators of the objections. One of these is the integration aspect. The campus plan would be arranged so that State guidelines on integration will be met and black and white teachers as well as students would be able to mix in some constructive proportion. A fear of that integration process still lies at the base of many of the objections presently couched in other terms.

The second major motivator is cost. Although claims about high cost are used in part to hide objections to integration, there are genuine concerns about the cost for the campus plan to be fully implemented.

In view of today's technology, good education is an obvious necessity, rather than a luxury. Somehow, though, many taxpayers seem to think that such an education can be had without paying for it and they vote against raising school budgets as a matter of course.

The proposed raise in school taxes to cover Syracuse's campus plan would be about $12-$15 for the average single-family property in Syracuse. And while hundreds of dollars are spent in a year for cigarettes, alcohol, unneeded clothing in new styles, electric scissors and other paraphernalia, taxpayers object to $15 more per year for an exciting educational possibility.

It is such reasoning which hampers the entire American social system and, by limiting educational development, helps perpetuate the limited sort of thinking which is the source of many of our other domestic and international problems.

Moynihan appointment is called 'most hopeful'

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

The appointment of a former Syracuse University associate professor to the new Nixon "in-group" is, according to Maxwell professor Michael O. Sawyer, "about the most hopeful thing I've seen so far."

Sawyer was referring to Daniel P. Moynihan, who taught American politics at SU and who has been appointed chief personal aide on urban problems under the Nixon administration.

Moynihan will serve as the principal staff officer of a cabinet-level Council on Urban Affairs.

He came to SU in 1959 as a research associate in the Maxwell School. Later he became an assistant professor, a position he held until he joined the U.S. Department of Labor in 1960 during the Kennedy administration.

The associate professor resigned from the SU staff in 1963, after being on leave for two years. During that time he was appointed assistant secretary of labor.

The new Nixon aide was a member of the personal staff of Governor Harriman for several years before he came to SU. He served as the Governor's principal assistant on policy and administrative matters when he was acting secretary to the Governor.

He had joined the Syracuse staff, after the expiration of Governor Averill Harriman's term of office, to write a history of the Harriman administration and to arrange the Harriman papers which were given to SU.

Dr. Alan K. Campbell, director of the Metropolitan Studies Program agreed with Sawyer on Moynihan's appointment and said, "Despite the fact that I don't agree completely with Pat Moynihan about the causes of the urban crisis, I do think that his appointment is a reason for some hope about the Nixon administration urban policies.

"Moynihan, a long-time student of these problems, has always shown great flexibility in his views and is quite innovative in many of his policy suggestions," continued Campbell. "It is my fear, however, that the relationship with the president-elect will be a most difficult one."

Moynihan received his Bachelor of Naval Science and Bachelor of Arts degrees from Tufts University. In 1949 he received his Master of Arts from the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy and was a Fulbright Fellow at the London School of Economics.

UU blast

University Union is giving the campus a chance to thaw out tonight as it puts on a Friday the 13th Beer Blast at Shaw Dining Hall.

The Hard Purple, a local group, will provide the music to dance to. The dance starts at 8:30 p.m. and will go till 12:30 p.m.

"Beer, all you can hold, will be provided for the small cover charge of $1.00," said dance chairman Andy Biggs. "But if anyone gets sick of it there will be soda."

desire for reunification, a strong distaste for Communism, and an increasing despair in the continuation of war and presence of U.S. troops.

Noting how the S. Vietnamese attitude towards Americans is "worsening," Morgan said he has sensed among Asians "a deep and bitter hatred of the white imperialists with guns."

Independent of China for 1000 years, the Vietnamese long to be free from outside influences and feel confident that they can live as a unified nation despite their differences, he explained.

So noticeable is this feeling, he added, that if peace comes to Vietnam, other Southeast Asian countries are fearful that Vietnam, with its pride, will become expansionist.

SLT 'faithfully' presents 'Woolf'

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

The complexity of a love-hate relationship and the horror of bared souls were explored last night in the dress rehersal of "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" In spite of a few technical problems the Syracuse Little Theatre gave a faithful and dynamic production of the Edward Albee play.

The play is the story of two faculty couples at a midwestern college who spend an evening drinking together. Gradually the secrets of their agonized lives are exposed.

The production was characterized by fine acting. Rona Lee used a grading, braying voice and flamboyant gestures to suggest the frustrated shrewish Martha. She expressed Martha's hatred, yet need for her husband in sudden shifts from a loud to a soft demeanor.

Miss Lee's tight fitting costumes were a distraction in that they made her appear too young. They emphasized her slim, youthful figure rather than suggesting a dumpy figure of a middle-aged Martha.

Howard Roller playing Martha's husband George gave a performance which consistently progressed from a meek mannered to hatred-filled anger.

The vapid and frightened character of Honey was conveyed with skill by Jenny Maybruck.

Ken Crawley, who played Honey's husband, convincingly conveyed intensity in a subdued role.

Albee's play reveals the futility and tragedy of the love between George and Martha. George tells Martha "there was a second once, when maybe I could have gotten through to you, but now it's too late and I won't even try."

The one last link between them, their mythical son, is broken and with it goes the meaning behind their relationship.

Albee's play also explores the problem on non-communication in our often superficial world.

Howard Roller stars as "George" and Rona Lee as "Martha" in Edward Albee's "Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf?" The play runs Friday and Saturday nights at the Regent Theatre.

Draft group sponsors session for training future counselors

The Syracuse Draft Counseling Service, a campus-based organization engaged in a number of draft-related projects, is sponsoring a draft counselor training session this Saturday, December 14 for SU faculty and students. The session will cover the Selective Service law and various methods for obtaining deferments or exemptions under the draft law.

According to SU graduate student Martha Westover, a spokesmen for the group, "We hope that people attending the one-day course will then be able to help others who have questions about their draft status."

After the Saturday session, the group plans to open a draft counseling office on campus in an effort to provide accurate and complete information about all alternatives to the draft. Some of those attending will help to staff such an office.

The Saturday session is going to be held in Chapel House from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. with an hour break for lunch. It will be run by Leonard Jaffee from the Central Committee for Conscientious Objectors, which is the nation's oldest and largest draft counseling service. Interested faculty and students are welcome. "But it is important that those attending stay for the entire session in order to gain a basic knowledge of how the draft system functions," said Miss Westover.

For more information people should call Professor Marion Roth, ext. 3311 or Martha Westover 478-6292.

A three hour meeting last night culminated in a vow on the part of about 150 students and student leaders "to educate the student body about the issues on this campus."

A list of 31 such issues--including open visiting hours for all students, curriculum changes and experimentation, legal and procedural rights for students, a 24 hour-a-day library and better food service--was compiled by the students at the session.

Student members of the Council on Student Life (CSL) have scheduled an open meeting for Tuesday at 7:30 p.m. in Grant auditorium to determine which of these issues the student body wishes to focus on immediately. They will then present a number of them to faculty and administration CSL members Wednesday at a special CSL meeting.

"There are three ways to get these issues through," said SG president Chuck Hicks, "through a CSL that has a legitimate cause and authority; by demonstration and boycott; or, if necessary, through a close-down of the University."

A major aim of this education drive, according to student leaders, is to "let the students know what makes up the power structure at the University." Then, they say, if the CSL is "frustrated in its attempts to influence policy changes, the students will know what is going on and they'll back us."

But at the same time, said Hick, "it's the student body that has to tell us what it wants. Then if the students are willing to stand by it, if they are willing to get their heads knocked around for what they believe in, then student leaders and I will be right next to them."

Hicks said he hoped the CSL would be the vehicle for change, "but if it isn't, we'll find some other way."

Student leaders said they were convinced that "the student body is in general very frustrated." Students don't want to rule the University, said Hicks, "they just want to be a part of it. They are asking for basic human rights. Just like the black man, they are saying 'Get your foot off my neck.' The time has come for change."

All SU teams in action this weekend

Swimmers to host Lehigh

By IRA SILVERMAN

The Hong Kong flu, which has hit almost every pro football team this year, has made its presence felt on SU's varsity swimming team, too.

Marv Schwartz, a junior 500 freestyle stand-out, Al Comly, a senior 200 breaststroke performer and Dave Crockenberg, a senior who swims the anchor leg on the 400 medley relay quartet, all are questionalbe for tomorrow's meet with Lehigh at Archbold Pool beginning at 2:00 p.m.

Coming off a resounding 71-33 win over the University of Buffalo last Saturday, coach Jon Buzzard's swimmers seem to have enough depth to easily handle the visitors from Bethlehem, Pa., even if these three are not able to participate.

"This is the best team since I've been at Syracuse," commented Buzzard, who has been associated with Orange swimming since 1953 as a swimmer and coach. "No team will be able to sluff off on us like they've done in the past. We have two good guys in each event."

The freshman swimmers open the program tomorrow at 12:30 p.m., going for their second straight win of the season against Alfred Tech. The Tangerines are paced by Brian Krause, who set five records against the Buffalo frosh last Saturday in only two events. By swimming the 500 freestyle in 5:07.2, Krause set the Tangerine, Syracuse University, and U. of Buffalo pool record for that distance. He also set a pool and freshman record in the 200 freestyle, with a time of 1:51.2.

"Brian's one of the best in the world," said Buzzard. "He can go faster now than six University records. In fact, he broke a University record three times in practice Wednesday morning."

The SU Varsity took 11 of the 12 events against Buffalo, with 12 different swimmers helping to bring home first place points. Only two seniors, Pete Schact, in the 1000 freestyle, Al Comly, will probably see action as individual performers. Juniors Jim Stein, Fred Mapes, and Marv Schwartz all won first places last week.

A fine array of sophomores, including Chip Thiele, Chuck Lanphear, Rob Sinnott, Larry Shulman, and diver Tom Skuce round out last week's winners who should be favored to repeat tomorrow. Lehigh, with six returning lettermen from last year's 5-5 team, is paced by Pete Harding, a former American prep-school record holder in the 100 breast-stroke. Harding is currently ranked among the top 20 college swimmers.

Wilting Orange might get lost in a Kansas cornfield

The Syracuse Orangemen, losers in their first three games this season, will find tough going this weekend as they try to get coach Roy Danforth his first win. As part of the Sunflower Classic, the team faces Kansas State tonight and the Kansas Jayhawks tomorrow night.

The Orange have been hurt by too many turnovers and not enought rebounding thus far. To compound problems, Wednesday night leading scorer Bill Smith had to sit on the bench with four quick fouls as Fordham came from behind to win easily, 77-62.

Unfortunately for Syracuse, Kansas State and Kansas seem to be in a class above Cornell, Niagara and Fordham. The Wildcats of K-State won the conference title and an NCAA tournament bid by half a game over Kansas last year, compiling a 19-9 record. First- year coach Cotton Fitzsimmons has three returning starters to help try to hold onto the crown.

The Wildcats will missing 7' center Nick Pino. Replacing him is Mike Barber, 6'11" junior who will give Bill Smith a flight on the boards. Teaming with Barber is Eugene Williams, 6'7", last year's leading rebounder. At the other forward spot is Terry Snider, who last year set an all-time frosh scoring record of 28.2 a game. Jim Webb and Steve Honeycutt are returning starters at guards.

After tonight's contest at Manhattan, the Orangemen travel to Lawrence to face possibly the best club they'll see all year. Kansas coach Ted Owens needs only 13 victories to make the school the first college team ever to win 1,000 games. The Jayhawks, 3-1, were upset last week by Wisconsin, but are still ranked tenth by the AP.

The Orange may have thought they saw the best guard in the country Saturday night when Calvin Murphy pumped in 68 points against them, but many experts feel the greatest backcourt man this year is Kansas' Jo Jo White. White is not the brilliant shooter Murphy is, and he doesn't have Cal's excitement, but he doesn't have to make any excuses.

The 6'3" senior returns for his last semester of eligibility after proving at the Mexico City Olympics that he can do everything by leading the under-rated U.S. team to the gold medal. He only averaged 15.3 last season, but his playmaking, defense and ballhandling dominated most games Kansas played.

Joining White in a strong supporting cast are 6'9" soph Dave Robisch, 6'10" soph Roger Brown and 6'10" senior Dave Nash alternating in the Jayhawk's double-post offense. Robisch is supposed to be a potential superstar, but needs to improve his defense.

At the wing opposite White is junior Rich Bradshaw, who will probably take his place next semester. Phil Harmon and Bruce Sloan also have been seeing a lot of action.

In any event, judging from past performances, it will take a supreme Orange effort to bring Coach Roy Danforth his initial varsity win and return the mentor to his usual talkative ways. "I don't like to talk much after a loss," explained Danforth last week, "I don't think there's much you can say when you're beaten."

Unless the Orange are able to make a reversal of their erratic play soon, we would be in for many more silent nights.

White will be eligible only for the first semester for Kansas....Bill Vesp's Tangerines have a rematch with Cornell tomorrow night at Ithaca.....WAER will not be carrying the two varsity contests, but will air the frosh tilt.

Fencers try to foil Buffalo in Archbold opener sat.

Alexander Dako, in his ninth year as coach, will send his varsity fencing team into battle tomorrow against the University of Buffalo.

Three seniors and six sophomores hold down the nine starting positions, with tomorrow's home encounter being their first of the campaign.

"The boys are all very enthusiastic and industrious," commented Dako, who lost four valuable seniors from last year's team.

Starting at foil will be Peter Lai, Jimmy Kuhn and Jerry Doyle. At sabre, Dako plans to start Vern Stevens, Randy Gamada and Roger Jackson. Fred Gaske, Kam Lee and Phil Conner are Dako's choices at epee.

"I hope for good results in the foil and epee," the coach said, "and maybe even in the sabre, too."

The meet will get under way in Archbold Gym at 1 p.m.

New Policy??

Chancellor Charles E. Young of UCLA on that institution's recruiting "...we work as hard at recruitment of excellent scholars as we work at recruitment of athletes. We are working much harder at recruitment of disadvantaged students than we work at the recruitment of athletes."

Dr. Young's point is proved by scanning the roster of the Bruins' basketball team for past few years. Lew Alcindor, from New York; Lucius Allen, from Kansas city; and Mike Warren, from Gary, Ind., are but a few of the "disadvantaged students" that UCLA has recruited.

Wrestlers travel to Temple; gymnasts face Navy

By FRED KRAVER

It is quite shocking to hear a coach talk about his respective team without at least the slightest morsel of optimism. But there does not seem to be a great deal of hope for either the wrestling team or the gymnastics team in their meets this weekend.

The wrestling squad has a dual meet this Saturday against Temple, and the problem for coach Ed Carlin is the injuries the team suffered last week, in tying the Coast Guard Tournament.

Richie Hagaan separated his shoulder, and it appears as though he will be out for the season. "Hagaan's injury really hurt us because we have no good replacement," said Carlin. Ralph Mannaker pulled muscles in his back, but could be ready for action after Christmas. Last year, Mannaker was a runner-up for a title against Temple, and will be sorely missed Saturday.

John Terboss has a slight chance of making it back, though ailing from torn ligaments. Carlin added a slight understatement when he said, "We're hurting."

Here's how they line up: SU has nobody for the 123 match, Glenn Peters (130), Joe Palmieri (137), Gary Barlow (145), Doug Garr (152), Woody Barry (160), Bob Carter (167), Joel Tozer, who weighs 160 pounds, but will compete in the 177 match, Bob Rust (191), and John Cherundolo is the heavyweight.

Coach Carlin emphasized last week's tie as being virtually a victory, since the sqaud upended the highly-respected Lockhaven grapplers. But this week, Syracuse will be pinned by injuries. "There seems to be a very slim chance," Carlin moaned.

The problem for the gymnasts is simply depth. In gymnastics, the good teams have three good competitors for each event, and the talent for the Orange is not that deep. Coach Paul Romeo will have to rely on a few strong individuals if he expects his squad to beat Navy this weekend. The match is set for Saturday afternoon at Annapolis.

The best all-around gymnast is Ernie Santangelo. Romeo is hoping to get a high point total out of Santangelo alone. Ernie competes in four events: floor exercise, long-horse vaulting, parallel bars and horizontal bars. He excells in the first three events.

Romeo sees two specialists with good possibilities. Sophomore Tony DeStefano looks good on the side horse, and George Stalter on the still rings. On the rings, Fred DeCarlo is improving each week. Soph Pat McDonell has a shoulder injury, and his versatility will be missed. He competes in three events, including side horse, horizontal bars, and parallel bars.

Whether or not the pessimism expressed by the coaches is well-founded will be determined Saturday.

Student strength?

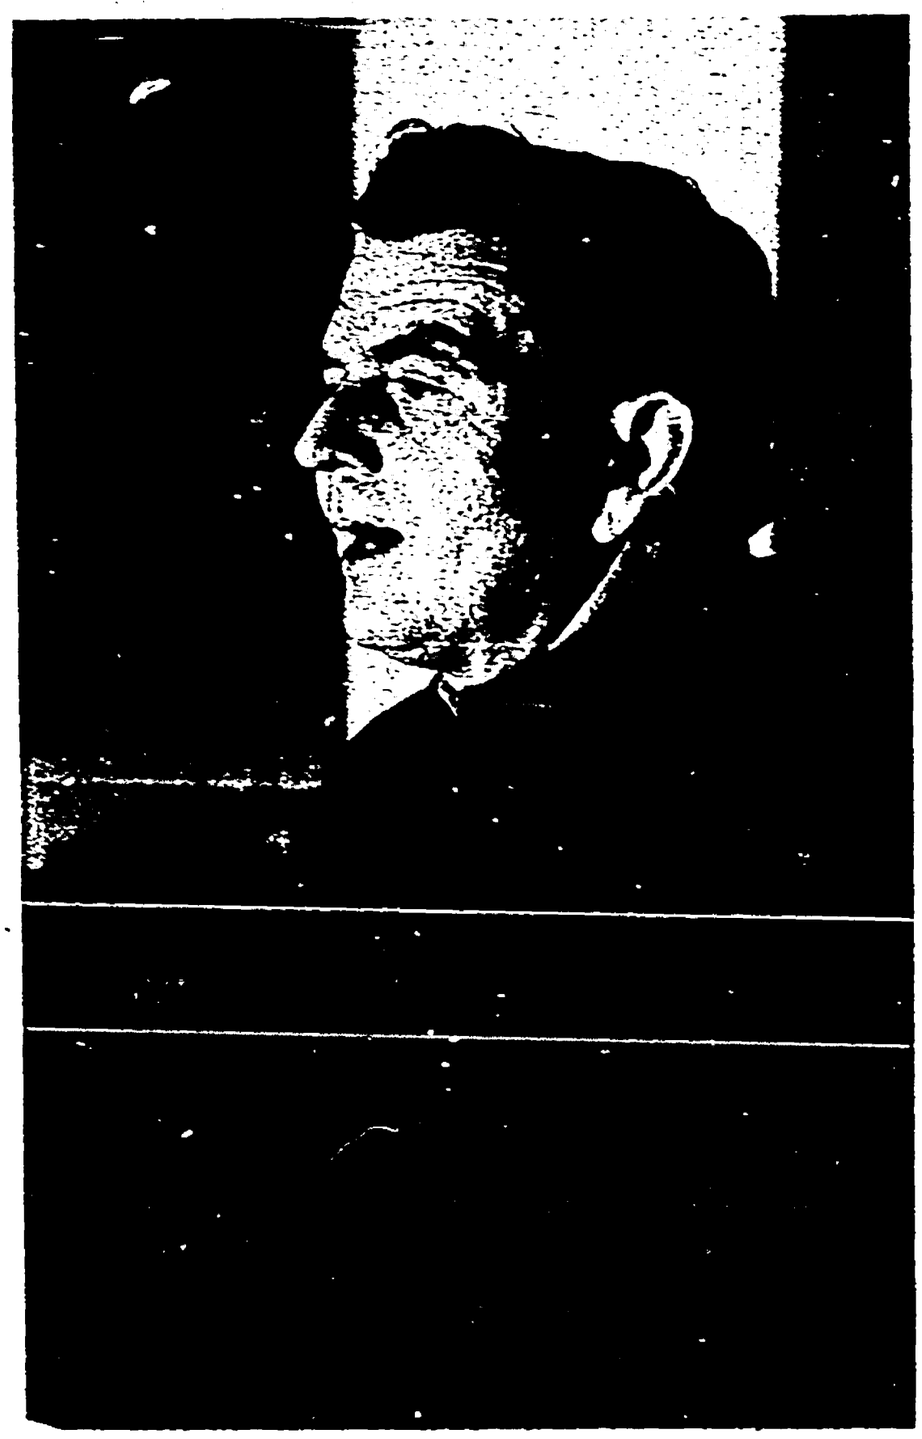
CSL power blitz: 'we'll be at Grant Aud. tonight'

By LARRY KRAMER

Sunday night approximately 50 student leaders from all types of campus organizations split into groups of two and three and traveled to nearly all undergraduate residences to speak about the present Council on Student Life controversy.

Acting under the direction of John Ross, chairman of Student Senate's Government Structures Committee, the 50 leaders set out to "educate the student body concerning student-administration relations." Between 8:30 p.m. and 11:30 p.m. all the residence floors of the university were scheduled to hear a half-hour talk concerning CSL.

The speakers stressed student participation. According to Ross, "We can do almost anything if the student body shows us that they are behind us." Students were urged to participate in the CSL open meeting tonight at 7:30 in Grand Auditorium. They were told that a large turnout was also a neccessity at the Student Tax referendum election all day Wednesday in HBC Lobby.



"The CSL was given the runaround because it was felt that they really didn't represent the student body," commented Gerry Horn, while speaking to a floor in Booth, "and the only way they can regain their power is to show the administration that the student body will support its leaders."

Jerry Tatarian, president of the University Union, and one of the six students on the CSL, told a floor in Watson: "I can cite numerous examples of how our power in CSL was gradually demoted to practically nothing. At first, our decisions were only subject to veto by the Chancellor, through the Board of Trustees. Then, with no explanation, our ruling about blanket parietal hours for all dorms was overruled and revised by the Deans of Men and Women. Eventually, all it took to veto one of our decisions was word handed down by the Dean of Women's staff."

In a strategy meeting Sunday evening, Ross stressed to the speakers the importance of tonight's meeting. "It will be like a town meeting," commented Ross, "and it will be one of the very few times the students will have a chance to show their support of us. If there's going to be any student power on this campus, tonight's the last chance for it to happen for a long time to come. We're setting up microphones on the floor in Maxwell that will enable those attending to tell us where we stand, and what the students want. The meeting will also serve notice to the administration that the students do want a say in the running of their lives."

Chuck Hicks, Student Government president, was one of the scheduled speakers in the Sunday night CSL "blitz." He remarked, "If only a few show up at tonight's meeting, I'll forget about the whole thing, but if the students show up and stand behind us, I know we'll all risk whatever we have here to make things better, to get things accomplished."

Visiting missionary relates Nigeria's '40-year setback'

By BOB DAVIS

The Reverend Peter Hughes, missionary of the Holy Ghost Church of Ireland, spoke at a sparsely attended Biafran teach-in at Hendricks Chapel last night.

Rev. Hughes said "25,000 war casualities will die by the end of this month." One million people have died so far in the Biafran-Nigerian Civil War.

The missionary said that before the civil war began there were "1600 elementary schools, 1000 high schools, two colleges and 73 hospitals in Biafra alone." Now there is no telling how many of these institutions are left.

In the beginning of the war he was interested in property loss. Now he understands "People are what count."

He said, "You can never replace the smiling face of a child if he starves to death or has a bullet put through his head."

At the present time, Biafran children get one meal every four days. This is supplemented with a half-glass of powdered milk a day."

Reverend Hughes "doubted that either side realized the extent that this war will go to." He said that the war had put "Nigeria back forty years."

Rev. Hughes then commented that the young people of the United States have given him encouragement. The hippies have taken to the cause of Biafra. They have hearts of gold, not cold smug hearts."

He advised everyone to donate "contributions if you can." He then said people should "pray for peace and place pressure on the powers that be to stop this terrible war."

SU students will be voting this Wednesday on whether or not to start forking over this $10 "student tax."

Hicks reverses tax position; students will vote tomorrow

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

Student Government President Chuck Hicks has killed the $5 student tax proposal that was to be decided by student referendum on Wednesday and has substituted a proposal that the $5 per student be deducted from the $50 general student fee instead.

The proposed tax would have been collected at registration and put into a Student Activities Fund to aid campus organizations.

After deciding to change the proposal late yesterday, Hicks said, "Even though I strongly favor a student tax, we're loosing perspective. We're so wrapped up in trying to get money that we're missing the point of the whole thing.

"The issue is not so much that students don't want to pay the extra $5, but what happens to the $50?" he questioned.

Mark Snyder, executive assistant to Hicks, advised him that while the $5 tax wouldn't break students, they might feel that SG was avoiding the issue.

Hicks agreed. "I think that we were beginning to cop out on the students. Students want to benefit from the general fee. They want some control over that $50. If it then becomes necessary for an increase, students might be more willing."

At the moment, Hicks wants to know not only in what areas the $50 fee is being spent, but how much is being spent in each area. He has appointed SG Vice President Jeff Portnoy and Snyder to investigate this. Hicks said a request for a breakdown of the uses of the student general fee will be presented to a meeting of the Council on Student Life on Wednesday.

Should the results of Wednesday's referendum support the new proposal, Hicks will use them as a student recommendation when he tries to meet with Chancellor Tolley and F.A. Wingate, SU vice president and treasurer, after vacation.

Hicks, however, may run into opposition, as Wingate yesterday virtually discounted the possibility of a $5 per student deduction from the general student fee. "I wish we could go along. It just isn't in the cards for this year or next."

He said he was "all for" having a certain portion of this money allocated to SG to be spent at its discretion. "I don't quarrel with this concept (Student Activities Fund). I wouldn't object to seeing SG participate in the budgeting process," Wingate continued.

But, Wingate indicated it is hopeless for this year because SU is running on a deficit and everybody, including the administration, is cutting back on discretionary funds. He said the deficit has eaten up the

Speculating in New York City

The transcendent values argued for on this page by the architecture writer of the New York Times point out a paradox in our society. Ada Huxtable would like Syracuse University to cherish as she does the French Renaissance architecture of a past era. Her appeal to preserve urban beauty is uplifting.

But her failure to resolve the paradox brings us down to earth. If our society truly rewarded the transcendent values, the American colleges and universities would not be in the financial fix they are in today.

To over simplify, the gifts to the University, usually by request, are invested year after year to produce income which gradually filters down to support the education we receive.

Hence, Syracuse University owns 2500 shares of stock in Dow Chemical Company, the Hotel Russel in New York City (bought for $1million 15 years ago and now worth $2.5 million) and a service station in Oneida, New York. It also owns stock in General Motors, Union Carbide and Xerox and five apartment houses in New York City.

As Vice President Wingate stated the University is speculating in New York real estate. It isn't offering, as Ada Huxtable reported, $2.7 million for the two remaining houses. That price is ridiculously high for the hard-headed businessmen of this University.

Syracuse is scarcely the sole culprit of American universities involved in the pursuit of profits. Matthew Ridgeway has written a book, "The Closed Corporation: American Universities in Crisis," in which MIT and Harvard are mentioned prominently as universities with a profit motive.

We too consider speculating in picturesque real estate in New York a bit crass for Syracuse University. But neither we nor Ada Huxtable tells us why those SU alumni in New York don't donate enough money so the University doesn't have to speculate.

Investment answers
Drumlins
By Abe Wagner

Following the announcement by the University last week that it would purchase the Drumlins complex, several questions were raised about the investment and the circumstances surrounding it. The questions typical of a communication gap that often exists, have now been answered to some extent.

First, the question regarding the advisability of committing some $2 million in endowment resources to the Drumlins investment has been "clarified." We have it on good authority that all is not as it appeared in the official announcement.

As we now understand it, no money will in fact change hands as a lump sum for the purchase. We are told that Drumlins will in fact pay for itself, by paying off a series of notes out of earnings.

This being the case, the University will not have committed $2 million to the Drumlins deal out of pocket. It will however remain committed to pay this sum over a period of time. With this goes an obligation to see Drumlins operates at a sufficient profit level to fulfill this promise. Currently, there are no figures available to indicate whether or not Drumlins will prove capable of "paying for itself" in this manner. We certainly hope it will. If we are to judge the shrewdness of University fiscal planners by Ada Huxtable standards (see her column reprinted from the New York Times on this page) the University may yet have made a good deal.

The second question raised last week, that of the moral position of the University as an investor is one which similarly concerns Miss Huxtable. With regard to Drumlins, we have been assured that the original statement that "current operations would be continued" did not mean to include any discriminatory policies that might exist. For the final answer, however, we can only wait for time to render the verdict.

The merger myth
DO and Pro
By Bob Tembeckjian

For quite a while, the Promethean has been in financial difficulty. Similarly, the Daily Orange has been without widespread student acceptance or support. Realizing this unfortunate situation, the editors of the Pro and DO met last week and, upon leaving the conference room, Bruce Chadwick, editor of the Pro, made the following announcement.

"I would like to take this opportunity to announce, forthwith, the merger of the Promethean, that fine, incisive, provocative journal and the Daily Orange, a local campus newspaper.

"There are many reasons behind our merger, not the least of which is my longstanding friendship with and unending admiration of my colleague, Charles Babcock. This respect was deepened when Babcock was chosen editor of the DO.

"There were, however, more important considerations. This was not a mere question of friendship, although Charlie did urge me to lead the DO out of the abyss of mediocrity.

"Unfortunately, the Promethean faced a bankruptcy of funds, a situation similar to the DO's bankruptcy of talent. Of course, I do not intend to criticize unjustly - I never do. It's just that my good friends Richert, Stamm, Wagner and Wiediger don't have the organizational talent the Pro has. After all, the DO comes out only four times weekly. How absurd!

"Many people, of course, will regard this merger as a sellout by the Pro. But I ask everyone to remember this: we were faced with dissolution. When the Herald Tribune was faced with the same problem against a competitor as strong as the Daily News (a situation similar to the battle between the Pro and DO), it reacted the same way we did: merge.

"So I urge each member of this university to give the DO another chance. Now that the Pro is lending it its grace, talents and energies, it can function as it always should have - as an effective, viable, responsible force.

"Finally, let me just say that great pains and negotiations were endured to find a name for this new publication. I would have preferred using the name Promethean, but Babcock insisted on keeping it The Daily Orange. Thus, the name of this merged journal shall be the 'P.O.'"

Merry Christmas, New York
Side street sabotage

The following column by Ada Louise Huxtable is reprinted with permission from the New York Times of Sunday, December 15, 1968.

Another chapter in the death of a city is hardly appropriate at the Holiday season, but the erosion of New York's urban assets goes on without pause. As we wrote a few weeks ago, with the city's avenues largely rebuilt, New York's real estate operations have been moving to the prime midtown side streets, where block-through sites are being assembled for mass demolition and standard new construction. It is on these small-scale streets that much of the cosmopolitan character and architectural quality of New York can still be found.

Still, neither planning nor preservation nor people nor consideration of style, function or livability can stay the profit-motivated speculator's hand. And no wonder. With the "leverage," as it is called in business parlance, of tax advantages and borrowed money peculiar to the real estate world, leading to returns, generally, of 15 to 35 per cent on investments requiring little of the operator's own money, as opposed to a median return of 11.3 per cent for the country's largest corporations where equity runs much higher, real estate is the closest thing to the proverbial pot of gold. (Argue this with Fortune, please, not with us, from which these unblusing facts of business come.)

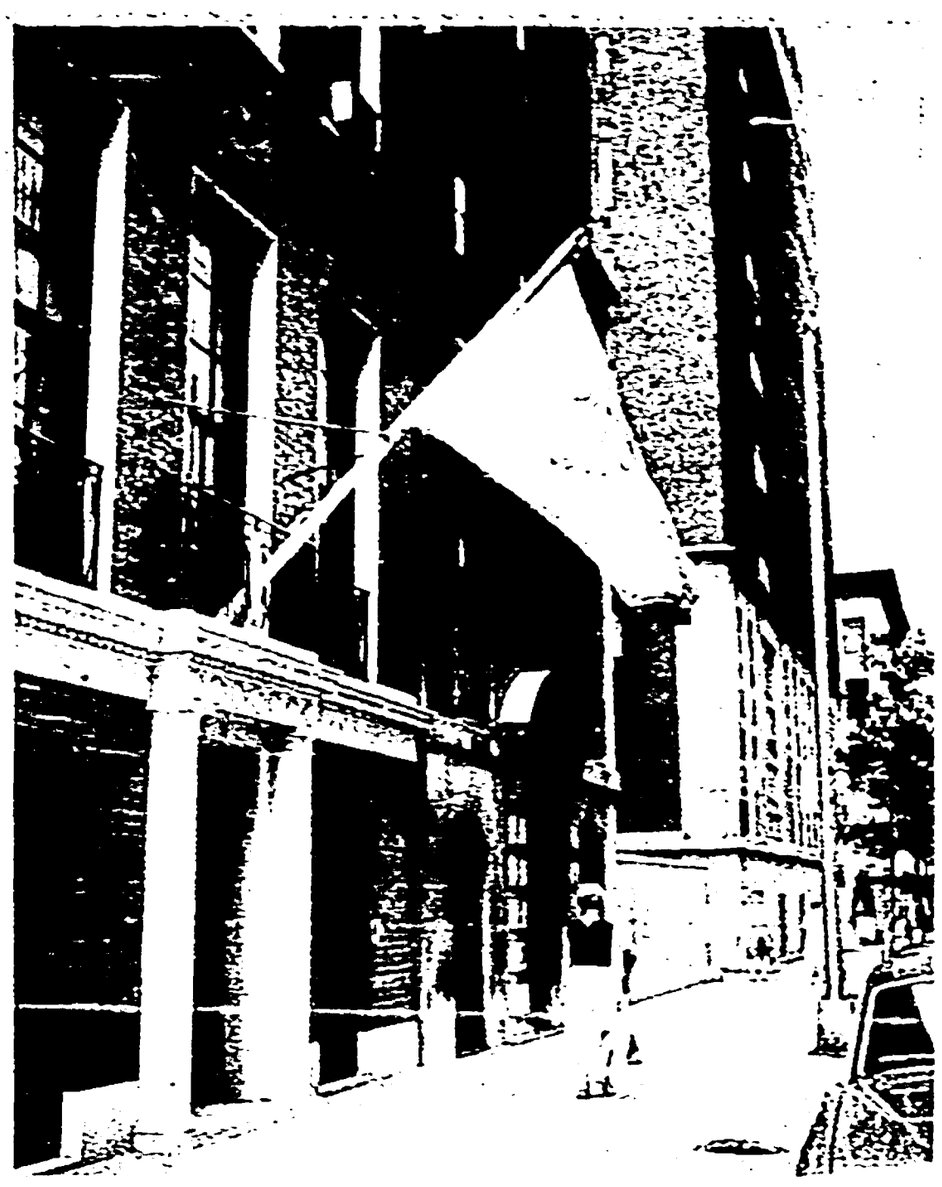
Any city that invites destruction at a return of 15 to 35 per cent plus a few depreciation benefits and capital gains bonuses, can hardly be saved. Interestingly, when real estate men turn to philanthropy, they always do so outside of the building or land buying fields. That would be too philanthropic.

And so those who care about what happens to New York—and its future as a city of civilized amenities balances on a surprisingly thin line—put their hopes in those institutions, corporations, foundations and educational organizations that supposedly support noncommercial standards and will balance them against purely economic factors. Again, in business terms, one looks for the "trade-off" between profit and the urban humanities. These institutions, one assumes, will help keep some kind of desirable urban balance. They will preserve. They will build better buildings. They will consider the city's design, function and esthetics, if the speculator will not. And on occasion, they do all of this conspicuously well.



This brings us to the depressing fact that the latest case of serious side street sabatage is the work of an educational institution theoretically committed to an understanding of urban and cultural values—Syracuse University. Obviously, a 15 to 35 per cent return looks good to a university endowment fund, too.

Since last spring, Syracuse University has purchased 12, 14, 16 and 18 East 62d Street and 15 East 61st Street. It is currently negotiating for the houses at 4 and 6 East 62d. The school already owned 11 East 61st Street, which is operated as an in-town admissions office and cultural center named for its donor, real estate man and philanthropist Joseph I. Lubin. Mr. Lubin, a Syracuse trustee, has been the university's prime mover for the purchases.

Syracuse has now assembled most of the block between Fifth and Madison Avenues on both 61st and 62d Streets, from the Fifth Avenue frontage to the Carlton House apartments on Madison. On Fifth Avenue, the Knickerbocker Club is at 62d Street and the Hartley Marcellus Dodge house is at 61st Street. This building, kept closed and shuttered since the death of Mr. Dodge by his elderly widow, Geraldine Rockefeller Dodge, is

NYC 'sabotage'

'New York Times' charges answered by Wingate

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

A New York Times article Sunday scathed Syracuse University for writing "another chapter in the death of a city" and "sabotaging" a row of "elegant" real estate that is apparently of significant value to architectural history.

The author of the article, Ada Louise Huxtable, an authority in this field, charged the University with "speculating" under the guise of "an educational institution theoretically committed to an understanding of urban and cultural values"–and at the expense of an architectural landmark.

The structures in question are 12, 14, 16 and 18 E. 62 St. and 15 E. 61 St. in New York City, which the University has purchased since last spring, and the houses at 4 and 6 E. 62 St., which Miss Huxtable said are being negotiated for by SU.

The University is buying the real estate not for educational purposes but in order to resell at the highest possible profit for demolition and development.

"The doomed 62nd Street block is an unusually handsome and characteristic example of a well-preserved row of elegant five-story stone town houses in the French Renaissance or Baux Arts style popular after the turn of the century," Miss Huxtable said.

Gale Brooks, assistant professor in the School of Architecture, yesterday attested to the value of the town houses. Brooks, who teaches history of architecture said he couldn't "help but agree with Miss Huxtable." The value of the 62nd Street block, he said, "isn't necessarily in the individual buildings but in the fact that they are intact. The landmark quality is in the completeness of the block."

SU Treasurer F.A. Wingate said that he, too, can see The Times reporter's plea that the town houses be preserved "as a nostalgic reminder of history." But, he said, Miss Huxtable "Is opposing the trend of the times–to replace old buildings with modern structures. It is simply uneconomical to preserve these buildings."

Wingate, who said he considers the planned transactions "a good investment, but if you want to call it speculation you can," estimated that the University will ultimately make at least a $3 million profit on the buildings. "And it's not impossible that it will make $4 million."

He insisted that those who have sold or who may sell the buildings know that the University plans to resell, rather than use them for educational purposes. Wingate suggested that the sell to the University because they realize that the ultimate profits will in fact benefit an educational institution.

That the trend has been to replace old buildings with modern structures also was noted by Brooks. But, he said, "This trend is based on economic values, not social values. It is hard to measure something like this but it is easy to talk realistically in investment returns."

SU 'sabotage' in NYC...

clearly destined to complete a large, extremely valuable and negotiable parcel of land.

The houses at 4 and 6 East 62d Street, presently being negotiated for as part of that parcel belong to the York Club, one of the city's private women's clubs. Because Syracuse University is known to be involved in the purchase some club members feel that they should sell for a vaguely altruistic reason suggested by the fact that the buildings are being sought by an educational institution. Others feel that they are simply being subjected to a rather familiar and unpleasant kind of commercial real estate pressure to give up and get out.

The offer for these two houses has gone up from $1.7 million to $2.7-million in a few months, although the five houses purchased earlier were bought for a total of $1,245,000. That, of course, should be the tipoff that nothing else is involved here than the completion of an investment purchase that will be worth a fantastic amount on the real estate market. Yet there has been a strange reluctance on the part of club members who favor selling to entertain open or competitive bids. Ladies, you are being had. Speculation, and only speculation, is what Syracuse University has in mind.

That fact was confirmed to this reporter by Francis A. Wingate, the university's treasurer. Except for the house that Syracuse now operates at 11 East 61st Street, he made it clear that there is no question of using any of this property for educational purposes. Even if such a use were being considered, which it is not, it would be debatable in that area.

What Syracuse intends to do, after having assembled the land by paying no more than it must, and hopefully not on the open market, is to resell the properties at the highest possible profit for demolition and development. "This is simply an endowment fund investment," Mr. Wingate says. "We have no intention of keeping these properties. We will carry them until such time as we get a good offer."

The doomed 62d Street block is an unusually handsome and characteristic example of a well-preserved row of elegant five-story stone town houses in the French Renaissance or Beaux Arts style popular after the turn of the century. Their landmark quality is enhanced by the completeness of the block. Nothing like them will be built again. Merry Christmas, New York City, from Syracuse University.

Still another case of side street sabotage is taking place on West 78th Street between Columbus and Amsterdam Avenues behind the Museum of Natural History. Here a row of brownstones has been patiently and privately restored by their owners. They have been renovated with loving care and architectural sensitivity and not much encouragement from the city or its lending institutions, which tend to consider the individual New Yorker's attempt to stay in the city and maintain its human and architectural character as some kind of deterrent to economic progress.

Now the work of these owner-residents is about to be destroyed by an owner-investor who has begun remodeling two of the houses, at 120 and 122 West 78th Street, in a manner that will ruin the scrupulously preserved block. He will extend the frontages of his property beyond the present building line, making damaging, out-of-character "improvements." Evidently banks are rather good about giving loans for this kind of thing, called "modernization," which is supposed to jack up values, rather than for sympathetic restoration, which retains values not in bankers' books. Ultimately, of course, proper historic restoration sends property values way up.

Advice and help offered by block residents—including an architect—on ways that would do the job and still save the street architecturally and urbanistically, have been summarily rejected. Perhaps in the spirit of the season the city should make the gentleman a gift of an anti-landmark plaque, engraved "owner-saboteur." It would be an appropriate gesture if not much of an addition to Christmas cheer.

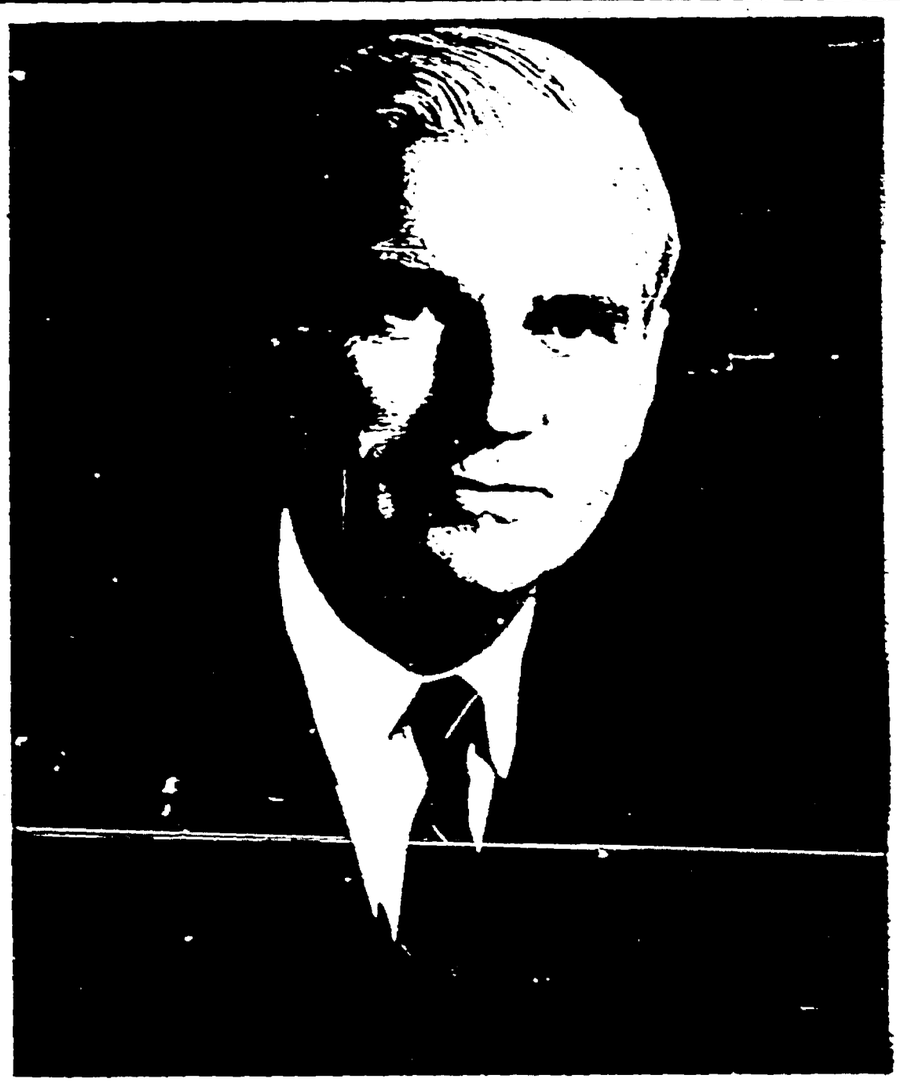
Bronx Congressman lecturing here today

U.S. Congressman Jonathan B. Bingham of the Bronx will give two public lectures today during a visit sponsored by the Public Affairs and Citizenship Program in the Maxwell School.

Bingham will speak at 11 a.m. in Hendricks Chapel and at 2:30 p.m. in Gifford Auditorium.

Bingham represents New York's 23rd Congressional District. He is a member of the House Banking and Currency Committee and chairman of the Foreigh Policy Task Force of the Democratic Study Group of the House of Representatives. Bingham is serving his second term.

During his visit he will be a guest at a private luncheon given by the Public Affairs and Citizenship Program and at 3:30 p.m. he will meet with a group of Maxwell faculty and graduate students.



Bingham was elected to Congress in 1964 after winning a dramatic primary battle.

Before running for Congress, Bingham practiced law in New York City and at various times he held posts in the Federal, State and City governments.

Bingham has long been active in the Democratic Party. In 1958 he ran for the State Senate in the North Bronx against the then Senator Joseph F. Periconi. In the 1960 campaign, he was on the New York city Policy Committee for Citizens for Kennedy and Johnson.

Bingham's father was the late United States Senator Hiram Bingham of Connecticut, the discoverer of the famed Inca city, Macho Picchu, in Peru.

He is married to the former Miss June Rossbach, a grandniece of the late Senator Herbert H. Lehman.

working capital meaning that the University must borrow money.

If the deficit continues, SU's credit standing will be hurt, and the interest now paid on loans which is at the highest rate ever, will be still higher.

SU is now paying interest at prime rates because it is considered a "preferred customer." If the deficit continues, the University will lose this status and have to pay higher interest rates. At the present time, more than $100,000 is being paid for interest alone.

Wingate said funds from the student general fee total over $1.2 million, but because it is combined with other University income, the individual identity is lost as appropriations are made. This will make it difficult for Hicks to obtain the breakdown of expenses he is seeking.

A total of $771,000 in the budget is labeled for student services which include costs of the Dean of Men, Dean of Women, the Women's Building program, Hendricks Chapel Marching Band, Traditions Commission, SG, UU and Pinebrook, to name a few. The largest of these expenses is $301,000 for the Student Health Service.

The student fee was instituted approximately ten years ago, Wingate said. One of the reasons was that SU was covering with tuition money some of the same services that other colleges were funding with a student fee. Adopting a student fee held tuition more in line with these other schools.

Another reason for its adoption was that the Chancellor felt everyone ought to be paying some part of the cost of University operation other than room, board and tuition.

Closing rumors

Despite widespread campus rumors, official sources report that SU will not close early for Christmas vacation.

The most prevalent rumor maintained that faculty members and trustees were meeting yesterday afternoon to consider early dismissal. No such meeting was conducted or is being planned.

Dr. Frederick N. Marty, director of student health service, said 39 students were in the infirmary on Friday. Yesterday morning, however, this number was reduced to 27.

Yesterday morning, a WNDR news headline reported that "three area universities close early for Christmas because of flu epidemics." The three "area" universities WNDR was referring to are in and around Albany.

6 jobs in 6 years is called job hopping?

Not necessarily.
Not at Du Pont.

We have a practice called "planned mobility," a kind of intramural job hopping. It means you don't go into a training program. You go to work—at different growth jobs that broaden you professionally, benefit you personally, and help you find the specific field you want to grow in. Here's how it worked for Jim Davis, an M.E. from the University of Pittsburgh:

"My first assignment was installation of improved polymer transfer systems," says Jim. "Then some research. A patent was issued on my device to apply steam to a running threadline. Next I was a college recruiter. After that I worked on a five-year forecast of the company's engineering needs. Now I'm in a cost reduction group."

For Jim, it added up to six assignments in six years. This may be some kind of a record. But he didn't waste time. Every day of it was solid profit.

Your Du Pont recruiter is a guy a lot like Jim. Ask him about planned mobility. Ask him anything. The coupon will get you some background information before you meet him.

Emanuel Anise, a Nigerian graduate student, then spoke. He told of his classmates "who had given their side for the federal side."

Then, trying to control his feelings. Anise said, "National unity could be pursued no matter what the cost. Nigerian unity can be bought at the price of one million people."

Josiah Osuagu, a Biafran graduate student, spoke later. He said, "We are all one and the same people under God. We shouldn't forget this."

He then said that in Biafra people now "have to wait for a handout and for those who give charity for survival."

Osuagwu also was impressed with the efforts of private groups within the United States. He told the audience that LeMoyne College had raised $2500. He was not, however, impressed with the United States government stance on aid to Biafra.

Julian Friedman, associate professor of political science, explained the role of the United States in the Nigerian Civil war.

He said the "response has come to slowly. Some would say too little, too late."

At first the U.S. tried to find out if it could do anything to end hostilities in Nigeria. Yet it could do nothing to solve the war.

The U.S. has sent some food supplies to Biafra. Recently the U.S. has increased direct aid to the war casualities.

All speakers agreed that money should be sent to The Nigeria-Biafra Relief Fund, Syracuse University, Chapel House, 711 Comstock Ave., Syraucse, N.Y.

Christmas happenings

Day's parodies, spirit make party successful

In tune with the holiday spirit, Day Hall's Christmas party proved to be a success. Those attending were greeted by the dorm's own Santa Claus, Marsha Smelkinson, who provided much gaiety and good cheer.

Following Santa's surprise appearance, the winners of the door decoration contest were announced: Nancy Gottlieb and Barbara Dwyer, Katheryn Salerno and Babette Yocum, Joan Shaffer and Jacquelyn Futterman.

Next on schedule, the highlight of the evening, was the parody of "Night Before Christmas," written by our illustrious R.A.'s. Some excerpts are as follows:

"Twas the week before Christmas
And all through Day Hall
The R.A.'s were busy
The large and the small

The girls were all busy
With parties and booze
And not one single person
Had time for a snooze

With girls in their rollers
And girls in their robes
Graham Hall was the lovelist
Place on the globe

When up on the Mount
There arose such a howl
As girls were struck down
By disease of the bowel

Some flew to the bathroom
And then to the sink
My God — it's food
poisioning
Some of them think

When what should ascend
From the campus belowly
But the great white father
Chancellor Tolley.

He sat in the lounge
And there did behold
The wonderous sights
That at curfew unfold

Right then and right there
Dean Smith, she appeared
Surveyed the situation
Said, its just as I feared

Your freshman hate curfew
They want OPTIONAL HOURS
But, before I'll grant that
I'll be pushing up flowers

Hope the problem is settled
By peace and good will Then Day Hall will be happy
On top of its hill."

Have a happy holiday - compliments Day Hall Exec.

Santa Claus visits ATO

Santa Claus came to Comstock Avenue in a vintage 1925 fire engine last Saturday. His visit was sponsored by Alpha Tau Omega Fraternity as part of the annual children's Christmas party program. The program is run by Alpha Phi Omega service fraternityin conjunction with the Interfraternity Council and Pan-Hellenic Association.

Santa rolled up to the fraternity in the old pumper and distributed Christmas gifts to the children, who were drawn from all parts of the city.

The 1925 American-La-France pumper, which was used by the City of Oswego until 1955, was obtained by Alpha Tau Omega from the Society for the Preservation and Appreciation of Antique Motor Fire Apparatus of America (SPAAMFAA).

'Promise rather than fulfillment'

SU adds bronze statue of Lincoln to campus scenery

A bronze statue of Abraham Lincoln by the late James Earle Fraser was installed on campus Friday. Fraser is the artist who designed the buffalo nickel and sculptured what many consider America's most popular statue, "The End of the Trail."

Syracuse University's Lincoln statue was transported to Syracuse by flatbed truck from the Modern Art Foundry, Long Island City, N.Y., where it was cast.

The first casting of Fraser's Lincoln was made in 1930 for a park at the eastern end of the Lincoln Highway, at Jersey City.

Mrs. Oliver H. Sawyer of Westport, Conn., gave Syracuse University more than 500 works in marble, bronze and plaster done by Fraser and his wife Laura Gardin Fraser. Mrs. Sawyer, Mrs. Fraser's sister, also gave the University $50,000 to support the Fraser collection and Fraser's papers, books, and the sketches and photographs he used in his sculpturing. The gift included the original plaster cast of the Lincoln statue from which the second bronze cast was made for SU, according to Bush, who arranged the gift.

Bush explained that Fraser liked to photograph his sculpture models from every angle. Camera portraits of famous American personalities are part of his work file.

Bush said of the Lincoln statue: "Fraser felt that everyone who did Lincoln did Lincoln the President. He wanted to do Lincoln the philosopher, the woodsman who grew up in the wilderness. Fraser has left several statements about converstaions he had with Lincoln's assistant private secretary John Hay (later Secretary of State) and with his son Robert Todd Lincoln. These men told Fraser that, even as President, Lincoln was in the habit of taking long walks in the woods to meditate. This was the man Fraser tried to capture--the man who went back to nature to get close to God, to analyze his problems."

Bush believes it was Robert Todd Lincoln, with whom Fraser corresponded, who supplied the sculptor with the hundreds of Abraham Lincoln photographs that are in the collection now at Syracuse. These pictures, Bush surmises, helped the sculptor create the statue installed here.

Lorado Taft, art critic and historian, wrote, "The statue marks the beginning of a great life; unlike most of our fine presentments of Lincoln, it shows him in his younger days of poetic vision, of promise rather than fulfillment."

Carpenter Hauling and Rigging Co., Inc., of Syracuse installed the 9-foot work on a three-foot nine-inch pedestal between Maxwell Hall and the Administration Building. Lowering the 2,770 lb. statue to the pedestal with a 50-foot hydraulic crane required precise work by a crew of four men from the Carpenter firm.

Greeks have toy drive for Syracuse children

Representatives of eight SU fraternities and sororities at Syracuse University have presented about 300 toys to the Christmas Bureau for distribution to children in Syracuse.

Members of the eight Greek houses sponsored a holiday party Friday and admission to the party was some kind of toy. Collected toys were given to the Christmas Bureau yesterday afternoon.

Fraternities and sororities participating in the event are Alpha Epsilon Phi, Iota Alpha Phi, Sigma Delta Tau, Phi Sigma Sigma, Sigma Alpha Mu, Tau Delta Phi, Alpha Epsilon Pi and Zeta Beta Tau.

Robert Vogel, a senior, is chairman of the event. The planning committee includes Robert Flax, a junior; Robert Krevit, a senior; Averell Satloff, a senior; Barbara Feldsinger, a senior; Tammy Lubliner, a junior. and Joy Glasser, a junior.

Vogel said, "Each of the fraternities and sororities has given a Christmas program every year for underprivileged children in the Syracuse area. This year we decided to combind efforts and give the gifts and toys collected, as admission to the party, to parents to give to their children. We feel it would be better for the children to receive the presents from their parents, rather than from strangers."

SUSKI members begin free skiing Wednesday

Free skiing will start for SUSKI members who have paid for the Song Mountain ski lesson package on Wednesday. Novice skiers in this group will receive a free lesson on fundamentals.

Three buses will leave from Slocum at 6:30 p.m. The cost for the transportation is $1 and will be collected at 6:15 p.m., the time the buses will begin loading. The buses are open to anyone, including those not signed up for the lessons.

Buses will return from Song Mountain at 10:30 p.m. and arrive at Slocum around 11 p.m.

At the meeting on Jan. 8, which will be held in 117 Lyman at 7:30 p.m., there will be an adventure movie and a sign-up sheet for the intersession trip from Jan. 21 to 26. The trip will be to the Rutland, Vermont area, with skiing at Killinton, Stratton and possible Okemo or Piro.

Follow-up session

Pinebrook participants extend results

By CELESTE LACY

In an attempt to follow through on ideas and conclusions reached at the Pinebrook Conference in October, a second conference was conducted last Saturday at Drumlins Country Club.

The purpose of the Pinebrook Conference is to create channels of communication between faculty members, students, administrators and trustees.

There were six committees which were primarily concerned with academics at Syracuse. Each committee had a faculty and student co-chairman.

Jeff Portnoy, vice president of Student Government and coordinator of the conference said, "Pinebrook II was much more successful idea-wise than Pinebrook I. I say that because it seems that very definite plans of actions were implemented.

"We're now in the process of moving out of the Pinebrook committee into the proper committee already set up by the University," said Portnoy.

The purpose of this action is to take ideas that result in Pinebrook Conferences and place them in committees which have the power to make them work.

Some of the suggestions discussed at Pinebrook II include one made by the Educational Innovation Committee. Several faculty members were asked if there were certain courses they wanted to teach that weren't being offered at present. According to Portnoy, there was a favorable response among the faculty for implementation of new courses.

The Academic Responsibility Committee discussed ways of bringing the University community closer to the surrounding black neighborhood. A proposal to build a dormitory in the 15th Ward was made.

The Curriculum Committee wants to set up a block program of courses. This would involve a set course of 30 hours that all freshmen would take.

Perhaps one of the more fruitful sessions involved a frank discussion about the role of the Council on Student Life. Joey Edwardh, a senior and Pinebrook participant, said she was pleased with the outcome of the conference. She is a member of CSL and spoke of the recent controversy concerning that organization.

"The administrators, students and faculty who attended the conference became more aware of the problem that exists. Pinebrook II was a definite communication program."

One of the trustees who attended the conference was Mrs. John Chapman, chairman of the trustees' branch of CSL.

Miss Edwardh said, "Mrs. Chapman was very concerned about CSL. She and the members of CSL came to some general agreements during the conference."

The Committee on Syracuse University Education will now be investigating the efforts of CSL and will determine whether the organization should die or continue in its activities.

All of these ideas and more came out of Pinebrook II seem to have established a new mood for future conferences.

Portnoy said, "The highlight of the one-day conference was the enthusiasm shown by all the people who particiapted. People were really interested and willing to admit how much work they had done whether it was a lot or almost nothing."

There has never been a follow-up to the Pinebrook meeting. Pinebrook II may have created a precedent.

Already plans are being made for a Pinebrook III to be held in March.

Portnoy said, "People in the past have always been talking about having a follow-up to the Pinebrook conferences but we are the first group to actually do it."

"We're trying to take the ideas that come up in Pinebrook and really do something about them."

Xmas bus

At press time yesterday the Association of Graduate Business Students had not been able to fill the coach destined for New York City. Since this project wasn't designed to be a money maker, the advent of this bus, not completely filled, means that the bus cannot run.

However, since the AGBS has made committments to more than 32 students and is only a few tickets away from the "breaking even," ticket sales will be extended today. Another new feature is that one-way tickets will also be on sale.

Dane Hahn will be available from 12:30 to 3 p.m. in the main lobby of HBC for those interested in purchasing either a one-way or a round trip ticket. All those who presently hold tickets should check the MBA news board in Slocum Hall after 3:30 p.m. for final bus information.

CSL blitz . . .

When asked about what would come out of the open meeting, Ross answered, "We'll choose four main issues and bring them to tomorrow's CSL meeting for immediate action. These will be issues decided on by the students at the meeting."

But what will happen if the administration doesn't respond? Ross answered the much asked question: "There are three alternatives. The first is to act through the established structure, that is act through CSL after their powers are clearly defined and they are given the due respect. The second alternative is a 'take what we want' method. This means that if the students want the library open 24 hours a day during finals, they sit there for 24 hours a day and study.

The final alternative is the closing down of the university. We hope, and we're relatively sure, that this won't happen. But if we're ignored, and treated with no respect, it's a possibility."

Route 17 finished; constipation ends

The final stretch of New York State's Route 17 was opened last week, eliminating the troublesome detour through Roscoe which has often mired SU students in hopelessly snarled traffic.

Most recently, returning students and hunters converged in a massive bottleneck after Thanksgiving. Westbound traffic below the Roscoe detour remained constipated for hours, as hundreds of upstate collegians passed the time with card games and other assorted diversions.

The four-lane divided highway has no tolls, which helps account for its popularity among students.

Danforth just waiting for team to bust loose

By ED AGRANOWITZ

The way things went for him over the weekend, Syracuse basketball coach Roy Danforth would have done well to stay in the Salt City and enjoy the balmy weather.

The gentle tropical breezes that caress the rosy cheeks of cheerful Syracusans might have been kinder to Danforth than the two storms in Kansas which blew his winless Orangemen off the court in the Sunflower Doubleheader.

The hapless Orange gave it good tries both nights, but came up 50 points short in their battles with Big Eight powers Kansas State and Kansas.

Against Kansas State, the Orange succumbed 88-68 after the Wildcats opened up a 45-29 lead at the half. The Orange offered little resistance, rallying only briefly to close within 10 early in the second half.

Bob Kouwe and Bill Smith led the Orange scoring with 20 and 18, but when the later was banned on fouls in the second half, the handwriting was on the wall for SU.

"We didn't play a bad game against Kansas State," said Danforth. "But State played a real good ballgame."

Danforth's remarks take on added signifigance when one realized that three Wildcat regulars were glued to the bench with the flu. Three "instant starters"—Jerry Benoble, Jeff Webb, and Mike Barber accounted for 53 of Kansas State's points.

No relief was in sight for Syracuse as its next foe was nationally ranked Kansas, featuring All American guard Jo Jo White, and a supporting cast of giants.

Danforth knew he'd have to do something different if his team was to have even a glimmer of hope. "In the first half we worked only for layups," he explained. "We thought if we could control the ball we could stay in the game. If we played their game and ran with them, they would have beaten us by a hundred points."

The freeze worked for awhile, with the Jayhawks creeping slowly ahead, but early in the second half the Orange was forced to open up and Kansas sped away to a 71-41 win.

The Orange did manage to stay within 24-14 at the half, but again were hurt by turnovers. White started things off with a steal and a breakaway layup after the Orange had held the ball for the opening minute. Other assorted mistakes (bad passes, failure to pentrate penalty, and missed free throws) helped the Jayhawks build their halftime lead.

"We're still turning the ball over too much," says Danforth. "We're making a lot of little errors."

When his team fell behind 36-21 early in the second half, Danforth had no choice but to give the Orange permission to take the short jumper. That enabled White to score 13 of his team's next 21 points, and Kansas pulled away.

"Kansas is definitely one of the five best teams in the country," said Danforth, "if for no other reason than their height." The Jayhawks boasted four regulars over 6'8" and a backcourt duo bigger than Syracuses forwards, and had no trouble making a believer out of Danforth. "They've got a helluva team," he sighed.

Bill Smith was the only man in double figures against Kansas, and leads Orange scorers with a five game average of 21.4. Bob Kouwe is the only other local possessing a twin digit mean with a 11.2 mark. Smith leads in rebounds with 49 followed by Kouwe and Bill Case with 26 each.

With Penn State and Buffalo next in line for the Orange, Danforth may get an early Christmas present in the form of his first win on the varsity level.

And the team will still be in their scratching and clawing for the rookie mentor. "The amazing thing about this team is that we just came home from three real tough losses on the road and the attitude is still excellent," says Danforth.

So Manley Field House fans may be in for a surprise Wednesday night when the Orange open the home season against Penn State. Danforth warns, "Pretty soon everything is going to break loose and we're going to put it together and win one."

ED'S ITORIALS: The school Band will entertain at the home games again this year, but reportedly have come up with something more suitable than last year's Lawrence Welk goodies.

Gymnasts and wrestlers bow

Records fall as swimmers top Lehigh

The SU swim team coasted to an easy 68-45 victory over Lehigh on Saturday to give the Orange winter sports teams their only victory of the weekend.

Coach Jon Buzzards team splashed out to a quick 15-1 lead in the meet, and Buzzard substituted freely the rest of the way. By keeping some of his top performers out of their best events, Buzzard held the score down and also kept some of his strength from being displayed in front of the eyes of the Colgate coach, who was in attendance at Archbold Pool.

Topping the Orange performances was diver Tom Skuce, who took first in both the one and three meter board events. Other individual winners for SU, which took eight of the 13 events, were Dave Crockenberg, Pete Schact, Chuck Lanphear, Larry Schulman and Jay Durante. Syracuse also won the 400 medley relay with a team of Ross Prosner, Al Comly, Lanphear and Schulman.

The outstanding performer of the meet, however, was Pete Harding of Lehigh, who set a new pool record in the 200 yard breast stroke. Harding, who was an alternate on the U.S. Olympic team, also won the 200 individual medley.

The SU frosh lost their meet to Alfred Tech, but Tangerine Brian Krause continued to set new SU records. Krause bettered Schact's record in the 1,000 freestyle by 9.5 seconds, and also broke Hunter John's freshman mark in the 200 butterfly. He now holds two university and one frosh mark, after swimming in only two meets.

Injuries and other maladies, meanwhile, have wrecked havoc on the varsity wrestling team.

Coach Ed Carlin's boys lost to the Temple Owls this past Friday by a 32-6 score. Various illnesses limited the SU lineup to only three first stringers.

Missing from the lineup were Ralph Mannaker, Joe Palmieri, Richie Haagen, Eric Greenberg, John Terboss, Vin Paolano, Lee Castner and Jerry Beach. With all these wrestlers out of the lineup, Carlin's chances for a victory over the Philadelphia school were slim at best.

Coast Guard champ Steve Parker gave the Orangemen half of their total when he decisioned his man by a 4-1 score in the 167 pound class.

Bob Rust, out for the team only four days, beat an Owl wrestler who took third in the East last year, by a 10-2 margin at 191.

Two forfeits (123, 137) and two second period pins (130,145) gave the Owls an early 20-0 lead. Decisions at 152, 160, 177 and heavyweight wrapped up the scoring for the Owls.

SU's patched up lineup will face a severe test Friday when they take on the Middies of Navy at Annapolis.

In gymnastics, the Orange bowed to Navy, 143.32 to 95.92. It was the first dual meet for Syracuse, while Navy evened its record at 1-1.

Ernie Santangelo, the team captain, paced the Orange scorers with a third in the long horse and a tie for first in his specialty, floor exercise. George Stalter also earned a first place tie in the still rings.

Coach Paul Romeo has until Jan 11 to ready the team for its next meet, against Cortland.

Great games

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

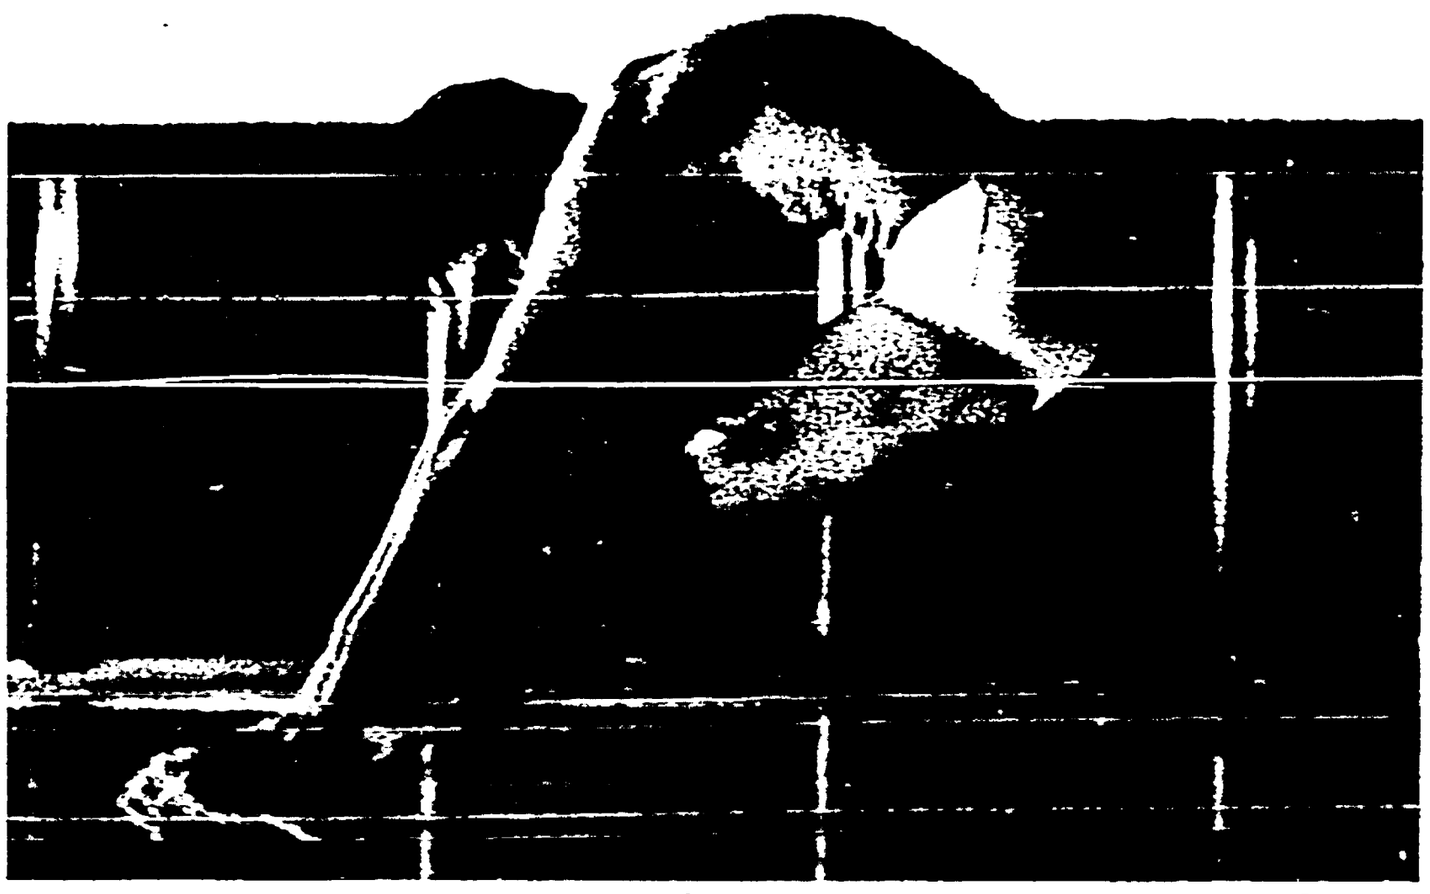
The holiday season brings with it the bowl games and the series of pro playoffs leading to the Super Bowl. The best teams in the country will once again be squaring off, bringing about the liklihood of supreme personal performance and superhuman team effort. Most of the game's greatest moments have come in these post-season classics.

Sport Magazine recently conducted a poll of college and professional coaches, players and sportswriters, asking them to list their choices for the greatest football game ever played. Of the four listed most often, three took place in NFL title action, and the fourth was a college game that took place at the end of the season.

Fourth in the poll was the 1966 title game between the Green Bay Packers and the Dallas Cowboys. In that one, Green Bay held off a last second Cowboy drive in the darkness of the Cotton Bowl. The Packers thus preserved their 34-27 victory and went on to beat the Kansas City Chiefs in the first Super Bowl.

In third place was the Notre Dame-Ohio State clash of 1935. Both teams went into the final game of the season undefeated and battling for the national championship. Notre Dame, a slight underdog, found themselves trailing, 13-0, at the end of three quarters. The luck of the Irish was behind them, however. They rallied for two scores, and pushed across another with less than two minutes remaining for an 18-13 win.

The "Ice Bowl" of last winter took second place in the poll. Green Bay's Bart Starr squirmed through the Dallas line with just 13 seconds to play to turn a 17-14 deficit into a 21-14 Packer victory in the NFL title game in Green Bay. The game was played in temperatures well below zero.

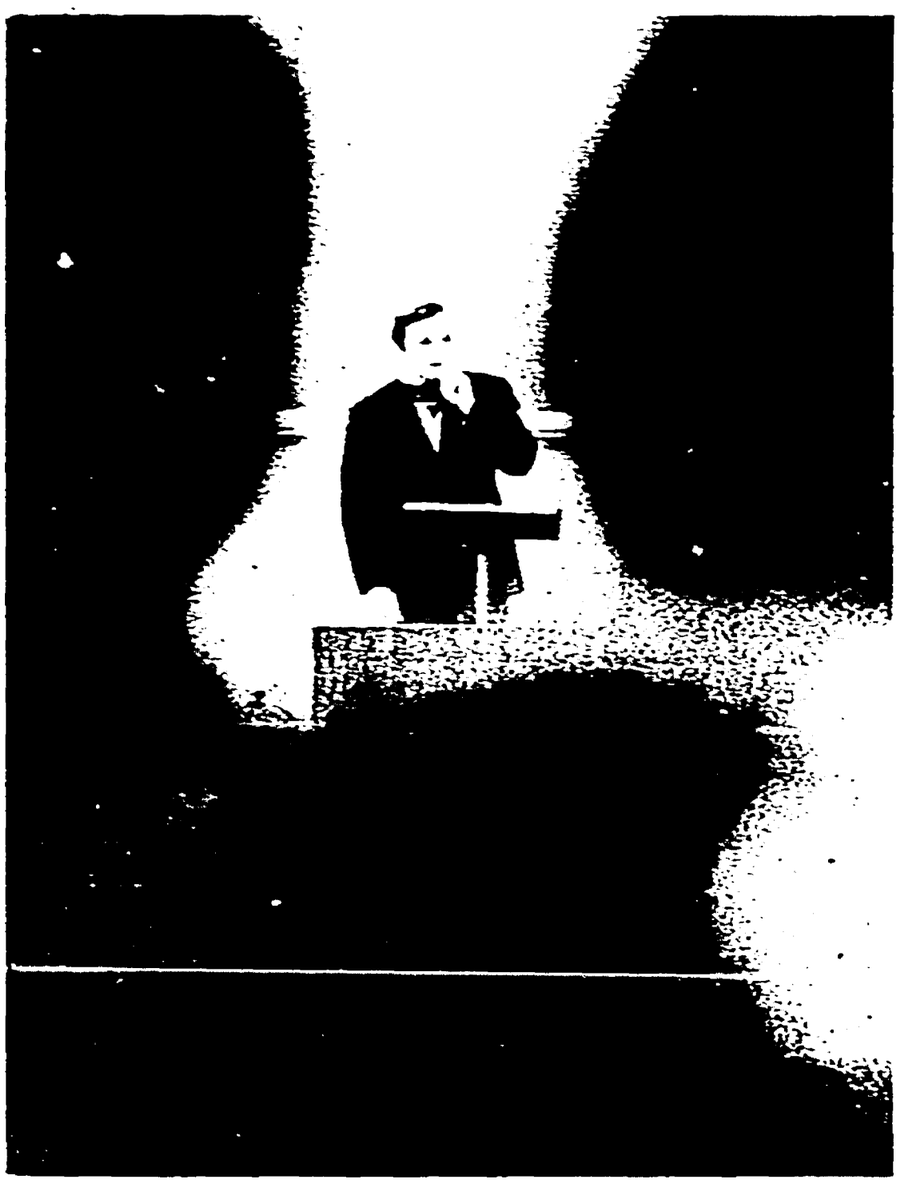


Winning the poll by a large margin was the first game to ever go more than four periods. In the NFL championship of 1958, the Baltimore Colts tied the New York Giants on a field goal by Steve Myrrha with 17 seconds left. The game went into sudden death, with the Colts winning on a plunge by Alan Ameche. Darkness and the crowds had already blanketed the Yankee Stadium turf before the Colts' 23-17 win was official.

Many other famous games did not get onto the Sport list. The Colt-Packer game decided by a sizth period Don Chandler field goal comes quickly to mind, as does the AFL title game between the Dallas Texans and Houston Oilers, which also went to six quarters. In the college ranks, the 1966 Michigan State-Notre Dame tie game was billed as the game of the century.

For the local buffs, who can forget the famous SU-Notre Dame game in which the Irish scored its winning field goal on an extra play awarded after time had run out? Certainly the two schools did not forget, for relations between the two have been strained ever since.

This year it appears that more of the same kind of thrills will be in store. The college bowl schedule has some tasty match-ups. Can Ohio State halt the fantastic O.J.? Will Penn State show the nation that Eastern football is as good as any other? Will the Texas backfield finally live up to its potential?



In the pro game, of course, the big question is who will advance to the Super Bowl. From the play of the last few weeks, it appears that the AFL will finally send a team that will be capable of knocking off the NFL champion. The road to Miami will be an interesting one to watch.

HIGH FLYING Tom Skuce of Syracuse won both diving events in Saturday's 68-45 win over Lehigh. Skuce, from North Tonawanda, N.Y., gives the Orange a real threat in the springboard events, which can provide the swimmers with a nice cushion in the tough meets to come. (Photo by Clemens)

Mass student meeting brings call for change

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

Heckling and obscenities intensified emotions last night in Grant Auditorium as the Council on Student Life (CSL) attempted to obtain a mandate from the student body.

Unanimously answering "yes" to "do you want a change?" the students unquestionably showed concern for their rights at the University. The capacity crowd, which spilled into the aisles, however, numbered 400-450 students.

Whether the emotional impact of last night's involvement will pervade the rest of the campus will be indicated today by the response to the student tax referendum. (story, page 6).

If student support is thus indicated and another active turn-out occurs at the next CSL student meeting, then plans for the "study-in" to make the library a permanent 24-hour center of study will be activated. Some students demanded that they sit in at the library last night, but the majority were content to wait until the planned January 8 "study-in" during finals.

(The 24-hour library proposal will be presented to the faculty and administration CSL members today at a special meeting.)

"I suggest freshmen women go to the library that night, too, and we'll kill two birds with one stone," offered Cindy Bailey, AWS president who urges optional hours for freshmen women.

Direction of the meeting was provided by John Ross, chairman of Student Senate's Government Structures Committee, and Stan Hunterton, who with Ross organized and planned the meeting.

Before opening the meeting to audience participation, a CSL statement was read. It stated that its policy-making power for student life has been "prostituted."

"The real power of the council, however, should lie in the student members as granted by the students themselves," it continued. "We, the students on CSL, now ask you to display this power."

Not all the students, however, displayed confidence in the CSL. One member of the audience pointed out that the members of CSL were not democratically chosen, therefore such power should not be vested in them. This has been one argument raised by the Peace and Freedom Party, which favors more radical action.

As speakers from the audience began to make student demands and discuss issues, more and more obscenities were flung, interrupting the discussion.

SG President Chuck Hicks, who afterwards received a standing ovation, finally rose to clarify their purpose. He explained that the student body must stand behind the CSL in order for it to gain demands from the administration.

Hicks urged students to unify, for if they don't, "then nothing is accomplished." Thus, he said, the students veto demands themselves.

Hicks continued, "You've got be be a human being for once in your goddamn life. You've got to be real people....We've got to learn respect for each other."

U.S. wealthy enough to rid country of poverty: Congressman Bingham

By BOB ZUER
Associate Editor

The United States has the necessary technological skills, natural resources and wealth to eliminate poverty in the country, according to U.S. Congressman Jonathan B. Bingham of the Bronx.

Bingham, who represents New York's 23rd Congressional District, lectured yesterday in Gifford Auditorium as part of the Public Affairs and Citizenship Program in the Maxwell School.

He told faculty and students, "We can afford to eliminate poverty in this country." But he added we must cut down on defense expenditures to do so.

Of the total Federal budget, the government spends six times as much on the military as they do on poverty programs, according to Bingham. To change this the Vietnam War must be ended and the trend toward increasing expenditures for purchasing more sophisticated weaponry reversed, he said. With the great arsenal of weapons currently at its disposal, the government is not paying for defense but "overkill," he emphasized.

Bingham said his biggest fear was that nothing would be done and the problems would become worse and the cities would continue to deteriorate. He was not optimistic that the new administration or the 91st Congress would act sufficiently on the problem either.

According to Bingham, another problem that those that favor immediate action face is obtaining enough support in Congress to get anything done. Less than one-fourth of the members of the House of Representatives are urban Congressman, and only 32 are from ghetto areas, he said.

Bingham suggested four points to use in arousing that support: 1.) Increased realization of the nature of the problems. 2.) A greater awareness of the history of the injury collectively imposed on blacks by whites. 3.) Wider acceptance of the fact that prejudice exists. 4.) A willingness to sympathize with the disadvantaged.

"I don't know a time when the problems have been greater or more severe...but what other time in history would you rather be living in...or what other country would you rather be living in?" he asked his audience.

JONATHAN B. BINGHAM

Bingham suggested improving our political institutions and mobilizing forces for political action as ways of curbing this dissatisfaction. He called for a modification of Congress' seniority system and changes in our electoral process. He cited especially the "miracle" in New Hampshire where Sen. Eugene J. McCarthy convinced young people they can produce change through political institutions as reason for hope in the future.

Investigation clears SU of new 'slumlord' charges

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

The "University as (the) second largest slumlord in Syracuse" has been listed as an issue affecting SU students in "The Council on Student Life and the Issues," a notice circulated by CSL last week.

Similar charges against the university were investigated by the Maxwell School's Committee on the American Dilemma, a group organized a few days after the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King.

Robert Leighninger, a Maxwell graduate student, submitted an interim report on the issue called "The University as a Slumlord." Discussing that report yesterday, Leighninger said it was his opinion that "the university could not be called a slumlord."

Maps of the area north of the main campus to East Genesee Street used by Leighninger showed the university's holdings to be greatest in the three blocks below East Adams Street between University and South Crouse Avenues.

But, in none of those maps, provided by the City of Syracuse, were large sections of housing owned by the university. Lots owned amounted to less than half a block in each case. In many of the other blocks in the East Genesee Street area, much of the university-owned land was vacant.

Two of the structures owned by SU were being rented to planned parenthood and legal service organizations.

Leighninger said that "the common concept of the university owning most of the property (in the East Genesee area) just isn't true." He pointed out the area northeast of Walnut Park as having fewer university-owned houses than commonly assumed.

Attorney William Burch, who handles real estate acquisitions for the university, said that "any accusation that Syracuse University is a slumlord is entirely false." He said that any housing purchased and operated by SU complies with city housing codes.

"If it does not comply with these codes, then the university either has to renovate it or take it off the market," he continued. Burch noted that only if a house is economically feasible for the university to operate will it do so.

Because SU adheres to the city housing codes, Burch flatly denied any slum ownership. He concluded saying, "I wholly resent that anyone should use that charge against SU."

Reaction

Students favor action

By HELENE MACDONALD
Associate Editor

Many of the 400 people who gathered in Grant Auditorium last night to sound off about the Council on Student Life and student issues agreed on one thing: the meeting served a purpose, but the purposes were as different as the people attending the meeting.

Hecklers from radical groups such as Peace and Freedom Party (PFP) and Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) interrupted speakers with obscenities and cries for student take-over of the University.

Such comments brought cheers from their contemporaries who were scattered throughout the audience, but got little reaction from other students who were interested in listening to the issues and opinions.

On a midnight voyage to Christmas

We walk hand in hand up University Avenue at 1 a.m. with the wind driven crystals lacing our faces and Mama Cass singing "On a Midnight Voyage" over and over in our consciousness like a subtle dye permeating a cloth.

The plowed sidewalk crunches underfoot, an aisle of white concrete sunk 20 inches below the drifting sea of snow.

A snowplow passes, its blade trailing a chorus of sparks, assuring one and all that man will not yield gracefully to nature's power and beauty.

The Student Health Center is once again the Hospital of the Good Shepherd, the ribboned canes in its doorways visible for the first time.

The snow, sculptured by an unseen hand, softens the harsh corners of buildings and makes the grayest University cottage a haven for security and warmth.

The campus is always more attractive at night, no tight-lipped people hurrying to unknown destinations for uncertain ends. The snow, drifted against the gray-stoned walls and stairways, flatters the Hall of Languages. It is man's impenetrable fortress to protect the knowledge of the ages against the whims of nature's power.

Only in front of Hendricks Chapel, where the wind isn't so cold, do we pause to marvel at the Christmas tree, its heavy, snow-laden branches waving, making the clumps of lights to flicker. It is Christmas for a moment. Then we walk on, hand in hand, on a midnight voyage.

PFP calls for action

Need for student control

We in Peace and Freedom Party believe the real issue facing the students to be whether or not they have meaningful control over their own lives and the university. The Council on Student Life has distributed a mimeographed sheet of thirty-two proposed demands calling for such things as an end to Rule One, women's curfew, arbitrary cottage closings and housing rules, liquor and visitation rules, etc. While we in Peace and Freedom Party believe many of these are very good demands, we think that all of them are just one part of what would be standard policy in a student-controlled university. Only student power and control can assure us that the gains we make will remain secure and not be subject to nibbling away by administrators. But to achieve this power requires that we demand that administrators stop determining our lives and that they abdicate their power to persons selected and controlled by us. And we must insist that this power be over genuinely critical issues that affect our lives--tuition costs, housing and curriculum, for example, and not just visitation and library hours or liquor regulations.

Students should seek a complete halt of administration restrictions on student actions. Student freedom now, not later, should be the goal for which we strive. We in Peace and Freedom Party believe that it would be a fatal mistake for students to organize their demands around a few noncontroversial, easily granted issues since this would leave the administration intact to renege on its promises--just as it has ignored CSL's decisions when it felt like it. Only complete elimination of university in loco parentis will suffice. Students can then collectively make and abide by their own rules.

A student-run university should show in its actions in the community and the world the same sort of humane commitment to freedom, justice and peace that the students themselves wish to enjoy. To this end, we in Peace and Freedom Party urge all students to insist that the university should devote its personnel and facilities to fostering creative rather than destructive aspects to modern life, and should take an active role in grappling with world and community problems.

Students should organize their demands through a new body created at the meeting this Tuesday in Grant Auditorium. The body should select leaders to represent fairly all points of view at the meeting. We in Peace and Freedom Party believe that this body, and not CSL, should represent the students, since CSL was not created by the students, its members were not chosen democratically, and it does not represent all viewpoints. Furthermore, we feel that these student government leaders have been lax in pushing for meaningful student control on critical issues like housing and tuition. Because of the intransigence of the administration, such student control can only be achieved through militant action by an aroused student body and its representatives.

UU is Drumlins

A new union?

By T. Cricket

Students, rejoice for the University much to the surprise of all, has bought us a UU building for Christmas. Yes, Drumlins! How perfect! For Drumlins has eating, meeting, dancing and drinking facilities plus golf, skiing and bowling. All this conveniently located near Married Student Housing on the public bus line and soon probably added to the SU Chartered bus line. Students, faculty and administrators already rent these facilities regularly.

SU Research Corp members often eat lunch there and the School of Social Work as well as the Business and Professional Women, a group to which the Dean of Women belongs. Ben S., who is a member of Nottingham Knolls C.C., the private portion of Drumlins, brings his boys there before each home game for a steak breakfast.

So you see, SU has been a steady customer of Drumlins; why not buy it and save all that money? Don't you agree, it's a great UU!

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

Once again the administration of one large eastern independent school (I won't tell which one) has made an about face to the misfortune of SU's student body.

Many weeks ago Dean Carleton who is in charge of student publications denied two serious student attempts to establish a student literary magazine.

Both of these attempts had solid credentials to pursue this literary ambition in the form of experience, hard work and knowledge. One of these attempts was by Bruce Chadwick, editor of the Promethean and the other was by Robert Meade, magazine major in the school of journalism.

After these attempts to acquire administrative backing were turned down, Mr. Meade went ahead on his own. After weeks of work to find advertising support and printing facilities, not to mention hard work in layout organization, policy formation and staff organization, Mr. Meade began readying his magazine for a January debut.

Now in a flagrant attempt to turn the screw another time into the backs of student initiative, Dean Carleton's board of publications OK'd a third party's plans for a literary magazine WITH University backing.

Good for you Mr. Administrator--you've done it again.

African student charges 'discrimination'

By DIANE WEATHERS

In August of 1968 Sikhanyiso Ndlovu, a graduate student from Rhodesia and chairman of the student branch of the Zimbabwe African People's Union addressed a committee of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and spoke on the conditions of prison and concentration camps in Rhodesia.

Ndlovu, who has been working actively against his country's white-dominated government, which has been carrying out an apartheid policy, at one time spent six months in a concentration camp in Rhodesia

On Dec. 10 Ndlovu experienced what he considered white racism American-style, and yesterday he brought his case before the State Human Rights Commission. Ndlovu has charged that a proprietor of a North Syracuse restaurant acted in "a racially discriminating manner" while he was a patron in the luncheonette.

Ndlovu said he entered the luncheonette in order to purchase a bus ticket and afterwards sat down and ordered a cup of coffee while waiting for a bus. The proprietor, according to Ndlovu, "gave him an angry glance" after he had ordered the coffee and later told him to remove his brief case from a seat next to his on which he had rested it. Ndlovu charged that when he explained that his brief case contained important material on Zimbabwe and furthermore "was not dirty," the proprietor replied "by throwing the brief case toward the door" and informed him that "his luncheonette was not a waiting room."

The hearing, which was to be held yesterday afternoon at 3 p.m., met for a short while and then at the request of the defendant's lawyer was postponed until next Monday. The proprietor's lawyer, who was demanding that the hearing not be held without the presence of a court stenographer, also requested that those people not legally involved with the case, including the press, be barred from the hearing.

Ndlovu represented himself at the hearing.

Neal N. Hoffman, regional director of the Commission on Human Rights, for obvious reasons would not comment on this case in particular. He did say, however, that his task in this case, as well as in other cases that are brought before the commission, involve first deciding whether or not there has been discrimination and second determining what legal action, if any, must be taken.

Noncommunication

Confusion, frustration mark living-learning center plans

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

Noncommunication appears to be a voting member of the Council on Student Life's (CSL) standing committee no. 2. The administration members seem to think plans for a living-learning center will be in effect in February while the student members are far more pessimistic--and consequently frustrated.

The standing committee was formed in April and charged with the responsibility of working to create a coed dormitory. At the time the committee was formed, Dean of Student Services Jim G. Carleton, who is chairman of CSL, asked Marjorie C. Smith, dean of women, to serve as the chairman of the standing committee.

At one of the first meetings of the committee, the primary purpose of a coed dorm was discussed. It was decided that the educational experience of two sexes living together in one building was to be subordinated to a more encompassing concept: that of a living-learning center developed along the lines of a complete integration of classroom and dormitory life.

The primary goal of the committee then became to create a living-learning center which would have male and female residents with faculty offices located in the dormitory. The students participating in the experiment would take a common elective course so they could discuss it outside of the regular classroom, making the experiment one of "living and learning together."

During that same meeting it was decided that some of the committee members would investigate living-learning centers on other college campuses over the summer and observe how they operate.

Their reports were subsequently given during the first meeting this semester, held in early October. Dean Smith presented two proposals during the meeting: that the committee organize a program to begin next fall or or experimentally set up a program in February which would then be evaluated by the committee.

It was decided to pursue the second plan, and two sub-committees were set up, one to investigate the academic program and the other to handle the procedures for recruitment and selection of student participants.

"At this time the committee was highly optimistic," said CSL and committee member Christopher Mudd. He was also a member of the committee to investigate what dormitory might be used for the center.

Washington Arms was then the first choice of the committee and several CSL members went to visit and talk with the residents. "We weren't greeted with much opposition," said Cindy Bailey, a committee member. "The girls said they wouldn't let themselves stand in the way of a living-learning center.

"However," Miss Bailey continued, "at the next meeting Dean Smith said she had received a lot of negative feedback from the residents and that the girls were not willing to move out."

This negative feedback apparently came from a survey which was conducted by Miss Jean Fisher, a head resident in Washington Arms. The survey revealed that 33 girls were willing to move out while 40 were not.

Mudd said he was not aware of the survey nor of its results until this reporter informed him last night. "If we had known the exact figures," he said, "the experiment could have been put into effect."

The negative results of the meeting, which was held prior to Thanksgiving, did not leave the student members time to find another dorm, according to Miss Bailey. "We had been told that the residents would have to know by the first week in December, and we didn't have time to find another living center. We also didn't have time to screen the applicants and have the necessary physical changes made in a dormitory."

The other student members

Program of sacred music

For the final concert of Crouse series before the Christmas vacation, a program of sacred music will be offered by SU's Chorus and Symphony Orchestra in Crouse Auditorium today at 8:30 p.m.

Programmed for the occasion will be Bach's "Magnificat in D Major" and Francis Poulenc's "Gloria."

Conducting the entire concert will be Stuart Raleigh, member of the faculty of the Music Department. The featured soloist will be the widely known soprano Helen Boatwright.

Raleigh is the Syracuse Symphony pianist and chorusmaster of the Symphony Opera Chorus. He was also director of the Syracuse University Wind Ensemble for two years. For the sacred music concert a quintet of soloists from the School of Music will be employed in the bach work. They are Carol Shippee, Manuel and Rosalind Brooks, sopranos, Del-Louise Moyer contralto, Benjamin Holroyd, tenor and Harry Gardner, baritone.

Frustration

of the committee agreed with Miss Bailey that it is impossible to begin the program by February. This, however, was news to Dean of Men David Tatham.

"I am surprised to learn that the students on the Council assume that the living-learning center proposed for the spring semester is a dead issue," he said. "I had expected that with the cooperation of the residents of Washington Arms and completion of the screening of applicants by standing committee no. 2 that the project would be in operation in February.

"If the living-learning center is as important as the council seems to think it is, it is feasible to ask some students to be inconvenienced by allowing themselves to be relocated in another dormitory," Tatham continued.

Miss Jean Crawford, director of women's housing, sees "innumerable complications" in relocating the girls from Washington Arms if the proposal were to be put into effect in February. "There is an awful lot to take into consideration. Theoretically one could manage it but I would just hate to do it so fast," she said.

Miss Crawford said that girls would be moving out of rooms that would be taken over by men, therefore leaving open spaces in men's housing but not in women's. She assumed that the residents would want to remain with their friends which would mean finding spaces together, creating another complication.

According to Mudd, the only hope that there will be any type of living-learning center lies with two co-ops. A plan is being formed independently of the committee and CSL which would involve a men's and a women's co-op. Students would live independently of one another as they are now doing but would meet once a week to hear a speaker and have a discussion.

"But if that goes into effect it will defeat the purpose of a living-learning center," said Mudd. "It won't benefit the campus because it will be on such a small basis and is not at all like the original idea."

Students to vote on $5 tax today

Students will go to the polls today for a vote that student government leaders hope will give them a mandate as to what action should be taken concerning the student tax.

The ballot, according to SG President Chuck Hicks, who proposed the student tax but then substituted a proposal that the $5 per student instead be deducted from the $50 general fee, will offer four choices:

Which do you favor:

1) Students pay $5 a semester for the Student Activities Fund (which would be created to administer the fee);

2) Students demand that they be given a detailed report on the $50 student fee (which is now charged by the University);

3) Students demand that they be given a detailed report on the $50 fee and that $5 for students be taken out of the student fee for the Student Activities Fund for second semester;

4) None of the above.

Hicks said last night that regardless of the outcome, SG leaders planned to offer activities and programs that the tax was originally designed to cover, such as free concerts, a black awareness program, Dorm Council aid, Projection '70 aid and a draft counseling service. But "we still need money for these programs and for student organizations," Hick said.

Students react...

Calls for unity and action from student leaders evoked applause from the audience. Most seemed to favor positive, organized action such as the sit-in at the library planned for Jan. 8, 1969, rather than immediately taking over the library last night as some people advocated.

People came in groups from floors, cottages and Greek houses as well as PFP, SDS, and student government delegations.

One student from Lehman Apartments said, "The whole business is a bunch of 'shit'—the university, the administration. The only people who get things done are radicals. We should take everything at the same time."

A sophomore from Marion Dorm felt that the "meeting served the function of educating people and making people aware of what should be happening and what is happening.

"I may disagree with the issues being discussed, but the meeting did start of a movement of people," he continued.

"The very fact of getting together is significant," a student who identified himself only as Bill said.

The arguments among speakers were unfortunate, Ellen Rogers, a sophomore, pointed out. "However, they were important. It showed that everyone is too intolerant of each other's opinion."

"It's about time the University realized that the students are more than a giant pocketbook," Mary Taylor, secretary of AWS and a member of Student Senate's Government Structures Committee said. "Everytime you turn around they're looking for more money and you don't have anything to say about it."

Student apathy was cited by Robert Staley, president of Watson West 4. "I'm disappointed in the turnout. If there's no support for the referendum and if Chuck Hicks is not backed, the people griping about conditions don't deserve any changes."

AGBS bus schedule

The Association of Graduate Business Students vacation bus will load Friday Dec. 20 at Day Hall from 12 noon to 12:20 sharp; then at Haven from 12:25 to 12:40 sharp; finally at Lawrinson from 12:45 to 1:00 p.m. The bus will leave Lawrinson at 1:00.

It was previously announced that it would arrive at 42nd Street and 8th Avenue. This has been changed to Penn Station because most of the students who bought one-way tickets from New York to Syracuse, weren't sure just exactly where 42nd and 8th Avenue was and it's a better place to load and un-load. The exact location at Penn Station will be posted in Slocum Hall on the MBA information board.

Bye, bye

With this issue, the Daily Orange suspends publication until Jan. 8 so that staff members may start opening their texts in a valiant attempt to earn the C's and D's that will insure their attendance at SU next term.

The staff extends warm wishes for an enjoyable holiday to all members of the University community.

Winless SU hosts Penn State tonight

JOHN BACH, a new head basketball coach at Penn State, moved to the Nittany Mountains this year after a successful tenure as head coach and athletic director at Fordham.

By ED AGRANOWITZ

The prestige involved will be minute, but you won't be able to tell it by players' attitudes when Penn State invades Manley Field House tonight to mix it up with the Orange.

The Nittany Lions, owners of a 1-2 record, will be bringing along a host of old faces with a brand new look. John Bach has replaced John Egli, and with Egli went the famed Penn State zone defense.

Bach has his Lions hustling with a pressure man-to-man defense which he used with great success at Fordham. "It's a tough switch for the boys to make," said Bach before the season started, "because they were all recruited to play zone defense."

Bach will be fielding a veteran squad, with the only missing face being last year's top scorer, Jeff Persson. Up front, 6-8 Bill Stansfield will open at center. "Stansfield has only fair moves to the hoop," says Tangerine coach Bill Vesp, who watched the Lions lose to Buffalo, "but he's a strong and determined rebounder with a good second effort."

Bill Young, 6-6, and Galen Godbey, 6-5, return at forward spots for Bach, but Godbey appears to have lost his job to 6-3 sophomore Willie Bryant. Bryant, slowed by sickness, and Young did very little against Buffalo, but Vesp considers them both dangerous.

In the backcourt will be Tom Daley and Jim Linden, both 6-2. This pair combined for 31 points against Buffalo. "Daley is the top player on their team," says Vesp, "and Linden does everything well."

For the Orange, coach Roy Danforth will stick with his starting five of John Suder and Gerry McFadden at guards, Bill Smith in the middle, and Bob Kouwe and Bill Case up front.

The offense will be a well-disciplined one, working for the good shot. "We won't slow it down like we did against Kansas," says Danforth, "but we've got to work it around, keep the turnovers down, and hit the good shots."

Danforth also plans to use Frank Hamblem more. Hamblen, who has excelled in relief roles for the past two years, is at his best in the deliberate attack situations with a fine outside shot.

Meanwhile, Vesp sends his 2-1 Tangerines against perrenial power Oswego State in the 6:30 prelim. The frosh suffered a 83-64 reversal at the hands of Cornell Saturday after edging the Little Red in their opener.

Gil Guerrero and Greg Kohls share the scoring lead for the yearlings with identical 18.3 marks. They are followed by Paul Pietrowski (15.0) and Gary Rainbow (13.3).

ED'S ITORIALS: Syracuse and Penn State met three times last year with the Orange winning twice.....Manley seating capacity has been increased form 6300 to 8200 with the extension of the end zone seats.....Syracuse's first five foes have a 18-8 record..... Syracuse holds a 42-37 lead in the series.....The teams will meet again in late January in University Park.....WAER will carry both games tonight and on Friday night.

McFadden of Dodge City packs a mean six-shooter

By LARRY CENTER

Every week for the past eleven years Matt Dillon has thrilled millions with his deeds, always managing to find more badmen to clear out of Dodge City. Thanks to Matt, Chester, Kitty and Doc, Dodge is known to most people as a wild town of the old West. Today Dodge has left "Gunsmoke" far behind and is a thriving town in central Kansas, with its frontier tourist attractions and a small junior college that most people have never heard of.

Gerry McFadden had never heard of Dodge City Junior College when, in May of his senior year at Spingara High School, which is also the alma mater of Dave Bing,his close friend, Roland Taylor, a basketball player at LaSalle, got in touch with the Dodge coach. Taylor had been very impressed with Gerry's ball-playing and, through him, McFadden got a full basketball-football scholarship to the two-year school. If it hadn't been for Taylor, "I probably never would have gone to college," says Gerry.

McFadden, now a starter for Roy Danforth's cagers, didn't acquire his impressive skills from a high school coach, through skull sessions or drills. Though he never played high school basketball, Gerry proved himself on one of the toughest testing grounds in the country, the playgrounds and recreation leagues of Washington, D.C., where games were always rough and a player could develop his moves by going one-on-one against some stiff competition, like Dave Bing and Elgin Baylor and high school All- Americans Bob Whitmore and Austin Carr.

In school, Gerry stuck to baseball and football, but still played basketball all-year round. "There are so many facilities for basketball in Washington," he explains. "All the kids, who start at such an early age, are inspired by the outstanding athletes who've gone on to play college or pro ball."

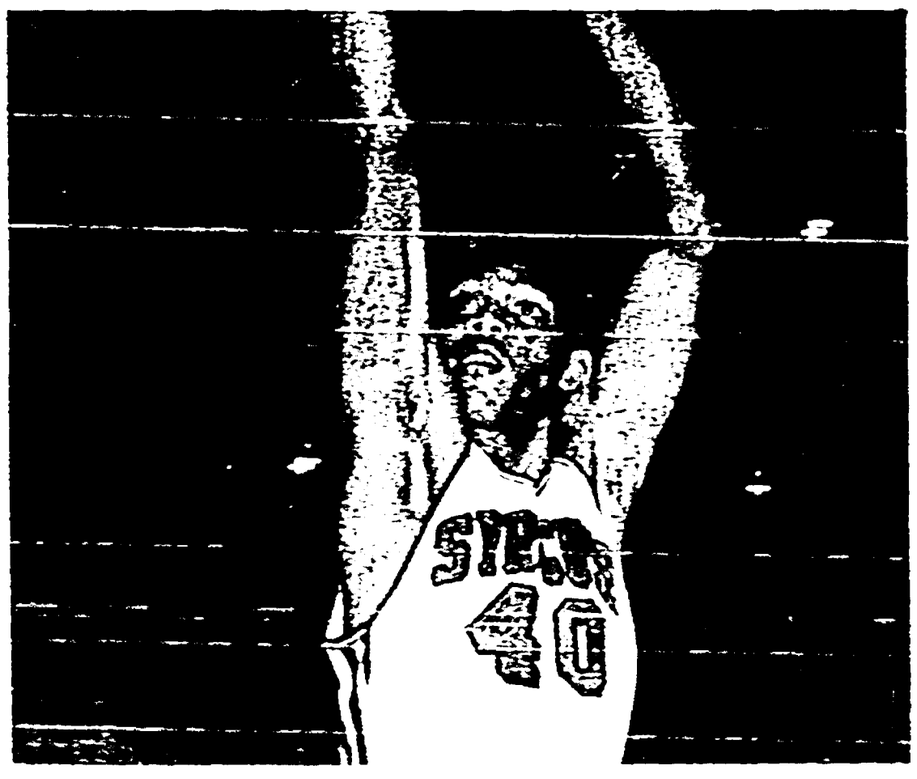
When Gerry got to Dodge, he started at quarterback in football and at guard in basketball, averaging 21 points a game. Already he has seen a big difference between small and major college ball.

"At the big colleges, the players are a lot bigger, stronger and more experienced at the game," he said. "They have a better knowledge of basketball. At Dodge we ran a set offense, but with not as much emphasis on patterns. There was more one-on-one playing, whereas here there is more of a stress on playing together."

Two of Dodge's games last year were against Trinity Junior College, led by Spencer Haywood. "Haywood was one of the most outstanding big men I've ever seen play. I had no idea he'd go to the Olympics, but I knew he'd be great," said Gerry.

Gerry decided to come to Syracuse after talking to Danforth. "He impressed me as being a very understanding individual who regarded me as an individual and a student, not just a basketball player," he explains. "Since I graduated from Dodge, I could play immediately and didn't have to sit out a year." Also, Syracuse was closer to home than some other schools I was considering."

After playing in Kansas for two years, Gerry sees several differences between eastern and midwestern brands of ball. He said, "Midwestern ball is a lot tougher. The players are much taller and quicker than in the East. It's more of a slow-down game, more disciplined. They hit the boards a lot stronger because the fellows are a lot bigger."



Already this year Gerry has come up against two of the top players in the country, Calvin Murphy and Jo Jo White. "But," he says, "they can't be compared. Jo Jo is a more complete ballplayer, a shooter, ball-handler, great on defense, a team player. Murphy is one of the greatest shooters, and he has to shoot. The main reason is White has the team behind him, while at Niagara it's Murphy all the way."

Even though the team is still looking for its first victory, Gerry is optimistic. "We're a young team, but we have good ballplayers and a lot of desire. We've had a little bad luck, but we have a good coach, who is our number one asset in keeping us up, and a good offense.

"All we need is one win under our belts," he continues." If we get some little problems ironed out, we'll be on our way. Playing our first five games on the road definitely hurt us, because a home crowd gives a team security, a feeling of assurance."

GERRY McFADDEN, a newcomer to the Orange roster, has moved right into a starting role.

Far West Classic will be highlight of holiday season

There is no rest for the weary. While most of the student body leaves for vacation on Friday, Roy Danforth and his team will embark on a cross country jaunt of fun and games.

Their first stopover will be in Buffalo on Friday night, where both varsity and frosh will take on the Bulls. Buffalo, which beat Penn State Monday night, has an impressive 5-2 record so far this year.

After that engagement, the Orange head for Portland, Ore. and the Far West Classic. There will be a one game stop in Provo, Utah, for a game with Brigham Young on Dec. 23.

The Orange will open the tournament against Washington State on Dec. 27. The winner of that game will face the winner of a game between Oregon State and Arizona State the next day, while the two losers will also play. California, Brigham Young, Oregon and Yale round out the field.

Both Brigham Young and Washington State have plenty of height in their starting lineups, so the Orange might feel they are playing the giant redwoods instead of just playing near them. Nevertheless, it has been Oregon State that has emerged the winner in all but two of the annual holiday tournaments.

Syracuse will return to the Field House for a Jan. 4 engagement with Pitt, while the student body is still on vacation.

The wrestling team will face Navy on Friday at Annapolis, and will be idle until Jan. 11.

All-night library plan results in confusion

By COREY SANDLER

The Carnegie Library will remain open all day today and tomorrow in a limited experiment to test 24-hour library operation schedules, library director Warren Boes said yesterday. Nevertheless, officials of the Council on Student Life (CSL) intend to continue with their planned "study-in" for continuous service at the library tonight.

According to CSL members, the Council Monday night passed a resolution recommending a three-week experimentation period, but it now appears that the experiment may be cut to as few as two days.

The apparent reason for the change is a lack of funds to finance the experiment. But some student and faculty CSL members yesterday questioned this experiment.

In a statement issued late yesterday, Frank P. Piskor, Vice President for Academic Affairs, said, "Whether the request of the Council on Student Life to staff the main library 24 hours a day is realistic remains to be seen. Limitations with regards to number of staff, budget and short notice restrict the alternatives available to Mr. Boes."

But some student and faculty CSL members yesterday questioned this experiment.

"We were under the definite impression that the experiment would continue through the final examination period," said Cindy Bailey, president of Assoication of Women Students (AWS) and Council member.

"And although it was understood that there would be no new money available to finance it, we were led by Mr. Boes to believe it could be financed by a shift in the priorities in the library budget," she continued.

Lawrence Feer, associate professor of industrial design, and a CSL member echoed these expectations. He said he knew the administration could not add to the library's budget but anticipated after Monday night's meeting, that the budget would be juggled to accomodate the experiment.

Student Government President, Chuck Hicks, reported he had concluded from Mr. Boes' statements that it would be possible to keep the library open by shifting priorities in the library budget.

Dean of Men, David Tatham, who also sits on the Council gave a different view. "Mr. Boes mentioned in some detail the problems involved. It was quite clear there were no additional funds available but he said he would do the best he could with the resources he had. The Council wished to be optimistic."

Whether these misunderstandings will lead to a fresh confrontation between students and administration remains to be seen.

According to Louis Jacobs, an SG spokesman, CSL and SG have not yet made a decision as to whether they will call for students to "study-in" at the library for the rest of the examination period, regardless of the Administration's decision on hours.

Dick Barton, chairman of the Senate Committee on Student Services, researched the feasibility of the 24-hour experiment. "The heart of a university is its library. The dormitory system is not conducive to studying and the library hours here are not realistic."

Students, he said, need the use of the library as a place to study on weekends and late at night. The library is closed Sunday mornings and during some athletic events as well, Barton pointed out.

At the Monday night meeting, the Council members said they left with the impression that students would staff the night hours and would be paid $2 an hour for the "grave yard shifts" of midnight to 8 a.m. The CSL started recruiting students to fill the job openings.

Yesterday, however, library

Mays, former Morehouse president, views American 'white' democracy

By RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

Dr. Benjamin E. Mays, former president of Morehouse College, the distinguished Negro institution, declared American democracy to have been "created for white men, not black men," in a speech last night in Hendricks Chapel.

Dr. Charles Willie, chairman of the sociology department, and a Morehouse alumnus, introduced Mays. Citing his achievements, his rise from poverty to earn degrees from Bates College and the University of Chicago, and his membership in Phi Beta Kappa, Willie quipped, "You've come a long way, baby."

Mays, speaking slowly and reading from a manuscript, for which he apologized, said that racism in America is "spoken of as having just come into existence yesterday."

He himself believes that the problem started 350 years ago when the first Negro slaves were brought over here.

Mays read portions of the Declaration of Independence describing the equality of man. "These are all beautiful words," he said. "But it must be remembered that until 89 years afterward the United States had slavery."

"The fathers of our nation wrote these words and returned home to their slaves," he pointed out.

Mays summed up the history of the Negro's struggle for equality in this country. He observed that after the Civil War, the north's attention to the plight of the Negro was "short-lived."

"On both sides the idea of white superiority was acknowledged," he said.

Nor were the Negroes able to advance themselves through political means; they were systematically excluded here too. "The Negro got enslaved again-when the ballot is taken away, citizenship goes with it," he said.

"The United States never intended to apply the same democracy to white men as to black men," Mays continued. "The Negro has had to spend millions of dollars getting rights that white men are born with. Too many have had to die in the effort."

Mays said that he did not condone "what many of my Negro brothers are doing." Black power "is a cry of despair and frustration" in his opinion, and not a solution to racial problems.

He pointed out that recent scientific advancements in medicine and space exploration have proven that "nothing is impossible."

Mays became president of Morehouse College, alma mater of the late Dr. Martin Luther King, in 1940. He retired in 1967.

Students approve plan for student tax deduction

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

In the largest turnout for a referendum vote in the history of SU-but still only a small percentage--the students passed the proposal asking that five dollars from the student fee be used as a student tax.

On December 18, 550 students voted yes to the statement reading, "I am in favor of using $5 from the student fee as a student tax." Negative votes were cast by 128 students.

The student tax proposal was initiated by SG President Chuck Hicks when he proposed a five dollar student tax to sustain the Student Activities Fund. He later substituted a proposal calling for the deduction of five dollars from the $50 general fee, which was the subject of the referendum.

The students also called for the investigation of University use of the general student fee by 638 yes and 36 no. This investigation proposal is now on the agenda for discussion by the Council on Student Life (CSL). In response to "I am in favor of taxing students $5 over and above the general student fee," 118 voted yes; 492 no.

Elections Commission Chairman Richard Barton said that some students only voted for one statement rather than voting on all three, which accounts for the difference in the totals. According to the counter on the voting booths, however, 754 students voted, setting a record for the turn-out on a referendum.

"There's a mandate not to charge the students for the activities fund," said John Ross, chairman of the government structures committee in Student Senate.

Earlier, however, F.A. Wingate, SU vice president and treasurer, discounted the possibility of a $5 per student deduction from the general student fee for this year. He had indicated that because SU is running on a deficit, the administration cannot create discretionary funds.

"I wouldn't object to seeing SG participate in the budgeting process," he added, however.

The student tax proposal was initiated to cover the need for student organizations and other programs. Presently, student organizations petition to the administration for the allocation of money, but not all are accepted. SG leaders have indicated that the tax was originally designed to cover such programs as free concerts, a black awareness program, dorm council aid, Projection '70 aid and a draft counseling service.

Steiger flicks coming

A sneak preview of Rod Steiger's newest film and a showing of one of his most recent films will highlight the Rod Steiger Film Retrospective at Syracuse University in February.

The movie to be previewed is "The Illustrated Man," about a tattooed man. The film will be shown February 5. It stars Steiger and his wife, Clare Bloom, each of whom will be attending the retrospective.

"The Sergeant," a Robert Wise production starring Steiger, will be shown February 6.

Both films will be shown in Gifford Auditorium. The retrospective is being held by Film Forum.

Circumventing the library issue

Syracuse University is slipping into a "confrontation" situation with its disputes over the recommendations of the Council on Student Life.

The Council recommended Monday, after questioning the Director of Libraries, Warren Boes, that the main library remain open 24 hours a day through the final exam period. The vote, according to two members present, was unanimous which means four administrators and four faculty members as well as six students found the recommendation reasonable.

The office of the Vice President for Academic Affairs issued a statement Tuesday afternoon, including the following: "Whether the request of the Council on Student Life to staff the main library 24 hours per day is realistic remains to be seen."

The students on the Council have not enhanced their credibility lately by lending their names to a list of grievances, one of which was the libelous falsehood that SU was the second largest slumlord in Syracuse. But we still have enough faith in the entire Council to assume its recommendations have a sense of reality, given the information they have access to.

The Director of Libraries left the impression upon most, though not all, the members of the Council that it would be financially possible to experiment with a 24 hour a day library until the end of final exams. The next day he was much more pessimistic and found it possible to plan for only two or three days of experimentation.

The Director of Libraries has proven in the past and at the Council meeting to be a sincere man seeking to accomodate the needs of the students for the facilities of the library. We must assume that his optimism so abruptly turning to pessimism means he has been caught in between the Council's recommendation and restraints from above.

It is true the University is suffering its greatest financial difficulty ever this year. Perhaps those who must take responsibility for the operation of this institution decided the library experiment would cost too much. But this judgment may overlook the fact that student volunteers would be available and that the cost of circumventing the Council's recommendation might be much greater.

Letter: New York renovation

To the Editor:

As an active alumnus of Syracuse University, I read your comments in the December 17, 1968 issue of the Daily Orange with great concern and amusement.

Your reference, to the restricted generosity of the SU Alumni in New York is most unfair. To my knowledge they have been extremely liberal in their contributions most of which have made possible the tremendous expansion of the University and it's ability to become one of the highest ranking Universities in the world.

Your concern about the destruction of the landmarks of New York City is also most amusing, if not adolescent in approach and understanding. If New York City were to remain static there would be no progress. A great landmark was removed when the General Motors Building was erected one block away. Why no comment then? Why no comment about Columbia University and its interests in the Rockefeller Center Complex? Surely, more old brownstones and (landmarks) were torn down there than could possibly be removed on 62nd Street. Why no comment about the eyesore created by the fenced-in lots of the Fifth Avenue and 61st Street corner? Would anyone not admit that what was erected either in the Radio City Complex, or on Fifth Avenue, or Lexington or Third Avenues or any where in New York City has not made for progress, for more taxable income to the City of New York, for better and more modern housing, or shall we New Yorkers sympathize with Miss Ada Louise Huxtable, who makes her living strictly by writing articles that have appeal to a very small segment of our city who are trying to hide behind the protective veil of rent controlled apartments, regardless of their conditions or habitability, as long as they have a good mailing address?

Unfortunately, private institutions cannot exist today without making their assets work for them to supplement the higher costs of education, construction of modern facilities, attraction of key educators, inflation and the other economic facets which student tuition or Alumni contributions alone cannot support. What consideration would be given to the students who need financial aid if the funds were not available?

Many of our older Alumni who have contributed year after year to make possible the conveniences and facilities which our children and other youngsters have available to them are concerned over the attitude of some young college people who feel that the world owes them a living. We do feel that we owe them an opportunity to get a good education but how far and to what extent beyond that?

In my opinion Miss Huxtable's motivations are questionable. Our nation has become great through progress, reconstruction and development. We have built museums to preserve relics of the past. Perhaps Miss Huxtable might find her place where I believe she rightfully belongs.

Call collect?

Hot line

By Bob Tembeckjian

During the annual Middle Eastern crisis of 1967, the Hot Line hookup between Washington, D.C. and Moscow was used. However, what actually occurred when President Johnson attempted to reach Premier Kosygin has never been revealed. Now, for the first time, we have an account of what went on.

The President's secretary, Judy Snyder, was the first to inform LBJ of the crisis. That was at 9:15 p.m.

"May I suggest, Mr. President, that you use the Hot Line?"

"Yes, Miss Snyder," replied the President. "I'll do it right away."

With that, the President picked up the receiver.

"Operator, I'd like to place a call to the Kremlin — collect, please."

"Yes, sir. Who's calling?"

"This is the President of the United States."

"I'm sorry, sir. I'll have to have your name, not your occupation."

"Johnson, Lyndon B."

"Thank you. One moment please."

Five minutes later, the operator returned.

"What was that number again, sir? I don't remember your having given it to me."

"I didn't. I am the President of the United States, and this is an emergency. I have to speak to the Kremlin right away."

"Was that Kremlin, New York or Kremlin, North Dakota?"

"Dammit! I want Moscow. The world is in danger. There's a flareup in the Middle East, and fighting, and . . . "

"Look, sir. I know you've got problems, but so does everybody. What's so special about yours? My family is hungry but I can't go home to make dinner because customers like you take up all my valuable time. If I got worried about every Arab-Israeli conflict I'd never have time to do anything else. Ignore it, just like the U.N. In a few days, it'll all go away."

"Miss, just put my call through. The fate of the entire world and its three billion people are in your hands, my fellow citizen. The burden of all free peoples is on your shoulders. Respond to their call! Heed their commands! And for God's sake put through that call!"

"One moment please."

Waiting for his connection, the President fell asleep. Secretary Snyder placed the receiver on its hook and left for the day. Later on, the President was awakened by the ringing of the phone.

"Howdy."

"This must be L. Baines Johnson. Who else answers that way? Good, this is Comrade Kosygin."

"Well, it's about time. I've been trying to reach you . . . "

"Yes, I know. Next time call person-to-person. If I am inspecting missile bases or something, you have not to pay. Is logic?"

"O.K. I'm just worried about the war. Let me assure you, Mr. Premier, the United States and her great people desire only peace. And we shall stop at nothing to attain it. We only wish . . . "

"Hold it, Comrade. But is now 10:30. Var is over."

"Oh. Well, it was nice talking to you, Alex. I guess I'll see you around in Vienna — after I get re-elected."

Students to run race relations course

By KAREN MAGNUSON

Next semester an experimental student-led course will be offered as a fully-accredited course by the College of Liberal Arts. The course, LAS 305, "Black and White in America," was initially instigated as a follow-up to the campaign speech of Howard Zweier, the junior class president.

Among its outliners are Craig Baumgarten, Gene Kane, and Stan Hunterton. During an interview yesterday with Baumgarten and Kane, the former said, "the main innovative aspect of this course is that it is one of the first courses to be developed and led by students."

The course purpose is dual. Baumgarten said the intention of the student-led course is to re-evaluate teacher-student roles and to attempt to "change education from a teaching process to a learning process." According to Kane, "the proper position of an educator in a classroom is to facilitate learning, not to teach." It is based on the theory that students, interacting in the classroom without expertise, to have a greater freedom to "respond to the problems of public policy," continued Kane. He also said that "the objective of the course is to bring the students to an awareness and a skill so that they can judge the problems of black-white relations in reference to how the institutions of America can best service those without power, and to judge public policy decisions based on their effect on the powerless."

The students will be graded with respect to their growth toward these goals. The course grade will be based upon a mutual evaluation.

The course will consist of six discussion sections conducted by six undergrad leaders: Baumgarten, Kane, Hunterton, Charles Payne, Greg Williams and Larry Sampson. As a supplementary source to the readings, a series of weekly lectures will be given by faculty members and prominent men in the field. The lecturers will also speak with the individual discussion groups.

Among the lecturers are Adam Clayton Powell, James Turner (Northwestern grad student), Jesse Jackson, Sterling Stuckee (a leading black historian), Julius Lester, John Williams (author), Julian Bond, Dr. Ralph Ketcham and Ron Walters.

The readings, according to Baumgarten, will be good but not excessive. They vary from fiction to sociological studies, history, to non-fiction. A sample of the texts are: Williams, The Man Who Cried, I Am; Bennett, Before The Mayflower; Conot, Rivers of Blood, Years of Darkness; Baldwin, Fire Next Time; Ellison, The Invisible Man; Kozol, Death at an Early Age. There will be final and individual studies investigating special problems.

Pre-registration will be in Dean Swerdlow's office, 212 Maxwell, today, Thursday, and Friday from 9:00-4:30. This is to indicate student interest and estimated participation. "Black and White in America" will be open to all undergrads. The lectures will be open to everyone and announced in the D.O. If there are any questions call Craig Baumgarten at 478-4820 or ext. 2020.

Projection '70 interviews scheduled this week

Projection '70–Education 324, the first student-run student-taught course at Syracuse University will ə holding interviews this week and next week for undergraduates (freshmen through seniors) who would like to take the course for second semester of this year.

It is a three credit hour course offered in the School of Education, originally a volunteer tutorial project started by the Class of 1970 two years ago.

This year, by making it into a course, advantages gained are:

1) Use of a professional staff from the School of Ed and Psych as advisors and backup trainers;

2) Intensive training in elementary reading and elementary arithmetic diagnosis and treatment;

3) Curriculum development.

The innovation offers the opportunity to teach an underprivileged primary-school student from the Syracuse area. Each tutor will be working twice a week for one hour, 7 to 8 p.m.

Tutors will be supervised and trained throughout the semester by the course's student "staff." The class may be taken on a pass-fail or graded basis.

Volunteers are also needed to help staff the course as typists, researchers and office clerical workers. Students may also assist with the project's own newspaper.

Interested undergraduates should call the Projection '70 office, ext. 2650 or 3138, this week to set up an interview appointment. Registration for Education 324 will be conducted during the regular period in Archibold Gymnasium.

Frosh optional hours report presented to Dean Smith

By ELLEN BILOFSKY

The latest step in a three-year effort to obtain optional hours for freshman women was taken yesterday with the presentation of a 22-page report to Dean Smith. Compiled by the Freshman Committee for Optional Hours, the AWS Executive Committee and the AWS Assembly, the report included petitions, surveys of students and parents and various arguments in favor of the change. Voting on the proposal will probably take place at the Dean of Women's staff meeting next week.

For the first time, according to AWS President Cindy Bailey, a large and representative group of freshmen was involved in this attempt. They are hoping this year for a better reception from the Dean of Women's office.

"Somehow AWS will get the optional hours," Miss Bailey promised. "The idea has been denied for so long that we can no longer understand the reasons behind the denial. Perhaps they no longer apply." She wished to emphasize however that "when the library is open for 24 hours, freshmen women won't be inhibited by having a curfew. They can take a campus overnight in order to use the library facilities."

Although the proposal is on the agenda for tomorrow's staff meeting, a two-week backlog of work will probably prevent its consideration by Dean Smith. Freshmen women must therefore await the results of next Wednesday's meeting which will determine whether they will have a chance for what the paper terms "a full experssion of individual responsibility."

ROBERT W. LEBERMAN

HARRY E. YEISER, JR.

3 vice presidents appointed in SU development office

Syracuse University has appointed three vice presidents in its development office. They are Robert W. Leberman, formerly director of the annual giving program; P. Lachlan Peck, formerly director of deferred giving programs, and Harry E. Yeiser, Jr., former associate director of deferred giving.

The announcement was made by Newell W. Rossman, vice chancellor for university relations, after a meeting of the executive committee of the board of trustees.

Rossman said Leberman's responsibility will be direction of the annual giving and alumni programs. Peck's will lie in the area of deferred giving and Yeiser will be in charge of special programs and projects in the development office, Rossman said.

Leberman, 36, has been with the University since October 1957. He is a 1954 graduate of SU, where he was captain of the varsity football team. After graduation he played professional football with the Baltimore Colts for a year, as defensive halfback. He served in the Air Force from 1955 to 1957.

Leberman is a member of the Varsity Club, the University Club of Syracuse, the Greater Syracuse Chamber of Commerce and Psi Upsilon social fraternity.

Peck, 40, graduated from the University of Connecticut in 1956 and joined the Procter & Gamble Distributing Co. He was a regional sales manager when named director of deferred giving at Syracuse University. Peck is a member of the board of the First Church of Christ, Scientist, Syracuse, and of the Syracuse Area Council of Churches. He is president of the Syracuse chapter of the Sons of the American Revolution and a former member of the executive committee of the University Hill Corp., the urban renewal agency. He is a member of the Syracuse Rotary Club, the Tigris Shrine and the University Club of New York.

Yeiser, 48, graduated from Michigan State University in 1942 and joined the Navy, serving in New Guinea, the Philippines, Korea and China. During World War II he was on the staff of the Commander of the U.S. 7th Fleet (Pacific). From 1950 to 1952 he was on the staff of the Chief of Naval Operations in Washington. He retired from the Navy in June 1968 with the rank of lieutenant commander, USNR.

Before he joined Syracuse University in August 1964, Yeiser was vice president of the Syracuse family firm of Yeiser & Son, Inc., bituminous coal brokers.

The appointment of the three vice presidents completes a reorganization of the development office which was under study since the spring of 1968.

Rossman was named vice chancellor by the trustees in October.

He is in charge of alumni programs, development and the news bureau. He is a 1939 graduate of the University and joined its staff the following year.

He was named development director at Syracuse in 1956 and was appointed vice president for development the following year.

After he received his bachelor's degree from Syracuse, Rossman took two years of graduate study from 1939-1941, when he was also assistant to the dean of men. In 1941, he taught political science at the University.

During World War II he was chief of the Research and Service Bureau of the Panama Canal. He served in the Canal Zone from July 1941 to November 1945. From 1945 to 1956 he was field secretary and director of the alumni fund for the Alumni Association of Syracuse University. He is the author of an article on corporation aid to education, published by the American Alumni Council.

He has served on the Commission for Higher Education for the area conference of the Methodist Church and was a trustee of the Onondaga Industrial Development Corp.

Library . . .

director Boes announced that no additional workers would be hired. He indicated that there is not sufficient money in the budget to pay the students. To keep the library open 24 hours a day with full services would cost $5,040 per week, according to Boes. Partial or no service would require between $1500 and $2000 weekly. The annual library budget is approximately $2 million.

"I don't know how long the library will be open 24 hours a day. The library is prepared to accede to the students requests for a 24-hour library. We don't want any confrontation–the library is not the place for it," said the director.

Boes told the CSL that he would prefer paid workers because they would tend to be more responsible but that he did not have the funds. The experiment, therefore, is certain for only two days, and the library will be staffed by volunteers.

CHARLES V. WILLIE

Conference on Crime and the Press to bring reporters and editors here

Editors or senior reporters from about 40 newspapers across New York state are expected to attend a three-day conference on Crime and the Press starting Jan. 12 at Syracuse University.

Prof. Charles V. Willie, chairman of the sociology department, said the seminar is part of a national program to increase public understanding of social science reserach. "The jargon of social scientists often is the greatest barrier to communication," Willie said. "The goal of the seminar is to break through this barrier so that valuable social science findings may become available to newspaper people."

The National Science Foundation is co-sponsor of the conference with the sociology department. Willie said: "The seminar will bring together newspaper people and social scientists in a setting where they can question and learn from each other. Small-group discussions among journalists after all presentations will enable them to explore together the implications of the various discussions, to raise questions, to point toward unresolved issues, and to indicate from their point of view further research required to provide a better understanding of social problems."

Capital punishment, civil disorders, crime and insanity and youthful offenders are among the topics for discussion at the conference, which begins at 8 p.m. Sunday, in the University's Center for Continuing Education (110 Roney Lane). Capital punishment will be discussed that night by Franklin H. Williams, director of the Urban Center at Columbia University.

There will be two sessions Monday morning, Jan. 13. The first, "Crime–the Way I See It," at 9 a.m., will be a panel discussion by Williams; Vincent S. Jones, president of the American Society of Newspaper Editors; Mario Rossi, night editor of the Syracuse Herald-Journal; and Jack B. Haskins, the John Ben Snow Professor of Newspaper Research at Syracuse University.

The second Monday session, at 11 a.m., on "Civil Disorders," will be a discussion led by Prof. William M. McCord of the sociology department.

"Crime and Insanity" will be the topic of the first Monday afternoon (1:30 p.m.) session, led by Thomas S. Szasz, M.D., professor of psychiatry at the Upstate Medical Center, State University of New York.

Author meets critic in the 8 p.m. Monday session when Howard James, Pulitzer Prize reporter, discusses his book "Crisis in the Courts" with Prof. Samuel N. Fetters of the College of Law, Syracuse University.

"Youthful Offenders" will be the subject of the Tuesday morning (9 a.m.) session Jan. 14, moderated by James F. Short, Jr., co-director of research for the National Commission on Causes and Prevention of Violence, Washington.

Some decisions are relatively unimportant. Where you put your engineering talent to work is not.

As you contemplate one of the most important decisions of your life, we invite you to consider a career at Pratt & Whitney Aircraft. Here, you will find wide-open opportunities for professional growth with a company that enjoys an enviable record of stability in the dynamic atmosphere of aerospace technology.

We select our engineers and scientists carefully. Motivate them well. Give them the equipment and facilities only a leader can provide. Offer them company-paid, graduate-education opportunities. Encourage them to push into fields that have not been explored before. Keep them reaching for a little bit more responsibility than they can manage. Reward them well when they do manage it.

And your decision is made easier, thanks to the wide range of talents required. Your degree can be a B.S., M.S., or Ph.D. in: MECHANICAL • AERONAUTICAL • ELECTRICAL • CHEMICAL • CIVIL • MARINE • INDUSTRIAL ENGINEERING • PHYSICS • CHEMISTRY • METALLURGY • MATERIALS SCIENCE • CERAMICS • MATHEMATICS • STATISTICS • COMPUTER SCIENCE • ENGINEERING SCIENCE • ENGINEERING MECHANICS.

More convenient

WATS expected to save SU $20,000 a year

Syracuse University during Christmas vacation began using Wide Area Telephone Service (WATS). By leasing circuits from the New York Telephone Co. instead of using its regular long distance toll service, the University expects to save about $20,000 a year.

"We now have a monthly telephone bill in excess of $9,000," Robert L. Rounds, director of physical plant, said. "Under the regular toll service a six-minute call to New York City would cost about $1.40, but with WATS the same call will be about 78 cents," he said.

The University has nine WATS circuits, three of them in New York State. The others cover the United States except Alaska and Hawaii, Rounds said.

The change affects only faculty, staff and administrators. Students continue to use pay telephones for long distance calls.

Rounds said he expects the WATS system to make long distance calling more convenient for staff members. "They will call a University switchboard operator who will place calls for them," Rounds said. "They won't do any dialing themselves."

However, University operators cannot supply out-of-town telephone numbers, he said. As in the past, callers must dial 1, plus the area code, plus the directory assistance (information) number, 555-1212, then give the Telephone Co. operator his billing number. There is no charge for directory assistance. The caller then dials a University operator to place his WATS call.

Telephone Co. personnel have made a study of University phone needs and have instructed University operators in using the new system.

Stickers giving dialing information have been placed on all staff telephones and the Telephone Co. has supplied each user with a book of area codes. There are nearly 5,000 telephones for faculty, staff and administrators.

"It should be an easy transition from toll dialing to WATS," Rounds said,. "We don't anticipate any problems."

SUSKI plans intersession trip to Vermont for members

SUSKI members wishing to visit Vermont during intersession should come to this afternoon's meeting at 4 p.m. in 117 Lyman. The meeting originally scheduled for 7:30 has been moved up because it conflicted with this evening's skiing trip at Song Mountain.

A film about skiing at Aspen, Colorado, will be shown following this afternoon's sign-up.

The intersession trip will leave Syracuse on Tuesday, Jan. 21, late in the afternoon. Transportation may be arranged for students with conflicting examinations. Accomodations have been reserved in Rutland, Vt., at the Highlander Motel. The trip will feature five days of skiing at Killington, Pico Peak, Okemo and Stratton. Club members will return after skiing on Sunday, Jan. 26.

SUSKI requires a $20 deposit at today's meeting. The trip's total cost is approximated at $80, which includes transportation, lift tickets, lodging and food.

Members are reminded that reservations are limited and only the first 70 students to pay their deposits will go on the trip.

Winter Weekend and Keg Racing will also be discussed at this afternoon's gathering.

American Youth: Its Outlook Is Changing the World

The subject of this month's issue of Fortune magazine

Much has been said, and much has been published, about today's "alienated" youth and society. But to some extent, two important questions remain unanswered: Is this, indeed, a special kind of younger generation? If so, what will be its impact on U.S. life over the next decade?

To find the answers to these questions, Fortune has devoted most of its January issue to Youth and Its View of America. Here, in a single issue of Fortune, is perhaps the most thorough and searching analysis of the topic ever presented by a magazine. Some of the areas on which this special study focuses:

- Why student activists demand reforms
- The revolution on the square campus
- Youth and the pop culture cult
- Parents of the Forties
- What blue-collar youth thinks
- A new style of campus living
- How youth is reforming business

Don't miss this special, single-subject January issue of Fortune. It's on sale now!

Voice from the bleachers

The young scout

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

Any college coach will readily admit that coaching itself comprises only a small portion of his job. In reality, they agree, recruiting is the name of the game.

Most of the larger schools have three or more men on their basketball staffs. The head man plans the strategy, another takes care of the freshmen, and the third handles the scouting.

Syracuse, however, has a two-man staff. Varsity coach Roy Danforth has the headaches this year, and frosh-assistant varsity coach-head scout and recruiter Bill Vesp worries about getting him material for future headaches, or the prevention of them.

Over Christmas vacation, Danforth took his team on a sightseeing tour of Oregon. The only sight they missed was a winning margin on the scoreboard. Vesp, meanwhile, was beating the bushes of the East Coast in search of talent for next year's frosh.

He talked to a guard on Long Island who is interested in coming to Syracuse. The guard went out in his next game and broke his foot. He looked at a 6-9 forward in Passaic, N.J., the famous town where the railroad runs down the middle of the main street. That is, he watched him until halftime, when the chills became too much for him and he succumbed temporarily to the flu. Recruiting, it seems, is not all wine and roses.

One SU scout had a great time on the road, however. He is young, though, and new to the game, so the endless hours of watching scrawny 16-year-olds run up and down the court throwing the ball away has not yet affected his mind.

The young scout, himself recruited by Vesp because of his brilliant basketball knowledge, was armed with a list of names and contacts, given a bundle of SU brochures, and sent out into the cruel, dog-eat-dog world of master recruiters like John Wooden and Adolph Rupp. He was somewhat apprehensive at first, but this feeling melted away with his reception at the first high school he visited.

Nattily attired in the latest Hill fashions, he strode swiftly through the lobby and to the ticket booth. He identified himself, somewhat sheepishly, as an SU scout, half expecting to be asked to pay for his ticket anyway. Instead, the man selling tickets introduced himself as the guidance counselor of the boy Syracuse was interested in. He went immediately into a five minute harrangue on the player's academic attributes, which were good enough to make him fair game for the Ivies. Finally, he called another teacher over, and the scout was whisked through the gate and into the gym.

The second teacher was, of all things, a Syracuse grad, Class of '36. The two hashed over such SU trademarks as their fraternities and the Daily Orange, and the teacher dropped some names for a while. Unfortunately, the scout knew neither his classmates from '36 nor his son, from '71. He did, however, detect a bit of pride when the teacher disclosed that his son had been tapped for Traditions, and a light tinge of regret that the boy had rejected his dad's fraternity in favor of one of its rivals. After a while, the scout was able to break away, making note of the teacher's name as a future contact.

The young scout walked past the cheerleaders and found what he thought to be an unabtrusive seat. The breaks of the game went against him, however. One of the little urchins sitting next to him turned out to be the brother of the player the scout had been sent to watch. After a brief interrogation of the scout, the kid began a play by play account of his big brother's exploits from toilet training to high school heroics.

On the court, however, his brother didn't do much of anything. His team lost by three points to an inferior squad, and he was held to a mere six points.

Determined to see if the player had suffered a bad night or was always this bad, the scout waited outside the locker room to talk to the coach. He was still waiting when the guidance counselor offered to take him inside.

The coach was a throwback to the old days. Gruff and surly after his third straight loss, he blamed it on his players, particularly the one in question. "Princeton and Cornell are after him," he said sarcastically. "I can't figure out why."

After such an encouraging report from such a likeable person, the young scout was ready for a quick getaway. Before he could get out the door, however, the guidance counselor cornered him again. It seems that he could not figure out why all that good material was being wasted year after year. "It's tenure," he finally decided. "Once one of these guys gets in and gets tenure, there's not much you can do about him."

The young scout, feeling his oats after being accorded the royal carpet treatment all night, agreed. "You are 100 per cent right," he said. "I think you, personally, should do something about it."

He then got into his car and drove off toward the next game in the next gym with the next player.

More joyous Orange to face UConn tonight

All Roy Danforth wanted at the beginning of the basketball season was a chance for his young Orangemen to get some experience.

The Orange lost five games on the road before coming back to Manley Field House to open up the Christmas vacation. They did pick up some experience in the five losses, and when the holidays rolled around, there was some joy for Roy's Boys as they won four of seven matches to run their record to 4-8.

The three holiday losses came in the Far West Classic, where the Orange finished eighth in a tournament with that many teams. Losses to Washington State (86-67), Arizona State (93-77) and Yale (83-65) made the Classic a forgettable event for Syracuse.

The Orange could generate little offense in these three games, as 16 point efforts by Bill Smith (twice), Bob Kouwe and John Suder were the only sparks.

The trip west was salvaged by a 77-73 upset of Brigham Young before the tourney. John Suder hit a career high of 21 points in this one, as the Orange won their third consecutive game.

The first two wins were against Penn State and Buffalo. The Orange whipped the Lions 71-51 at Manley, with Smith's 22 point output leading the way. The sparse crowd that showed up for the home opener had little to cheer about until reserve David Harmon took the court.

Harmon, whose playing time up to that point consisted mainly of giving Smith short breathers once a half, played about ten minutes of the second half against State.

Dave the Rave delighted the fans with his acrobatic rebounding, his flashy passes and his big friendly smile. In fact, the fans even momentarily forgot about Vaughn Harper while watching Harmon work his show. From there, the Orange traveled to Buffalo and made it two in a row with a 76-70 triumph. Smith's 21 points again paced the Orange scorers.

Syracuse captured its fourth win after the Classic with a 70-55 romp over Pittsburgh at Manley Saturday night. Smith slumped to four points in this contest, but Kouwe and Gerry McFadden picked up the slack with 20 and 18, respectively.

For the Pitt game, Danforth moved McFadden to a forward spot in place of Billy Case, and inserted Frank Hamblen at guard.

Tonight, the Orange journey to Storrs, Conn. to take on the Connecticut Huskies. The Orange will be seeking to revenge last year's 89-84 upset at the hands of the UConns.

Roy's Boys should have little trouble, as Huskie coach Burr Carleson's team is limping along at 0-10.

After Connecticut, the Orange return to Manley to entertain the LaSalle Explorers, a Top Twenty team that beat Syracuse twice last year. The game will be played Saturday afternoon and will be featured on the ECAC Game of the Week.

COURT JESTINGS: Attendance at the Pitt game, slightly over 1,800, was an all time Manley low....Smith has seen his average drop to 17.7....Despite his shortage of playing time, Harmon ranks fifth on the club in rebounds....Suder raised his mean to an even 10.0....The 3-1 Tangerines next play against a tough Canton Tech team on Saturday following the varsity tilt.

All quiet on library front—for now

DAILY ORANGE

THE LIBRARY remained open last night–as planned–and students studied–as planned. (Photo by Haxo)

By LARRY KRAMER

There was a special significance last night in the silence sign on the wall of SU's Carnegie library. It represented the same type of silence which follows a mutual understanding.

Almost 300 students were in the library at 1 a.m., which is one hour past the closing time. They were studying.

The library was kept open all last night in what was described as an experiment of the recent Council of Student Life recommendation to open the library 24 hours a day during finals.

"This is the best thing that could have happened," said Joey Edwardh, a student member of CSL. "It'll make people realize that we weren't playing games. These students are really studying."

Freshman senator at large Howard Lippman remarked "I study here four hours a day. It's very conducive to the studying I can't get at Watson."

But library director Warren Boes said of the experiment and CSL, "CSL knows nothing about the library, and all it did was stick its nose into something it shouldn't have." Boes mentioned that the cost of an all-night operation was $72 an hour, "and we can't afford it now."

Among the rumors being discussed at the library, one involved the closing of the library at 1 a.m. and the opening of cafeterias to study.

"A reasonable compromise would be acceptable to the CSL," said Cindy Bailey, CSL member, concerning the cafeteria proposal.

According to Chuck Hicks, SG president, when asked about student support on the library issue, a random survey taken by Mark Snyder, executive assistant to Hicks, indicated that approximately 70% of students would turn out all night if asked.

"I was really impressed," said Hicks, "When I got here I expected 50 people, but the place is packed. It's really a great place to study.

"If the students need the library all night, this is when it will be open," commented Hicks. "If they leave at 3 a.m. that's when it should be closed." Commenting on the financial difficulties involved, Hicks placed student needs over the initial financial problem.

Hicks, who said he expects the largest crowd to turn out Sunday, remarked that if the library is closed that night, as he now anticipates, "we'll open it."

Hicks said that if changes are made in the all-night library schedule, student government will distribute necessary information to the living centers.

The decision as to whether to accept CSL's recommendation for a three-week experiment will likely be ruled on by the Administration sometime tomorrow, when the next CSL meeting is expected to be held.

Campbell: U.S. educational system is biased toward white suburbia

By BOB ZUER
Associate Editor

The educational system in the United States has served best the white middle class suburbanite because it has been primarily designed by that economic group, according to Alan K. Campbell, dean-designate of the Maxwell School and expert on urban affairs.

Campbell made the charge in an article published in the Dec. 21 issue of the "Saturday Review" entitled "Who Governs the Schools?"

"The greatest resources per student are being spent on suburban school children," he writes. "The crucial decisions are made by a small group of leading community figures in cooperation with professional educators. This results in an educational system which reflects the interests of this elite and produces a system that serves primarily the American white middle class."

In a second article entitled "Inequities of School Finance," appearing in the most recent issue of that same publication, Campbell acknowledged that the present allocations of resources for education might match the distribution of political power in American society, but argued that it does not match the distribution of need.

Campbell warns that if educational opportunities are unequal in this country, the "American experiment in equality of opportunity must fail." He cites the inequity of the allocation system which provides more resources for educating the suburban child than the city child as a danger sign. Campbell believes it takes more money to educate a city child because of numerous complex problems involved in that process.

Campbell cites the redistribution of population in the U.S. as the main reason for the financial problems central city school systems now face. "Poor, less educated non-white Americans are staying in the central city," he writes, "while higher income white families and a substantial part of the industrial sector are moving to the suburbs and taking their tax base with them."

Campbell suggests integration, compensatory education, community control, more private schools, or some combination of all these as Oppressed?

TAs lead meager existence at SU

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

"Are the teaching assistants (TA) academician's serfs?" as "The Wall Street Journal" claimed in a front page article yesterday.

When the idea of TAs first began, the program in colleges and universities was that the graduate student did a certain amount of teaching under the guidance of a professor, with the design of the job being to prepare the TA for later membership in college faculties.

However, now the majority of TAs are in divisions similar to the program at SU where the basic freshman English courses are broken into sections giving the TA complete control over his classes.

The question of whether the TAs are academia's serf comes out of the pay situation which exists. Alphonse Sallett, a graduate student in sociology, called graduates "the oppressed class in America." He added, however that "undergraduates are the absolutely oppressed, but their position is an involuntary one, while the graduate's is voluntary."

A TA in the political science department, Kevin McIntyre, said "as an individual, I happen to be very fortunate in the professor I am working with. He is interesting and considerate of my time.

"He never gives me any assignments without making them beneficial to my studies, and I've learned a great deal from him." However, McIntyre finds the only way he is able to live a civilized existence is with the additional support he receives by serving as a resident advisor.

An example of the role of TAs can be found in the anthropology department. One of the basic courses is composed of two lectures given by a professor and a discussion group led by a TA.

Joan Howard, who teaches some of the discussion groups, pointed out some of the problems in the arrangement. "The teaching assistant makes no decisions about the course. They are left up to the professor in charge. We have little to say about the course content and can't even tell the students what to expect on the exam."

In contrast to this, Harvey Greisman, who is teaching a sociology course, feels the exams in his department are prepared democratically. "There is an essay for the individual sections and an objective part from the lectures and books."

Greisman said the idea of TAs is a good one, but he feels a lot is lost in the actual practice of the program.

Miss Howard also said the anthropology department is not as bad as some of the others because of its size. The professors get to know the graduate students who are working in the department because it is small.

In speaking of the salaries TAs receive, Miss Howard said, "We are voluntarily poor. We could get jobs with the degrees we hod, but since we are

Information extension

If you want to reach an information operator at Syracuse University's switchboard you should dial 4113. Dialing "0" for an operator will only slow down the process.

Mrs. Ila G. Christoff, chief operator, said establishing an information extension has cleared the switchboard for Wide Area Telephone Service (WATS). Under the WATS system the University has leased telephone lines to various parts of the United States and University operators will place long distance calls. The WATS operators will be reached by dialing "0".

True believers on the library issue

A sit-in may develop in the main library some night during final examination period when the library wasn't scheduled to remain open all night. Although we think the Administration has not dealt properly with the Council on Student Life recommendation, we do not mean to imply we support the demand that the library be kept open all night, regardless of the problems involved.

There are many sound academic arguments for keeping the library open and an experiment is in order. But the academics of the matter would be its least important aspect to many who would elect to sit-in. Judging from the militant-activist meeting in Grant Auditorium December 17, some of those who might sit-in would find the library a totally new and exciting place. Others would find it difficult to endure eight hours of continuous studying, a bad habit they long ago managed to rid themselves of.

The academic reasons were cited at the Grant Auditorium meeting but a student off the stage put the issue more succinctly: "It's the easiest objective."

What is going on here isn't an academic debate but an age-old conflict between students and their adult supervisors, the faculty and administration. The students, near-adults and desiring adulthood, want to be taken seriously and to indulge in adult activity such as sharing in the decision-making of the University.

Many undergraduates today have a sense that they are being ignored, that there are more pressing concerns in the University than their education or student life. The more militant students have adopted a tactic of some of the more distant faculty: talk as if education were all-important when you really want something else.

Events such as political assassinations, race conflicts and the war in Vietnam combined with increasing social awareness have provided ammunition for the attack on adult authority. If there is a tension between young and old, then that tension, like the antagonism between the Negro and the lower class whites next to which he lives, is greatest between the near-adult and the adults with authority over them.

We hope the administration will speak plainly to the Council if the library for good reason cannot remain open. In the meantime may the activists be wary of becoming true believers in their own propaganda.

Honest frustration

Time to shout!

By Bill Loweth

Student government at Syracuse University is following a pattern. To be sure, it is serving an important role. Last week a University Dean remarked that General Motors would be satisfied with the progress made in the past five years. But you are not, and there is no reason to think that you should be.

A glance at the record, however, shows that at least partially, student government has been a big factor in the establishment of several scholarship funds, more liberal policies regarding class sponsored weekends, greatly extended curfew regulations and optional hours, a growing and successful honors program, a pass-fail course selection option, legal consumption of alcoholic beverages after ninety years of Methodist middle age mores, and tremendously expanded student participation on university policy committees.

This list of accomplishments is not just "tokenism." The louder you shout the more you will be heard; the more carefully you shout, the more you will be listened to; and the more you back up your shouts with well thought out proposals and thorough research, the more your shouts will bring action. In a policy statement last week, the student members of CSL said, "The council has not decided, it has debated." There is a truth in this statement just as there is truth in the feeling that after a certain point, debate must cease and decisions must be made. How difficult to know when this point is reached. How difficult indeed, to know when a problem has been looked at from all sides, when each possibility has been thoroughly considered.

One is never totally sure he has debated each idea and explored each alternative completely. Rather, he should decide upon action when he himself is totally and honestly exhausted from debate and research. If a man does not try something which he feels is right, then he will become tremendously frustrated. Often, this frustration will lead him from sound, almost certain decisions, to hasty and desperate ones. It is when honest frustration occurs, that dishonest decisions are commonplace.

You are now at a point of honest frustration. You have debated and researched with complete honesty, and made what you feel are good sound decisions. It is time to shout! If you want to use the library 24 hours/day during January, then the faculty and administration will cheer you. Indeed, they must cheer. If students want the center of learning to be available around the clock, then the goal of Syracuse University-to teach-is very successfully being acheived.

Just as the university will respect your desire to have a place to study, you also must respect their desire to be informed of what's happening here. Tell them what you want and why. Then, if Syracuse is sincere in it's goals, your library will be yours.

Letters to the editor

Hillel constitution

To the Editor:

Regarding the recent report in the Daily Orange that the Hillel Constitution was not approved by the Student Senate, let me state the following facts:

Our Constitution was not submitted for approval to the Student Senate. We submitted our Constitution to the Dean of the Chapel and it was approved by him and accepted by the University Religious Council.

The same procedure is followed by fraternities and sororities who submit their constitutions to the Interfraternity Council.

Ed Feldman, President of Senate, met with Dean McCombe, the president of URC, Hillel representatives and me regarding this procedure. He indicated that further discussions would ensue before any action by the Senate. The Senate was motivated to act though we were in the process of negotiation.

To claim that an organization which is dedicated to an ideology, Judaism in our case, must be open to those who adhere to opposing ideologies only reflects the shallow thinking of the students on the structures committee. Every scholarly society could be abolished under this rubric. Furthermore, organizations which are philosophically and factually founded on outright discriminatory principles are admitted without question. Obviously, some motive other than a democratic one brought about this ruling.

Procedures for the election of officers and their qualifications are frankly stated in our constitution and meet the requirements of every principle of democracy. These have been taken from a National Hillel Constitution and have been accepted on more than 200 campuses throughout the country. Furthermore, organizations which elect their officers without consideration of democratic procedures have been accepted by student government. Again, it seems that the discriminatory shoe is on the other foot, namely, that of the Student Senate.

The fact that the Senate acted at the moment that their elected head was holding discussions with us, the URC, and the dean of the Chapel is a self-explanatory comment on its integrity. It, also, reflects on the character of student government in its relation to university authorities. This essential irresponsibility of student leaders makes it difficult for any fair-minded person to support their demands on any level. The fact that they are capable of such duplicity and the stubborn refusal to a continued elucidation of problematical issues renders suspect any endeavors they undertake.

Hillel does not feel threatened by this type of student leadership. We are complimented by the recognition of our dynamic role on campus and the impact that religion is making at Syracuse University. We sincerely pray for our student leaders; we hope they will join us.

Crouse renovation

To the Editor:

It was gratifying to me to note the concern of a School of Music student, Marc Balkin, about the condition and appearance of Crouse College. Since I came to Syracuse in July 1964, I have been engaged in a constant effort to bring this really notable building into the sort of shape it ought to be. Although the university has many other costly upkeep problems (the leaks in Newhouse, for example) the administration has supported a very considerable investment in Crouse College in these last few years--much of it not easily noticeable to the casual eye. For example, recent major expenditures have involved new copper gutters (absolutely necessary to stop leaks); a completely new heating system installed, then again reworked, in the auditorium (to get rid of banging pipes during concerts); rewiring for audio purposes and, for the first time, an adequate telephone communications system (in progress now); and (very expensive) removal, re-leading, and replacement of all the stained glass windows, which had reached the stage that a strong wind might have blown them in, destroying a feature of this period building which could not be duplicated nowadays.

Beautification may rest in the eyes of the beholder. As far as I was concerned, it began with immediate removal from the main hall (few students here now will even remember this from 1964) of a huge bulletin board plastered with every kind of sign and notice, three vending machines and an ugly old wooden telephone booth between the Winged Victory of Samothrace and the Botticelli murals. Then came the question of the studio doors in the main hall: these were varnished in 1889, but since then they had suffered about 75 years of thumb-tack violation by teachers and students who posted notes on them. There was no way to deal with the holes except to fill them with spackle and paint them. I'm afraid Marc's idea of restoring the wood there (as well as the floors) would be unproductive. But, in Room 200, now my office, I did insist on sanding the old classroom floor, removing a false ceiling which hid the old beams, and preserving the original doors with a varnish finish. It is the central administration's intention to support all such tasteful renovation of the building; but, alas, not all areas will respond to this kind of treatment because of what has been done to them in the past.

Honorary probes sources of conflict

Tau Theta Upsilon, senior men's honorary, yesterday announced that it is conducting an inquiry into sources of potential conflict at at Syracuse University.

The results of the investigation, which will be in the form of a commission report and will include a survey of students, probably will be presented to Chancellor Tolley by late March.

The investigation, said honorary members, will focus on the role of the University. "What we're concerned with," said Martin Gordon, who already has conducted a preliminary survey, "is the student's definition of the University's function–what it is and what it should be."

According to Tau Theta members, which includes SG President Chuck Hicks, WAER Program Director Jason Squire and Senior Class President Barry Randell, it is the disparity between "what the function presently is and what students think it should be" that often is at the base of University disorders.

Other members of the honorary are Cliff Ensley, who, besides a well-known SU athlete, last year ran for the senior class presidency; Bill During, who, also on the SU football team, has been involved with such programs as Leadership Through Education and Projection '70; and Evan Richert, managing editor of the Daily Orange. Gordon is a member of Traditions Commission and co- chairman of Goon Squad.

The situation at SU, particularly now, "suggests that an investigation such as we propose is necessary," said Richert, who has been a member of the DO staff for more than two years. "The problems that are presently causing more friction between students and the administration than ever before on this campus have to be brought into the open more effectively and throughly then such organizations as the Council on Student Life and SDS have been able to do," he said.

He added that the honorary has a number of advantages in conducting the inquiry. Most of the members, he said, have been in some way directly involved in campus affairs. "Hicks and Randell in particular will be able to give the investigation important insights," he said.

Hicks, as SG president and as a member of CSL, "more than any other individual on campus has been in touch with student grievances on the one side and administrative problems on the other," he said.

Squire added that one reason the honorary chose this project was optimism that the members could make a student survey effective. "The members are from such diverse backgrounds that the people we talk to, our approaches and our own experiences should make the survey and report representative and hopefully credible to the administration and others who read it."

possible solutions, but acknowledges that the costs will be high. One of the ways by which the American fiscal system cam overcome these inequities is through intergovernmental aid, according to Campbell. The present system, he maintains, has failed to "fill the gap" left by these inequities. He maintains that the needed revenue cannot be raised by increasing taxes because the cities are poor.

"Tax burdens are big, educational disadvantage is growing, and political resistance to applying increased local resources through education is on the rise," he writes. But he adds that "unless major breakthroughs in central city education are made soon, the same problems will spread throughout metropolitan areas."

What he suggests is that states change their aid patterns to ones based on need. Currently, the state education formulas provide substantially greater aid to suburban school districts than to city school districts because of the pressure exerted by the elite power structures he memtioned in his first article.

A Particular Place for Particular Skiers

MAD RIVER GLEN
WAITSFIELD • VERMONT

"Blues for Mister Charlie," the powerful and often controversial drama by James Baldwin, opens January 10 in Syracuse at the Experimental Theater of the University Regent Complex, and will include seven SU students in its cast. The play is being produced by the Salt City Playhouse and directed by Joe Lotito, Playhouse managing-director. It will run for ten nights, the tenth through the nineteenth.

"Blues" was written in 1964 and is based loosly on the killing of the Negro youth, Emmett Till, in Mississippi. Dealing, as it does, with the oppression of one race by another, it is uniquely compassionate to white as well as black. The situation is described with a frankness and authenticity which has been the cause of considerable controversy and yet it is a three-dimensional play about human beings, rather than a caricatured presentation of white against black.

Andrew Godwin, who was starred by the Playhouse this summer in its American premiere production of the British play, "The Restoration of Arnold Middleton," will appear as Parnell James, the white newspaper editor. The murdered young man Richard is played by Chuck Hicks, student government president at Syracuse University. Other pivotal roles include Al Chisholm of Allied Chemical Co. as Meridian Henry, a Negro minister and father of Richard; Sean Hopkins, an S.U. sophomore as Lyle Britten, the murderer; and Eleanor Russell, a Nottingham High School senior as Mother Henry. Miss Russell, who startled Syracuse audiences two years ago with her portrayal of Mama in "A Raisin in the Sun" has been hailed throughout the area as a major talent and is due to enter the drama department of Syracuse University next fall.

There are many young people in the large cast and many Syracuse teenagers, members of Youth Theater, an arm of the Playhouse, will be working backstage as well. The Salt City Playhouse was formed last spring and plated its first summer season this year. It was formed to provide area actors and technical people a level of opportunity between the city's professional equity company and existing community theater groups. Youth Theater Workshops are held weekly throughout the year and its members serve as apprentices on all major productions. "Blues for Mister Charlie," the first of a five-play subscription series for 1969, is a joint production of the Salt City Playhouse and of Youth Theater, and several Youth Theater teenagers will appear on stage alongside experienced local actors.

An unusual statement is carried at the beginning of the printed version of the play and signed by Tennessee Williams, Lillian Hellman, A. Philip Randolph, Leontyne Price, Lorraine Hansberry, John Killens, Geraldine Page and many others. The statement says in part: "Once in a very great while, a play transcends its form and becomes an experience - as real, as imposing, as true, as experience itself...'Blues for Mister Charlie'....is a gift of great value to the American heart."

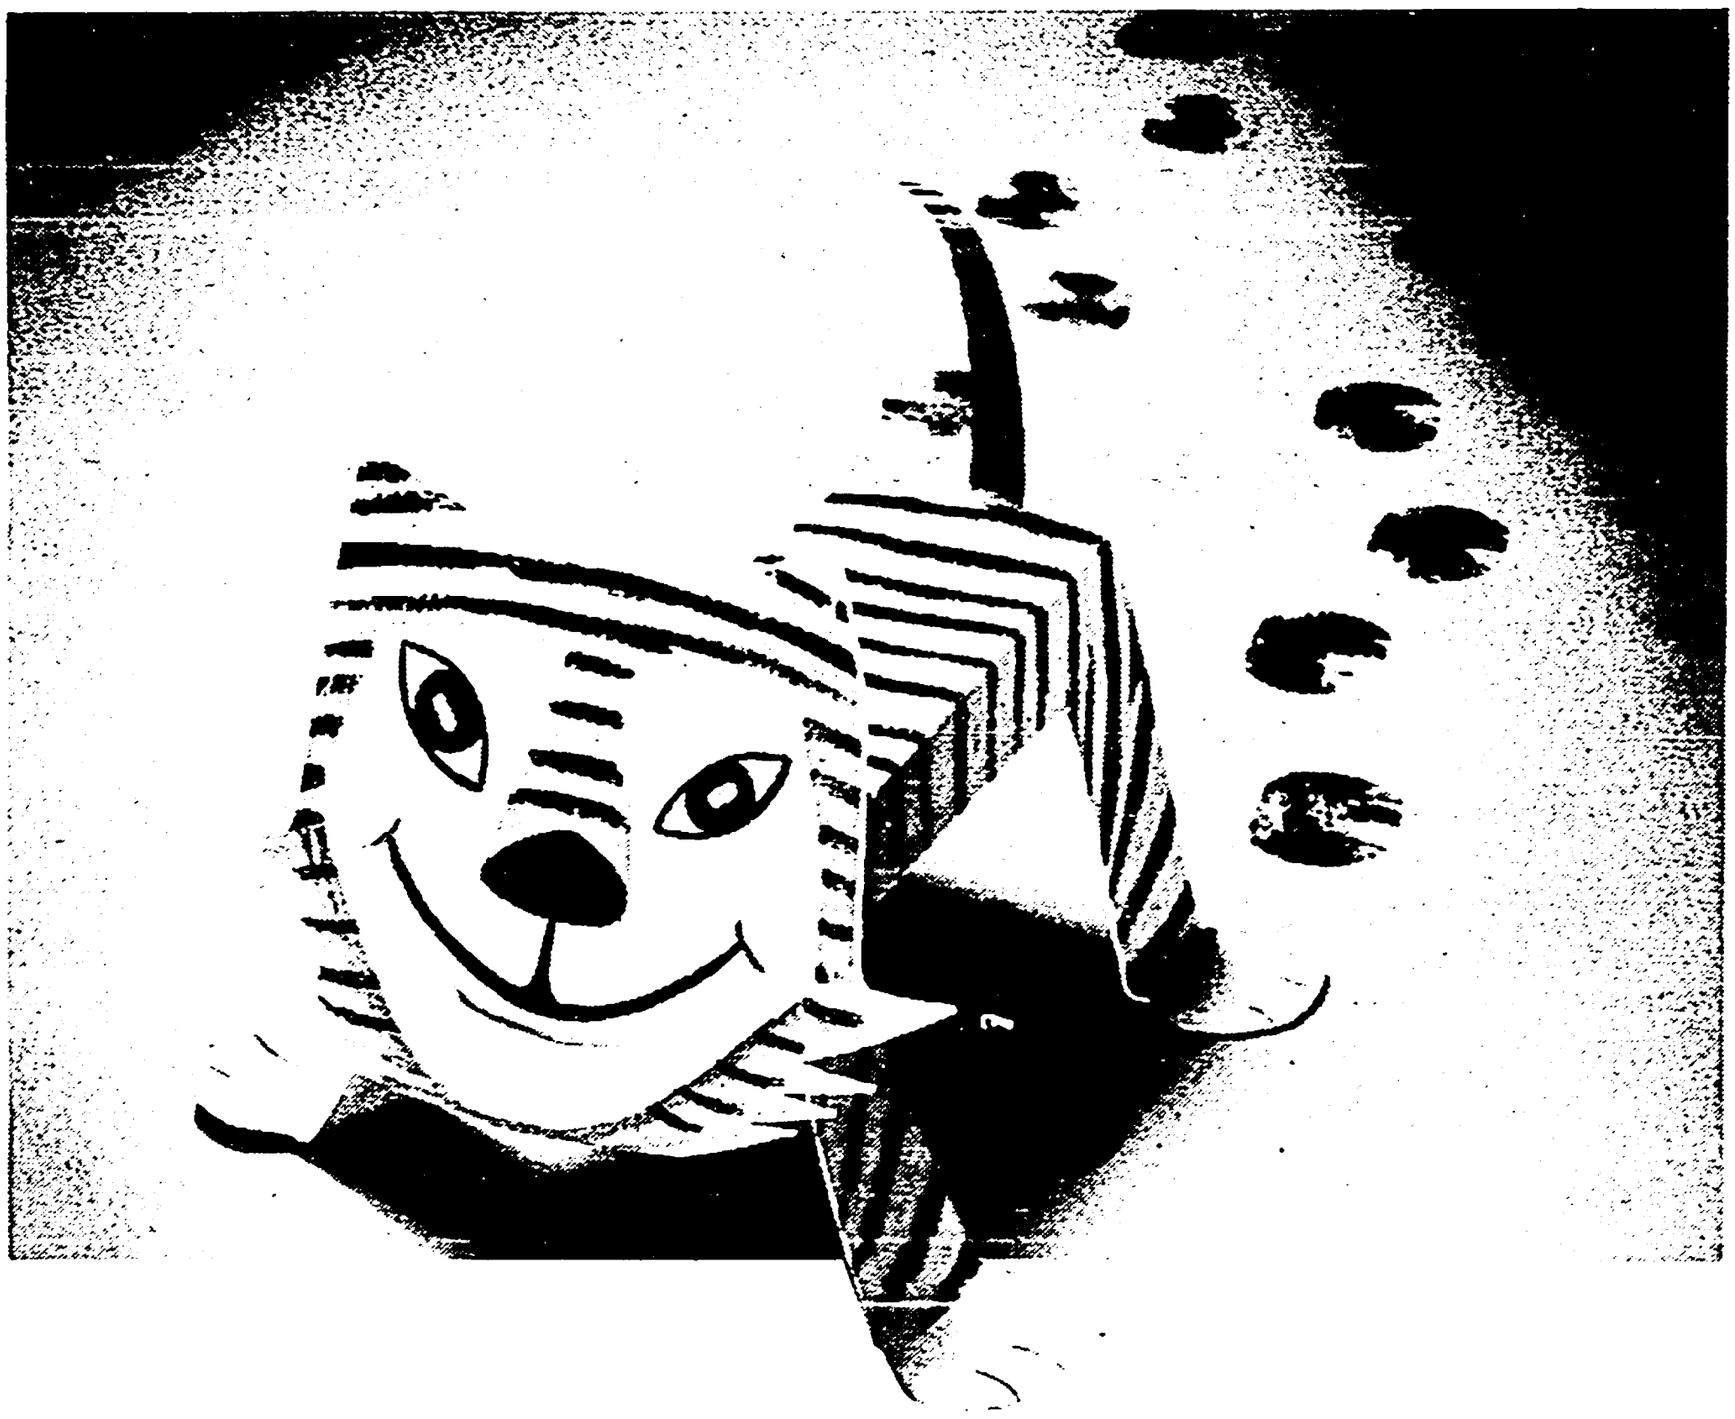
The SU students who appear follow, with their roles and background:

Diane Weathers (Juanita). A journalism major at Syracuse University. Attended Brooklyn Friends School in Brooklyn, NY. Appeared there in "H.M.S. Pinafore" and Mozart's "The Magic Flute."

Sean Hopkins (Lyle Britten). Makes an unusual first stage appearance, playing a major role with no previous experience in drama, public speaking or related activities. Sophomore at Syracuse University.

Sandra Walters (Jo Britten). S.U. freshman from Branford, Conn. Extensive high school and summer experience in drama. Appeared in "South Pacific;" student director, "Bye Bye Birdie;" Meg in summer production of "Brigadoon" by New Haven Total Theatre group.

Chuck Hicks (Richard). President of the Syracuse University student government. In his fourth very active yeare at S.U. From Bogalusa, Louisiana, where he directed and acted in high school productions.



Danny Sanford (Rev. Phelps). S.U. freshman and drama major from West Islip, L.I. Appeared in drama department productions of "Merry Wives of Windsor"

Exchange by fraternity is scheduled

For those hard-pressed for money, Alpha Phi Omega service fraternity offers its semi-annual Book Exchange as a convenient way to let students sell their used textbooks to other students at a reasonable price. Books to be sold are dropped off at Archbold Gym ticket windows, St. Mary's and Flint Hall control offices during final exams. The student selling the book sets the price, and Alpha Phi Omega will sell the book at that price at the book sale to be held during Registration Week. The fraternity takes a 10 percent commission to cover expenses, and the remaining 90 percent is returned to the book's seller.

Last September the Book Exchange was run from a roving Volkswagen bus. For the upcoming sale this January buses will be used to move the books from dorm to dorm during the week. This will enable students to buy their required textbooks during the day and in the evening, with out leaving their residences. A schedule of locations will be publicized before the sale.

The Book Exchange was started by Alpha Phi Omega in the early 1950's, and has been run continuously since. For further information, contact the fraternity's office, extension 3433.

PAPER TIGERS NEED NOT APPLY.

Thanks, but they're just not our type. Young engineers who join us are expected to move in on some rather formidable programs . . . with alacrity and lots of gusto. And a willingness to assume early responsibilities on demanding assignments is an attribute which we welcome warmly. It's the kind of engineering aggressiveness that has brought Sikorsky Aircraft to dominant stature in a new world of advanced VTOL aircraft systems.

If our criteria parallel your outlook, you'll find an excellent career environment with us. You would enjoy working (with a select group) on exciting, full-spectrum systems development. And you can watch your talent and imagination assume reality in such diverse forms as Heavy-Lift Skycranes—Tilt Rotor Transports—High-Speed VTOL Commercial Transports—and much more for tomorrow.

Does this responsibility stir your imagination? Then you probably should be with us. There's ample opportunity for innovation in: aerodynamics • human factors engineering • automatic controls • structures engineering • weight prediction • systems analysis • operations research • reliability/maintainability engineering • autonavigation systems • computer technology • manufacturing engineering • information systems • marketing . . . and more.

And your career advancement can be materially assisted through our corporation-financed Graduate Study Program—available at many outstanding schools within our area.

Consult your College Placement Office for campus interview dates—or—for further information, write to Mr. Leo J. Shalvoy, Professional and Technical Employment.

continuing our education, we are volunteers."

According to Miss Howard, several departments make the salaries tax deductable. She feels that this should not be left up the individual departments, but that it should be a universal policy on the campus."

Roger Fink, who is working toward his PhD in English and is serving as a TA said sometimes the side-benefits are forgotten. "TAs overlook the fact they are getting time and energy out of a particular department and the professors beyond the salary and tuition. How can you estimate the value of the time?" he asked.

"If you know a professor and get him for a seminar, he already knows who you are," was one of the intangibles cited by Fink. But although Fink doesn't "think its a raw deal," he said "TAs are economically exploited." Fink is teaching extra courses to supplement his income from the program.

An average salary for a TA at Syracuse is about $2000 a year and 18 tuition credits, which are divided equally between two semesters. According to Morton Schwartz, who researched and wrote an article for the Maxwell Review last semester, SU is "a little low, but not the bottom."

Contest

Rexall Drug and Chemical Co. has established a design competition for seniors in the Syracuse University School of Art. Two thousand dollars will be awarded to the best designer in the School, selected during a competitive exhibition to be conducted each May.

The winner must use the award for foreign travel to help him develop his knowledge and gain experience in design. Each competing student must submit at least two projects and describe his travel plans.

Laurence Schmeckebier, dean of the School of Art, will appoint a committee to supervise the competition and judge the entries.

The National Science Foundation has given $170,200 to SU for a year's study of the most basic particles of matter. Marvin Goldberg, associate professor of physics, and Giancarlo Moneti, visiting professor of physics, head the research project.

They are looking for evidence of certain basic particles whose existence has been predicted in theory.

Retrospective

Steiger to appear here for preview

"The Illustrated Man," the first film in which Rod Steiger and his wife Claire Bloom appear together, will be previewed at Syracuse University Feb. 5, the first night of an eight-day, 10-film Rod Steiger retrospective on the campus.

Steiger and Miss Bloom will be at the University Feb. 5 and 6 for the retrospective presented by Film Forum, an organization sponsored by the United Campus Christian Fellowship and the University Union.

The Rev. Norman O. Keim, director of Film Forum, announced the complete program for the retrospective, which also includes Steiger's just-released picture, "The Sergeant," and the star's own favorite, "The Pawnbroker."

The visit of Steiger and Miss Bloom to Syracuse University will be one of their last public appearances in the United States before Steiger leaves (Feb. 15) for a year abroad, during which he will play Napoleon in the de Laurentiis film "Waterloo."

"The Illustrated Man," based on the book by Ray Bradbury, is scheduled for national release in the spring.

Following is the schedule, with comments by Keim (all films will be shown in Gifford Auditorium, H.B. Crouse Hall):

Wednesday, Feb. 5: "The Illustrated Man" — Preview of Steiger's latest film, to be released this spring. First film that pairs him with his wife, Claire Bloom.

Thursday, Feb. 6: "The Sergeant" — Steiger in a powerful performance as the tyrannical, homosexual sergeant.

Friday, Feb. 7: "On the Waterfront" — Role as Marlon Brando's brother, Charlie, first brought Steiger into prominence.

Saturday, Feb. 8: "The Mark" — One of the finest psychological dramas ever filmed, played with extraordinary distinction and excitement.

Saturday, Feb. 8: "The Big Knife" — Perceptive story in which Steiger plays a grasping Hollywood producer. With Jack Palance and Ida Lupino.

Sunday, Feb. 9: "Across the Bridge" — Suspense drama of crooked tycoon on the lam from Scotland Yard in Mexico. Powerful performance by Steiger.

Monday, Feb. 10: "In the Heat of the Night" — Academy Award winner as the small town Southern sheriff.

Tuesday, Feb. 11: "No Way to Treat a Lady" — Steiger has fun as the multi-roled lady-killer.

Wednesday, Feb. 12: "The Pawnbroker" — The film for which Steiger should have won an Academy Award.

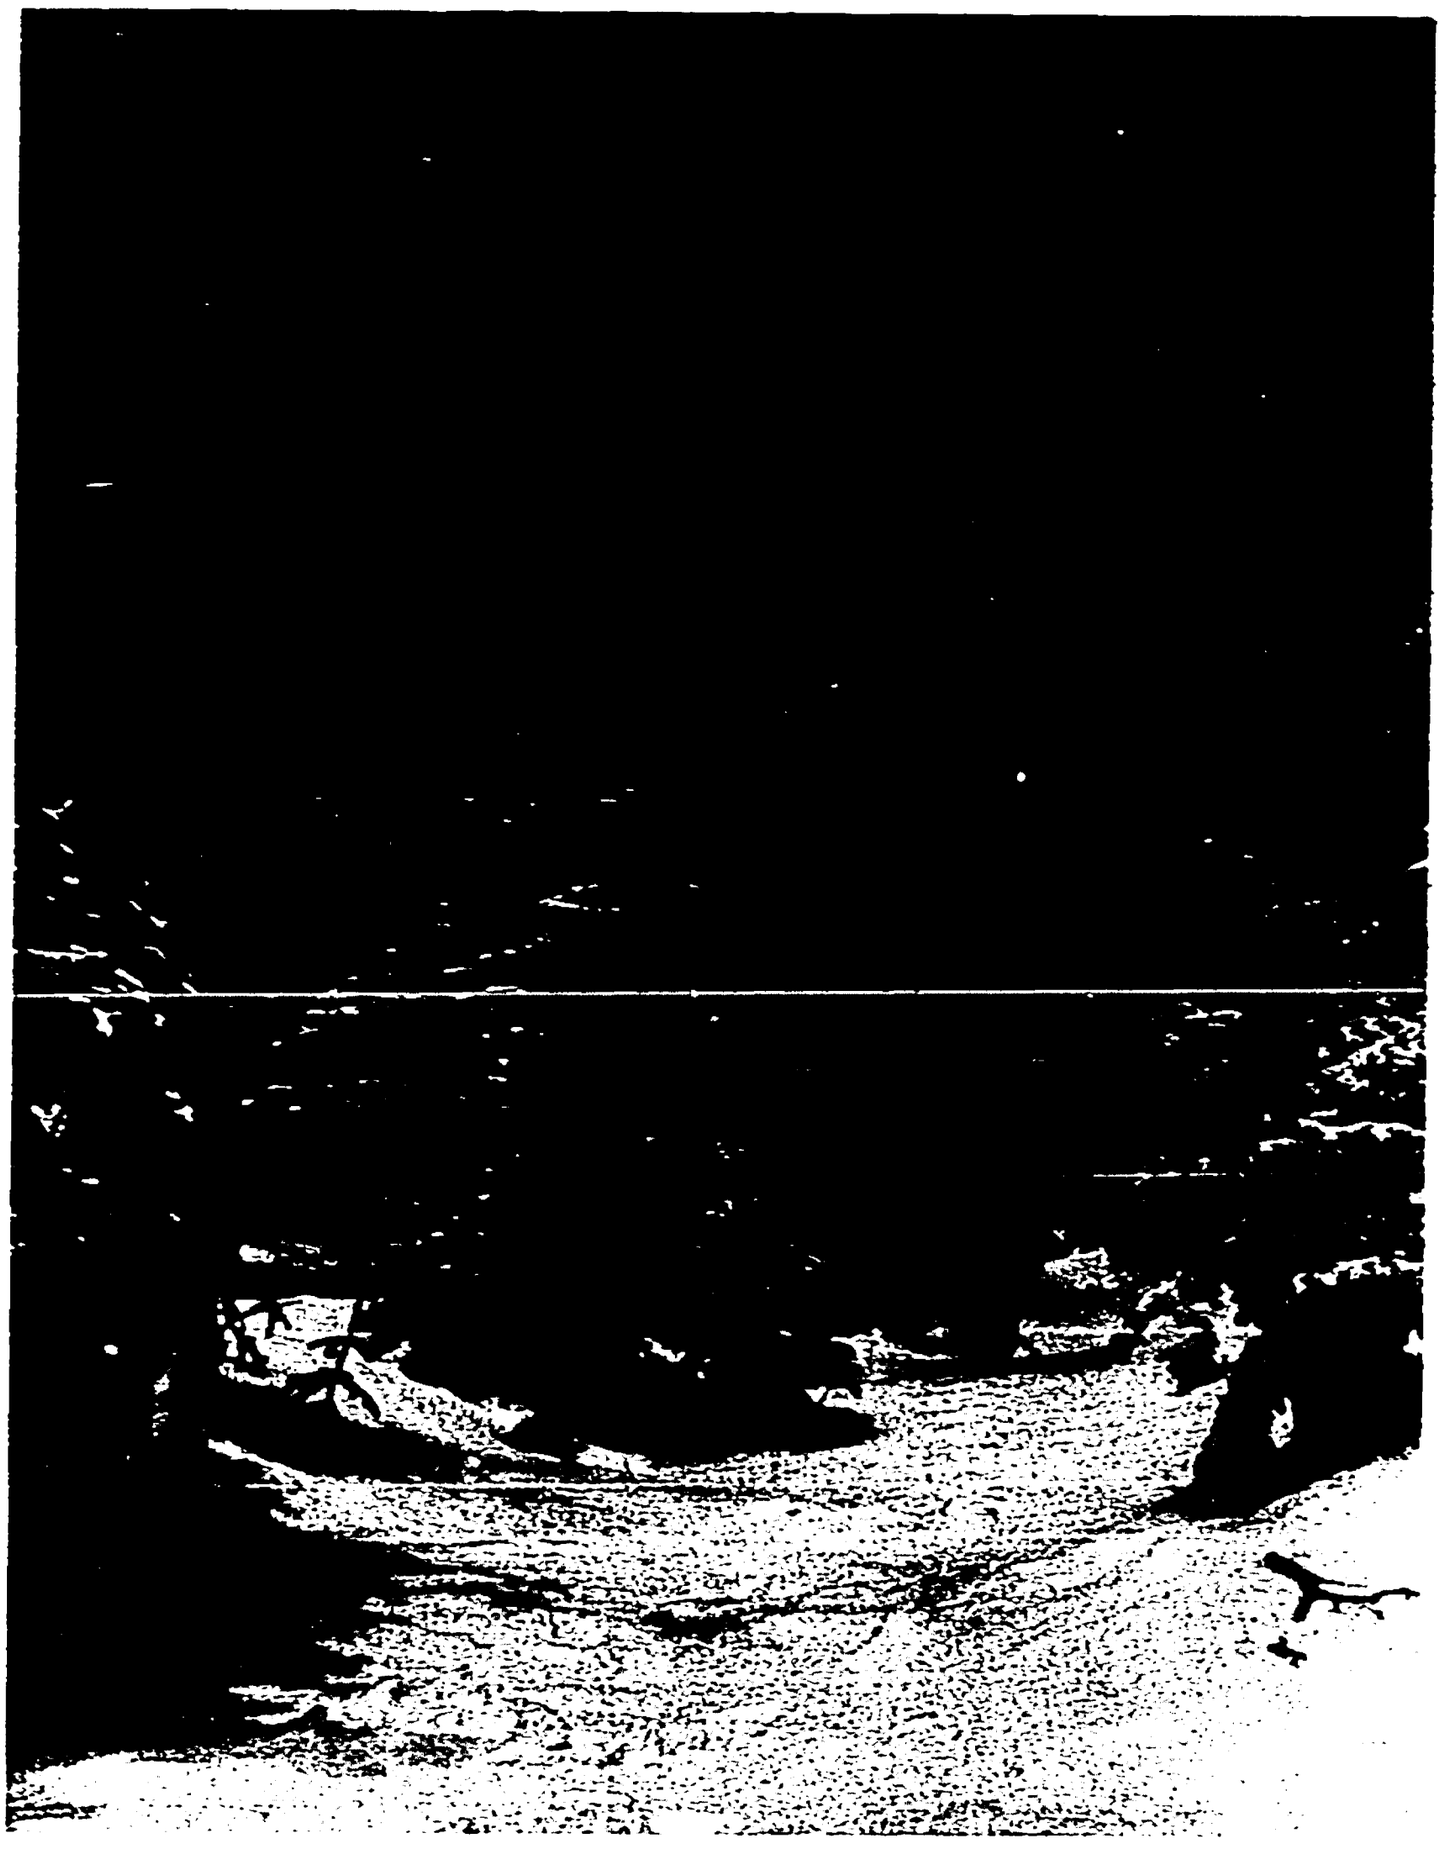
Du Pont wants engineers who want to grow professionally. And we have great respect for the guy who'd like to "know more about it" before he marries a specific kind of job. We even have a plan to help him.

It's called "planned mobility"—a sort of intramural job hop. You don't get into a training program. You get into a job. If it doesn't fit you, or you it, you get into a second job or a fifth or a sixth, until you find the one you want to grow with. It gives you time to decide while you're broadening professionally.



Ask the Du Pont interviewer about it. Ask him anything. He was in your shoes very recently.

UConn Huskies put whip to Orange

BAN ON POINTS. Syracuse center Bill Smith, after a fast start in the scoring department, has not been too offensive lately. The 6-11 pivotman has scored only 11 points in his last two outings, as his teammates are having trouble getting him the ball. (Photo by Biggar)

STORRS, CONN–The only suspense in last night's Syracuse-Connecticut basketball game was whether the Huskies would top the century mark. They did it in the last minute, and sent their partisans home happy for the first time this season.

The 103-84 victory for coach Burr Carlson's young team came after ten straight losses. Syracuse, which had been confident of victory going into the game, saw its record further dropped to 4-9.

The Orange were almost literally run off the court, as the Huskies made extensive use of an old SU weapon, the fast break. Paced by their playmaking guard, Bob Boyd, they cleared the ball out fast and raced down the court far ahead of the dazzled Orange.

Connecticut featured a balanced attack with five men in double figures. Boyd, in addition to a phenomenal 16 assists, found the time to pick up 18 points. Sharpshooter Bob Staak had 19, center Steve Koski had 15, Tony Budzinsky had 19 and Tom McCrocklin was high with 21.

McCrocklin scored most of his buckets at the end of the fast break, as he did a good deal of basket hanging. Budzinsky, a 6-8 sub, scored 14 of his points within a two minute span of the first half, which set the wheels spinning for the UConns.

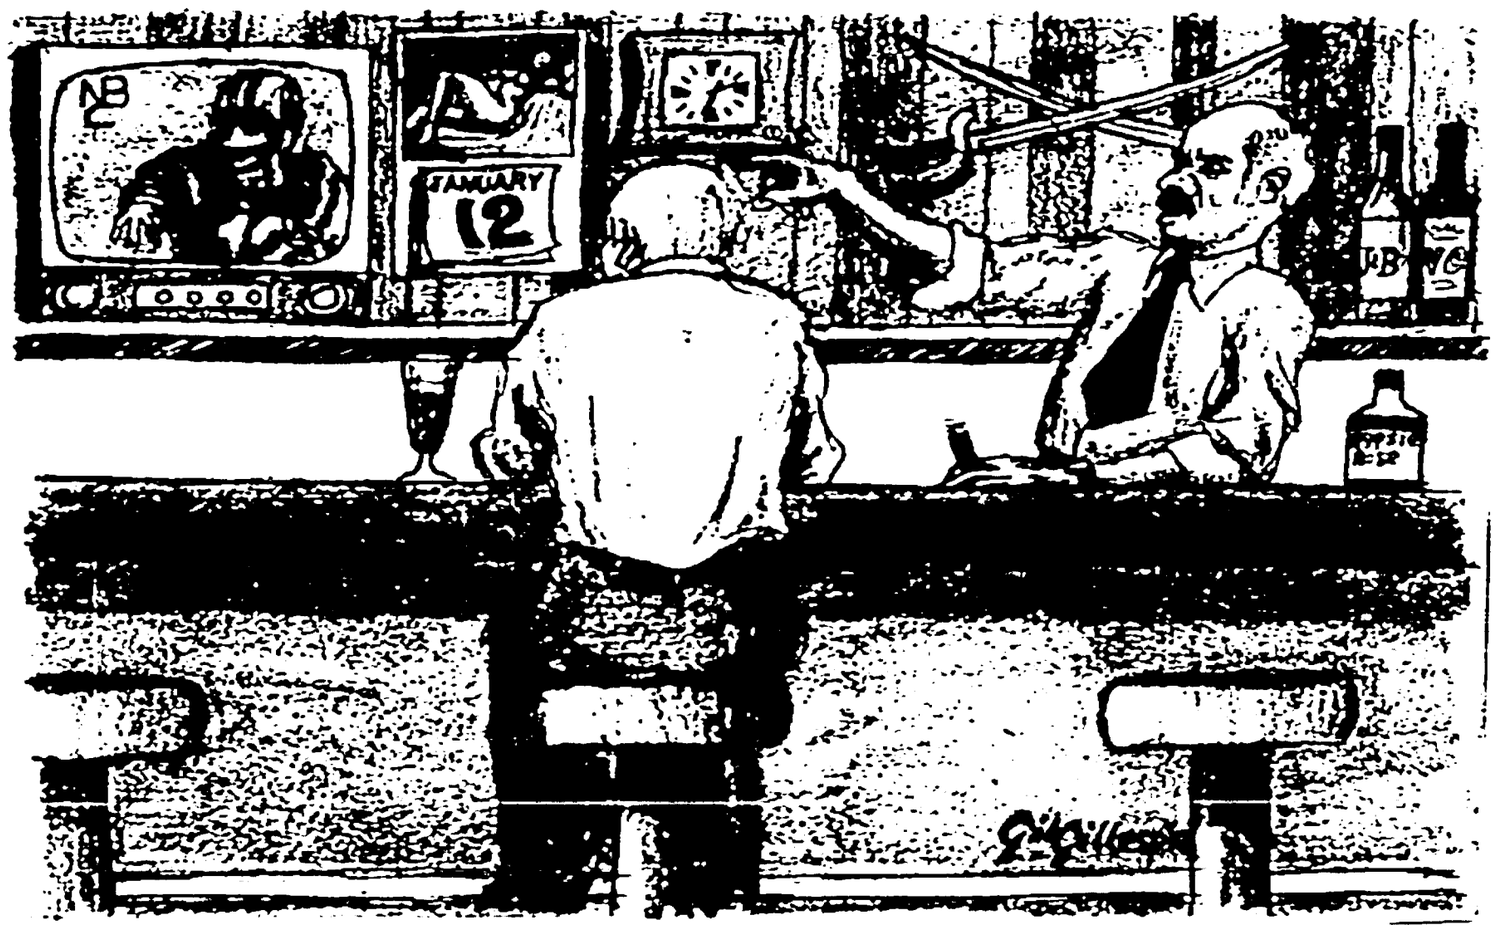
SU played some of their worst ball in the first half as the Huskies ran out to a 54-50 halftime advantage. Connecticut outshot the Orange from the floor, 59 percent to 41 percent, but much of their scoring came on uncontested the last break layups that SU seemed powerless to stop.

SU, meanwhile, was forcing many shots, rather than waiting to move the ball to the inside. If it was not for Bob Kouwe's hot hand, the Orange might have been in worse shape at halftime. Kouwe scored 22 of his game high 28 points in the first half.

The Huskies did not let up in the second half, as they were still running and pressing at the end of the game. They scored the first 10 points of the second half, upped the lead to 24 at one point, and waited for the Orange to make defensive mistakes.

According to the statistics, the Orange did not do too badly. They outshot Connecticut, 81-76, and outrebounded them, 48-46.

One problem that plagued Syracuse on offense was the inability to get the ball to their big scorers. Bill Smith, who leads SU scorers on the year, had only three field goals, as he suffered his second straight poor offensive showing. Kouwe, after keeping the Orange in the game through the first half, could not get loose during the second, as Connecticut made some minor adjustments in its shifting zone. He scored only six points after intermission.



The Orange was visibly disheartened after the game. "There was no way we should have lost to this team," said Kouwe. There were 2,204 fans in the UConn Field House who might have disputed his statement, however.

Things do not look too bright for the immediate future of the hot-and-cold Orange. "There will be some changes made before Saturday," a disgruntled Roy Danforth observed.

Voice from the bleachers

New sports novels bring attention to the fan

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

Now that the season for finals has arrived, it is high time to settle back into an easy chair and start to read. Forget about the history, physics and anthropology, however. There is some much better stuff on the market.

Today the bleacher fan heralds the next era in sports literature. Frank Merriwell is dead. Chip Hilton has become a dope addict. Even the greatest sports hero of all time, Henry "Author" Wiggin, The Southpaw of the New York Mammoths, has now passed his prime.

Two current novels have ushered in the nouvelle vague of athletic yarns. They concern sports, and yet they are not about them. They are anti-novels with anti-heroes. And, to culminate this glorious revolution, the anti-hero of sport turns out to be, of all people, the fan!

The main character of Robert Coover's The Universal Baseball Association, Inc., J. Henry Waugh, Prop., is an aging accountant who has never handled a bat in his life. In Frederick Exley's A Fan's Notes, A Fictional Memoir, Exley himself is the star, although the closest he came to notoriety was as a reserve on the JV basketball team at Watertown High School.

Coover's story contains a lot of play by play, yet it has little to do with the game of baseball. The Universal Baseball Association is a game developed and played by Waugh in his solitude every night. It is played with dice, and resembles such games on the market as Strat-O-Matic baseball. Waugh, however, is not content to merely play the games; his Association has a history, from the Year I; complete with financial ledgers, births and deaths and interesting political sidelights.

J. Henry, however, gets to a point where the game becomes real, and he finds it is difficult to separate the world he has created from the world that has created him.

Putting himself in the role of one of his fictional players, something strange happens. "Beyond each game, he sees another, and yet another in hopeless succession. He hits a ground ball to third, is thrown out. Or beats the throw. What difference does it make? He stares at the sky, beyond which there is more sky, overwhelming in its enormity. He, Paul Tranch, is utterly absorbed in it, entirely disappears, is Paul Trench no longer, is nothing at all: so why does he even walk up there? Why does he swing? Why does he run? Why does he suffer when out and rejoice when safe? Why is it better to win than to lose? Each day: the dread. And when, after being distracted by the excitement of a game, he returns at night to the dread, it is worse than ever, compounded with shame and regret. He wants to quit–but what does he mean, 'quit?' The game? Life? Could you separate them?"

Coover comments on baseball along the way, elaborating on the strange mystique that the ordinarily boring game has. "...the record, the statistics, the peculiar balances between individual and team, offense and defense, strategy and luck, accident and pattern, power and intelligence...and, at the same time, strange as it seemed, so much ultimate mystery."

Baseball is compared to things it has never been brought up against before: accounting, intercourse, the American Way, religion. "I had the funny feeling," Waugh says to his only friend, "that ball stadiums and not European churches were the real American holy places." All this builds up to a psychedelic ending that even Marshall McLuhan would have a tough time figuring out.

Exley, on the other hand, is overly concerned with the real world, although he is sometimes unable to cope with it. He is the son of the most legendary schoolboy football player in the Northern New York area, and the memory of his father, whom he could never match, haunts him through his life. Although he does possess talent in his own right, he is forever on the run. He finds momentary solace only in drinking and the New York Giants.

"Why did football bring me so to life?" he asks. "I can't say precisely. Part of it was my feeling that football was an island of directness in a world of circumspection. In football a man was asked to do a difficult and brutal job, and he either did it or got out. There was nothing rhetorical or vague about it; I chose to believe that it was not unlike the jobs that all men, in some summer past, had been called upon to do. It smacked of something old, something traditional, something unclouded by legerdemain and subterfuge."

And so, from city to city, job to job, aslyum to asylum and woman to woman, Exley searches for his equivalent to football. He watches his idol and classmate at USC, Frank Gifford, and thinks, "We were viewing something fine, something that only comes with years of toil, something very like art." The book is a sometimes happy, sometimes sad rememberance of a life with many ups and downs.

The Universal Baseball Association was published by Random House at $4.95. A Fan's Notes comes from Harper's at $6.95. They will make you forget George Plimpton.

Frustration vs. finance

Library hours stay uncertain

WARREN BOES

Studying?

About 100 or 125 students were reported in the main reading room of the library at 12:30 a.m.—studying. Twenty or more had drifted out by 1 a.m. "It's definitely not wasted space," said one observer. One of the student members of the Council on Student Life suggested that a compromise might be reached shortly enabling the university to keep the library open later than usual, if not all night.

By EVAN RICHERT
and LARRY KRAMER

Nobody really expected, or apparently wanted, any disruption at the library Wednesday night. Nor was anything but studying planned or hoped for last night.

This, say Council on Student Life members, is what they would like to see for the remainder of the three-week, 24-hour-day experimentation period recommended by the CSL Monday night. "We're not out for a confrontation," said SG President and Council member Chuck Hicks yesterday, "we just want what's best for everyone."

Uncertainty about the experiment, however, will loom at least until tonight, and probably until the beginning of next week, for no one is sure how long it will last. Reports have ranged from two days to three weeks. Even Library Director Warren Boes does not have a more precise answer than "as long as possible."

Perhaps the uncertainty—and a potential confrontation—rise in the confusion about who actually has the power to determine the length of the experiment. Keeping the library open 24 hours a day is not a student activity and could be construed as a basic change in policy. Therefore Chancellor Tolley or his representative would have to act on the recommendation.

But the only response from the Administration to the three-week experiment recommendation has been a statement issued Tuesday by Vice President for Academic Affairs Frank Piskor, leaving the matter to Library Director Boes.

Some CSL members apparently saw this as a tacit, if not clear, approval of the recommendation, particularly because most of the Council understood that Boes had given the experiment the go-ahead at Monday night's CSL meeting. Most council members were so confident that this is what Boes meant that they began recruiting students to staff the "graveyard shift" at the suggested $2 an hour.

Tuesday afternoon however, Council members were told by Boes that the experiment could not be financed and that the recruiting would have to stop. This apparently came as a surprise to most Council members, who claimed that, although they knew there would be no new money to fund the experiment, they were given the clear impression by Boes that, if nothing else, priorities in the existing budget could be shifted to accommodate the night-hour expenses.

The 24-hour library demand, which CSL student members had hoped would demonstrate a show of confidence in the Council by the Administration, thus has evolved into a potential confrontation—not so much because the 24-hour library is so valuable, but because students once again feel that they and the CSL are on the verge of frustration.

More than that, they again sense an Administrative "run-around," for, they say they do not understand how on one night they can be given a distinct impression that the experiment could be financed, and the next morning be told it is impossible— unless pressure was quietly applied to Boes by higher Administration officials, forcing him to disclaim his earlier optimism. But, according to Piskor's statement the matter is in Boes' hands.

Boes, meanwhile, although apparently willing to cooperate within budget limitations, now appears to be pessimistic about the recommendation. He and others, including the chairman of the faculty library committee, point to the strain on the budget and staff caused by all-night hours. Wednesday night's student turnout probably did little to persuade him that the experiment would be worth the costs.

The library staff counted no more than 155 people in the library at 1 a.m. while two other sources counted 286 and 304 at that hour. Only 25 remained at 4:15 a.m., according to the library staff.

At the same time, he is reluctant to hire student volunteers because, he says, they would be less responsible than a paid staff.

Furthermore, Boes Wednesday night questioned whether CSL should even have made the recommendation, indicating that it is properly within the jurisdiction of the faculty library committee.

Regardless of Monday night's impressions, the experiment was reduced to Wednesday and Thursday nights--and as long as possible after that, apparently meaning as long as staffing and financing are available.

But there are no assurances that students are satisfied with this set-up. Although they insist they do not want a confrontation, most CSL student members have indicated they are dissatisfied, and that if other students say they wish to use the library after normal hours, then that is a right which they will respect. That presumably means opening the library should it be closed by the Administration.

If a confrontation is to be avoided, the fate of the experiment apparently depends upon a suitable compromise between an overtaxed budget and a student determination to honor a policy change which they hoped to initiate. The outcome, as one SG official pointed out, may be a step toward a badly needed definition of CSL power.

SU program threatened; cable stirs ire in Uganda

By BOB STRUGATZ

A sedition trial in the African country of Uganda is threatening to cause the dissolution of Syracuse University's East African Studies program in that country. The school is running an undergraduate program in social psychology at the University of Makerere in Kampala, Uganda.

On Oct. 18, 1968, Rajat Neogy, founder and editor of the magazine Transition, and Abu Mayanja, an opposition member of Parliament, were arrested for a letter written by Mayanja to Transition and published by Neogy which attacked the "allegedly slow rate of Africanization among the high court of judges Unganda."

Academicians

The impending trial of these two men immediately became the interest of many academicians all around the world. One of these was Marshall H. Segall, acting director of the East African Studies program at SU. In a letter to A. Milton Obote, president of Uganda, Segall praised Uganda for carrying on the trial proceedings with "order" and justice. To this letter there was no reply.

Segall then followed the letter with a cable which ran: "We watch keen interest sedition trial stop. Concerned lest unfavorable outcome threaten our own efforts to channel academic assistance into Uganda stop. Urge vigorous adherence to international standards of justice stop. Speedy completion of fair trial only outcome that can prevent tarnishing Uganda's good name. Signed Faculty PEAS, SU."

The cable expressed the personal views of Segall, but was misinterpreted by the government of Uganda to be direct interference on the part of Syracuse University in the affairs of the trial. Obote threatens now to request SU to abolish their psychology program, which would deprive Uganda students of this opportunity; already, one such student has come to SU for his graduate work.

The first report of this situation was dispatched by the foreign news agency Reuters. It stated: "The ruling Uganda People's Uganda Party newspaper, The People, said today the Government cut all links with the University of Syracuse because the New York institution interfered in a court case scheduled to open here...The People said the move followed an alleged cable sent by Syracuse University announcing it would withdraw all aid to Uganda if President Milton Obote did not insure a 'favorable outcome' in a sedition case."

Chancellor Cables

In response to the situation, Chancellor William P. Tolley sent a cable to Obote: "Distressed by alleged action taken by your government against Syracuse University as reported by Reuters January 8. Assure you that cable of January 3 not authorized by me or any other officer of Syracuse University. Cable sent unknown to us by Prof. Marshall Segall as expression of individual views. Regret these unfortunate developments."

A spokesman for the university stated that all the school could now do would be wait for further action on the part of Obote. SU considers this a very unfortunate occurrence, and is hoping for a speedy reconciliation.

Flu vaccine coming

Frederick N. Marty, M.D., director of the Student Health Service, announced Thursday that 1,000 doses of Hong Kong flu vaccine will be available Monday at the health center, 804 University Ave. Students, members of the faculty and employes of Syracuse University may be vaccinated at $1 each between the hours of 9 a.m. and 5 p.m. starting Monday, for as long as supplies last.

Dr. Marty recommended vaccination for all who have not been immunized against the Hong Kong flu, but said those who are now ill should not take the vaccine at this time.

He said those allergic to eggs or to vaccine made from eggs should not get the shots. There are relatively few such people, he said.

The vaccine being made available is part of a batch recently manufactured for immunization against the current wave of Hong Kong flu, Dr. Marty said.

Alternatives for the discontented

There is a timeless conflict between adults with authority and the near-adults such as students. But this does not explain why a growing minority of students is so militant and eager to take over libraries compared to students of ten years ago.

The militant, defiant radical is but the extreme manifestation of a broad malaise and questioning of basic social values one encounters in almost any student. We are still primarily an industrial society based on producing and consuming more and more goods. But a recent Harvard Business School survey showed 88 percent of American college students do not believe that business, despite its increasing involvement in social projects, is concerned with solving the real issues of our time.

Rather than being concerned with producing more so we can consume more, there is an elementary desire to reorder priorties, which is why Student Government President Chuck Hicks can say the needs of the students come before the problems of the University budget. Surely ten years ago he would have been laughed out of office for being so "illogical" and "unrealistic."

He is, by the way uncommonly suited to his office at this point in time. He has a natural spontaneity and desire to communicate; he believes more in moving around and talking to people than in organizing the Student Government executive branch or anything else.

There is much to be said for the discontented student and the underlying objectives of the radicals. If our society is capable of moving beyond the corporation that produces and the advertising which conditions us to consume, then we should do so. And Chuck Hicks is capable of uniting the radical and the discontented when he talks about creating a more humane society.

Nevertheless, despite the evil to which our technology has sometimes been put to use, we do have a more or less open society. We do have room in American democracy to set up competing systems and to compete for power by convincing others of the wisdom of our vision rather than grabbing the Establishment by its shorthair.

Self appointed judges

In loco parentis

"A UNIVERSITY SHOULD BE A PLACE OF LIGHT, OF LIBERTY AND OF LEARNING." -Disraeli

Has Syracuse University accomplished this ideal? We think not. No university can live up to this ideal until it has met all three demands. The limiting of any one facet affects the other two. A small, neat little machine running at the head of the school has established itself as the parents of nearly 10,000 capable students. You, as a group of self-appointed judges, you have been restricting the civil liberties of the student body. This is quite a shame, for a university which claims to be cosmopolitan is missing its chance to become a model for the universities of the world.

It is now time for the university to reevaluate the purpose of education for its students. You must realize that the educational process is more than going to classes and listening to a professor lecture. You must learn that education encompasses the total experience of student life. You have been restricting this process by infringing upon the liberty of the students beyond the bounds of the common law.

The magic phrase is in loco parentis, the power of the university to act in place of the student's parents. You assume this right through a contract that our parents must sign before we enter Syracuse University. Our freedom to expand as people, therefore, is stolen from us even before we enter here as students. Has it not occurred to you that you are dealing with adults? Can you sit behind your desks and dictate standards of conduct beyond the extent of the law to men old enough to fight and die for their country and women who are considered adults by the law of this state?

You say that you are progressing. Parietal hours are cited as an example. We find it amazing that you take pride in returning, in an unequal manner, rights usurped in the first place. Maybe you are proud, but the students of this university are sick and tired of participating in what seem to be mass psychological experiments with fundamental liberties. They are tired of being tested to see if they are mature enough to act as the adults society considers them to be.

We demand an end to in loco parentis and insist on the creation of social freedom within the university. Future demonstrations of student support for this goal will open up the avenues of knowledge at Syracuse University.

Library hours

To the Editor:

The reporting of the open library issue in the DO has resulted in some possible misunderstandings. Most importantly, The DO has failed to convey the most important aspect of this problem to its readers, namely, the excellent spirit of working together that has characterized both students and library administration. No one has tried to dodge the issues or to back down on commitments. To this point, the librarian has shown deep respect for and sympathy to the student request for longer hours. Students have shown an increasing awareness of the real difficulties involved in implementing the proposal for 24-hour opening. The DO has not reflected this spirit, but has printed reports that tend to dramatize and thereby distort the situation.

It is important that the Syracuse community receive the very best reporting of this issue. All involved desire the best possible solution, one that will enhance the academic atmosphere of the University. There are no "meanies" or bad guys involved in this issue. There is almost total agreement on fundamental principles. But the facts are that the university and the university library are facing a severe financial situation. This is not unique to Syracuse. It is a national problem. Therefore, both students and faculty as well as administrators have a great responsibility to weigh the evidence and evaluate the priorities for all new undertakings. We are all committed to the continuing improvement of education, in classrooms, labs, and the library, at SU. But as intelligent people we know that we must make those improvements that will give us the greatest return. We have no right to waste our resources. Therefore, we must decide what steps we can take that will provide the greatest benefit to all members of our community.

As a faculty member, I take seriously the proposal of the CSL..I think it shows constructive thinking and a real interest in the basic educational values to which we are committed. I hope that this proposal can be the basis for increased co-operation

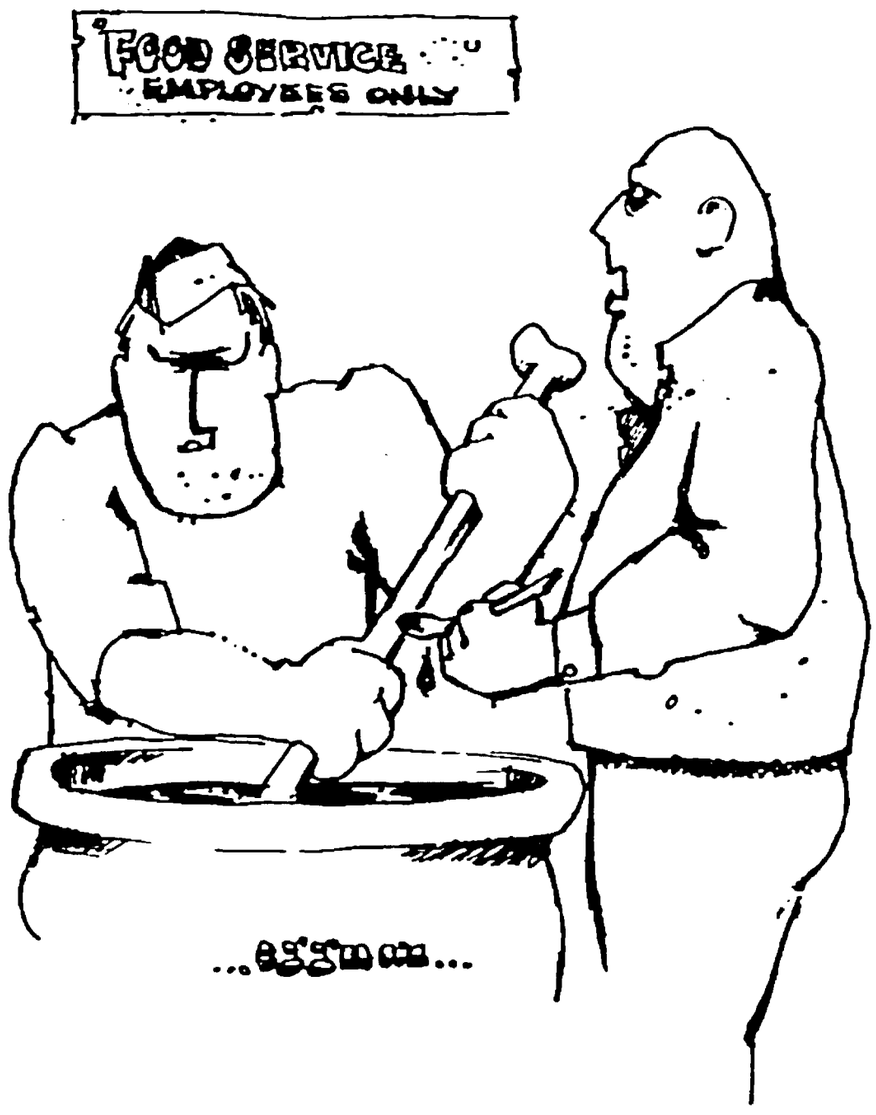
CLOUT'S concern

CLOUT, the student organization of the Graduate School of Library Science, wishes to congratulate those members of the Council on Student Life, the Student Government and the staff of Carnegie Library for avoiding a direct confrontation last evening when the library remained open all night. Director Boes and his staff are especially to be commended for undertaking the manning of all the library service desks and on relatively short notice with so many staff members ill and at home.



Having been outside of the discussion which took place within CSL and between CSL and Director Boes, we are not able to comment on the motives of the CSL and Student Government for wishing the library open 24 hours daily during the next three weeks. However, CLOUT wishes to add a strong second to Dean Piskor's statement of January 7 when he stated that his personal desire was to have "as liberal an extension" of the library hours as possible. We are also aware that the library and administrative staff have discussed keeping the new library, when it is built, open 24 hours daily during the entire academic year, a practice which is finding favor in more and more university libraries across the country.

Therefore, it seems to us, that the objective of 24 hour service is not an issue here. What is at issue is the ability of the library, under present budget and staffing limiataions, to carry out the objective to as full a degree as possible. Clearly, if the library staff alone cannot handle the additional burden, it must have immediate help from the university administration. Anything less than immediate financial help in the direction of extended library hours is a compromise with the quality of education received by both undergraduate and graduate students. Therefore, we cannot support another part of Dean Piksor's statement in which he calls for a review by the Senate Committee on the Library, the Senate Committee on Faculty Welfare, the Graduate Student Organization, the administration, as well as CSL. This we believe is too nebulous to be of immediate effect.

We strongly believe that extended library hours compliment directly the educational aspirations of the student body. We believe that the administration of the university, whose tuition fees are comparable to the highest in the country, is morally bound to place uppermost among its concerns the betterment of learning facilities for its students. The woefully inadequate Carnegie Library must be considered foremost of these facilities.

CLOUT which sees itself concerned with the quality of library service available to all Syracuse students fully supports the objectives of CSL for an experimental three-week program where the library is open for study, reference and research 24 hours a day. We offer our services as future librarians in aiding in keeping the library open. Finally, we urge the administration to give immediate support to the continuance of the three-week experiment suggested by CSL and supported by CLOUT.

Opinion

Destruction inhibits educational change

By Lew Howell

The current difficulties at San Francisco State College and at San Mateo Junior College provide a situation from which students and administrators elsewhere could extract some important lessons, if we are so inclined.

I regard the inclination as important because I don't think that the issues being put forward as the justification for violent activity at these colleges merit violence in themselves. Much of it is no more than a striking out which originates in frustration and not in intention.

There unquestionably is a pervasive mood, a resentment, existing among the young generation in America regarding economic, policital and social systems as well as the educational system. But while many young Americans agree about the general "wrongs" existing, there is not so much agreement about how to attack those wrongs.

The protests and strikes at San Francisco State erupted following the removal from duty of a black instructor who had suggested that other blacks might find it necessary to bring guns on campus to protect themselves. Such a suggestion certainly was not prompted by logic and probably would not have merited much attention had the administration not made an issue of it. But the suggestion, and the administration response, were symbolic of the larger issue of discontent on the part of some blacks and students with the hierarchical structure of American educational institutions with the American social and economic structure. The issue wasn't so much that blacks felt that they needed to protect themselves on campus as it was the feeling that they needed to protect themselves in America.

The question arises as to why the campus should be picked as the battleground for attacking injustices which emanate from the social and economic systems and are only reflected in the educational structure which serves those systems. Though one might disagree with the concept of education simply serving the socio-economic system, no human society has reached a state of being so economically secure that education can be offered purely for education's sake. Educational institutions remain the slave of the society that fosters them.

Can we, however, really affect the master by attacking the slave? To a limited extent, because in this case the slave happens to be in charge of perpetuation of the master's ideals. But what we must realize is that changes in an educational institution leave the socio-economic structure untouched and still able to exert tremendous pressure on the universities and on the students who eventually leave those universities to seek some place in the social and economic systems.

Thus, the firebombing of a dean's home, as happened at San Mateo on Tuesday, involves risking the alienation of many of the uncommitted on various issues of change without striking anywhere near the heart of the matter. And high risk for a possibility of minimal gains is a rather blundering decision to make.

It would be indubitably more profitable to make the most of gains that are possible through education by achieving educational change in a manner which still may involve confrontation but not destruction and its subsequent reaction and alienation

WAER

WAER radio, 88.3 FM will offer "Music to Study By" throughout the exam period, for the benefit of students who wish to eliminate distractions. Beginning Monday, January 13, broadcasting will consist solely of music without interruptions by announcers.

Interlude programming will continue until Monday, February 3. On this date WAER will sign-on for its full-time Spring '69 schedule of programming. At this time also, the new program schedule will be available for distribution.

Study Halls

Following is a list of Study Halls to be operated jointly by Student Government and the Registrar's Office.

All rooms will be in Maxwell, and will be open at the following days and times as Study Halls:

Rooms 202, 302, 309, 315: Jan. 8-12, 7 p.m. to 11 p.m.; Jan. 13-14, 1:30p.m. to 10 p.m.; Jan. 15-19, 7 p.m. to 12 midnight; Jan. 20-21, 1:30 p.m. to 10 p.m.; Jan. 22-23, 7 p.m. to midnight.

SUSKI trip registration

SUSKI members will have another chance to register for the intersession trip to Vermont by paying a $20 deposit at 4 p.m. today in 117 Lyman.

The excursion's complete cost of $69 includes lodging, transportation and lift tickets. Meals must be purchased separately.

Skiers will leave from Slocum Hall on Tuesday, Jan. 21 at 6 p.m. Transportation may be arranged for students with conflicting examinations.

Accommodations have been reserved in Rutland, Vt., at the Highlander Motel. The trip will feature five days of skiing at Killington, Pico Peak, Okemo and Stratton. Club members will return after skiing on Sunday, Jan. 26.

Bye, bye

With this issue the Daily Orange is suspending publication until Jan. 31 so staff members can whiz through their final exams and go skiing--though not necessarily in that order.

The staff extends to all students its sincerest wishes for good luck on finals and a truly memorable intersession vacation; and to the faculty, wisdom and speed in grading the exams...within 24 hours.

See you next term!

Dependency, aggression, independence...

Moods related to childhood experiences

Aggression described as essential

By CATHY COVERT

Human Aggression, by Anthony Storr, 127 pp. Atheneum, New York, 1968, $5.00.

Do you feel depressed in the wintertime? Haunted by the feeling that you are not really independent and on your own? And yet lured against your will-during exams , for example-into longing thoughts of return to the womb?

Reading a book about it may not help much, aside from providing the excuse for not studying (always useful at this time of year), but some of the insights in a new volume by a British psychotherapist may prove intriguing.

In "Human Aggression" Dr. Anthony Storr throws down the gauntlet immediately, challenging the assertion "fashionable among academic psychologists" explaining all aggression either as response to frustration or as learned activity.

Such an explanation supports the hope that we could all live at peace if we only re-structured our society or somehow changed our child-rearing methods.

Such a hope is peculiarly American, says the Britisher in kindly fashion, because Americans look on everything amiss in man or nature as remediable.

However there is much evidence suggesting to Dr. Storr that aggression is a positive drive, an "essential part of human instinctive equipment."

Simultaneously necessary and undesirable, it precipitates wars while enabling the individual to overcome obstacles and to master his environment.

Thus a child's supplies of natural dependence allow him gradually to escape from dependency. Granted, the need to cling to the mother periodically asserts itself, but this alternates with the natural drive to explore, to act independently.

Dependency and aggression are thus "intimately related." In fact, the more a person remains dependent on another, "the more aggression will be latent within him."

"To be dependent on another person is to be in the power of that person, and therefore to feel their power as a restrictive influence which may be overcome."

Man is so aggressive, Storr believes, because he remains dependent for so long on his way to maturity, bottling up enormous stores of aggression meanwhile.

Some people find it difficult to handle their own aggressions, either turning aggression inward against themselves, attributing it to others, or expressing it in "explosive and childish forms."

To tell a depressed person that his mood came from the inhibition or repression of aggressive impulses might meet with disbelief. "Yet, if one were to point out that, in a mood of this kind, the person suffering it lacked his habitual 'attack' or showed less than his usual mastery of events, it is likely he would concur."

And have you ever noticed that a good friend may signal the end of his depression by suddenly turning hostile?

Depression can be triggered by loss or failure, such as disappointment in love, says Storr. Some people, however, are particularly susceptible. Those who suffer more than passing depression in response to bad experiences may look to their childhoods for explanation.

The child who has not acquired the conviction of his mother's essential "goodness" may find it difficult to develop an idea of his own lovability, says Storr. He develops no dependable sense of selfesteem to tide him through trouble.

Even if successful in later life, he may remain vulnerable to "failure, rejection or disappointment, which will seem to him the end of the world and throw him into profound depression."

People liable to such severe depression may find difficulty in personal relations. They are forever looking for the mother love they did not have, and forever failing to find it.

Intensively sensitive to other's moods and feelings, they may exude excess sympathy for others' troubles in hopes of eliciting the same for themselves in return.

More robustly confident individuals may be initially less sensitive to others' needs, but have more to give when they finally become aware.

"The price we pay for our kind of culture is a heavy one," says Storr, "and it is probably that the frequency of depression amongst us may be related in part to our failure to meet our children's dependent needs, and to our puritanical insistence that they shall be independent before they are ready for it."

Relation drawn between sanity and survival

Man viewed as his own enemy

By PAULA SULLIVAN

Sanity and Survival, by Jerome D. Frank, Ph.D., M.D. Vintage Books, New York, 1967. $1.95.

The age-old conflict between man's actual behavior and the way he should behave is the subject of Jerome Frank's "Sanity and Survival, Psychological Aspects of War and Peace."

Whereas others have delved into the topic of man's aggression without adequate preparation, Dr. Frank's approach is the reverse. He is exceedingly careful and accurate, documenting diverse factors and avoiding theoretical limbs. In some cases I would have preferred more discussion of the all-important underlying assumptions, such as whether man is naturally agressive. Lorenz's "On Agression" and Ardrey's "Territorial Imperative" versus Montagu's "Man and Aggression" represent opposing viewpoints on this unsettled question.

Dr. Frank theorizes no further than he can with certainty, leaving prescriptions to policy-makers for whom he supplies data. He begins and ends his book with what is a hope (desire) rather than a "hard fact," (in the terminology of William James). "First, the only hope for the survival of civilization lies in the eventual elimination of war...the main threats now come from man himself instead of nature."

The purpose of this work is close to Church's shocking "If Peace Does Not Come," in which the ominous forecast of future waepons jolts the reader into concerned consideration of how to maintain peace.

Why do individuals fight? Dr Frank lists various causes, stating that the overriding cause is frustration. "Frustration cannot be eliminated from life because humans, never satisfied, keep pushing until they come to a barrier erected by the natural environment or by others also in the process of aggrandizing themselves or their groups..."

This suggests that frustration is inherent in human nature. Can something inherent be modified? I think Dr. Frank skirts this issue when he then suggests that people should adjust their expectations to reality.

His second suggestion is that man channels his frustration-induced aggressive tendencies into such avenues as social reform. But previously he seemed to be speaking about physical aggression, which raises the question: can urges toward physical aggression be totally sublimated into non-physical realms? If not, into what substitute physical activities can this destructive-physical urge be channeled? Sex? Perhaps every night the male will symbolically re-murder his mate in the bedroom. Perhaps a chemical reduction of sexual hormones is in order. Dr. Frank does not say.

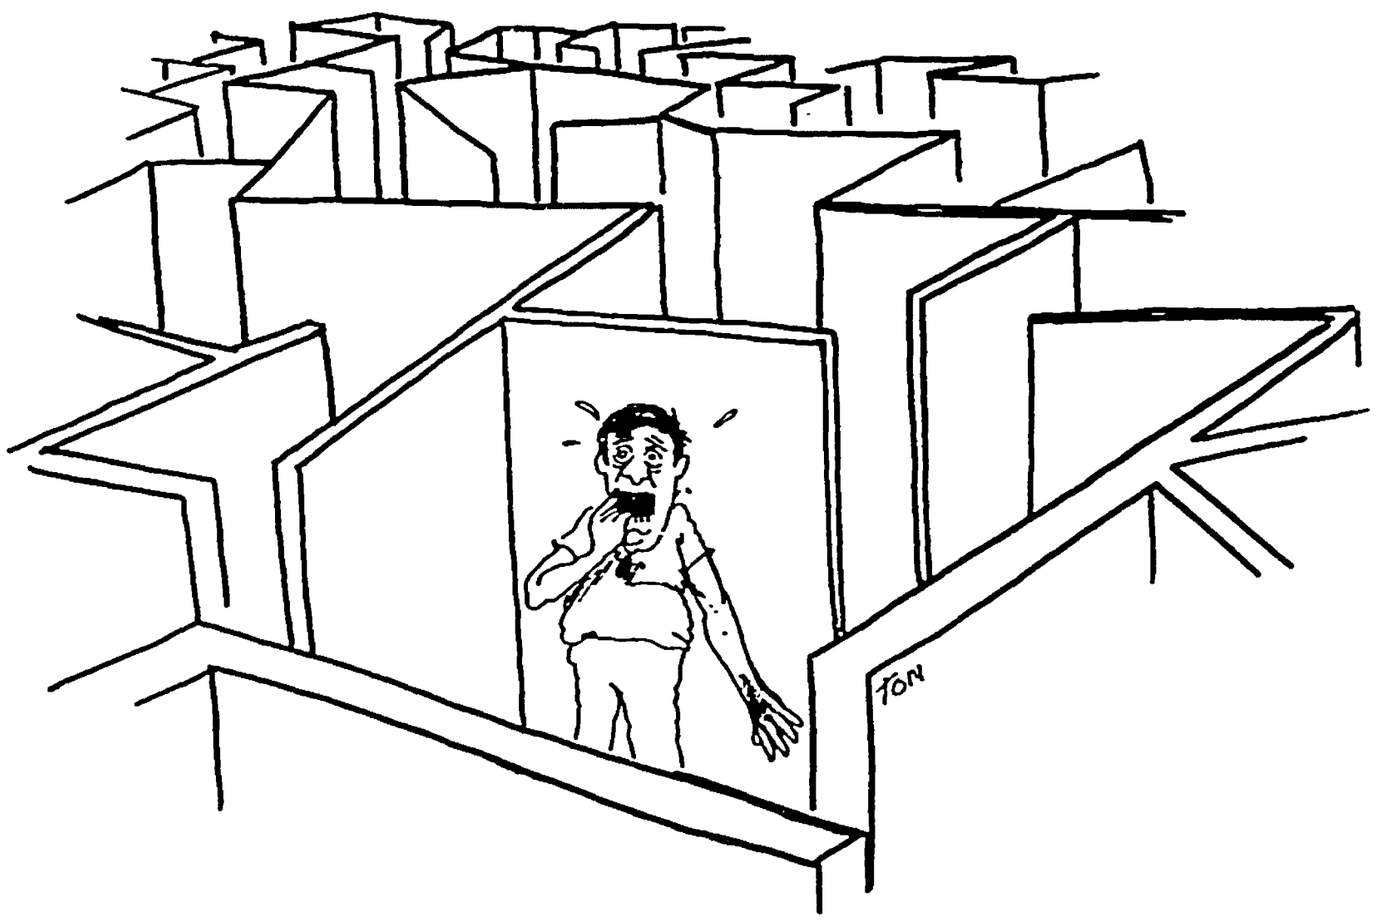
Dr. Frank also suggests that man has a "territorial imperative." "Property rights have always taken precedence over human rights...In humans, as in animals, furthermore, status and property are powerful lures in helping the male attract a mate...Because this has been a major source of war, the abolition of war thus requires loosening of the link between national identity and territory."

But nowhere does Dr. Frank examine the implicit question of whether man's desire for territory is an innate instinct ("territorial imperative") or an eradicable acquired trait. If the former, might not the abolition of nation-state identities (with the attendant wars, mass murders) merely bring conflict back down to the individual level of neighbor against neighbor, to the Hobbesian "war of all against all?"

Dr. Frank does not say.

Like Joan Baez's fervent singing in favor of the international brotherhood of man to replace nationalism, Dr. Frank's suggestion may be more idealistic than realistic. He proposes internationalism to replace nationalism, just as Barnet and Raskin in "After Twenty Years" suggest an open society to replace the existing closed societies. I hope for this Utopia as much as they, but is it likely?

Dr. Frank notes that "One powerful force for group formation is the existence of a common enemy." Traditional anthropology- sociology asserts that the easiest and most powerful mode of uniting people is in a common hate. Hence, societies are necessarily closed to reflect in-group, out-group sentiments, giving prevalence to the "scapegoat" tendency.



Perhaps the greatest underlying and unresolved assumption, on which this or most any book rises or falls, is the "rational animal," the fact on which rightly rests Dr. Frank's suggestion--hope that man can learn to avoid the holocaust of another war indirectly through his imagination, rather than through direct stimulus-response.

But, if we can believe Desmond Morris (a former student of Lorenz) in "The Naked Ape," man is also the "sexiest animal." Dr. Frank indicates that there is a positive correlation between male sex hormones and aggression. Adding these two concepts together would give a possible reason for the theory that "the most striking difference between humans and almost all animals is that...they lack adequate inhibitions against killing their own kind." Thus man may possibly have stronger biological drives toward aggression than other animals, drives difficult to eradicate.

In fact, the whole practical problem of whether this suggested abolition of violence is feasible is unanswered, as Dr. Frank admits: "In short, non-violent campaigns always include an element of brinkmanship, and it is hard to imagine that they could succeed without it. To what extent it is a serious limitation or implies that violence really cannot be eliminated from human conflict remains an open question."

Despite all this critical commentary, I do think very highly of Dr. Jerome Frank's "Sanity and Survival." It is a highly knowledgeable work, and at the same time a modest one--the author says that something "remains an open question" rather than feigning omniscience.

I think his "hope" (in the sense of both ideal and emotion) is essential to the "sanity" and therefore to the "survival" of this powerfully-weaponed human race. Man needs a utopian ideal to guide him. Man also needs emotional hope to avoid taking the defeatist position that his fate is determined biologically, thereby abdicating rational free choice and insuring that his fate is determined by the "darker" irrational forces.

Mr. Rosewater's foundation

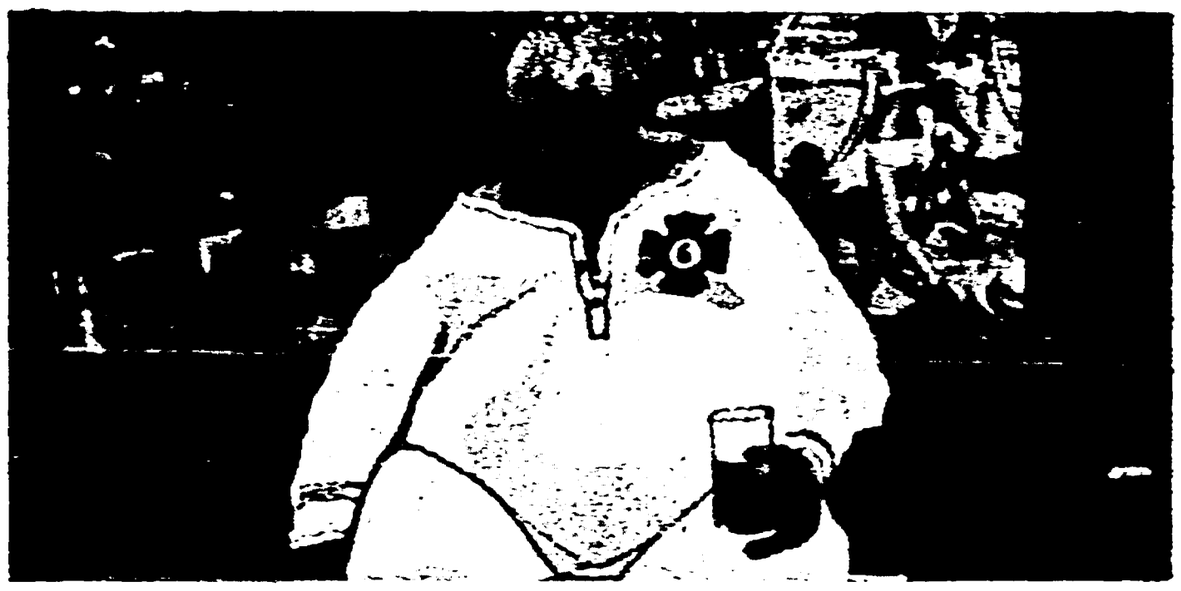
Varied gifts Gifts to the poor and useless

By ABE WAGNER

God Bless You, Mr. Rosewater by Kurt Vonnegut, Jr., 217 pp. Dell Publishing Co., Inc., New York, 1965, $1.75.

Almost any casual observer of the current literary scene is bound to agree that it is indeed cluttered with a great deal of new fiction that is neither novel nor very good fiction. At times even some of the old standbys begin to appear redundant and dry as if they are somewhere between oases on the intellectual desert Although promising new writers appear from time to time, it seems a rare occasion, and one worthy of considerable note, when a truly refreshing book appears. Few people know this fact better than Kurt Vonnegut, who has himself been a book reviewer and literary critic for some time.

Vonnegut's first novel, "God Bless You Mr. Rosewater," can be noted as one of those rare occasions. What he has produced is a piece of fiction that demonstrates exceptional wit and a keen insight into many of the nuances of human behavior.



The principal character, pardoning the pun, in the book is a sum of money. Specifically $87,472,033.61 on June first of 1964. As it happens, this money was the endowment of the Rosewater foundation, and produced an income of about $10,000 a day which, under the charter of the foundation, could be distributed by one Mr. Eliot Rosewater in any manner he saw fit. To the utter dismay of his wife, his father, an esteemed Senator, and of a sneaky attorney attempting to get his greedy hands on Foundation funds, Eliot Rosewater was obsessed with the idea of giving money to people who needed it.

Truly an absurd man, Rosewater insists on rushing about doing absurdly good deeds and lavishing love on useless people. Before abandoning his plush New York office for a one room apartment—office in Rosewater county Indiana, the good man would take walks, exchanging his four hundred dollar suits with the potpourri of people he met on the street. Often he would disappear for weeks, returning in dirty coveralls to a wife who was convinced she was just not good enough for her husband.

Always keen on the condition of volunteer firemen, Eliot made it his business to endow his local department. One gift of particular note was "the loudest alarm in the Western hemisphere. It was driven by a seven-hundred-horsepower Messerschmitt engine that had a thirty horsepower electric starter. It had been the main air-raid siren of Berlin during the second world war."

From this dingy office, whose file contained little else than beer cans, and a ledger kept in senseless cipher, Eliot Rosewater made his life of giving to those little people around him. A telephone to the lonely, a few dollars to the suicidal, and even a set of German records to a local would-be Nazi. For reasons unbeknown to any of those around him Eliot persists in doing good to the point where the question of whether or not he is really mad — or everybody else is.

Without a doubt, Eliot Rosewater, is a truly funny man. As his father notes, "He could have been Governor of Indiana by lifting an eyebrow, could have been President of the United States, even, at the price of a few beads of sweat. And what is he?... a notary public, friends and neighbors, whose commission is about to expire."

'1-Dimensional Man'

By CHARLES WALTER

"One–Dimensional Man" by Herbert Marcuse. 257 pp. Beacon Press, 1964, $2.25.

Herbert Marcuse, the philosophy professor at the University of California at San Diego, is the prophet of our time–though perhaps a false prophet.

He has given the New Left it rationale of violence and disruption and he is read by militant German, French and Japanese students. Although he may be associated with anarchists and nihilists, he is profoundly optimistic about the nature of man.

He is concerned with qualitative change in our society and does not believe any society that stock piles nuclear bombs and bases its economy on "defense" industries can be Great or even rational.

"...the established rationality becomes irrational when, in the course of its internal development the potentialities of the system have outgrown its institutions," he writes.

This is an abstract way of saying ideas once true become outdated and don't perceive what really can be accomplished within new conditions. From this conservative springboard Marcuse leaps into the doctrine that we are all trapped in an outdated industrial society that succeeds in forcing us to consume more and more material goods we do not need.

Our freedoms have enslaved us and only a break with the system will free its iron grip on our "one-dimensional thought." We are molded by powers we do not comprehend and only revolution can bring change.

The springboard of his thought–that industrial democracy has achieved its goals and goes on functioning only at the enslavement of the people–has elements of truth in it. The original goal of business at its highest level was to organize the financial and material resources of a nation to feed, clothe, shelter, educate, etc. an expanding population.

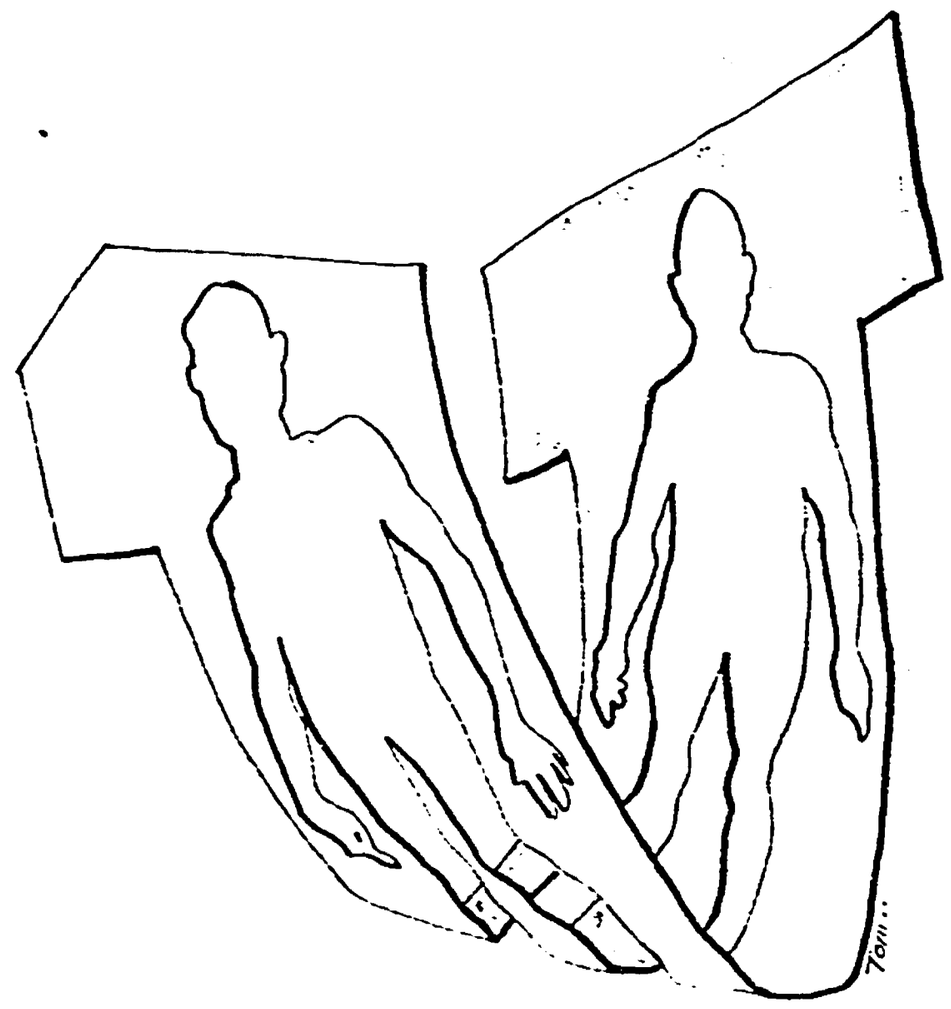
It would seem now we could use our resources, expecially our technology, to create a less hurried, less materialistic society capable of pursuing human potential rather instead of shiny new cars that fall apart in three years. And while our society as a whole is well-off materially, there remain pockets of Puritans choose to increase their material comforts and we have been moving toward an integrated, accelerated national economy ever since.

What guarantee does Marcuse have that the revolution he hopes for will bring qualitative change? Will and Ariel Durant write "The Lessons of History:" "In some cases outworn and inflexible institutions seem to require violent overthrow, as in Russia in 1917. But in most instances the effects achieved by the revolution would apparently have come without it through the gradual compulsion of economic developments. ...To break sharply with the past is to court the madness that may follow the shock of sudden blows or mutilations."

Hence, when the French revolted against the King in 1787 they created the society of the guillotine and eventually turned to Emperor Napoleon.

Marcuse believes men are capable of being perfectly just, wise and peace-loving, given revolution, tomorrow. He does not explain how he and so many students escaped the enslavement of industrial democracy or the corrupting influence of power.

Furthermore, advertising, one of the biggest and fastest growing industries, creates demand for new products by playing upon the insecurities and desires for status of the mass market.



Bur Marcuse's main concern is not the alternatives of post-industrial society. He is convinced discussion of them is pointless since we are enslaved in the current society.

Part of the difficulty of answering Marcuse's analysis is the cumbersome, abstract style in which it is written. There is no lack of imagination in the effort and the abstract style enables it to be comprehensive–he does not condemn this or that isolated aspect of society but the total system. But at the same time he does not illustrate his abstractions by showing how they relate to the lives of the "enslaved." At one point he briefly condescends to give "banal" examples of what he is talking about and they are illuminating. But he chooses not to or can't illustrate his major theme of enslavement in American democracy.

In the introduction Marcuse cites such authors as C. Wright Mills and Vance Packard as illustrating the facts of enslavement. Mills wrote in "the Power Elite" that American society was run by a group of men who all went to the same schools, joined the same law firms, attended the same country clubs and followed the same routes to power as did their fathers and fore-fathers.

Daniel Bell in "The End of Ideology" argued to the contrary that we have an open society with opportunities for upward mobility. Policies in our country could not be formed by an inner elite group because so many of them were simply responses to events outside this country. The policy of containment that was to absorb great industrial resources was formulated by George Kennan, an independent intellectual and diplomat.

The most basic criticism of Marcuse's analysis is his failure to refute the possibility that current consumption–oriented society may be what men want rather than what they have been conditioned to accept. When the colonists came to the raw American frontier from different parts of Europe to settle at disconnected points on the coast, they had the option to create whatever kind of society they choose. Even the poverty and outcasts who for no fault of their own cannot enter and run the race.

Author attempts to satisfy curiosity

Book reveals celebrities' private lives

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

Do You Sleep in the Nude? by Rex Reed, 276 pp. New American Library, 1968, $5.95.

Americans are nosey. They want to know what celebrities are really like, as evidenced by movie magazines, and tourists who swarm over the homes of stars in Hollywood.

One of the latest attempts at satisfying that curiosity is Rex Reed's first book, "Do You Sleep in the Nude?" This provocatively-titled book is a collection of Reed's outspoken, soul-exposing interviews published in the New York Times and various magazines.

Each article exposes a candid, decisive picture of the celebrity being interviewed.

Sometimes the image is unflattering as in Reed's now-famous scathing portrait of Barbara Streisand. The reader learns that Barbra is always late, her grammar is bad, her table manners are worse and one of her hair-do's makes her look "more like a male hairdresser than a girl."

Reed simply and almost subtly tears apart many illusions that the reader may cherish about Barbra. One such illusion is Barbra's supposed empathy with and interest in her fans. When some teenagers brought her some hot chicken soup, Reed quoted Barbra as saying, "Get rid of the creeps. Those jerks follow me everywhere."

Reed is equally adept at painting an appealing picture of someone he respects. He describes actress Shirley Knight as an "idealist, a dedicated innocent who has landed kerplop in the middle of a quagmire of professional jealousy, viciousness and distrust called show business." He conveys the fervid devotion behind her career by quoting her as saying:

"I don't want to wake up someday and be forty and not have done the things I became an actress for. The greatest success of my life was not those Oscar nominations, but playing Juliet for Negro school children in Delaware for seventy-five dollars a week. It gave me more joy than making some silly movie with Yul Brynner in Japan for which I made fifty times as much. It makes me sick to see actors prostitute themselves for money."

Sometimes, though, one wonders if Reed's image-painting subjectivity can go too far. He describes Broadway actress Angela Lansbury "...barefoot, peachy skin glowing, champagne hair bobbing, looking for all the world as though someone had just bottled the secret of daisies and dandelions and allowed her to swallow the formula."

Reed's effusive description of Miss Lansbury is rather unusual and perhaps on those grounds it should be allowed. However, Reed says Warren Beatty (star of "Bonnie and Clyde") is "...restless from having everything too soon, bored with himself, desperate to become a pillar of the movie world...."

Is a man who only knows a celebrity a few hours or days really capable of making such judgments? Sometimes you wonder if the interviews were written by Reed or God.

Also, one may wonder how Reed could use extensive quotes in interviews in which Reed wrote that the celebrity refused to allow a tape recorder or note-taking. As Reed strove to remember the celebrity's words he may have recalled inaccurate statements.

Reed's book is intriguing, rather like tasting forbidden fruit. One piece of advice should be given though–don't treat his book like the Gospel.

Background on Middle-East involvement

Few hints on Israel's future course

By CAROL KEPPLER

The Jews: Story of a People, by Howard Fast, 338 pp. Dial Press, Inc., New York, 1968, $7.95.

In the past few days and weeks world attention has been drawn again to a tiny part of the world. Israel and her neighbors of the Arab world have taken up arms again to gain violently what might be better won at the conference table. Peace and harmony will never come to this area of the world as long as men--Arabs and Israelis--use swords to achieve their victories. There would be less hate and vengeance if men would use the pen. Who are these Israelis about whom so much conflict centers?

Howard Fast has woven a tremendously eloquent saga of the Jewish people. While he answers many questions about the Jews and their relationship to Israel, he also raises many more questions--any one of which would be an appropriate subject for another manuscript.

Though the early history of the Jews may seem deadly dull to those who are interested in the current world, Fast begins one of the major themes of his book there. "The history of the Jews is," for Fast, "this history of his God, his belief, his philosophy, and his unique role on the stage of human affairs." Fast explores the Jewish secular contributions to Western civilization in particular both while the Jew lived in what is now Israel and when he wandered Europe and America in the Diaspora.

In the field of religion, Fast becomes involved in developing two important themes--monotheism and the non-violent ethic. In the beginning Yahweh, the God of Moses, was only one God among many gods. "Moses knit him to a people, the Yehudim, a tribe of a numerous and wide-spread Semite people called Beni-Israel." A contract between God and the Jews was made: "I am the Lord your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt, the house of bondage. You shall have no other Gods besides me." Fast interlaces the development of Judaism with the history of the Jews--their prophets, their kings, their conquests, their defeats.

In the beginning Yahweh was also a thundering god, a just and jealous god, a god to be feared. He was likened to a volcano on the edge of eruption. He was a desert god and his people were a desert people. Then the people of the desert became the people of Canaan. The nomads became the owners of fertile fields and vineyards, and Yahweh became less violent. With Hillel Yahweh, the angry and terrible God, disappeared. He became a pervading presence, and man served God through his actions and with his mystical union with this nonviolent God. Later God was to lose some of his pervasiveness.

Fast fills in the chapters from Hillel to Hitler with wonderfully written prose about Christianity, the Diaspora, Jewish contributions to the great civilizations, the Jews in America. He also provides many photographs. In his elegant and lucid style he tells the reader about the Jews--what their religion is and what their history as a people was.

Where does Israel fit in? Fast feels the Hitler holocaust left the Jews nowhere to go except back to Israel. Jews in large or small numbers had lived there for centuries. It was a mystical home. Europe and America had closed their doors to Jewish refugees. Those who survived went to Israel. They walked three thousand miles. They took boats which were turned back or sunk by the British. Right or wrong, the British had promised the Jews Palestine and Palestine was to be theirs.

How can Israel justify its violent actions with a nonviolent tradition that is over a thousand years old. How could the Jews--the East European, or Asheazi, Jew--advocate violent means while adhering to a nonviolent ethic? Fast attempts an answer... "Man is beginning to learn that it takes more courage to die for a belief in nonviolence than it does to die for a belief in violence. The Ashkenazi Jew was very steadfast in his belief in nonviolence, and for a thousand years he was not shaken in that belief. Surrounded by a world that measured nobility, courage, and honor in terms of butchery, he looked upon the gentile without envy and maintained his position that a human being does not take a human life and then dissolve the horror of the deed in a rationale of necessity." Only when the Jew realized a death machine was operating to destroy him would he turn to violence.

The ghetto Jews of Warsaw fought the death machine of the "civilized" Germany. Perhaps one reconciliation for the Israeli violent actions with the Jewish nonviolent ethic is the presence of another death machine. The Arabs also would like to see Israel-- the Jews--destroyed. Fast, however, does not extend his thoughts this far.

Israel, for Fast, is a turning point in Jewish history. While he is not certain what Israel's contribution to the world and humanity will be, he assumes on the basis of past Jewish contributions that it will be significant. "What direction the future will take no one knows, but it is hardly to be expected that in the foreseeable future as in the remembered past, the story of the Jew will ever be without excitement, creativity, and passion." Fast continues optimistically: "I think there will always be Jews-- if only because the fact of being a Jew is a special kind of wonder, not a condition of superiority and neither a condition of inferiority, but rather a condition of civilization, of being a little bit of an outsider with the outsider's point of view, so that at least some of those who are Jews see things more clearly because they are apart. The world needs its outsiders, Jew or not and being a Jew-and indeed being anything else in the family of man--is a special kind of experience. So many Jews savor with delight what they are, that one who talks of their demise talks out of a lack of knowledge. Mankind will just have to get used to the fact that the Jews are here to stay, and once he is relaxed on that score, he might enjoy them."

What is this significant contribution that Israel will make? What contributions will American Jewry make? Will American Jews continue to blindly follow the Israelis right or wrong? Will violence replace nonviolence as a theme in world Jewry? If Fast knows the answers to these questions, he is not telling--at least not yet.

THESE ARE ISSUES YOU WILL TALK ABOUT FOR THE NEXT 4 YEARS!

FOCUS ON CANADA
What changes will the Nixon Administration bring to our relationship with Canada? Take a fresh look at our northern neighbor with Professor Stephen Koff, a specialist in the field of comparative politics. Koff is currently at work on a study of the Canadian political culture. COURSE INCLUDES A FIELD TRIP TO OTTAWA.
Monday 8-10 p.m. Feb. 10 - Apr. 14 (8 sessions) $35 single; $65 husband & wife.

GOVERNMENT IN ACTION
Who are the men who make the decisions to shape your lives? Joel S. Berke, a political scientist, will emphasize the public decision-making process in the federal government. Berke is engaged in research on problems of public affairs for government agencies as well as private foundations. COURSE INCLUDES A FIELD TRIP TO WASHINGTON, D. C.
Tuesday 8-10 p.m. Feb. 4-Ap. 29 (11 sessions) $50.

NEW DIRECTIONS IN AMERICAN POLITICS
The next four years will bring profound changes to our political system. With Professor Ronald McDonald, you will take a good look at the new administration and at the status of the political party system. McDonald is an observer and participant in national politics. His service in Washington on congressional and senatorial staffs gives him valuable insights into the functions of politics.
Wednesday 8-10 p.m. Feb. 12-Mar. 19 (6 sessions) $30 single; $55 husband & wife.

SELECT TOPICS IN NEGRO HISTORY
For the first time, White University educators are digging into the valuable contributions made by Negroes in every field. This course is fundamental to any well-rounded education in humanistic studies. It is a perceptive look at the presence, role, status and contribution of the Negro to our common past. V. B. Thornton III brings to the course a personal and professional commitment in the examination of the Negro's role.
Thursday 8-10 p.m. Feb. 6-Mar. 27 (8 sessions) $35 single; $65 husband & wife.

The Humanistic Studies Center offers lecture series, lecture-discussion seminars and other special programs for the intellectually curious adult who no longer needs or desires formal academic credit. There are no prerequisites and these non-credit courses cover a broad range of liberal studies.

Bethlehem Steel
Loop Course Interviews:

FEBRUARY 14, 1969

What is the Bethlehem Loop Course? It is our management development program for graduates with bachelors' or advanced degrees.

The course starts early in July with four weeks of orientation at our home offices in Bethlehem, Pa. Loopers attend lectures on every phase of the corporation's activities, and make almost daily visits to a steel plant.

Steel Plant Loopers, who comprise a majority of the average loop class of 150 to 200 graduates, proceed to various plants where they go through a brief orientation program before beginning their on-the-job training assignments. Within a short time after joining the course, most loopers are ready for assignments aimed toward higher levels of management.

How about other loopers? Our Sales Department loopers (30 or so) remain at the home office for about a year of training. Most are then assigned to district offices where they take over established accounts.

Fabricated Steel Construction loopers are trained in a drafting room, on a field erection project, in a fabricating shop, and in an engineering office. A looper's first work assignment is based on interests and aptitudes disclosed during this program.

Loopers in Accounting, Shipbuilding, Mining, Research, Traffic, Purchasing, Finance and Law, General Services, and Industrial and Public Relations go through training programs tailored to their types of work.

Where would YOU fit in? Check your degree or the one most similar to it.

MECHANICAL ENGINEERING–Engineering or mechanical maintenance departments of steel plants, fabricating works, mining operations, and shipyards. Fuel and combustion departments. Supervision of production operations. Marine engineering assignments in Shipbuilding Department. Also: Sales or Research.

METALLURGICAL ENGINEERING – Metallurgical departments of steel plants and manufacturing operations. Engineering and service divisions. Technical and supervisory positions in steelmaking departments and rolling mills. Also: Research or Sales.

CHEMICAL ENGINEERS–Technical and supervisory positions in coke works, including production of byproduct chemicals. Fuel and combustion departments, including responsibility for operation and maintenance of air and water pollution control equipment. Engineering and metallurgical departments. Steelmaking operations. Also: Research or Sales.

INDUSTRIAL ENGINEERING–Positions in steel plants, fabricating works, shipyards, and mines. Engineering and maintenance departments. Supervision of steelmaking, rolling, manufacturing, and fabricating operations. Also: Sales.

CIVIL ENGINEERING: Fabricated Steel Construction assignments in engineering, field erection, or works management. Steel plant, mine, or shipyard assignments in engineering, construction, and maintenance. Supervision of production operations. Sales Department assignments as line salesman or sales engineer (technical service to architects and engineers).

ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING–Steel plant, fabricating works, mining operations, and shipyard electrical engineering, construction, and maintenance departments. Technical and supervisory positions in large production operations involving sophisticated electrical and electronic equipment. Also: Research or Sales.

MINING ENGINEERING – Our Mining Department operates coal and iron ore mining operations and limestone quarries, many of which are among the most modern and efficient in the industry. This 10,000-man activity offers unlimited opportunities to mining engineers. Also: Research.

NAVAL ARCHITECTS AND MARINE ENGINEERS: Graduates are urged to inquire about opportunities in our Shipbuilding Department, including the Central Technical Division, our design and engineering organization. Also: Traffic.

OTHER TECHNICAL DEGREES–Every year we recruit loopers with technical degrees other than those listed above. Seniors enrolled in such curricula are encouraged to sign up for an interview.

ACCOUNTANTS–Graduates in accounting or business administration (24 hours of accounting are preferred) are recruited for training for supervisory assignments in our 3,000-man Accounting Department.

OTHER NON-TECHNICAL DEGREES – Graduates with degrees in liberal arts, business, and the humanities are invited to discuss opportunities in the Sales Department. Some non-technical graduates may be chosen to fill openings in steel plant operations and other departments.

NOW'S THE TIME TO SIGN UP FOR AN INTERVIEW. And when you register at the placement office, be sure to pick up a copy of our booklet, "Careers with Bethlehem Steel and the Loop Course." It contains important information about the corporation and your opportunities through the Loop Course.

Committees investigate candidates for chancellor

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

Prime candidates for the chancellor of Syracuse University are being investigated by the Trustee, Faculty, and Student Committees on the Selection of a Chancellor.

Two top candidates for the post have been interviewed recently by representatives from all three committees. These applicants will be visiting SU later this month for further interviewing.

Out of approximately 100 candidates, five or six have been placed on an "A" list which designates them as the prime candidates. The trustees, faculty and students, who worked together compiling nominations, all agree on the names presented on the "A" list.

Regarding the student committee's participation in the selection of a chancellor, Dean Frederic J. Kramer, chairman of the faculty committee, believes that they've "played a significant role."

"They've exercised independent judgment and they have had their opinions listened to," he added. Among the tasks in which the students have participated are: nomination of candidates; participation in all screening activities; viewing the credentials of the candidates; and expressing preferences for the primary list.

The trustee and faculty committees compiled a statement of eight qualifications which they deem necessary for the candidate to possess. The student committee, which is chaired by junior Ray Rafalik, agreed upon the list as preliminary criteria, but also added a list of questions as a supplement.

That the candidate would have "an understanding of the conditions that are necessary to the process of education," and "be a person of proved administrative ability" are some of the qualifications listed. He should also be a person with vision, imagination and sound judgment.

With respect to students, the list states that the candidate should "be sensitive to student concerns and values, and have the ability to communicate with them." Another point states that he "preferably be in the age range under 50, but more important, he should have a youthful outlook, and be open to innovation."

In interview sessions the student committee will present their list of questions. They may query the candidate as to how he would deal with expanded study programs for undergraduates, how he would handle social conflicts, and what his views are on student rights.

The student committee consists of ten persons, four graduate students and six undergraduates.

Varsity faces Lafayette tomorrow

Krause silently shatters pool marks

By GINA BELL

I'd like to introduce you to a freshman swimmer named Brian Krause, and I'm going to say lots of nice things about the way he swims. If I don't, you might never know that he's broken two university records in his first two meets, and has a good chance of breaking a third this Saturday when the freshmen swim at home against Colgate immediately after the 1:30 varsity meet with Lafayette.

Brian sure isn't telling.

Quite, different, almost too modest to be for real, Brian won't fit your image of what a Super Jock should be. (High school All-American and New York State record holder, he fits into the Super Jock category easily.) He doesn't wear a letter jacket, or even a swim team sweatshirt. He doesn't swagger, or look around to see who's checking out the presence of the Star. Surprisingly enough, he must be pumped before you can get him to talk about swimming in general or his swimming ability in particular. Strange.

It isn't until you've talked with him for a while you realize that Brian Krause has no need to beat his own drum. He's content to let his record speak for itself. He has the quiet sort of self-confidence that belongs only to the superior athlete. It doesn't come from some sportswriter's calling him the best freestyler in the state, and it isn't evidenced in a swagger.

It comes from knowing that he's better than his competition, and knowing how to prove it. It is fostered, not by praise and publicity, but by the knowledge that he has been beaten only twice in the past five years, and is not likely to be outswum in the near future.

Brian began to establish himself as an outstanding freestyler when he started breaking records as a freshman at North Tonowanda High School, a member of the best swimming league in New York. In the Buffalo area, the competition is fierce and the coaching is excellent. Taking full advantage of his opportunities, Brian added his bit to the record books, and by the time he was a junior, his times had qualified him for All-American status in the 100 and 200 yard freestyle events. As a senior, he earned further All-American recognition in the 400 yard freestyle, and by the time he'd graduated, he held the New York State records in the 200 and 400.

Brian's record was doing all the talking when the recruiters came around, and he was approached by virtually all the swimming powers in the East.

It was swimming coach Jon Buzzard who persuaded Krause to try Syracuse. The idea of being on a team that was building and establishing itself as a swimming power appealed to him, as did the University scholarship and the Syracuse atmosphere.

He is already earning his way: in his first meet, against Buffalo, he broke the university and freshman records for the 500 freestyle, as well as the frosh 200 freestyle. Later, against Alfred, he broke the university 1000 yard freestyle and freshman 200 butterfly records.

Brian Krause's big ambition is to become nationally ranked and to increase the prestige of eastern swimming. Buzzard is more than happy to have him as a part of his building program. "He's one of the finest, if not the finest, swimmer to come out of the state, and when a nationally known swimmer like that comes to Syracuse, students in the area begin to think of us in terms of swimming," he explains. "More quality swimmers will become interested in the team since Brian swims for it."

What lies ahead for a guy who's made such a big splash already? Buzzard is confident that he'll break four more records soon, since he's already bettered the university time. Some day, Brian Krause is going to be Big Time. You'd better get to know him now while he's still a humble frosh.

THE LOOK OF LOVE. A pensive Roy Danforth surveys the scene unfolding on the court before him. Danforth is sure to see at least one good basketball team tomorrow, as Tom Gola's LaSalle Explorers come to town. Ranked 11th nationally, they sport a 10-1 record, and have plenty of height. (Photo by Biggar)

LaSalle: lawmaker and rule breakers with height

By LARRY CENTER

The Syracuse Orangemen will face their first big test of finals week tomorrow afternoon, and this one looks even tougher than the ones to follow.

Pennsylvania State Legislator Tom Gola brings his LaSalle Explorers in for a 2:00 game at Manley to be televised as the ECAC Game of the Week. Those who can't make it to the game will have to be content watching Tony Kyasky and Art Thoms perform in the Senior Bowl, since there is a local TV blackout.

Roy Danforth's boys will be trying to stop a LaSalle club that is presently 10-1 and eleventh-ranked by AP. The Explorers' only loss was to South Carolina in the finals of the Quaker City Classic. Their last victory was Tuesday night over Creighton.

All Explorer starters return from last year's 20-8 team, including All-America prospect Larry Cannon, a 6 ft. 5 in. senior. Last year he led the team in scoring with 18.7 assists, and was second in rebounding. Cannon's best game of the season came against Syracuse, when he scored 30 points, had 18 rebounds and six assists.

Joining Cannon on the starting five are sharpshooting guard Bernie Williams (16.9 on 48% from the field last year), 6 ft. 7 in. soph Ken Durrett (25.1 and 14 rbs for the frosh), 6 ft. 6 in. Stan Wlodarczyk, and either playmaker Roland Taylor or 6 ft. 8 in. Ed Szczesny.

Gola can go to a veteran bench if any of his starters need a rest. Senior Joe Markmann and juniors Stan Witalec and Ed Holzer, who have been hampered by injuries, can all do the job. He also has another "Cannon" in reserve, Larry's younger brother Greg.

The Explorers are doing everything on their own initiative this year--they have no post-season tournament to look forward to. They are in the middle of a two-year NCAA probation for rules infractions, but, the way they're going, the team doesn't seem to mind.

The Orange are coming off an unexpected and disappointing loss to previously-winless Connecticut. Before that game, they beat Pitt here at home a week ago. To stay with the Philadelphians, Roy's Boys will have to be tough off the boards and play tight defense. LaSalle's front wall is 6 ft. 8 in., 6 ft. 7 in. and 6 ft. 6 in., and the whole team can shoot.

CENTER TAPS: As LaSalle coach, Gola returns to the scene of his former glory. A three-time All-American, he led the Explorers to an NIT title (1952), an NCAA crown (1954) and a second place (1955), before a ten-year career in the NBA...The Explorers beat Syracuse twice last year, 78-68 and 105-81—but the Orange leads in the series, 12-6...Bill Vesp's Tangerines, 4-1, will take the court after the varsity contest to oppose a tough Canton Tech team...Gerry McFadden will be facing his high school pal who directed him to Dodge City JC, Roland Taylor...Both games will be aired over WAER, 88.3 FM.

Injured wrestlers trip Cortland State

By ADAM DAWSON

The varsity wrestling team won its first dual match of the season Wednesday night. The grapplers beat a stubborn Cortland State team by a 18-11 score.

Ralph Mannaker got the team off to an early 3-0 lead when he beat his man at 123 pounds. Ralph won by a 7-0 score, including over six minutes riding time advantage.

Two consecutive losses at 130 pounds and 137 pounds by Joe Palmieri and Mike Heck gave Cortland a 6-3 lead and made coach Ed Carlin very "uncomfortable."

Eric Greenberg evened the score with a 10-0 decision at 145 pounds. Eric wrestled one of his better matches and was always in control.

Ray Boland squeaked out an 11-10 victory, and Ken Haynes was pinned to make the match score 11-9.

Cortland's lead did not last long as Steve Parker scored a resounding 13-2 triumph. Parker was always in control during the match, scoring three takedowns and two predicaments, all with a sore shoulder.

Glenn Bateman widened the Syracuse lead with a squeaker, winning 6-5. A last period reversal and his ability to stymie his opponent's takedown attempts gave Bateman the match.

In the final match, Bob Rust decisioned his opponent 15-4. During the match Rust got credit for five takedowns and completely controlled the match. The Cortland man's weight advantage (40 lbs.) made a Syracuse pin impossible.

This victory, with a patchwork lineup, boosted the varsity's record to 1-2.

The reason for the lineup was that old numesis, the injury bug. This year's team has been severely bitten so far this year.

Regular 137 pounder, and last year's freshman eastern champ, Richie Haagen heads the injury list. He will be out for the entire season, and says Carlin, "He will really be missed." Rich separated his right shoulder early in December at the Coast Guard Tourney.

Another regular and walking wounded is co-captain John Terboss. John tore ligaments in his right knee in that same tourney. There is a slight possibility that he will be able to wrestle before the season is over. His availability would give Carlin a top notch wrestler at either 137, 145 or 152 pounds.

Freshman eastern runnerup in 1968, Doug Garr, has had bruised ribs for the past three weeks. He is slowly working himself back into shape and is not expected to miss more than one or two matches.

Another sophomore, Woody Barry, was the regular 160 pounder until he developed tonsilitis just prior to Christmas vacation. Barry now has an infected ear, but he is expected to be back in fighting form for the team's next match, which is January 25th against the Engineers from Lehigh.

In addition to those "major injuries" the ineligibility of Vinnie Paolano and the non-appearance of Jerry Beach, add the countless sprains, aches, pulled muscles and the flu, and you have some idea of what the first part of the 1968-69 was like for the wrestlers.

Sports sidelights

In other Hill sports action tomorrow

In other Hill sports action tomorrow, the varsity gym team travels to Cortland for a dual meet, starting at 1:30;

the varsity and frosh fencers are at Cornell, both at 2:00; and the freshmen wrestlers visit Colgate in a 6:30 starter.

All SU teams then have a two week exam layoff before competition begins again on Jan. 25.

The Crucifix

Dean of Hendricks Chapel, the Rev. John H. McComb, stands beneath the crucifix that dominates the south wall of his new office in Hendricks Chapel basement. The crucifix was sculpted by Doris Ceasar, for St. Johns College in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Because the Christ figure did not have a cross, it was deemed sacreligious by officials of St. Johns and shipped back to the sculptress. Her friendship with Dr. Martin H. Bush, assistant dean of Academic Development, led to her donation of the crucifix to SU. Dean McComb discovered it hanging in Lowe Art Center and, after speaking to the sculptress, arranged for its placement in his new office. According to Dr. Bush, it is now worth $15,000. The Metropolitan Museum of New York has offered to purchase the piece. (See story, p. 16).

A literary success, Maelstrom

As many of you know Syracuse University was recently presented with its first edition of the literary magazine, Maelstrom. Unlike past efforts, Maelstrom is an unpretentious publication intent on presenting campus literary talent to a wide range of readers.

Its lead piece, "All God's Creatures," is a powerful short story about man and beast, ending by blending the two. "To a Widower" is a touching poem that reaches our own sense of mortality and interdependence, while "Journalist at a Street Fight" offers at least a sharp bit of cynicism.

The literature is balanced by Jacqueline Dutton's sensitive illustrations, making the first edition of Maelstrom a literary success.

'Blues for Mister Charlie'

The Salt City Playhouse's performance of the James Baldwin play, "Blues for Mister Charlie," is an excellent example of communication through the arts.

The audience was over half black on the night of the final performance and each race must have preceived and shared the predicament of the other as the characters on the stage acted out their roles leading to the murder of an outspoken Black youth in a small Southern town.

Despite the greater crime of the Red Necks, the human shortcomings and fallibilities of both white and black was the central theme and such compassion in these turbulent times is refreshing.

Chapel mural

The mural in the basement of Hendricks Chapel is a distinct addition to the campus. You cannot help but leave behind your momentary concerns when you step from the shadowy passageway into the well-lit cavern-like room that contains it and probe introspectively for meaning.

Dean McComb's plans to make part of the future Noble room and the surrounding hallway into a showcase for student art also contributes to the campus by making Hendricks Chapel a physical center of student talent as well as the campus's spiritual focus.

The basement renovations in the Chapel have also made a physical donation to ecumenism by providing space for the Hillel organization (across from the office of the Methodist chaplain).

Registration

By Abe Wagner

At its worst, the semi-annual ordeal of registration usually amounts to a few hours of waiting, walking and frustration. For those who are "priveleged" to register early and work at the gymnasium for the next three days listening to the complaints of their fellow students, a few types emerge as likely candidates for the flying fickle finger of fate award. To these faculty and students alike who make registration a bad time for all who try so hard...

First prize goes to the Department of Psychology who, on the first day of registration produced a total of two people to issue cards to a line two hours long. The person designated to man the Educational Psychology section couldn't seem to arrive before eleven, while students were lined up from the early hours for their cards.

A runner-up worthy of special mention is the Linguistics desk, which, in the most hectic hours of Wednesday's rush, left its desk unattended for a two hour lunch break, while would-be Linguistics, Hindi and Swahili students waited...

Never failing in its annual attempt to do battle with the students, the benevolent English Department was doing its level best to confuse people already weary from the rigors of the Psychology line.

Registration is never without a myriad of trying student types, who give the gym its true character...

"I can't take any 8:00 o'clocks, I don't feel well in the morning...

"I had five guts and nothing before ten in the morning -- now everything is closed...this place is always trying to screw the students."

"This course is in my major...I need it to graduate, you can't close it."

"What this school needs is pre-registration. All the other colleges in the country have it and all the kids there love it, why can't we have it here?

"They closed the course to all but departmental majors and those preregistered for it. It's just like this place, always trying to screw you."

"I can't take a Saturday class, I'm Jewish. I told you, this place is anti-Semetic."

Despite these few staff and students who can at times make things hard, it is to the credit of the majority that over ten thousand students of all shapes, sizes and levels make it through their own ordeal in reasonably good shape.

Every registration has its unsung heroes. Each time the same people can be counted on to rise up to the salvation of the poor student in distress. Heading the list is Registrar Edwin Smith, known to most as "the man with the bow-tie who makes everything right." At trying times like registration, even the legendary Dean Cope, known by various titles, can be counted on to lend a helping hand. For the past few days the good Dean has fought off attacks of the flu to bring order in his domain.

The best thing about the whole process, as most will agree, is that it only lasts a few days. So until next Fall...

Letter: six year deception

To the Editor:

It has come to my attention, in even so far off Colombia, that my Syracuse University is intending to purchase 4 and 6 East 62d in New York City to complete a purely speculative real-estate investment.

I should like to say that this report leaves me very much disturbed. Disturbed because for the six years that I attended The School of Architecture at Syracuse University, I was ever so pains-takingly brought to an awareness and appreciation of our Architectural and Urban Development. I believe that these have great value, though not measurable by the dollar sign, SU.

Now it would seem that those of you who have, by no little effort, helped to guide and build the development of the university, including the School of Architecture, are negating some fundamental principles. The question is: Have I been deceived for six years, is my education worthless (other than in dollars)? I am certain, to your great consternation, that it is not; and that perhaps the error or oversight is yours. You are certainly not lighting the fire yourselves; which, no doubt, is contrary to your holy vows; but are you not inviting this incendiarism while giving the fire-department a two week vacation?

I should like to remind you that one of the better architectural works by James Renwick, and the only one in the entire upstate New York area, came to the knowledgable care of Syracuse University. It was destroyed by Syracuse University.

Have you considered that perhaps you are not informed on every facet of the subject; and that it just might be to your advantage to obtain other knowledgable advice? I refer you to that fragile institution, The School of Architecture. Fragile because of the economic and other reprisals that it is in your power, collectively and individually, to make upon its members. (Do not be shocked-- if you can take a little from us all,you can take all from a few.)

May I suggest that you consult those whose life and work are involved with this aspect; especially Professor Emeritus, Harley J. McKee; and even others hopefully beyond our own university.

Graduate draft deferrments

The following advisory letter has recently been sent by The Director of Selective Service to all State Directors. The practical effect of this advice will be to permit most graduate students to complete the school term in which they are currently enrolled before being inducted into the armed forces.

STATE DIRECTOR ADVICE NO. 763
SUBJECT: POSTPONEMENT OF INDUCTION FOR CERTAIN STUDENTS

When college students are ordered to report for induction during a school term in which they are satisfactorily pursuing full-time postbaccalaureate courses, consideration should be given, on an individual case basis, to a postponement of induction until the end of the term (quarter, trimester, or semester).

Library hours extension possible

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

Though SU's Carnegie Library has resumed its normal operating hours after the 24-hour library experiment which lasted for two weeks during final exams last semester, a permenant extension of the hours may be possible. Library Director Warren Boes reported that should student support for the longer hours be indicated, and should additional funds be appropriated to the library at a future date, the hours it is open to students could be extended.

To conform with a Council on Student Life (CSL) recommendation, the library was open round-the-clock from Wed., Jan. 8 until Wed., Jan. 22. According to a statement from CSL, a request for the 24-hour library during January exams and the entire spring semester was made by CSL's student members on Dec. 18.

The statement continued saying that CSL members "agreed that:
(1) the proposal was a reasonable one for consideration;
(2) raising the question of expanded service by the library, even in these times of budgetary crises, was not a disaster but rather a substantial opportunity for mutual learning; and

(3) the request by the students to be given the opportunity to prove that they want to use the library has a certain attractive ring to it."

While considering the library proposal, CSL concerned itself with issues like the educational needs of the students, the facilities of the library that would be open, the cost of the experiment and the staff needed during the extended hours. CSL was advised on these matters by the library director and members of the Senate Library Committee.

The final recommendation for the 24-hour library during exams came from CSL on Jan. 6. The experiment began on Jan. 8, though, according to Boes, it was difficult because of "such short notice." His greatest problem was staffing the library, some of which was finally done by student volunteers.

In an effort to determine the number of students taking advantage of the extended hours, library workers counted students in the library every hour on the half hour from 12:30 a.m. until 7:30 a.m. each night the library was open. Understandably the number present dwindled to just a few most nights.

An average of 115 students were present in the library at 12:30 each morning during the experimental period. The greatest number recorded at that time was 275 counted on Wed., Jan. 15 and the lowest was 62 counted on Sat., Jan. 18.

An average of 80 students were present at 1:30 a.m. during the two weeks; 28 at 4:30 a.m. and an average of 10 at 7:30 a.m. About 35% of the people present left between 12:30 and 1:30 each morning. There were people in the library at all times except when the count was taken at 7:30 a.m. on Jan. 11.

Boes said the cost of the experiment from Jan. 13 until its conclusion was $1,246. Cost was not calculated for the earlier days because much of the staffing was done by volunteers. The money for the experiment was provided by student organizations, primarily Student Government and the Association of Women Students.

The CSL statement said the experiment proved to be "a valuable one." It indicated that "further discussion on the library issue will include consideration of the possible use of branch libraries and dormitory libraries for 24-hour study. In addition there are proposals for the opening of dining halls for study; however, the Council is aware of the differences between a study hall and a library. The original student proposal was for the use of library facilities."

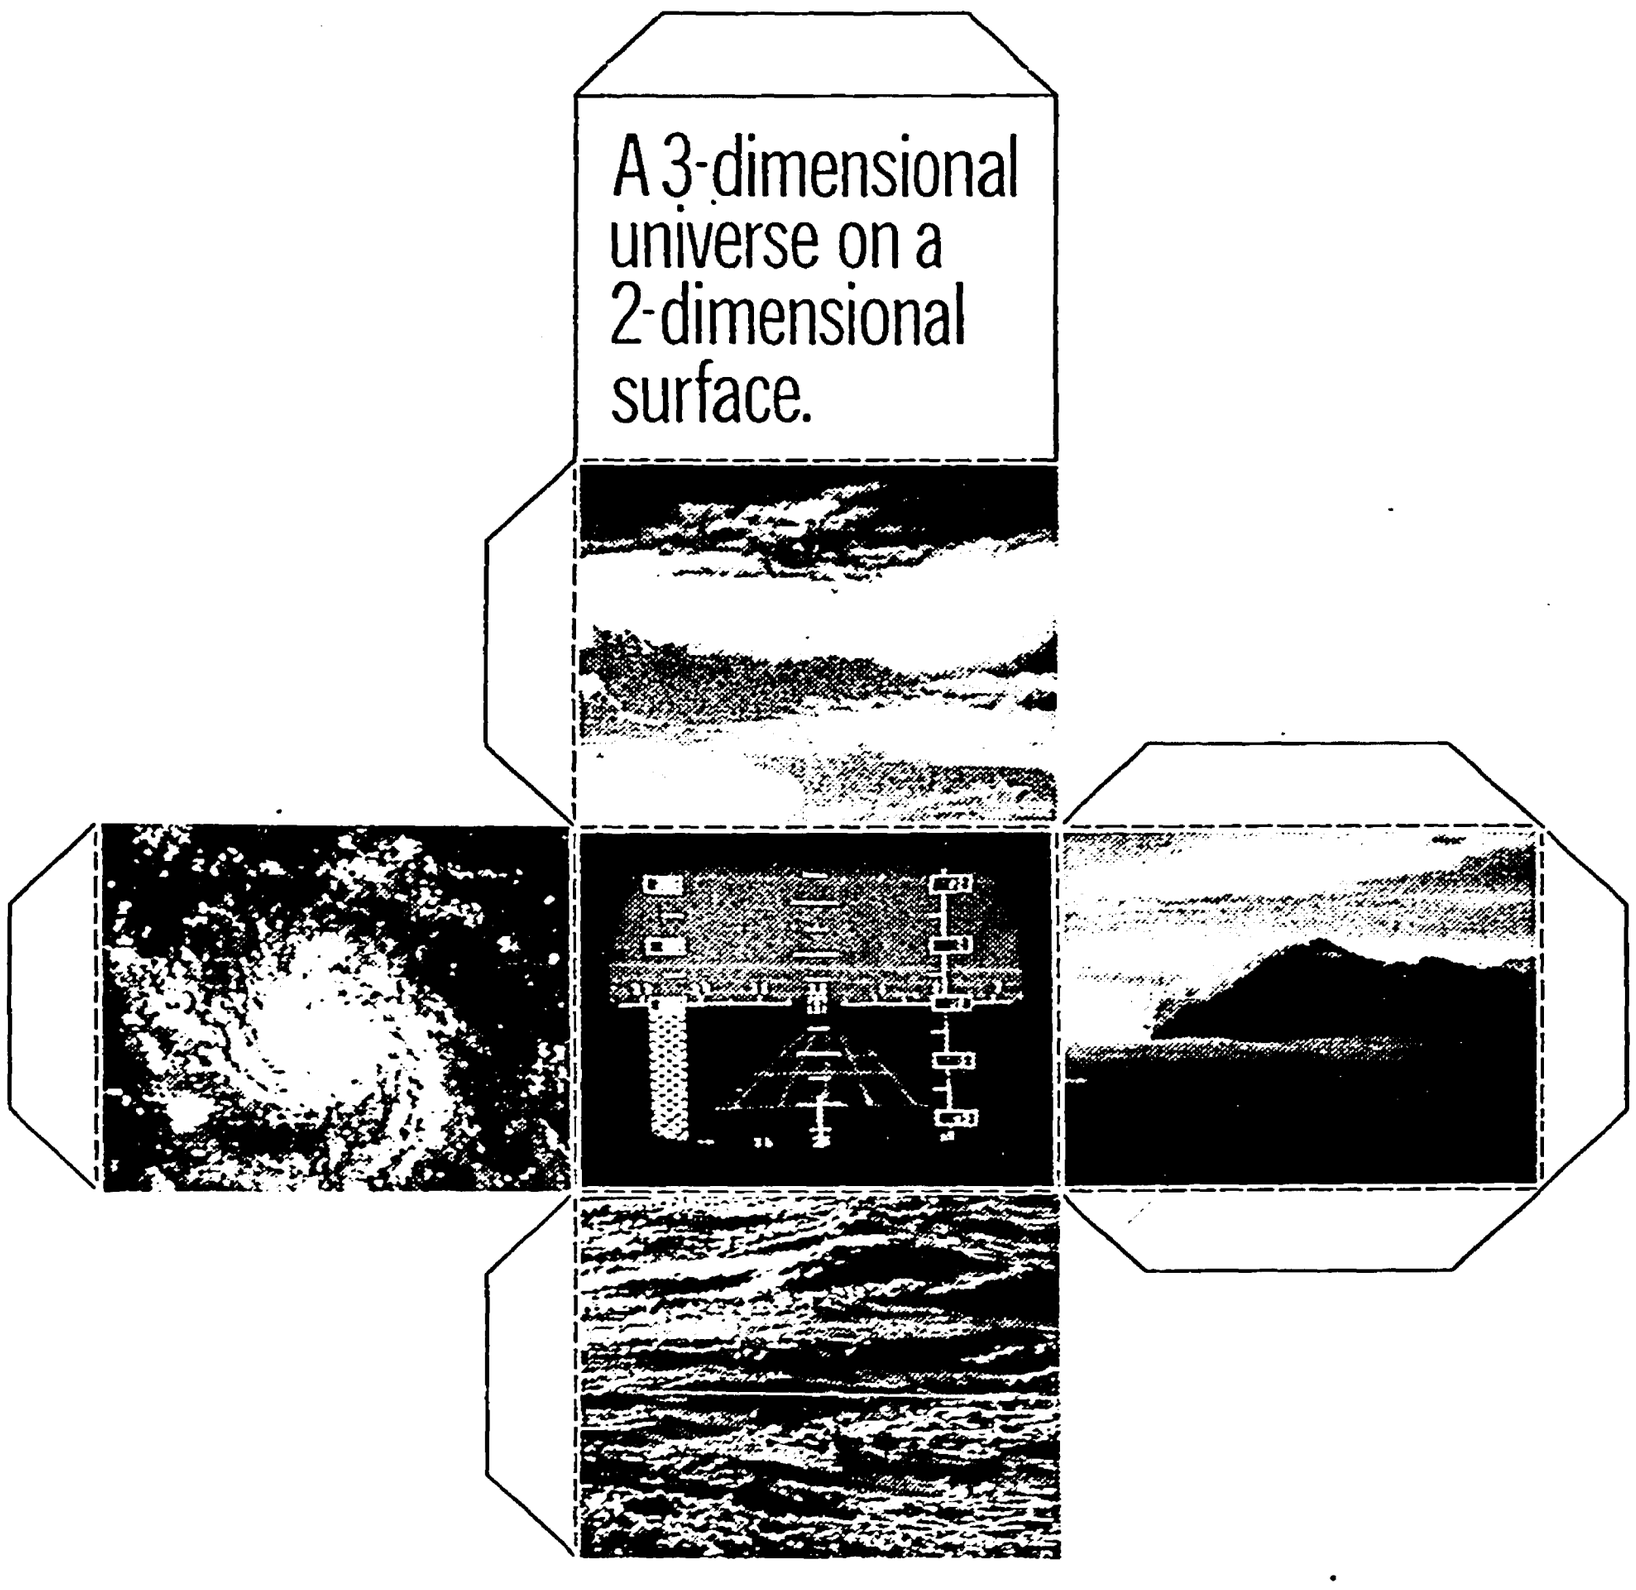
In addition to continuing study of the library issue, CSL will be working on a proposal for self-governing dormitories. Such a proposal is now being considered by student members of CSL.

In an interview yesterday, President Chuck Hicks, a CSL member, said he felt it was "time to stop playing games and let every dorm govern itself." He indicated, however, that there would have to be "broad general guidelines" applying to all dorms.

Hicks said a series of dormitory and campus-wide "town meetings" will be held shortly to discuss the matter with students. The first such meeting is expected within several weeks.

UU accepting applications for positions

University Union is currently accepting applications for the positions of Film Director, Programming Board Treasurer and Policy Board Treasurer.



The Film Director has charge of booking and screening all UU movies. He sits on the Programming Board.

The Programming Board Treasurer prepares statements for all UU programmed events and assists the Policy Board Treasurer.

The Policy Board Treasurer supervises all UU bookkeeping, prepares the yearly budget, and signs all requisitions.

Applications should be two typed pages or less and include name, address, extension, accum., and ideas for the position and for UU. Turn them in to Mary Franciosi at Haven by Feb. 12.

Are You A Slow Reader?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to increase your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure, success and income by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, most people regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading ability to a remarkable degree. Whether reading stories, books, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this newspaper with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More," mailed free. Frosh endeavor, Aspiration '72 will unite races in social action

LARRY KRAMER

A new link between Syracuse's black ghetto youth and the white university student will soon be introduced by SU's freshman class.

The program, Aspiration '72, has been on the drawing board since early last semester, and this week appears to have made it off the ground.

"We're suddenly being seriously considered for funding by a foundation, and a few organizations on campus have indicated their willingness to contribute funds for operational costs. We'll be in the Syracuse schools by February 17," said Larry Kramer, the program's creator.

The goals of Aspiration '72, according to program officials, are to increase the number of black students, poor students and minority group students in large universities, and to engage white students in social action.

To achieve these ends, Kramer has proposed a two-pronged program. First, there will be a series of forums in the high school social studies classes, directed by SU students.

"The forums will serve as a podium for black students to air their feelings about the white university system," said Kramer. "The important reason for this is that we want to leave the impression with the black student that this is just as much his program as it is ours."

The student forum-directors will then report to a central committee, comprised of two faculty members, one administrator and four students, which will in turn issue a report of problems to be solved and possible solutions.

The second aspect of the program, according to Kramer, "is much more individual-oriented." Following the forum discussions in the high school classrooms, student directors will return to the high schools, but this time to recruit applicants for Aspiration's scholarship program.

The major difference between this scholarship program and others at SU, said Kramer, "is that we will be giving the scholarship to the student for the school of his choice, not necessarily SU. We can, if we are able to get the funds, also provide an additional scholarship solely for SU."

At least a portion of the money is scheduled to be raised during a future fund raising week, the dates of which will be worked out with fraternities on campus, Kramer said.

Scholarship recipients will be determined by the central committee.

"The single most important factor of Aspiration '72," noted Kramer, "the factor that we think will prove to be the major step to success, is its student origins. It is significant that the program was started by upper-middle class white students who want to do something to change the establishment from which they themselves are reaping benefits."

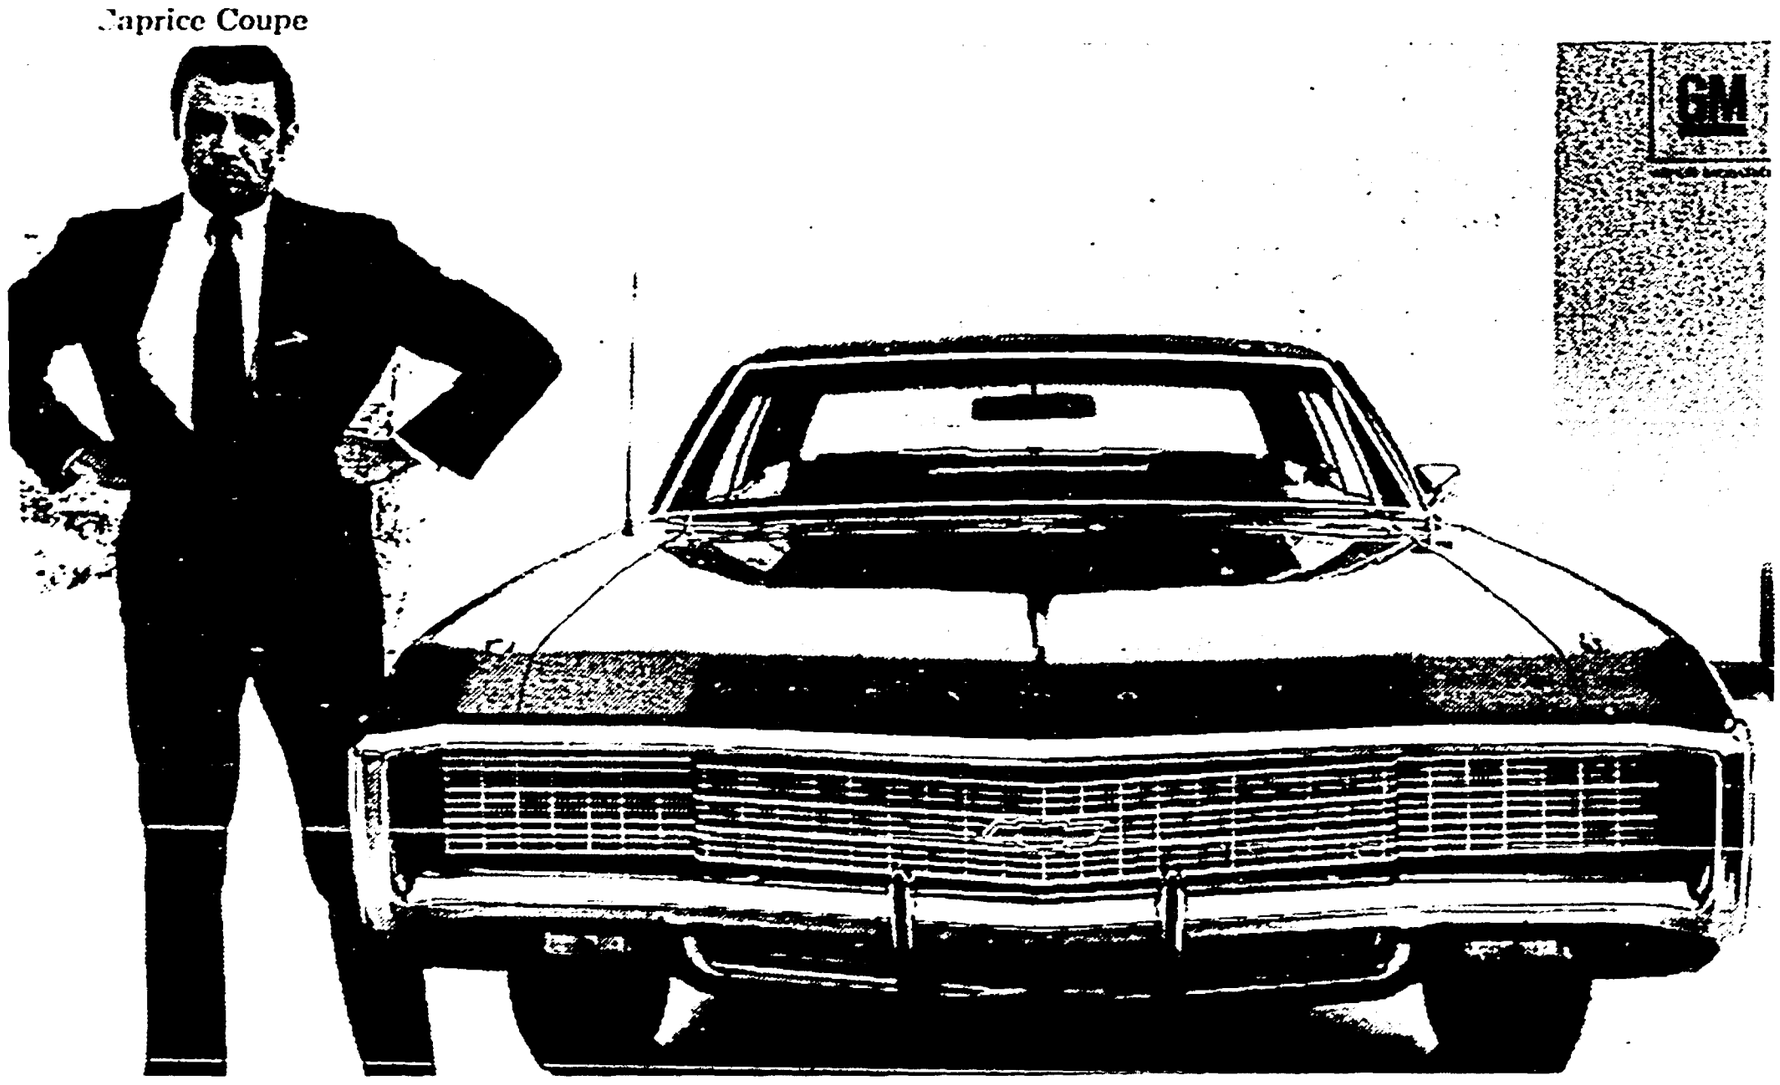
Corruption viewed as Asian way of life

At a foreign policy conference at Skidmore several weeks ago, a South Vietnamese speaker was asked by a student why little was being done to eliminate corruption in South Vietnam. The speaker began his reply by apologizing for the corruption. He knew it was not a good thing, he said, but little could be done about it. When asked why not, he answered that "too many people were involved" and "too many could be hurt" if corruption was done away with. The American audience was amused by this, didn't understand how that could be possible, and they laughed, leaving the South Vietnamese speaker somewhat embarrassed. He had not said this for laughs.

The American audience was in the wrong, however, and, as Americans often do, showed their ignorance of Asian culture in their precipitate reaction. For corruption--our word in English, remember--is and has been for centuries a part of the way of life in Asia. The payoff and bribe, described in different terms there, are common in business, government bureaucracy, and in "protection" of business and home. Corruption's seeming universality and eternality do not make it "good," of course, and many Asians themselves have come to the realization that the intricate Asian payoff system hinders the economic progress which the developing countries want so much to achieve.

Economic development, though, is very much dependent on the West, and much sentiment against corruption results from the intrusion of Western ethics into Asian culture--and that includes Marxian ethics as well. But this creates something of a dilemma for Americans, particularly in Vietnam, in that the elimination of corruption for economic betterment means forcing our ethical system onto the Vietnamese. We are reluctant to do this openly, primarily because of criticism from the world community which would ensue--especially since we aren't at all sure of our reasoning for being in Vietnam in the first place. On the other hand, the Communists have made a concerted and well advertised effort to eliminate the worst corruption in areas they control and this has been a strong attraction for those peasants on the bottom of the payoff pile.



A major problem remains in determining exactly what methods should be employed in dealing with those who give and accept bribes. Use force? Shoot the corrupt as the Viet Cong do? One might note the comments of King Bhumibol Adulyadej of Thailand as he spoke to a Thai student group: "I am at a dead end to offer a solution to the corruption problem," he said, adding only half in jest: "If we solved the problem by executing people, Thailand would be left with few people." (Time, Aug. 18, 1967).

Thus, the difficulty. As the South Vietnamese speaker at Skidmore pointed out, accurately, too many people would be hurt by loss of income, loss in development of their economy, and loss in U.S. aid too, because of the corruption system, with just the few profitting handsomely from the payoffs.

Perhaps the payoff system, as many Asians believe, will never by eliminated. If it is, however, the Americans are not likely to have any direct part in its destruction since we have no ground from which to attack it. And too, we are certainly much too self-righteous about corruption anyway, and we tend to shrug off cases at home of company salesmen taking buyers out for dinner and a night on the town by calling it "business."

To Asians, though, aspects of American society such as that look suspiciously like payoffs.

Campus organizations unite

Committee to increase minority group enrollment formed here

In what was described by Chairman Ed Ruhe as "a meeting to coordinate all efforts on campus directed towards increasing minority group enrollment," ten students met Wednesday evening at the Student Government Office.

Ruhe, a graduate student in the Maxwell school, formed the committee to prevent any overlapping workloads, and to help the organizations to help themselves.

"There are so many cases where the same work is being done by different people for different organizations. We can help solve that problem by setting up a communications link between these organizations."

Attending the meeting were representatives from the following organizations: Aspiration '72, Students Afro-American Society, Council on Student Life, Freshman Action Committee, Projection '70, Student Senate, and Shaw Dormitory.

The theme of the meeting centered on all recruiting efforts on campus. It was stressed by Ruhe that the recruiting isn't limited merely to blacks, but to minority groups in general.

Larry Kramer, program coordinator for Aspiration '72, spoke about the program, and what it is presently involved in. "We expect to be in the Syracuse school system by February 17th. We're now in the process of acquiring funds from campus organizations for operational costs until we get grant money for the overall program. We're also compiling all the scholarship information applicable to the kids in Syracuse."

Another member of Aspiration '72, Howie Lippman, spoke on another phase of the program. Lippman said, "We're in the process of arranging a weekend up here at SU for kids from the city's high schools. I hope we can include about 200-250 students. Tom Mabry is helping us by coordinating our efforts with the Black Students on campus."

Bettie Hubbard, head of S.A.S., remarked on the progress, or rather lack of progress on the part of the American Dilemma Committee formed in Maxwell earlier this year, and the Operation Shoestring Program. "The American Dilemma Committee has the power to do something, but it doesn't exercise it." She charged that, "Operation Shoestring is a great program that hasn't been given a chance to work. It was started at the end of the summer, then completely neglected by those administrators involved."

Ruhe formed sub-committees to deal with special aspects common to almost all of the organizations, such as the compiling of scholarship information.

Burch denies kickback deal in SU real estate transaction

The real estate officer for Syracuse University, William T. Burch Sr., this week denied receiving a kickback from a city real estate broker in a transaction in which the university purchased property worth $38,000.

The denial, reported in Syracuse downtown newspapers, followed a decision by the state Court of Appeals finding real estate broker Leo F. Ferris guilty of engaging in a kickback arrangement with Burch, and directing Ferris to return to SU a $1,520 commission fee.

The newspapers reported that Burch, also an attorney and an instructor in the School of Journalism, said he received $700 from Ferris in payment for past private legal services.

But Lomenzo ruled that Ferris had breached his fiduciary relationship with the university by paying Burch the money. A fiduciary relationship is one of trust and confidence between a broker and principal in a real estate transaction.

The transaction in dispute involved property at 1017 E. Adams St., which in 1965 was sold to SU for $38,000. The broker's commission, at the usual 6 per cent, was to be $2,280, with one half due the real estate salesman.

However, according to the newspapers, the salesman received $760 instead of $1,140 and complained to Lomenzo. The subsequent investigations led to this week's order.

The newspapers reported that Burch said he performed legal services for Ferris in 1962, including the purchase of Ferris' house, and clearing up liens on property owned by the broker.

Burch is reported to have said that he recorded the $700 payment from Ferris as a legal fee and so reported it for his income tax return. He said the Internal Revenue Service has audited his return and accepted as a fact that the payment was for legal services.

This contention, however, was ruled not credible based on other testimony.

Burch said the department of state failed to look up and evaluate the public records available in the Onondaga County Clerk's Office that would uphold his contention that he had performed prior legal services for Ferris.

Think selfishly about your own career before you decide on one with Du Pont.

Be selfish. But be honest. You've put in a lot of tough years to get your degree. Your allegiance lies with a professional discipline.

Why, then, must you decide now to plight your trust to a company for life? Don't. Join a company first. If it doesn't advance you within that professional discipline, well, you're not married to it.

Many have found career enrichment at Du Pont. This comes from being handed a ball and being expected to run with it. From working with top people, from growing in a company where the opportunities are always wide open and the projects are often way out.

Many have found professional fulfillment and have built a very full, varied and happy life as "Du Ponters."

Others have found, after working at Du Pont, that their professional interest lay in teaching, in further study or in an industry that offered even wider scope in their particular discipline. All of these men left Du Pont far better qualified professionally than when they came.

March brings optional hours to frosh

By HELENE MACDONALD
Associate Editor

The two-year battle for freshman optional hours ended Jan. 15 when the Dean of Women's staff voted to extend the privilege to second semester freshmen meeting the same qualifications as upperclassmen on optional hours.

Mar. 1 has been set as the first day when freshmen with a 2.0 average, parental permission and not on probation can begin optional hours.

A 23-page proposal prepared by the freshman committee for optional hours, AWS Exec and AWS assembly was presented to the Dean of Women's staff just after Christmas vacation.

Announcement of the decision was posted in living centers along with notice of meetings Thursday night to explain the procedure for going on optional hours.

Dean Smith explained that a girl must have carried at least 10 credit hours last semester and have a 2.0 average; not be on academic, social or disciplinary probation; and have written parental permission.

Freshman optional hours is not being run as an experiment. "A policy change has been effected," Dean Smith said. In the future freshmen will have optional hours, subject to review and procedural changes by the Dean's staff.

The Dean of Women's staff, not AWS, is handling freshman optional hours, including the writing of a new parent permission letter.

The letter described optional hours as a no-curfew system, the conditions a girl must meet and sign-out procedures, much as the old letters did. However, the new letter adds a section on security, emphasizing that protection will not be extended and that no coed should walk alone after dark.

Each girl will send a letter and three permission slips home. Parents will signify whether they approve or disapprove optional hours for their daughter, sign the slips and return two to the Dean of Women's Office, keeping the letter and one slip for reference.

When the Dean's Office receives signed permission letters, it will notify head residents. Each living center must work out its own procedures for signing out and proctoring or key system. Freshmen representatives of living centers picked up their packets containing letters and slips for distribution.

"The decision is precedent setting because the girls do not have to write constitutions that must be accepted," Miss Bailey said.

"AWS appreciates the amount of time the Dean of Women's staff has put into this effort. We pursued freshman optional hours because of our unending confidence in freshmen to accept responsibility."

Dean Smith expressed confidence in the freshmen. "We think you are grown people who can take responsibility and you will find out how much we really do trust you."

The Dean said that the maturity freshmen have gained from experiences at home and during the summer, in addition to the responsiblity they have assumed first semester, influenced the staff in making its decision.

Piskor announces appointment of Honey as vice-president for governmental affairs

John C. Honey has been named Syracuse University vice president for governmental affairs and research. The appointment of the political science professor was announced by Frank P. Piskor, University vice chancellor and provost.

Prof. Honey is also director of a Syracuse University-National Aeronautics and Space Administration research program and acting director of the Latin American Studies Program in the Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs.

Honey joined the Syracuse University faculty in 1965 as a professor of political science. He was formerly associate director of the Institute of Public Administration and consultant to NASA and the U.S. State Department. Representing the Institute, he initiated and participated in work in Peru on a development administration program. He worked on similar programs in Nigeria, Venezuela and Egypt.

From 1957 to 1961 he was executive associate of the Carnegie Corporation of New York and from 1953 to 1957 he was director of the Government Studies Program of the National Science Foundation.

Honey has served on the program planning staff, Office of the Secretary, U.S. Department of the Interior (1952-1953); as assistant chief, Caribbean Division of the Interior Department (1951-1952); as consultant to the Insular Government of Puerto Rico (1947-1949); and with the Office of Price Administration (1946-1947).

Honey has taught in the fields of government and public administration at Syracuse University and the Universities of Connecticut and Puerto Rico. From 1950 to 1957 he was an adjunct professor of public administration at American University in Washington.

Dances enhance service

Two parts of the 11 a.m. service on Sunday (Feb. 2) at Syracuse University's Hendricks Chapel will be replaced with dances. The change is part of the monthly experimental services arranged by the Chapel's Worship Committee.

The Rev. Harvey Bates will be the celebrant. Bates said dances will be substituted for the scripture and prayers. Bates will deliver the sermon, "The Lord of the Dance."

Bates said: "This is a time of liturgical renewal. Many of the things being done are not new but a return to older practices. The dance, a form of non-verbal communication, after all was first of all a religious expression."

The dancers who will perform during the service are Deborah Lee, a sophomore from Springfield, Mass., Scott Serverance, a senior from Fayetteville, N.Y., and Dale Earnshaw, a senior from Syracuse.

Snyder notes openings for UJB officials

Paul Snyder, chief justice of the University Judicial Board, yesterday announced that the board had openings for two court commissioners.

Applicants must have a 2.7 accumulative average, must be in good standing, and must not have been on probation in the past year. Only sophomores and juniors are eligible.

Interested persons should call Snyder at ext. 3540 and leave names. Interviews for the positions will be announced in the near future, Snyder said.

Court commissioners record transcripts during trials.

Why does a perfect size 7 look perfect only 21 days every month?

It has nothing to do with calories. It's a special female weight gain... caused by temporary water-weight build-up. Oh, you know... that uncomfortable full feeling that sneaks up on you the week before your menstrual period. This fluid retention not only plays havoc with your looks but how you feel as well. (It puts pressure on delicate nerves and tissues, which can lead to pre-menstrual cramps and headaches, leaves emotions on edge.)

That's why so many women take PAMPRIN®. It gently relieves water-weight gain to help prevent pre-menstrual puffiness, tension, and pressure-caused cramps.

PAMPRIN makes sure a perfect size 7 never looks less than perfect. Nor feels less than perfect, either.

Student unrest

Protest at SU: disputing replaced by attack on adult authority

By JEAN HAVENS
Associate Editor

In this era of the violent protest and demonstration, the Syracuse University campus appears to receive only the smaller tremors from the shock waves caused by students at Columbia, Berkeley, Chicago and Paris. Protest, however, is actually nothing new to the SU campus.

The earliest reported SU student protest concerns an area which is still a bone of contention today -- the library. As one of today's crusaders for an all-night library might have come out against the policies of the library administrators, a student wrote in an 1888 issue of the "University Herald" (concerning the continuation of current library policy): "we shall expect to see a high wall around it (the library), mounted with well manned guns, and uniformed sentinels stationed at short intervals to give warning of the approach of any deluded mortal who still clings to the old idea that libraries are to be used and not simply kept."

The students' main objections revolved around the limited hours (it was sometimes open only three hours a day), the poor seating facilities, and the book withdrawal system.

As athletics became more prominent, the students began to voice their demand for the construction of a gym. Protesting the lack of adequate facilities, the "University Herald" published editorials and news items supporting such an enterprise. A barrage of journalistic protestations began in 1872 and continued up until 1883 when an old shed behind HL was confiscated by the students for use as a temporary gym.

The erstwhile tool shed proved to be adequate for the students' needs, but a problem arose because of the close proximity of a chicken coop. Rumor also had Chancellor Sims' cow being stabled in the same structure. Rumor or not, the shed "gym" and chicken coop were becoming a definite eyesore when a group of early SU protestors took strong action --and burned down the "gym."

As the Syracuse teams began to gain recognition, so did the school colors which were, by that time, pink and blue. Protesting that such colors looked out of place on a football field because of their lack of "vitality," the alumni and students both waxed quite vocal on the issue and ultimately had the color orange officially adopted in 1890.

A modern-day protest concerning athletics arose in December of 1963 when the Syracuse University Committee on Equality (SUCE) urged that the university sever all athletic ties with segregated schools. The controversy was still raging in March of the following year when 18 Negro athletes signed a statement supporting a University Senate motion to "suspend athletic contests with segregated institutions." The list included the names of Jim Nance, Dave Bing, Vaughn Harper and Floyd Little.

More than half of the campus opposed the cancelling of contests with segregated schools. Polls revealed that the students sympathized with the Negroes but urged that SU set an example in playing segregated schools who were worthy opponents. Following the picketing of the Ernie Davis memorial varsity-alumni football game, protesters staged a freedom march to Manley Field House. SUCE also planned a mass vigil on the quad, intending to stay there "for days" if necessary. Finally, on September 24, 1964, the DO headlines proclaimed the University's decision not to play segregated schools.

News of the aftermath of another demonstration on the quad was even circulated to the international wire services as it became known that Chancellor Tolley had forcibly struck a protester with his cane. The date was May 12, 1964, and the occasion was the Chancellor's ROTC review. Pickets protesting the draft and expressing the belief (according to the Post-Standard) that "military training is not compatible with the pursuit of knowledge in a free society," had been requested to remain on the sidewalk at one end of the quad. Thinking the review was over, they began to cross the grass and were asked by Chancellor Tolley to leave the field. When they refused to do so, the Chancellor "holding his cane like a baseball bat," according to the "Post Standard," struck one of the pickets.

The picket, a former student, suffered a slight bruise on his arm and stated that 'People are emotionally dead'

Black students find unity

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

Most black students have found their identity on campus--with other blacks. As a whole there is no student unrest like that found on other campuses and various organizations are working closely with the administration to bring more blacks to the campus.

For the most part the students don't necessarily identify with the black student groups, for example the Student Afro-American Society (SAS), the Freshman Action Council (FAC) and the House of Lords, a social service organization. Instead they identify with individual students.

Chuck Hicks, president of Student Government, feels this identity gives the black students unity "because we're all black. There are personality conflicts because blacks have their own interests just as whites do. But there's a unity because we have the same culture and share the same heritage."

No fraternity socialization for blacks lasted long on campus until the House of Lords was founded in 1966, according to Earl Fraser, a member of the group. He feels there is not much that a white fraternity can offer in the way of social activity for blacks because the ideas of socializing which are held by blacks are different from those of whites.

"However, the House of Lords is not a fraternity in the sense that the word is commonly used at SU," he continued. "There is a great deal of fraternal brotherhood but the members didn't want to get bogged down with the Greek system and therefore it is more of a social service organization.

"It tries to get blacks together and make their stay as pleasant and informative as possible," said Fraser.

During the past semester a local chapter of Omega Psi Phi, a national black fraternity, started at Syracuse. It offers the brotherhood other Greek houses give but has only blacks in the SU chapter.

During the sorority rush which took place at the beginning of this week one house reported one black student going through rush while a spokesman for another house said none had particiapted in the rushing period. There are 610 freshmen girls rushing and each one must visit all 23 houses at the beginning of rush.

Although no figures were available on fraternity rush the houses contacted said virtually no black students were rushing their houses.

Hicks, who has belonged to a fraternity for several years said he joined his house not for social reasons but to get to know that group of people better. "I don't find myself going to very many parties because they don't interest me and I am now beginning to question the whole concept of fraternities more than I did before."

Larry Sampson, a senior in Liberal Arts, feels blacks are isolated from the mainstream of University life but he is not concerned with becoming a part of it. "It's all tinsel. The University and the people here are synthetic. You may have liberal friends but they can never understand. They talk but they aren't doing anything. They're with you one day and they're part of the system the next," he continued.

Sampson defines himself as a "black man" because he feels to deny it is to deny his heritage. "You can't go back on heritage; it speaks for the people. The goal of a black man is to reach black awareness and strive for a better life."

Bob Hamilton agreed with Sampson, saying, "College is the place to learn to make society a better place to live in and to help people understand and improve society. I feel there should be a black studies program to help attain these goals."

"Many people are emotionally dead to what is happening. You get action with riots and burnings but it is far better to educate people and get results that way," Hamilton said. "There are blacks who don't feel they are part of the situation of change, and they, along with most whites are the silent majority, the walking dead."

He, along with the other black students interviewed advocates a black studies program. Greg Williams feels the creation of such a program would relieve some of the static by teaching black students about their past cultures while enabling whites to better understand the viewpoint of blacks.

In order to have blacks identify better with courses of this type. Fraser would like to see more black professors. "It is rather hard to sit in a course and have a white professor teach you about black history. There seem to be about 50 credit hours that you can take which deal in some part with black studies but they are in different departments and are not connected in any way," he said.

Hicks also said that not only should a couple of courses be given along that line but that there is a need for a black studies program, especially on the graduate level so students can major in the program and get a degree in it. He also feels black history or literature should be incorporated into the courses which are already offered if they fall within the scheme of the courses naturally.

For the most part black students seem to accept the admissions policies of the University. Over the past three years the number of black students has increased, with a majority being in the current freshman class. Fraser summed up the policies by stating, "There is room for improvement but it can't happen overnight. The University has progressed greatly over the past years in admitting more black students."

Those students who wish to apply to SU will be able to use FAC as a reference. According to Miss Hunte the financial aids office is working on the program to help those students who are accepted by giving them scholarships.

Attack on adult authority...

he didn't plan to take legal action. Many students praised Tolley's act; circulating petitions to that effect, and painting signs with legends such as "Speak softly and carry a big cane," "His Cane was Able," and "We swat bugs, too, Bill!"

The Chancellor came in for more than his share of demonstrations that year (1964) when the students discovered, to their dismay, that Christmas vacation was to begin on December 23 and end January 4. A Sugar Bowl bid caused the vacation to be extended to January 5, but this only caused reactions such as that of Roger Harrison, president of the class of '65, who said: "I cannot reconcile how a university can extend the vacation to accommodate a limited number of Syracuse students returning from a bowl game and then disregard the overwhelming majority of students that are so inconvenienced by having to travel home for the Yuletide vacation just a mere day and a half before Christmas."

Harassed by petitions, speeches over WAER, campus polls, and editorial cartoons, Chancellor Tolley agreed to speak to a mass meeting of students on the quad. Approximately 3,000-4,000 students were on the quad that day to hear him affirm the December 23 starting date.

Tolley had also been criticized in December of 1961 when he had cancelled the Episcopal worship service because it conflicted with the 11 a.m. service at Hendricks Chapel. In February of the following year, when the controversy was still raging, he explained that, while the Catholics were allowed to hold mass at the same time, "this is a privilege extended by the university and is not a right that can be claimed."

The DO campaigned valiantly, but ultimately gave up, stating as their reason that: "the student body, and the Episcopal students in particular, have shown no leadership or interest in having the services continued...Syracuse University is reputed to have a most apathetic student body. The case of the Episcopal services is just one case in point. We hope this will be the last showing of this type of disinterest."

The "apathetic student body" has since proven itself to be not quite so passive. Recent years have seen protests against on-campus recruiting by Dow Chemical Company and the military; the "DellPlain Incident" in the spring of 1967, in which SG President Peter Jeffer drank a can of Dixie beer to protest SU's dry campus; the take-over of the Administraton Building last year; and even that annual rite of spring, the water fight.

It is obvious that the student disorders of the past may be classified more as mischief than student revolt. This chronicle of student unrest in the past at SU points out that students have always found differences with the adult authority over them. But drinking beer in DellPlain or seizing an administration building or even picketing the Placement Center represent a more extreme attack on adult authority.

A recent Fortune magazine survey found that about two-thirds of all college students today believe in using civil disobedience for causes they support, 10 per cent believe in using civil disobedience for any cause, half said they supported none of the three major candidates for President during the last election, and half said they had little faith in the democratic processes.

These results indicate not only are basic adult claims to authority being challenged but the fundamental values of our society are undergoing a thorough examination and review.

In the past students at SU and elsewhere have tended to rebel when adult authority was misused. Today it is adult authority itself that is being challenged on the campuses across the nation and sometimes at SU.

Anti-war groups mellowing

Dow might bring New Left out of hibernation

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

The politics of confrontation may rear its unpleasant head here three weeks from today.

Impetus could be provided by the presence of Dow Chemical recruiters on campus, a situation which has sparked small-scale but turbulent demonstrations here in the past.

But peace groups, previously eager to exploit this issue of "university complicity," have remained outwardly dormant during the past few months.

Dave Morton, leader of People for Freedom and Peace, said this week that his organization has not yet discussed any plans for protesting Dow's visit on Feb. 20 and 21.

"We probably won't do anything," he reported, "and as far as I know, SDS has also become almost non-existent." Nevertheless, Morton does not discount the possibility of "some demonstration being thrown together on short notice."

Last February, Dow's men were greeted by a carpet of wall-to-wall protesters at the Placement Center. That "lie-in" by about 20 demonstrators prompted the Center to close several hours before schedule, with Dow's representatives failing to complete their interview sessions. When Dow returned last October, protest tactics shifted from active obstruction to passive diversion. Peace groups offered interview-bound students an "alternative to becoming partner to genocide and murder" by symbolically re-enacting the destruction of a Vietnamese village.

Mellowing of anti-war coalitions may be attributed to several factors, including feelings that the war is almost over, that radical action alienates too many students and that demonstrations have been and will continue to be largely futile. Lethargy is also fueled by the amorphous nature of SU's New Left groups and an embarassing gulf between white radicals and black activists.

Blacks, suspicious of the motives and attitudes harbored by middle-class white students, often prefer to run their own show for their own objectives.

Morton also feels that absense of a central gathering place, "like the Gridiron Restaurant or a Student Union," severely hampers organizing attempts.

Morton and several friends had planned to publish an underground newspaper last term, but he reports that "lack of bread" stymied that venture.

Anti-war activists traditionally regarded their work as that of an "in-group"--isolated from most SU students and faculty members.

Since many students were obviously upset by the war, sectarianism represented a political blunder--failure to build and broaden a movement when such expansion was objectively possible.

SDS and PFP have not yet made themselves credible to the majority of students upset by the war but as yet unprepared to make the transition to committed dissent.

One question which remains to be answered regards the durability of the New Left's current listlessness.

When winter's cold gives way to spring's balm, when the long school year begins to pall, it is possible that hard-core protesters may emerge from hibernation.

CSL students combat frustration

Threats, compromise pave road to power

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

After two months of threats and compromise, the picture that emerges of the Council on Student Life (CSL) remains hazy.

The fact, of course, that compromise among student, faculty and administration members is considered feasible, and in fact has worked, is a sign for cautious optimism that the council may eventually live up to its billing of a year ago.

At that time, a nation-wide student dissatisfaction with inadequate policy-making powers was beginning to manifest itself in administration building take-overs and general campus violence.

The outlook at Syracuse, however, was brighter, for the CSL had been established, seating six students in decision-making positions next to four administrators and four faculty members. Invested with seemingly broad powers, the council was considered to be, if not a panacea, then at least a major step toward campus peace.

But since then, severe frustration and impatience have set in especially among the student members of the council. Frustration with the slow pace of change and impatience with what sometimes is perceived to be administrative insincerity are common to students at most universities; and both seriously hamper the will to compromise.

Much of the council's future therefore depends upon a renewal of good faith among members. As SG president and council member Chuck Hicks put it, "The council will be workable as long as everybody decides to be honest with each other."

Thus, attitude and intentions are vital to this body as they are to any body in which progress is to be made. But this is especially true in the CSL, for good faith must compensate for its structural inadequacies.

The charter establishing the council was, according to its creators, intentionally broad in order to allow "flexibility." The charter reads:

"The Council on Student Life shall determine, within the policy limits set by the Board of Trustees, the regulations and procedures governing student activities and social life. The Council may recommend modifications of policies in the student activities and social life area to the Board of Trustees through the Chancellor. The council may review any aspect of student life..."

Any more precise definitions of council powers was avoided because it was felt that flexibility was desirable. "If the CSL were regimented with a lot of detail" said student member Joey Edwardh, "it would become stagnant." And flexibility is necessary to any organization if it is not to be outdated by changing times.

But flexibility is two-way, and different "interest groups" tend to use it in different ways. The result has been different interpretations of the charter by student, faculty and administration members: students, it seems, wish to expand CSL powers to new limits, while administrators are intent upon periodic contractions.

Because the student members are "expansionist,"--because, as David Riesman and Christopher Jencks have pointed out, "Students need a sense that they have some kind of power over adults which at least partially offsets the power adults obviously have over them"--they interpret the charter liberally.

They believe that it gives the council the power to probe any area in university life; to make recommendations based on these investigations; and to make the recommendation policy unless vetoed by the Chancellor.

The student members see their duty as responding to the demands of the student body, and believe their only real limitation to be resources with which to implement recommendations. And even this limitation loses its effect when the students point out that, if such resources were not available, then the recommendation wouldn't be made in the first place.

The administration and at least some faculty members, on the other hand, are more conservative in their interpretation of the charter language. Although they recognize that the council has broad powers to probe university areas, and that no administrator (except the Chancellor) can veto a council recommendation, they do not attach the same significance to a recommendation as do the students.

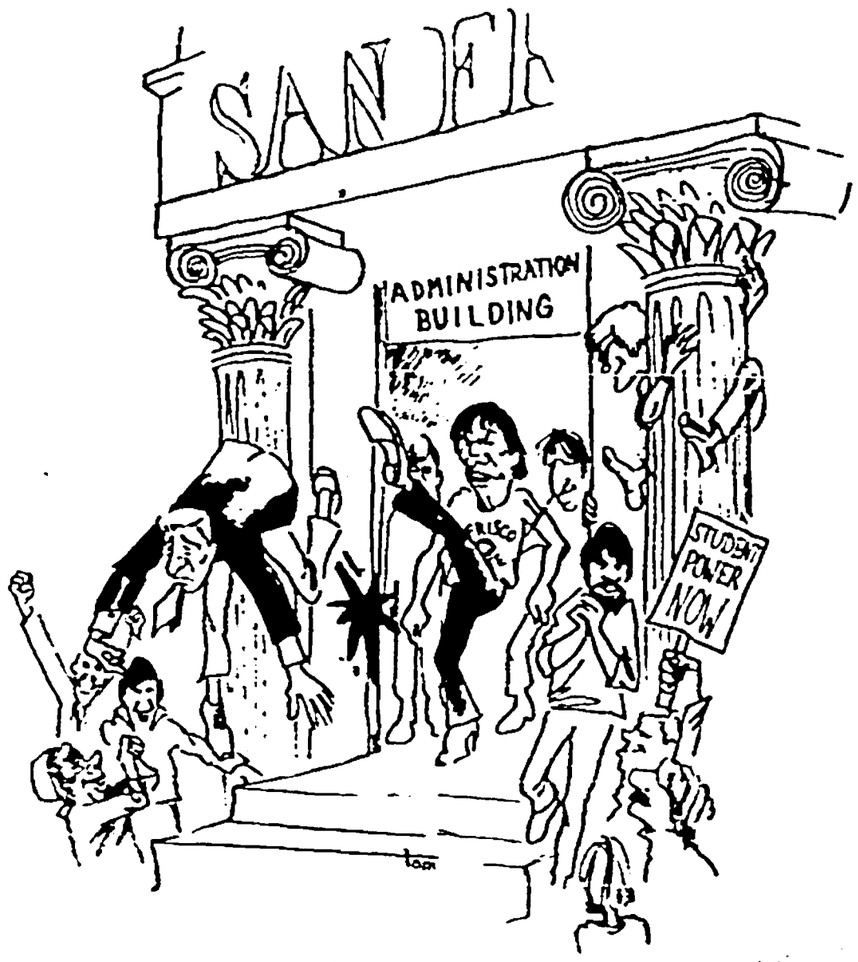
The value of the council, said one administrator, is in determing "what should be done and bringing the recommendation to the attention of those that can implement the change."

The automatic transition from recommendation to actual change thus is interrupted--and it was this kind of interruption and hesitation that frustrated student members and brought charges of "dishonesty"

This discrepancy in interpretation is by no means settled. It was therefore possible this week for a faculty member to say, "I think it's clear that the council has very limited powers," while a student asserted, "I don't see any limitations."

Yet, the possiblity that the council will not prove effective in the future is largely discounted by most, including student, members. Virtually all the members this week called the CSL "workable."

"The powers are written down (in the charter)," said Miss Edwardh, "but they must be tested. The CSL is continually being restructured. It has to be able to change to meet the demands of the University."



It may be then, that the past two months have been a time of growing pains, and, at least for the present, they do not appear to be terminal.

Dissent waves have racial undertow

Black activism grows with aid programs

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

Recoiling from the nation's swelling alarm over racial unrest, particularly after Martin Luther King's assassination, hundreds of U.S. universities began instituting programs to enroll deserving black youths who can't pay the bill or don't meet normal admissions requirements.

Despite the apparent humanitarian generosity of these colleges (or perhaps because of it), black students' militant sense of importance and power is growing along with their impatience.

When waves of dissent challenge university policy, the undertow is often racial.

Many youths elevated from ghetto to campus haven't been the appreciative, industrious students some administrators anticipated. Rather, they have fermented protest movements disrupting dozens of campuses across the nation, stretching from San Francisco State College to Queens College in New York City.

Moreover, schools are compelled to readapt curriculums and methods to accomodate new arrivals, whose experience differs noticeably from that of their largely middle-class student body. Occasionally, underprivileged students are confronted with manifest resentment from tuition-payers who are irritated that others are obtaining a "free ride."

As another consequence of relaxing financial and scholastic entrance standards for the poor, some universities become targets of harsh criticism from alumni, townspeople and legislators. Fearing that the institution's efforts may irreparably lower its standards and prestige, these critics are in an ideal position to pinch a college where it hurts.

More often, however, the only publicized pressure is mounted by special-project participants themselves. Their outspokenness may be traced to the fact that for most such youths, college provides their initial exposure to student and black activism.

Supplementing this realization is the familiar plight of being a minority-group representative--and being treated as such.

Recruited blacks may imagine (sometimes with good cause) that they are "on display" as sociological specimens. While a well-meaning student tries to make conversation by asking "Are you in the special program?" or by routinely inquiring about a recruitee's background and home life, a sensitive black may conjure the stigma of being "different" or an outsider.

Idealistic blacks soon discover that not all modes of campus life glowingly described in the catalogue are available for their benefit.

Some fraternities and sororities, for example, may not be overly enthusiastic about opening their hallowed portals to disadvantaged students.

Universities' scholarship grants, generous as they may be, do not solve all problems of a few very poor students. Boys find themselves without nearly enough cash to splurge on such campus necessities as dates and beer blasts. Girls, on the other hand, may not own a suitable wardrobe for extensive dating.

All these influences occasionally combine to produce a damaging "reverse racism" -- evidenced on campus by all-black tables in dormitory dining halls, all-black Greek houses, or, in the most extreme cases, demands for a special all-black department.

These forms of subtle protest are still not what bring black student revolt into the headlines.

For the ultimate confrontation, we must turn to colleges like San Francisco State, where black "students" participated actively in the sometimes violent strikes which have crippled that campus since last Fall. Their demands include greater student autonomy and more special programs for minority-group members.

Contrasting with last semester's surge of black student activism are suggestions from some Negro leaders that black collegians tone it down.

Roy Wilkins, executive director of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, recently said black youths "ought to be in the libraries studying and getting degrees so they can do some good."

Despite such pleas for moderation, the problems recounted above could intensify. The prestigious Carnegie Commission on Higher Education recently called for extensive, Federally-financed programs to assure higher education for all qualified Americans.

Trial "education-for-all" projects indicate, however, that few colleges are prepared for any large-scale influx of the militant poor.

'Youth and crisis'

Search for identity: alienated vs. radicals

By MARTY GORDON

Society today calls for an ego-dominated individual. As the premium on technology and affluence rises, so does the premium on the rational man as the model citizen. And, psychologically speaking as well as in social terms, this ego standard appears to be a key to today's student unrest.

In the age-old search for identity, youth often seriously question this emphasis on rationality as opposed to the id-emotion. Yet they are confronted with the evolution of a technological civilization and culture, a mechanistic society of which they do not feel a part. They do not desire to exist for the sake of society—as cogs in a machine—and it is difficult for them to form positive identifications to the machines which have brought wealth and comfort and security to much of the older generation.

Youth consequently find it hard to accept the older generation's "reality." Parents, according to psychologist Erik H. Erikson, often impress their young as having remained "outgrown boys and girls, taken up with a world of gadgetry and buying power which permits them to circumvent the whole formidable issue of the new meaning of the generations in a technological universe, including the Bomb and the Pill."

In disagreeing with society's values, the youth believe only a relative freedom of experimentation can improve society. When this freedom is expressed through drugs or student demands for more rights and influence, conflict can flare. As Erikson pointed out in his study on "Identity: Youth and Crisis," "The search of youth is not for all-permissibility, but rather for new ways of directly facing up to what really counts"—where it's at, like it is, the Flower Children's love and sensitivity.

Youth, furthermore, have often experienced unkept promises by authoritative persons, thus irritating the conflict. Freud referred to this as the hypocritical morality which was "wreaking in all of human history."

Youth demand "intellectual relevance." Adult and Establishment options available do not seem appropriate. Open avenues toward adult achievements and success are, psychologically, no longer considered acceptable at all. It is not that they disparage success or that they feel it is beyond their grasp. For indeed, these students have attained and rejected them, dimly feeling that there was something more important.

"There ain't no success like failure, and failure's no success at all."—Dylan

Today's youth experience a sense of inner frustration and discontent, a feeling that they are wasting their lives being irrelevant in the wasteland of conventional middle-class life.

Out of such dissatisfaction has evolved two kinds of student discontent. One is represented by the "young radicals," the activists who make up much of the New Left; the other is the "alienated," a group of youth who are apolitical and in many cases have withdrawn from society. Each is a more profound expression of discontent than the regular "student leader" activist, working within established channels.

Although there are basic differences between the alienated and the activists, strong positive correlations do exist. First, the uses of technology are alienating both of these groups from society. Second, the social and economic backgrounds of the two groups are similar, and studies indicate that both have strong mother figures in their families, although the relative influences and ideals of the mothers differ.

Finally, a trend toward masculine tenderness exists in both, as do basic intelligence and academic success: again, with different consequences. Masculine tenderness, incidentally, does not mean the youth are in a state of bisexual confusion or that they are without fidelities in their sexual lives. Rather, the roles of the sexes are being re-evaluated, and as there is a greater identification with sensitivity, males feel greater ease in expressing emotion, and the longstanding characteristics which society calls "maleness" are breaking down.

The line between the radicals and the alienated, then, is not always clear. Some of the alientated undoubtedly are just as radical as the activists, for example, and vice versa. Furthermore, the alienated of the 1950's could very well have been the radicals of the 1960's. Fifteen years ago, youth may have been looking for a cause, a place, a commitment--but found none. Seeing no hope for change within the system, they therefore withdrew from society.

Beginning with the Kennedy years, however, youth began to find commitments--the civil rights movement, for example; and in the Johnson years, it has been the war in Vietnam. Having seized upon objectives, youth have found a chance to rebaptize basic American moral principles.

But in psychological terms, perhaps fundamental to the similarities--and to the differences---between the alienated and the activists are their childhoods and the values of trust and fidelity in those early years.

An early sense of trust, the primary development in the child's first year, is, as psychologist Erik Erikson points out, "the most fundamental prerequisite of mental vitality." Basic trust is a belief in others as well as a fundamental sense of one's own trustworthiness; and a failure to develop basic trust in childhood may, in adulthood, be expressed in a particular form of severe estrangement which characterizes individuals who withdraw into themselves when at odds with themselves or with others.

The mother as nurse and care-taker is responsible for establishing this basic trust. Much is dependent on her own and the community's attitude towards nursing and childcare itself.

Fidelity initially is the harmonizing of the individual's childhood with the social forces of his community. It is, says Erikson, "the vital strength which youth needs to have an opportunity to develop, to evoke, and to die for." The need for fidelity can be found in any generation looking for causes. For example, fidelity enabled the junior high and high school students of the 1950's to say they would be willing to die for American democracy to defend it from Communism.

Fidelity can be gained in the involvement of youth in causes in which they believe. It can be lost when recent causes are deemed false or irrelevant. It can be regained by acting out one's principles and by joining in common cause with one's peers.

The activists have achieved some measure of fidelity by basing their relationship to society on society's basic principles—free speech, democracy, etc.—while the alienated cannot see themselves in concert with any part of society. Not fitting in, they withdraw.

In psychology a normative "identity crisis" is associated with adolescence and young adulthood. Today identity refers to a search or desperate quest, something noisily demonstrative. The sense of identity is to Erikson a deep and intense feeling of being active and alive, when you can say, "this is the real me." Today there is need for a personal identity within the larger influences of social identity. The individual's identity crisis and contemporary crisis in historical development help define each other and are inseperable.

In adolenscence, there is often an excessive preoccupation with the question of what kind of man or woman one might become. There is an awareness of discrepencies between one's self-image and one's appearance in the eyes of others. Today's youth have a will to be themselves, very concerned with not being a "phony"--not doing it for effect. It is as if to say

"I know who I am, and who I may be if I chose."

—Cervantes

For the activist, this has meant participation—in Keniston's terms, "the participation in a student demonstration or group activity that concerns itself with some matter of general political, social, or ethical principle. In short, activists are politically involved, humanitarian, and universalistic in value."

The radicals do not necessarily object to our society's basic principles, but only to the fact that it fails to implement them fully, both domestically and in our foreign policy. Their dissent may have a wide range, but they rarely demonstrate merely because their own interests are jeopardized. Although most activists oppose careerism and familyism as personal values, they are not alientated from fundamental American values.

A significant difference between the young radicals and the alienated is the radicals' belief in political and social action. Although the radicals may therefore be politically optimistic, they do not endorse present political institutions or forms of action, and their violent objections to them have been voiced from Berkeley to Chicago to Columbia.

On the other hand, one of the most interesting characteristics of the New Left is its district of formal ideologies. And as a result, this group that so ardently seeks an acceptable identity, role and commitment does not have a fixed ideology.

Educationally, activists are generally outstanding students. The colleges they attend are usually academically excellent, highly selective liberal arts colleges or private universities.

Alienated Radical activist

They seek a liberal education for its own sake, rejecting careerist and vocational goals. They are highly liberal in their view of education and desire self-expression and self-examination.

Contrary to popular opinion, they drop out less frequently than their classmates, and most often continue on to graduate school. This would seem to indicate that the activist is not wholly dissatisfied with his college education. Rather, it is a denial of student rights by administrators which irritates the activists. Another fallacy is the claim that they are repudiating or rebelling against parental values. On the contrary, their concern is, according to Keniston, "with living out expressed but unimplemented parental values."

The alienated are quite a different personality and can best be described as apolitical, romantic, and aesthetic. Alienated students tend to come from the same general social strata and colleges as do the protestors. Yet they are far too politically pessimistic to firmly oppose "the System" in an organized public way, and instead show an actual distaste and disinterest in politics and society.

In contrast to the activists, the alientated tend to reject their parents' values as well as their practice. To them, their fathers are in the valueless pursuit of success and status, and they are determined to avoid such a fate for themselves.

Educationally, the alienated are less committed to academic values and intellectual achievement. They have little desire to take part in organized groups and avoid assuming responsibilities of leadership.

Rather, they tend to withdraw into their own subjective experiences and are especially attracted to hallucinogenic drugs--marijuana, mescaline (speed) and LSD to achieve the combination of withdrawal from ordinary social life and the promise of greatly intensifed subjectivity and perception. They are often driven by a desperate sense of immediacy and great distrust for society which has led to turn-on, love and drop-out cults.

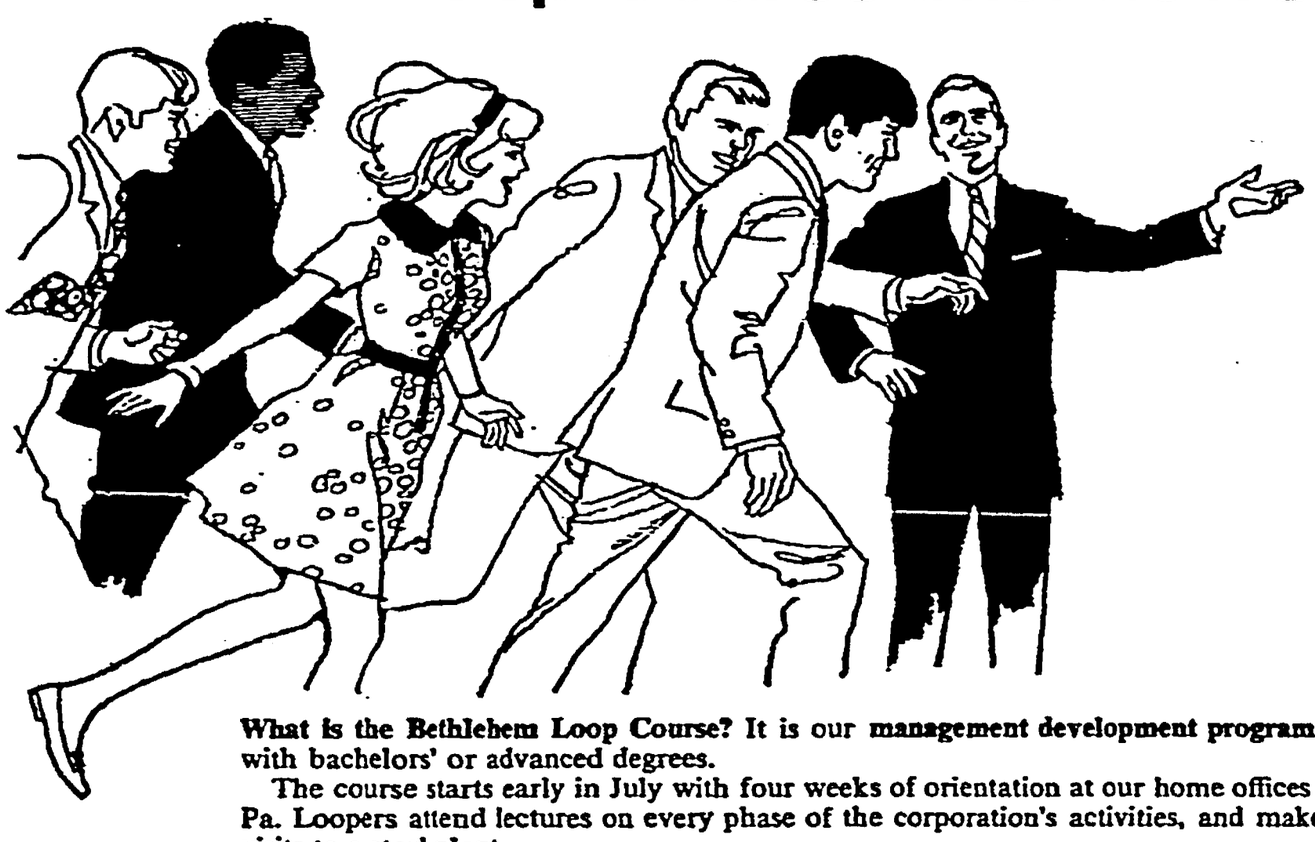
Basic differences between the alienated and the activists extend to family background, childhood, the way they view their culture and history and the resolution of the Oedipal comples.

The Oedipal complex in somewhat oversimplified terms is the child's desire to possess one's mother and to replace one's father; its "resolution" leads to the identification with the same sexed parent.

Although the activists are alienated come from approximately the same socio-economic background and from mother-dominated families, their differing relationships and interactions have led to different characteristics.

In both the alienated and the radical, studies have indicated that there is an unusually strong ties to the mother in early childhood, and both families are generally highly permissive. In the activist, this close maternal tie seems to have led to an unusual responsiveness to the mother's wishes. Although there is intense pressure for academic achievement, the young radicals generally appreciate their mothers' educating and individualizing influences.

These middle-class mothers are usually free from financial responsibilities and therefore often work at jobs which offer idealistic fulfillment rather than material rewards. An extremely significant point is the empathy and sympathy with the underdog, the oppressed, which the activists seem to possess and which Keniston, for one, believes originates from the "identification with an active mother whose own work embodies nurturant concern for others."



In general, then, the families of activists are equalitarian, permissive, democratic, and place a high premium on self-expression and intellectual independence.

It is true that there are also intense mother-son ties in most alienating families, but studies describe these mothers as overprotective, possessive and excessively involved with their sons. The relationship is characterized by maternal control and intrusiveness, tending to restrict independence and initiative.

Psychological tests have reflected two major themes in the alienated personality. First there is a sense of a "loss of Eden"—a distinct concern with a loss of possessions, with forcible estrangement and with a desire to regain union with a lost loved one. This may be associated with the lack of formation of basic

Loop Course Interviews: FEB. 14

What is the Bethlehem Loop Course? It is our management development program for graduates with bachelors' or advanced degrees.

The course starts early in July with four weeks of orientation at our home offices in Bethlehem, Pa. Loopers attend lectures on every phase of the corporation's activities, and make almost daily visits to a steel plant.

Steel Plant Loopers, who comprise a majority of the average loop class of 150 to 200 graduates, proceed to various plants where they go through a brief orientation program before beginning their on-the-job training assignments. Within a short time after joining the course, most loopers are ready for assignments aimed toward higher levels of management.

How about other loopers? Our Sales Department loopers (30 or so) remain at the home office for about a year of training. Most are then assigned to district offices where they take over established accounts.

Fabricated Steel Construction loopers are trained in a drafting room, on a field erection project, in a fabricating shop, and in an engineering office. A looper's first work assignment is based on interests and aptitudes disclosed during this program.

Loopers in Accounting, Shipbuilding, Mining, Research, Traffic, Purchasing, Finance and Law, General Services, and Industrial and Public Relations go through training programs tailored to their types of work.

Where would YOU fit in? Check your degree or the one most similar to it.

MECHANICAL ENGINEERING—Engineering or mechanical maintenance departments of steel plants, fabricating works, mining operations, and shipyards. Fuel and combustion departments. Supervision of production operations. Marine engineering assignments in Shipbuilding Department. Also: Sales or Research.

METALLURGICAL ENGINEERING — Metallurgical departments of steel plants and manufacturing operations. Engineering and service divisions. Technical and supervisory positions in steelmaking departments and rolling mills. Also: Research or Sales.

CHEMICAL ENGINEERS—Technical and supervisory positions in coke works, including production of byproduct chemicals. Fuel and combustion departments, including responsibility for operation and maintenance of air and water pollution control equipment. Engineering and metallurgical departments. Steelmaking operations. Also: Research or Sales.

INDUSTRIAL ENGINEERING—Positions in steel plants, fabricating works, shipyards, and mines. Engineering and maintenance departments. Supervision of steelmaking, rolling, manufacturing, and fabricating operations. Also: Sales.

CIVIL ENGINEERING: Fabricated Steel Construction assignments in engineering, field erection, or works management. Steel plant, mine, or shipyard assignments in engineering, construction, and maintenance. Supervision of production operations. Sales Department assignments as line salesman or sales engineer (technical service to architects and engineers).

ELECTRICAL ENGINEERING—Steel plant, fabricating works, mining operations, and shipyard electrical engineering, construction, and maintenance departments. Technical and supervisory positions in large production operations involving sophisticated electrical and electronic equipment. Also: Research or Sales.

MINING ENGINEERING — Our Mining Department operates coal and iron ore mining operations and limestone quarries, many of which are among the most modern and efficient in the industry. This 10,000-man activity offers unlimited opportunities to mining engineers. Also: Research.

NAVAL ARCHITECTS AND MARINE ENGINEERS: Graduates are urged to inquire about opportunities in our Shipbuilding Department, including the Central Technical Division, our design and engineering organization. Also: Traffic.

OTHER TECHNICAL DEGREES—Every year we recruit loopers with technical degrees other than those listed above. Seniors enrolled in such curricula are encouraged to sign up for an interview.

ACCOUNTANTS—Graduates in accounting or business administration (24 hours of accounting are preferred) are recruited for training for supervisory assignments in our 3,000-man Accounting Department.

OTHER NON-TECHNICAL DEGREES — Graduates with degrees in liberal arts, business, and the humanities are invited to discuss opportunities in the Sales Department. Some non-technical graduates may be chosen to fill openings in steel plant operations and other departments.

NOW'S THE TIME TO SIGN UP FOR AN INTERVIEW. And when you register at the placement office, be sure to pick up a copy of our booklet, "Careers with Bethlehem Steel and the Loop Course." It contains important information about the corporation and your opportunities through the Loop Course.

'Black and White'

Content and goal reasons for new course popularity

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

Photographic studies in Germany, "Black and White in America," literature of the black man, and a course of human relations in London all are now offered by Syracuse University.

Probably the most popular of the new courses at SU is the experimental student-taught course of "Black and White in America." Because the administration is limiting its enrollment to approximately 120 students, many interested persons were turned away at registration. The student discussion leaders wanted to schedule more sections to meet the demand, but the administration vetoed the suggestion.

Some white students were also chagrined when they read the sign stating that the course's "white quota" had been met for that day. The student enrollment of the course has been regulated to provide a "balance" between whites and blacks.

This course, LAS 305 (Liberal Arts and Sciences), will delve into the history of the black race, study the split in black leadership, analyze the Harlem rennaissance, investigate Northern and urban migration of the black population, and study the black-white conflict and its resulting prejudices.

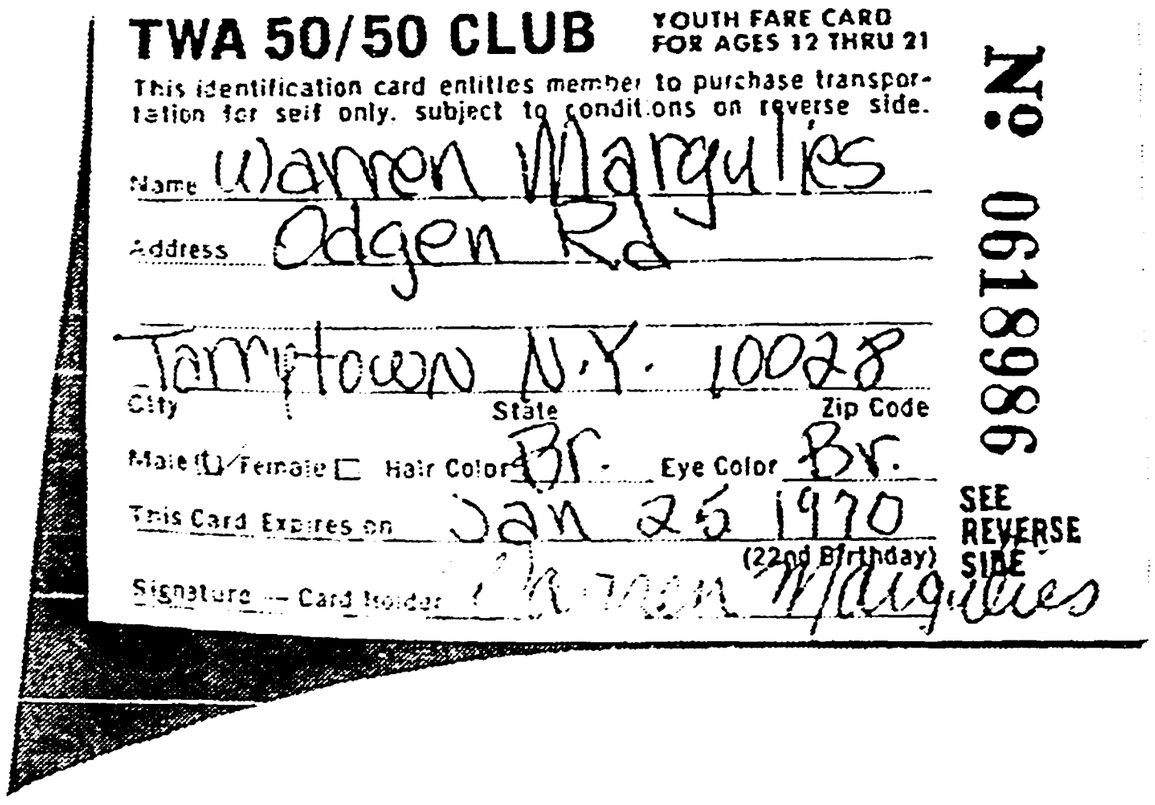
Among the readings for the course are "From Plantation to Ghetto" - Meier and Broderick; "Black Protests" - ed. Grant; "The Nature of Prejudice" - Allport; "The Negro in America" - Rose; and many other well-known recent analyses of the black situation.

The content of the course is not the only reason for its popularity, however. Hoping to "change the teaching process to a learning process" is the goal of the six undergraduate students who are conducting the discussion sessions. These students are Craig Baumgarten, Gene Kane, Stan Hunterton, Charles Payne, Greg Williams, and Larry Sampson.

The discussion groups range from 15-20 persons each. The two one-hour sessions will be supplemented by weekly guest lecturers, among whom are Adam Clayton Powell, John Williams (author), Sterling Stuckee (black historian), and James Turner (Northwestern grad student).

Another new course at SU which will involve the black man is that of "Greater American Writers: The Black in 20th Century Literature." Prof. David Owen included these books on his reading list for the course: "The Confessions of Nat Turner" - Styron; "Black Boy" - Wright; "Invisible Man" - Allison; "Another Country" - Baldwin.

Photography buffs now have an opportunity to see Munich, Germany through their lenses. Beginning this June six weeks of photography courses will be offered at the Agfa-Gevaert-Technikum, under the sponsorship of SU. The Techuikum is a modern school with the latest photographic facilities.



Associate Prof. Fred A. Demarest, chairman of the photography department at SU, will be a full-time instructor for the fifteen students in the program. Applicants must have successfully completed one year of photographic courses at an university and must submit a portfolio of ten black-and-white prints with their applications.

"The program offers American students the unique opportunity to study photography in an interesting picturesque location while becoming better acquainted with the life and people of another country. Included will be field trips to medieval towns, museums, castles, photographic studios and industries," said Demarest.

The School of Education is also initiating a program abroad – in London. In cooperation with the Institute of Education of the University of London, Dr. Randles and Dr. Herring of SU will teach "International Dimensions of Human Relations: The Process and Skills."

The three-week course is aimed at developing group leadership capabilities.

Here's one card from the establishment that no student will ever burn.

It's TWA's 50 50 Club Card. And if you're between the ages of 12 and 21, it entitles you to fly TWA anywhere in the United States at half-fare (and it's good for discounts on most other airlines too). Now's the time to get one, so you can take off between semesters. Fly skiing, fly swimming, fly home, fly anywhere. TWA flies just about everywhere. See your travel agent, TWA Campus Representative or stop by the local TWA office. Forget about exams and fly TWA somewhere at half-fare. Even if your parents approve.

Students elected to English Council

By RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

Three undergraduate English majors, David Cohen, David Ifshin and Don Pettifer, have been elected to serve on the English Advisory Council. This is the first time undergraduates have been permitted to serve on the Council. The students will have a full vote, and will be considered equal in influence to the council's other members, the staff of the English department. There are three graduate student representatives.

Ifshin, who serves also as coordinator of activities between Student Government and the National Student Association, commented that SG "is in the process of encouraging departments to organize so undergraduates can play a larger role in the decision-making process."

He explained that the newly formed Undergraduate English Organization has been established in order "to create interaction among individual students, as well as between students and faculty."

"We want all English majors to be a part of this," Ifshin said.

"We want to create an environment that is not only existent, but effective as well."

The organization would like to create a situation in which English majors can discuss literature with each other and with professors. "Other universities have an atmosphere where discussion of academic matters is facilitated," Ifshin continued. "Syracuse is becoming a more serious place, and this atmosphere is necessary here too."

Meeting of the Undergraduate English Association will be held at 4 p.m. each Wednesday in 102 HL. The room also serves as a lounge for English students.

Piskor named vice chancellor and provost; supervises all aspects of academic life

Chancellor William P. Tolley has announced the appointment of Frank P. Piskor as vice chancellor and provost of Syracuse University. He was formerly vice president for academic affairs.

Dr. Piskor, who has his Ph.D. from Syracuse, has been with the University since 1939.

In his new post, Piskor is responsible for supervising all aspects of academic life at the University.

He was born in Turners Falls, Mass., Jan. 5, 1916, graduated from Middlebury College, Vermont, in 1937 and came to the University in 1939 as a graduate student in the Maxwell School and personnel counselor. After service as director of freshman counseling and acting dean of men, he was named dean of men in 1946 and was in that post until 1953. From 1941 to 1950 he was an instructor in political science. He earned his Ph.D. in 1950 and in the same year was promoted to assistant professor of political science. He became an associate professor in 1953 and a full professor in 1960. He was named vice president and dean of student services in 1953 and in 1959 was appointed vice president for academic affairs.

Piskor is also dean of the Graduate School and dean of faculties. Last year he was named chairman of the Commission on Institutions of Higher Education of the Middle States Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. He had been a member of the Commission since 1961 and was vice chairman from 1964 to 1968.

DR. FRANK P. PISKOR

He is vice chairman of the Federation of Regional Accrediting Agencies and a member of the New York State advisory council on graduate education and of the Regents Commission on Educational Television.

An exhibit of more than 100 black-and-white photographs by students of the Kunstgewerbeschule (College of Arts and Crafts) in Zurich, Switzerland, is on display through Feb. 2 in the lobby of the Newhouse Communications Center, Syracuse University.

A similar display of prints by students of the Syracuse University School of Journalism's photography department, in black-and-white and in color, has been sent for exhibition at the Zurich School. It is believed to be the first international exchange between photography schools, according to Associate Professor Fred A. Demarest, chairman of the photography department.

He said: "There is a danger of schools becoming provincial in their approach to photography. For this reason an exchange of photographic exhibits between schools in this country and overseas will broaden the scope of students everywhere."

The free exhibit at Newhouse traces the training of the photographers at Zurich during the four years' schooling. It includes a key to the assignment each picture panel illustrates. Subjects of photo essays are East Berlin, New York City and a young student actor.

Hendricks Chapel Dean John H. McComb hopes for some new weather to go along with the new floor-to-ceiling mural in the Chapel basement.

In Hendricks chapel

Mural connects themes of radiance and education

Renovations in the basement of Hendricks Chapel are nearly completed and include a ceiling to floor mural of "the idea of education expressed in its religious dimension."

Dean of Hendricks Chapel, the Rev. John H. McComb, described the mural this way: "Harry Freeman (the artist) has taken the themes of radiance, joy and resurrection and related these to what education truly means, from the womb to resurrection, from constriction to freedom, from darkness to light. Education is the liberating force of man."

In the center of the mural is a sun-like source of light or energy. Above it hovers an angel facing downward. An owl peers out of the left of center area at the viewer and some insect-like creature flies into the upper left corner. Splashes of light or energy dance among the components of the mural and a human figure rises from the energy source toward heaven while beneath him bone-like and flesh-like matter seems to pour toward the energy source.

"The dots and trails of light attempt to show life's force, the creative reality of the universe," continued Dean McComb. "Somehow the universe is saying that the power behind you is greater than any of the problems life provides."

He pointed to the major human figure which remains incomplete and noted how in the shadow of the rib cage of the man was the breast of Eve, "the idea that we all come from the same origin and are part of each other."

The artist, Harry Freeman, 23, graduated with honors in design from the Syracuse University School of Art. He is currently studying at the Boston University School of Theology. He is an ex-president of the University Religious Council and intends to try to express theology in art. He refused to explain the mural he created to anyone.

"To me the owl represents wisdom or the wise man. When Harry painted the owl I knew I was in trouble. It stares right out at me," said Dean McComb, laughing.

He thought the insect-like creature in the upper left corner was a honey bee whose significance was how sweet life is, despite its misery and difficulty.

"Experiences we call hell are really many of the growth processes necessary or at least usable to achieve balance and peace. Frequently what we call hell is a misnomer. If what we mean by heaven is acceptance of the status quo, a lack of tension, a sheltered, false peace, then that's really hell. Some suburbanized Christianity is this modified hell. When the Chruch is stripped of its securities, when all its properties are sold, when its back is to the wall, then the Church's real business will begin. Then it will engage the spirit of the happy warrior. The troops may say this is hell but this is what life is all about."

The mural is located in a cavern-like room about 13 feet high in part of the area formerly known as the Board Room. One walks through a short eight-foot high passage to the chamber containing the mural, "something like coming from the constricted womb to birth, life and light."

Dean McComb's new office is located to the left of the mural chamber and as one enters it, a sculptured iron crucifix dominates the wall. The crucifix by Doris Ceaser is a gaunt figure with hollow eyes and a gaping, agonized mouth.

"Students walk in and it hits them, they walk under and around it, they don't even know I'm here," remarked Dean McComb. He thought it clearly portrayed the result of man's inhumanity to man, poverty, ignorance and brutality.

The walls of the renovated basement are covered with a stucco-like material still being experimented with. It is sand textured acrylic that is sprayed on. The rugs are also experimental materials, specially woven for the Chapel.

The Colonial Room of the Chapel will soom be dedicated as the Noble room with the late Dean Noble's portrait hanging in it. The pillar in the center of the room and its south wall will be covered with Monk's cloth to be used for art exhibits.

Most of the offices for the University chaplains have also been remodled and enlarged. For the first time, quarters have been provided for the Hillel organization.

The renovations in the Chapel basement have been financed by about $75,000 worth of gifts, including $5,000 from the Jewish Welfare Association and $1,000 from the Newman Association.

Actors eager for campus dialogue

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

All it took to interest Rod Steiger in appearing at a Steiger retrospective at Syracuse University was a message left with the secretary of Steiger's agent, said Jason Squire, originator and co-ordinator of retrospectives here.

"I started asking students who they wanted for a retrospective this year and consistently they 'Steiger,'" said Squire. "I went home to New York over Thanksgiving and started making phone calls. I finally got the office of Steiger's agent but he wasn't in. I left a message.

"About four days later, Rev. Norman Keim, director of Film Forum, got a call from the agent who said Steiger was enthusiastic and that Steiger and his wife, Claire Bloom, both wanted to come for two days."

Squire initiated Henry Fonda's visit here last year by handing him a letter of invitation after Fonda appeared in a panel discussion open to the public. Within a week, Fonda's agent called, saying Fonda wanted to come.

"I guess I got the idea of a retrospective after reading an article about a John Ford Film Festival at a museum in New York," said Squire. "I chose the term retrospective because it connotes tracing an actor's career."

Squire said a distinctive element of retrospectives at Syracuse is the desire of the actors to talk to college students.

"I think Steiger is fascinated with the present college generation and the upsurge of interest in films," said Squire, who met Steiger in New York recently. "I think he wants to rap with students."

Another reason Steiger may be interested in coming to Syracuse, according to Squire, is that Steiger never graduated from high school. Steiger attended acting schools a few years after leaving high school. Squire said Steiger has never been honored by a college or university.

Luck is an important element in the decision of whether or not an actor will come to a retrospective, according to Squire.

"We caught Steiger at a time when he was between films," he said. "If we had wanted him later in the year, he couldn't have come because he'll be in Europe making a movie."

There are three aims of retrospectives at Syracuse, according to Squire. He said they are to trace an actor's career and maturation on film, to follow the development of cinema and to establish personal contact between the actor and students.

Without the equipment and backing of Film Forum, said Squire, the idea of a retrospective never would have been born here. He said most of the movies used in a retrospective are on 35 millimeter film, the size of commercial film. Squire said most colleges have projectors which can show only 18 millimeter film, the size for educational and home movies. Film Forum has projectors for 35 millimeter film.

"Even those colleges with 35 millimeter film projectors have difficulty showing commercial film because of local theaters," said Rev. Keim. "Last year the State University of New York at Buffalo couldn't show 'Charade' because the theater across the street complained to the film company.

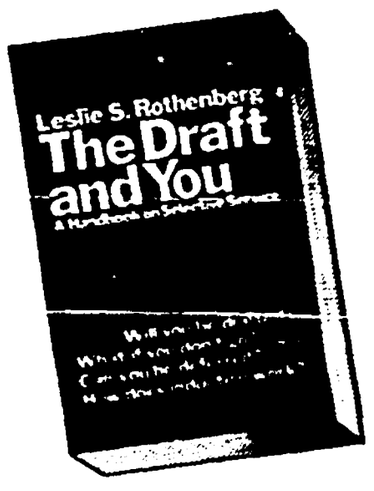
"We proved to the movie companies that student response here was excellent. It's completely commercial; if you can produce the profits, then you get the films. Cornell still hasn't been able to get a movie like 'In the Heat of the Night' which we're showing during the Steiger retrospective. Cornell can't get movies like that from the film companies."

Film Forum's success, according to Rev. Keim, also enables that organization to bear the cost of a retrospective. The cost includes, he said, travel and hotel expenses for Steiger and his wife, the cost of luncheons and dinners being given for Steiger and guarantee money that must be paid to movie companies before they will send the films.

Even though Film Forum has been successful, said Rev. Keim, it still had difficulty with Warner Brothers, the company with rights to "The Illustrated Man." That film was to have had its first public showing here but Rev. Keim said Warner Brothers suddenly decided the movie would not be shown here.

"Apparently Warner Brothers thought we'd give it too much publicity," he said. "They think it's a problem film and were afraid it would get bad reviews here that would hurt its release. It's an episodic film and there are structural problems tying it together. Steiger was hopping mad when he heard about it.

"We may end up with something even better, though. We're hoping to show excerpts from 'The Illustrated Man' and from 'Three and the Two Won't Go,' a Steiger film which is still being edited in England. He and Claire Bloom will comment on the films. It will be more personal and intimate than having them appear for a few minutes before a film."



Claire Bloom and Rod Steiger are featured in this scene from "The Illustrated Man," the first film in which they appear together. Miss Bloom plays a tattoo artist and Steiger plays a tattooed man in the film version of the Ray Bradbury collection of science fiction stories. Excerpts from "The Illustrated Man" will be shown on February 5 with Steiger and Miss Bloom commenting.

By the time you've gone from experimentation to being a Head, it will be too late to read this book.

No subject is surrounded with as much misinformation today as that of drugs, particularly as they relate to college students. DRUGS ON THE COLLEGE CAMPUS is something else. It's the most lucid, reasonable presentation of the facts, problems, and issues that surround the taking of various drugs (barbiturates, amphetamines, marijuana, LSD, alcohol, even aspirin) that you can find. Without a single sermonizing word.

Alienated vs. radicals . . .

trust and could be a cause of their own mistruct of others, leading to withdrawal and estrangement from society as a whole.

Second is the theme of a Pyrrhic Oedipal victory. In the alienateds' fantasies, attacks on father figures in the struggle for the love of a woman are almost always successful–only to find the attacker himself overcome by some extraneous force. This suggests that although traditional male authority is weak, its destruction leads to a new and worse tyranny. The real victor is the mother who now dominates both the father and the son.

This might also lead to the subsequent development of mistrust and withdrawal from society. Out of fear of another Pyrrhic victory, the alienated wish to avoid competition and rivalry.

It is in the attitude toward their fathers that the alienated and the radicals differ most drastically. In some situations, the radical sees his father as ethical, idealistic, intellectual and principled. At other times the same man is looked upon as weak, acquiescent and ineffectual in realizing his ideals. The young radicals are aware of their ambivalent feelings, and in most instances the positive paternal image dominates with the negative side emerging later in relation to the father's failure to be entirely true to his values.

The alienated, on the other hand, see their fathers as weak and corruptive. The male role is thereby seemingly impotent and unattractive. In an unconscious attempt not to let what happened to their fathers happen to themselves, the alienated repudiate conventional adulthood which is epitomized by their fathers' unattractive position.

But despite the differences between youth groups, a central theme may be found running through the youth personality in general: the technological society. And both the alienated and the young radicals see the urgent need for ethics to catch up with the technological progress in order to prevent, as Erikson says, "willful and playful testing of the limits and range of the 'supermachines.'" This danger can be seen in the political policy which the United States pursued in the 1950's–brinkmanship. A direct reflection of these fears can be seen in the goals of the young radicals in particular.

There are many other factors influencing our youth's search for identity, mastery and goals in today's society. In no other stage of the life cycle are the promise of finding oneself and the threat of losing oneself so closely allied:

You lose yourself, you reappear, alone you stand with no one near
When a trembling distant voice unclear
Startles your sleepin' ear to hear
That someone thinks he's really found you.

--Dylan

There is a need to find a deeper meaning while simultaneously coping with the technological world. Movement toward the meaningful and away from the sham is imperative.

To enter society each generation of youth must find an identity consistent with its own childhood and consistent with the promise of its ideals in the context of the historical process. American youth is attempting to develop its own ideology and rights of confirmation. They are likely to find the greatest identity problem in seeking a technical skill.

The existence of the alienated personality shows a central distrust in the emotional lives and ideologies of these individuals and may reflect a family in which neither parent became what he or she had promised to be. The alienated therefore devote much time to working out inner conflicts, such as the inability to form direct relationships with others.

In contrast, the radicals express many of the traditional American values. They are committed to the very ideals which the alienated reject. They also lack a strong diffuse hostility, which is apparent in the alienated. In both groups the role of the mother is crucial in the evolution of the child's basic views. A good description of the activists is given by Tom Hayden, former SDS president.

> Most of the active student radicals today come from middle to upper middle class professional homes. They were born with status and affluence as facts of life, not goals to be striven for. In their upbringing, their parents stressed the rights of children to question and make judgments producing perhaps the first generation of young people both affluent and independent of mind."

It is clear that the ideological needs of today's intellectual "neohumanists" are not being met by society. The form of their dissent may differ, but certain changes are implicated as essential by all. There is a wish to make something work, and work well, and for occupations which offer success with the satisfaction of enjoyment and uniqueness — a sense of specialness. More urgent is a need for a new ethics which transcend ideology and technology to limit and humanize technological expansion. It may be best expressed by a student frustration with education:

> "Witnessing the inadequate procession of our ideas across the page, up all night, typing words we have not loved."

Our pill.

Does it really work?

If you've ever resorted to NoDoz® at 4 a.m. the night before an exam, you've probably been disappointed.

NoDoz, after all, is no substitute for sleep. Neither is anything else we can think of.

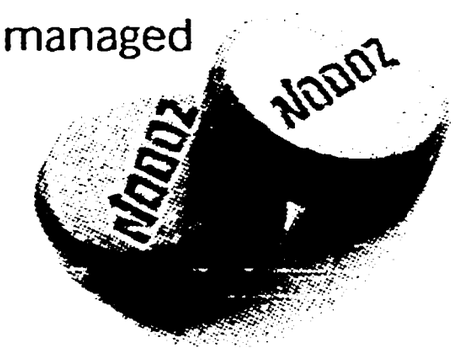
What NoDoz is is a very strong stimulant. In fact, NoDoz has the strongest stimulant you can buy without a prescription.

Caffeine.

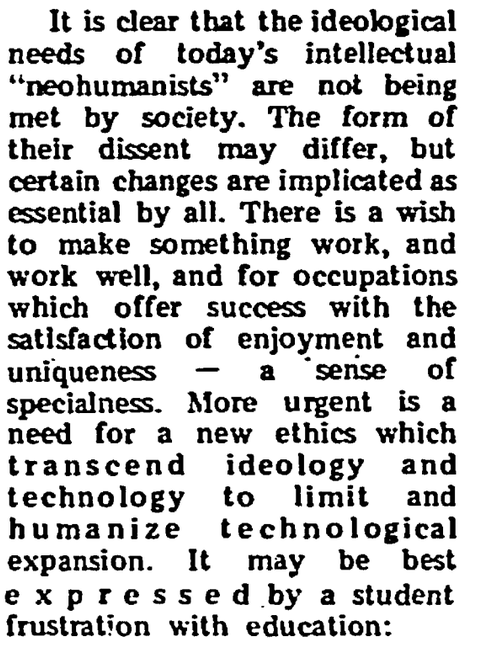
What's so strong about that?

If we may cite The Pharmacological Basis of Therapeutics: Caffeine is a powerful central nervous stimulant. Caffeine excites all portions of the central nervous system. Caffeine stimulates all portions of the cortex, but its main action is on the psychic and sensory functions. It produces a more rapid and clearer flow of thought and allays drowsiness and fatigue. After taking caffeine, one is capable of more sustained intellectual effort and a more perfect association of ideas. There is also a keener appreciation of sensory stimuli.

Very interesting. But why take NoDoz when you can get caffeine in a cup of coffee?



Very simple. You take NoDoz all at once instead of sipping coffee for 10 minutes. And if you take two NoDoz tablets, the recommended dosage, you get twice the caffeine in a cup of coffee.



Two tablets—isn't that likely to be habit forming? Definitely not. NoDoz is completely non-habit forming.

Which means it's safe to take whether you're cramming at night. Or about to walk into an 8 o'clock class. Or driving somewhere (even though you're rested) and the monotony of the road makes you drowsy.

One last thing you should know about NoDoz. It now comes in two forms. Those familiar white pills you take with water. And a chewable tablet called NoDoz Action Aids®. It tastes like a chocolate mint, but it does everything regular NoDoz does.

And if you've managed to stay awake this long, you know that's quite a lot.

'Maelstrom' a success: two more issues planned

By VIC LIVINGSTON

"For the first time in many years at SU a literary magazine has been a success."

With this comment Editor-in Chief Don Bredes sums up his opinion of his new literary potpourri, Maelstrom. The magazine, released this month with a grant from the SU Board of Publications, has met with warm acceptance and is on its way to sell-out status, with 850 copies already sold.

This sketch by Jacqueline R. Dutton is featured in the first issue of Maelstrom. Miss Dutton is an SU senior majoring in illustration.

Already, Editor Bredes plans two more issues this semester of prose, poetry, and other literary contributions from the University community.

All has not been a bed of roses concerning the new magazine, however. First came the fight for approval and financing from the Board of Publications. Bredes and his colleagues, production manager Tom Ahearn and executive editor Harvey Schwartz, were ultimately given the go-ahead late last fall for yet another attempt in recent SU history to provide a successful literary magazine.

Larger hurdles, however, were to come. The response to requests for literary material was poor.

"We received much poetry," said Editor Bredes, "but our selection of prose was severely limited. People seemed reluctant to submit work to an untested magazine for fear that their work would be placed alongside poor quality contributions. Also, the present trend is toward poetry and away from prose. Poetry is the dominant form, and Maelstrom's contents reflect this trend. Our choice of good prose was extremely limited."

Time also proved a problem. The Maelstrom carried no advertising in this issue due to lack of time for an ad campaign. In addition, said Bredes, many would-be contributors were home during the vacation period unable to submit material.

The next issue of Maelstrom will reflect the format set with the premier issue, with some variations. Campaigns for both both advertising and literary contributions will b e intensely pursued. The next Maelstrom may also contain an article by a faculty member, another innovation. A third issue is planned for May.

"We expect no major departures in format," Bredes said. "Our layout will be consistent so that people will come to recognize Maelstrom."

Bredes reports that response to Maelstrom has been favorable not only among students, but with faculty and administration members as well.

A limited number of copies are still available at the Book Center on "M" Street.

Interestingly enough, the name "maelstrom," chosen by Bredes, means "a whirlpool; an irresistable force or influence." With the initial success of Maelstrom, the new magazine certainly reflects its appellation.

Lift for sagging team

Austin gets OK for Orange court play

By LARRY CENTER

Syracuse fans will be hoping for a basketball revival tomorrow night to celebrate the return to the team of Ernie Austin, who was grounded last semester by academic difficulties.

The play of the Ernie Austin of two years ago could be a big boost for the Orangemen, who are trying to break a four game losing streak. As a freshmen, the 6 ft. 2 in. guard from Washington, D.C., averaged 30 points a game, eclipsing Dave Bing's frosh scoring mark. Last year he was something of a disappointment, tallying 8.9 a game.

With 9 games left on the schedule, starting at Manley Field House tomorrow night against the University of Massachusetts, Austin's old shooting touch could mean a big difference for Roy Danforth's 4-12 team. However, Ernie will be no instant savior.

According to Danforth, he is not in "game shape" yet and "he'll have to work his way back into the line-up. He is not in real good shape and his shooting and timing will be a little off, but I think he'll be in the line-up real soon."

The coach said that Austin has been working out with the club, but not enough to be able to go at full speed right away. However, Danforth, "I know he'll be able to help us immediately."

With Austin back, maybe the Orange will be able to reverse the trend they have shown in their last three games. In each contest the Orange trailed throughout the game, then mounted a last-ditch rally only to fall short in the last few minutes.

Against Penn State Wednesday night the story was the same. After falling behind early, the Orange drew within four points of the Lions with a minute to go, then saw their momentum evaporate when a technical foul was called on an incensed Roy Danforth, who had seen almost all the calls during the game go against his team.

The coverted technical and four quick points by the Lions sealed the lid on Syracuse. During the SU hot streak, Gerry McFadden and Mike Barlow stole the ball three times and scored, helping the Orange outscore State, 11-3 over a five-minute span.

Once again Smith got into early foul trouble, getting his third with 10:45 to go in the first half. Having scored only five points, he stayed out the rest of the period. When he returned, big Bill only had a chance to get two points before both he and Lion center Bill Stansfield were ejected from the game for the roughing contest they had been carrying on all night. The banishments occured just before SU's hot streak, when the Orange could have used Smitty's inside scoring.

Early in the week, Danforth said, "Bob Kouwe is the only senior who is giving us any scoring." Wednesday night Kouwe again led the Syracuse scoring, getting 19, 15 in the second half.

Tomorrow night Roy's Boys will face a strong 9-4 Massachusetts club. The Redmen beat Fordham, the team that beat Syracuse earlier in the season, Wednesday night, 73-60. They also boast an 89-66 victory over a Connecticut team that routed SU, 103-84.

Frosh coach Bill Vesp, who scouted Massachusetts against Fordham, calls them "a very strong club with excellent guards, Ray Ellerbrook and Joe DiSarcina. Fordham, a team known for their tight defense, threw every kind at them, but it didn't bother them." Vesp said that their main strength is that "they're a very disciplined ball club, very proised, but they can get the rebounds and fastbreak, too. They're a real well-organized club."

READY FOR ACTION. Ernie Austin, the holder of the SU freshman scoring record, works out in preparation for his return to active duty. The Washington, D.C. native was ineligible for the first semester's play because of academic difficulties. He will play tomorrow night against the University of Massachusetts. (Photo by Klein)

Pros tap Thoms, Kyasky; Winnepeg signs Zegalia

By MIKE WEBER

Some smiles and some sad faces are being worn by senior members of the SU football team following the completion of the pro football draft.

Those wearing the broadest smiles are defensive tackle Art Thoms and defensive safety Tony Kyasky. Both were snatched by the pros in the first day of the AFL-NFL common draft conducted in New York.

Thoms, the burly 6-4, 240 pound defensive stalwart for the Orangemen, was tabbed as the first round pick by the Oakland Raiders.

His defensive line coach at Syracuse was Ted Dailey. He expressed great pleasure at Thoms' early selection, but a cautious optimism was evident as he rated Thoms' chances in the senior circuit.

He said, "I'm really pleased that Art went so high in the draft. He's a fine ballplayer and has all the equipment to make it as a pro."

Dailey said his only worry about Thoms was that his protege lacked strength in the upper part of his body. "I've been trying to get Art to work with weights for over a year. He's going to have to work hard to make it, there's no question about that. He's got a lot to learn, but he's always wanted to play pro ball and now he's getting his chance."

Asked whether Thoms might be moved to a linebacker slot with the Raiders, Dailey replied, "He's been drafted as a tackle and I think they'll keep him somewhere in the interior of the defensive line. If he doesn't work out there, they might try him in a linebacking spot."

Kyasky was snared in the fifth round by the NFL's New Orleans Saints. He will probably be tried as a strong safety, according to SU backfield coach Jim Ridlon. Ridlon expressed surprise that Kyasky was not picked sooner, but added, "you never can tell about these things."

He commented further, "I guess Tony's speed hurt him, but I'm sure that he'll be a first stringer by the time he's through with football."

In addition to the two AFL-NFL draftees, SU saw another of its products scooped up by the Canadian Football League. Steve Zegalia was signed by the Winnepeg Blue Bombers, although his position is yet to be decided.

Dailey had nothing but praise for Zegalia, calling him a "fine, dedicated ballplayer. His size was definitely against him. He was probably one of the shortest defensive ends in the country, but also one of the toughest. With Winnepeg, though, I could see him being moved to linebacker."

Well-concealed disappointment filled the air around Cliff Ensley and Jerry Beach. Both were passed up in the draft, and now have uncertain football futures.

Ensley summed up his feelings this way. "I can't say much. I love football and would like to play. I've had a couple of offers from some American teams to sign as a free agent."

Ensley, who is in the fourth year of a five-year engineering program, said a free-agent offer would have to be substantial to make him give up school. "I'll get a B.A. this year and a B.S. next year. As much as I like football, I can't let it dictate my life."

Beach, who was outstanding as a middle guard this season, was also hampered by his stature (6 ft., 220 lbs.). When asked of his feelings, he replied "I didn't expect anything. I'm just too short for American ball."

Beach has received some nibbles from Canadian teams, but won't disclose from whom or for how much. "In a few days, I'll know more," he concluded.

And so it went across the nation, with the big boys being grabbed up, leaving the smaller ones untouched. Thoms and Kyasky will be attempting to join such noteable SU grads as John Mackey, Al Bemiller and Floyd Little in the pro ranks. Meanwhile, it's up to Zegalia and possibly Beach to show American college students there is more than one reason to go to Canada.

Wrestlers, fencers home; swimmers at Penn State

SU's undefeated swim team figures to continue that way this weekend, but two other Orange squads face tough meets in Archbold Gym.

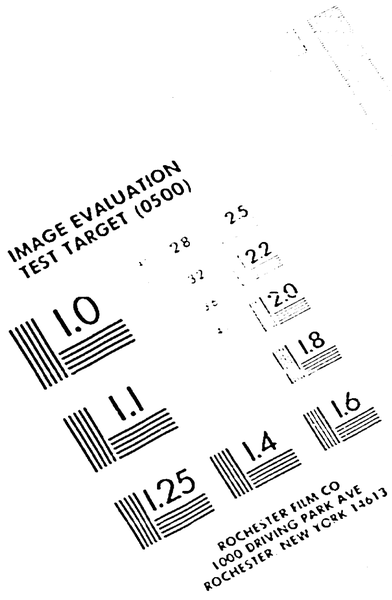
The fencing team hosts Penn State and the wrestling team goes against Army on the home front tomorrow, while the mermen will be opposing State in University Park.

Coach Jon Buzzard's 3-0 crew has not been pushed so far this year, and the Mount Nits do not appear to have the experience or manpower to halt the Orange surge. Penn State is now in only its second pool season.

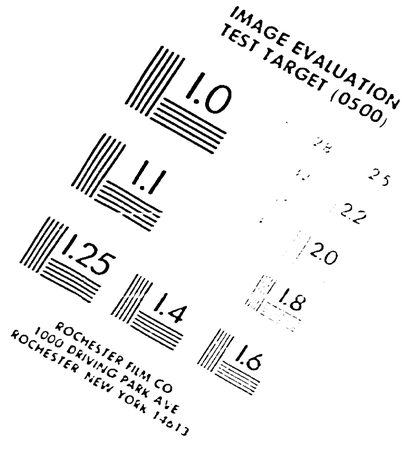
What could have been a bright season is deteriorating rapidly for the grapplers. Three more wrestlers were lost over semester break because of scholastic or disciplinary reasons, and the team absorbed a 34-7 trouncing at the hands of Lehigh. Bob Rust, at 191, and Eric Greenberg, at 152, have been the only steady performers for coach Ed Carlin.

The fencers will get underway at 1 p.m. Saturday, while the wrestling match will start at 2.

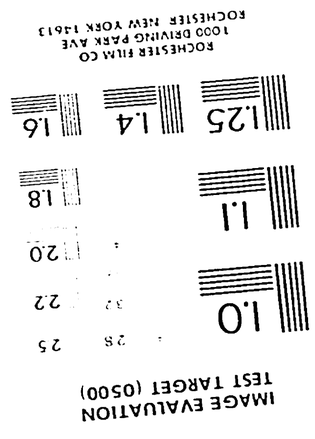
Mohawk CC tops frosh



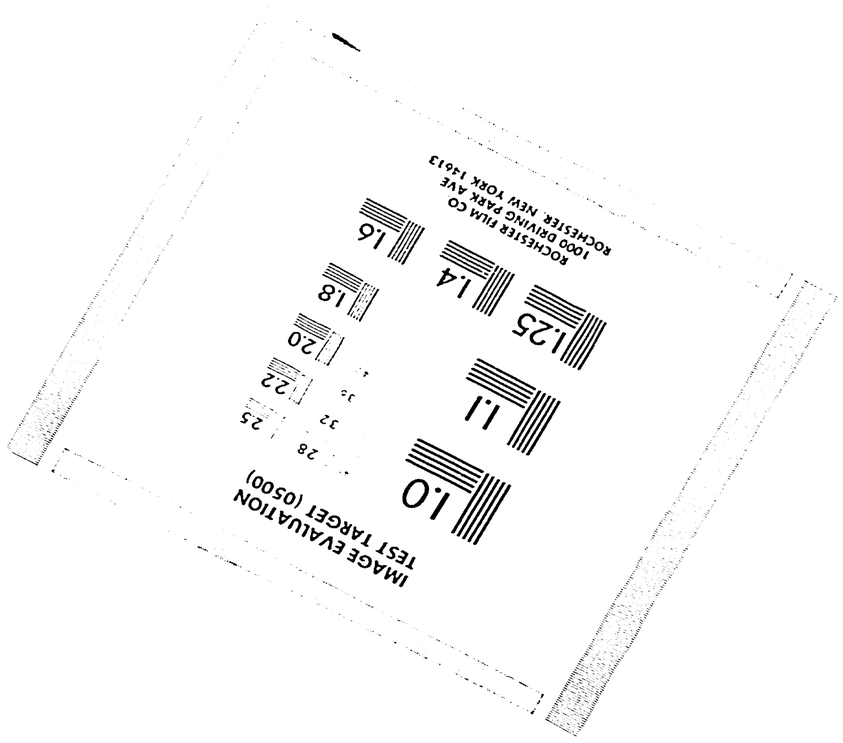
The SU frosh went down to their second straight defeat last night, dropping a 56-52 decision to Mohawk Valley Community College.



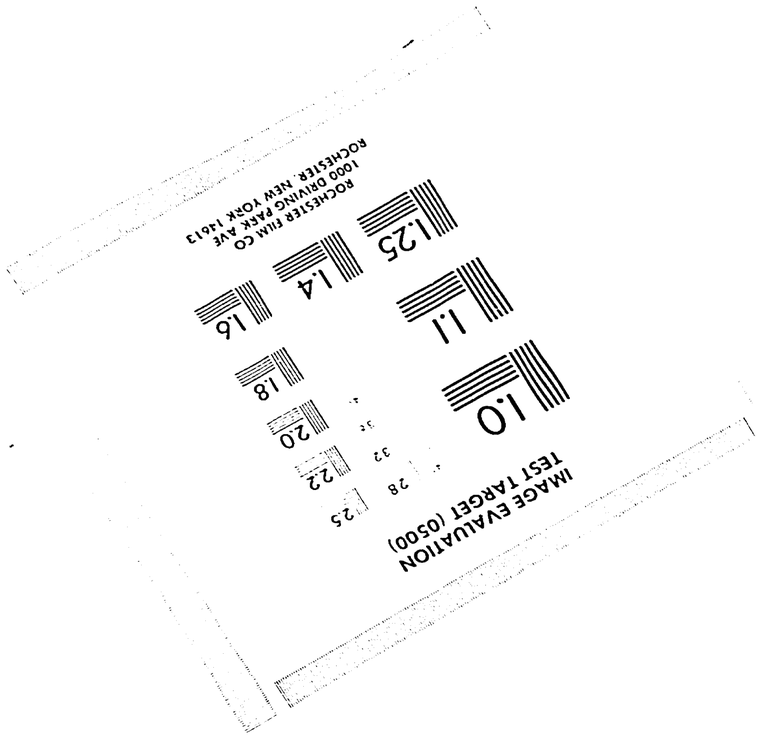
It was the first time in three years that the Tangerines have lost two straight games.



Two of the SU starters played at less than full strength. Ken Gray, who missed the last game, played the entire second half, clearing the boards well and scoring eight points. Gil Guererro, the second leading scorer on the team, did not start because of a slight muscle pull.



Greg Kohls topped the Tangerines with 16 points, but a charging foul against him in the last minute of play iced the game for Mohawk.



Doug Knapp of Mohawk was the game's high scorer with 24 points.
