Students will meet stars

SU to host the Steigers tomorrow and Thursday

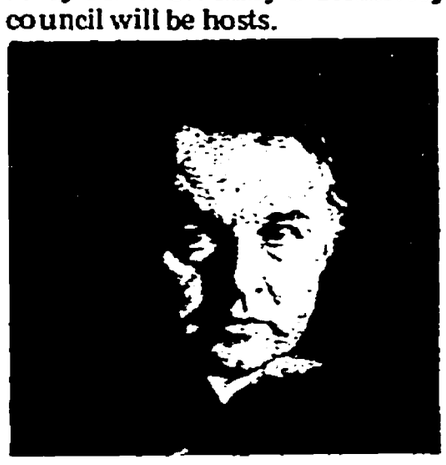
Syracuse University students will have several opportunities to meet film stars Rod Steiger and Claire Bloom and discuss their work with them during their campus visit tomorrow and Thursday. Student organizations will be hosts at some of the sessions.

Unless the students go to Hancock Airport for the Steigers' scheduled arrival tomorrow at 10:57 a.m., their first glimpse of the acting couple will be at 1:45 p.m. when they arrive on campus for a tour of major buildings, including the Administration Building and Hendricks Chapel, the headquarters of Film Forum, which is sponsoring the visit.

At 2:30 p.m. Steiger and Miss Bloom will chat informally with students in the Noble Room of the Chapel. Members of B'nai B'rith Hillel Foundation will be hosts at the session, according to Miss Barbara Prinzivalli, assistant to the director of Film Forum.

At 3 p.m. Miss Bloom will be a guest in Prof. Ray Irwin's class on interpretation of Shakespeare in Room 402, Hall of Languages. This will be familiar ground for the British-born actress. Before she became a film star she was a member of London's Old Vic company, and her interpretation of Juliet was credited with giving that troupe its first big hit in many years.

At 3:30 p.m. Steiger will go to Haven Hall for an informal session with students. Miss Bloom joins her husband there at 4 p.m. Haven Hall dormitory council members will be hosts.



After a private dinner in Lawrinson Hall penthouse, the couple will be in Gifford Auditorium at 8:30 p.m. for "An Evening With the Steigers." Excerpts from "The Illustrated Man," the first film in which they co-star, and from other films in which they have appeared will be shown. The Steigers will discuss the film clips.

Steiger and Miss Bloom will be back on the campus Thursday at 9:50 a.m. when students changing classes will be able to see them on their way to a 10 a.m. videotape session in the television studio in the basement of the Carnegie Library. There they will be interviewed by television and drama students. The tape will be shown at a later date over Syracuse's educational television station, WCNY-TV.

At 11:30 a.m. the Steigers are scheduled to drive to East Genesee St. and Irving Ave. for a tour of the University Regent Theatre complex, including the new Experimental Theatre.

At a noon luncheon they will be the guests of students in the drama department. This will be followed by a discussion with the students at 1 p.m. in the new Theatre.

Panhellenic Association and Interfraternity Council, coordinating bodies for the sororities and fraternities at S.U., will be hosts to the Steigers at their next appearance at 2 p.m. in the lounge of the Newhouse Communications Center on University Place for an informal session with students. At 3:30 p.m. the Steigers will meet students informally in the main lounge of the dormitory at St. Mary's site. St. Mary's dormitory council will be hosts.

ROD STEIGER

Steiger and Miss Bloom are scheduled to leave the city for New York aboard American Airlines flight 422 at 11:50 a.m.

SU anthropology professor murdered by bomb in Africa

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

A Syracuse University anthropology professor who early in 1963 took a leave of absence to attempt to free his native Mozambique from Portuguese rule was assassinated yesterday in Dar-es-Salaam, Tanzania.

Dr. Eduardo Mondlane, founder and president of FRELIMO, the Mozambique Liberation Front, apparently was sitting in the home of long-time acquaintance Betty King when a bomb that had been placed under his chair exploded. It is not known who planned the assassination.

Dr. Mondlane came to Syracuse in 1961 and taught in the Maxwell School of Citizenship and Public Affairs until 1963, when he left to unify and lead revolutionary groups in Mozambique against Portuguese authority. His headquarters were in Dar-es-Salaam, the capital of Tanzania.

Dr. Mondlane, who in 1963 said he was convinced that violence was the only way to liberate Mozambique, had left Mozambique in 1949 after serving a prison sentence for revolutionary activities. Before arriving at SU, he was a research officer in the Secretariat of the United Nations.

But by 1963, Dr. Mondlane was persuaded to return to Tanganyika (now united with Zanzibar to form Tanzania), from which the liberation would be spearheaded.

The nationalistic movements in Mozambique, a country which is 90 per cent African, were given their first strong leadership with the creation of FRELIMO. Armed struggle against the Portuguese began in September 1964, and by 1967 the front asserted it had more than 5,000 uniformed men operating in the northern provinces of Mozambique.

Armed conflict was necessary, Dr. Mondlane said in 1963, because Portugal would not otherwise give up Mozambique, a country vital to Portugal's economic health. It was, therefore, "our duty to push and pressure in every way possible" for Mozambique's liberation, he said.

Despite the limited success of the liberation movement, Dr. Mondlane has been viewed as one of the most successful modern-day revolutionaries. One who holds this opinion is Prof.

Judicial Board clashes with the Dean of Women

In an attempt to settle misunderstandings between the University Judicial Board (UJB) and the Dean of Women that have seemed to impair their total cooperation on disciplinary matters, both parties will meet for discussion tomorrow afternoon.

According to Paul Snyder, chief justice of UJB, "this is not a crisis, but a misunderstanding that I feel we can solve."

One source of conflict between UJB and the Dean of Women's office has been an informal agreement that the Dean would forward a memo to UJB after there had been what Snyder called "significant disciplinary action" against any coed. Snyder claims that only one such memo has been received and he thinks there should be more. The Dean of Men's office sends UJB a carbon copy of letters sent to students involved in any disciplinary cases to explain action to be taken against them.

Letters from the Dean of Men's office have, of course, provided names of the students involved, while the memos from Dean Smith do not. Snyder says he will ask her to "make available all information relevant to the case. We want the names of everyone involved."

In assessing the situation, Snyder said "we believe there is room for improvement. The Dean of Women's office isn't functioning as efficiently as the Dean of Men's."

According to Snyder, one point of contention arose last term after the Board ruled "no action" in the case of two women students who were sipping soup with two males in a men's dormitory after an evening of sledding. UJB's opinion stated:

"Stern punishments afforded to these four students for having a "soup party" would simply be out-of-line with the confidence which has been demonstrated by the Administration and faculty, and which we strongly feel is not misplaced."

Another complaint voiced by Snyder was a case handled by the Dean of Women in December in which part of the punishment involved was a certain amount of time spent working in the Dean's office. Snyder said the action "doesn't fit the crime" and described it as "harsh," as it came before exams. He also indicated that the punishment was not one prescribed by the Judicial Code of the UJB.

When asked about the case in question, Dean Smith said "I have no comment on Mr. Snyder's charge." She said that her judicial procedure with girls involved in disciplinary cases is "the same as the procedure used by the Dean of Men and everywhere else in the university."

Another request that Snyder will have for Dean Smith on Wednesday is the appointment of a permanent representative from her office to the UJB proceedings, rather than having different members of her staff appear at various hearings. He indicated that this request just involved his interpretation of the rules followed by UJB.

Assets near $200 million

Syracuse University, according to Vice President and Treasurer F.A. Wingate, will in 1970, its centennial year, achieve total assets of $200 million.

This figure, cited in an article written by Wingate for yesterday's Syracuse Post Standard, represents an increase of $100 million from six years ago. It took the university 93 years to hit the first $100,000, according to Wingate.

While noting this vastly improved rate of accumulating assets, however, Wingate emphasized that "deficits are still with us. They have become commonplace even in universities with large endownment."

In fact, in assessing a university's financial situation, such things as the endowment

The student issues of tomorrow

For any governing body to wield power wisely it must maintain a fundamentally humane outlook, despite its outer rigidities and inner conflicts. Because the Council on Student Life seats at the same table persons of different perspectives, it tends to maintain this quality. Although its members may represent a specific interest, they still share a concern for the general welfare; although the students may believe the adults sit in conspiracy against them, they still must perceive them as human beings and talk with them individually.

This a community form of government whose members relate to one another as human beings and whose fundamental concern is satisfying human needs. This is an ideal governing body for a university.

There are, however, two trends at Syracuse that tend to disrupt this ideal and developing form of government. One is the tendency of a few administrators not to take the proposals from students with whom they share power too seriously. They are tolerant of panty raids, water fights and other "traditional" student frivolities but they are taken back when students submit proposals for change and expect them to be dealt with seriously.

This view cannot be considered typical of Syracuse University administrators as a whole, however. The changes wrought by the Council to date are great. It has slackened the drinking rule, introduced an element of due process into Rule One, implemented parietal hours for 25 per cent of the campus with 100 per cent participation likely for all those desiring them next fall, and found a way for the library to remain open 24 hours a day during final exams.

The second tendency to disrupt the community form of government and its pattern of accomplishment is the current student Zeitgeist. Because students sometimes seek to free themselves of all adult restrictions and to impose their ideas on the authorities over them, they may use the community form of government to augment student power, to go from sharing decision-making power to student autonomy. Future issues before the Council may include asking for a portion of the general student fee to be administered solely by students and making student dorms autonomous. The latter idea has great merit and could help humanize dormitory life. The former must take into account the difficult and complex state of University finances. Such attempts to create student autonomy by taking advantage of sharing the decision-making power will be a future point of contention in the Council on Student Life and the academic councils into which students have been incorporated.

The walk-out by the student members of the Council on Student Life is one indication of this student Zeitgiest. But the mood is more far-reaching than the current crop of student leaders. If the students on the Council had not walked-out and called the administration "liars" and the Council a fraud, they would not maintain the credibility they do among the militant activists. Future students who worked hard on a smooth-functioning Council might find themselves labeled stooges and disregarded at a moment of confrontation.

The Council's existence, then, remains tenuous and the two major factions, students and administration, must remember the fundamental human needs if the community form of government is to survive.

Side-stepping
Dorm autonomy
By Stephen L. Tober

Stephen L. Tober is currently serving as president of Booth Dorm Council.

Right in tempo with current attitudes concerning student power on this campus is a recent demand made by student leaders for a bold new tangent to Administration policy--namely, dorm autonomy. Perhaps autonomy is not the correct word; for, as is outlined in a report concerning a recent informal campus Pinebrook, not only is there a call for dormitory self-government, but, in addition, the development of "a sense of community" within each dorm. It appears, however, that while the goals of such a proposal are rightfully idealistic and follow in the development of contemporary liberalism, there is a lack of judgment caught in the fervor of student unrest.

The plan, in essence, calls for a separation by the dormitories from the rules and regulations of the Board of Trustees, and, as the report vaguely states, "Other forms of hierarchy." The reasoning for such a radical move is further stated: "we are turning out educated adolescents which is one of the main faults of our In Loco Parentis- paternalistic crutch system." Thus, the over-all effect desired within the individual dorms would be a uniform advancement in "freedom and responsibility."

To propound a breakaway from established regulations of the University, and to have these rules placed inconsistently amongst living centers, is to deny the existence of human nature. Man is an animal who needs a strong centralized system of checks and balances; one that is, if even somewhat distasteful, at least uniform. To place essential regulations such as Visiting Hours and alcoholic consumption on the lower levels of dormitory control, would result only in confusion, and perhaps even back-sliding of all-ready promising Administration policy. The leaders of dormitories are not professionals; they are students, like everyone else, and more times than not are backed by weak dorm councils. To ask them to insure "strong self-imposed regulations" is ludicrous--that can only be handled by individuals who are trained in that area.

Yet the intentions of dorm autonomy may be reached, without the unnecessary secession from school policy. Every objective called for in the report--among them freedom and responsibility in education, and a sense of community--can be achieved through the creation of strong and diligent dorm councils. By working with the Administration, and exhibiting a basic understanding of the problems, dormitory policy can truly create the communal atmosphere desired in college life.

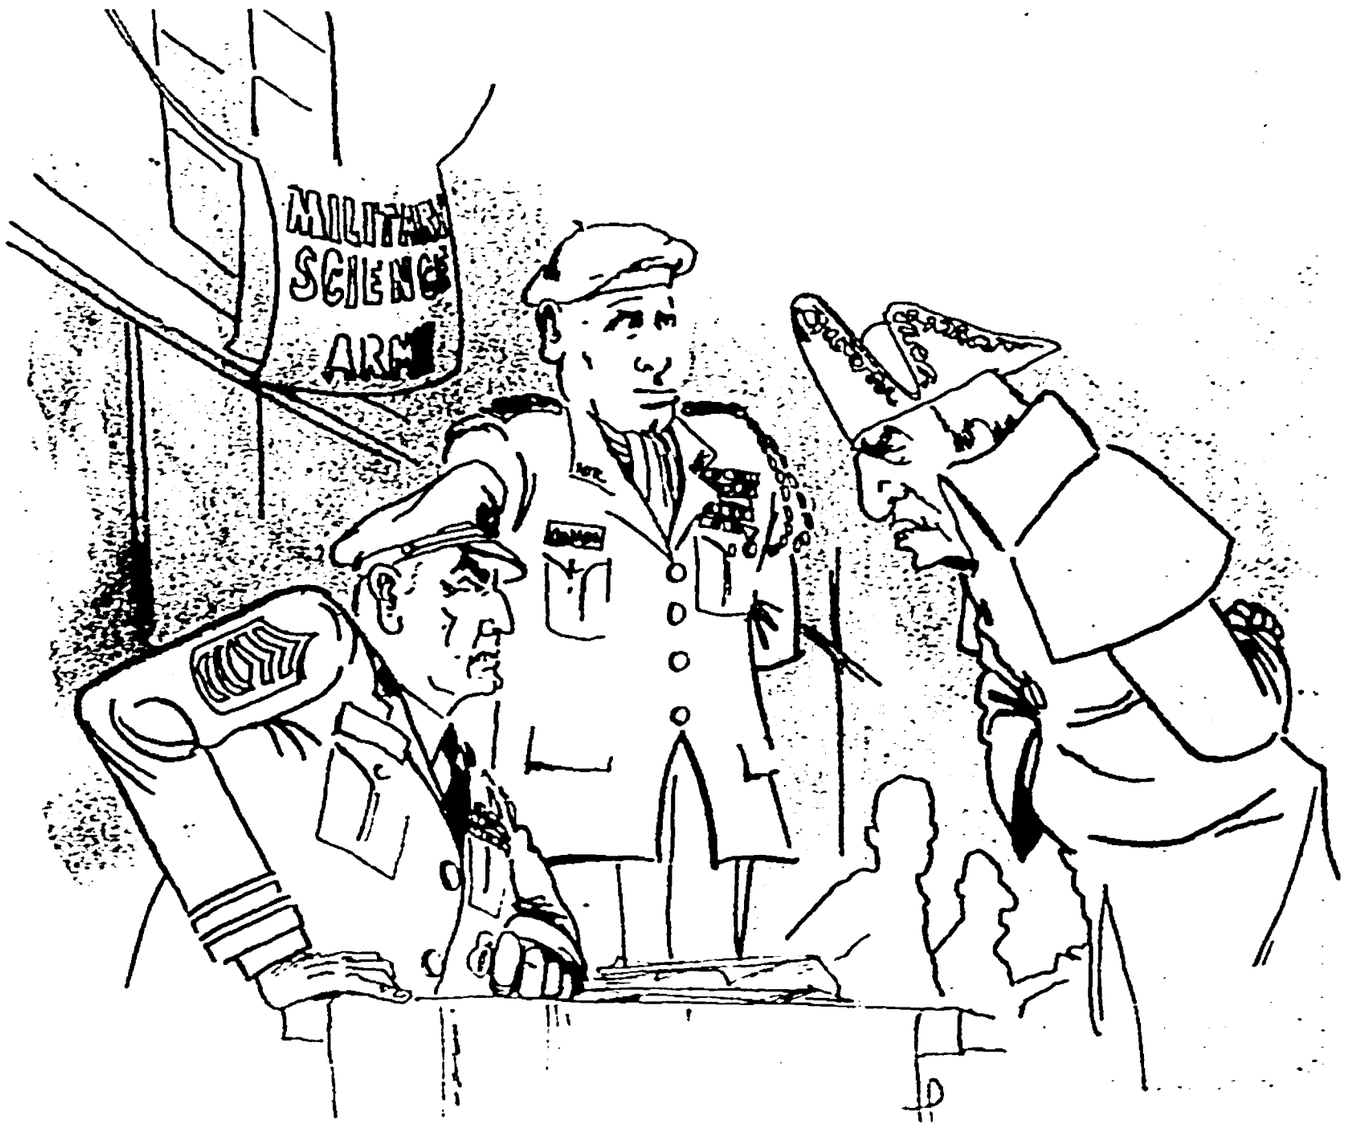
Dear Mr. Nixon . . .
Together again
By Paul Finkelman

Dear Mr. Nixon,



At a rally during your campaign a girl held up a sign asking you to "bring us together again." Although it is a general and unspecific goal, you must indeed direct your executive powers toward uniting the nation while leading it. If you fail, your tenure in office will be difficult if not disastrous. If you succeed, it will rank among the greatest achievements in our history.

Your base of power has traditionally been among conservatives and moderates within your party. Your first appointees, such as Agnew, Hickel, Laird, and J. Edgar Hoover, have all served to strengthen your influence among this group, as well as among conservative Democrats. Because of this you can afford to strengthen your influence among Republican and Democratic liberals without eroding your base of power. In essence, by compromising in favor of your opponents you will gain their respect and support, and in so doing, unite the nation Compromise with liberals must be achieved through two specific acts and in two vital areas: the new Chief Justice, and the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty; and Racial and Civil Rights problems and Vietnam. Your first major appointment will be the post of Chief Justice of the U.S. Supreme Court. In an unprecedented attempt to unite the nation behind you, I think you ought to submit the name of Abraham Fortas to the Senate. By doing so you would gain strength among liberals and Democrats. More importantly, perhaps, you would assert the power of your office on the Senate by showing that the office should not be insulted, even when a lame-duck president is in power. To take Justice Fortas's place on the bench you should choose from a number of prominent Republicans, former Senators Morton, Keuchel, or Keating, or Gov. Nelson Rockerfeller.

The Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty must be passed as soon as possible. With conflicts in progress in the Middle East, Africa, and Southeast Asia the threat of a world nuclear conflict is very real. The closer the world gets to nuclear disarmament the better off the United States and the world as a whole will be.

Daily Orange elections

Applications for the position of editor-in-chief of the Daily Orange are now available at the office of the Dean of Student Services, Jim Carleton, Administration Building. The selection by the Board of Publications is scheduled for February 24.

Mondlane . . .

Fred G. Burke, former director of East African Studies at SU and now dean of international studies at SUNY at Buffalo.

Most revolutionaries, said Burke, who brought Mondlane to SU and who has been close to the Mondlane family for more than a decade, are toppled unless they succeed in liberation. But, he pointed out, Dr. Mondlane "stayed in the saddle for nearly six years."

Although Dr. Mondlane was a revolutionary, Burke said, he was not "a violent man." Rather, "he was a very passionate man who felt deeply about certain issues, and who expressed himself vociferously and eloquently."

Student assistant coffee set for Feb. 16 at Haven; applications due on Feb. 21

Women interested in becoming student assistants next year should attend a coffee on Feb. 16 from 3 to 5 p.m. in Haven penthouse. Applications are due Feb. 21. This year seven girls served as student assistants on floors in Flint, Shaw and Winchell.

Mrs. Jennie Mingolelli, director of St. Mary's and coordinator of the student assistant program, commented on the requirements needed for assistants. "We look for intangible things. When talking to applicants, we look for leadership, the type of personality that will draw them to people, especially girls they will be working with in the future."

Women who will have junior or senior class standing and an accumulative average of 2.5 by September are eligible. Remuneration is full room and board.

Student assistants work with dorm directors and head residents. They are considered staff members and are expected to attend weekly staff meetings and help advise resident hall groups.

This year's student assistants, who may be contacted if applicants have questions, include: Barbara Brinckerhoff x2260, Carolyn Richards x2307, Win Rowe x2970, Judy Sokol x2972, Cressy Starkweather x2249, Barbara Stasiuk x3304, Joan Tully x2263.

Aspiration '72 rakes in funds from dorm councils

In separate actions taken over the past two nights, three dorm councils granted Aspiration '72 a total of $135 to work on its scholarship information center, the first phase of the student-oriented program.

Booth and Dellplain Dorm Councils gave the program $35 and $50 respectively on Sunday evening at their regular meetings.

On Monday night Watson, the only all freshman dorm added $50 to Sunday night's total. Later in the week requests will be made of the Lawrinson and St. Mary's dorm councils for similar grants.

The funds will be used, according to program coordinator Larry Kramer, "to allow us to begin to compile all the necessary information on scholarships and education we can to bring into the schools with us when we go, on Feb. 17."

Kramer and Jon Lazar, the program's school system coordinator, will meet with the director of guidance of the Syracuse school system today at 2:30 p.m. to iron out details of the program.

"We begin work on the second phase now," stated Kramer, "We will start recruiting people for the actual job of going into the school system and talking to kids. We are planning an orientation program designed to acquaint all our discussion leaders to the problems they'll be encountering."

Those interested in participating should contact any of the following freshmen: Larry Kramer, X3214; Lou Tambakos, X3210; Jon Lazar, X2022; Howie Lippman, X2884; or Ellye Manowitz, X2188.

Centennial Medals to be awarded to Steigers

Syracuse University announced today that it will award Centennial Medals to film stars Rod Steiger and Claire Bloom Feb 6.

The presentations will be made to the acting couple by Chancellor William P. Tolley at 1:30 p.m. in the New Experimental Theatre of the University Regent Theatre complex at Irving Ave. and E. Genesee St. The ceremony will follow a luncheon given for the Steigers by students in the drama department.

The Steigers will be at the University two days, Feb. 5 and 6, for the start of an eight-day Rod Steiger Retrospective arranged by Film Forum, a campus organization directed by the Rev. Norman O. Keim.

The Centennial Medals were created in 1967 by the University's board of trustees. Syracuse University observes its 100th anniversary in 1970.

Steiger and his wife will be the first actors to receive the medal. Previous recipients include Prime Minister Egal of Somalia, art patron Joe Lowe, Philip Hofer, curator of the Houghton library at Harvard University, and several educators.

The medal is inscribed "For Outstanding Achievement" on one side along with the name of the recipient and the University's motto, "Suos Cultores Scientia Coronat" (Knowledge Crowns Those Who Seek Her). The obverse, with the inscription "Syracuse University 1870-1970 Centennial Medal," shows the oldest campus building, the Hall of Languages, home of the College of Liberal Arts.

Keim said Steiger was chosen to receive the Centennial Medal because he has brought to the craft of screen acting "a deep sense of personal integrity" as well as skill and art.

Award of the medal to Miss Bloom pays tribute to her as "the queen of the Shakespearean stage" who has translated her acting gifts to the screen, Keim said.

In a Feb. 5 ceremony the Steigers will receive certificates as guest professors in the School of Speech and Dramatic Art. They will be presented at 7:30 p.m. during a private dinner in the penthouse of Lawrinson Hall by Dr. Ray Irwin, associate dean of the School.

'The Box' planned as festival project

The School of Journalism will have a rather unique addition by the time the Festival of the Arts rolls around April 26: a huge 18-foot cube conceived by Prof. Harry McLaughlin and planned as a student-administered psycho-project.

The Box, as it is affectionately called by its father, will house a series of participation events from Arpil 26 to May 3, including The Great Put-On, The Screen Scene, The Negative Space, and The Boob Tube Cube. WAER and WCNY-TV will be among the groups actually working from within the confines of The Box, which will sit squarely in Newhouse lobby.

McLaughlin has invited all students, especially those in journalism and members of professional journalistic societies Sigma Delta Chi or Theta Sigma Phi, to a planning meeting in A-1 Newhouse tonight. Dress is psychedelic and "way-out movies" will be shown. Though the announced time for the meeting is 7, a reliable source told the Daily Orange by telepathy that the flicks will start shortly after 6:30 p.m.

SDX President Dan Schlossberg and Theta Sig President Jill Purtell will introduce McLaughlin, who in turn will introduce The Box. The Box will then address the audience.

Coordinators will be selected for the various projects to be housed in The Box, including:

The Great Put-On--Sat., Aor. 26, 1 to 4 p.m., The Box becomes the world's largest bulletin board and shakes to psycho-music while students scrawl graffiti on its exterior. Meanwhile,

The Screen Scene will be happening inside, This multimedia presentation covers most aspects of communication from the beginnings of life through 3000 A.D. This exhibit will last until Monday when it will be replaced by

The Press Box - a newspaper office staffed with reporters who will interview visitors. Stories and wire-service copy (arrangements are being made with UPI to move their machine into the lobby temporarily) will be edited and type-set on the spot and visitors will be invited to try their luck at instant journalism.

By Wednesday, The Negative Space will be installed so that students can have their picture taken, take the photographer's picture, and see ultra-modern techniques of photography.

The Boob Tube Cube, slated for Friday and Saturday, May 2 and 3, will feature live broadcasts of WCNY television and WAER. Visitors may be interviewed and see their work played back on videotape.

The Box of Tricks is operating under a $600 budget, $400 from the J-school and an additional $200 from the Festival of the Arts Committee. Project coordinator Erik Collins, Design Director Don Newgren, and Public Relations Director Ken Sheinkopf are helping to get it off the ground.

Prizes established in honor of Arnold

A new national awards competition in newspaper typography, open to weekly and daily newspapers, will honor Professor Edmund C. Arnold, chairman of the graphic arts department at the Syracuse University School of Journalism.

The awards have been established by Newspaper Editorial Workshop Services (NEWS) of La Jolla, Calif. Announcement of the competition was made by its director, Robert A. Juran, a 1952 graduate of Syracuse University.

Juran said Prof. Arnold is considered the outstanding authority in the United States, and perhaps in the world, on newspaper design. Arnold's "Functional Newspaper Design," which won the George Polk Memorial Award, is considered the standard modern text on newspaper typography. His latest book, "Modern Newspaper Design," will be published in June by Harper & Row. He has helped redesign the formats of such papers as The National Observer, Christian Science Monitor, the Toronto (Ont.) Star and the Chicago Daily News.

Arnold said, "The typography of newspapers is one most Americans come in contact with frequently, and anything that raises the standard is important. We think of typography in books and high class direct mail but forget it involves newspapers as well. Typography affects public taste as much as good music on radio stations. Thus, these awards can perform a very useful service."

Juran was a School of Journalism student before Arnold joined the faculty in 1960. A typographic designer and consultant and longtime newspaper editor, Juran has operated the Newspaper Editorial Workshop Services since 1965.

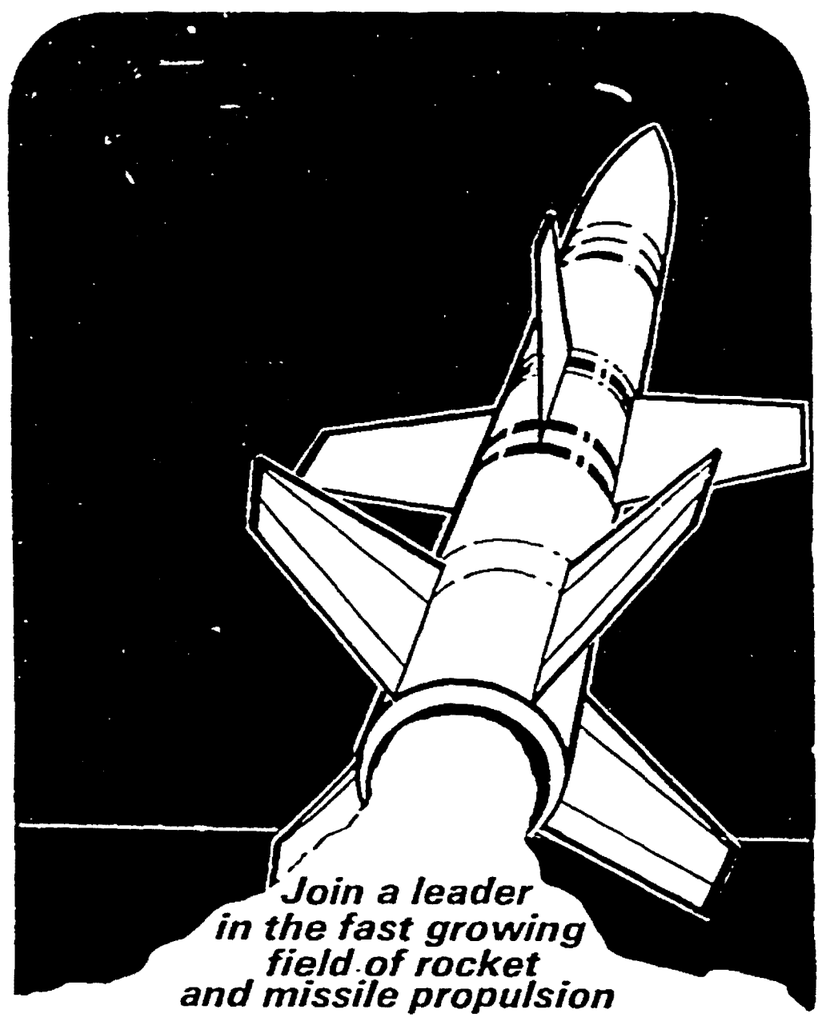
New WAER program devoted to blues

Pop music is doing things it has never done before. Everyday, someone comes up with something new. But, for the first time, as music moves ahead, it is also looking back and making its audience aware of its roots—the greatest of which is blues.



For the first time in this area, there is now a radio program devoted totally to the blues. It is called Over Yonder's Wall, and it happens every Tuesday night from 7 to 9:20 on WAER, beginning this evening.

Over Yonder's Wall will be looking at every form of the blues, most of which have yet to attract wide audiences, and will also keep abreast of new things happening to the blues.

The forms of the blues are widely varied, so much that little can be really said well here. It can, however, be loosely fitted into several catagories: the country blues; the urban blues (old and new); white blues; and what one might call progressive blues, for lack of a better term. They all make up Over Yonder's Wall.

From each of these groups there are outstanding names which gaive a closer, though still incomplete, view of the material in the program. From the archaic country blues come names like Robert Johnson, Son House and Skip James. The older urban bluesmen include Muddy Waters, Elmore James, John Lee Hooker, and crossing the path to the newer artists, B.B. King.

Among those making the music that keep the blues vibrant today are Junior Wells, Buddy Guy, and Otis Rush. Progressive artists, all but the last one white, include John Hammond, Eric Clapton, Savoy Brown, Ten Years After, and the best known of all, Jimi Hendrix.

EXPLORE the potential for professional achievement at the Naval Ordnance Station, Indian Head Maryland

Few technical fields offer you as many opportunities for an exciting and rewarding career as the rapidly growing field of chemical propulsion. Indian Head is a recognized leader in research, development, production, and evaluation of propellants and rocket propulsion systems and has advanced the state-of-the-art of chemical propulsion through participation with the Department of Defense and NASA. Indian Head has made important contributions to the Polaris, Poseidon, and Sidewinder propulsion systems as well as virtually every missile system in use by the Fleet today.

Located 25 miles south of Washington, D.C. Indian Head is close to the cultural, social, and scientific advantages of the Nation's Capital offering opportunities for pleasant suburban or country life near mountain and shore resorts.

fund, the operating budget, rising costs and the national economy's health in general figure as importantly and probably more so than do total assests.

SU's endownment fund, which includes stocks, bonds and taxable real estate has a market value of $60 million. But, said Wingate, "It should be three times this size in view of the university's current operating budget of $70 million."

Rising costs, according to Wingate, are the major factor for today's increasing financial pressure, particularly in the realms of faculty salaries and educational equipment and facilities.

In attempting to adjust to these financial pressures, said Wingate, the university is seeking greater federal and state government support, alumni and business support and has "done some belt-tightening," partly by deferring physical maintenance.

SU also is attempting to modernize the management of the university endowment by splitting its main security portfolio in half and turning each portion over to a "nationally known investment counsel." And, said Wingate, by orienting its investment program toward equities rather than fixed income securities, officials are confident that the endowment fund's purchasing power can be maintained "and even increased" in today's inflationary economy.

WAER starts semester with daily soul sound

WAER-FM is starting off the spring semester of programming with the sounds of rhythm and blues every afternoon from 2 until 4:30. Executive producer Mike Fisher promises to make WAER "The Soul Sound in Syracuse."

News is presented at 4:30 for a full half-hour. During the early evenings, the Department of Public Affairs will offer discussion, interview and telephone call-in shows from 5 until 6 p.m. when the exciting world of Broadway is exposed and aired Monday through Thursday.

Folk also has a large slice of WAER's programming schedule from 7:30 until 9:20 Monday through Thursday. For jazz buffs, there is jazz Monday through Thursday at 9:30 until 11:25, when the nationally-known telephone talk program ' Night Call" is presented live from New York. (Call in questions collect: (212-) 749-3311).

To fully participate in offerings of the National Educational Radio Network, of which WAER-FM is a member, WAER-FM presents various programs of interest, after Night Call, at 12:30 a.m.

On the weekends, programming begins at 11 a.m. During Saturday and Sunday, children's programming takes up most of the mornings, with Rhythm and Blues on Saturday afternoon at 2. Both evenings are devoted to "Underground Music."

Senators get Rick Cassata in draft

By DAN SCHLOSSBERG

Rick Cassata, who led the baseball Orange with a .352 batting average last spring before leaving for a successful season with the Saskatchewan Rough Riders football team, may become heir apparent to Washington Senators third-baseman Ken McMullen.

The 23-year-old native of Tonawanda, N.Y. was drafted Saturday by the Washington club and, according to Senators farm director Hal Keller, will train with the Nats if he signs with the team.

RICK CASSATA

Cassata, a standout quarterback for Ben Schwartzwalder's football team for three years, played only one season of baseball for Andy Mogish, but it was a big one. In addition to his batting average, he paced the club in stolen bases (7), hits (32) and runs scored (31). He tied Lou Marcoccia for the lead in doubles with six.

Though he played shortstop — and had one unsuccessful pitching assignment — Cassata was drafted as a thirdbaseman.

"We think that's his best position," said Keller from the Senators' office. "But we'll see what happens in spring training. We want to do a little experimenting."

Keller said Cassata would probably be assigned to Savannah (Class AA) or Burlington (Class A) if he signed with Washington.

Cassata was unavailable for comment on his selection, but his mother, contacted in her Tonawanda home, expressed delight with her son's selection.

"We're in a state of shock over here," she said, "my son, Joe, called us from law school in Cincinnati to tell us about Rick. He saw it in The New York Times. That's really about all we know.

"What's Rick's reaction? He's thrilled, who wouldn't be? I think he could play both sports, he loves them so much."

Mrs. Cassata said Rick planned to play basketball after work yesterday, primarily to get in shape for whatever professional sport he'd try in 1969.

Also ecstatic about Cassata's selection is his college baseball coach, Andy Mogish. The coach recalled that the sight of Cassata taking batting practice in the cage at Manley Fieldhouse always drew a crowd of teammates who wanted to watch his picture swing.

It was Mogish, too, who told Cassata last season that he should consider himself a thirdbaseman rather than a shortstop. The Senators apparently think that way.

"Rick was a tremendous competitor and a great leader," Mogish said. "He was always hustling. He learns quickly, too, and htat's one of the reasons I think he has a pretty good shot at making it."

Cassata, a righthander all the way, stands 6-1 and weights 187. He could conceivably be in line for the Washington third base job two or three years hence if sluggine Ken McMullen or slick-fielding Ed Brinkman is traded. Cassata combines both talents and owns a rifle arm which can nip speedy runners on infield grounders.

All this, however, is speculation, for Cassata won't even be asked for his signature on a Senators contract until later this week, according to Keller. But the big boy from last year's SU club does indeed have a chance to join the list of Syracuse alums in the majors, among them Dave Giusti (Cardinals), Doug Clemens (Phillies), Bill Connors (Mets), and Ed Barnowski (Orioles), and Ed Mantie (Giants). The latter is also a graduate of the 1968 SU crew, for whom he posted a 3-0 pitching mark, 0.90 earned run average, and a sensational 31 strikeouts in 20 innings of work.

DAN'S DATA: Yesterday was the first day of spring practice. Baseball season opens in the South April 1... Coach Mogish says the 20game slate listed in Dates and Data has been expanded... Lefthander Dave Stone (4-2 with the frosh) lends balance to the starting rotation of Greg Lowe, John Martell, and Mike Barlow... Lowe and Martell are co-captains... Catcher Jim Gordon has looked good at first base.

Suspensions, injuries stymie wrestling team's high hopes

By BOB GALLAGHER

The SU varsity wrestling team was stuck with its third straight loss and fourth of the season last Saturday as Army pinned them 38-6 further ruining an already disappointing season.

In October the wrestling team began practicing with a solid team for what was hoped to be a successful season. In December, after tying Northern Illinois for the team title in the rugged Coast Guard Wrestling Tournament, the grapplers were considered by many to be the best in the East. The new year brought disaster instead of fulfillment.

Academics, injuries and suspensions took their toll knocking six first stringers off the team. Vinnie Paolano, a first place finisher at the Coast Guard, was declared ineligible but will return to action Feb. 12. Another first place finisher at the Coast Guard Tournament Woody Barry quit school after the first semester.

Captain John Terboss and Richie Haagen, a sophomore who was Freshmen Eastern Champion at 137 pounds, were injured at the Coast Guard Tourney. Terboss had torn ligaments in his knee but it is hoped he can come back in time for the Eastern Championships March 14-15. Haagen suffered a shoulder seperation and has since left school. Glenn Bateman the replacement for Paolano at 177 pounds has been hobbled by a knee injury.

Another Coast Guard champion, Steve Parker, and Ralph Manaker, a runnerup the previous year, were suspended from the team for the remainder of the season.

With the team thus handicapped the only consistent winners have been senior Eric Greenberg 8-1-2 and Bob Rust, a junior 5-0.

Greenberg began the season at 145 pounds where he finished in the runnerup spot at the Coast Guard Tourney but due to the various maladies effecting the team he moved up a weight class to 152 pounds.

Although wrestling at the higher weight class makes it easier to make weight it also has some disadvantages. "I'm wrestling bigger and stronger guys now," Greenberg said. "Most of them," he said, "lose 20 pounds to make the 152 pound limit while I pull only a few pounds because that's almost my normal weight."

While at 152 pounds Greenberg has an impressive record. Last Saturday in the loss to Army Greenberg earned SU's first three points with a 1-0 victory over Mark Hoffman, who was third in the East last year Greenberg got an escape with 15 seconds remaining in the match to earn his victory. The week before against Lehigh's Tommie Muir, second in the East last year, Greenberg had a 1-1 draw.

Since Greenberg is going back down to 145 for the Eastern Championships he still feels it is helpful for him to be wrestling up a weight class. He said, "wrestling the bigger boys will aid my conditioning and make it easier when I go against the lighter opponents." It will hurt him however when they make up the seeding for the 145 pound class at the Eastern's because he will be at a disadvantage since they are based on who you wrestle in that weight class.

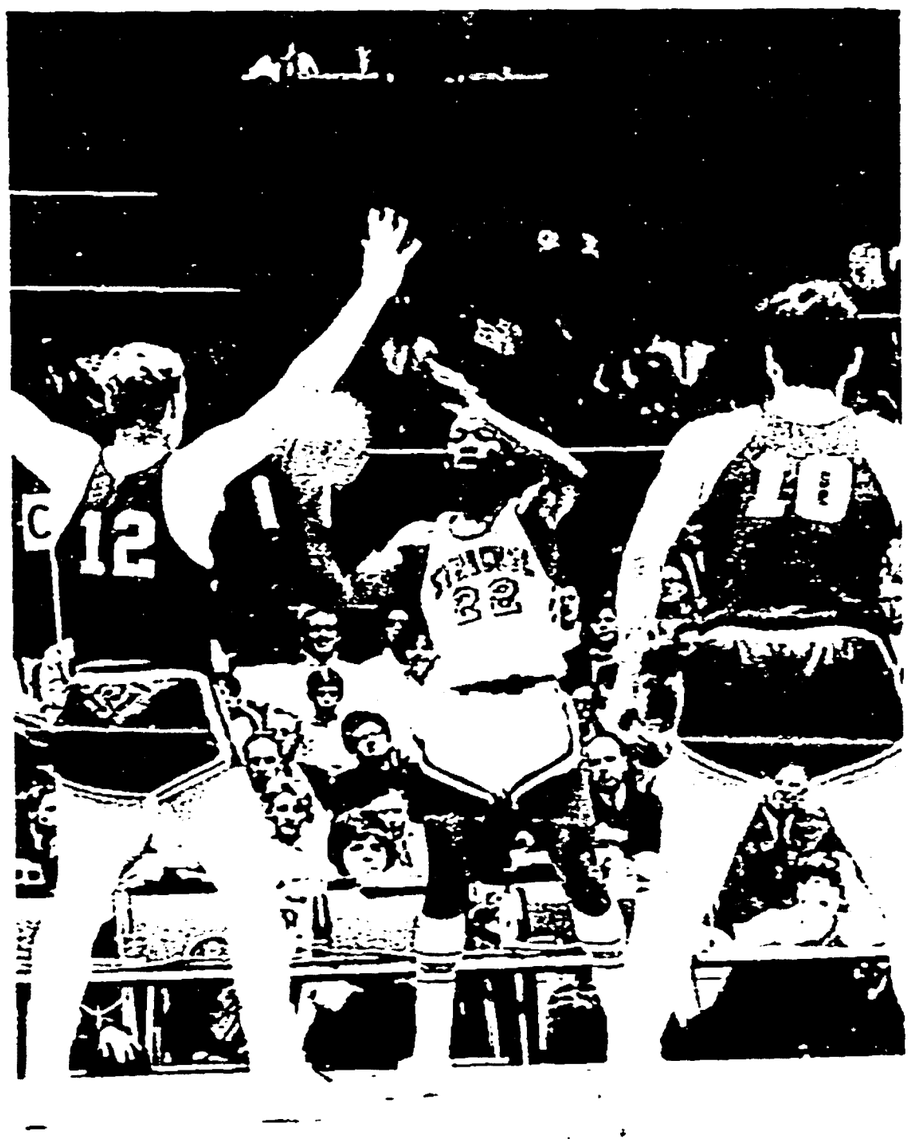
In going down to 145 Greenberg faces a problem common to all wrestlers that of making weight. "The major problem with pulling weight, he said, "is it makes you weaker. In pulling weight I worry more about losing the weight rather than about doing the drills and contact work which puts a wrestler in condition to wrestle.

Conditioning is a very important aspect of sports. In most sports however their are timeouts or other periods of time when no action is taking place so a participant may rest. In wrestling there is no such time. Greenberg stated, "conditioning is 90% of wrestling. The guy who can go real hard in the last period should win."

In an individual sport like wrestling each individual must get himself up mentally for each match. Greenberg said, "I'm always nervous before the match. I've been wrestling for nine years so I know I have the necessary wrestling ability." He continued, "I go out to wrestle with the idea that nobody can beat me if I wrestle my type of match. I try to prove this to myself each week."

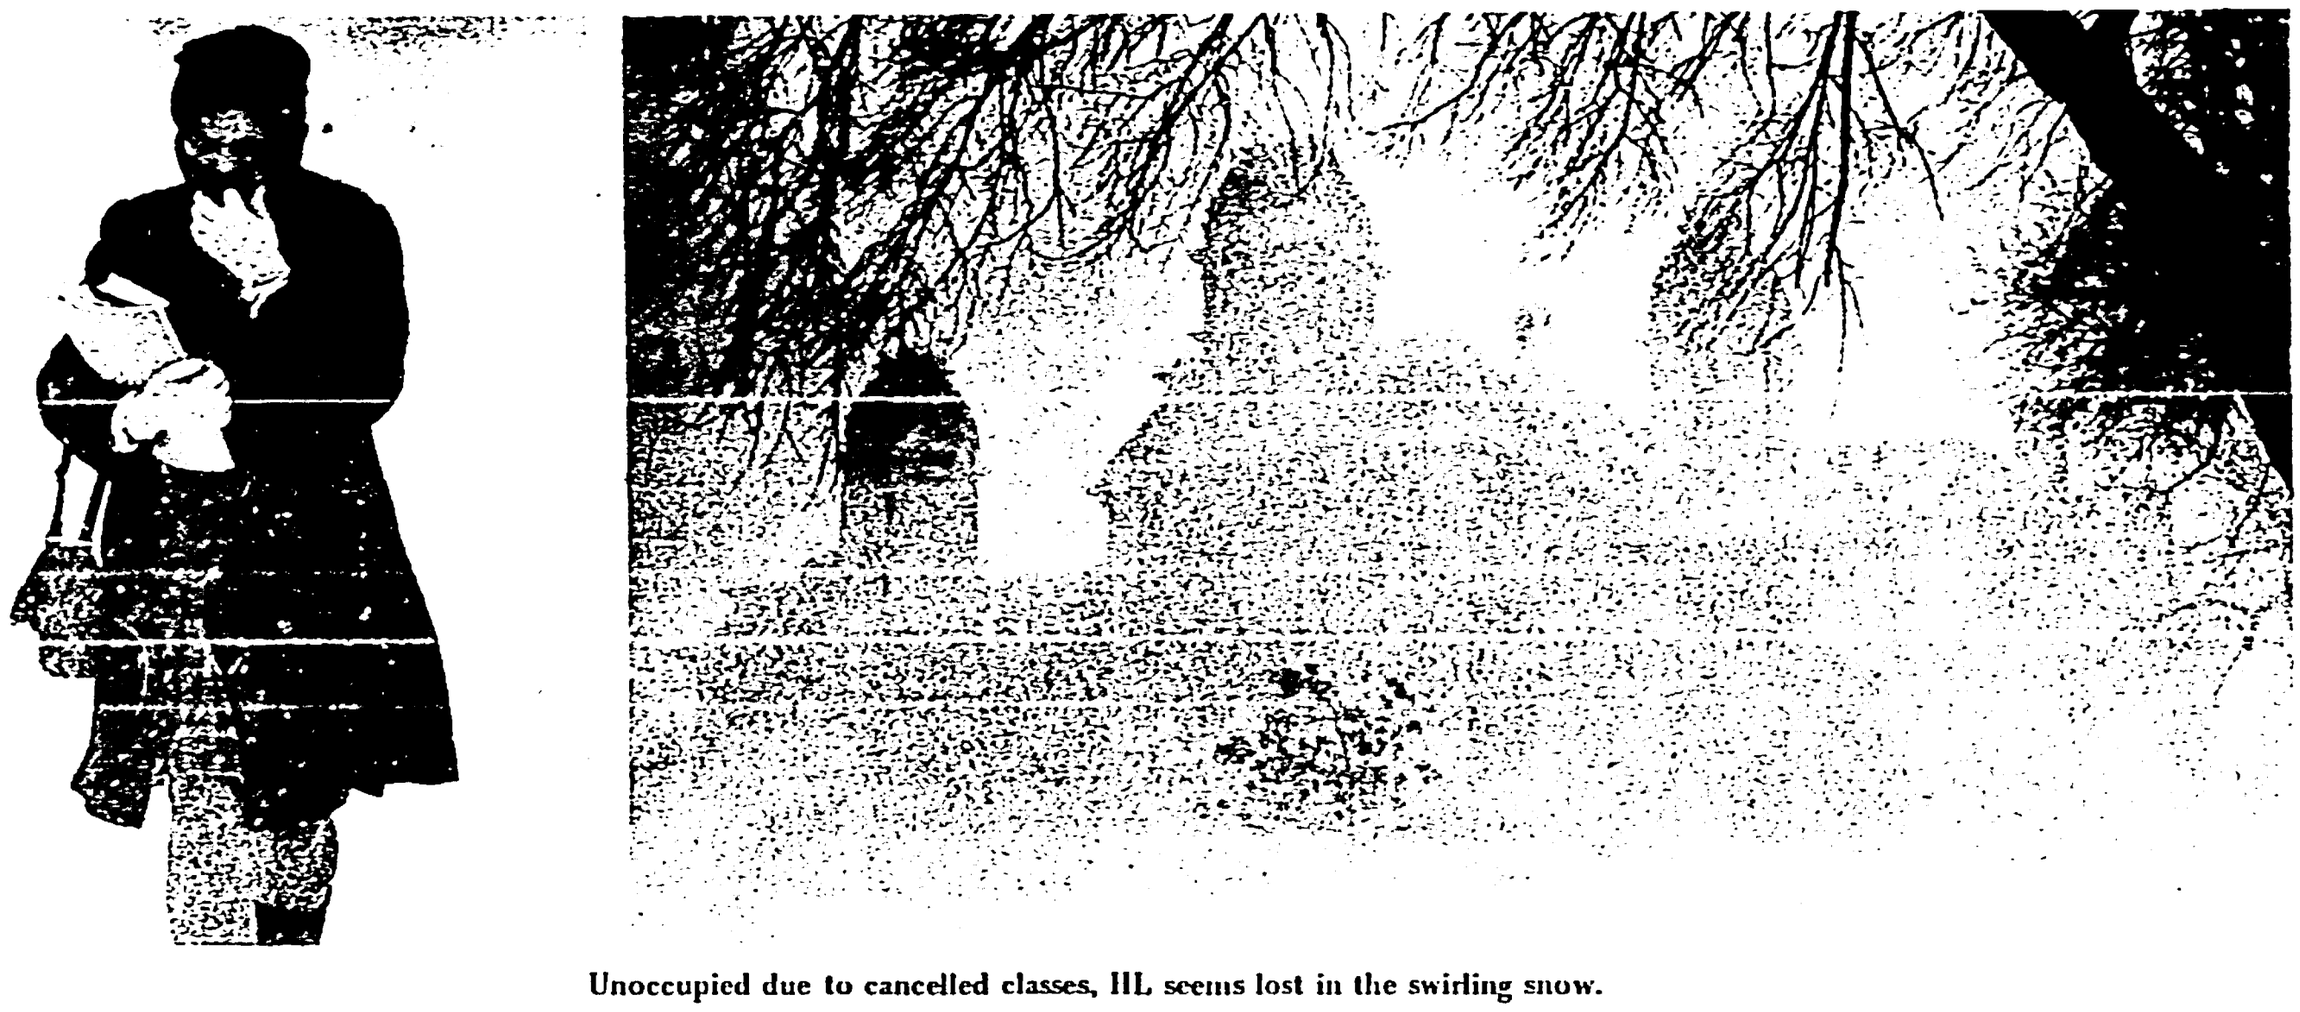
Greenberg always tries to plan each match. In the first period he tries for a takedown. "I try to put the other man on the defensive," he said, "but if my opponent is stronger I play a little more defense than I do with a weaker man." He uses a single leg takedown. Greenberg stated, "I try my takedown by going for the lead leg of my opponent."

In the second period if Greenberg has the choice of top or bottom he chooses the bottom. "I usually have more energy in the second period than I will in the third so I will have an easier time getting an escape or reversal in the second rather than the third period. While I'm on the bottom I keep moving to keep the other guy on the defensive," Greenberg said.



In the final period Greenberg tries to ride his opponent out, stay on top of him, for as long as he possibly can. He said, "I will give up one point for an escape but will try to prevent the man from getting a reversal on me. If the score is close I will also try for an insurance takedown."

A wrestler's moves and the efficiency with which he performs them are of vital importance to his success. "I work on many different moves," Greenberg said, "but I have a few in which I have the most confidence. The others I use when my regular ones aren't working."



The wrestling season has been disappointing this year. Greenberg regrets what has happened to the team but has not given up. He stated, "After the Coast Guard's we were the best team in the East. The team was solid all the way down the line and this helped to build confidence among the team members."

Although team morale is low Greenberg is still glad he is a member of the team. "All the guys have desire. They practice hard everyday and they want to wrestle for SU no matter who they have to wrestle against," he said.

Greenberg has some personal goals for this season. He said, "I hope Bobby Rust and I can go on to win the Easterns and then go to the Nationals in Utah at Brigham Young University. I want to repay the coach and the school for the confidence they have shown in me.'

MANY HAPPY RETURNS have been made before, but the return of Ernie Austin on Saturday brought the only smile of the night to coach Roy Danforth. Austin is being hemmed in by UMass guards Ray Ellerbrook and Joe DiSarcina, just as the Orange were hemmed in by the Redmen all night. (Photo by Clemens)

Heavy snowfall cancels classes

By RONI ZLOKOWER

Just three days into "spring" semester, students, faculty members, and most university administrators and workers, received an unexpected one day vacation -- a result of icy roads and a snow storm which began Monday afternoon.

The initial decision to close the University until noon was made at about 8 a.m. according to Vice-Chancellor Piskor, when it was clear to officials that poor visibility and icy road conditions would make driving hazardous for anyone travelling to the University. About mid-morning, buildings and grounds crew workers reported that they would need an entire day to clear out parking lots and driveways in order to accommodate incoming traffic.

At noon, officials reconsidered the problems caused by traffic in the city and suburbs and the poor condition of the campus. Feeling that a large number of people would be affected by these problems, a final decision was made to cancel classes at the main campus and at University College for the remainder of the day.

While most offices at the University were closed, buildings and grounds crews and security guards worked all day. Food Service, Health Service, and the telephone operator service functioned as usual and the library remained open.

The closing down of the university is a group decision involving both academic and non-academic consideration. Victor Colway, comptroller, and Francis A. Wingate, treasurer, are primarily concerned with the non-academic effects of a close-down, while Chancellor Tolley and Vice-Chancellor and Provost Piskor evaluate the academic aspects of the decision. The general SU policy in regard to official closedowns is "to stay open if at all possible."

Some special problems arose both before and after the decision to close had been made. University College had to be closed on its first day of classes, and late registration further delayed. Decisions had to be made locally in Poughkeepsie, Endicott, Rome, and Utica, where branches of the University are located. The closing down of the College of Forestry had to be cleared with State University officials.

Veterans of Syracuse winters could cite only two other instances in the history of SU when the University had been forced to close, in 1947 and in 1966. In 1966, a huge blizzard caused a three-day delay in registration. During that blizzard, many students and faculty were stranded while returning to the University after intersession. Rescue teams had been organized to get students from travel stops back to school, while volunteer snow brigades worked on campus in clearing away huge drifts. One sorority delivered groceries to families within two miles of the campus who were unable to reach food supplies.

Yesterday, some students studied and rested while others walked, frolicked, and played football in the snow. Students whose dreams of spring had been enhanced by recent rainfall, hibernated in warm rooms while smiling skiiers spoke of the long winter ahead.

Below-normal attendance was reported at the library.

Dorm autonomy issue debated this Friday

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

Dorm autonomy, the issue of total control of dorm life by dorm councils, has slowly developed as a major issue this year among student leaders and administrators, and will finally surface with formal proposals before the Council on Student Life (CSL) on Friday.

In its perfect form, dorm autonomy allows students in every living center the opportunity to make all major decisions regulating where and when alcoholic beverages can be consumed, when visiting hours shall be, if there will be curfews and how students shall be treated for disciplinary infractions. It implies total self-government and regulation.

Most student leaders, especially those on CSL, support the idea of dorm autonomy. Cindy Bailey, president of the Association of Women Students, calls it a "beautiful" ideal concept. Ed Feldman, speaker of Student Senate describes it as "government for students by and of their peers." To Inter-Dormitory Council (IDC) President Peg Johnston, it is a "total change of atmosphere."

Student opinion is not unamious, however. Stephen Tober, president of the Booth Dorm Council, wrote in a Daily Orange column yesterday that granting this much power to the individual dorms was to deny man's basic need for a "strong centralized system of checks and balances."

The administration policy doesn't impress others as promising. In Feldman's opinion, "The administration treats people like puppets." He agreed with Tober's comments on the need for a centralized system, but said it can be provided by Student Government. By supporting SG in that role, he thought students would be insuring that the plan was a total student effort.

Miss Bailey said that no regulation of students was "meaningful unless the students are participating." She suggested that present regulations were meaningless and that exercising dorm autonomy would be an education for students.

The major impetus for the adoption of the dorm autonomy plan will have to come from students. CSL student members have talked with dorm councils and most seem favorable with the exception of Booth. After the proposal is presented on Friday, CSL student members will sit back and wait. "We are not professional revolutionaries," said Feldman.

Bailey said CSL student members are only interested in "promoting the concept" of dorm autonomy. "If councils want to pick it up, good for them." She and Feldman indicated that CSL student members would be willing to help dorms draw up their constitutions should they decide to follow through.

When the constitutions for the dorms are drawn, it will be the duty of Interdorm Council and ultimately Student Senate to approve them. Feldman has suggested that dorms should follow this procedure even if the university doesn't approve dorm autonomy.

Compromise on the autonomy issue is not yet a consideration with those interviewed. Miss Johnston said, "You're talking about a change of atmosphere and you can't do it piecemeal."

Make citizens aware

ISO's Great Decisions focus on world crises

The International Student Organization tomorrow night will begin a searching look at eight of the world's current crises and developments.

At 8 p.m. the ISO, in its annual Great Decisions program, will present "Czechoslovakia, Russia and Eastern Europe: what outlook for East-West co-existence?" The program will follow a group discussion format, and the University community is invited.

Prof. Michael Thomas, of the Business School, will lead the discussion, and, according to program organizers, experts on the topic, including Czech students, will attend.

But, said ISO president Emmanuel Anise, "this program is based upon the participation of people with limited knowledge." The aim of Great Decisions, he said, is to educate. A booklet has been prepared on each topic and is available as an aid for discussion.

The Great Decisions program, which was initiated last year, is a kind of outlet for the Foreign Policy Association, a private Washington-based nonprofit organization whose interest is to supply civic and religious organizations and schools and colleges with information on major policy issues. "It tries to make citizens aware of the problems," Anis said.

The ISO selects issues from suggestions of the Foreign Policy Association, Anise said. "The topics are of current significance and great interest," he added.

They include: "Canada under Trudeau" (Feb. 13), "Africa, Asia and the Development Decade" (Feb. 20), "Southeast Asia" (Feb. 27), "Western Europe and the U.S." (March 6), "Cuba-the Castro Decade" (March 13), "The Middle East Tinderbox" (March 20) and "Dissent, Democracy and Foreign Policy" (March 27).

All programs will be at the ISO center, 230 Euclid Ave.

In other ISO activity, a tentative schedule for the annual International Week has been established. It will open March 1 with a mixer and March 4 with a foreign film. On March 5 Prof. Halim El Dabh of Howard University will give a presentation on the drums and piano, and the Indonesian ambassador to the United Nations will speak the next day. March 8 and 9 have been chosen for a Grant Auditorium talent show and a world's fair and fashion show.

Also in the international realm, the World Affairs Council will sponsor a panel discussion, featuring Peace Corps returnees, at 8 p.m., Feb. 19 at May Memorial Church. The returnees will discuss how African nations view American foreign policy.

Welcome, Mr. and Mrs. Steiger

Most of us already know Rod Steiger from "The Pawnbroker," "Doctor Zhivago" and "In the Heat of the Night" so his visit here is more like a rendezvous with an old friend than an introduction to a stranger.

We remember seeing him on the Tonight Show during Christmas vacation, unpretentious and candidly explaining why he carried a cigarette, even though he didn't smoke, to relieve his tension before the camera.

"The best actors I know are those who try to talk to the audience, make the audience feel and discover feelings – actors who understand their audience and excite it. I feel that actors of this kind will be the same offstage as on; they will attempt to do the same thing with anybody." This is the way we expect him to be during his visit here.

His visit also marks the maturation of the retrospective idea. This is the second retrospective Film Forum has sponsored. Its' first was the visit of Henry Fonda to campus last spring and the showing of his films.

Thanks to Film Forum, University Union and Hillel, film enjoys the spotlight of the arts at Syracuse. "What we are doing now is showing the best of the art-type pictures, many of which ordinarily do not come to a town like Syracuse," commented Rev. Norman Keim of Film Forum.

A retrospective deepens this basic interest in film by allowing an audience to watch the development of an actor through his old films and also to encounter him face to face as in "An Evening With the Steigers."

Or in the words of an old film aficionado, Jason Squire, "The campus is a perfect place for something like this--the excitement for film is right here."

Rod Steiger on acting

Editor's note: The following quotation by Rod Steiger is taken from "The Player--A Profile of an Art" by L. and H. Ross, Simon and Schuster.

"I believe in what I do. In the social structure that exists today, it's so difficult for a person to work at what he believes in and loves and still make a living. If you want to act for no other reason than to be among the happy few who are able to be beautiful in their art, then learn to be honest with yourself and act. For the first twenty-one years of my life, I never thought of actors as being anything but golden people from another world; I didn't know they were really alive. When I was told that people study acting, it came as a great surprise to me. I have my own credo for acting. I believe the actor can, through the medium of acting, exchange his discoveries about himself with his fellow-man. I believe that an actor who disregards his responsibility, that of truthfully attempting to communicate, and 'acts for a living,' ceases to exist as a creative artist. I know that all of us fail over and over again when we attempt to communicate, but we must always insist on attempting it. If an actor has one inspired moment in a performance, I'd say he's good. If he has two inspired moments, he's great. If he has none, he's going to bore himself to death. The actor really lives for those inspired moments."

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

Congratulations to John Wisniewski on his exceptionally stupid anaylsis of the Beatles latest album, "The Beatles." It's nice to know that there are still people who are naive enough to believe that everything in life has a singular, concrete meaning. I thank Mr. Wisniewski for interpreting the songs of this album for me and the rest of the students at Syracuse. It would indeed be tragic if there were no reviews of this nature for we would then be forced to get our own "message" out of the album.

This article was printed as a personal opinion, which we are all intitled to present. My opinion, Mr. Wisniewski, is that you are wrong; dead wrong.

Bob Cullen

To the Editor:

In reference to Jacques Lebel's recent article, I must register a mild protest. Mr. Lebel stated that the "ROTC Gestapo," goose-stepping around the upstairs gym in Archbold, prevented him from playing basketball. As a matter of fact, ROTC cadets have had drill in this gym less than five times this year.

His comparison of ROTC cadets to Gestapo is as tasteless as it is absurd. The Gestapo, or Nazi secret police, neither goose-stepped nor even wore uniforms. The terrorist and underhanded techniques they employed are hardly comparable to the activities of cadets in the ROTC program.

I realize that Mr. Lebel was just trying to be clever. I hope next time he will find out a few facts before he makes short-sighted blanket condemnations which have no basis whatsoever.

Nixon's dilemma

Pres. v. Press

By Bob Tembeckjian

A few moments before his first press conference as President, Richard Nixon was reviewing the statement he had prepared. A friend of mine, who wishes to remain anonymous, told me what went on.

"Now, let me make one thing very clear, Spiro. I don't want you to say a word at this press conference. If you've been to one, you've been to them all, and I know clearly and precisely how hard they can be."

"What will you say, Mr. President?"

"Well, let me be perfectly frank. I want the press and all America to know exactly where I stand on all the issues."

"Can't I be the first to know?"

"Yes. Let me just read you a few passages from my text. 'When I ran for the Presidency, I sensed the American people wanted a change. My friends, I am convinced, even after taking office, that the American people still want a change. Of course, when I ran I made it very clear that a Republican administration could clean up the mess in Washington. And let me say that I am disappointed in the way this present administration is moving."

"But Mr. Nixon," said Agnew. "You are the present administration."

"Oh. I forgot. I've spent so many years criticizing the government that I can't get used to the fact that I am the government now. I guess you can't teach an old dog new tricks."

"Let's keep Checkers out of this."

"Yes. I'll just ad lib. Let's have a dress rehearsal. You play the press and I'll play President Johnson--err, I mean President Nixon."

"O.K. Go."

"My friends, many years ago, a young boy in California would go to sleep hungry at night, listening to the distant whistle of a freight train. And he dreamt of one day following that train all the way to Washington. That boy, however, did not only dream. No, he was an all-American lad, a regular Alger Hiss--err, I mean Horatio Alger--who worked his way through school. He helped his mother in the kitchen. He walked the dog. He played football, baseball and basketball with the neighborhood kids. And friends, tonight that boy stands before you..."

"But Mr. President. You used that speech at the convention. Don't you think you should wait a while before you use it again?"

"Yes. Well, how about this--My friends of the press who have been very fair with me in this campaign, who have accurately quoted and represented my views, let me say this. Now that I am President; now that my words have some real meaning; now that the great and powerful machinery of the American government is in my command, I don't think I should make any statements that might be misrepresented or misinterpreted by the communists as long as one of our soldiers' lives might be in danger. And until the Paris talks are ended, I don't think it would be proper for me to comment on the war. Let's not undermine our peace efforts."

"That's good, Mr. President. Are you ready to go in?"

"Yes. I'm ready."

Nixon then motioned to an aide.

"Are the press ready for me?"

"There's no one in there. Mr. President," the aide replied.

"What do you mean? Where did they go?"

"I don't know, but they left this message."

Nixon took the note and read it aloud.

"'Dear Mr. Nixon: You won't have the members of the press to kick around any more because this is our last press conference.'"

Next thing they'll fight over is who's going to play King Arthur

Melange of roles

Squire: Remarkable range of Steiger makes him greatest actor

Jason Squire, coordinator for the Rod Steiger Retrospective which starts here today considers Steiger the greatest living American actor.

In an interview, Squire, a senior majoring in television and radio, explained why: "Steiger has remarkable range and always selects roles which broaden his dimensions as an actor. A good example is a comparison between Nazerman, the elderly, anguished pawnbroker, and Bill Gillespie, the bigoted southern police chief in 'In the Heat of the Night.'"

Squire, who has acted in campus and educational television productions, added: "In 'The Pawnbroker,' I remember marveling at Steiger's use of facial muscles which I never even knew existed. In 'No Way to Treat a Lady' there was Steiger playing in several distinct disguises, with precise dialects and physical mannerisms. Steiger conveys a great deal of pure honesty in his work.

"Every Steiger role is carefully detailed. He's remarkable with dialects, and his whole body changes in a role. For instance, there's always a different and characteristic walk. There are always mannerisms with the hands and he has an incredibly expressive face. Often he can convey lines of description with some eye movement and a twitch of the mouth.

Last year during Thanksgiving vacation Squire telephoned the actor's New York representative, seeking his reaction to a proposed Steiger retrospective. The representative, Alan Ebert, then telephoned the Rev. Norman O. Keim, director of Film Forum on the campus, and expressed interest in the project.

During Christmas vacation, Squire and Keim met the actor in New York. Over lunch, Steiger told them that he was enthusiastic about the idea of a retrospective. The film star also said his schedule and that of his wife, British-born actress Claire Bloom, gave them time to visit Syracuse University early in February, before leaving for a year in Europe. Arrangements were made for the retrospective to run for eight days, with the Steigers on campus during the first two days, today and tomorrow.

Claire Bloom to be honored tomorrow at local premiere of her 'Charly'

Claire Bloom, wife of Rod Steiger, will be guest of honor at the Syracuse premiere of "Charly," the film in which she co-stars with Cliff Robertson, tomorrow at 8:30 p.m. in the University Regent Theatre. The premiere is part of the Rod Steiger Retrospective and Claire Bloom Tribute

"Charly" is based on the short story and novel "Flowers for Algernon" by Daniel Keyes. Miss Bloom plays Alice Kinian, a night school teacher who tries to help Charly Gordon, a gentle adult with the mind of a child.

Miss Bloom's dramatic career has included many Shakespearean roles. With London's Old Vic company she played leading parts in "Romeo and Juliet," "Hamlet," "Twelfth Night," "The Tempest," "All's Well That Ends Well" and "Coriolanus."

Miss Bloom's favorite film role was in "Look Back in Anger" with Richard Burton. It was while working with him in the Broadway production of "Rashomon" that she met Rod Steiger.

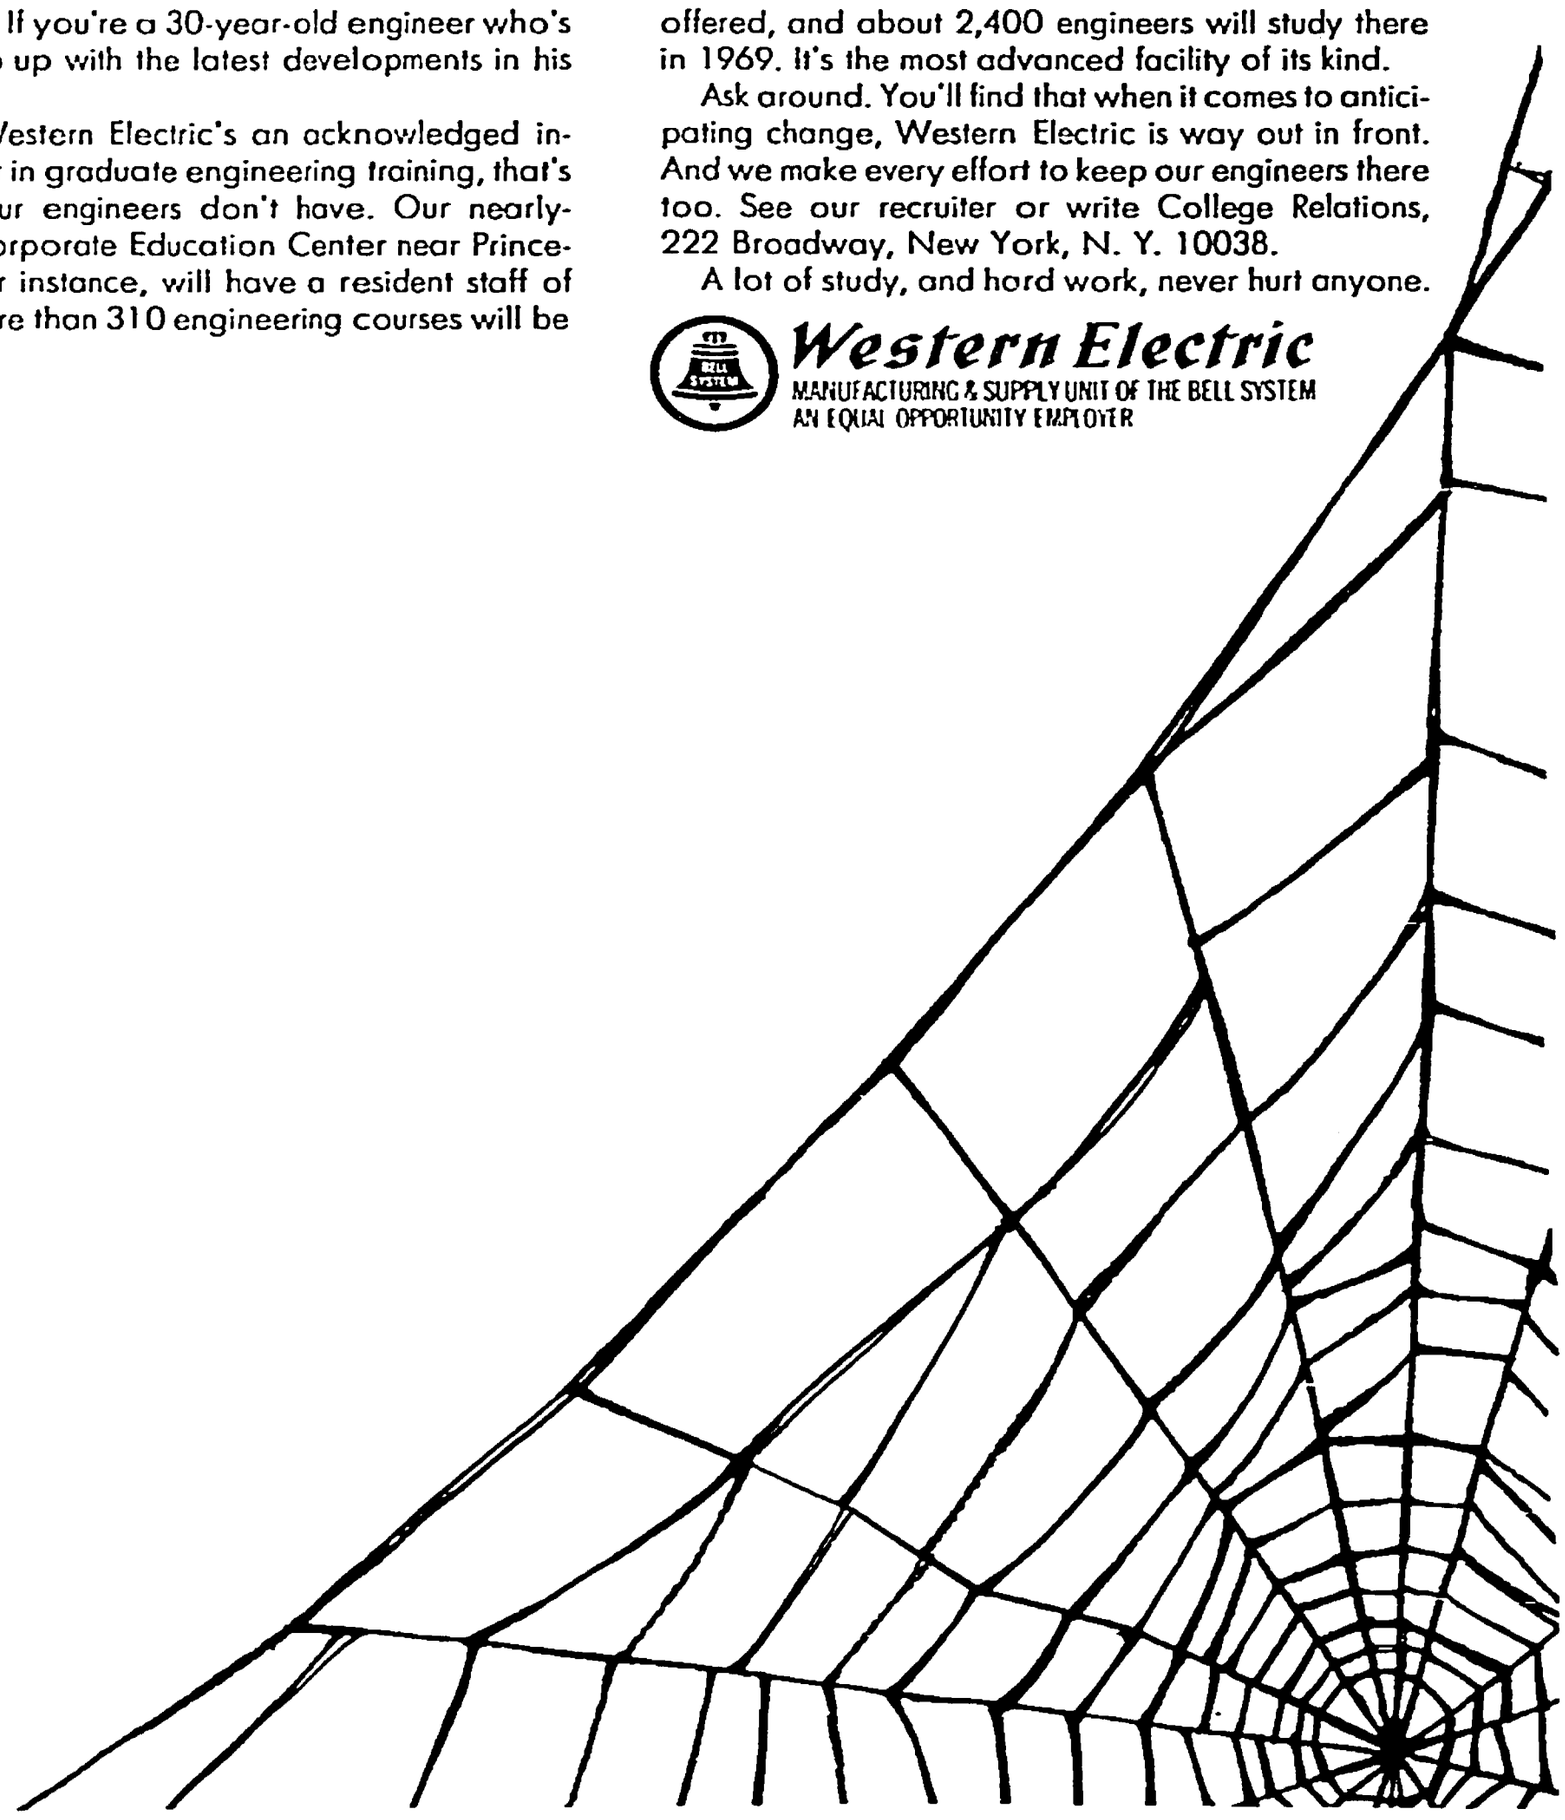
Is it possible to be passed by at 30?



Absolutely. If you're a 30-year-old engineer who's failed to keep up with the latest developments in his field.

Because Western Electric's an acknowledged industrial leader in graduate engineering training, that's one worry our engineers don't have. Our nearly-completed Corporate Education Center near Princeton, N. J., for instance, will have a resident staff of over 100. More than 310 engineering courses will be offered, and about 2,400 engineers will study there in 1969. It's the most advanced facility of its kind.

Ask around. You'll find that when it comes to anticipating change, Western Electric is way out in front. And we make every effort to keep our engineers there too. See our recruiter or write College Relations, 222 Broadway, New York, N. Y. 10038.

A lot of study, and hard work, never hurt anyone.

Union plans being sought from students

Undergraduates and graduate students will have their last chance to decide what they want in a student union building, when UU sounds out campus opinion Thursday night.

Current plans and alternatives for the building site and facilities will be explained in a presentation and discussion, headed by UU Development Director Rob Rockefeller. Students will then be invited to design a model union of their own.

Campus leaders will offer their opinions in a series of interviews with a UU panel next week. Their ideas, the comments given at Thursday's meeting, and answers from the Future Union Building Survey taken three years ago, will determine the plans for the final building.

"Students don't realize how close we are to building a student union at Syracuse," commented UU Chairman Jerry Tatarian. "We must complete our plans now to take advantage of the chances offered us. Student ideas given Thursday night will affect the campus for years to come."

The presentation will be given Thursday at 6:45 p.m. in 207 HL. All members of the university community are invited to attend.

Volunteers needed to aid children

The Syracuse Chapter of the Onondaga Association for Brain Injured Children, the student coordinators of which are SU students Jim Livingston and Beth Meyerowitz, is seeking greater student participation and greater publicity. According to Livingston, the activities of the SU group include tutoring brain-injured between the ages of six and sixteen and supervising organized games such as kickball. There is also a swimming program in which the brain-injured are taught to swim and participate in water games.

What the program accomplishes, said Livingston "is getting the children to work with each other. Some of them cannot attend school and we have found that our program has helped these kids function better in the company of other children."

There are presently 15 to 18 children enrolled in the program, which is conducted on Sundays between 2 p.m. and 5 p.m. at Corcoran High School. When they first arrive, some of the children are withdrawn, not wishing to participate in any activities. But the 15 to 18 student volunteers are almost always successful at helping the kids learn and enjoy the various games and activities, Livingston said.

Livingston hopes to receive more support from Onondaga parents' associations. He hopes this will get more people to learn about the group's work and to get more children enrolled in the program.

Projection '70

Involvement is the key

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

Progress. How does it happen? It begins with the germination of an idea. Take Projection '70, an idea which became Bob Gladden's campaign promise during his quest for sophomore class president in 1967. A successful tutor recruitment found the student volunteers. In October, 1967, one hundred children were being tutored by SU students By December the number had increased to 215. This fall students could register for Ed. 324 as a three-credit course. The program became a seven-credit course for a year's work in the program next year. Presently Projection '70 continues to explore new educational methods.

What is the key to such a successful program? Involvement. As the course has progressed in its development it has gradually geared the student-teachers toward a sense of involvement, provided them with a purpose, and has given them the experience of initiating the learning process of a child.

The object of such a tutoring session is "to find a source of motivation and a spark of interest," according to program director Bob Mussey. The one-to-one relationship, one tutor to each child, gives the tutor the opportunity to encourage the child's learning and at the same time become his friend.

These Sumner School (other side of Thornden Park) children, aged 6 to 13, will challenge the 60 tutors enrolled in this semester's course. The tutee is sometimes several years behind in his reading ability and comprehension. He is probably black and he might ask "touchy" questions about black-white relationships. He might be stubborn and inattentive or playful and mischievous. But, no matter his attitude or background, he is in desperate need of guidance.

"We don't promise you a rose garden but we do think that the chance for a relevant and exciting education here is as great as any place on campus," writes Mussey in his introduction to the new tutors for this semester.

The tutors will confront their students for the first time this week. They will begin teaching "transitional" math, a cross between "old" and "new" math, for which they have been prepared in an earlier session with Dr. John Wilson, head of the Arithmetic Clinic. The tutors will also teach reading during the semester.

Before the tutor meets the child, he will have discussed the child with last year's tutor so he will have some insight to his problems and character In-service Trainers (IST) will supervise training sessions for tutors throughout the course. The nine IST supervisors are students who have had the minimum of one semester tutoring and are headed by Gene Kane, director of training.

The tutors are instructed to emphasize the role of a teacher as a resource. In that manner, the student teachers encourage the development of student motivation or the "self-discovery" method -- where the student is led to discover things on his own.

At the same time the tutees learn how to discover things, the tutors are learning the teaching process.

Claire Bloom and Rod Steiger will make the following appearances on the SU campus, where they will meet and talk with interested students:

Wednesday, Feb. 5: 2:30 p.m. in the Noble Room of Hendricks Chapel;
3:30 p.m. in Haven Lounge;
8:30 p.m. in Gifford Auditorium at "An Evening with the Steigers", featuring clips from "The Illustrated Man."

Thursday, Feb. 6: 2:00 p.m. in the lounge of Newhouse Communication Center;
3:30 p.m. in the lounge at St. Mary's Dorm; 8:30 p.m. at the Regent Theater for the showing of "Charly", starring Claire Bloom.

The Sounds of Truth!

As the universe opens to the probing mind of man, the need for the personal message becomes more and more acute. We, all of us, hunger for internal revelation. Who are we? What are we? Where are we going? Truth becomes the sole protector of our sanity. It is constant and pure, and the one factor that will ultimately decide the future of mankind.

The philosophy behind every recording on this page is simple; state the truth in as pure and personal a performance as the talent is capable of, and let the listener accept what he can relate to. The music is gentle, strong, shy, bold, and always an honest expression of the performer's emotional and intellectual capabilities.

It is not electronic; it is not psychedelic; it is not computerized. It IS artistic expression in a free environment, and you can't help knowing it.

we mean it

when we say there's a real opportunity for you here

Before you decide what you are going to do with the new life your degree can open up for you, think about all the possible opportunities.

Don't just answer the usual questions about big company versus small company, service company versus product company, industry versus academe, or public versus private business.

Think about where you can do most of what you like best, where you can make the most meaningful change.

We think you can do it here if what you are interested in is making specific, measurable improvements in the world. We build electronic systems to communicate, gather and process data, defend the country, and study inner and outer space.

We expect that our systems approach will also help us solve some of the big problems in our day-to-day concerns like medicine, education, and city planning.

We need men and women with degrees in business administration, engineering, and liberal arts to help us realize the full potential of these systems.

We need individuals who know that formal education can never stop for system builders, who will take advantage of our many education opportunities, including prepaid tuition, in-plant graduate degree programs, and fellowships. Achievements in this atmosphere can be extremely satisfying, academically as well as personally and professionally.

Computers used by sororities

Freshman sorority rush, now in progress is almost completely computerized this year. The computer sorts sorority invitations and after the rushees accept or regret their invitations, the computer schedules their parties. In this way the parties should have a more even attendance, and the rushees should be able to visit the parties in a convenient geographical order.

Rush began Monday, January 27 with Open Houses. The rushees visited all 23 sororities that Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday. The following Saturday and Sunday they returned to 12 Houses for Tour Parties. This Friday the rushees will visit 6 Houses for Skit Parties. Sunday, February 9 is the last round of parties, Formal Parties. At these parties the rushees will learn something of what a sorority means to its members. After filing preference that night, Silence Period will last until 5 p.m. Pledge Day, February 12.

Newman has new officers

The Newman Association of Syracuse University has compiled the results of its election for the offices of President and Vice- President for the year 1969-1970. Replacing Arthur Mruczek as President is Augustine Ubaldi, a junior in the College of Engineering majoring majoring in Civil Engineering.

Nancy Rideout, also a junior, will continue as Vice-President of Newman. Miss Rideout is majoring in Anthropology in the College of Liberal Arts.

The officers of Newman are elected by the Parish Council, which is composed of the President, Vice-President, Corresponding Secretary, Recording Secretary, Treasurer, External Affairs Director, and the members of the various committees who assist the Chaplain in achieving the goals of Newman.

Cancelled

The Black and White in America lecture tonight has been cancelled to enable students to hear Ralph Ellison, author of "The Invisible Man," at Cazenovia College at 8 p.m. Students are urged to go if possible.

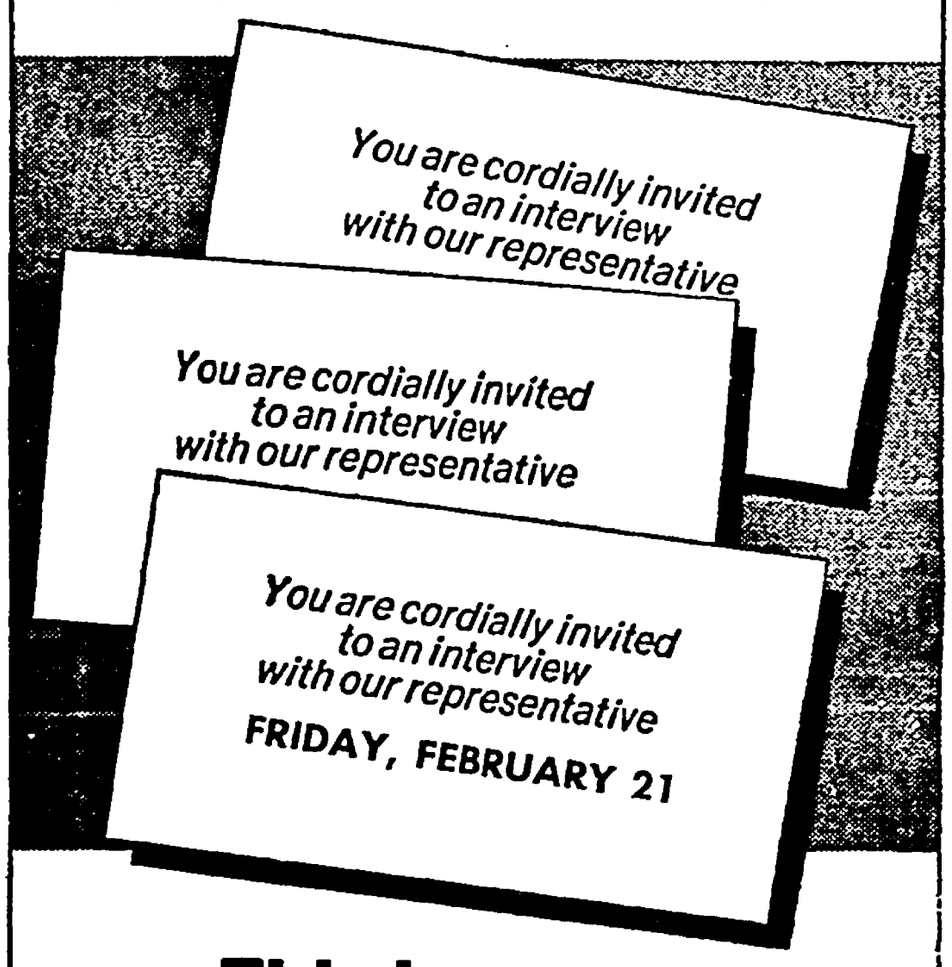
Syracuse lecturer receives honor

Donna Shalala, a Syracuse University lecturer in urban politics and personal assistant to Alan K. Campbell, dean of the Maxwell Graduate School, has been selected for inclusion in the 1968 edition of "Outstanding Young Women of America."

Miss Shalala came to Syracuse University in 1965 as a graduate assistant in the Metropolitan Studies Program of the Maxwell School and she will complete her doctorate in social science this year. She served with the Peace Corps from 1962 to 1964 in Iran.

During her Peace Corps service, Miss Shalala was dean of women at the University of Ahwaz, and she taught English and social science at that University.



As an undergraduate at Western College for Women in Oxford, Ohio, she was listed in "Who's Who Among Students in American Universities."

The Outstanding Young Women of America citation notes Miss Shalala's outstanding ability, accomplishments and service to her community, country and profession.

This is a copy of a copy of an invitation to interview a company you may not know well enough.

Making copies is only part of the story.

You can get the other part straight from the source. Talk to our representative and ask him about R&D looking ahead to major advances in education...in areas like color xerography and 3-D imaging...about refinements in combined xerography and EDP systems to process and graphically reproduce any theory or fact available...at any distance.

Ask anything imaginable and you'll discover you're probing a company that's involved with every phase of the information and education explosion.

We place great emphasis on individual initiative. Additional schooling aimed at advanced degrees. Brainstorming. A variety of short-term project groups. And benefits. In short, your career, not simply a job for you to fill.

So while you're looking us over for career opportunities, we'll be looking you over for career potential. Fair enough?

Why not make an appointment with your Placement Director. A half hour of your time could be the start of a great future in research, engineering, manufacturing, programming, accounting, finance, statistics or marketing/sales.

His friends call him 'Hole'

Prossner makes big waves in Archbold's 'too cool' pool

By GINA BELL

It's so easy--and so misleading--to a pigeonhole a guy, especially an athlete, into a neat little category without taking into consideration the factors which make him an individual. It's a mistake which any writer should avoid like the plague. Just this once, though, I can't resist it. Right down to his matted crewcut, baby blue GTO, and assertive self-confidence, Ross Prossner is a superjock.

Ross, fondly referred to by his teammates as "Hole" for reasons which remain unexplained, also happens to be an outstanding swimmer who enhanced his superjock image last Saturday by coming up with a pair of valuable firsts as the swim team mortified Penn State in a dual meet. The 78-35 score added to Syracuse's growing reputation as a tough team to beat.

Being a superjock involves having an attitude of supreme self-confidence (which might be dismissed as arrogance in anyone else) as well as the habit of winning to back it up. Ross has both.

As one of "Bab's boys" at Williston Academy, the acknowledged swimming power among the Eastern prep schools, Ross was team captain, record holder in several backstroke events, and scholastic All-American in his senior year. With snowy credentials like these, you might wonder what he's doing at Syracuse. This is easily (and tactfully) explained by the fact that Coach Jon Buzzard is a very persuasive recruiter and that the Syracuse admissions department is a lot kinder to superjocks than those of other colleges.

It has taken Ross a while to live up to his image, although as a sophomore, he managed to set records in the medley relay, 100 to 200 yard backstroke events. As one of his teammates put it, "Ross is so strong that he makes you sick. He never had to work hard to develop into a good swimmer. He knew he was good already." Ross let up a little in practice until Buzzard began to call him "the cow's tail," a euphemism referring to his tendency to shun leadership in practice. Maybe this is because Ross always feels the water in the pool is too cold.

All that is different now; Ross is afraid of being mediocre. ("Mediocre" is a dirty word in his vocabulary.) He had now joined frosh Brian Krause in taking the lead in practice, setting a rugged pace for the rest of the team. He is focusing all his attention on preparation for the Easterns in March, concentrating on freestyle sprints as well as his usual backstroke events.

Ross attributes his renewed drive for excellence to the increasingly high calibre of talent on the team. "It's hard to swim well when the internal competition isn't too fierce," he explains. "Now I have good swimmers to work against, and it makes me work harder so why shouldn't I do well."

Thus far this season, Ross has been beaten only once, and that was in the 50 yd. freestyle, an event which he describes as his hobby: "It's something I enjoy, something I'm good at, and something I don't need to work at." Unfortunately, he didn't bother to work at it against Buffalo. "I wasn't paying attention, and one of my Psi Upsilon fraternity brothers Dave Crockenberg beat me. I was just fooling around," he said.

Ross doesn't plan to do any fooling around in the next few months. The swimmers will be put to their first real test against Bucknell this weekend, and the succeeding meets don't promise to be easier. Ross is determined to shave a second off his time for the 100 yard freestyle, adding that to his other records. At the Easterns, he will compete against some of the best swimmers in the country, and wants to go a little higher than the consolation finals this time. "I don't want to make a fool of myself the way I did last year," he says. "I had some awfully mediocre times."

Ross Prossner has made up his mind to really put out this time. It's a good thing he has. After all, who ever heard of a mediocre superjock?

ROY DANFORTH..gray hairs??

Danforth takes long glance down a rocky Orange road

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

Flashback: it is March, 1966, and the Orange of Syracuse have beaten Davidson and advanced to the finals of the NCAA Eastern Regional, SU, once the doormat of the East, has reached its basketball pinnacle of the decade.

Now, another flahsback, this one more recent. It is last Saturday night, Feb. 1, 1969, and the Orange is trounced in Manley Field House by an adequate UMass team. In three short years, fortune has reversed itself, and SU basketball has returned to the doldrums.

The signs of the times are everywhere. The feature story in the UMass program is a fond rememberance of the days of glory, and optimistically forcasts, "Those Days Will Be Back!" But it also says, "Now it's just wait. Wait till the team matures."

The fans, however, are too impatient, or disinterested, to wait. The capacity crowds have shrunk to about one-third of their former size. The ushers, in fact, who once had to worry about students sitting on the court, are now anticipating a layoff.

The biggest change is in the temperament of the team. Even last year, when the team had a losing record, the players were veterans, and although losing, maintained a certain degree of class about them. This year, it seems more like twelve players in search of a basket.

There is hot-tempered Bill Smith, with great potential and a tendency to get into shoving, pushing and punching matches with the opposing center. He has been ejected from one game, and has come close on other occasions.

There is John Suder, ostensibly the team leader, missing two easy jump shots and then burying a fist into a 5-10 UMass guard.

There is Bob Kouwe muttering to himself about foul calls while the other team is sending a basket-hanger in for an unmolested layup. There is the whole team continually complaining to the referee instead of playing defense.

"It happens when you're losing," coach Roy Danforth says. "It's no reflection on ability." Of the roughhouse tactics and complaints, the rookie mentor shakes his head and says, "Those are the things that are toughest to stay away from."

As Fred Lewis once did before him, Danforth is now faced with the task of reversing the trend.

"I think the kids want to win," he says. "There's as much pressure on them now as there would be if we were 15-0. Everybody's taking it upon himself to do something." The problems are many. "Rebounding is where we're having trouble, both offensively and defensively," Danforth explains. "UMass has about the same height we have, and they have been out-rebounded only twice all season. All the teams we play put one man on Smith, keep him off the boards, and that's it."

Smith got only five rebounds on Saturday night, all of them coming in the second half. He did, however, score 18 points, and was excellent on defense. "Smith played the best defensive game he's played all year," Danforth points out. "If he plays like that for the next two and a half years, he'll be the best defensive center around."

Another thing that concerns Danforth is the lack of scoring punch. "We've only been getting two men a game in double figures, and then a couple at around eight or nine," he said. "That's not enough. We're not stopping the other team."

With the return of Ernie Austin to the lineup, the Orange will see a partial rebirth of the run-and-shoot game that Danforth likes to play. "We tried to run more the last two or three games," the coach said, "but we haven't been able to do it. I don't know if we'll be able to run on Temple, either."

The Orange face the Temple Owls tonight in Philadelphia. Danforth would love to win one to break the current five game losing streak, but he is more interested in building for the future. "I don't feel any more pressure," the coach maintains. "You just do the best you can."

Two ranking players give Frosh tennis a fresh outlook

By ADAM DAWSON

1968 was a very good year for tennis coach Gary Thorne, even though his team went 3-8-1 for the season. September of that year brought, in the class of 1972, the first two ranking tennis players to come to Syracuse in a long time.

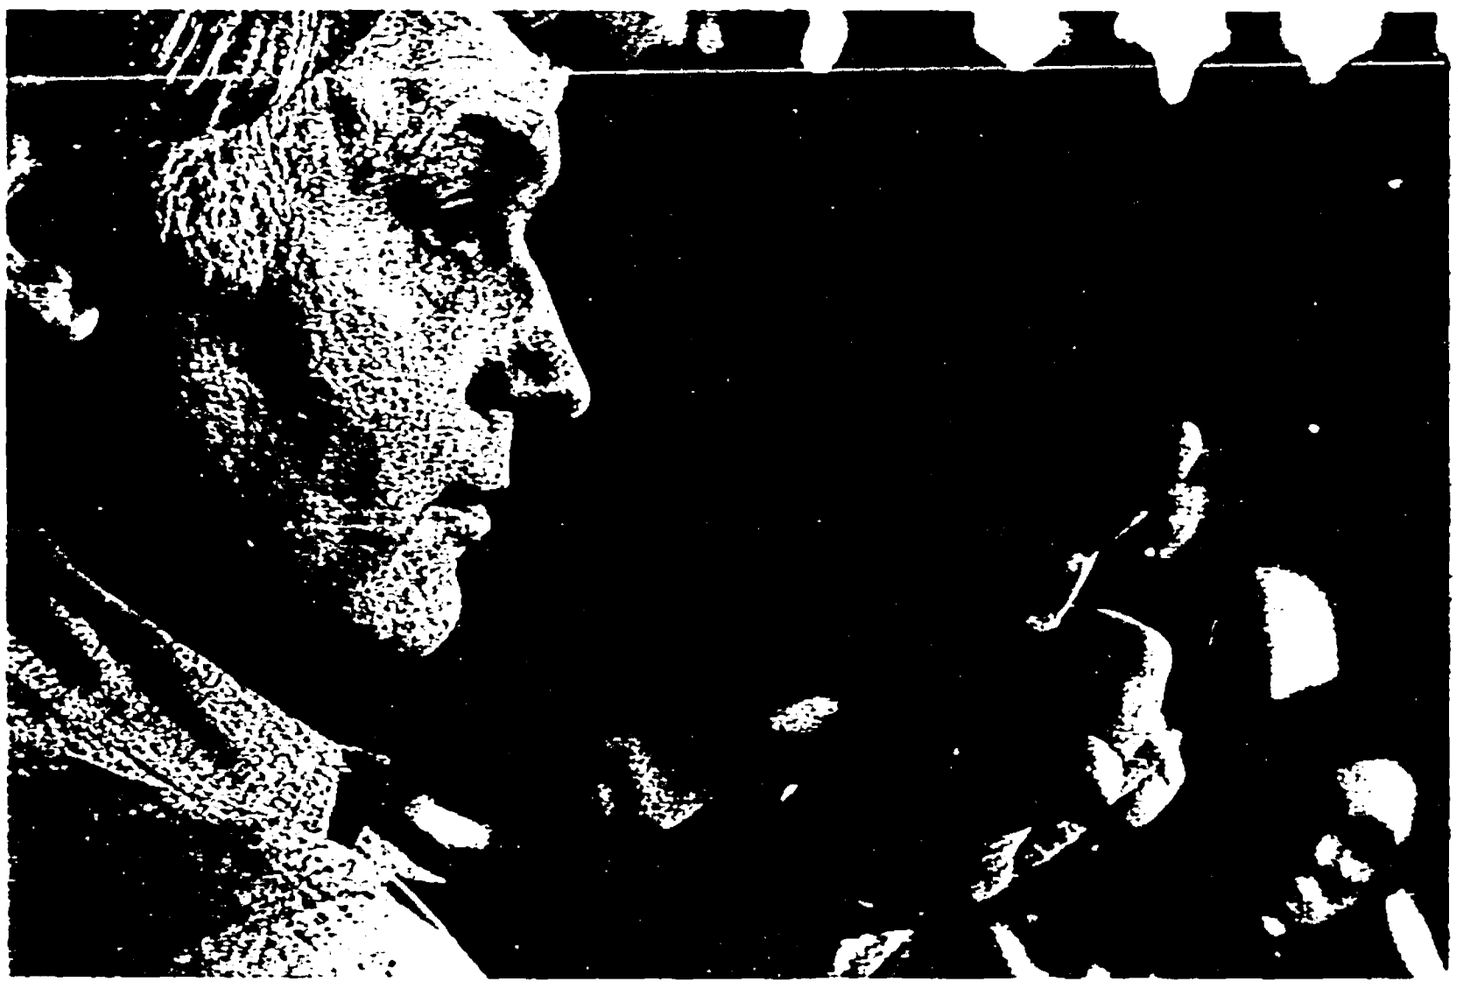
These two players, Pat Mason and Dale Patterson, were not even recruited for Syracuse. Mason came here because his father is an alum and Patterson came here because of the skiing.

Mason is ranked seventh in the Junior division of the Eastern Lawn Tennis Association and Patterson is ranked ninth in the Middle Atlantic States Tennis Association, Junior division. Both of these boys turned down scholarship offers from other schools to attend Syracuse. As Thorne describes it, "Syracuse is the only major school in the area that doesn't give any tennis scholarships. This gives us a tremendous handicap against other Eastern schools."

Another pleasant surprise for Thorne came from a completely different source. This one came from the Women's building "people" (as he puts it). They agreed to let him use their facilities for indoor tennis practice five days a week during the endless Syracuse winter. This extra practice time should give the team better stamina in the early going and it would help improve their overall game as well.

Into this seemingly rosy picture one or two thorns appeared. Last year's varsity second singles man, Pete (Rocket Ship) Gifford, will probably not be available this year, because of a knee operation. Thorne was counting on Gifford for a top varsity berth.

To compensate for Gifford's loss, Thorne has senior Marc Pine back on the team after a year's layoff. Thorne plans to use Pine as his top singles man.



John Schwandt, Peter Frank, Howie Noble, Jeff Shankman, Sandy Aronauer and Paul Lynn will form the nucleus of Thorne's varsity club.

Steigers relate life's wrongs to work

ROD STEIGER: retrospective at Syracuse University

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

A jovial and outgoing Rod Steiger and a subdued but lovely Claire Bloom yesterday drew large crowds at campus sessions in which they answered students' questions. The Steigers arrived for the first day of the Rod Steiger Retrospective and Claire Bloom Tribute.

"I come here flattered and to take advantage of you to see if I know what I'm talking about," said Steiger. "You're my foundation and if I lose contact I'm out of it as a human being."

Steiger, perhaps the greatest of modern-day actors, mixed humorous comments with thoughtful answers to student inquiries. When asked, for example, which movie he thought he should receive an Oscar for, he said with a laugh, "The next one."

Steiger wore a bright orange cape, cowboy boots and a medallion that he said was "a desperate attempt to look young." His wavy gray hair had touches of brown and hung over his forehead. Miss Bloom seemed less at ease with the students and at one point asked, half-seriously, "What am I supposed to say?" She let her husband do most of the talking.

Man's Inhumanity

In an exclusive interview with Steiger yesterday morning, he said there is a need to be reminded of man's inhumanity to man. One such reminder, he said, was "The Pawnbroker."

"I choose to be involved in those films that deal with social problems," said the actor. "Any good work of art has inherent in it some social comment. But the trick is never to lecture an audience. They should be entertained as well as instructed."

Steiger's next movie, which he'll begin in April, is "Waterloo." He said he'll play Napoleon as a dying but ambitious man. The actor said he's been reading autopsy reports about the famous general.

"Napoleon was dying of cancer," said Steiger. "Where most men would have lied down he stayed. I'd like to see him as a human being rather than a figure who poses and carries on."

Steiger said he never worried about changing his early screen image as a heavy or villain that he gained in such movies as "Al Capone."

"I never worried about images," the actor said. "Everything I do is character analysis. Heavy parts are usually more interesting. Straight parts are as dull as dishwater."

Key to Syracuse

At the Hotel Syracuse, the Steigers were presented with a key to the city of Syracuse by Mayor William Walsh. The key was inscribed, "For your contribution to the American stage and screen."

When the Steigers arrived on campus, British-born Miss Bloom spoke to an "Interpretation of Shakespeare" class, while Steiger went to a student question session.

In an interview, Miss Bloom said she didn't believe in a woman giving up a career for marriage.

"It's difficult to combine a career and marriage, but I'd be unhappy if I didn't work," she said, adding, however, that she was away from her daughter only for short time periods. "How can one spend years studying and then not use his education?"

"I played Ophelia when I was 17," said Miss Bloom. "I was just marvelous because I didn't have the faintest idea of what I was doing. The main thing about Ophelia is that she must be young and vulnerable. I think I brought that untouched spirit to the role because I was as dumb as could be."

Dorm autonomy proposal calls for self-regulation

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

The "Proposal for Dorm Autonomy" to be reviewed by the Council on Student Life on Friday envisions an atmosphere of complete student self-regulation and predicts that it will offer an educational and adult "total experience."

The six student members of CSL that were instrumental in drafting the proposal have indicated that they find student life at SU to "fragmented," inadequate to prepare students for later life and "lacking necessary services."

The academic, social, cultural, government and student services phases of student life are all considered open to improvement and potentially a more integral part of living center environment. Each is dealt within a separate article of the proposal.

Under a dorm autonomy system, present academic efforts in the dorms such as lectures and faculty visitations are considered to be "the initial methods to create an academic community." What would follow, the proposal indicates, is greatly increased academic activity such as tutoring, and special and experimental courses, both potentially for University credits.

The student proposal indicates that there is great potential for carrying the principles of "psychology, sociology, library science and art" from the classroom into the dorm situation.

The broad freedoms given to dorm councils in the regulation of student social life will undoubtably be the source of greatest controversy when the CSL starts to consider the autonomy proposal tomorrow.

In proposing the sweeping change in social codes, the students of CSL recognizes the "responsibility of self-regulation," and recognize that "basic in the philosophy of corporate responsibility is the insurance of the individual's welfare."

The CSL students propose that "self government remains the purest form of education." They suggest that the students' power to regulate alcohol consumption in the dorms will develop maturity and a sense of responsibility among dorm residents.

Cultural activity at the student living center level would receive a boost under an autonomous situation, the proposal suggests. It cites the Shaw Dormitory coffeehouse, exhibitions and concerts as activities that might flourish in a student-directed environment. Other interesting suggestions in the article included an interfaith center and comparative cultural programming, both of which could be developed at the dorm level.

10 charged in academic dishonesty

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

Ten students recently were named in recommendations following hearings which were conducted to investigate alleged academic dishonesty.

The charges are that a student stole accounting and marketing examinations and then sold them to other students. The hearings were conducted jointly by the College of Liberal Arts and the College of Business Administration with Malcolm Schlusberg, associate professor of law and public policy serving as the chairman.

Both colleges were involved because some of the students are enrolled in Liberal Arts, but the courses are given by the Business School.

The committee, which includes members of both colleges' faculties, concluded its hearings late last week, but according to Schlusberg, it has not finished the inquiry and the case not closed. The content of the recommendations, therefore, haven't been revealed.

An administration source said the College of Business administration found out the examinations had been stolen and changed them slightly in order to discover who had taken the tests. The students were then confronted and told they would appear before an academic dishonesty committee.

"The committee is an investigatory and hearing panel, and the students appear before it," said Dean of Student Services Jim G. Carleton. "The members conduct the hearing and make recommendations as to the action which should be taken," he continued.

The recommendations are then sent to the deans of the colleges involved and are either accepted or rejected. In this case both Frederic J. Kramer, dean of Liberal Arts and Robert G. Cox, dean of Business Administration, approved the recommendations. The office of the Dean of Men then accepted them.

Carleton received the recommendations and is acting upon it. "As a reviewing authority I'm not just a rubber stamp. Therefore my policy is that of understanding the rationale and reasoning behind the recommendations," he said.

It is conceivable material that he may feel is relevant has been left out of the report, and if that is the case he checks back with members of the hearing panel.

"There is no relationship between the time it takes to process recommendations of this type and the possibility the penalties involves will be changed," he said. After Carleton has reviewed the Dormitories governed by their residents would tend to humanize life in them. Anyone who has looked down an endless cinder block corridor in Watson or up at the beehive-like windows of Booth and DellPlain has felt the need to humanize the dorm environment.

Autonomy for dormitories

An elected dorm council with power to determine visiting hours, curfews, consumption of alcohol, punishment for violation of council-made rules and general dorm projects would give dorm residents a sense of control over their environment and hence over their lives. An elected council would in a practical sense be closer to the needs of the residents.

Autonomous dormitories would draw residents into decision-making roles. Outlets would be found for creative talents and of course, every dorm should have its own newspaper.

One humanizes life by giving people some control over their own destinies, channels for creative energies and purpose by allowing each to contribute to the betterment of the whole.

Residents in self-governing dorms would continue to face many of the same frustrations and limitations. Self-government might even fail once in a while. But students would get a taste of life by facing their own problems rather than blaming them on a distant administration.

An experiment in dorm autonomy may be considered costly and inefficient from the point of view of the administrator. (It would profoundly shock the seasoned SU dorm dweller to be told he could paint the walls of his room.) Yet the benefits of dorm autonomy would enrich the spirits of their residents.

Dorm autonomy . . .

A necessity

By Steven Eisner

The concept of dorm autonomy entails much more than the temporal questions of visiting hours, alcholic consumption on campus, and other "radical" student demands; rather, it is concerned with the basic right of self-determination which, at least theoretically, exists in a democratic society. It is a fact that this right has been continually usurped by the university administration.

Stephen L. Tober, in his article in the February 4 D.O., defends this usurption. Evidently, he does not think that SU students are mature or intelligent enough to run their own affairs. He writes: "Man is an animal who needs a strong centralized system of checks and balances; one that is, if even somewhat distasteful, at least uniform." If it were not for his inclusion of checks and balances in that statement, he would have a perfect defense of facism. Where are the checks and balances in that statement, he would have a perfect defense of facism. Yet, where are the checks and balances involved in SU regulations and policy-making? The only checks are those that the administration exercises over student government. The only balance that exists is rather lopsided; student government has little influence over administrative mandates.

The only realistic answer to the continual erosion of student self-determination is dorm autonomy. Dorm councils, unlike in the past, have proven to be fairly competent. Any "weaknesses" which might exist are primarily due to the frustration which results from their limited powers.

Furthermore, there is no need to worry about inconsistencies in regulations amongst living centers. SU students living in St. Mary's, for example, are not profoundly different from those living in Booth, or from those living in any of the other dorms, for that matter. A broad student government constitution could insure that no dorm council becomes unrepresentative of the best interests of the students and the university.

In conclusion, experience has shown that one can not reach the goals of freedom and responsibility under the present university system. Under the stifling control of loco-parentis, it is apparent that there will only be a growing sense of frustration. If this is not put to an end by the adoption of a new system of dorm autonomy, this frustration will soon manifest itself in the only way that it can: in violent resistance. The administration must act now to guarantee student self-determination before it becomes too late.

I regret Stephen Tober's opposition to the dormitory autonomy proposal; having examined it carefully and debated it with its drafters, I strongly support the proposal. However, Mr. Tober has raised some valid questions. As he states, the proposal is "rightfully idealistic." Many of the ideas it presents, particularly in academics and services, are not immediately implementable. But they are ideas which are realities at other universities and which faculty, administrators and students here have considered for some time.

The key thoughts center around the concepts of self-regulation, self-government, and the freedoms and responsibilities thus entailed, all central to the discussion of the development of the individual within society. The writings of Edgar Friedenburg define the relevance of these to maturing youth and the stunting effects of their opposite, the imposition of regulations by external "authorities" such as at SU. Friedenburg states self-regulation is "basic to the development of self image, so necessary to the cultivation of responsibility," quote the proposal.

With regard to Mr. Tober's statement "man needs a strong centralized system of checks and balances," I would remind him of our Founding Fathers' philosophy of decentralization. Syracuse today is already physically decentralized and fragmented, from Manley to Genesee St. The Danforth Report, written in 1967 by Dean Cope and Profs. Hardin, Ketcham and Muller, noted this in its proposals. Since a central regulatory and service system would have difficulty dealing with this situation. I suggest rather a uniform set of guidelines, which the proposal provides through the screening of all dorm consitutions by IDC and Student Senate.

Granted most dorm councils are weak and inefficient. However, there are three points here. First, dorm councils have been offered strong advisory backup by the CSL students to strengthen the councils. Also, Chief Justice Paul Snyder of the UJB is backing the creation of lower dorm courts. Second, since the councils will have a more important, responsible and meaningful role under autonomy, undoubtedly stronger councils will emerge as students accept the broadened responsibilities. The strong council in Shaw last year during its fight to obtain optional hours is strong supporting evidence. Third, the strength of each council will be one factor considered by IDC and Senate before approving any dorm's constitution.

Further, the implementation of dorm autonomy can become a first step in the establishment of a residential college at SU as outlined in the 1967 Danforth Report. Copies of this report are available in the Liberal Arts office in HL. Originating at Michigan, the residential college has proved effective in developing the "sense of an intellectual community" called for by the autonomy proposal, and upgrading the academic atmosphere on campus. By easing student concern over social life at Syracuse, I suggest the proposal will increase student involvement with academic improvements. And the past indicates students must seize the initiative in order for change to occur. As Mr. Babcock noted, changes in the drinking rule, Rule One, visitation hours, and library hours came because of student initiative.

African student wins discrimination case

An African student at SU who in December charged the proprietor of a North Syracuse luncheonette with discriminatory practice received a favorable decision from the State Division of Human Rights, the DO learned yesterday.

The student, Sikhanyiso Ndlovu, however, did not press for damages because, he said, "I was looking only for a moral judgment."

The Human Rights Division ordered Joseph Benjamin, proprietor of the Blue and White Restaurant, 107 North Main St., North Syracuse in a conciliation agreement to —refrain from the commission of any unlawful discriminatory practices in the future;

—to accommodate and serve all patrons on an equal basis and without regard to their race, creed, color or national origin; and —to write a letter of apology to Ndlovu.

The incident occurred Dec. 10, according to Ndlovu, when he entered the luncheonette to pruchase a bus ticket and order a cup of coffee. He said he placed a brief case containing important papers on the seat beside him.

"Upon observing that I had been served," Ndlovu said in his complaint, "Mr. Benjamin shouted to me that I must remove my briefcase from the seat. I told him that the briefcase was clean and that it contained important material on my country, Zimbabwe. He then seized my briefcase and threw it at the door of the luncheonette, saying there were no thieves there and indicating that the luncheonette was not a place for waiting for the bus.

"I asked the man not to shout and to stop provoking me by his insults and mishandling of my property. I also indicated that I intended to take the matter...up with higher authorities. I gave him my name and requested to have his. He told me his name was John Jones and refused to write it down when I asked him to do so..."

The Division of Human Rights Regional Director Neal M. Hoffman determined "there was probable cause to believe that (Benjamin) had engaged or was engaging in unlawful discriminatory practice."

Ndlovu and the Division then agreed upon terms of conciliation, to which Benjamin also gave his consent.

"I have never tolerated this kind of treatment," Ndlovu said yesterday in an interview, "not in South Africa or in Rhodesia, and not in America."

Before coming to the United States Ndlovu spent seven months in a Rhodesian concentration camp.

Dorm autonomy...

given to the individual dorm councils. Dorm courts would provide the main judicial machinery with the University Judicial Board serving as an appellate court. The Interdormitory Council is designated to "review and evaluate" individual dorm constitutions and Student Senate will give final ratification.

The dorm autonomy proposal suggests a wide range of student services that might be organized at the dorm level. They cover such fields as "academic, legal, medical, psychological, religious, vocational and financial."

The proposal indicates that the resident advisors and head residents be retained in a "guidance capacity."

Skiers compete in all-night marathon

What is believed to be the first all-night marathon in Eastern ski history took place this past Friday. A large number of anxious skiers entered the test of fortitude which began at 6:30 p.m. at Intermont Ski Area in Solon, N.Y.

Some "ski nuts" took cat naps on table tops, hoping to be the last in line for the awards. Two others pitched a pup tent in the parking area and went to bed in sleeping bags at 5 a.m. Only two, Wally Roman and David Munce, from Phi Gamma Delta, were still standing by 7:30 a.m. They reign as champions of the Ski-Athon.

This Friday, those who lost and other interested skiers will have a chance to prove their endurance. The lifts start operating at 6:30 p.m. The entire night of skiing at Intermont costs three dollars. Further details concerning Friday's event can be obtained at the SUSKI meeting tomorrow at 4 p.m. in 307 HL.

Activities resume for dance group

The SU Modern Dance Group, a production group sponsored and promoted by the Women's Athletic Association, will resume activity for the Spring semester today at 7 p.m. in the dance studio of the Women's Building. New and interested members will be welcomed.

The group meets once a week to improve dance skills, learn new ones and experiment creatively. The members exchange ideas, work together and stage productions. Performance plans for the semester include participation in the Fine Arts Festival.

The group is composed of individuals of diverse background, training and particular interests. During the practice sessions, the members experiment in jazz, folk, modern and ballet technique. Last semester the group worked actively with several Fine Arts majors who were especially interested in staging and design.

A good cry cleanses the soul

After all is shed and done, your soul may be saved but your contacts need help. They need Lensine. Lensine is the one contact lens solution for complete contact care . . . preparing, cleansing, and soaking.

There was a time when you needed two or more different lens solutions to properly prepare and maintain your contacts. No more. Lensine, from The Murine Company, makes caring for contact lenses as convenient as wearing them.

Just a drop or two of Lensine coats and lubricates your lens. This allows the lens to float more freely in the eye, reducing tearful irritation. Why? Because Lensine is a compatible, "isotonic" solution, very much like your eye's natural fluids.

Cleaning your contacts with Lensine retards the build-up of foreign deposits on the lenses. And soaking your contacts in Lensine between wearing periods assures you of proper lens hygiene. You get a free soaking-storage case with individual lens compartments on the bottom of every bottle of Lensine.

It has been demonstrated the improper storage between wearings permits the growth of bacteria on the lenses. This is a sure cause of eye irritation and in some cases can endanger your vision. Bacteria cannot grow in Lensine because it's sterile, self-sanitizing, and antiseptic.

Lensine . . . the solution for complete contact lens care. Made by the Murine Company, Inc.

Steigers relate life to work

Miss Bloom, who does little Shakespeare now, said she doesn't miss it. "I'm trying to do more contemporary roles." In five years I may be ready to play some of the really super roles in Shakespeare, but I've played all the young girl roles he wrote."

The great disillusionment of the theater, according to Miss Bloom is that few people give a beginning actor the guidance and help he needs.

After the class, she joined Steiger in Haven Hall as he talked to students. When she entered, Steiger did a comic worshipping bow in front of her, much to the students' amusement.

Steiger said he is often faced with the temptation of taking parts he doesn't believe in because of the large salaries that accompany them. He said that if he had not been lucky, he would have been forced to take bad parts in order to provide for his family.

"The big problem today is maintaining self-respect in a monetary society," the actor said as he raised his arm emphatically. "There are some things more important than acting. My first responsibility is to put bread in the mouths of my family."

Greatest Moment

Steiger said the greatest moment of an actor is when he discovers a moment during a performance that he didn't know he would find. Steiger said the actor will spend the rest of his life trying to achieve another such moment.

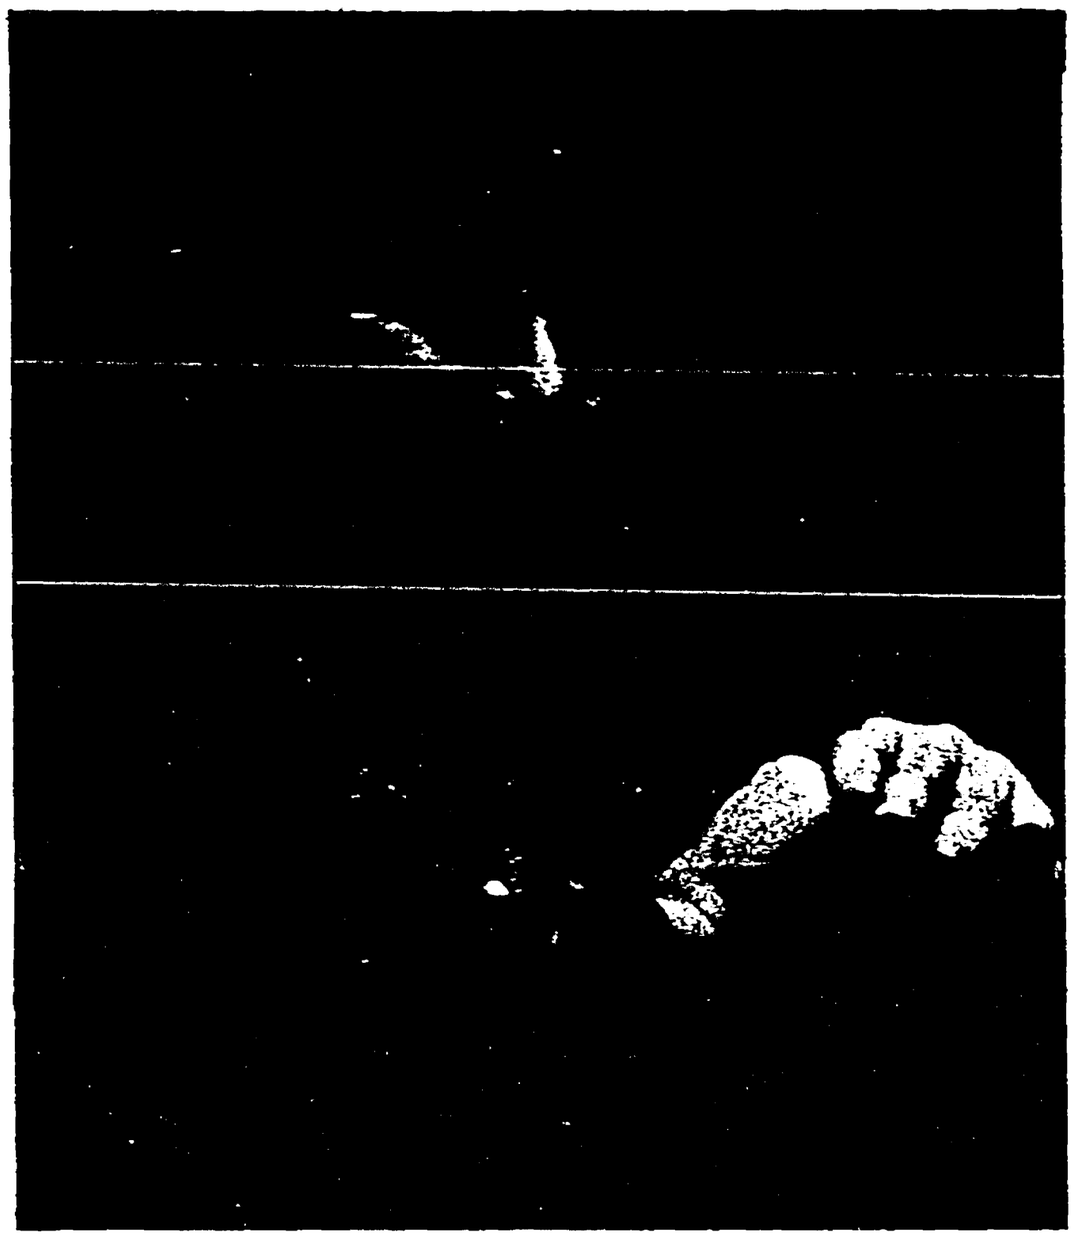
"The tragedy of the theater is that whatever small moment you create is dead," said Steiger as he slouched forward. "It works in all mediums. The styles of film change with time.

Steiger said that when something is going wrong with a movie, the actor must tell the person responsible.

"Nice guys can be the death of art," he said as he rubbed his hands together. "You've got to get a little tough. I believe in Toscanini's quote, 'In art I'm an autocrat but in society I'm a democrat.'"

The actor said he hopes to combine his acting, directing and writing skills in a film before he's "too old."

Steiger said he regrets not finishing high school. He quit school at age 16 to join the navy.



No Adolescence

"I never had any adolescence," he said. "I never went to a senior prom, never went to a drive-in, never played on a football team. Plus there's what I might have picked up along the way scholastically."

He said after his discharge from the navy he joined an amatuer theatrical group because all the girls in the office where he worked belonged to the group. The woman who taught the group suggested he become professional.

"She reminded me that I could go to acting school on the G.I. Bill," said Steiger. "If she hadn't said that I wonder if I would have had the determination to become professional.

"I don't think I have the strength to punch a clock and work a nine-to-five job. In that way, it was the best accident that ever happened to me."

Steiger evening

Clips of actor's movies featured in Gifford Auditorium

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

An overflow audience in Gifford Auditorium last night got an occasionally confusing look at clips of several Rod Steiger films.

Although the audience received little information about the Steigers' newest movie, "The Illustrated Man," Steiger did answer general questions, frequently spicing his replies with four-letter words.

The evening was a near repeat performance of his sessions with students yesterday afternoon.

Heading the evening were various film clips of the yet-to-be released "The Illustrated Man," the movie version of a collection of science-fiction stories.

Basically, it is a story of a tatoo artist (Miss Bloom) who "illustrates" Steiger with tatoos. These tatoos hold within them the future, and when looked into, they reveal a melange of events.

Most of the clips, however, went unexplained by Steiger, leaving the audience wondering about the characters and situations in most scenes. Wife Claire Bloom also remained silent.

Branching into several of his other movies, Steiger apologized for the film clip of his recent film, "Three into Two Won't Go," which was sent by the company that produced it.

"They sent a trailer in their usual cop-out fashion," said the actor. "It's a much more intelligent film than the narration implied."

A study of marriage, "Three into Two" shows, according to Steiger, how marriage can break up with no one as the villian. "It's a rather extraordinary study," Miss Bloom said earlier in the day.

Steiger was asked what he thought Sol Nazerman of "The Pawnbroker" would have done at the point where the movie left him.

"I think he would hang around for a few days and pull himself together and then go back to face his wife's grave," said Steiger. "I think he would have used his education as a way to pay back society what he thought he owed it."

Steiger said the difficult aspect of that role was that Nazerman was a loner and isolated himself from the world.

"His tragedy was that he wanted to be in the world but not be responsible for breathing," said the actor. "I cut out lines because he wouldn't speak when it wasn't necessary. I didn't make any unnecessary movements. I wouldn't look into the camera. I was worried the audience would say he was a bore. I took a chance."

Steiger expressed sympathy for the homosexual G.I. he plays in his new movie, "The Sergeant."

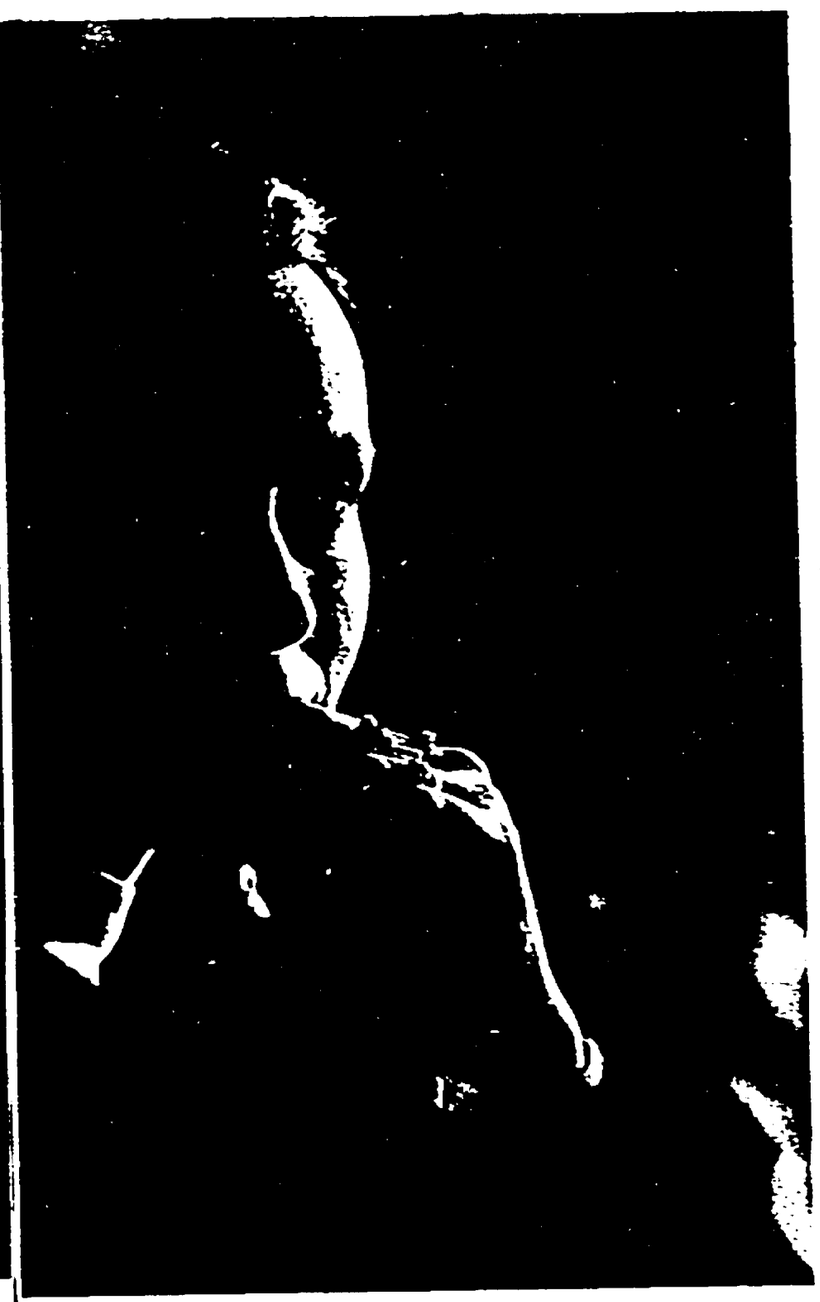
"I came from a broken home," he said. "I was alone until I forced my mother to sign a paper so that I could get into the navy when I was sixteen. The navy was another womb. It puts you to bed, it gets you up, it feeds you.

"The sergeant's loneliness had next to nothing to do with homosexuality. That one night his loneliness and rigidity came out in a pass at a man. If instead of bearing himself in the military machine he had gone to someone for help, he might have made it.

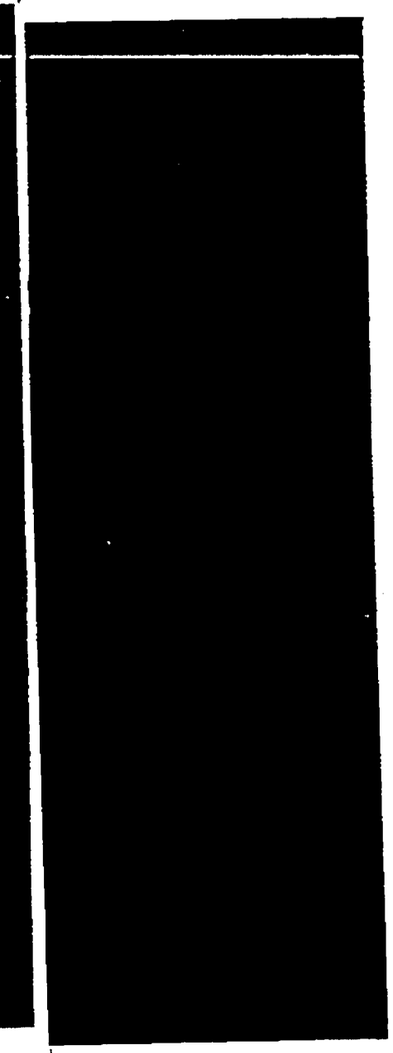
"You can't make it on your own. I've learned that. You need someone."

Steiger said because many of his old films are shown on television that medium is like a "recurring cancer." He said many of his poorest films, such as "Run of the Arrow," are shown again and again.

The actor criticized television for having shown a woman commentator who said that Steiger and his wife ahd been fighting publicly, that they had been barred from various restaurants and that they were separating.



"I don't care what they say about me but I care what they say about my wife," he said. "What if my nine-year-old daughter had come in the room? What would I have said about this vicious unfeminine bitch?" he asked, referring to the commentator.



In spite of his criticism of television he said it was what discovered him. According to him, his role in "Marty" was what brought him his part in "On the Waterfront."

'A double barreled affair'

Rev. Keim speaks about Film Forum and student interest

By ANDRIJ BILYK
Associate Editor

"The Film Forum seems to be a double barreled affair," said interviewer Roberta Hollander to her subject, the Rev. Norman Keim, during Fordham's Sixth Film Study Conference in July, 1968. "One is that you show feature films and the other is that you make films. Would you tell us something about that, please?"

"What we are doing now," replied Syracuse University's Protestant Chaplain and Film Forum Director, "is showing the best of the art-type pictures, many of which do not ordinarily come to a town like Syracuse. We make a basic charge of a dollar and with that money we purchase films for our own use and also give grants to student film-makers."

Hollander then wished to know if the Film Forum showed any films from Eastern European countries like Poland and Czechoslovakia. Yes, said the Rev. Keim, the Polish film has been very strong the last ten years and now the Czech film is at its height. The Rev. Keim drew attention to the East European Film Festival held here in 1967 where such films as "Shop on Main Street," and "The Passenger," were featured.

Hollander then wondered how it was that students who belonged to the Film Forum can make films. "I'm sure our listeners in Eastern Europe would be interested in knowing the relationship of the Forum and the University to the student film-maker. Do they lead him in any direction? Must he make films on certain topics?" she asked.

"The film-maker is given absolutely free reign on what he wants to do and how he wants to do it," replied the Rev. Norman Keim. "We try and have no censorship at all so that the film ideas submitted to us for film grants are liable to cover anything at all."

"Would you give us a few examples," asked the interviewer, "perhaps way-out ones?"

"Well," began the Film Forum Director, "one of the films we sponsored this year was a very energetic science fiction project of about 25 minutes. It had to do with a kind of Orwellian world of the 1980's and 90's where computers told everyone just what to do every day.

Another film was made on the Seneca Indians, who reside in the western part of New York State. Recently they had a part of their reservation inundated by a Federal dam so one fellow did a documentary on these Indians and how the dam project affected their lives."

"And now," asked Hollander, "could you tell us the relationship between you, as head of the Film Forum, and the Administration of the University?"

"We get full cooperation from the University," Rev. Keim replied. "The University does not sponsor us but they do let us use the auditorium, allow us to buy the equipment, and help us by letting us advertise the films."

The Rev. Keim concluded his remarks with an optimistic eye for the future of film-making. "It is the art of the 20th century and it's particularly the young that have been attracted. There isn't a campus in this country today where there isn't this immense interest in film."

The 5 billion dollar corporation you probably never heard of.

Funny how big you can get and still remain virtually anonymous.

Somehow we've managed to do it.

We're a group of over 60 companies, making everything from microwave integrated circuits to color television. And we rank number 9 in the top 500 corporations in the nation.

Pretty hot stuff for a nobody.

But though you may not recognize our name, maybe the name Sylvania rings a bell.

It's one of our companies.

You may even live in one of our telephone company areas. We operate in 33 states.

So here we are, 5 billion dollars strong, growing all over the place, and looking for engineers and scientists to grow with us.

Why don't you think us over with your Placement Director?

Incidentally, we are known in the communications field as General Telephone & Electronics.

Pssst. Pass it on.

Schaefer SKI TIPS BY ROXY

Don't let T-bars throw you.

Riding a T-bar is pretty easy, if you'll just remember one thing: a T-bar isn't a seat. It doesn't carry you uphill. It pulls you up.

Keep that in mind, and you're ready to ride. Just move into the ski tracks and put the tails of your skis against the backstop. Then, with your poles in your outside hand, turn your head and upper body to the inside toward your riding partner.

When the bar is put behind you, gently hold the vertical staff of the T with your inside hand. Turn to the front and keep your skis in the tracks as you move uphill. Keep relaxed (yet erect) with your ankles and knees flexed slightly forward.

Remember. Don't sit down on the bar.

When you reach the summit, just push the bar aside and let your skis carry you away from it. It's a cinch. And it sure beats climbing!

papers they will be sent to Frank P. Piskor, vice-chancellor and provost, for his approval.

Appeal by the students involved may be made to the reviewing committee or to the chancellor.

According to Melvin C. Mounts, assistant dean of men, who served as an ex-officio member of the committee, the normal penalty in a past clear-cut case of academic dishonesty has been a circled F in the course and a period of suspension from the university.

Kramer, who approved the recommendation said he felt the hearings were quite fair and that in several instances the penalties given to people who confessed were lessened. He did not recall the range of the penalties and said Alfred H. Cope, assistant dean of Liberal Arts, had represented the college during the hearings.

Cope had no comments on the hearings or the range of penalties involved. He did say that when the hearings were over there was one member who felt the penalties should be stiffer. Schlusberg, however, said the final decision was unanimous.

A university official said all of the students named in the recommendations appeared in private interviews before the hearing panel. At least two of those involved have left school, but not because of pressure by the committee.

Although it is alleged the exams were stolen, Carleton said, "On the basis of what I know there will be no criminal action taken."

Kramer said he cannot recall any case where the evidence was as clear-cut and involved as many students, and where the original action was apparently just an attempt to make money.

designed to meet the Army's need for persons versed in resource management. The 14-month program is for United States Army officers and Department of Army Civil Service employees.

Liaison representative to be picked

Dean of Women accepts UJB two-part agreement

By VIC LIVINGSTON

The Dean of Women, meeting with members of the University Judicial Board (UJB) yesterday, has accepted a two-part agreement ending the recent misunderstandings between the Dean and the board members, according to UJB Chief Justice, Paul Snyder.

Under the agreement, the Dean of Women Marjorie Smith will:

1) Make available to the UJB the names of those women under disciplinary action,

2) appoint a member of her staff to act as a permanent liaison between the Dean of Women and the UJB.

Yesterday's meeting was "businesslike, correct, and cordial," Snyder said.

"We have achieved a satisfactory agreement. There are no further problems."

With the agreement, the Dean of Women has granted the two requests Snyder sought from the meeting. The UJB is assured information of disciplinary action from the Dean of Women's office as well as from the Dean of Men, who in the past has notified the board of disciplinary actions. Also, a representative of Dean Smith will meet with the UJB at their Thursday night meetings, and will report to the permanent liaison official.

"The offices of both personnel deans are now exercising uniform procedures," Snyder said. "This was the main problem that needed resolution."

The first test of the agreement may come at next Thursday's UJB meeting. However, Snyder said, time must be allowed for Dean Smith to choose her liaison representative.

"We will begin functioning under these new procedures in the near future, as soon as a liaison official is appointed," Snyder said.

Former SU professor Seris dies

Doctor Homero Seris, internationally known scholar and professor emeritus of Spanish literature at Syracuse U., died Sunday, at the age of 90 at a Brooklyn hospital.

Born in the Alhambra on January 12, 1879, Professor Seris was educated in Spain, Mexico, Cuba, and France. After teaching in France, Dr. Seris came to the University of Illinois in 1917 returning to Madrid in 1923 to hold several posts at the Centro de Estudios Historicos founded by Menendez Pidai.

With the advent of the Spanish Civil War, he returned to the United States where he lectured at numerous universities including Harvard, Princeton, and Columbia. At Syracuse University he founded the Centro de Estudios Hispanicos to carry on the work of the Madrid center which closed down because of the war. Dr. Seris remained at Syracuse until his retirement in 1953. A vice-president of The Hispanic Society of America, Dr. Seris spent his last years at that institute carrying on the research for his monumental Nuevo Ensayo de una biblioteca espanola de libros raros y curiosos," still in the course of publication. Among his many distinguished works are Bibliografia de la linguistica espanola" (1964) and the "Manual de bibliografia de la literatur espanola" published by Syracuse University Press (1948—1954) and used as a textbook for Hispanic literary research in American and European graduate schools.

Temple wins, 86-83

Late Owl rally spoils SU effort

By LARRY CENTER

PHILADELPHIA— "Heartbreaker" is one of the oldest cliches in sports, but it is the best word that can apply to last night's last-minute Orange loss, 86-83, to the Temple Owls.

The Orange played one of their finest games of the season and seemed on the way to a stunning upset, only to see Temple storm back from a 12-point deficit and go ahead for the first time since early in the game, 81-79, with two minutes left. It looked like overtime with 25 seconds left, but the Owls capitalized on SU fouls and held on to win.

The contest was played in three "stages." It was a seesaw battle through the first fourteen minutes, as the teams were tied at 5, 7, 11, 13, 20, 23, and 26. Syracuse was full-court pressing and getting its share of rebounds. Bill Case held Temple's high-scoring John Baum scoreless for the first seven minutes, and himself was contributing to the balanced SU scoring.

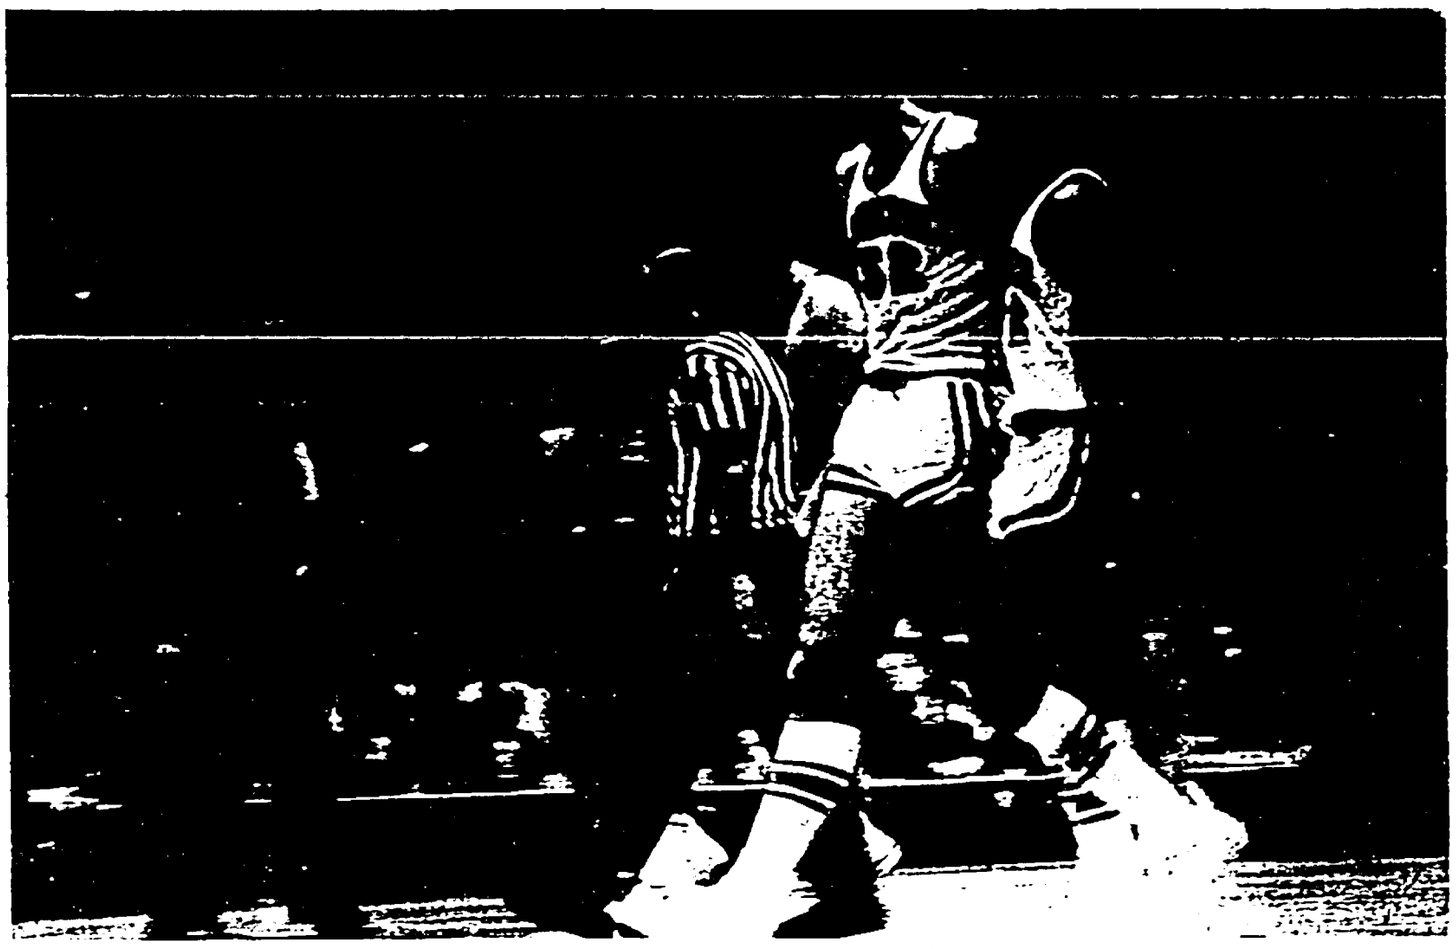
Then suddenly the Syracuse press started producing Temple turnovers and Roy's Boys, especially Bob Kouwe, got red-hot from the field.

With six minutes left until intermission, three straight fast-break baskets by Kouwe, Ernie Austin and Bill Smith, followed by buckets by Bill Finney and John Suder gave the Orange a 36-26 advantage.

They maintained this ten-point lead through the rest of the half, although Temple kept pecking away. A buzzer basket by Suder gave SU a 48-38 halftime edge.

The first-half story was reflected in the shooting statistics. Syracuse was a hot 51% from the field on 21 of 41, while Temple shot a respectable 47%. But the real story was defense and a balanced attack. Case held Baum to only four points and the Orange showed four men with eight or more points.

They hung onto their lead during the second half, but the Owls kept narrowing the gap as Baum finally began hitting. Suder hit twice in a row to give Syracuse a 71-63 lead with 7:30 to go, and important buckets by Case and Austin maintained the edge at 75-67.



SU suddenly became cold, and Temple edged up until they finally knotted the score, 79-79, when Ed Mast scored on a three-point play, as Smith fouled out with 16 points after a fine effort.

After a Temple basket, Kouwe scored to produce an 81-all deadlock with a minute and a half left in the game. The Owls then held the ball for a final shot, hoping for a victory or, at the worst, overtime.

With 24 seconds on the clock, the Owls' Comer drove for the basket and was fouled by Suder. One of two free throws gave Temple a one-point lead. A Suder shot in the final moments was off the rim, and after Syracuse, forced to foul, gave up two foul shots, Suder's uncontested layup finished the scoring.

The Orange lost, but they showed that they are capable of playing hustling, good basketball on both ends of the court.

The balanced attack, with Kouwe getting 20, Smith and Suder 16, Case 14, and Austin 10 and the excellent press displayed tonight should encourage Syracuse fans. A win could come Saturday night against American University.

CONTROL YOURSELF. Big Bill Smith mumbles to himself about a referee's call as he and Ernie Austin walk downcourt during last Saturday night's game against Massachusetts. The boys had more to grumble about after last night's loss to Temple, extending the Syracuse losing streak to six games.

Soul sounds a memory

Ed Agranowitz

When Syracuse bade farewell to winning basketball seasons last year, it took with it a home court advantage which was a favorite in the hearts of fans and players alike -- the playing of soul sounds during the pre-game and halftime warmups.

Excitement filled the air when the Orange charged onto the court with the Four Tops, Temptations and Impressions cheering them on. The music served not only to inspire the Orange players and fans, but occasionally caught visiting teams off guard and gave Syracuse momentum before the game even started.

Such was the case when West Virginia visited Manley Field House two years ago for a Saturday TV game. The favored Mountaineers actually stopped their warmups to watch Vaughn Harper perform his patented pregame show to the music, and the visitors were never in the game.

But then at the beginning of last season, SU's crack athletic department, being quick to recognize a good thing, eliminated the records. The Orange band was the replacement, and this organization provides the pre-game melodies to this day.

Somehow the fans didn't appreciate the change and the band was greeted at the games somewhat less than cordially. Their selections of "Erie Canal" and "Everything's Coming Up Roses" just didn't seem to go over as big as "Reach Out" and "Standing in the Shadows of Love."

Undaunted, the band played on. The fans, meanwhile, realized that their protests were helpless, and so they just sat quietly by while the band was swinging.

Saturday night the nadir of basketball music disgrace was reached. The Orangemen, needing all the encouragement they can get in a rocky season, were treated to a new kind of warmup tune. With the band sitting idle, the team was greeted by some lullabye-type FM radio music.

This generated about as much excitement as a Washington Senator - Chicago White Sox baseball game on a Wednesday afternoon in August.

Bob Kouwe and Dave Aldrich, two seniors who have seen both sides, would love to see a return to soul. "The records pumped you up and really helped you to get started," said Kouwe. "And the records also brought the fans to life," added Aldrich.

Vaughn Harper described the situation perfectly. "The band is very good for the type of music they play," said Harper last year, "but for basketball there is just no replacing the Temptations."

Therefore, there would seem to be the obvious solution of giving the team their soul sounds before the game, and letting the band play during time-outs, and during the halftime break. Sounds easy.

How do the coaches feel? Fred Lewis was all for it last year. "I don't particularly like the music myself, but if the team likes it, they should have it," said the former Orange mentor.

Roy Danforth felt the same way when he said before the season, "The team wants the records, so I want them."

So why no records? "I have nothing to do with it," says Danforth, "It's a mutual agreement between the athletic department and the band director."

"We've tried really hard to get the records back this year," said Kouwe, the team captain. But no joy.

Last year the athletic department permitted the soul sounds to be aired only at the final home game as a "favor" to the three departing seniors. But that was the last hurrah.

The team wants the records.
The coach wants the records.
The fans want the records.
The athletic department doesn't want the records.

Does Kouwe think the athletic department might ever see the light and bring back the soul?

"Not a chance."

Make sense?

The Dean of Women and due process

The recent agreement between the University Judicial Board and the Dean of Women is a baby step forward in improving due process at Syracuse University. So far this year the only women to appear before the Judicial Board were the two involved in the "soup-sipping" case and these coeds were sent by the Dean of Men's Office. Furthermore, the Judicial Board has received thus far only one notice of action taken against a coed by the Dean of Women.

Heaven knows, Dean Smith, that we too are aware of the virtue of Syracuse University coeds. But even we don't believe that only three disciplinary cases have arisen from the SU coed population this year.

Consequently, we think the Judicial Board was correct in requesting the names of all women against whom the Dean of Women's office takes disciplinary action. The names must not go beyond the UJB but without them it could not check occasionally to see if the students disciplined were offerred the option of appearing before the student Board.

This procedure is also more in keeping with the spirit of due process written into Rule One by the Council on Student Life. It requires expulsions to be made "through University established procedures."

Although the Dean of Women may have been right when she noted disciplining students in the privacy of her office is "the same as the procedure used by the Dean of Men and everywhere else in the University," we don't believe this procedure guarantees even the simplist requirements of due process.

Need for total planning

Toward real autonomy

By Abe Wagner

The proposals put forth under the name of "dorm autonomy" have aroused much due interest on the part of both students and administrators. What the overall proposal states, however, is neither novel or complete nor does it draw into the picture the third important part of the University triangle; the faculty.

To consider these problems in order. The idea of so-called "dorm-autonomy" is part of a much larger, total concept in contemporary education at the multiversity known under various names such as the "residential college." Designed to cope with many of the problems confronting massive educational complexes, the residential college creates a sense of community within the residents, by creating a structure small enough so that the students can still relate as individuals to their environment. This basic property exists within the current proposal, cloaked in verbiage such as "controls over their own destinies" and "a humanizing experience."

Thus, in order to maintain a proper perspective within (or adjunct to) the larger structure of the entire University, the autonomous dorm must be considered not only in terms of an individualizing and humanizing process as the present proponents display it, but also in terms of the educational process and the complete concept. If half-way and incomplete measures are undertaken now, it will be to no one's surprise if the results are also halfway and incomplete.

To further complete the ideas thus far proposed by members of the CSL, we can look to the third problem briefly mentioned above; the inclusion of the faculty into the total picture. So basic to the educational process, it is easy to overlook this segment in early and superficial attempts to create a new experience, as in the present case. A proposal such as the one currently under question may be hastly to lump the faculty into the vast morass of the "establishment" along with their administrative colleagues and written off as antithetical to any attempt at autonomy.

A closer look, reveals the integral student-teacher relationship and suggests that any complete plan must seek to maintain this as an integral part of the autonomy if it is to succeed.

Plans now in existence at many "Ivy League" universities and theoretical ones such as that proposed by Robert M. Hutchins find the need for autonomy on the level of the living centers as a dual necessity, both for the student seeking to relate to thlarge university as an individual, and for the same University trying to relate to the individual needs of students by offering a personalized, meaningful education.

Looking to other major institutions that have adopted similar plans would indicate that faculty members be located within the autonomous dorm as part of the total experience. For Syracuse, this could mean making available some Resident Advisor rooms as faculty offices. Many of the faculty working in currently crowded conditions would welcome the opportunity to have large private offices among the student body, just as the residents of the autonomous dorm would welcome many of their teachers as part-time residents.

This, of course, is not the whole answer either. It is simply an additional step toward an effective and complete concept. What is important now, is that CSL and others show at least the same amount of foresight and total planning they would expect from an often criticized administration.

The politics of Jabberwocky

CSL proposal

By Fred Tuccillo

'Twas brillig, and the slithy toves
Did gyre and gimble in the wabe;
All mimsy were the borogroves,
And the mome raths outgrabe.

-Lewis Carroll

There is a certain sense of the harmless in reading about Alice's encounter with nonsense verse in THROUGH THE LOOKING GLASS. The lines of "jabberwocky" contain no significant message so its language is no cause for frustration. But now something akin to that language is being applied to an elusive concept called "dorm autonomy." The Politics of Jabberwocky is upon us.

The nonsense verse we encounter is contained in three pages of mimeographed utopia headed, "Proposal for Dorm Autonomy," and designed to cure what ails the SU dorm-dweller. The SU dorm-dweller, it turns out, is up-tight because "The restriction of academia to the classroom stultifies curiosity" and because "Dormitories are cultural graveyards" and "The individual student is lost in a labyrinth lacking necessary services."

Oh.

The solution, according to the student members of the Council on Student Life (Move over, Lewis Carroll) is to remove the dormitories from the jurisdiction of the administration. That way the dorm-dweller will get himself unstultified through "lectures, panel discussions, bull sessions, faculty visitations, debates...experimental courses...revolving exhibition, movies, concerts, readings."

The frenetic pace needed to enjoy such a "total experience" in his leisure time will no doubt lead the dorm-dweller to appreciate those special moments in the "meditation room."

Assuming the dorm-dweller has the time and/or the inclination to undertake any or all of those activities, it has probably occurred to the more inquisitive reader to ask just what all those activities have to do with dorm autonomy. Is it necessary to break away from administration control to institute such fun and games?

In CSL Jabberwocky - yes. In plain English - no.

In plain English, that tidal wave of culture (It covers most of the three pages) is merely the window dressing for the real goal of dorm autonomy, the only one which necessitates seperation from administrative jurisdiction - dorm control of drinking and visitation rules. That is what dorm autonomy means to the average dorm-dweller; the administration isn't restricting him from doing any or all of those other enriching things. (But then, it is not apparent that anyone bothered to ask him in the first place. "All dorm-dwellers participating in the Stultification Survey please sharpen your pencils.")

It seems however that this is the way student members of CSL propose total liberalization of drinking and visitation regulations to the faculty and administration members of CSL. (A spoonful of sugar makes the medicine go down, assuming the elders don't read too carefully.)

"When I use a word," Humpty Dumpty said in a rather scornful tone, "it means just what I choose it to mean - neither more nor less."

"The question is," said Alice, whether you can make words mean different things."

The only axiom of the Politics of Jabberwocky is - "Talk about everything, except what you are talking about."

But alas, some less enlightened student leaders find Jabberwocky beyond their intellectual grasp. They cannot understand why one does not use straightforward English to discuss such important matters. (Shame on Stephen Tober and the Booth Dorm Council for failing to see the value of gibberish, for arbitrarily rejecting gobbledygook!)

One wonders, though, if the "less enlightened" are really the less enlightened. After all, even Alice had the good sense to leave Jabberwocky to Humpty Dumpty.

Didn't think invasion would come

By ANDRIJ BILYK
Associate Editor

"We did not think the Russian invasion would come, not because we thought Russian policies had changed but after all, this was 1968. Such a thing could not happen in 1968."

So spoke recent immigrant and former Czech student Cyril Hromnik to about 25 people crowding the International Student Center last night. This was the first of the "Great Decision" discussions sponsored by the World Affairs Council. The topic was: Czechoslovakia, Russia and Eastern Europe.

"We did not have much freedom in Czechoslovakia," Hromnik said. "Some of us studying East Africa applied for visas to go abroad. I got one to go to France but it took a year to get it."

Hromnik, who also worked for Radio Prague, said that after Dubcek's arrival a new era of hope was born for the Czechoslovakian people. "In the radio (station) I often heard private conversations against the Russians but every week we had a discussion about how to broadcast and what to say. Some people wanted to tell the truth, others said we must be careful because of the Russians."

We were going toward socialism with the human faith, said Hromnik, but the Russians told us we were going towards the West and so they came to help.

Professor Michael Thomas, discussion leader, pointed out that perhaps the Russians have their own domino theory. If Czechoslovakia, which is actually a spear through Eastern Europe bordering right on Soviet Ukraine, was to move toward the West, would this not have a disastrous effect on the Warsaw Alliance?

Suzanne Mikula, graduate student of history and late 1940 Czechoslovakian immigrant, then gave background information helpful to understanding the Czechoslovakian situation.

"First," she said, "we must remember that Czechoslovakia was created in 1918. Two different peoples, the Czechs and the Slovaks, comprised the Federation of Czecho-Slovakia.

"By 1920, however, President Masaryk and his cabinet decided that for purposes of rule and stability the country must be unified under the Czechs."

The Slovaks, said Miss Mikula, cried that they had been tricked. It must be remembered that Dubcek is himself a Slovak and that part of his success must be attributed to the Slovakian support. One of Dubcek's main reforms was to make Czechoslovakia a federation again, and as of last January, it is a Czecho-Slovakia.

Secondly, she said, "It is important to recognize that until the betrayal of Munich, Czechoslovakia had been West-oriented. But sometime during the war the Czechoslovakian government realized it could no longer be dependent upon the West."

Hromnik said that the Czechoslovakian reaction in 1968 was more pronounced against the Russians than that which had greeted them 20 years earlier. The contemporary philosophy is, "Don't be heroic like the Hungarians and get yourself killed all over the street," said Hromnik. "Try to lead your life normally but, almost as an afterthought, if there is a chance to blow up a train, then dash. Go do it."

Campus-community relations

AMA program to aid ghetto businesses

By VIC LIVINGSTON

A further step in bettering campus-community relations is planned by the SU chapter of the American Marketing Association (AMA). The AMA is initiating a small-business consulting project, allowing SU volunteers to aid ghetto-owned businesses with free consultation and advice concerning marketing, finances, advertising, and other administrative considerations.

The AMA, headed by President Rick Murray and Vice Pres. Marcia Joslyn, hopes to assist small, struggling ghetto-owned and operated businesses in developing into effective, profitable concerns that will ultimately benefit the inner-city community and improve understanding of current ghetto problems.

The project, according to the officials, will be staffed by volunteers from not only the business school, but sociology, advertising, psychology, and other students as well. The volunteers will approach businesses recommended by the Federal Small Business Administration, PEACE, the coordinating group for volunteer ghetto workers in Syracuse, in addition to businesses selected by the AMA itself.

The volunteers will then work closely with the local merchants, suggesting innovative business techniques that hopefully will help the business succeed, officials said. At the same time, the students will learn first-hand the problems of small ghetto businesses and will develop a knowledge of life in the inner-city.

Both Miss Joslyn and Murray anticipate some problems, but they feel their project will ultimately be a success.

"These people are striving to succeed in their work. They are determined, energetic people who are working for what most of us were born with," said Murray.

A major hurdle will be obtaining the trust and confidence of the local merchants. Murray expects to meet with some ill-feeling from merchants who feel that the effort is tokensim designed to clear the conscience of the affluent community. Also, some businessmen may reject any outside help, wishing to "make it" on their own.

"The project will be new," Murray said, "but I feel we can prove to the merchants that we are sincere in our efforts. They will probably be willing to have our assistance, but will rightly demand success. We will try to choose businesses with problems we can handle, so our efforts will be more likely to succeed."

The selection of businesses chosen for the project, Murray said, will be limited to ghetto-owned and operated businesses only. "It is a fact that some ghetto businesses exploit the local community," said Murray. "We will aid any localbusiness whose owners, black or white, live in the inner city. We don't want to help the businessman who lives comfortably in Fayetteville. We don't want to alienate other merchants, but it is the owners of the local ghetto-owned businesses that are trying to better their lot.

"We may cause hard feelings among owners of outside-controlled businesses. If we do, we're sorry. We are not trying to discriminate; we want to help the ghetto businessman who lives in the area. These are the people we feel can benefit the most from the project," Murray said.

One of the project's problems is assembling a volunteer staff that is able to devote adequate time. Each volunteer must spend five hours a week working with a ghetto business. Persons interested in working for the project should contact the AMA office in Lubin Hall. The volunteers, Murray said, will have the opportunity of examining the socio-economic problems of the ghetto while aiding local business.

The administration and faculty are enthusiastic about the project, Murray said. He hopes a three-credit business course will arise from the initial project.

A similar and partially successful program of this type was begun last semester by the Association of Graduate Business Students. The new program will examine the results of the past effort and add new innovations, while expanding the scope of the project. Special emphasis will be placed on selection of businesses and volunteers.

The AMA hopes their project will serve as a basis for cooperation and a bond of friendship and trust between the inner-city and the University.

"Instead of trying to violently change the system from without, we are trying to change the system from within, to work in the ghetto businessman's favor. These people are trying to make it within the system. We feel that we can help them. Hopefully, the upper classes of society will then become more involved with the problems of the ghetto."

Maxwell's Dean Campbell finds transition to be easy

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

Everything looks the same in that large comfortable innermost of the inner offices on the second floor of Maxwell, except there's a new man behind the desk and his bookcases aren't filled yet. The books will come later; right now Dean Alan Campbell is a busy man.

Campbell recently took a one month round-the-world tour with his predecessor, Stephen Bailey, to meet the Maxwell School's contacts in Africa and Asia, and officially has been Dean of the Maxwell School for slightly more than a week.

Campbell described the transition as an "easy one." He and Bailey have worked closely since Campbell came to Syracuse in 1961 and their relationship will continue as "a kind of partnership" now that Bailey is with the S.U. Research Corporation.

Campbell, a well-dressed and urbane man with a Ph.D. from Harvard, spoke easily and casually about the job ahead. Promoting the interdisciplinary activities among the departments of the Maxwell School will be among the Dean's primary concerns. While his work has centered on metropolitan affairs, he has had extensive contact with other departments in the school and forsees no difficulty applying his efforts to the "total Maxwell School."

DEAN ALAN CAMPBELL

In his role as an administrator, Campbell said he will "miss most his relationship with students." His teaching load will be limited to his popular urban government course for undergraduates and a seminar on metropolitan affairs.

When asked if he planned any additions or changes to the Maxwell staff, Campbell indicated his immediate concerns would be with getting support to maintain the faculty the school now has. The prestige of the Maxwell school greatly enhances professors' reputations, and they are therefore subjects of frequent offers from other institutions. It is safe to assume that the Dean himself has been subject to much of this temptation.

The research that Campbell and his staff have worked on for the past several years has centered on: (1) the allocation of resources between the cities and the suburbs and the functions to which those resources are applied such as transportation, education or welfare; and (2) the politics, government and financing of public education with emphasis on urban schools."

Campbell is now acting as a project director for the Committee for Economic Development and will prepare a "policy statement on the whole question of urban policy." He will also work as a director of Arden House and provide research on the relation of state governments to urban problems.

Many of the contacts that Campbell had in metropolitan affairs circles in Washington, D.C. have been broken with the advent of the Nixon administration. When asked the direction he would like to see the Departments of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) and Health Education and Welfare (HEW), Lake Campbell said that the "solution of social problems in urban areas is in improvement of urban education." He indicated that states haven't been responsive to the problem and the answer now lies in federal resources.

Campbell is occasionally mentioned as a possible candidate for state office or federal appointment, but he discounted anything for the immediate future. When posed with the question, he smiled and said it reminded him of the time soon after he became chairman of the Hofstra College political science department in 1954. On that occasion, he was asked what his goals for life were and he replied "to be a good political science teacher." He has come a ways since then and for the time being, looks happy.

UNIVERSITY REGENT THEATRE

AND film forum PRESENTATION

Steigers moved

Presented with SU centennial Medals

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

A world renowned actor, winner of an Academy Award and various film critic awards, was noticeably moved when he received a Syracuse University Centennial Medal yesterday. The presentation of Centennial Medals in the Regent Experimental Theatre to Rod Steiger and his wife, Claire Bloom, was a surprise to them both.

The medals, presented by Chancellor William P. Tolley, were created in 1967 by the university's board of trustees. The medals are inscribed, "For Outstanding Achievement." The Steigers are the first actors to receive them.

Up to the time of the presentation, Steiger always had a smile or a quip in public. While he was seated listening to the chancellor read the inscription on the medal, however, Steiger was solemn. He stared relentlessly at the chancellor and didn't move a muscle.

When the chancellor finished reading, Steiger walked to him silently and stood in his characteristic pose, legs spread apart and arms crossed. The actor was still wearing his cowboy boots.

As Chancellor Tolley was about to put the medal around Steiger's neck, the actor reached out for it, as if he was impatient to touch it. After it was hanging from his neck, he gazed down at it and fingered it.

Steiger gave a brief, hurried and only partly comprehensible acceptance speech. For the first time since he arrived here, Steiger seemed less than certain of what he wanted to say.

"On behalf of my wife and myself, we are overwhelmed with your enthusiasm and flattered by your presentation," he said. "We will attempt when showing this to our daughter, Anna, to remember our responsibility for the continuance in life terms of the poetic miracle of human beings."

It wasn't until several minutes later, when Steiger was answering the questions of drama students, that he returned to his casual and frequently humorous manner.

Several times during the day Steiger kiddingly referred to his honorary title of professor which was bestowed upon him Wednesday night. When a student standing behind him addressed him as professor, Steiger turned around to look at him.

"Did you say professor my boy," said Steiger in a mock-British accent which evoked student laughter. "You are undoubtedly one of the most brilliant students in this college."

Before the presentation of the medals, the Steigers took a brief tour of the Regent Theater Complex. Steiger gazed politely at everything but the only things he examined carefully were several miniature stage settings. He said he had studied set design for two years and had thought of making it a profession.

Steiger watched his wife as she fingered and discussed constumes and props. When she entered the room where scenery is painted she said, "It smells so good in here, it's the smell of the theater."

During the tour, Steiger called out to his wife, as he has done frequently, "Are you all right Clara?" He addresses her as Clara, or occasionally when few people are around, as "Bean-bum." Whenever Steiger introduces her, he refers to her as Miss Bloom.

"I know what an actress' mind is like," said Steiger. "She wants her credits too. I remember the first time I introduced my wife as Mrs. Steiger. She said, 'My name is Miss Bloom.' I got the message."

After the tour and the presentation of the medals, Steiger attended three student question and answer sessions. During the last session at St. Mary's, Steiger said he was trying not to sound repetitive since many of the questions he was asked were asked before. He rubbed his eyes and forehead as though fatigued and reached for a cup of coffee.

He was asked why he did the movie, "The Illustrated Man." The film is a version of the Ray Bradbury collection of science fiction stories.

"Ray Bradbury is an incredibly important writer and is also a friend of mine," said Steiger. "He was a friend before I did the film. I have great respect for him. I love his compassion for people. He does not write science fiction stories by the way. He hides his 6 jobs in 6 years is called job hopping?

Not necessarily.
Not at Du Pont.

We have a practice called "planned mobility," a kind of intramural job hopping. It means you don't go into a training program. You go to work—at different growth jobs that broaden you professionally, benefit you personally, and help you find the specific field you want to grow in. Here's how it worked for Jim Davis, an M.E. from the University of Pittsburgh:

"My first assignment was installation of improved polymer transfer systems," says Jim. "Then some research. A patent was issued on my device to apply steam to a running threadline. Next I was a college recruiter. After that I worked on a five-year forecast of the company's engineering needs. Now I'm in a cost reduction group."

For Jim, it added up to six assignments in six years. This may be some kind of a record. But he didn't waste time. Every day of it was solid profit.

Your Du Pont recruiter is a guy a lot like Jim. Ask him about planned mobility. Ask him anything. The coupon will get you some background information before you meet him.

Calling a farce a farce

"THE KNACK" — the scientific approach to seduction

By JIM KING

There are two things a director can do with a farce-comedy like "The Knack:" He can keep it moving or he can leave it to die. I believe there is a species of fish that survive on this same scheme. Nevertheless, the University's Drama Department is presenting a mobile production of "The Knack" this weekend and next weekend at the Experimental Theatre.

This may be a little hard to swallow, but people are still writing farces. Ann Jellicoe's modest play, only a few years old, bears the distinctive markings of that genre. It is fraught with ridiculous situations, and probably is definitely not the order of the evening. Still, in this particular play the characters seem a little more than one-dimensional, and there is even a hint that the author is trying to make the statement that human flaws and fancies are absurd, although this idea is implicit in all farce.

But it's becoming more and more difficult to call a farce a farce--we start scrounging around and trying to corner something significant. I don't think you can read too much into "The Kanck," unless you start digging into the old corruption-of-innocence bag. Quite simply, and simple is the word for it, the play is about the knack of making a girl. One of the characters has developed this knack into a science; another wants to learn how to manipulate women. When a naive girl happens into their apartment looking for the YWCA, she becomes part of a demonstration, as the confident teacher illustrates the fine points of the seduction process to his awe-filled and envious student.

It seems that only the Electronic Age could induce a play where the characters spit dialogue at each other at a staccato clip. Miss Jellicoe's idea of humor is to repeat words so that language itself becomes bludgeon. Improvisational groups, groping for something to say, often succumb to this peculiarly unfunny tactic. It doesn't get laughs in the play, but a good director can make an audience overlook it.

The characters are not allowed to sit down and think about themselves, or to explore how they got where they are; they have to keep moving. And the best thing a director can do is to slip the actors some Benzedrine, place a metronome back stage to maintain the comic timing, and keep things light.

Rick Graves directed this production, and although I thought the first act was a little ponderous, the actors achieved a refreshing ease in the second act and sailed into a last act that bristled with hilarious bits of stage business. Graves keeps his actors precariously busy, ushering them through an obstacle course of bed springs and ladders and masses of furniture. His success comes through the knack of whipping up a pace that doesn't give the audience time to think about the play. And with a play that is poised between insanity and inanity, this knack comes in particularly handy.

Mr. Graves has an excellent cast working under him and, more important, working with each other.

Kenneth Cox, as the young man who wanted to learn the knack is the perfect specimen of confidence trying to assert itself and falling on its face. Mr. Cox crumbles his scarecrow body on the furniture, gawks, gloats, simpers, and conveys emotion through the shape of his mouth. He has a magnificant moment in the third act where he learns to saunter sensually, but not before he has staggered around the stage like the Frankenstein monster.

Don Brinks carries a formidable amount of authority as the active stud who leaps out the window after any girl who passes his home. The character's narcissism and particularly his terrifying bestiality, come across handsomely.

The Chancellor

During 100 years, many great men have led SU

By JEAN HAVENS
Associate Editor

In 1970 Syracuse University will celebrate its Centennial Year. As the tale of SU's first 100 years is told and re-told, the names Winchell, Haven, Sims, Day, Flint, Graham and Tolley will appear time and time again. Seven particular men, seven administrations–seven chancellors of Syracuse University.

Before their story even begins, however, the name of yet another man looms large, that of the Rev. Daniel Steele. Dr. Steele was the administrative head of the University while the Trustees sought to obtain the very best man possible for the position of SU's first chancellor.

Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy, Steele was faced with the awesome task of rallying the new students and faculty to the support of an equally new university. During his temporary administration, courses were developed and listed in a small catalogue, admissions standards were established. Tuition was set at $60 a year, and the cornerstone for the Hall of Languages was laid.

Steele's decision to retire in 1872 gave added impetus to the search for a chancellor. Ultimately selected was Dr. Alexander Winchell, professor of Geology, Zoology, and Botany at the University of Michigan. This prominent scientific scholar, lecturer and author had received the reputation of being quite a radical. Attacked by some for his acceptance of Darwin's theory, his application of the theories of evolution to earth history and the creation of man had attracted considerable attention.

On the day of his inauguration as Syracuse's first chancellor, Winchell was given a warning by a senior who delivered the congratulatory address on behalf of the students. It read: "Your duties will be arduous. Discordant opinions must be harmonized; financial embarrassments avoided; the interests of sound education conserved, and the University established in undoubted permanency and unquestioned excellence."

Along with these ominous-sounding charges, the student told Winchell that he was "called to the Chancellorship of an institution which is yet in the precarious period of infancy, to you is committed its care; by you is to be formed its character; through you is to be determined its reputation; and for you it is to be a monument of glory or a tumulus of reproach."

Winchell's work seemed cut out for him. From the beginning of his administration in January, 1973, to his resignation in 1874, his job was plagued by ever-increasing duties and personal problems. The students almost worshipped him, but he, himself, longed to be back in the classroom teaching.

As Prof. Frank Smalley wrote in the "University Herald" of March 23, 1891, Chancellor Winchell resigned due to "the serious financial embarrassment of the University, at that time, and (his) conviction that he was not so well adapted to the work of a financial agent as to the far more congenial duties of the lecture room."

So Chancellor Winchell was gone, but not forgotten. At a meeting of the Trustees on June 23, 1874, a Geology, Botany and Zoology chair was endowed, with Dr. Winchell in mind. Also on that busy day the Trustees announced that the fledgling institution was finally out of debt, and that the Rev. Erastus Otis Haven had been elected to the position of chancellor.

Dr. Haven, a former Massachusetts senator and former president of Northwestern University, may have come in shortly after the University was declared solvent, but his administration was still troubled by monetary worries. He brought to his office experience and a reputation for scholarship and efficiency, but, not being a financial wizard, he could do little to develop the University materially.

The first of SU's chancellors to be an ordained Methodist minister, Haven was in the midst of impending financial disaster for SU when the 1880 Methodist convention elected him a bishop and assigned him to San Francisco. This promotion made it necessary

Trustees, faculty scrutinize candidates

Chancellor search shrouded in secrecy

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

The selection of a new chancellor appears to be the best-guarded secret on campus. And, according to William Clark who served as the acting chairman of the Trustee Committee to select a Chancellor at several meetings, it will remain that way.

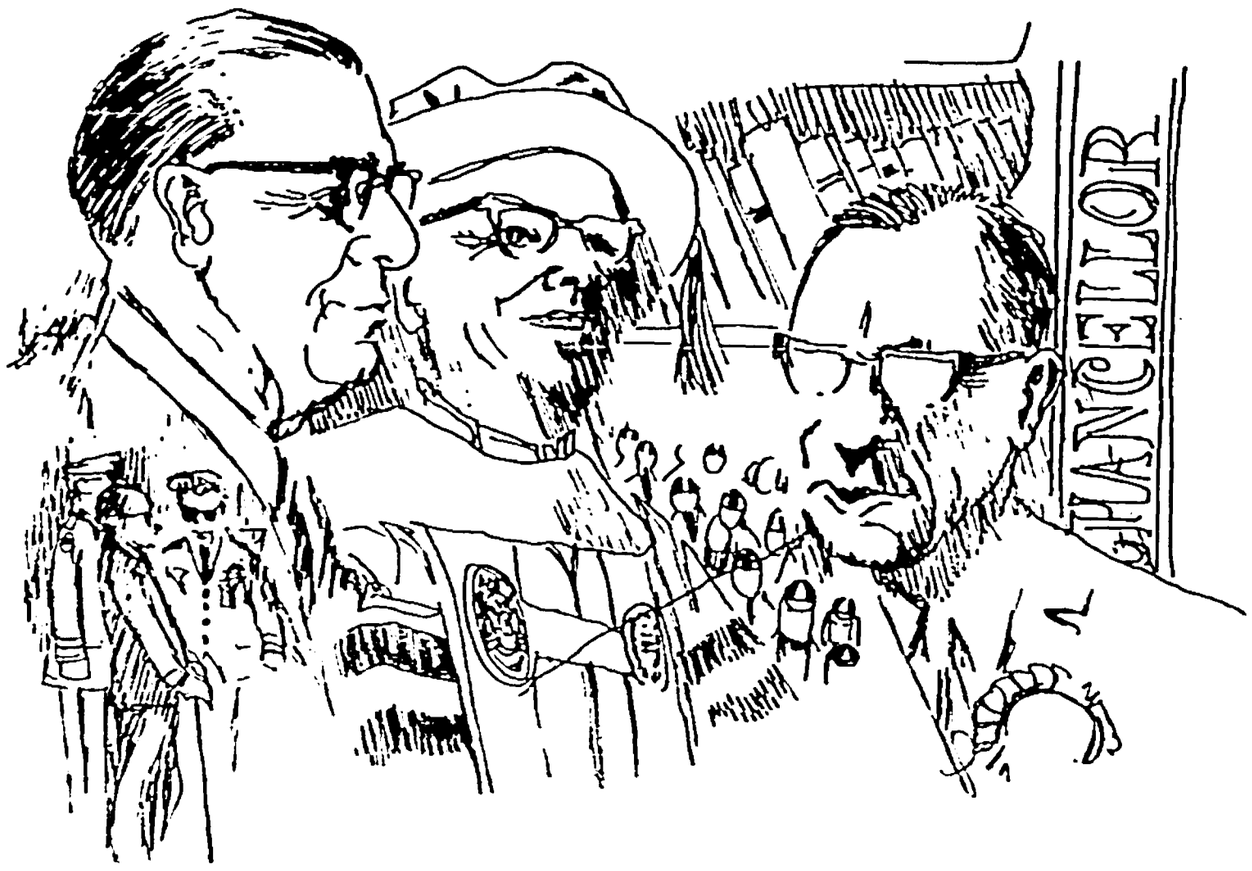
By tradition, the search for a new chancellor has been shrouded in secrecy. If anyone turns down the job, this fact must be concealed lest the position lose its attractiveness for other candidates on the list.

In September, three committees were formed, one with students, another with faculty members and the third composed of members of the Board of Trustees. The three committees have met separately and jointly and hope to submit one name for approval by the Board of Trustees.

Robert Cutler, a trustee, said the committees had hoped to complete their review of the recommendations by the first of this year. However, other trustees and faculty members said no date has ever been set.

A list of criteria has been drawn up for committees to follow during their evaluations of the candidates. It reads in part: "He should have the following qualifications--an understanding of the conditions that are necessary to the process of education; he should be a person of proved administrative ability, vision, imagination and sound judgment."

Other qualifications are that he be sensitive to student concerns and values and have the ability to communicate with them.



The committees are looking for a man who is under 50 years of age but consider it more important that he have a youthful outlook and be open to innovation.

Dean of the School of Liberal Arts, Frederic J. Kramer, who is serving as the chairman of the faculty committee, said the man's field of primary interest is not critical but rather his experience, general background and administrative experience are more important.

Although several chancellors have been ordained Methodist ministers, Kramer said it is not a primary consideration of any of the groups that the men under consideration be in this category.

One of the faculty members said three lists had been made from the original applications. The highest number on the primary list at one time was 20, according to that member, and of those, three or four have asked that their names be withdrawn.

The same committee member said the active list is down to about a dozen but that it fluctuates from day to day and may increase or decrease.

'Man for all liaisons'

Demands upon a university chancellor are many and intense. Dr. Robert Goheen, president of Princeton, has written that he must serve as a "scholar, educational leader, financial wizard, fund raiser, public relations expert and a ceremonial figure of stature." Sometimes within several days, a chancellor must attend cocktail parties with alumni, official academic functions with deans, pep rallies with students and cordial teas with potential benefactors.

"There are nights when you want to say to hell with it all," laments U.C.L.A.'s Franklin Murphy, who resigned last year at the age of 52.

Is voice representative?

Students gain foothold in power hierarchy

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

In the 96 years of chancellor reign at Syracuse University, students have failed to puncture the veto power of the man who sits behind the large desk on the third floor of the Administration Building. This year, however, the student voice of SU has struggled for recognition and has finally succeeded in attaining an unprecedented powerful level--students have a voice in the selection of the next man who will be holding that veto power, the future chancellor.

The Student Committee on the Selection of a Chancellor (SCSC) has merited equal representation with the faculty and trustee committees. And since its origin in the fall, student members have participated in the determination of criteria, nomination of candidates, the screening process, the viewing of candidates' credentials and expressing preferences for the primary list.

Liberal Attitudes

Just the mere existence of a student committee for such an important academic decision reflects the progress of a liberal attitude at SU. But, how powerful is this student committee in reality? Is the University merely trying to establish good public relations with the student body, or is it making a sincere effort to listen to student interests?

Although the whole committee, trustees, faculty, and students, have been working together for several months, it is still too early to evaluate the effectiveness of the student voice in the choice of a new chancellor.

The real definition of student voice will be determined when a conflict occurs. Such a clash will probably happen when the final list's priority rating is determined. Although SCSC chairman Ray Rafalik claims that SU students could "live with any of the top candidates," he believes that the critical period of student voice will be determined at this point.

If the concluding priority list represents a compromise which suitably reflects the opinions of all parties, then it will have been shown that the students did indeed hold a respected position of influence. Such a conclusion would in reality be a victory for students. But, if the Board of Trustees ignores student interests at this final point, then it will be concluded that the student voice of SU has again been abused.

But, will such a clash occur to reflect the victor? Probably, but possibly not. Thus far, the students, faculty and trustees have operated in harmonious agreement. "We've worked in accord up to this point," commented Rafalik.

Extensive Investigation

Such progress should not be overlooked. Thus far the committee as a whole has completed fantastic investigatory work. After the nominations of approximately one hundred candidates, the credentials and qualifications of the candidates are viewed. A primary list was then drawn up with the prime candidates placed on an "A" list. These individuals have then been extensively interviewed and questioned by representatives of all three committees.

Throughout this investigatory process only small differences of opinion have occurred between the trustees and students. Rafalik said that these differences are "mechanistic" in nature, those which are typical of any organizational system. Any disagreements have been brought out in discussions which have resulted in compromises. Such a process indicates maturity for both the trustees and students and indicates the rapport they have with each other.

"We've (the students) wielded as much influence as the faculty, if not more," commented Rafalik.

It has been released that presently the student committee is "at odds" with the trustees as to whom to investigate after the six prime candidates, if it is decided to take such action. Other than this, no disagreements have been aired outside of the committee whole.

The probability of conflicts is high, however, due to the extremes of viewpoints represented by both groups. Because the trustees are basically convervative, the student committee members tend to express a more radical view in order to counterbalance their views.

Hicks Views 'Success'

Thus, based on its workings so far the SCSC can be deemed a success. Student Government President Chuck Hicks feels that SCSC is the most effective student committee to date, over that of the Council on Student Life. This student committee has proved, said Hicks, that avenues of change can occur without conflict.

"I think it shows there's a time when a university has to mold itself around students rather than students mold around the university," continued Hicks.

The most amazing attribute of SCSC is the fact that it is the first and only student organization which does not have the veto power of the chancellor. Any "veto power" resides in the consensus of opinion on the committee. Trustees, of course, can overrule the rest of the committee, but such an overruling does not rest in a single man's hands but rather in the entire Board.

Thus, students at SU finally have a hand in one of the most important decisions confronting the University today. But, are the students' voices being reflected?

Yes, the members of the SCSC have been presenting their viewpoints and opinions, but has the average student's opinion been reflected, sought, or considered?

Unfortunately, no. SU finally has a student line of communication to the power-wielders, the trustees, but communication on the other side of the fence, to the students, does not exist. Although SCSC members have repeatedly stated that they are open to opinions, suggestions, candidates, etc., they have not sufficiently publicized their committee and worked to gain student response as student representatives. Some students don't even know that such a committee exists.

"Open Communication"

Hicks also has praised committee members due to their "open line of communication," but referred such communication as applicable to trustees and faculty members on the whole committee. He noted that one of the weaker points of the committee is their lack of relation to the student body.

Defending his committee, Rafalik enumerated three trials for student response which were offered to the student population at SU: (1) publicity of nomination forms in the D.O.; (2) distribution of the forms to all fraternity and sorority houses; (3) exposure of these forms in the St. Mary's dormitory complex site. Such distribution, however, yielded not a single response from the University "So, once again SU comes through with its apathy," Rafalik bitterly concluded. He admitted that no further push for student response was initiated after such discouragement and that the committee has relied on its own intuitions and varied composition to present varied views of students to the committee.

Chuck Hicks, however, buoyed on by the recent student response to CSL demands and controversies, plans to organize "one last push" for SCSC organization. Having received a list of 32 grievances from students at the December CSL meeting, Hicks plans to hold "storm meetings" in dorms within the month. He will

Presidential fatigue

Harrowing position at the top claims its toll

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

At this moment, approximately 300 American colleges or universities are searching for new chancellors. Almost all the departing leaders have one thing in common--exhaustion, both physical and mental.

A number of academe's chief executives who resigned last year were well before retirement age. One reason for leaving was admitted frankly by Florida's J. Wayne Reitz, 59, who left his post in 1967 after suffering what he called "presidential fatigue."

Although most college leaders are not literally too exhausted to carry on, they agree almost unanimously that the pressures on campus presidents are too intense for one man to bear for long.

Chancellors must serve as educational leaders, financial wizards, fund raisers, public relations experts and ceremonial figures. They must accomplish all this to the satisfaction of diverse publics: students, faculty, parents, alumni, the community and potential benefactors.

Chancellor William P. Tolley conceeded last October, "If I did it again, I would be a professor, not a college president. Professors have the best of both worlds--they can do what they want and they don't have to do what they don't want.

"The longer you stay as president the more obligations you have," he continued. "You make more appearances before faculty and student groups. You make fewer important speeches but more off the cuff. You cut down on state and national meetings only to be more deeply involved on the campus.

"You continue to see the people you have seen as well as new ones. The pressure to find time for fund raising is greater than ever," the chancellor explained.

U.C.L.A.'s Franklin Murphy, who quit last year at the age of 52, expressed it more bluntly: "The job is a physical, emotional and creative drain. You have to be sadistic to ask a man to stay on more than ten years. There are nights when you want to say to hell with it all."

"The demands on a university president are limitless," laments the University of Miami's Henry King Stanford.

"You feel yourself sometimes torn into a thousand fragments, and you wonder how any man can go on in this business," explains Earlham College's Landrum Bolling.

Some presidents go a bit further than just recounting their grievances. U.C.L.A.'s Murphy offers these suggestions:

"A chancellor shouldn't have to deal with every problem that comes across his desk, and there should be a man to accept a few of his speaking invitations too. He should have a sabbatical every four or five years in which he would be free to do anything he wanted."

Robert J. Wert, head of Mills College, feels "something is going to have to be done to allow the academic heads of institutions to concentrate on education and let somebody else handle all of the corporate aspects." (In fact, several colleges are currently experimenting with a new form of "dual leadership," as reported below.)

Irving Kristol, writing in The New York Times Magazine last December, noted that "the university president today is primarily the chief executive of a corporate institution, not an educator." He also ventured that "most university administrators have no clear idea of what they are supposed to be doing."

This may be true, but most university administrators appear to have a clear idea of what they are NOT supposed to be doing:

"I left my law practice to become an educator, not a policeman. Now every university president has to be a policeman," notes Indiana's Elvis J. Stahr. He resigned last year at the age of 52.

Brown University's Ray Lorenzo admits, "I wasn't ready for the constant public exposure in this job. Every facet of your life is under scrutiny, and this can become a strain on your family life. I do feel the strain, and I do get fatigued."

Some of Dr. Heffner's colleagues concur on the debilitating effect their jobs exert upon home life. "It's impossible to be the president of a university and a useful member of a family," says Stahr.

"For the past 18 years, my children really haven't had a father. I have gone as long as 37 days without ever sitting down to dinner with my family," reports the University of Kansas' W. Clarke Wescoe. He resigned last June at the age of 48.

"The only people who should be university presidents are the friendless, the orphaned and bachelors," gripes Ruth Stanford, the wife of Miami's president.

Nevertheless, the position still has its advocates. Douglas Knight, head of highly-regarded Lawrence College, told Newsweek in 1962: "I'm sure you have to be faintly schizoid to survive in an appalling, impossible job like this. But after nine years, I wouldn't give it up for any other career I know."

'No one can be all of these things. Some succeed at being none.'

"The American university president is expected to be a friend of the students, a colleague of the faculty, a good fellow with the alumni, a sound administrator with the trustees, a good speaker with the public, an astute bargainer with foundations and federal agencies, a politician with the state legislature, a friend of industry, labor and agriculture, a persuasive diplomat with donors, a champion of education generally, a supporter of the professions -- particularly law and medicine -- a spokesman to the press, a scholar in his own right, a public servant at the state and national levels, a devotee of opera and football equally, a decent human being, a good husband and father, an active member of a church; above all, he must enjoy traveling in airplanes, eating his meals in public and attending public ceremonies.

"He should be firm, yet gentle; sensitive to others, insensitive to himself; look to the past and the future, yet be firmly planted in the present; he should be both visionary and sound; affable, yet reflective; know the value of a dollar and realize that ideas cannot be bought; inspiring in his visions and yet cautious in what he does; a man of principle, yet able to make a deal; a man with broad perspective who will follow the details conscientiously; a good American but ready to criticize the status quo fearlessly; a seeker of truth where the truth may not hurt too much.

"No one can be all of these things. Some succeed at being none."

Solution for 'fatigue'

Dual leadership splits tasks, not chancellor

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

As SU committees scrutinize prospective successors to Chancellor Tolley, other large universities are marking their transition of power by converting to a relatively new form of dual leadership.

This system, whose popularity has spread during the past several years, is one solution to the growing problem of "presidential fatigue" described above.

Dual leadership shares a university's reins between a president and either a chancellor or chairman of the board.

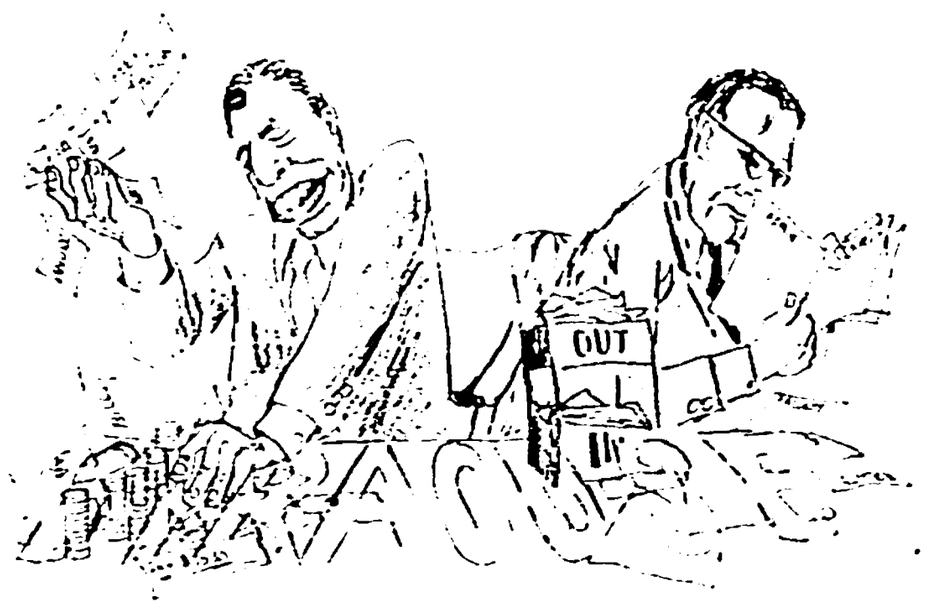
Robert F. Goheen, president of Princeton University, recently suggested that Princeton convert to dual leadership. Dr. Goheen offered his proposal in the winter issue of University, Princeton's quarterly.

Having both a chancellor and a president, Dr. Goheen explained, has "the one major advantage in that it splits the position rather than the man holding it."

The president would be the chief executive officer, directing all internal operations, overseeing the curriculum, the student body and the faculty. The chancellor, or chairman, would direct fund-raising operations and represent the university in external functions, including alumni affairs.

"The office of the president has become more and more like that of a business manager and less and less academic," Dr. Goheen reports. "I am convinced something needs to be done."

His analysis of a university president's roles emphasize the burden imposed on one man: "Scholar, educational leader, financial wizard, fund raiser, public relations expert and a ceremonial figure of stature."



"The man in this office has to take a lot more guff than he used to," Dr. Goheen explained, "not only from activist students--and their faculty supporters--but from all those on the outside, who think he ought to crack down on the activists."

The following schools are currently operated under a president-chancellor helm: Brandeis University, the University of Wisconsin, New York University, the University of Bridgeport and Fairleigh Dickinson University.

Massaschusetts Institute of Technology is led by a president and chairman of the board.

Fordham University recently established a triumvirate with a president, chancellor and chairman of the board.

The University of Chicago insitituted a president-chancellor jurisdiction some years ago, but has since returned to a single-leader system.

Students gain foothold in power . . .

devote a few minutes discussion at these meetings to talk about participation in the choosing of a new chancellor, hoping to give it more publicity and gain student response.

Despite the lack of such a popular mandate, Rafalik claims the committee nevertheless reflects the students' voice. "The points of view aired on the committee represent quite a range," he commented.

The origins of the Student Committee on the Selection of the Chancellor began last spring when Chancellor Tolley wrote a note to the Board of Trustees, expressing his desire to see student involvement in the search for a new chancellor. Simultaneously, Hicks began working with Dean Jim G. Carleton for the evolution of such a committee.

The CSL announced its search for committee members in the fall and began recruitment immediately. After ten students were chosen, six undergraduates and four graduates, Hicks asked the Student Senate to approve the members to legitimize their actions. They were readily approved.

"They are more liberal than the average student, necessarily so," said Ed Feldman, Speaker of the Student Senate. "This balances the conservative aspect of the trustees. They are also more intelligent than the average student."

The six undergraduates serving on the committee are: Ray Rafalik, junior zoology major who chairs the committee; Amy White, senior psychology major; Mary Lou Leary, sophomore English major; Tom Whitlow, freshman forestry major; and Jim Richards, senior in the urban teaching program. The four graduate students are: Dwight Emerson, English; Ken Ritzenberg, Sociology; Peter Sandford, Education Administration; and Charles Greebel, Law.

These student members have approved the list of criteria for the new chancellor's qualifications which the trustees and faculty drew up. In addition, they have a list of questions which they ask the potential candidates. Some of the questions are:

In what areas does student participation have a valid role in the university system?

Are you willing to advance the university into social conflicts of our time and area, as typified in Syracuse by the 15th Ward?

How would you re-shape or re-establish the administrative system at a university to deal with the dead wood of status quo?

How would you make the academic and policy structure of this university more responsive to the students? How would you de-centralize, make more efficient?

Thus, with the establishment of the Student Committee on the Selection of a Chancellor, the student voice of SU has reached a new and more effective status. The real progress of this student involvement will be revealed at the naming of the chancellor. The actual choice is not the issue. The crux of the matter rests in the amount of "say" the student members will have had in the final decision.

It will reflect the effectiveness of SCSC's landmark of progress in unprecedented student involvement in administrative decisions.

'No place for a selfish man'

Dr. Tolley on the office of Chancellor

Eligible for a scholarship that an awards committee refused to give him, SU undergraduate William P. Tolley appealed his case to Chancellor James R. Day.

"I spent about 20 seconds explaining my case when he said, 'You may be right, young man, but you lose,'" recalled Dr. Tolley now completing his 26th year as Chancellor of Syracuse University.

"I felt like he had just slapped me. If he had only taken 30 seconds more and explained some of the problems I would have left feeling much better. I vowed I would never be so brusque with students."

This was perhaps Chancellor Tolley's first lesson in University administration. He had not planned to be a college president but a scholar.

But within a few years after graduation he was an administrator at Drew University and then president of Allegheny College at 30 years old, the youngest college president in the country. He became Chancellor of Syracuse University in 1942.

Chancellor Tolley has overseen the rapid expansion and growth of Syracuse University into the third largest private university in the country. Its assets have grown form $16 million to about $200 million by mid-1970. The role of his successor who he expects will be chosen next month may be to consolidate the gains of the past and prune the excesses connected with those gains. Even so, the views of Chancellor Tolley on the role and necessary qualities of the Chancellor will remain extremely relevant.

"I've always felt the primary role of the college president is as an educator, not as a public relations man or fund raiser," he said.

His major aims as Chancellor have been to 1) upgrade the faculty, 2) upgrade the student body and 3) improve the curriculum and refine the objectives of education. He noted that his goals would be the same if he could do over again his term as Chancellor. And he noted the basic problems of education don't change even over a long period of time.

"The Chancellor of a university has to be a realist. He has to know what the worlds of business and politics are like because he has to mediate between the two. The art is to move easily from one field to another, and from one intellectual discipline to another.

On the specific qualities his successor should possess, the Chancellor named patience, a sense of humor and "a member of Trinity."

"He has to like people, all kinds of people. He can't ever afford to be a sarcastic, cruel or mean. He has to have a heart. It's so easy to hurt people, so easy to be unfair. Students will remember a casual contact with the Chancellor and most have to screw up their courage just to walk into a dean's office."

He didn't think the next Chancellor must be an international scholar but he must be able to work with scholars and know scholarship and he must be healthy.

"The health factor is a lot more important than generally thought. I've had letters during the past few weeks from three friends who say they are giving up college presidencies. The seven-day-a-week tension, the strain on family life is very wearing. One said he had never found anything like a university presidency. It destroys people."

He though some former Chancellors, including Chancellor Day who he described as "probably the greatest SU has had," stayed in office a few years beyond his capabilities.

He expected the next Chancellor would be able to spend more time with the faculty and students.

"This is no place for a selfish man. His own life has to be less important than the institution he serves. The real reason I'm retiring is that the institution is more important than I am.

The selection of the next Chancellor sometime during next month should be completed smoothly. The Chancellor noted the three selection committees have been working very harmoniously--"perhaps too harmoniously; I don't think it would be bad to have a little disagreement as long as everyone spoke his mind."

Chancellor Tolley has not though about what he will do in retirement other than write. The real problem of retirement for him will be to slow down.

"I have no plans yet. I've been too busy. I expect to work hard up to the last day."

Book examines dilemma

Chancellor: educator or caretaker?

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

Dr. Harold Willis Dodds, who served as president of Princeton for 24 years, analyzed the post's problems in a 1962 book entitled "The Academic President--Educator or Caretaker?"

Dodds' thesis is that college presidents must concern themselves as much with philosophers as with accountants. He views one primary purpose of a campus head to be improving the processes of intellectual development.

He stresses that university leaders should find some means of devoting at least 50 per cent of their time to educational--not administrative--matters, instead of the 10 to 20 per cent he says they devote to scholastic affairs.

Dodds reduces the dilemma to a matter of skillfully delegating non-educational duties to competent staff heads.

Yet he emphasizes that a chancellor cannot merely delegate his non-educational duties and then forget about them, as some well-intended scholar-presidents have done. A president's own non-educational 50 per cent must concentrate upon the leadership of all to whom he has assigned those responsibilities.

But Dodds doesn't understate the ease with which this can be accomplished:

"The president needs a nervous constitution which will enable him to live habitually at a focal point of conflicting pressures."

Dodds acknowledges that he is offering a description of a superman whose prime requirement is sagacity but who also must be able "to attend, if need by, more dinners than there are days in the week."

Colorful history of Chancellor reign...

for him to resign after six years of guiding the University.

Upset by the short terms in office of the first two chancellors, the Trustees set down guidelines in their search for Dr. Haven's successor. They decided, according to SU historian W. Freeman Galpin, "to make no appointment until the right man could be found. And by the right man was meant one who could and would devote himself to promotional rather than instructional matters. Leave academic considerations and curriculum building to the faculty and allow the Chancellor to concentrate all of his time and energy upon the physical and financial life of the University!"

The post was offered to and accepted by Rev. Charles N. Sims, pastor of the Summerfield Methodist Church of Brooklyn. One of Sims' first official acts was to ask the Trustees for a definition of the Chancellor's duties. As spheres of authority were established, and boundaries delineated, the influence of the chancellor became more apparent in every aspect of life at SU.

During Sims' administration the student body had risen from its opening figure of 41 to 322. The Holden Observatory, Crouse College, a Gymnasium and a Library (present Administration Building) were added to the campus.

An extremely busy man, Sims still found the time to teach several classes. Prof. Smalley, again writing of a former chancellor, said of Sims: "...he was easy to access to the humblest freshman, ready to hear the story of privation and hardship, freely giving from his own pocket to assist the struggling student, and pouring out the sympathy of his own great heart to those in distress."

With the end of Dr. Sims' administration in 1893, a more outspoken leader for SU was found in the form of Dr. James Roscoe Day. Having established quite a reputation as a money-raiser, the Trustees and faculty looked to him to pull the University out of the depths of financial despair. The equally enthusiastic students greeted him with the cry: "Day! Day! Chancellor Day! We've got him here and he's got to stay!"

This extremely vocal chancellor lashed out against Presidents Taft, (T.) Roosevelt, and Wilson during their particular administrations. Day came out against trade unions, urged larger corporations, and attacked plans for a larger army. He received the support of the Standard Oil Company for SU, and consequently had to defend his patrons. He supported monopolies, and called the muckrakers "jungle judges and jingo novelists."

Articles by Chancellor Day appeared in early magazines such as "Leslie's Weekly" and "Life" (a forerunner of today's version). An article from the latter magazine read: "Our good friend, Chancellor Jim Day, of Syracuse, is splendid about the war (WW I). When the Chancellor is wrong, he is wronger than less strenuous spirits, and when he is right he is more gloriously right."

A strong believer in capitalism, Day actually did put the University on its feet. During his administration, enrollment increased from 666 to 4,800; the endowment fund from $600,000 to $5,000,000; the colleges from three to eight; and the number of faculty members from 60 to about 350.

The following buildings were built during Day's term in office: Steele, Winchell, Haven, Sims, Smith, Carnegie Library, Bowne, Lyman, Archbold Stadium and men's gym, and Slocum. He also introduced ROTC into the SU curriculum.

The task of guiding the University following such an active administration fell to Dr. Charles Wesley Flint, the fifth chancellor. Coming into office in 1922, Flint was described by the "Methodist Christian Advocate" as "a clean cut, modern business executive, plus the moral and religious convictions of a Methodist minister."

Tuition went up to $225-250 during his first year in office. The Maxwell School and School of Journalism were founded during his administration. Throughout his term in office, Flint supported prohibition, raged against campus pacifists, was an enthusistic football fan, and had marathon sessions at his desk when he personally signed 840 diplomas.

Flint developed stricter entrance requirements - for "proper inclusion, not capricious exclusion." He was sympathetic toward student self-government and opposed the subsidizing of athletes. He forbade smoking on campus and also student marriages.

Chancellor Flint's successor, in 1937, was Dr. William Pratt Graham, the Dean of the Smith College of Applied Science. He was the first alumnus to become Chancellor, and also the first non-clergyman to do so.

An extremely intelligent man, Dr. Graham was one of the ten physicists who first understood Einstein's theory of relativity when it was originally expounded. He kept up with the times, instituting special "war courses" when WW II broke out, increasing the size of ROTC, appointing a head football coach and an athletic director, and established the first radio workshop on campus.

Originally intending to hold the position for one year, Graham had accepted the chancellorship after postponing a well-earned retirement. Dr. Frank Graves, president of the New York State Board of Education, said of the chancellor ("Daily Orange," April 2, 1937): "He has impressed everyone with his keen sympathy and broad humanity. He is approachable, and causes all to feel that he is their friend. He believes in the students, faculty, and alumni. The door to his office in the Administration Building always stands open for the students."

In office until 1942, Graham was succeeded by the present Chancellor, Dr. William Pearson Tolley. The second SU alumnus to attain the position, Tolley had already achieved recognition as the youngest college president in 1931 when, at the age of 30, he was appointed president of Allegheny College.

Tolley's administration has consequently spanned the years from World War II to the conflict in Vietnam. Throughout that time the campus has expanded, in size, in recognition, and in enrollment. Faced with modern-day problems in today's world. Dr. Tolley has made an impressive record for himself and his university.

When Chancellor Tolley's successor, who is currently being sought, comes into office, he will have an impressive legacy to live up to. Seven eras of administration, each with their own particular problems and challenges, and each with a capable, carefully-chosen Chancellor as its head, have guided Syracuse University through the days of the founders, the flappers and today's "freak-outs."

By Lew Howell

For adult responsibility, students must show maturity

In the Daily Orange's Perspective section of Jan. 31, there were several articles dealing with student unrest and with the drive for power which has originated in that discontent. In each case a distinction was made between those characterized as "students" and those traditionally known as "adults."

In this unnecessary distinction between student and adult, and in this description of student protest lies the major difficulty to be faced by students in obtaining a substantive role in educational administration.

By following a concept such as that expressed in: "basic adult claims to authority (are) being challenged," the student takes a position of being in some other category than "adult," that is, "non-adult," the only alternative. Is this really what is intended? I hope not, because despite any negative connotations which might be ascribed to the word "adult," it also indicates a stage of human maturation in which full size, strength, and intellectual capacity are achieved.

If students intend to replace "adult authority" with "non-adult authority" (student authority), they will have to contend with the argument which describes this as being a replacement of "full capacity" by some "partial capacity."

In the discussions which are greatly dependent on these semantics, I would prefer the contention (even the assumption) that students are already adults and should have appropriate responsibility in the handling of their own education and affairs. Any "attacks" that take place should not be on "adult" authority but rather on arbitrary authority.

If authority, particularly in educational institutions but also in government, is really the issue, then it can be partly solved by students alone. That solution will come as a result of those in student status looking upon themselves as "adults," perhaps not yet at full capacity, but close enough to function in positions of authority with a large degree of success. But as long as students do not see themselves as "adults," administrators are not likely to give up their power to confessed "non-adults," no matter how many buildings are occupied, curses cast, or gates picketed. In this case, at least, progress can and must be made among the students themselves before much can be expected from those currently exercising university and governmental authority.

Educational development suggested by Krathwohl

David R. Krathwohl, president of the American Educational Research Association, today (Thursday, Feb. 6) called for development of the National Institutes of Education. Krathwohl, dean of Syracuse University's School of Education, made the recommendation in the Presidential Address prepared for delivery at the Association's annual convention in Los Angeles.

Krathwohl said: "I would propose that we urge the development of the National Institutes of Education. They, like the Institutes of Health, would be a responsibility of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, separate from the Office of Education.

"The National Institutes of Education would consist of a central coordinating staff which would, like the National Institutes of Health, work with a series of institutes each focused on a critical education problem."

In his prepared remarks Krathwohl also cited the need for educational researchers to communicate more effectively with teachers and parents.

"Perhaps it would be well for a variety of educational organizations to join together in the establishment of a journal which would present research and development in popularized form.

Playtex invents the first-day tampon™

(We took the inside out to show you how different it is.)

Outside: it's softer and silky (not cardboardy). Inside: it's so extra absorbent...it even protects on your first day. Your worst day!

In every lab test against the old cardboardy kind... the Playtex tampon was always more absorbent. Actually 45% more absorbent on the average than the leading regular tampon.

Because it's different. Actually adjusts to you. It flowers out. Fluffs out. Designed to protect every inside inch of you. So the chance of a mishap is almost zero!
Try it fast.

Peak season for ski marathons, races in central New York

By LEIGH KALNA

February is always the biggest month for skiing. The weather turns cold after the traditional January thaw. The equipment bought in November and December is finally paid for. Everyone is rested after the tiring holidays. When February comes, thousands of skiiers are ready for some fresh powder.

Central New York ski areas have planned some special events for the peak skiing season.

Every Wednesday and Sunday at 3:45 p.m. skier Jimmy Huega runs his Standard Race at Song Mountain.

Each skier is invited to race against the time established by Huega, who runs the course first. A handicap is established in relation to the challenger's time. Those with the three lowest handicaps are given a free trip to Heavenly Valley, Calif.

Tonight, Intermount, located 10 miles east of Cortland, will have its second ski marathon. Starting at 6:30, skiers will run all night. If this marathon is successful, according to manager Ken Archibald, it may become a weekly event.

On Sunday, Feb. 16, the older and established Greek Peak will feature trick-skiier Rudi Wyrsch, who is on tour for the Broken Leg Promotions. On Feb. 28 and March 1, Greek Peak will host the Western Regional Championships of the USEASA. Four Grand Slalom and four slalom races will be run.

There are no special events at Skytop.

One student wanted to know how Steiger felt about drugs. The actor said he'd like to "take a trip" for purposes of discovery if psychiatrists and other doctors were present.

At one point, Steiger was asked what legacy he wanted to leave to the world. He replied, "I'd like to be remembered as someone who tried and who was respected."

Ballroom

Margaret Stafford, Director of Social Activities, announces that registration for free ballroom dance classes will be held for all students, staff and faculty, Wednesday, February 12, 7:30 - 9:30 p.m. in the Recreation Lounge of the Women's Building. Director of the class is Walt Medicis, a member of the University Staff.

The first class for the seven week course will be held at 8:00 p.m. the same night as registration. Concentration will be on basic, intermediate and advanced steps in all the Latin and American dances including: Cha Cha, Fox Trot, Rhumba, Waltz, Bossa Nova, Swing, Tango, Merengue and Discotheque. Classes will be held every Wednesday evening for seven weeks from 8:00 - 9:30 p.m. ending on March 26, 1969.

Three rock groups sock it to Syracuse

Three contemporary groups will roll into the War Memorial Tuesday night. The Turtles, Canned Heat and Tommy James and the Shondells will make up Irving Granz's "winter spectacular."

the Turtles, who have sold a large number of albums and singles, have nothing deep or complicated about them.

The Canned Heat, on the other hands, know and feel the Blues. The smell of hard times, of misery, wafting through tenement halls in Chicago, down the Missippi, across the hundreds of villages and small towns that have heard the wailing in the night and have put it to music. This is the Blues, and it is complex.

The Shondells all come from around Pittsburgh. Tommy James comes from Michigan. As a group, they are in the rhythm and blues category, even though their first big hit, "Hanky Panky," is hard rock and roll. The Shondells are releasing their first album with that same title.

Members of the Shondells include: Mike Vale, bass, piano and organ; Ronnie Rosman, piano, organ and cordolox; Vinnie Pietropaoli; Joe Kessler; and George Magura.

Miss Richter explains Yoga tenet of rebirth

By RONA KAVEE

In a neat, sparely furnished apartment heavy with the smell of incense, Lilyan Richter practices an ancient science in which she believes lies hope for the salvation of mankind.

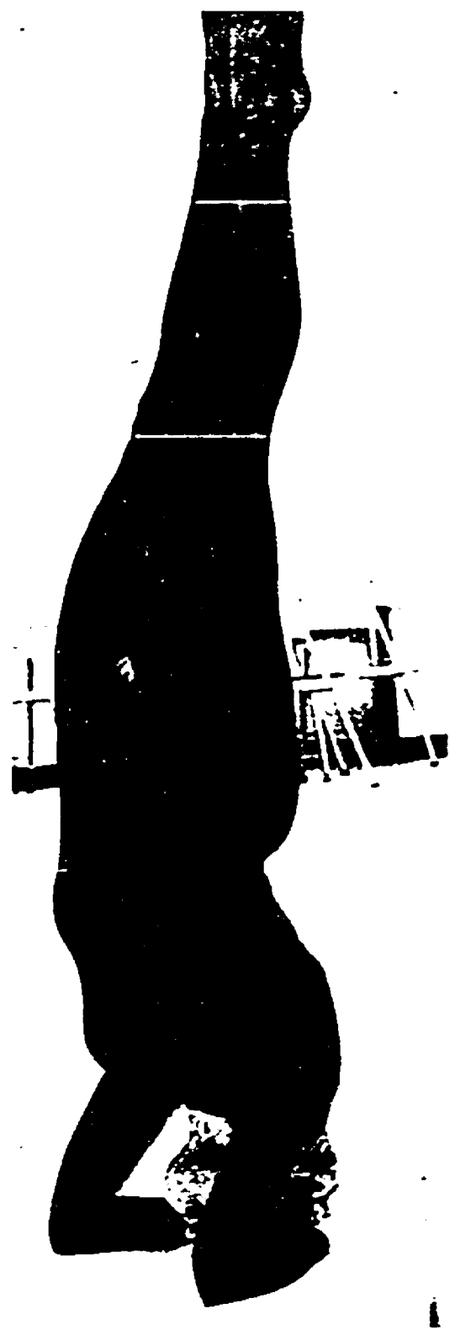
Miss Richter is a Yogi. She believes that the purpose of her religion is "for man to find out who he is...to discover his entirety." Small, with curly gray hair and large, deepset brown eyes, Miss Richter spoke in a lilting voice, emphasizing her words with fluid gestures.

One of the basic tenets of Yoga, she explained, is the idea of rebirth, or reincarnation. "Man never was not and will never cease to be." True man is immortal because the consciousness or spirit of each individual is not destroyed by his physical death.

"This is rejected as a rule in Western thought," Miss Richter noted. "In Yoga we believe that we have as many lives as we wish."

She explained that when one learns Yoga "truth is presented like a huge banquet. The student selects his own mental fare as he proceeds in training."

In order to receive training "the Western mind must remove 'avidya,' the basic ignorance of the truth that man is really immortal," Miss Richter continued. She stressed also that the Yogin practices "harmlessness, total self-lessness--he must serve all."



Thus, "Yoga is the answer for the world to find perfect peace," in Miss Richter's opinion. To a Yogin, all people then, is the same as harming oneself."

To work towards the goal of peace, she believes that Yoga should be taught to college students, because "youth is tired of war." She teaches a class in the subject of Utica College.

Miss Richter, an artist whose works decorate the walls of her apartment, explained that in Western thought there is a separation between the everyday practical world and the world of philosophy and religion.

"In Yoga there is one path," she said. Through meditation and control over first body, then mind, one expands one's consciousness to reach a state "where we are no longer torn apart by the things that happen to us."

WAER will present a series of interviews with Lilyan Richter February 11, 12 and 13 at 6 P.M.

PETE SCHACHT, captain of the SU swim team, working out in the Archbold waters. Coach Jon Buzzard's undefeated mermen travel to Lewisburg, Pa., for a meet with Bucknell tomorrow afternoon. Schacht will probably swim both distance events, the 500 and 1,000 freestyle races.

SU is unbeaten

Mermen at Bucknell

By FRED KRAVER

The water-ballet is over for the undefeated SU swimming team. The competition in the first four meets has ranged in abilities from poor to weak. Saturday, Syracuse will face its first competent team when they travel to Bucknell.

As miserable as the opponents have been until now, nothing can be taken away from the great effort the squad has put in. Coach Jon Buzzard has taken the SU swimmers a long way in only four years. The improvement since then has been truly remarkable.

Four years ago, Lafayette was stiff competition for Syracuse, taking them down to the last relay before winning. This year, SU had to ease up in its meet with Lafayette's mermen so that they would not be completely humiliated. Pitt beat SU four years ago, but this year, SU figures to beat their trunks off.

Six of the swimmers' nine meets are against such weak competition. The three tough ones are tomorrow's Bucknell meet, Cornell Feb. 19 in Archbold, and Colgate Mar. 1 at Colgate.

The swim team's success has not been an overnight occurrance, but has come about through gradual improvement of the individuals. While Bucknell, Cornell and Colgate currently boast fine teams, their freshman squads are not much better than the Syracuse frosh. Syracuse swimmers have been constantly bettering their times as they increase their experience. SU has the potential to become a swimming powerhouse.

But, one step at a time. Coach Buzzard concedes that at the moment, Bucknell, Cornell, and Colgate are better than Syracuse. "If they match their best times, and we match our's, they'd win," he says. At the same time, the swimmers are confident, and by no means awed by Bucknell's reputation. Buzzard is well aware of this, but frankly states, "We have to have a team-wide effort. SU teams have become stronger, and have gained more depth, but we're still not as good as those three."

The objective of every swimming team is the championships, and each meet is geared to vault the team into a better position for reaching this goal. An upset tomorrow would put SU two steps away from greatness.

Orangemen could snap loss string vs. American Eagles

By LARRY CENTER

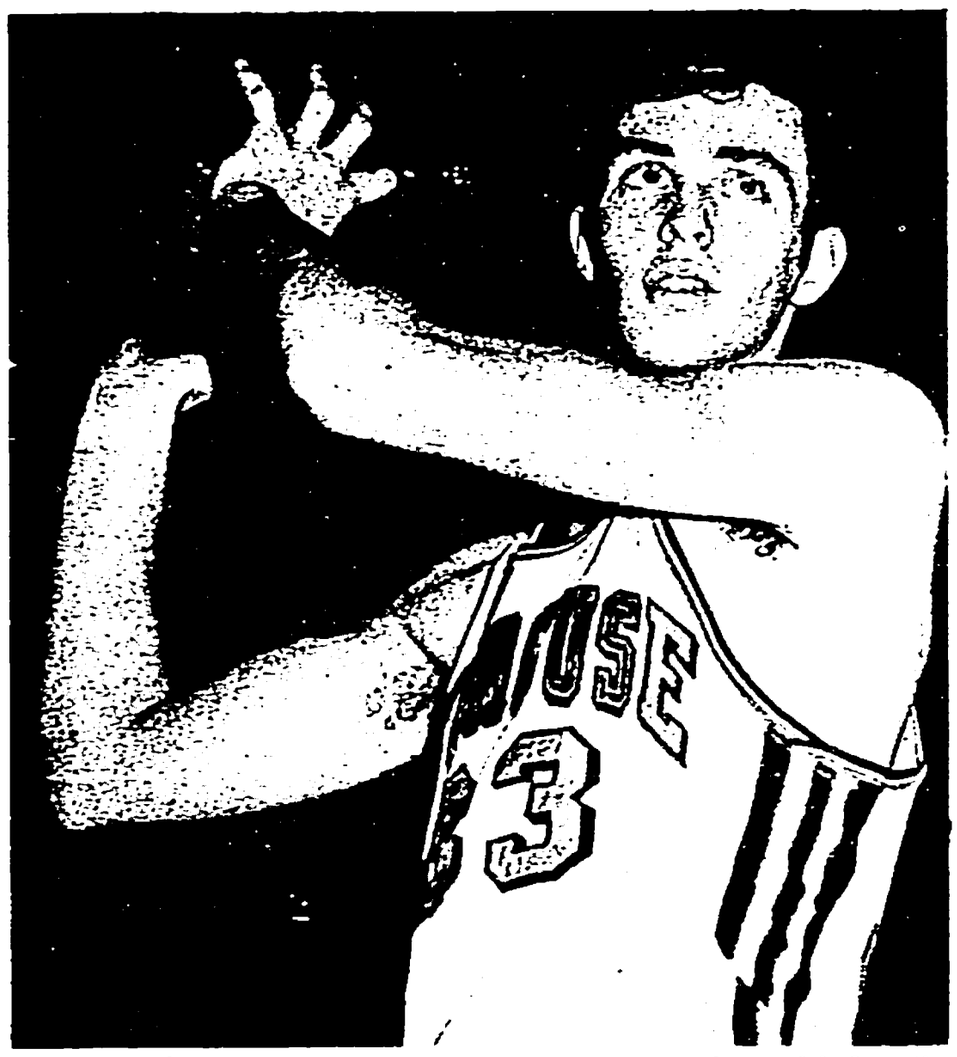
American University will give the Syracuse Orangemen a good chance to break their long losing streak when the two teams meet tomorrow night at Manley Field House, preceded by a 6:30 freshman game with Hartwick.

As exasperated as Roy Danforth is after seeing his team come close to victory several times, Eagle coach Alan Kyber has more reasons to gripe. His team is sporting a 3-13 record and has been having a lot of difficulty in maintaining a good starting lineup.

In Philadelphia to scout the Orange against Temple Wednesday night, Kyber said that last week for the first time he was able to put together his original starting five. During the season the coach has spent as much time as a medical aid as he has a coach.

Guards Terry Hill, Reid Fader, Dave Driscoll and James Cook, plus forwards Bill Kagarise, Gordon Stiles, Craig Litchfield and starting center and leading scorer Vince Schafmeister all missed some games with assorted injuries or the flu. No starter has stayed healthy for the whole season.

Stiles is a leaper who at 6 ft. 3 in. was the nation's 19th leading rebounder in 1967-68 with 14.8 grabs per game. After coming back, he has quickly grabbed the bounding lead with a 13.5 mark and is scoring at a 12.3 clip.



He will give the Orange trouble defensively, as he was known to often "stuff" 7-1 Art Beatty in practices last year. Besides his jumping ability, Stiles is a rarity, he is one of the great schoolboy stars from D.C. whom American didn't let get away.

The other probable Eagle starters are co-captain Terry Hill and sophomore Reid Fader at guards, and Bill Kagarise in the forecourt. Hill has been hitting at 13.7 a game and leads Tyber's fast break.

Fader, last year's leading frosh scorer at 15.2, doesn't have a great shot. However, his ballhandling and playmaking abilities earned him a chance to play for the All-State team. A top college scout who viewed his play for Fair Lawn High School called the six- footer "one of the top playmakers on the East Coast."

If the Orangemen were ever determined to win, it's now. In the Temple loss, they finally had fine rebounding, tight defense, balanced scoring and full-game hustle. All to no avail. If they duplicate that effort tomorrow night, Roy Danforth should finally be smiling.

CENTER TAPS. Bill Smith got down to rebounding against Temple and led the game with 14...It was the first time this year the Orange had five men in double figures...WAER, 88.3 FM, is airing both games.

BILL CASE, 6-4 swingman, has been playing of late with heavily taped knees, but has been doing an admirable job nonetheless. Case, a junior, held Temple's top scorer, John Baum, to four points in the first half while scoring 14 on his own in the loss Wednesday.

Stumbling SU matmen to host tough Penn State

By MIKE WEBER

The Syracuse varsity wrestling team, hapless losers of five straight dual meets, play host to a powerful Penn State contingent in a dual meet at Manley Field House tomorrow at 2 p.m.

The Orange grapplers, torn by internal troubles and injuries, have gone rapidly downhill following their championship performance in the Coast Guard Tournament in December.

The Orangemen will forfeit the 123 pound class as in the past and then will send winless Joe Palmieri (0-4) against tough Dana Balumb at 130.

Keith Clark, who has one loss in as many starts, will be pitted against the Lion's Craig Freas at 137. Freas is a former New Jersey high school champ and is looking toward the Eastern Intercollegiate crown this year.

Gary Barlow (0-3) is slated to go at 145 while one of the few bright spots in the pale Orange grappling picture, Eric Greenberg, puts his unbeaten record on the line at 152. Greenberg (3-0-2) will face Clyde Frantz, winner in five of six bouts, in what shapes up as the meet's top attraction.

The next three weights, 160,167, and 177 offer little hope for SU as only 160-pounder Boland has a victory to his credit. Len Zigment, winless in his only outing and Joel Tozer (0-4) are the Syracuse entrants.

Unbeaten Bob Rust (5-0) will face John High at 191 in another outstanding bout. Coach Ed Carlin said that High is a "real tough boy. It'll be a good match."

At heavyweight, a game but so far outclassed John Cherundolo will wrestle. Cherundolo, who had never competed in college wrestling before this year, is still filling in for Jerry Beach, the on again, off again heavyweight.

When asked why Beach was not in the lineup after wrestling last Saturday against Army, Carlin simply replied, "You're asking me?," whatever that means.

He then commented generally about how to meet shapes up. "Penn State is always a tough team. They aren't as well-balanced as last year, but for us they'll be ready. They're a good overall squad."

Carlin also noted that co-captain John Terboss (145-152) has just received the doctor's permission to return to practice. Terboss, the team leader and spark plug has been out for some time with a knee injury sustained in the Coast Guard tourney.

The varsity meet will be wrestled at the same time the freshman compete against the Cortland frosh, offering fans a unique, if not distracting afternoon.

Rounding up sports

The indoor track season starts tonight, with the Orange hosting Hamilton and Cortland in a triangular meet at the Field House. The meet will commence with the field events at 7 p.m.

Coach Bob Grieve is banking on veterans Larry Zuller, Guy Roberts and Gil West for points. Zuller, the cross country star, ran a 4:19 mile at Cornell despite a bad cold. Roberts is an All-American in the 600, and West holds the Field House mark for the long jump.

The gymnastics team is also home this weekend, facing strong Penn State at Archbold gym Saturday at 2 p.m.

Penn State is undefeated and one of the best teams in the East. Syracuse, 1-2 on the year figures to score with Ernie Santangelo in all-around, Tony DeStefano on the side horse and George Stalter on the rings.

The varsity and freshman fencing teams host Hobart on Saturday at 1 p.m.

Coach Jim Boeheim will have a meeting for all candidates for the varsity golf team on Tuesday night at 6:30 at DU.

The second meeting between the SU freshman basketball team and Manlius was not played on Wednesday night, due to a scheduling misunderstanding.

Steiger says students are on their toes

ROD STEIGER

Actor Rod Steiger and his actress wife, Claire Bloom, said they learned something about themselves and about young people by visiting Syracuse University. The couple made the remarks at a press conference Friday before leaving Syracuse.

"I learned that young people and I understand each other and that I'm getting through," said the actor. "I realize now how unfairly young people on campuses have been misrepresented by the press. It's given everyone the idea that college students are a cross between pot addicts and Hell's Angels."

He said college students have good manners and good ideas. According to Steiger, today's college generation is "on its toes" and will notice any dishonesty on his part.

His comments were made before his wife arrived. When she entered the room, he rose and surrendered his chair to her. He walked across the room. Miss Bloom was left seated in front of the press. She looked around, her large brown eyes wide with what appeared to be dismay.

Except for her session with a Shakespeare class, Miss Bloom spoke rarely during her visit. (Although she has done several movies, she is best remembered for her interpretation of such parts as Juliet and Ophelia at the Old Vic in London.) The citation accompanying the Syracuse University Centennial Medal she received calls her "a shy person."

"The visit was extraordinary," said the actress as she nervously twisted a gold ring on her finger. "I've been kind of thrown into it. I didn't expect to have to do so much. It's been good for me. The young people are so alive. Young people are much brighter than they were 12 or 15 years ago. This was my first chance to be with them.

10 students booted out for cheating on final

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

Ten students were charged with academic dishonesty yesterday in recommendations approved by Vice-Chancellor and Provost Frank P. Piskor and Dean of Student Services Jim G. Carleton.

The action was a result of one student stealing accounting and marketing examinations and then selling them to other students.

Hearings were conducted jointly by the College of Liberal Arts and the College of Business Administration. Both colleges were involved because some of the students are enrolled in Liberal Arts, while the courses are given by the business school.

Penalties handed down range from a full year of suspension to ten years. Some students received a sentence of three-semesters suspension.

Carleton said the punishments are in line with SU's normal policy in cases of academic dishonesty. He also said three theories were given in the recommendations as to the way in which the examinations were stolen: access by key; access by offices being left open; and access by someone internally distributing them.

After the committee concluded its hearings, recommendations went to the deans of the two colleges involved, who approved them. Recommendations then went to the Dean of Mens office and later to Carleton and Piskor.

Although it took several days for Carleton to review the recommendations, he said there was no relationship between the time it took and the possibility that penalties were changed. He did not comment on whether or not he had altered anything but did say, "it is conceivable material I felt was relevant was left out of the report. In that case I checked back with members of the hearing committee."

The ten students' only opportunity for appeal is to Chancellor William P. Tolley or to the original academic dishonesty committee.

More talks Friday

No action taken by CSL on dorm autonomy plan

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

When the "Proposal for Dorm Autonomy" came before the Council on Student Life as routine business on Friday, lengthy discussion developed, but neither concrete action nor a vote was taken. Talk on the issue is expected to resume at the next CSL meeting on Feb. 21.

Reaction to the meeting was mixed. Dean of Men David Tatham called it "a good and helpful discussion," and indicated that a number of the proposals in the dorm autonomy discussion are "probably feasible." He said that any really final decisions will have to wait until "detailed, specific proposals" are made.

Ed Feldman, speaker of Student Senate, said he was "very, very frustrated." He felt that most of the members of the Counciwere refusing to consider what he though was the real issue–"in loco parentis." He said that a student would not be getting a real education until he starts "governing his own social life." SU should be looking at itself as an academic institution rather than an overseer."

Joey Edwardh hinted at dissatisfaction over the supposed devil's advocate role that she felt some administrators on CSL were assuming. She indicated that if they "were truly interested, they should assist the students when they find places where the proposal lacks."

Another CSL member, Dr. Michael O. Sawyer of the Maxwell School, generalized that he had "some measure of enthusiasm for an even more decentralized dorm."

Sawyer made two observations on the dorm autonomy proposal. First, he raised the question of completely eliminating the faculty and administration from the proposed system of dorm regulation. Speaking of the all-student dorm councils, he said "I'm not sure that this would be a better system than a dorm council made of students, faculty and administration."

Sawyer's second point was one dealing with responsibility. He questioned if the proposal called for a landlord-tenant relationship between the university and the students in the dorms, meaning who would be responsible for the debts owed on the dorms.

Observing with what may be the opinions of many of the CSL members, Sawyer called the proposal "an imaginative idea, but we still need to work some things out."

SU law students start campus branch of nation-wide Civil Rights Council

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

Nearly 50 law students have formed a Syracuse University chapter of The Law Students Civil Rights Research Council, an organization that has gained national recognition through its championing of civil rights cases in the U.S.

The Syracuse chapter, according to Cliff Forstadt, an organizer of the group, will offer services to both the community and the University.

In the community the chapter is working with the Civil Liberties Union in researching such matters as rights of patients in mental hospitals and excessive bail, particularly in drug cases, and in drawing up a model code for the legalization of marijuana or the reduction of penalties for its use.

At SU, the group already has set up a draft counseling service which meets Thursday nights and is working with the Syracuse Draft Counseling Service. According to Forstadt, the chapter also will look into the due process procedures at the University.

The national council was founded in 1963 after a handful of Northern law students gave up summer jobs to go south as volunteer clerks for civil rights lawyers.

In the summer of 1965 more than 100 students scattered over the North as well as the South to aid indigent clients from Philadelphia to San Francisco.

Besides clerking for attorneys, the council has researched subjects ranging from rent control to de facto segregation. According to a 1965 Time Magazine article, "the movement has an impressive record of devotion to the constitutional law in action."

"We want to help people with legal problems who can't afford or can't contact lawyers," said Forstadt of the SU chapter, adding that the organization will be able to forward such people to attorneys. "We're hoping to guarantee basic rights in the city and the university."

He said there is a great demand in the civil rights area of the law, but that low or no pay often is involved.

"I also see civil liberties as the most important type of legal work," said Forstadt. "The law is supposed to protect the people, but often people find themselves on the short end of the deal."

Forstadt, who said he thinks the faculty and administration are "enthusiastic" about the organization, figures participants not only will get practical experience, but also will help change the law profession "which has tended to be conservative in the past."

Members of the national board of advisors include Sen. Jacob K. Javits; Roger Baldwin; founder of the American Civil Liberties Union, Louis H. Pollack, dean of the Yale Law School; and Jack Greenberg, director counsel for the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational Fund Inc.

Sorority gets the axe as membership lags

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

The tight little world of SU sororities has grown even tighter.

The local chapter of Phi Mu has been declared inactive by its National Council.

Dean Carolyn Jones, panhellenic advisor, cited the chapter's "declining membership over a period of six to eight years" as one primary reason for the decree.

The chapter currently has 31 sisters.

At the sorority's 30th biennial convention in Denver last year, chapters from across the nation shared 100 awards in 13 categories. SU's Beta Zeta Chapter received none.

Threads of continuity

We are fortunate to be members of a generation that demonstrates great idealism. We have seen the devotion to racial equality in our compatriots; we have shared their antipathy to war and other expressions of man's cruelty to man.

Every generation deserves this chance to try to change the course of history, to express what is best in the potential of man. Doing so, however, seems to entail today a rejection of all things past. It is shallow but common comment that we are a generation unique in its idealism and committment.

We may justly ask: why has the fight for civil rights been left so long that we must press it over 100 years after the Emancipation Proclamation? How can our elders endure such an unjust war as the terrible one in Vietnam?

Then they answer in a tired voice, filled with the inarticulateness that marks their generation like the passion that characterizes ours. that they were busy doing other things, seeking a little order and security which they possess in abundance today without really believing it.

What they were doing was struggling through the worst depression in our history, fighting a grim war that unleashed the most terrible forces in history and then trying to preserve the hard won peace through a costly system of collective security.

They rebelled against their parents by rejecting isolationism and establishing the United Nations. They broke with tradition by sending women to work, children to "progressive schools," and unions into the large industries.

Our generation is fortunate in growing up more or less secure, and in having the technological and industrial means to satisfy our quantitative, material needs.

Now we can lift the burden from our elders and pursue the qualitative values that we know, and they always suspected, were most important.

Freshman rush

Who's House?

By Bob Tembeckjian

Freshman are now in the process of rushing fraternity and sorority houses, and they are, as a consequence, forming various opinions of the Greek system. Following is a conversation overheard yesterday in which two freshmen discuss their rushing experiences.

"Hey, what's the hurry?"

"Can't you see? I'm rushing."

"You seem pretty happy about it. What's happened?"

"Man, I've seen a lot of well-known campus people and I'm really excited. Some of them were disappointing to meet, though."

"What do you mean? Like, who'd you see?"

"Well, at Theta Chi, for instance, old Bruce Chadwick just tried to convince me how bad the DO was and how it never said much. Then he went on and on about how bad Chuck Hicks was and how he never did anything. I guess if you agree with him you can take that stuff all night long. I left early, though. I got tired of his picking on Hicks and Babcock."

"What'd you do then?"

"I went to TKE. Now there's a house! I mean, guys write songs like "Hold Me Tight," and they've got jukeboxes and stuff! I was really excited. After a while Bob Kelly, my campus hero, introduced himself. Mostly he talked about his trip to Florida, and IFC, and how there are only seven girls in all his classes. He seemed easygoing and nice, but he ran into a problem. He put a quarter into the jukebox but didn't know which three songs to play. He almost called a meeting of the whole house to decide before I convinced him to just pick any three at random."

"What did you hear?"

"'Help,' 'What Kind of Fool Am I?' and 'Zorba the Greek.'"

"Sounds like you've been having fun. I haven't been doing too well. I've done a lot of walking between houses, but I seem to go unnoticed by the brothers. All they say is 'Hello, where you from?...oh, that's nice. Well, stop in again sometime, err, if we invite you.' That's all I've been getting."

"Too bad. Anyway, let me tell you about Kappa Sig."

"Kappa Sig? Which one's that?"

"That's my buddy Joe Nicoletti's house. Man, he just talked my ear off about politics, concert committees, CSL, campus parties and elections. It was like Walter Cronkite and the Seven O'clock News."

"God, those crazy Greeks'll talk to anyone who'll listen."

"Yeah. Well, what are you going to do? Pledge?"

"I don't know. They didn't pay too much attention to me. I even used Ultra Brite. I guess I never wanted to be a Greek anyway. I mean, all they do is lie, cheat, steal, and spill milk at dinner. And they're a bunch of idiots. No sir, I wouldn't be a Greek if you paid me. I don't want to be corrupted."

"It looks to me as if you already are. I think I'll pledge."

"Why?"

"Some of my best friends are Greeks."

Letters to the editor

No speaker?

To the Editor:

As a living, breathing, though somewhat exhausted member of the notorious Class of '69, I have but one question left in my weary scholastic soul to ask--who is our graduation speaker?

As the days roll by, our selection will undoubtedly narrow to such illustrious choices as Tiny Tim, Captain Kangaroo, or, heaven help us, that household word, Spiro T. Agnew.

Sara A. Bookbinder
Haven - 8

Welcome?

To the Editor:

The freshmen have "O Week," the sophomores have the slump the juniors have their majors, and the seniors their fantasies of graduation --what do the transfers have? Food Service.

That is the way many transfers feel. We find ourselves in notorious freshman dorms, adhering to freshman rules, and paying for freshman projects. We are given optional hours in the hope that somehow that will appease us into accepting the constant barrage of happy freshmen engaged in the pursuit of non-academic activities (as is the tradition and in many ways the right of the frosh.)

Unlike many frosh we all came to Syracuse with a purpose in mind. We gave up the friends and organizations of other institutions because we felt that SU would really give us what we wanted. Academically speaking most of us are satisfied. Otherwise we feel like "the country-cousin" who has come to visit and finds himself quite ably ignored. We have, at least, some experience with organizations on other campuses and are willing to get included here.

We are not disillusioned with SU; perhaps disgusted would be the word to best express our present feelings. We feel ignored, forgotten, and generally disregarded. We want to give something to the campus too, but have found that our lack of knowledge concerning university policies and our status as transfers (rather than the freshman status which automatically labels the kid as ignorant of such things) are making it very difficult.

We are here, we are in the frosh dorms, eating in the dining halls, studying in the libraries, and trying to become a part of our adopted school. We ask only recognition, not only as upper classmen, which just as others we have earned, but also as new students!

Sharon Fruto

And to all of you transfers, a hearty welcome from the Daily Orange. Ed.

Beauty or beast

To the Editor:

It came to my attention today that Watson Dormitory is sponsoring a beauty contest in which girls in my dorm are invited to participate.

In looking through the DO's February 5 "Happenings on the Hill" I notice two somewhat similar events: 1) "Sweetheart's Ball" and 2) "Winter Weekend Queen Contest."

As a woman dedicated to Women's Liberation, I strongly oppose all three events. My reason is that these events are based on an inhuman, oppressive premise: that women are things to be selected, like cattle at an auction, on the basis of physical attributes. By stressing the phsyical demeanor of women, their mental abilities are minimized at best, or, as is all too often the case, ignored. These contests stress conformity to a dubious norm, the Ideal American Woman (she is a 36-24-36 White Anglo-Saxon, or so the "Miss America" contest would have us believe).

In conclusion I urge men and women at this university to abstain from participation in and to stridently oppose these "slave market" exhibitions. A suggested means of demonstrating dissent is this: get a ballot for these contests and vote; write on your ballot the words "Liberate Women."

Next confrontation?

Tonight's Senate meeting to study off-campus living

By COREY SANDLER

The disputed right of an upperclassman to live off campus may prove to be the topic of the next confrontation between SU students and administrators.

Student Senate will meet tonight at 7:30 p.m. in Grant to hear a motion that will request the administration to accept one standard regarding housing exemption, and that this standard be applied to both men and women.

In the spring of 1967, Bruce Riedel, a senate member, authored the Housing Exemption Extension Act. This bill proposed that all students who are 21 by October of their senior year, and who have attained at least a 2.7 cumulative average, and have not been on any form of disciplinary probation, may petition for off-campus residence.

The policy was immediately accepted and put into force by the dean of men.

There have been no reported cases of students with proper credentials being turned down by the office. On the other hand, according to Student Senate President Pro Tempore John Diamond, the Dean of Women does not necessarily adhere to this standard. Each case before the dean is treated individually. "This discrepancy in housing policy should not exist on a campus which is supposedly living in an age when men and women have equal rights and responsibilities," said Diamond.

One major argument given the plan is the concept of the "residence university." The chancellor has stated that he believes that there is great educational value in the experience of living on campus. Diamond disagrees with this contention.

"It should be pointed out that approximately 20 per cent of the undergraduate students on this campus commute, which means 20 per cent are not allowed to participate in this "educational experience." In addition to that, there is the large fraternity-sorority population. This type of environment can hardly be equated in any logical manner with the environment of a cinder-block dormitory," said Diamond.

A spokesman for the students, who was not involved in the cheating itself, said, "it doesn't seem to be a very democratic appeal when one is obligated to go back to the original body which heard the case. This is an example of the lack of due process associated with academic dishonesty cases."

He continued the students feel the processes were long, drawn out and inefficient. Those who confess to their actions were told that their cooperation with the committee would enter into any decisions, but two or three semesters of suspension do not seem to be lenient sentences.

According to the spokesman, the students first heard about the recommendations during a television newscast and in the newspapers because of leaks from the faculty and administrators. However, the students were not officially informed of the actions which would have been taken against them, until yesterday.

"They were kept in complete oblivion as to what was going on and the three weeks since the examinations were filled with rumors," he said.

"There is a need for a complete re-evaluation of the system of hearing cases of academic dishonesty," the spokesman said. "The way the University handled this case is the biggest mockery.

"The penalties serve to explain the complete administrative ineptitude of the University. This case should lead to needed reforms in academic dishonesty hearings," he said.

Operation Volunteer gives involvement opportunity

Involvement in an extra-campus activity can help close the gap between student and community. Such an opportunity is offered by the Syracuse Volunteer Center, which works in conjunction with the student organization on campus called Operation Volunteer.

This is not a club but an organizing force to place interested students with various city agencies of their choice for volunteer work in the community.

Students work two or three hours a week in such areas as nursery and child care, youth and adult programs (tutoring and recreation aides), United Campaign assistants, senior citizens' programs, helping the handicapped, and office and project aides. Because the work is volunteer, personal gain is determined by the effort and enthusiasm contributed by each individual to the service in which he is involved.

Representatives from the volunteer Center will be on campus today and tomorrow to interview interested students and place them in agencies of their choice. Interviews will be held from noon to 4 p.m. at Hendricks Chapel basement. Questions concerning work in individual agencies may be referred to Don Lash or George Beaudry, Sadler 3, Ext. 2921, 2926.

Student Senate

Student Senate will meet tonight at 7:30 in B117 Grant, according to President Pro Tempore John Diamond.

TEACH IN GHANA or NIGERIA?

Yes: — If you . . .

1. Have a Bachelor's Degree; preferably a Master's Degree.
2. Have at least 30 semester hours credit in one of the following: a. physics, b. chemistry, c. biology, d. mathematics, e. industrial arts, f. French, g. geography, h. home economics; or i. business education.
3. Desire to teach at the secondary school level.

"Our Business Is People"

Steigers seem less remote during visit . . .

'Captive audience'

All eyes are transfixed on Rod Steiger as students stare and listen intently at one of the actor's informal discussions here last week. (Photo by Clemens)

"I had thought of the theater in America as dying but young people are so interested in it here that I don't think it can be dying. The theater is coming back in a form acceptable to them."

She spoke precisely in a soothing melodious voice that has just enough of a British accent to make it sound cultured and distinctive. Miss Bloom prolongs such words as ghastly, extraordinary, marvelous and devasting, all of which she uses frequently.

The petite actress wore a short black knit dress with a white stripe down the front and a plastic ring belt around her slim waist. Her glossy dark brown hair was pulled severely back by a dark red silk scarf. On her left arm was a gold linked bracelet that she frequently turned around her wrist.

When asked what her favorite films are, she wrinkled her forehead, put her hand to her chin and said, "Battle of Algiers" and "Elvira Madigan."

"I think 'Elvira Madigan' is a woman's film," she said. "I thought it was extraordinary but I took my husband and he just sat there."

At one point, she described Allan Bates as "a marvelous and delicate actor."

"When they did the play 'Look Back in Anger,' he created the role of the Welsh boy but they didn't want him for the movie," Miss Bloom said. "They didn't think he was film material."

Miss Bloom also discussed the reactions of the Steigers' nine-year-old daughter to their films.

"She saw 'In the Heat of the Night' and was upset because her papa looked fat," said Miss Bloom with a smile. "She wants us to look beautiful. She saw us on television during the Academy Awards and was disappointed. She wanted me to look like a fairy queen."

Miss Bloom said her daughter had asked to be in the Steiger's next film.

"She told me, 'I'll do anything, I'll even run in and say, telegram,'" Miss Bloom said as she put her hands together in her lap, threw her head back and laughed. "I can't imagine where she got the idea that people in movies run in and say 'Telegram.'

"I'd never discourage her from becoming an actress but I'd rather she did something else because it does become difficult trying to live down or live up to your family."

Although Steiger is six years older than his British-born wife, she has been a theatrical success longer than he. When she was 15, she got her first job in a B.B.C. radio play. In 1952, at age 21, she received acclaim for her portrayal of Juliet which was credited by many as having put the Old Vic back on sound financial footing. Steiger first achieved fame in 1953 for the title role in the television version of "Marty."

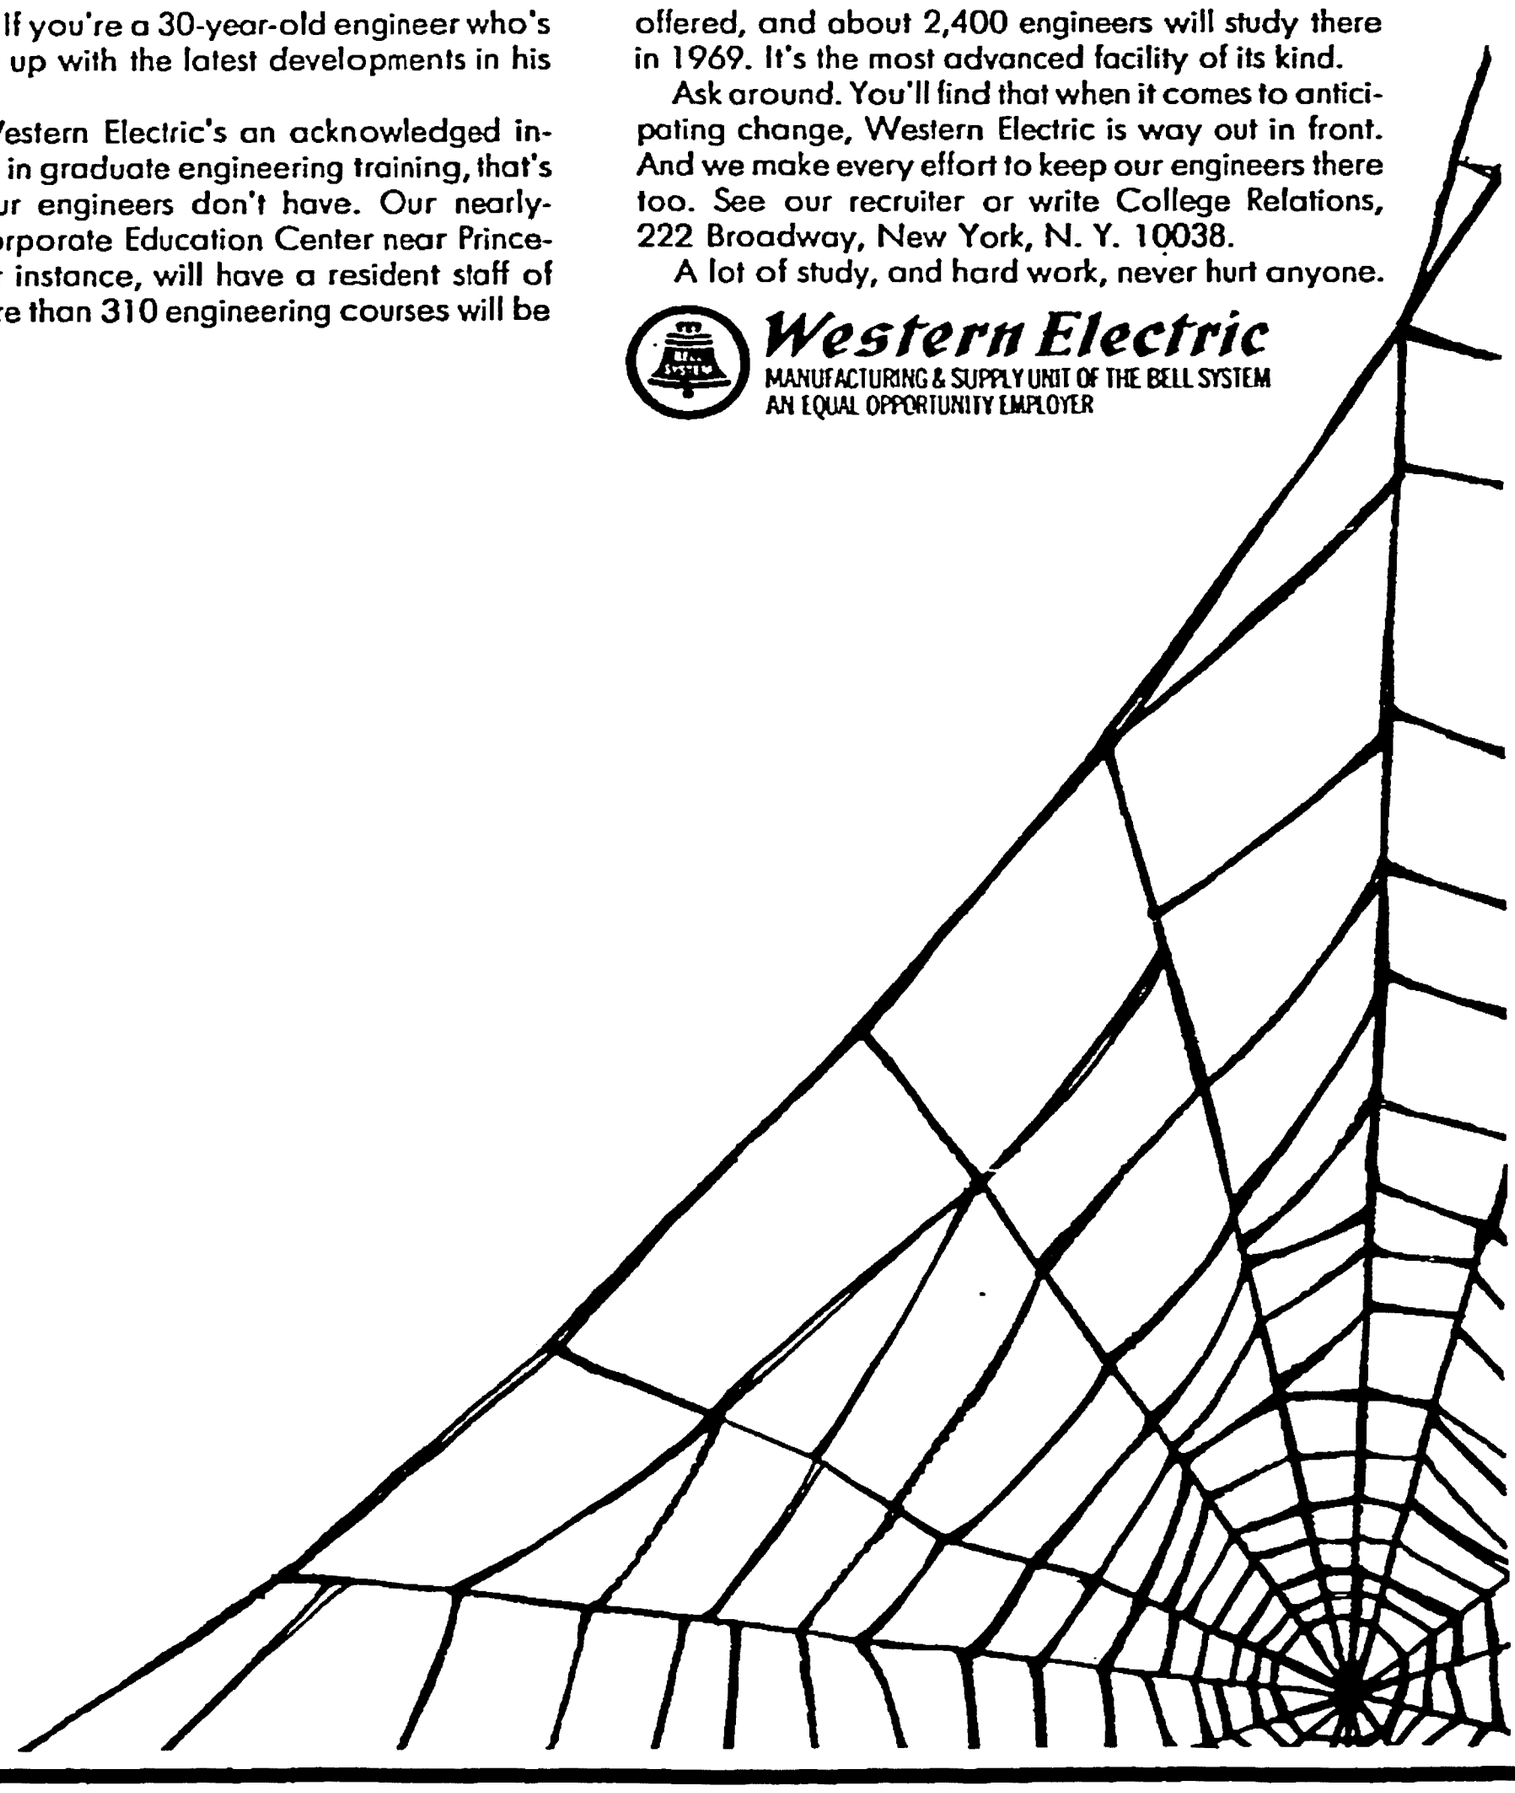
"I took you off the streets of London and made you what you are today-a nervous woman," Steiger said to his wife in a mock-serious tone.

She laughed and leaned over towards him. He kissed the back of her head.

The final vision the press had of the actor and his wife was as they stood in the hotel lobby waiting to leave. Miss Bloom, hatless and wearing a mink coat, smiled.

Steiger was silent and expressionless. He wore once again his orange cape-coat, a black, flat-topped, wide-brimmed hat and yellow sunglasses. Suddenly he seemed remote and unapproachable. He was the famous movie actor once more.

Is it possible to be passed by at 30?



Absolutely. If you're a 30-year-old engineer who's failed to keep up with the latest developments in his field.

Because Western Electric's an acknowledged industrial leader in graduate engineering training, that's one worry our engineers don't have. Our nearly-completed Corporate Education Center near Princeton, N. J., for instance, will have a resident staff of over 100. More than 310 engineering courses will be offered, and about 2,400 engineers will study there in 1969. It's the most advanced facility of its kind.

Ask around. You'll find that when it comes to anticipating change, Western Electric is way out in front. And we make every effort to keep our engineers there too. See our recruiter or write College Relations, 222 Broadway, New York, N. Y. 10038.

A lot of study, and hard work, never hurt anyone.

'Black and White'

Student discussion leaders strive to learn with peer group

By MONTYE CHAFEY

Under the concept of peer group instruction the course "Black and White in America" offers a new type of class discussion structure to Syracuse University.

"We aren't trying to disseminate any information to the group; we're striving to learn with it," said Larry Sampson in discussing his role and that of the other student discussion leaders.

The section leaders of the course differ from other university instructors and professors, not only because they are students, but because "we don't set ourselves up as authorities," said Craig Baumgarten, another student-instructor. Sampson thinks the advantage to this system is "a greater freedom of speech and frankness exists if there is not a person with a great deal of authority in the class."

Baumgarten said different techniques were being used to sensitize the students to racial issues. In the technique of role playing one class member might be appointed to act the role of racist and another to act as a black militant. He told of how one instructor discriminated against half of his class to make the students aware of how discrimination felt.

CRAIG BAUMGARTEN

For the most part discussion prevails and the discussion leader's job is "merely to direct discussion along a particular channel," said Baumgarten. Both he and Greg Williams agreed that like professors, they were responsible for bringing some predetermined topics into the course.

Williams, like other instructors minimized his own role. "I don't think I bring a greater store of knowledge to the group than any other group member," he said.

A test was given at the beginning of the semester and another will be given at the end as a final, or post-course test. None of the four discussion leaders interviewed said they would use the final as a grade determinant although this isn't necessarily true in all six classes. The purpose of the tests is to evaluate this course as an experiment in learning.

Total group involvement was the theme of the instructors in describing their efforts in "Black and White in America." Larry Sampson summed up the goals of the course this way: "I'm interested in what they (the students) are saying, I am part of the group and we have a goal of becoming aware, sensitive and open."

Students to submit suggestions

Ideas needed for centennial observance

Undergraduate and graduate students are invited to submit their ideas and suggestions for the University's Centennial to the student committee for the Centennial observance, student chairman Barbara Woods has announced.

The student committee will meet Thursday night at 8 p.m. in Newhouse Communications Center to discuss ideas for the Centennial, and to consider suggestions for involving students in the program. The meeting is the first of several open meetings designed to give students an opportunity to participate in planning for the Centennial program, Miss Woods said. Students are invited to attend the meeting in person, or to contact one of the student committee members to submit suggestions.

Graduate students also will have representatives on the student Centennial committee, according to George Dolch, GSO president. The graduate student representatives are expected to be appointed at the GSO meeting Tuesday night (Feb. 11).

All areas of the University are expected to be involved in planning and carrying out the Centennial program. The faculty committee is scheduled to meet this afternoon (Tuesday, Feb. 11) to consider suggestions.

Mr. DeWitt C. LeFevre, Board of Trustees representative, is general chairman of the Centennial Committee, with activities coordinated on campus through the office of Kenneth G. Bartlett, Vice President for Public Affairs. Dr. Kathryn Morgan, associate professor of mathematics is faculty chairman, and Miss Woods is chairman.

Sorority . . .

Current members of the chapter have attained alumnae status, thus retaining "all rights and privileges" of Phi Mu alumnae membership. Fall pledges were given the option of being initiated or of being released.

The current crop of sisters will continue living in their house at 208 Walnut Place for the remainder of this semester. The sorority corporation owns the building and property.

Phi Mu was founded on March 4, 1852 at Wesleyan Female College in Macon, Georgia. Nationally, it has 107 chapters with approximately 5,000 collegiate members and 45,000 alumnae.

At Syracuse, however, the sorority felt the pressure of competing with large "name" houses. As its sisterhood declined, so did its appeal to some rushees.

In addition, Phi Mu also had to cope with other problems plaguing almost all Greek houses. Seniors' apartment option and dorms with greater privileges may be robbing Greeks of their alluring niche as advantageous living centers.

The demise of Phi Mu, not entirely unexpected or surprising, leaves 22 national sorority chapters on this campus. Others, however, may also find stumbling blocks in the path of growth that are piling high enough to make a wall.

Rabbi Elefant awards Hillel members before 5-month Sabatical to Israel

In his last official act as Hillel Director before leaving on a five month Sabbatical to Israel, Rabbi Milton Elefant bestowed the Golden Key Award, B'nai B'rith Hillel's highest achievement, upon seven seniors at the Hillel dinner Sunday night.

Arthur Koch, who has been president of Hillel for three years, received a special award in addition to his Key. Koch was singled out by Rabbi Elefant for his "unending efforts for Hillel" and for "almost single-handedly raising Hillel's membership in three years from under 500 to over 1250."

Also honored were Bob Kravitz, cantor; Ed Jacobs, Vice President of Filming Programming; Harry Dank, Religious Vice President; Michael Pike, Social Vice President; Claire Zysblat, Vice President in charge of Frosh Council; and Carol Shanik, Cultural Vice President.

Seniors Fred Katz and Neil Dansker, contributors to Hillel's newsletter, the "Sage," were awarded Certificates of Merit. A Hillel Pin, for outstanding service, was awarded to Senior Arlene Rosen, Publicity Chairman.

Judicial Board suspends 2 men for apartment caper

By BOB DAVIS

The Syracuse University Judicial Board made decisions on two cases last week. One resulted in the suspension of two students for one semester, while the other case ended in a guilty, no action decision.

In the first case two male students signed up as commuting students during registration. Actually both students were living in an off-campus apartment without official permission.

On Saturday, January 25, at 2 a.m., a resident of Booth Hall saw two people loading furniture into a car. Officials were able to trace the car, by its license plate, to the father of one of the students that was living off-campus illegally.

The students, it was shown, were using Booth furniture to furnish their apartment. The students were caught in possession of four chairs, one coffee table, one rug, a lamp and a quantity of toilet paper.

The students were found guilty of a violation of residence requirements and a falsification of information. In addition, they were found guilty of theft. The vote was 7-2 guilty, by the University Judicial Board.

Both students have submitted written requests to appeal the decision to the Court of Appeals.

Another case involved a girl who asked a male friend to help her study for a physics final. They used a room in the dormitory where the girl resides. At 5 a.m., a director of the dorm found them in the room studying together.

The girl elected to be tried by the University Judicial Board. The boy, however, decided to go before the Dean of Men.

After hearing the case, the court found her guilty, but took no action against her. Paul Snyder of the University Judicial Board explained that the girl had not broken any of the five questions asked by the board.

The questions are, "Was anyone hurt?" "Was anyone inconvenienced?" "Was anything damaged?" "Did any harmful results occur?" "Was any federal, state or local law broken?" Since the answer to these five questions was no, the board took no action.

Records fall during Manley track meet

By DOUG GARR

Coach Bob Grieve's track team set three university records last Friday night as they easily beat Cortland and Hamilton in a triangular meet at Manley Field House. The Orangemen finished with 61 points, while Cortland and Hamilton had 32 1/2 and 22 1/2 respectively.

Guy Roberts broke the former SU record of 1:11.8 in the 600 yard dash by one-tenth of a second as he turned in an extremely fast 1:11.7.

Gil West finished second in the long jump to three-event winner Bob Devins of Cortland. West's 23-3 in the long jump was good enough for a varsity record, however, even though Devins nipped him with 23-5, a Field House record.

The third SU record was set by Roger Taylor in the shot put. Taylor tossed an impressive 54-3 as Syracuse swept the first three places in that event.

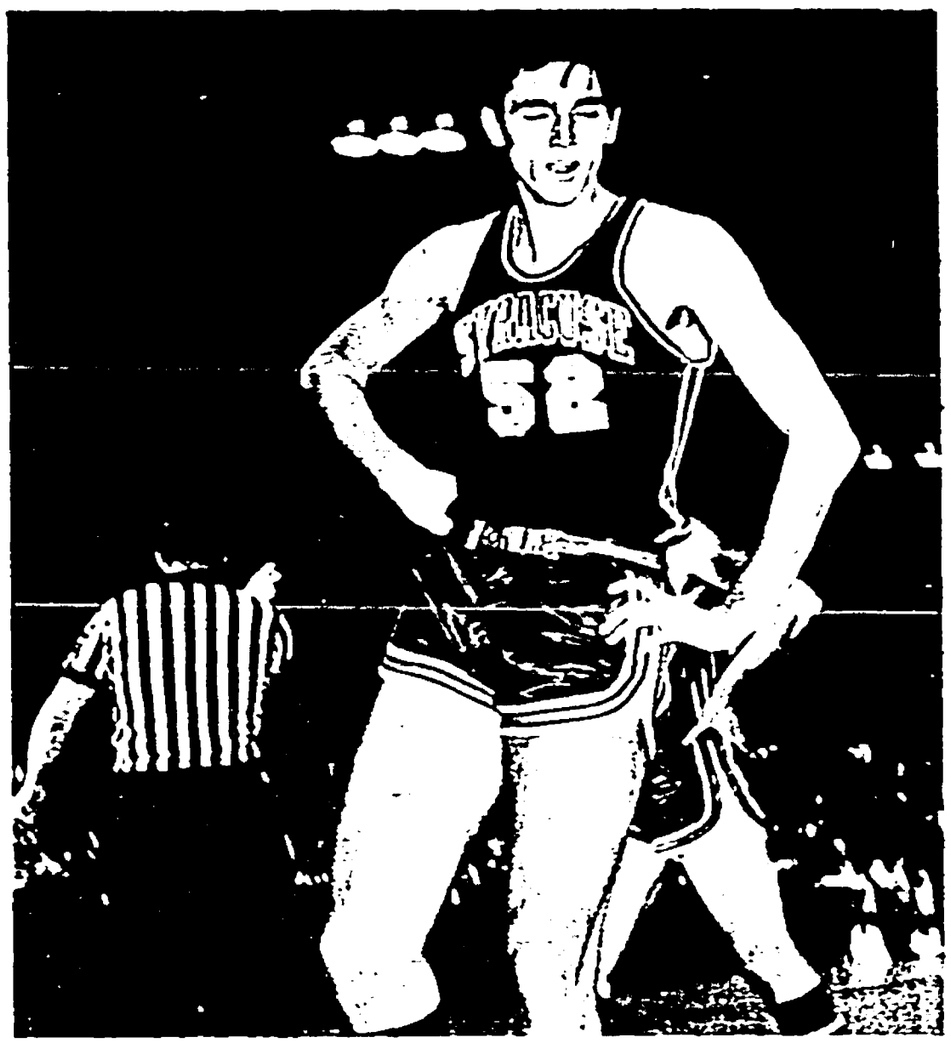
The star of the meet turned out to be Cortland's Bob Devins. He finished the evening winning three events, the 160- yard dash, the long jump and the high jump. In the two field events, he set Manley Field House records, including a 6-2 high jump.

Larry Zuller of the Orangemen also turned in a standout performance. He won the 1000-yard run in 2:15.6 and the mile in 4:18. He almost nipped Hamilton's anchor man in the two-mile relay as well, making up nearly a 75-yard deficit.

Syracuse's other first place was in the mile relay, with a time of 3:29.5.

The SU freshmen team also started the season with a winning performance as they overwhelmed the Cortland yearlings, 70-31.

Tom Stoyan won the 1000-yard run in 2:16.3 which Grieve called "really quick for a freshman." Andy Hurray was a double winner, as he won both the mile and two mile events. Other first places were earned by Mike Sweeney in the 600-yard dash and Bill Lefesky in the pole vault. Andy Weezer and Bill Larrabee tied in the high jump.



Next Friday evening at 7:00 p.m. the Orangemen host Cornell and Cortland in another triangular meet. Coach Grieve thinks it will be a close meet and promises the mile run to be one of the most exciting races of the season.

Sidelights

There will be a meeting of all candidates for the varsity golf team tonight at 6:30 at Delta Upsilon, 426 Ostrom Ave.

WAER will broadcast both games of the Colgate double-header on Wednesday night, beginning at 6 p.m.

BOUNCING BACK after six straight losses, the Orange won a baskerball game on Saturday night, defeating American. Bill Smith, the sophomore center, led the way with 28 points. In addition, soul music returned to the pre-game festivities for the first time this year, which proves that as the Temptations go, so goes the Orange. (Photos by Biggar)

Voice from the bleachers

Pressure cooker

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

"There is no rotten way to win; there is only winning."–Yves Montand in the film, Grand Prix.

"Who needs the aggravation?"–Dr. Fred Lewis, in the real life drama, Losing Season.

Intercollegiate athletics is supposed to be an extention of the educational process. Coaches are supposed to instruct boys in areas such as compassion and valor, things that are better taught on the playing fields than in the classroom.

Such idealism, however, seldom gets further than a Tom Slick cartoon on a Saturday morning. College sports is intense competition, complete with un-campus like facets as hate, money and brutality. Sometimes it is hard to tell the college sport apart from its professional counterpart--without a scorecard, anyway.

John Bridgers was the well-liked coach of Baylor University until this past year, when he suffered his second straight losing season. He is now the well-liked ex-coach of Baylor University, and is currently trying to earn a living as an assistant coach with a pro team. He observed recently, "In pro football, it's obvious that you must win. In college football, there's sometimes talk of other goals, but when you get right down to it, that's what really matters there, too."

Bridgers was axed, not because he was a bad teacher, or because he could not get along with the university community, or because he used outdated methods, but simply because he did not win.

All through college athletics, but especially in the major sports, the pressure to win has become phenomenal. The equation is simple: Schools rely on money, a big name brings in money and sports is a quick route to a big name.

While some, like Bridgers, are eased out of the picture, others get out of their own accord. Syracuse's former basketball coach, Dr. Fred Lewis, is a good example.

Lewis resigned to take a post as athletic director at Sacremento State College in California. Although he didn't make his decision known until late May, there were indications earlier that he was disenchanted with "the big time."

During the winter he talked longingly about an article in Sports Illustrated about a close friend of his, Phil Woolpert. Woolpert won back-to-back NCAA basketball championships with the University of San Francisco in the years of the Bill Russell-K.C. Jones teams. A few years later, he retired from coaching, mainly because his health and his nerves could not take the pressure anymore. He subsequently assumed the coaching job at a small California school, and was enjoying coaching again, in spite of his teams' mediocrity.

In the final months of his tenure here, Lewis had the Woolpert story constantly on his mind. He left with some definite distaste about the local athletic policies, and a sense of relief as well.

Lewis knew the tensions that both good and bad seasons can bring for there is pressure when the team is losing, and there is pressure when the team is going well. The coach must worry about victory in this game, while subconciously he is already planning ahead for the next one. Sometimes, in fact, it is worse when winning. Win one, and the wolves want another. Lose one, and the wolves are upon you.

Somewhere along the line, a wise man said that games were supposed to be fun. In college sport today, however, business has cut in, and fun has been pushed right off the dance floor.

Santangelo the only gem on Romeo's Orange gym squad

By FRED KRAVER

The current superstar athlete at Syracuse University is not an All-American running-back. Nor is his specialty averaging 30 points a game for the basketball team. He is a fantastic gymnast named Ernie Santangelo.

That the gymnastics team is only 1-3 is no fault of Ernie's. The fault lies in that the team is extremely weak. In gymnastics, a good team boasts three good competitors in each event. Syracuse faced Penn State last Saturday with a total of five gymnasts. The result was a 131-80.45 defeat.

In defeat, Santangelo led all scorers with 27 points, yet was still disappointed with his performance.

He finished second in long-horse vaulting, third in the parallel bars and the high bars, and fourth in the floor exercise. In gymnastics' complicated scoring system, that is an average of seven points out of ten allotted to each event. Ernie was disappointed because he failed to reach his average of 30 points per meet.

Santangelo is remarkably versatile. Although he competes in four events, he is capable of being an "all-around," that is, performing in all six events. Syracuse does not have three men for every event, and cannot afford to let Ernie perform as an all-around.

Santangelo's best event is long-horse vaulting. His goal is to compete in the long-horse at the Nationals in Seattle later this season. Last year, he finished sixth in the East in that event.

The Catholic high school that Santangelo attended did not support a gymnastics team, so he competed with the Rochester Turners. He chose SU primarily for its gymnastics program, but did not neglect the academic aspects. "Syracuse has geen good to me in a lot of ways," he says.

The general complaint of the gymastics team was voiced by Santangelo, when he complained about the lack of recognition the gymnastics team gets. "The students don't know when a gymnastics meet is on. How could the football team survive if nobody came to the games? It's the same with us. We need more recognition."

One of the reasons the team has no depth is that the University grants very few scholarships to gymnastics. Santangelo is one of the few on scholarship.

The stocky little senior is very devoted to the sport. Coach Paul Romeo is in high praise of his star, but fears that his intensity occasionally is hard on the team. Santangelo expects nothing short of one-hundred per cent from each of his teammates.

He practices with the team hours a day, every day except Saturday. "Working on each event keeps us in shape," he points out. "In practice, we each concentrate on our specialties."

Romeo feels that Santangelo's best event is long-horse vaulting, but prophecies that he could be a surprise in the parallel bars.

It is unfortunate that the gymnastics team must rely on one man, particularly since Romeo thinks the team has reached its peak, and if anything it is downhill from here on. But if one man is capable of carrying the team, it's superstar Ernie Santangelo.

GULP. The winning streak of the seim team was snapped at four by Bucknell on Saturday, but the Orange put up a good fight before losing, 59-54. Despite missing three swimmers from the lineup, a matter of a few tenths of a second would have reversed the score.

Former deans to teach

Policy Institute opens

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

All the men who will be working for the new Policy Institute, an organization established by the Syracuse University Research Corporation (SURC), will teach at least one course each semester, according to Dr. Stephen K. Bailey, chairman of the Policy Institute.

At a press conference at the Syracuse Press Club yesterday afternoon, Bailey also announced the names of the members of his staff.

Harlan Cleveland, currently the U.S. Ambassador to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, and a former dean of the Maxwell School will join the core staff of SURC in June. He will also rejoin the political science faculty for at least one academic year to help design the international component of the Policy Institute and will do writing on the problems of post-Vietnam international relations.

Also named to the staff was Richard T. Frost, who has served as national director of Project Upward Bound for the U.S. Office of Economic Opportunity.

Other members of the core staff are Fred B. Smith, an attorney specializing in the fields of international trade and finance, and Joel S. Berke, a doctoral candidate at SU, who served as personal assistant to the Maxwell Dean when Bailey held that office.

Before naming his staff, Bailey said, "The core staff will be kept very small and we do not plan to develop a large research staff. Instead we will dip into the University. The core will be organizing the talent and relating the University members to the research."

He said the Policy Institute has already begun three projects: the preparation of a report for the U.S. Office of Education on the status of research on education in the U.S.; a study for a private foundation on the feasibility of developing privately financed and organized work-study programs for underprivileged youths; and an analysis of governmental and social service questions involved in the establishment of a new community for the Urban Development Corporation of New York State.

A committee composed of University administrators, faculty and students will serve as an advisory council to the Policy Institute. The chairman of the 10-member council will be Dr. John C. Honey, University vice president for governmental affairs and research.

Chancellor William P. Tolley commented on the Policy Institute saying it represents a "new role for major universities." He defined the role as helping to "provide the intellectual base for solution of the major policy issues confronting the governments and societies of the world."

Royal O'Day, chairman of SURC's executive committee, Stephen K. Bailey, chairman of the new Policy Institute and Chancellor William P. Tolley appeared together at a news conference yesterday to announce the formation of the Policy Institute.

Fraternity rush: better or worse?

By LARRY KRAMER

Fraternity rush at S.U. this semester showed marked differences with previous rush periods. Whether the differences were better or worse is a topic of controversy.

The first reactions after informal rush, last Wednesday and Thursday, were of disappointment. Houses that had traditionally attracted between 150 and 200 people each night found themselves entertaining no more than 60 or 70 this year.

"Actually, most people don't realize it, but this year's rush drew more people than ever before," remarked Mike Asen, Inter-Fraternity Council prosecutor.

Approximate figures, accumulated through individual count totals from all the houses, and not counting any duplicates revealed that more than 600 freshman attended rush functions; a total slightly higher than last year's comparable freshman rush.

Asen said the higher total, despite apparent lower turnouts, was due to open contact, which permits fraternity members to socialize with perspective rushees.

"We had open contact throughout the first semester for the first time," he said. "We staged an informal rush during December for six days. This year, the freshman went into second semester rush with the idea of visiting two or three houses, not the nine they had to see last year."

The stamp system this year also was revised considerably. This year, nine stamps were to be collected over a six night period in December. The houses were assigned certain nights to be open. The nights that houses were to be kept open were decided on the basis of geography, as opposed to last year's system which separated houses on the basis of size. Also last year, twelve stamps were needed and they were collected in February. This year's stamps

Senate forms new courts; off-campus rules changed?

By RONA KAVEE

Last night's long and somewhat grueling Student Senate meeting yielded a number of significant and far-reaching results.

The first order of business recognized by Senate Speaker Ed Feldman was the amending of the University's Judicial Code. Paul Snyder, chief justice of the University Judicial Board was present at the meeting to explain the importance of each amendment and clarify any questions as to its application.

The UJB will henceforth be called Undergraduate Student Court. It presented several amendments delegating its power to a series of subsidiary courts for the Senate for its consideration.

The Senate approved the establishment of these lower courts within university living centers. The subsidiary courts must have their constitutions approved by the Undergraduate Student Court in order to hear cases.

The subsidiary courts will advise the presiding officers of the student courts of pending cases 24 hours prior to their hearing. At this time, the student court can reserve the right to rescind jurisdiction of the case if it chooses.

The jurisdiction of these courts is limited in the respect that they may only rule on cases involving violations of dormitory policy or regulations "which are not also general university regulations."

In addition, the Senate approved that amendment permitting the student court to "fine individuals or groups when deemed appropriate."

Debate arose over the passage of a number of procedural issues concerning the right of the court to subpoena witnesses.

The amendments dealing with these issues will be returned to the court so that it may revise them. Several students felt that several of these procedures violated United States constitutional rights.

The Senate moved on to pass a bill permitting undergraduates to live off campus in accordance with several regulations.

First, only seniors will be permitted the privilege of off-campus living. Second, a student must be at least 21 by October 1 of his senior year or younger with "parental acceptance of responsibility. Finally, the student have at least a 2.5 index and must never have been on academic probation. These standards are subject to university approval.

Any student who does not meet these standards may petition to have them waived. In most cases, all qualified students will have to do is inform the proper housing authority that they will be living off campus.

Feldmen emphasized the fact that these regulations will be uniform for both men and women. In the past, the dean of women has been reluctant to allow coeds to live off campus, while a significant number of male students have been granted the privilege.

John Diamond, speaker pro tempore of the Senate, announced that the Faculty Senate has proposed the inclusion of students in its activities as a representative body. Diamond said he believed this to be "an exceedingly beneficial step towards the goal of one university government."

Chancellor William P. Tolley has added his voice to the growing list of university heads advocating dual leadership.

As reported in last Friday's Daily Orange supplement, dual leadership splits a university's academic and financial reins between two men.

In a letter to this newspaper, Tolley explained' "On several occasions I have expressed to members of the Board of Trustees my belief that a large private university will find it advantageous to have both a Chancellor and a President."

Bearing in mind his impending retirement, Tolley continued, "When the new Chancellor and President of Syracuse is selected he should determine whether he wants to keep both titles or divide them.

"In any case, he will be the chief executive. The steps we have taken in reorganizing the central administration have been under consideration for some time and in the judgment of many are overdue. Other changes will be made by the new Chancellor and he should be permitted considerable freedom in continuing the reorganization of the central administration.

"In general," Tolley added, "privately endowed universities (unlike State universities) have made very inadequate provision for central administration. . .All of the members of the central administrative staff carry burdens their counterparts in public institutions would regard as intolerable if not impossible."

Institutionalizes human weaknesses

The Greek system revisited — and still ailing

The Greek system is still ailing and one thermometer of its fever is rush. Rush is the process whereby all Greek brothers and sisters demonstrate their brotherhood by stealing prospective pledges from one another.

This, of course, is not a new process but one long respected by the Greek system. "Hypocrisy and fraternity rushing seem to go hand in hand," said another misled Daily Orange editorial in 1958.

Rush has undoubtedly improved through the efforts of the Inter-Fraternity Council since the unhappy days when "another house was seen Saturday night at one of the local taverns, treating rushees and dates to free drinks!" Still, female rushees in cloth coats bounce like a black ball at some "fur from Fifth Ave." sororities.

It is unfair to indict the whole system for operating on the principles of social status rather than brotherhood. The pursuit of social status is a failing common to our society as a whole, as reflected by our advertising, fashions, and automobile restyling. The Greek system did not create this human shortcoming; it simply reflects it in an easily indentifiable form.

This is its greatest failing. It institutionalizes some of the worst aspects of human behavior. Although independents may pursue social status or discriminate on the basis of race or religion just as much as Greeks, the Greek through the social structure of his house can more easily express these human shortcomings. The independent cannot dictate who he will live with or next to. A Greek house is built on discriminatory selection. The interaction of diverse personalities and people may produce greater human understanding among independents. The Greek seeks to shelter himself from this interaction.

An example of the Greek tendency to institutionalize human weaknesses is dirty rush. Each year the Inter-Fraternity Council establishes rules by which rush is to be conducted. The object is to give each house an opportunity to present itself to desirable rushees before they have decided which house to pledge.

Dirty rush is the violation of those rules by a house so that it can secretly pledge a rushee it considers desirable, before he is attracted to another house. These violations have continued year after year despite the efforts of IFC. Recently, however, it eliminated dirty rush by institutionalizing it in "open contact" and "informal rush." Both allow the brothers of the house to meet with prospective pledges before formal rush in order to get to know one another, and by the way, to make committments to one another.

The tendency to institutionalize human weaknesses is a grave illness. John Gardner in "Self–Renewal," a brilliant book on the growth, decay and renewal of individuals and societies tells us: "A society decays when its institutions loose their vitality. As the organization or society ages, vitalty diminishes, a flexibility gives way to ridigity, creativity fades and there is a loss of capacity to meet challenges from unexpected directions."

Perhaps in the Garden of Eden man could ignore his weaknesses and drift into rigid patterns of behavior. But John Gardner and all of us know how long ago that was.

Letter to the editor: black students reply

Dear Editor,

As black students of Syracuse University, we consider the recent DO articles as well as administration policies towards blacks, at best, painfully amusing if not intolerably vexing.

Perhaps, as the DO article of January 31, 1969, Black activism, suggests, we are unappreciative in light of the liberal views students, faculty and administrators so eloquently express and sporadically practice.

"Many youths elevated from ghetto to campus haven't been the appreciative, industrious students some administrators anticipated." And as the article cautiously stated, perchance we don't belong here. "...U.S. universities began instituting programs to enroll deserving black youths who can't pay the bill or don't meet admission requirements." Everyone knows that all white students attending this school are qualified, paying scholars. And we apologize for our second-rate education.

Agreed we should acknowledge the "Humanitarian generosity" of forward looking universities and colleges (We do like to think that SU is liberal and forward looking). As the DO accurately reported, the number of black students has increased significantly in the past few years. A greater influx is expected in the future. SU's sports program is tolerably represented with several black athletes and most white students don't mind idolizing black athletes like Jim Brown, Ernie Davis, Dave Bing and Floyd Little. Blacks can be proud of a student body that extends itself to elect a black student to the prestigious alcove of student president. Indeed the growth of recent courses related to black people is a curious oddity at Syracuse that must be cherished.

And as black students we can be thankful for the other magnanimous gift-wrapped crumbs of white power here at SU. We certainly should be appreciative for the competent Security Police personnel who insist upon blacks showing their ID cards when entering student facilities of the Gym, while our white brothers go unmolested. The security people seemed to be following some University directive or discriminatory policy.

Several years ago when black students first decided to organize SAS, the only meeting space available seemed to be located in a cast-aside pre-fab while other white student organizations were allowed to use rooms more conducive to meetings. Infrequently the passing comfort of HL was obtained with pressure.

The Omega Psi Phi Fraternity during its embryonic stages of organization has to settle for the cramped quarters of the game room in Sadler basement, which offers the comfort of a well lighted miniature linen closet. At the same time Omega Psi Phi was beginning, another newly organized white fraternity was given the facilities of Newhouse where they could hold meetings. After one year of formal organization and formal recognition by campus administration, Omega Psi Phi embarrasingly finds itself competing with a rock group for the same ignominious linen closet. The suggestion by the brothers of this fraternity that they be allowed to use a vacant cottage for their meetings and program has not been answered by sedentary, if not remotely hostile, administrators. Obviously, Beebe Cottage where other black organizations like Student Afro-American Society (SAS) and Freshman Action Council have deservedly found a home, is supposed to be enough to accomodate the interests and activities of all black students. Maybe there are a lot of things we are not thankful for when we think about it.

Are we being cry babies and unjustly critical of SU. No, as one black student so aptly related to the DO, "There is room for improvement, but it can not happen overnight." But still it is becoming increasingly harder for black students to shower upon white students and administrators a whole lot of "thank you kindly Mr. Charlie." In light of frequent and flagrant indignities from white people, black students don't sleep well at night.

We are open to any responses or suggestions from white students and administrators for remedies that will arrest our black insomnia.

Tentatively yours,
Brothers of Omega Psi Phi

Growing program gets new director

By GREG SMITH

Prof. Ronald McDonald, assistant professor of political science, has been named director of the Maxwell Graduate School Latin American Studies Program. He replaces Dr. John C. Honey, newly appointed vice president for governmental affairs and research.

A recognized Latin American affairs expert who has done extensive research in his field, Prof. McDonald earned his A.B. at Pomona College and his M.A. and Ph.D. at UCLA. He has served as an advisor for secondary school education in Latin American studies to the New York State Dept. of Education. He joined the Maxwell faculty in 1963.

"Prof. McDonald lends a first-hand knowledge of Latin American affairs to the program," stated Dr. Honey, program director since Sept. 1967. "He has done excellent scholarly work on Latin American politics. I have been pleased with the program's operation thus far, and, because of these factors I'm highly encouraged about the program's future."

Dr. Robert J. Shafer, chairman of the All-University Latin American Committee, praised the appointment as "a great thing," calling McDonald "a widely-traveled and well-known scholar."

McDonald assumes a myriad of duties as director. He must take an overview of program development; seek research funds from outside sources; encourage the hiring of faculty with Latin American interests; participate in all university Latin American activities; and cooperate with Dr. Myron Lichtblau, chairman of the Undergraduate Latin American Concentration and Dr. Shafer.

The 23-year-old Latin American Studies Program offers anthropology, economics, geography, history, international relations, political science, and social science graduate degrees with specialization in Latin America. A semester of study at the University of Los Andes, Bogota, Colombia is available.

A certificate in Latin American studies is granted to graduates who complete 15 credit hours relevant to Latin America, as well as other requirements for the particular advanced degree being sought.

The program has recently participated in the opening of a graduate school for higher administration studies in Venezuela; cooperated with the Univ. of Buenos Aires, Argentina, in the training of graduate students in economics; and, in conjunction with the College of Business Administration, helped to set up a graduate school of business in Medellin, Colombia.

The program is only partly funded by SU. It has received $10,000 from the university for library development in the Latin American area. The program also receives limited travel and incidental expenses. Outside grants constitute a large portion of the budget.

Commented Prof. McDonald, "The program came about because of a coalescing of interests. It grew out of a mutual desire to coordinate activities in that area (Latin America) of the world. There is a strong interest in Latin America culturally and historically on campus. We have a genuine desire to intensify awareness of that region."

Architects' new project

Early Monday afternoon, third-year design students in the School of Architecture took on a different kind of project: the redesign and reconstruction of their own design studio.

But what put this project in the unique category was the fact that it was self-assigned--without the approval of the school's dean D. Kenneth Sargent, who did appear angered by the activity, according to students on the scene.

Students, however, were quick to point out that their aim was not to protest "but to improve conditions."

The project, which gained spontaneous approval from nearly all students in the class called for leveling the studio and overhauling the original arrangement to provide for more contact among designers lecture space. Picture at left shows nearly completed platform to provide more seating space before a small blackboard.

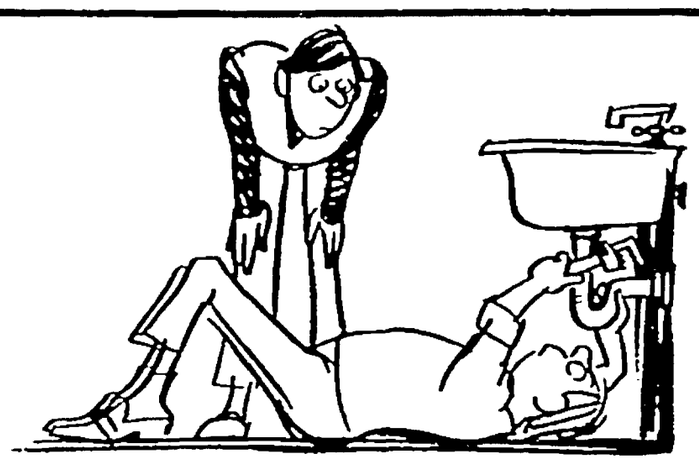
Corning president will lecture today



An informal coffee hour with Waterman is scheduled for 3 p.m. A question and answer period will follow the discussion.

The Association of Graduate Business Students (AGBS) is sponsoring a continuing business lectureship program starting this semester. Outstanding men and women in the business industry are invited to speak to students and faculty about current problems relating to their industry and on subjects relevant to ethical business practices.

R. Lee Waterman, President and Director of Corning Glass Works, Corning, New York, will be the guest lecturer today at 3:45 p.m. in Grant Auditorium.

He is a member of the Advisory Committee on Marketing for the Graduate School of Business Administration at Harvard University.

Waterman will speak on problems associated with the growth of Corning Glass.

1. Pipe broken?

No, I'm trying to find where I stashed some dough.

2. That's where you keep your money?

Sometimes I put it in the flower pot.

3. What's wrong with the bank?

I'd only take it right out again.

4. But that's what you're doing now.

Not quite. The beauty of my system is that I usually can't find where I put it.

5. I think you'd be a lot better off putting some of your dough into Living Insurance from Equitable. It not only gives you and the family you're going to have a lifetime of protection, it also builds cash values you can use for emergencies, opportunities, or even retirement.

I wonder if it could be with the french fries?

ACC meeting set to recruit new members

Syracuse University students who would like to get to know members of the faculty and become involved in some phase of academic work are invited to attend the annual recruiting meeting of the Academic Communication Corps tonight from 7:30 to 9 p.m. in the Founder's Room, Maxwell Hall.

The Academic Communications Corps, now in its third year, is a two-way arrangement whereby faculty get much-needed assistance with some aspect of their work and student volunteers gain insight into academic methods. Students who join the group may request any type of volunteer work which interests them -- research, clerical, evaluative -- in any area or department, with any professor, and at hours of their own choosing. Assignments range from setting up a personal library to doing research for a writing project.

Forty-five students are currently enrolled in the Corps and many more are needed. Several professors who have used volunteers will attend the open house: Agehananda Bharati and William Mangin, anthropology; Norman Haight, public affairs; Michael Sawyer, political science, adviser to the Corps; David Sherrill, testing service; and James Williams, religion.

Mrs. Ann Rath, corps director, said: "Transfer students who are juniors are especially invited as they belong to one of the groups of campus newcomers who are eager for such orientation. Students who cannot attend the meeting are invited to talk with me in Building 24 when convenient."

"There's no area of the world more important for a leading university to be concerned with than Latin America," added Dr. Honey. "The U.S. is the only world power with a primary interest in Latin America. We have here (at SU) a number of extremely able Latin America-oriented students. The Latin American program is modest, but is increasingly developing a sense of common focus and direction.

A statement issued through Chancellor Tolley's office said: "No national university can neglect having a strong, competent Latin American program since the U.S. has such special interests and responsibilities in respect to Latin America."

Syracuse is a member of the governing body of the Latin American Studies Association, a consortium of universities which includes Cornell, Buffalo and Penn State.

SU also participates in the Latin American Studies Program in American Universities (LASPAU).

Student panel to crown Freshman Queen at dance

By BOB DAVIS

They will all be there on Friday night at 8 p.m. at the Women's Building. The beautiful girls, the judges, the music and the leering boys. The only one missing will be Burt Parks.

They will be there for the crowning of Freshman Queen at the Watson Queen Contest.

Candidates are selected from each floor by the vote of residents on the floor. Yesterday a screening committee composed of Watson residents and Resident Advisors chose five finalists from 24 candidates. The Queen will be selected during the Friday dance by another panel of students and Resident Advisors.

The dance will be semiformal, with men required to wear jackets and ties. Music will be provided by the Monterey's, one of the top groups in the Syracuse area.

The panel will judge candidates on their beauty, personality and floor sponsorship. Each person in the dance will cast one vote for the Queen, so the candidate's personal support will weigh heavily on the decision of the judges.

The Queen will receive a bouquet of roses. In addition, the three top finalists will receive gift certificates.

The lucky escorts will all come from Watson Dormitory, which is sponsoring this event. Admission will be fifty cents and refreshments will be available.

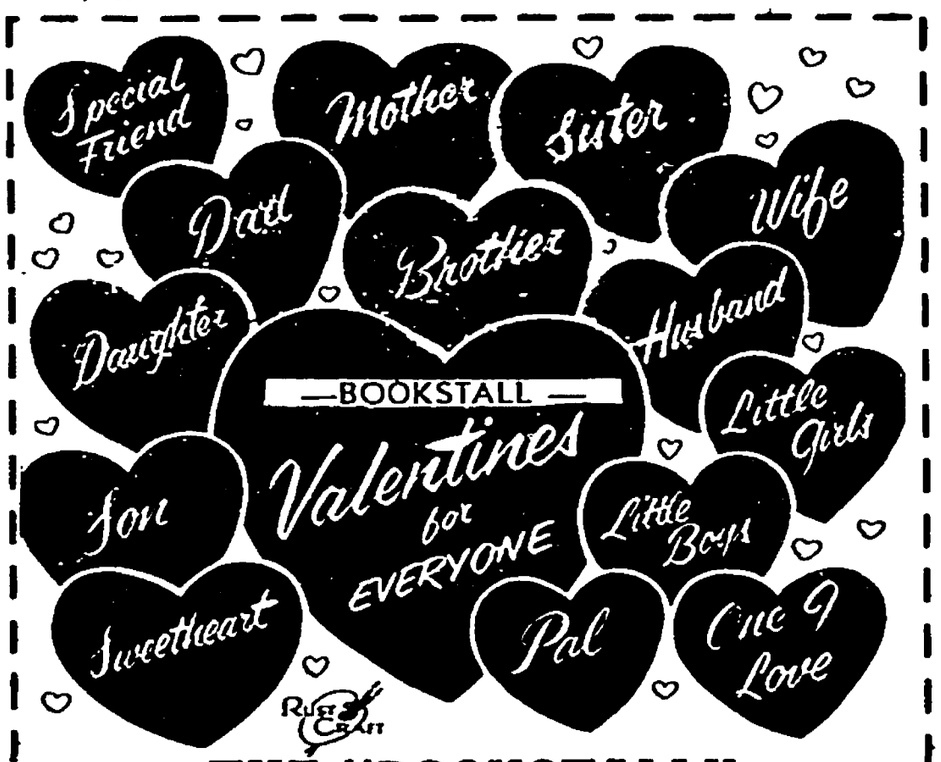
Editor's note: The story "Steiger says students are on their toes" on page one of Tuesday's Daily Orange was written by Associate Editor Patti Williams.



Why does a perfect size 7 look perfect only 21 days every month?

It has nothing to do with calories. It's a special female weight gain... caused by temporary water-weight build-up. Oh, you know... that uncomfortable full feeling that sneaks up on you the week before your menstrual period. This fluid retention not only plays havoc with your looks but how you feel as well. (It puts pressure on delicate nerves and tissues, which can lead to pre-menstrual cramps and headaches, leaves emotions on edge.)

That's why so many women take PAMPRIN®. It gently relieves water-weight gain to help prevent pre-menstrual puffiness, tension, and pressure-caused cramps.

PAMPRIN makes sure a perfect size 7 never looks less than perfect. Nor feels less than perfect, either.

SU's Appeals Court slates initial session

By BOB DAVIS

Some time next week, the University Appeals Court will convene for the first time. The board never met last term since students on the Court wanted to delay meeting until after final exams. There are now four cases on appeal.

According to Paul Snyder of the University Judicial Board, the philosophy of the appeals court and the entire judicial branch is to give "logic to rules."

The Appeals Court can't increase the penalty decided by the University Judicial Board. There is no automatic appeal of a case from the University Judicial Board, since the Court must vote to accept a case.

The Appeals Court is made up of three members of the Faculty Senate, elected by the Faculty Senate. Each one of these officials have a vote.

There are also three undergraduates who each have a vote. The Chief Justice or the associate Chief Justice of the University Judicial Board, is also on the Court,but has no vote.

Another member of the Court without a vote is the dean of the school or college where the student before the court is enrolled.

The Appeals Court is the highest court in Syracuse University. Once a person elects to be tried by the court system instead of the administration, the administration can't appeal a decision.

Paul Snyder says the Court's "say is final, unless the student wishes to appeal."

The Appeals Court has a unique "suicide clause" in its organizational papers. If a decision of the higher court is overruled, the judicial code is nullified. This dissolves the judicial system.

This is done to "discourage the administration from interfering with the judicial board.

The judicial section of student government is not satisfied with the present judicial organization. Some ammendments that will be later submitted to Student Senate include the right to subpoena witnesses, and the right to fine individuals or groups. The judicial group also wants new proceedures for the remanding of cases.

According to Snyder, the judicial branch also wants to provide "guidelines for the immediate organization of dormitory courts."

Fraternity rush . . .

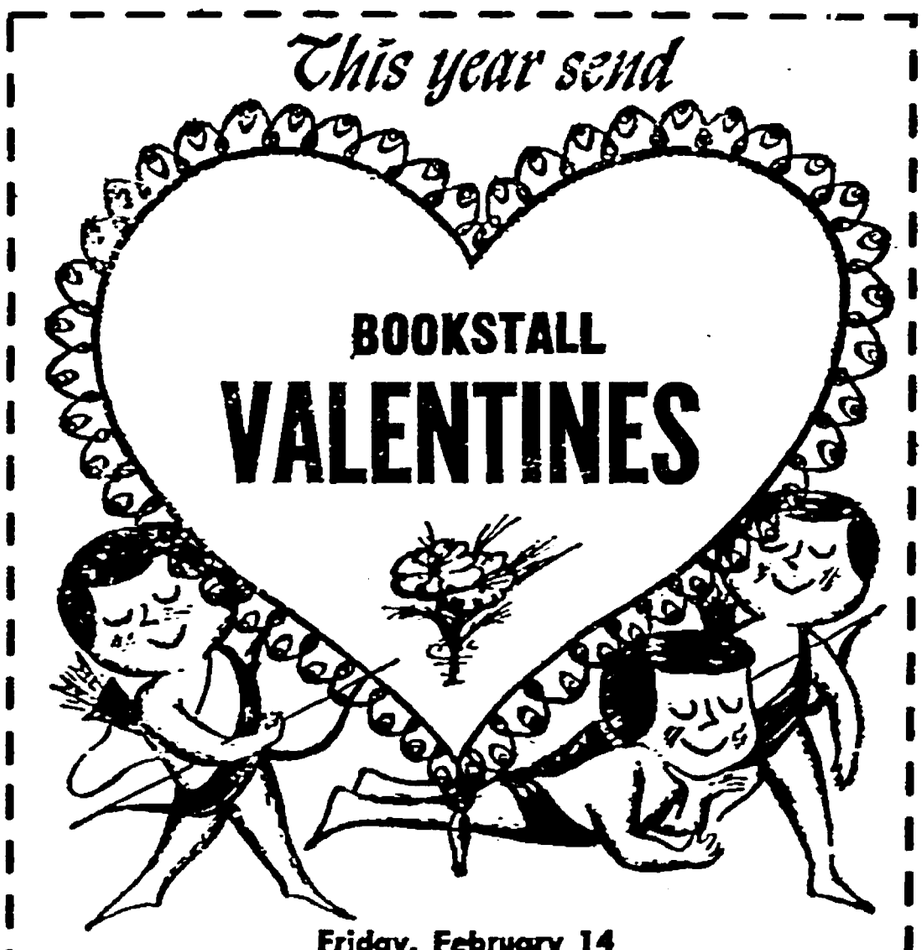
were never collected, reportedly because of the flu epidemic over the December rush period.

Freshman Rick Parker, upon submitting his top three choices at yesterday's rush booth in Newhouse, commented on this year's rush system, "It was worth the trouble. Because of it I know I made some lasting friendships. For any good thing that you want, you have to go through some trouble."

Another freshman, Dave Herman, remarked, "I think it's very superficial. Too many people rush a house just to be in a fraternity. All you really see during rush is the good side of a person."



Formal bids can be picked up today between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. in the main lobby H.B.C.

Ex-wrestlers attack powers that be

By MIKE WEBER

(ed. note-This is the first of a three-part series on the internal problems existing within the wrestling team)

There have been many empires in the history of the world. Dynasties which have survived for centuries only to fall apart. Historians have studied the reasons for the eventual collapse of even the strongest of these. The main reason unearthed is division-a dichotomy formed from within. Thus weakened, they fell easy prey to invaders.

On a much smaller scale, such is the case with Syracuse wrestling. Formerly one of the powers of Eastern wrestling, the Orange grapplers have become the doormat. Winners of Eastern team championship in 1963 and 1965, the once-vaunted SU grapplers failed to place a single wrestler in the top three in any weight at the 1968 EIWA tourney.

With things at seemingly the lowest ebb possible, wrestling fortunes seemed destined to improve. A tie for first place in this year's Coast Guard tournament indicated an upswing. However, this proved to be a false prophecy. The wrestling team has since lost six meets in a row and sports only two men with winning records. Of the 10 athletes who participated in the Coast Guard tourney, only three competed in last Saturday's 27-12 loss to Penn State.

What has brought about the rapid decline in Syracuse wrestling? Plagued by untimely injuries and curious rumblings from within, little remains now from what began as a top-notch team in December.

Five team members have quit the squad, while two highly rated wrestlers failed to show at all. According to the ex-wrestlers, the dissension which has crumbled the wrestling team's 1968-69 edition has apparently stemmed from two sources: the coach, Ed Carlin and the athletic department, headed by James Decker.

Doug Garr, former 152-pounder for the Orangemen commented on the team's downfall and his estimation of the cause.

"In the beginning of this season," he said, "we were the best in the East. I don't mean one of the best, I mean the best. And now, well, it can't all be the fault of the wrestlers. Ed is a great part of it."

Ex-123 pounder Ralph Manaker echoed Garr's sentiments when he said, "When Richie (Haigen), John (Terboss) and Joe (Palmieri) had to withdraw from the Coast Guard tournament because of injury or sickness, we were really down. Ed could have picked us up right then, but he didn't. I just don't think he has the ability to be a leader."

Aside from the mishaps during the Coast Guard tournament, both boys had several other complaints. Manaker, former New Jersey High School champ, said he is disgusted with the whole wrestling picture at Syracuse. He said that while he realizes that motivation and self-pride are the chief necessities of a good wrestler, he needs something more.

ED CARLIN...under fire

"A wrestler knows his capabilities after awhile," he explained. "The most important job of a college coach, as I see it, is to instill the drive to win in his wrestlers. Ed just failed to do that. He had little discipline and no respect from the guys. If you don't respect your coach, it's a bad situation."

Manaker also lashed out at what he termed "a very, very poor view of minor sports" on the part of the athletic department. He cited the lack of a real wrestling room (the team practices in the upstairs of Archbold Gym) and the non-existence of moral support by the SUAD. "I don't think they give a damn about wrestling here. They like to have it in their catalog, that's all."

Jerry Beach, former Orange heavyweight who finished second in the 1967 Eastern tournament, said there was no reason for his failing to compete this season other than that he was tired of it.

"I'm just tired of being in shape," admitted Beach. "I've been wrestling since I was in fifth grade and I have no drive left. It's not Ed's fault. In fact, I feel bad about letting him down. But, I just can't continue wrestling anymore."

Beach added that he had no knowledge of the factors which influenced many of his former teammates to quit wrestling. He concluded, "Ed is a good coach as far as I'm concerned. I haven't really been on the team all year, so I don't know what's been happening."

In addition to those airing their views in this article, the athletes who quit the wrestling team are Richie Haagen, Woody Barry and Steve Parker. Both Haagen and Barry have left school for what was termed "personal reasons," while Parker was unavailable for comment.

With the ex-wrestlers having had their say, equal space will be devoted to the current team members. Their views will be printed in the second part of this series which will appear tomorrow.

This is the first of a two-part series.

The basketball season is nearing its end. The baseball team is getting ready for its trip South. And down in the football offices at Manley Field House, Ben Schwartzwalder and the football coaches are busy at their year-round job of improving Syracuse football. Right now Ben and his assistants are in the process of organizing next year's team and the teams after that.

With cards and letters strewn all over his desk, looking at movies of high school stars who all "can't miss," Ben is busy recruiting prospects for next year's Tangerines.

It's a long and difficult grind. Says Ben, "Recruiting takes a lot out of you. We have one group that will come and the other group that 50-100 schools are after. We have to decide if we want to take the sure thing or hold out and wait for later, which could be risky."

The coaches are glad last year's freshmen did so well. Because this year they can only bring in 17 boys with scholarships, they have to be a little more stingy.

Ben is also busy evaluating next year's varsity, and, as usual, he is his cautious and pessimistic self. Most college coaches are wary this far before a season, but Ben does not hedge when speaking about last year's Orangemen.

"Last year's frosh group had an extra toughness that other freshman teams didn't quite have," he said. The varsity, though, was a different story. "They didn't stay tough and combative. After the Navy game (a 44-6 SU win), it was all downhill, largely due to mental attitude."

Ben said his coaching philosophy is, "any time you lose, that's a failure. There are some things we can do something about." About the old adage, "a coach is only as good as his players," he says, "most people around here don't believe that. You can't find loopholes."

Going from last year to next, Ben commented, "An awful big part is putting the boys in the right frame of mind. If we work at getting in shape and are really hungry, we'll improve."

Last season the coach counted on his defense, one of the top units in the country the year before, to carry the offense, without a super back for the first time in a long while. This time he will be missing half of the defense, including Kyasky, Thoms, Beach, Zegalia, Ensley and Ruccio.

It would be hoped that the more experienced offense could carry the defense some, but according to the coach, this will be very difficult.

"The offensive line is all back, but they're not so good that they won't have to prove themselves against the frosh. I wouldn't be disappointed if the interior line is a little shuffled up. With the same boys back after a year of experience, they should be better, but we don't know. You need competition, something we didn't have in the line last year."

Last year's backfield was a disappointment. "Our longest gain on the ground was 27 yards--we had no real breakaway threat. Usually, we hope players will improve as they go along, but our backs didn't really improve that much through out the year. Castner improved some, and by the end of the season, he was probably a better football player than Johnny Bulicz. Newton came in flabby and that hampered him throughout the schedule."

Fans' cheers are saved for SU's Dave the Rave

By ED AGRANOWITZ

For the past several seasons, the Syracuse basketball team has always succeeded in fielding a player that was a favorite to the Orange fans.

A few years ago it was Dave Bing, whose All-American achievements on the Hill were a stepping stone to a super-star status in professional basketball.

More recently, Vaughn Harper thrilled the crowds with his comical court antics coupled with fine all-around play.

When the Orange came home from their first five road games this year without a win, the home crowd did not have a lot to cheer about.

But in the second half of the home opener with Penn State, a new star was born, and the Manley fans had another favorite. He's Dave Harmon, whose high jumping acrobatic rebounding is a sure crowd pleaser.

In that Penn State game, Harmon snatched eight rebounds in less than a half, and now has 41 caroms on the year.

Coach Roy Danforth uses his jumping jack primarily in a relief role for center Bill Smith once a half. Harmon's playing time is therefore limited, but he has filled the backup center spot well for his 6 ft. 4 inc. height.

Dave the Rave was a three sport star in high school in Columbus, Georgia. He played end and quarterbacked the football team in the fall, and jumped (long and high) for the track team in the spring in addition to his hardcourt activities. Harmon met with fair success in the high jump, being able to clear his height, and plans to compete for the SU track squad this year.

Dave played his next basketball in the Army, where he was stationed at Fort Rich, Alaska. Harm scored about 36 points per game in the service and was a bunk-mate of Tom Thacker, a former University of Cincinnati All-American who has played for several NBA teams.

Auburn N.Y. Community College was Harmon's next stop. Here Dave played center and led the New York State Junior College Athletic Conference in scoring (23-24 ppg) and rebounding (14) for two years.

At Auburn, Dave's most noteable performance was a 35 point output against Broome Tech and Syracuse's old friend Frank Streety. Streety engineered last year's only Tangerine loss for Danforth's 15-1 club.

DAVE HARMON

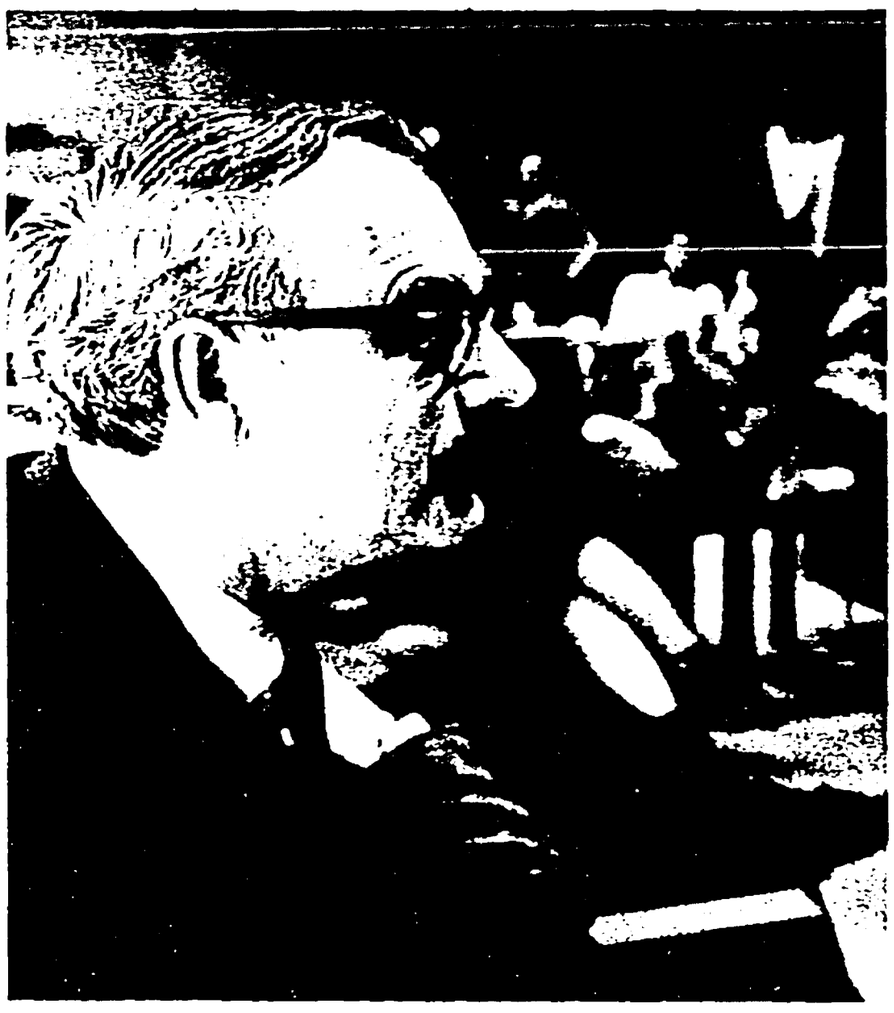
After being named to the Honorable Mention Junior College All American team, Harmon received offers from 23 colleges around the country.

With the Orange, although anxious to log more playing time, the Rave is nevertheless delighted with his new found fans. "I love it," he says simply. "I love to play in front of a crowd, and with everyone cheering for me it's a great feeling.

"I didn't expect to be welcomed like this," continues Dave. "No one knew me up here, but the fans have been great. I really enjoy pleasing the crowd."

Another pleasant surprise for Dave was the miraculous return to the soul sounds during the warmups before Saturday's win over American. "The records really made the team happy and I like to be happy when I play ball," says Harmon. "The soul sounds are sure better than that band."

Orange fans will be pleased if the team can continue the improvement it has shown of late. "We should win at least four of our last six games," says Harmon, who has been told that he resembles Satch Sanders of the World Champion Boston Celtics and Jumping Johnny Green of the Philadelphia 76ers.



But despite the comparisons, Dave just tries to be himself. He aims to please, and the fans love it.

ED'S ITORIALS: WAER will air both ends of tonight's doubleheader at Colgate starting at 6:30.....Following tonight's game, the Orange visit Canisius and then wind up the season with four home contests – St. John's, West Virginia, Niagara, and Colgate.

Black students air complaints to CSL

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

More than 50 black students gathered yesterday in the Newhouse Communications Center lounge to air a lengthy list of grievances and make recommendations before a subcommittee of the Council on Student Life (CSL).

The proposal with perhaps the widest potential impact was made in a prepared statement by Byron Merritt, who acted as spokesman for the black students. The statement recommended creation of an Afro-American Studies program and major at Syracuse University and outlined in detail proposed curriculum structure.

Grievances set forth before the CSL subcommittee, which was formed after the CSL voted in December to hold a series of meetings on "the quality of life of minority students on campus," ranged from the Daily Orange to charges of discrimination at the Men's Gym and in Food Service.

Each grievance was accompanied by detailed explanation by the students, and in most instances, recommendations for improvement.

The CSL members, who appeared receptive to the suggestions, emphasized that although the council could not alone approve and implement the recommendations, it could channel them to and influence appropriate authorities.

Generally the grievances revolved around the "irrelevance" to the black student of the academic and social life at SU.

"All these grievances and proposals," said Merritt, "are extremely immediate. The grievances have existed in the past, but we see no reason why they should exist in the future.

Merritt and others emphasized their belief that eradication of the grievances "is within the realm of the administration's possibility."

The Afro-American Studies proposal was saved until others had been discussed, and relfected similar recommendations that recently have been made on several of the nation's campuses.

As proposed, the program would be in the School of Liberal Arts, and would be administered by black students and faculty.

The most important consideration now, Merritt said, is the recruitment of black professors, which "should start right away."

The proposed program would be based "on new, relevant courses," including a survey history course, a sequence of courses dealing with the social history of the black man in America, courses on black politics, black nationalism, and community organizations in black neighborhoods, and courses concerning the economics, philosophy, music, psychology and religion of the black race.

"This program is vital," explained one student, "because we must return to our respective communities when we leave the university, and we have to have something to offer the people there. We need an education that will equip us for this. The present courses don't say anything to blacks."

Several of the grievances and proposals listed by the students were aimed directly at the administration. They included:

-the lack of black counselors and deans. "We feel that when problems arise among black students," said Merritt, "the people (now in these positions) aren't properly equipped," because they haven't been close to the lives of the black students.

Dr. Walters discusses Africa's long history of slave involvement

By RONI ZLOKOWER
Associate Editor

The DO will cover the Black and White in America lecture series to be held on Wednesdays at 7:30 in Maxwell.

African slavery differed greatly from modern slavery in that the slave had certain rights, rights which were respected by his owner, said Dr. Ron Walters, professor of political science in the Maxwell School in a lecture last night on Afro-American history culture.

In briefly tracing the history of the blacks in Africa and the introduction of white slave trade, Dr. Walters discussed the emergence of Ghana as the most powerful of the black states in Africa between the third and tenth centuries. Ghana, along with Songhay, and Mali controlled the Sudan, the broad belt of open country between the Sahara in the north and the rain forest of the Guinea coast in the south.

The culture of the Sudan was influenced by Egyptian ritual and the concept of divind kinghships. The political organization depended on the power of the king to whom the loyal chiefs of the hinterland paid their taxes.

In the 11th century, Ghana fell to Moslem fanatics and the Mail empire arose. Sundiata Keita and Gonga Musa developed this empire in commerce, agriculture and art into one of the greatest countries of the medieval world. Musa made his famed pilgrimage to Mecca in 1324 with 60,000 persons, 12,000 of them servants. Five hundred slaves carried six pounds of gold each, and 80 camels carried 24,000 tons of gold. This pilgrimage established the Africa to Mecca trade route and spread a myth of the amount of gold in Africa to the rest of the world.

Songhay took over upon the decline of the Mali empire with Askia Mohammed as its greatest king. He developed Timbuktu into one of the intellectual centers of the African-Moslem world. The last of the great black empires fell apart after 1538 as a result of raids and the death of its leaders.

The Portugese started the slave trade, and then were driven by the English to Mozanbique and Angola. Sir John Hawkins presented the idea of slave trade to the Caribbean to Queen Elizabeth.

The introduction of slave trade by whites made it easier for the Europeans to take over, since so many Africans were being shipped out and so many died in the process.

Dr. Walters pointed out that in the examination of slavery, it is important to recognize from its atrocities that there was a background of adversity for the blacks to overcome and to ask what kind of people were these who had the ability to overcome it.

Fusion of law and psychiatry

Dr. Watson stresses need of jury understanding in cases

A pioneering authority in the fusion of law and psychiatry, Dr. Andrew S. Watson, illuminated his position regarding their inseparability here yesterday.

Dr. Watson takes the position that juries cannot make rational judgments regarding questions of guilt or innocence unless they understand why a defendant acted as he did. He has educated more than a generation of trial lawyers to seek the motivation behind behavior and taught them how to use their findings in the courtroom with psychodynamic materials.

In an interview yesterday, Watson amplified his stand by explaining that juries are not the only individuals in the courtroom governed by psychiatric motivation. "Lawyers," he emphasized, "must also be aware of their own emotions and be able to keep them in control."

Watson stressed that students of law and psychiatry should keep an eye on the trial of Sirhan Bishara Sirhan. Watson feels "an expert will have to lead the jury back through Sirhan's life to show what type of home he came from and how this family influence may have affected his actions."

Watson wants adaptions in legal education "to take advantage of the knowledge about human behavior which has been accumulated over the past 50 years."

Watson is a joint professor of law and psychiatry at the University of Michigan. He was the first psychiatrist appointed to a law school faculty post in America. Many others have now achieved his position.

He met with students and faculty members from SU's College of Law yesterday, and plans to do so again today.

Last night, he lectured on "Problems of Custody Following Divorce." Excerpts from his talk follow:

"Counsel will have to become more skillful in utilizing behavior and will need to forgo the temptation to moralize at parents and deal with the true issues of the child's best interests. They will have to become more adept at making painful decisions even when they know they may be wrong.

"One critical need is to improve the education of legal personnel about the nature of family life and child rearing. Similarly all of the behavioral science people involved in these legal procedures should know the minimum amount about the nature of the procedures. Extensive efforts can be made to eliminate the use of visitation rights as a battle pawn."

Watson is the author of "Psychiatry for Lawyers," a law text, and has been published widely in scientific journals. He has been called one of the leading reformers in the legal education process. In his writing and teaching he has challenged the law school teaching methodology. Professionally, Watson has been a critic of the mental illness commitment process.

Notes on a revolution of despair

"We are turned to bitterness by the impotency of our action. We cannot follow because we are not validly led. We cannot lead because we are not heard. We are unique in the history of this country. The Vietnam "situation" has been so undecisive and agonizing and has gone on so long that we are the first generation in history that is able to view itself as sausages endlessly being fed into a meat grinder." A Harvard student responsing to George Kennan's charges in "Democracy and the Student Left."

Probably every generation has felt at one time or another to be trapped in events and circumstances created by the generation that came before. Yet many students today exhibit almost a class identity in regard to their feeling of entrapment.

Part of this sense of entrapment is expressed in the belief that democracy isn't working any more. Eugene McCarthy made a gallant effort and Nelson Rockefeller tried to win the race in the homestretch but instead, Richard Nixon, the candidate youth believed in least, won the election.

It is irrelevant to point out that the democratic processes worked in 1968 about the same as they have always worked to those newly arrived at political consciousness. All that matters is that the processes failed to produce a satisfactory candidate.

There has been little genuine progress for the Blacks in America and efforts to help the poor fell short of expectations. And the war drags on and on.

Pessimism in America about the future has been growing since World War I. World War II was fought grimly, without the crusader's zeal to save the world for democracy or the Fourteen Points. Vietnam may mark the death of America's missionary impulse; the despair it has created may cause us to overlook what we may legitimately share with other peoples.

At home there seems to be a return to barbarism and destructiveness. The use of force by teachers and other civil servants, minority groups, and students indicates they believe our society moves blindly down its rut, smothering dissent and criticism in its path.

And yet . . .

Dynamic duo revisited

Autonomy

By Paul Finkelman

Tweedle dum and tweedle dee are off and running. After their fantastic voctory at Booth Hall the Ev and Charlie of SU (better known as Steve and Fred) are out to convert the entire campus to their cause; the repudiation of dorm autonomy.

And just check out their arguments. First there was Booth's President, Stevie-wonder, pleading to the students to realize that they are not mature enough, or responsible enough to run their own lives. This is to say, if I read Steve's Jabberwocky correctly, that we aren't old enough to govern ourselves. That we must be led by the Dean of Men's staff, which will take care of us and protect us from the veils of the world (such as alcohol and women--oh! perish the thought, and drink anywhere in New York State except your dorm)! This is why we came to SU and live away from our homes. Because we need an administration in Loco Parentis. We never really wanted to leave home and be on our own, Right? God bless mommy, daddy and Dean of Men!

But this representative of student opinion in Booth doesn't stop there. He goes on to show us that the Dean of Men's staff is made of experts, who know how to run dorms efficiently. They know what is good for us. And how do they run the dorms? Why through a magic wand that is in the administration building. From there they control Booth, DellPlain, Sadler, Lawrinson, and Watson, and the rest, all at the same time. But, alas, this is only from 9 to 5 on weekdays. On the weekends and at night the wand is put on remote control and it runs the dorms that way.

Then there is the other half of the dynamic-duo, fighting Fred. After getting half-way through his own from of gobbleygook, we find Fred afraid to break the umbilical cord between the students and the Dean of Men. Then we find, or so I think since Jabberwocky is so hard to understand, that Fred doesn't want total liberalization of drinking and visitation regulations at SU. It is after all, we who are renting rooms from the Unviersity. But, unlike other landlords, SU doesn't allow us to act as we please within the confines of our own rooms. He also claims the intellectual aspects of the CSL proposals can be implemented without dorm autonomy. If this is so, then paternalistic instincts of those in loco parentis have apparently not been inclined to do so.

It is not from the Dean of Men's staff, but from the Dorm Council that Booth Hall got movies this year. The red tape of the University itself often made even these movies difficult to show. To buy records for the dorm took weeks of red tape. It is time to end these things by letting students control their own lives and their own dorms.

When Dwight Eisenhower came to Colombia as its president he told the student government, "I am now Colombia University." The SG President disagreed, saying "We, the students, are Colombia." I say, the students, not the administrators, are Syracuse University. I say that through a peaceful change of power the students of Syracuse University should have dorm automony--the right to control their own lives as mature adults.

Letters to the editor

The butt of the joke

To the Editor:

Perhaps you should use humorous writers for your humor columns. Bob Tembeckjian's "funny" column of Tuesday was about as funny as you running for IFC President. Mr. Tembeckjian has shown throughout the year that he cannot write decent humor. This fact is driven home by the mistaken attitudes of his readers, who believe the "satire" they are reading is factual opinion. This was once again the case Tuesday. Tembeckjian began his column by stating that I was at my fraternity during rush, which I was not since I am only a social member. Since I was not there I obviously did not make the statements attributed to me.

Being a journalist, I realized the column was satirical, but hundreds of others did not. They thought it was opinion and the quote true. I think Chuck Hicks has done a fine job as SG President—certainly a better job than his three predecessors. However, I was quoted as saying he hasn't done anything. Fabricating a quote like that is very poor journalism because everyone believed that I said it. Since Tembeckjian is such a poor writer he could not get across to his readers the idea that the whole sad mess was humor. If it was funny I wouldn't mind, but it wasn't. It was cutting, scathing and malicious putting myself, Mr. Nicoletti and Mr. Kelly in a very poor light.

I think Tembeckjian's columns should be carefully read before they are published to prevent unfortunate incidents like this from happening again.

The dual role of chancellor

To the Editor:

The recent articles on the selection of a new chancellor and the role of this officer in a large university did not include a call for limited terms of appointment.

William L. Cary, Professor of Law at Columbia University, wrote in the November 16, 1968 N.Y. Times that university presidents should lose their tenure.

The president, neither a secretary for the board of trustees nor a faculty spokesman, must play politics with all components of the university including the students according to Professor Cary. He questions the inertia that sets in after a president has passed his prime years.

The need for flexibility and the close parallel of running a corporation with administering a university lead the writer to offer new "escape hatches" for presidents. Professor Cary suggests ten years as a term and eliminates reappointment in most cases.

While the selection committees here by definition are primarily concerned with picking a new chancellor, inextricably involved in that process is re-evaluation of the chancellor's position. Hopefully, refined guidelines will accompany the final appointment.

Beauty revisited

To the Editor:

This letter is in reply to the letter in the DO on Feb. 11 denouncing "beauty contests." I am a member of the Watson Queen Committee and thus able to provide some facts about our contest. First, the major consideration in our judging is the girl's personality. The appearance of the candidates is important but it is secondary. WE assumed that the floors would enter good-looking girls but we emphasized to the floors that our main concerns were personality and poise.

It is unfair to call our contest a beauty contest because we do not ask the contestants to dance in bikinis or to give their measurements.

I invite Miss Ardito to come to the Women's Building on Friday and view our contestants. I do not know if the winner will be the best looking girl. I will let Miss Ardito decide that.

Spencer, first dean of J-school, dies at 87; Clark and Rossman to attend funeral today

Syracuse University Chancellor William P. Tolley and Dr. Wesley C. Clark, dean of the School of Journalism, paid tribute to M. Lyle Spencer, first dean of the School, who died Monday night in Clearwater, Fla., at the age of 87.

Spencer organized the School, formerly a department, in 1934 and was dean until his retirement in 1951, when he was awarded the School's Journalism Medal.

Dr. Tolley said: "No dean of journalism has matched the record of Dean M. Lyle Spencer. Always ahead of his time, he was as wise as he was imaginative and creative. He made a tremendous contribution to the University as well as to the School of Journalism. His passing is a heavy loss to all privileged to have known him."

Dean Clark said: "Syracuse University and the nation have lost a great educator in the death of Dr. M.Lyle Spencer. It was he who was responsible for the broad foundations upon which the present school was built and it was his foresight which made so easy the transition from a small school to the great communications complex which the world now knows. The school, the faculty and I personally have lost a great and good friend."

Spencer, who received an honorary Doctor of Letters degree from SU in 1951, was the author of two books, "News Writing" and "Editorial Writing," which were widely used as texts in journalism courses.

Clark and Vice Chancellor Newell W. Rossman will represent the University at the funeral this afternoon in Clearwater.

Cash and change stolen from Gym

Within thirty minutes after a security patrolman completed one of his nightly rounds, an undetermined number of thieves broke into three offices and vending machines at the Men's Gym early yesterday morning.

An undisclosed amount of cash and change is reported missing, according to Leo J. Graszler, assistant director of Security.

The burglary occurred sometime after 2 a.m., with break-ins at the offices of Men's Physical Education Department, and Army and Air Force ROTC.

There was no evidence of forcible entry into the Gym itself, leading Security to suspect that the thief or thieves had a key or hid in the building until janitors left.

One office contained $100 in cash which was overlooked.

Judy Collins to sing here next month

One of the most exciting of all folk-singers comes to Syracuse for a performance at the concert circle of the War Memorial on Friday evening, March 14th.

Judy's last two records, "Wildflowers" and "In My Life" have firmly established her in the foreground of popular music interpreters. Her appearances at colleges have given her a rare rapport with the youth of America. She used to represent "Protest," yet has continued to grow as a performer, and more recently as a composer.

Miss Collins studied serious music with a piano teacher who was a student of the great Sibelius. However, at the age of 16, Judy became disenchanted with practicing alone and finally defied her teacher. "I needed togetherness much more than I needed to be alone," she said. She found the guitar and thereafter followed the discipline of communication through songs.

Tickets for the Judy Collins evening are now on sale at the Famous Artists Series office in the State Tower Building.

JUDY COLLINS

Winter Weekend Feb. 21-23

Due to an error in Dates and Data, many students are undre the assumption that the Winter Weekend dates are Feb. 21-23, rather than the actual dates of Feb. 28-March 2.

This all-university weekend begins with the 5th Dimension in concert at the War Memorial, at 8:30 p.m. on Friday. Tickets for the concert, as well as the other weekend events will be on sale at HBC starting Feb. 17.

Following the concert, there will be a happening at Kimmel Dining Hall. The event, sponsored by the Junior Class in conjunction with the Kimmel-Marion dorm council, features the Sidewinders, a light show, and a Mass Media production entitled "One Virgin's Blood." Beer will be served continuously from 11:30 p.m. to 3 a.m. The price for this "after-concert" happening is 75 cents per person. Curfew has been extended so that all freshman girls can participate fully in this event.

On Saturday, March 1, the Junion Class is sponsoring a Winter Carnival at Song Mountain. For skiers, the event begins at 9 a.m. when the lifts open. For both skiers and non-skiers, there will be continuous music and beer from 1 p.m. through 1 a.m. Transportation will be provided for all weekend participants, every half-hour leaving from Sims, beginning at 12:30 p.m. Talent features include the Sidewinders and the Eastern Graile. Tickets will be on sale at HBC at $7.00 for skiers and $2.50 for non-skiers.

Lutherans present drama during worship services

The Student Council of the Lutheran Campus Ministry announces an unusual drama to be presented during Sunday morning worship services beginning Sunday at 10 a.m., Chapel House (711 Comstock Avenue).

Entitled "For the Sake of the People," the drama's action centers upon a strange trial before a church congregation in in which a young man asks members to judge his views on war, the Gospel, world hunger, violence and poverty. This sensitive young man, who claims to be a Christian, abhors violence and refuses to bear arms.

The chairman of the Citizens' Committee, who also happens to be a member of a local church, is asked to investigate this young man and others like him who refuse to bear arms in defense of their country. The committee is attempting to understand why a growing number of young people are contesting the entire national security system.

The young man suggests the investigation take place before a local congregation so that the Church may judge him. He claims that there is a new way for people to live in this world and asks the Church to live it. The dialogs are about this person; who he is, what he does, how he interprets the Word, and what he proposes to do "for the sake of the people."

Harris Gershman and Donald Schuster, students in the University's School of Drama, represent the lead parts. The dialogs will be presented six Sunday mornings during the Lenten season during the regular service of worship. The drama was written by Paul Keller and Stan Kloth for Kairos Productions.

-black deans should be in charge of admission of black students to the university.

-financial aid is not adequate, "especially in view of the rising price of education," said one student. In some instances, students said, financial aid has been cut rather than increased.

-a more conscientious effort to allow black students to have black roommates if they so choose. According to one student, "Nine-tenths of black students would choose black roommates, not out of hostility to white students, but due to general background and common interests."

-an end to "discrimination in the Men's Gym. Everytime a black student walks in, he's asked for his ID card," the students said. "This doesn't happen to whites, often not even to whites who aren't students." Related to this, the students urged that the gym be open to neighborhood children.

-equal treatment by Food Service personnel. "Blacks are much more closely scrutinized in the dining halls and sometimes only they are asked for numbers, while the whites walk through," the students charged. They also criticized the menus, which "are totally geared to the white students' tastes. We're excluded."

-larger and permanent facilities and equipment for black organizations on campus, such as the Student Afro-American Society (SAS) and the Freshman Action Committee. The students, who believe SAS to be equal to student government in importance and relevance to them, said that that organization still has not been budgeted by the university, although a budget had been submitted in the past. Another will be submitted in the near future.

On the student level, the black students said they were "discontented" with the Daily Orange, which they argued was "tainted" and "inaccurate," and often omitted announcements of black students' activities.

They called SG "irrelevant to us, because we have specific needs that only a totally black organization can fulfill."

The problem, said one student, was one of "general attitude." Because most things depend "on who you know," and because such things as political power on campus are concentrated among white students and in a Greek system "that we consider irrelevant to us and a farce," the black students siad blacks are "ostracized."

The students also categorized the freshman orientation program as irrelevant. "This is supposed to be a period of adjustment," said Merritt, "but the information black students get doesn't help at all."

A second hearing has been scheduled by the sub-committee for Monday at 3:30 p.m. in the Newhouse lounge. Members present at yesterday's meeting were administrators Dean of Men David Tatham, Dean of Woman Marjorie Smith, Dean of Student Services Jim G. Carleton; faculty members Benjamin P. Burtt, Michael O. Sawyer, Lawrence Feer; and student Chris Mudd.

URC plans fund-raising

The University Religious Council is currently planning fund-raising activities to assist Projection '70 with its operational costs. Bake sales will be first on the list as the Council attempts to reach its pledged sum of $1,000. The sales will be held today, next Monday and Tuesday from 10:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. in HBC lobby.

Projection '70 leaders feel the funds will enable the program to enhance and enrich its current activities, thus becoming more beneficial to both city children and SU students involved.

The Council has already received a donation of $100, and plans to sponsor a movie, a breakfast (such as the traditional Spring Weekend Strawberry Breakfast), and a meal sign-away. Proposed dates for the sign-away, which will net the Council reimbursed funds from the University for uneaten meals, are Feb. 19,20, and 26.

Urban education sessions begin at SU next week

The first of five sessions on "Crisis in Urban Education" will be on Tuesday, at Syracuse University. The program will concentrate on how religious and secular segments of the community can respond to educational conflicts, according to T. William Hall, chairman of the University's religion department.

Dr. Nathan Wright, clergyman, author and director of Urban Work for the Episcopal Diocese of Newark, N.J., is the first guest of the series. His books include "Let's Work Together" and "Black Power and Urban Unrest."

Guests at later sessions will inclide the Rev. C. Herbert Oliver, chairman of the Ocean Hill-Brownsville Governing Board; the Rev. Kevin Kelley, New York City clergyman and educator; Dr. Alan K. Campbell, dean of Syracuse University's Maxwell Graduate School; Mrs. Ann G. Wolfe of the department of Civil Rights and Social Action of the American Jewish Committee, and a number of Syracuse educational leaders.

All sessions will be in Room A—1, Newhouse Communications Center. The Tuesday meeting is at 7 p.m.; all others are at 7:30. A registration fee of $10 will be charged for the five sessions, Dr. Hall said, and persons interested in attending should register in advance by writing to him at the Department of Religion, 316 H.B. Crouse Hall, Syracuse University, Syracuse, N.Y. 13210.

Following is a schedule of the five sessions:

Feb. 18, "The Crisis in Urban Education": an exploration of the causes and issues in the crisis. Dr. Nathan Wright.

Feb. 25, "Educational Reform": case study and insights from the New York City school crisis. The Revs. Kevin Kelley and C. Herbert Oliver.

March 4, "Political and Legislative Issues in Education": an examination of the politics of educational change, its relationships to city, state and national governmental units and legislation. Dr. Alan K. Campbell and representatives of the Interfaith Legislative Team of New York State.

March 11, "Metropolitan Education Issues": an examination of cultural differences in suburban and urban areas as they relate to educational issues. Mrs. Ann G. Wolfe and a panel of parents and school personnel.

March 18, "Unrest in the Public Schools"; its causes and cures. Robert Warr, Mrs. Anna Mae Williams and others.

Sponsoring groups are the religion department, The Chaplains' Council, The Urban Ministries Department of the Syracuse Area Council of Churches, Coalition for Quality Education, Office of Inner City Development of Catholic Charities, Jewish Welfare Federation and the Continuing Education Center for the Public Service at Syracuse University.

Radio buffs

Do you have a special interest, a special bag which you would like to explore in depth?

WAER has a department of Public Affairs and Special Programming which is in charge of producing special programs, usually documentaries, in various fields. If you want to produce your own radio show, the station will provide equipment, tape and personnel; all you need is the idea. It can be on anything from economic issues, to race relations, to art.

Interested students should stop into the prefab directly behind the library anytime Friday afternoon and ask for the Public Affairs Director, Ernie Grafe.

Winter Weekend

On Friday, FEb. 14 from 1 to 7 p.m., block seating for the 5th Dimension concert will be sold at Shaw dorm in the front lounge. Tickets are $3 and $3.50 per person. If you would like a block please bring an envelope with the name of the fraternity, floor, etc on it; the number of tickets you want and the amount enclosed in the envelope and marked on the front; a block is at least 14 seats and they will be given on a first come first serve basis. The tickets will be delivered within three or four days. Questions, call Sandi Haynes, ext. 2966, Meryl Kramer, ext. 2952 or Darby Gibbons, ext. 2616.

Phi Beta Kappa elect five

Five members of the Class of 1969 at Syracuse University have been elected to membership in Phi Beta Kappa, the national honor society. Phi Beta Kappa selects members twice a year. Those chosen during the first semester of their senior year must have maintained a grade point average of 3.8 on a 4.0 scale.

SU students honored follow:

Peggy Lentz, Syracuse, N.Y.;

Neal Maresca Jr., Huntington, N.Y.;

Lauren Michael, New York, N.Y.;

Paula Sullivan, Nutley, N.J.; and

All are students in the College of Liberal Arts.

Phi Beta Kappa is the oldest American college Greek letter fraternity. It was organized Dec. 5, 1776, at William and Mary College, Williamsburg, Va. Originally founded as a secret fraternity, it was reorganized in 1883 as an honor society.

Nielson conducts survey of recruitment programs

The A.C. Nielsen Co. of Chicago--the world's largest marketing research firm--is once again conducting a "Corporate Recruitment survey" here and at 46 other colleges and universities throughout the country. The purpose is to enable various corporations and firms to judge the quality of their recruitment programs.

In this survey students who have signed up for job interviews with companies are asked to complete a simple two-part questionnaire at the Placement Center. The first part consists of six questions designed to measure the student's attitudes toward the company holding the interview, and when completed the questionnaire is to be left in the collection box at the Placement Center. Part two is to be completed and sent directly to Nielsen (via the postage paid envelope) after the student has had a job offer and/or visit to the company.

The data form last semester has been collected, processed, and published in a "Corporate Recruitment Survey Student Report." Anyone desiring a free copy may pick up one at the Placement Center. Questions or comments concerning the survey may be directed to Peter Shay, Amy Krieger, Janet Segal, or Peter Hofmann.

Escape loss in final seconds

Orange edge Colgate, 87-86

By FRED KRAVER

HAMILTON, N.Y. - With the regional sports pages glamorizing the amazing streak of the New York Knicks, it seems as though everyone is overlooking the current rampage of the Syracuse Orangemen. Last night, SU extended their streak to two games with a 87-86 victory over Colgate.

Syracuse had a definite height advantage over the Red Raiders. Colgate had no one over 6-5 to guard seven-footer Bill Smith, and SU therefore had no trouble controlling the boards.

The first few minutes of the game saw Syracuse run off with a twelve point lead, but hot shooting by Colgate narrowed the gap to two by halftime, SU ahead 46-44. In the half, Syracuse relied on Bob Kouwe and Bill Case primarily.

As the second half started, Syracuse had to ward off Colgate's momentum which was built up in the last five minutes of the first half. Bill Smith came alive off the offensive boards, and Kouwe refused to cool off. But Rick Caputo and John Reed kept Colgate close.

SU finally relinquished its lead with 9:42 left, and from then on the lead bounced back and forth. With 1:30 left, Smith made a key three-point play to put the Orange ahead 84-80. John Suder then hit from the free-throw line. Reed drove for a lay-up to cut the gap to three for Colgate, and after Suder travelled, Reed hit another lay-up.

Ernie Austin took the ball out, and threw it to Suder. After the game, John described the play. "Ernie threw it to me, and I held on. Colgate was leaning on me, and I was waiting and waiting for the ref to call it." Finally the whistle was blown, and Suder proceeded to hit the free throw and the penalty shot to ice it for Syracuse. Reed hit another lay-up, and it was all over.

The victory was the most exciting game of the year. Coach Roy Danforth was pleased with the team's performance. "Every time we go to Colgate we have a tough game," he said. "It always goes right down to the wire."

Danforth singled out Smith and Kouwe. "Smith was great off the boards. He was especially effective since they played him one-on-one." Kouwe finished with 27, one point below his career high.

Perhaps the worst performance of the evening was put on by the Colgate fans. Even though the majority of the calls went against Syracuse, the fans seemed to derive some kind of pleasure out of pelting the court, the refs, and Coach Danforth with debris.

The final figures look like this: Bob Kouwe had 27 points and 14 rebounds, Bill Smith had 25 and 17 rebs, Bill Case had 13 with 10 rebs, Suder had 8, Finney hit for 6 in the first half, Austin had 4, and Gerry McFadden and Dave Harmon each had one basket. Caputo had 29 for Colgate.

The frosh took a big lead in the first half of their game, but failed to hold it, losing 86-74.

Meanwhile, the varsity will try to extend its winning streak to three when they face Canisius Saturday night at Canisius. Bring on UCLA!

DAVE McCARD (above) and Jim Cherondolo were praised by Ben as two outstanding interior linemen returning in 1969.

Lots of holes to be filled in Syracuse grid lineup

By LARRY CENTER

This is the last of a two part series.

Where did last season's Orangemen go wrong? What can insure an improvement on the 6-4 record? Coach Ben Schwartzwalder is trying to answer the first question to help answer the second one.

In commenting on the team's progress in 1968, Schwartzwalder admitted that after the Michigan State game, the team improved and the defense came on, but then "did a fadeaway act, just like the offense. So, in the long run, we wound up a poor football team, and I did a poor job."

The coach mentioned an often-ignored topic. He said, "Nine of the 12 seniors on the team were married. I don't want to knock that old institution, of which I've been a member a long time. But you have to wonder if the added responsibilities don't hurt their football concentration. Bear Bryant enforces the no-marriage rule on his boys at Alabama, and hasn't done too badly."

Ben hopefully looks for relief from the frosh, who were very impressive last year. "We can't depend on a lot more improvement of the veterans because they should have improved last year. They didn't improve, they got worse."

Right off, Ben said, he needs a quarterback. If the quarterback situation was muddled last year, this year it is even more so. "Anybody who can make a contribution there takes precedence over anything else. Last year we hoped Ron Trask could lead us out of the wilderness, but he was hurt the whole season and we have to see how he comes back from the operation he had Monday on his foot."

The coach continued, "Paolisso's got to get tougher and learn to take a punch. Sometimes he staggered around out there in a daze, and Panczyszyn had the same problem. Randy Zur should improve some. Of course, he isn't known for his speed, although he throws the ball very well. Then we also have Larry Hatalsky from the frosh. If the other four could stay healthy, we might try Panz at safety."

Ben is looking for a lot from the freshmen. He said, "If (Marty) Januszkiewicz' leg is all right, he's going to be a good one. He's had a little problem with his knee, but if he's in shape, he could be the guy to beat out. If (Al) Newton or (Mike) Chlebeck come on, he might play at halfback." Only Ben knows how much of this is truth and how much is psyche food for his veterans.

Ben then elaborated on his spring practice plans. "We're going to let the frosh play both ways for a week or so and take a little longer to get them located. We hope to take more of a look than normal at everybody, and see how the frosh react under fire."

The coach lamented some more about the uncertainties surrounding his 1969 squad. "Right now nothing is absolutely sure, although it will take quite a bit to move out Massis, Maddox, and our two best offensive linemen, McCard and Cherundolo, on offense."

He said, "We hope Gubitosa will be all right. "If the tough defensive end can't come back from his operation, Ben will have more to cry about. "We've got Ray White, but beyond him we're not too well set on defense. There aren't too many they'll want in the Hula Bowl."

Next year should see SU stick to the same basic style of play and formations, but there may be some additions.

"We might go to the full-house (the original balanced T). Some bowl teams, like Texas, used it well," he said. "We might also go to the pro set, if we can work it out." This is where the speed of a Jon Godbolt or Greg Allen might prove useful.

Ben isn't making any promises. He only says, "We'll try to take the best 22 men available, and do a little shuffling if we have to. There's no one formula; you have to keep looking and evaluate the best you can." Syracuse fans shouldn't worry too much, though. At this time of year all coaches like to complain.

Other side of the coin

Orange wrestlers defend their coach

Ed. note–This is the second of a three part series on the struggle of the wrestling team.

By MIKE WEBER

To each story, there are usually two sides. As in a court of law, both the defendant and the prosecutor have their time to speak. No one is on trial in this series of wrestling articles, though. To paraphrase Dragnet's Joe Friday, "Just the facts, man, just the facts." At least the facts as seen by those involved in the current wrestling problem.

Yesterday's article was mostly devoted to out and out critics of the coach of the wrestlers, Ed Carlin. The ones who felt they could no longer put up with the situation and quit, and those who saw fit never to reportfor practice had their say. Now, the members of the team as it stands now air their views. Every bit as critical in some respects, more understanding in others, these are the wrestlers who chose to retain their status.

Perhaps their most unifying character is their opinion of the wrestlers who severed their ties with the team.

152-pounder Eric Greenberg aptly described the current feeling of the team towards those who quit. "The guys who quit are going to be the losers in the end. You've got to be able to stick some things out. If they had any guts, they'd stick it out too."

Although decidedly not against their coach, the current wrestling crew feels there are some things aobut Carlin which should be changed.

Co-captain Joe Palmieri said that Carlin "is a really nice guy. Too nice a guy. People tend to take advantage of a person like Ed. It happened here and that's where the trouble began."

Palmieri said that many of the complaints against Carlin could be brought against any coach in the country. "There's no such thing as a perfect coach. But Ed does fall short in a few areas. He has a tough time pushing people to do things. But that's what a wrestling coach has to do. He's got to push and push in practice so that when we're on the mat alone, we can push ourselves. Ed hasn't been able to do that, though he's tried."

Palmieri and fellow co-captain John Terboss said they felt Carlin had two strikes against him to begin with. The lack of student support, they said, coupled with the apparent apathetic attitude on the part of the athletic department has made a difficult task that much harder.

"He can't overcome the feeling which the athletic department creates within the wrestlers," commented Palmieri.

Terboss added several examples in which the athletic department had failed the wrestling team, in his estimation. "The general facilities are poor," he said. "We practice in a gym which is usually cold. We can't use it anytime except during regular practice, because of classes. We finally got a steam room, but we shouldn't have had to cry to get it. I'm disillusioned with the whole athletic department.

Glen Bateman, 167 pounder for the Orange, believes Carlin's methods of putting across points are a big drawback. "He knows everything there is to know about wrestling. But the way he puts it across isn't the best way. He thinks he's doing it the right way, but maybe it isn't."

Commenting on a chief claim by the ex-team members that Carlin does not command respect, Bateman said, "Right now, that isn't so. We didn't have a lot of respect for him before, but as he is changing, so are our attitudes towards him."

Vinnie paolano, top 177 pounder who has been injured and has just resumed active practice, said that the team had reached its low morale point and was now coming back: He feels that the team as it stands now is very dedicated and has the will to win.

"Ed used to pull guys off the gumnastics team or anywhere else he could get them to fill a weight," he continued. "This hurt team spirit. Now that he knows we don't like it, he would rather forfeit a weight than just put a body there. This is a good sign."

And that is the way it is. Both sides of the issue have been heard. Tomorrow, an attempt will be made to summarize what has been said. Included will be the opinions of both Carlin and SUAD head Jim Decker.

Aid penalty for crime may get Assembly ok

By BOB ZUER
Associate Editor

The bill passed Wednesday by the New York State Senate which would ban state financial aid to college students convicted of crimes "committed on the premises of any college" has a good chance of being passed in the State Assembly as well, according to Kenneth G. Bartlett, Republican assemblyman from the 119th District (Syr.) and vice-president and dean of public affairs at Syracuse University.

Bartlett said yesterday the bill will probably be sent to committee in the Assembly sometime before the end of next week. If it is adopted by the Assembly, Gov. Nelson A. Rockefeller would then have to sign it for it to become law. Bartlett said he was sympathetic toward the bill but refused to say whether or not he would vote for it because he had not yet read it.

The bill, passed by a 38 to 15 margin, forbids state subsidies for college students convicted of unlawful assembly, aggravated harassment, criminal nuisance, "falsely reporting an incident" or "unlawfully possessing noxious material," such as smoke bombs.

Last year a similar bill was passed by the Senate but was killed in the Education Committee in the Assembly. Bartlett is a member of that committee.

Bartlett said conditions for passage of the bill are more favorable now because of the changes that have taken place since last year. He said correspondents from his constituents–which he described as "not different" from those of the other assemblymen–has indicated a "complete refusal" to support financially students who disrupt the campuses. "The public is anxious to have college students go back to work," he emphasized.

Secondly, the Assembly presently is controlled by the Republicans, whereas last year the Democrats held the majority.

Even if the bill were passed, however, Bartlett said he was not sure Rockefeller would sign it. He noted the Governor did not seem to favor last year's bill.

Maxwell professors Michael O. Sawyer and Donald Meiklejohn criticized the vagueness of the bill.

Sawyer said the legislation should be redrawn because of the use of general terms. It ought to be more specific because of the effect it will have, he added.

Meiklejohn said the reported Democratic objections on the grounds of "looseness and breadth of language (in the bill)" seem well taken. (Some Senate Democrats have criticized the bill as unclear and loosely written.)

"Most of all," said Meiklejohn, "the bill severely invades an area which belongs to the colleges and universities--the determination of who should study or be helped to study. Punishment for crimes is the duty of a civil authority but the decision whether a student should be aided is the business of the college or university," he added.

Alan K. Campbell, dean of the Maxwell School, also said he opposed the bill. "Such matters (as withdrawing aid) should be entirely in the hands of the University," he said.

He said only the University can evaluate the actions of students accurately enough to justify such things as withdrawing aid, suspension or expulsion.

SDS joins ranks to oust ROTC from campus; petition cirulated

By MARGARET ALLAN

"The Reserve Officer Training Corps does not have educational value; its sole purpose is to improve the effectiveness of the military."--from the SDS "ROTC Must Go" petition.

Students of leading universities have long been toying with the idea of abolishing ROTC programs.

See related story on page 5.

Syracuse members of the Students for a Democratic Society planned to follow suit by sponsoring an anti-ROTC petition in dining halls and other strategic areas during the coming week.

The petition, which was distributed in mimeograph form at last night's meeting, launches an attack on administrative backing of the military programs on campus. Students and other campus inhabitants who "demand that all forms of ROTC be discontinued as accredited University courses" are encouraged to sign the flyers. SDS maintains the right of the student "so inclined" to participate in officer's training, but objects to the administrative support of the program.

Also in the petition are the provisions that the University reject military courses or programs financially sponsored by the defense department and that military course instructors be eliminated from the University staff. SDS member Bob Tumposky noted that military forces "cannot easily survive without ROTC.

According to Tumposky the purpose of the petition is "not just to get a lot of written names, but to change minds." He added that people who have always disapproved of ROTC "will see that they are not alone."

SDS organizer Marty Mayer indicated it is "the hope" of SDS to "oppose all militarization of the campus community." He noted that ROTC was the focal point of attack because "it is visible" and "vulnerable." He said that posters announcing the "ROTC Must Go" campaign that had been placed on Marshall Street were torn down almost immediately.

The petition copies will be submitted at the next open SDS meeting Thursday night 110 Hall of Languages. The results will measure what Tumposky described as the "passive support" of students who make "the minimal commitment of signing their names."

"The militarization of American life is increasing daily, the petition proclaimed. "It is in the interest of students and others to stop this."

Financial problems

SU receiving double room payments

By HELENE MACDONALD
Associate Editor

The University is receiving double payment for some rooms vacated by girls who moved into sorority houses at the end of first semester and filled by girls moved from closed cottages, the Daily Orange has learned.

Under a compromise between the sororities and the dean of women's office, girls could move into sorority houses if they paid room money to the university and board to the sorority. However, even if the rooms are filled, girls will continue to pay for them.

This arrangement does not hold where sororities "exchanged" a girl living in the house for one in university housing. Girls were permitted to move into Alpha Delta Pi because of a previous agreement with the dean's office.

Financial difficulties were cited by Jean Crawford, director of women's residence, for changing girls for rooms they vacated. "It seems unfair, but the total financial problem entered into making the decision.

"A room contract is for a year," Miss Crawford explained. "We have released girls from contracts in the past, but financial difficulties prevented us from doing the same this year."

She attributed the number of vacancies in large dorms to the decrease in enrollment, rather than the number of people living off campus.

The reasoning behind the policy of making girls pay even though rooms are occupied is puzzling to many. Large dorms are not quite full at the present, although there are only between four and six empty spaces in Flint, according to its director.

Four members of Iota Alpha Pi, among others, find themselves in this position. Vicki Abrams, a sophomore, said, "The whole thing is pretty unfair. The house is losing money and the university is making it."

Another member of Iota called the situation "lousy. There's nothing we can do about it because the University just will not compromise."

Minorities

Problems of admission

By ROB STRUGATZ

"There are still relatively few students from minority-group and lower income families entering the American higher educational cycle..."

This is the opening from a paper written by Edward Ruhe, a graduate student at Syracuse University, which will appear shortly in the Maxwell Review.

Ruhe is head coordinator for the Minority Groups Enrollment Committee (MGEC), an organization devoted to helping create programs to allow more black and Indian students to gain admission to the University.

The Committee, according to Ruhe, is basically an ad hoc committee of Student Government, comprised of members from the CSL mass movement and Aspiration '72.

Ruhe took his undergraduate studies at the University of Wisconsin where a similar program has been in effect for three years. Ruhe said his main task once here was to coordinate all the diverse smaller groups working on this problem.

In an interview yesterday, Ruhe said that one of the main problems of the admissions issue is the Scholastic Aptitude Test scores, on which he said black students tend to rate an average 100 points lower than white students. This, according to Ruhe, is a grave misinterpretation of the student's ability, especially on the verbal part of the tests.

He claimed that verbally, black students have a completely different orientation than white students. Within this framework, black students are equally as articulate as white students are in

. . . there is hope.

It is true there is a seemingly hopeless destructiveness among a minority of students and blacks. But even this is evidence of hope. Erich Fromm in "The Revolution of Hope: Toward a Humanized Technology" tells us that "another and much more drastic result of shattered hope is destructiveness and violence. Precisely because men cannot live without hope, the one whose hope has been utterly destroyed hates life . . . He wants to avenge himself for his unlived life . . ." The wild-eyed revolutionary whose only aim is to tear down has experienced the destruction of hope. For every revolutionary, however, there are fifty who have experienced the rebirth of hope. The amazing fact is not that Senator McCarthy lost the nomination but that he came as close as he did to winning. (Even if we recognize the fact that the New Left supported McCarthy not to win but as a divisive force.)

As Fromm points out, it is human to hope. Our parents, having grown up with want and war, may have expressed their hope in terms of material goods. Having acheived an abundance of material goods, students today may have two choices: to loll in purposeless pursuit of comfort and a perpetual state of boredom, or to accept the challenge of the era and pursue that which is truly human in ourselves, to seek the common bonds between man and man rather than the common grave.

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

I am somewhat dubious about the function of the Syracuse University Judicial Board. The University and Board of Trustees have established rules, regulations, and procedures governing student activities and social life.

Although students may or may not be in agreement with these rules, it would seem to me that the function of the Judicial Board would be to interpret them and pass judgement as to whether a student is guilty or not.

By judging students according to the "Big Five Questions," the Board has begun to make up their own regulations. If the Board continues to function under a policy of, "Guilty, No Action Taken," then the effectiveness of the board will dwindle to nothing. The girl who was studying with her boy friend at 5:00 a.m. was found guilty with no action taken. In effect the Board is saying, you are guilty but we are not going to do anything about it. Other students are therefore entitled to do likewise and break rules. Students will have nothing to fear, because they know the Board will take no action.

There is positively no excuse for "No Action Taken" when outright violations have occured. If the student is guilty, as in the case cited, she should be disciplined, without question.

Until the University rules are changed, the student body must abide by them and be prepared for the consequences.

To the Editor:

Sometimes I wonder why there isn't a wall constructed between the College of Forestry and Syracuse University. The dissimilarities between the two colleges are equal to those of East and West Berlin. In the "Blizzard of '69," which occurred a few days ago, the differences were quite apparent. The C. of F. had their lots and roads plowed before 8:30, while SU students were still attempting to force the doors of their dormitories open in the afternoon.

I called the campus security police and inquired when the University would be able to plow the parking lots. The voice on the other end informed me that the physical maintenance department was operating on a limited budget. "Limited budget?," said I. "But for the Sadler lot alone you receive 2200 plus dollars, surely for the three or four heavy snowfalls we have a year, you could plow ...;" "I'm sorry, the voice said, Goodbye."

This same question was asked last spring when a Corvette was demolished in the Lawrinson garage. "Where does all the money go that we pay the University in parking fees?" Can the Student Government answer this question?

Just maybe, if the Chancellor brought a plow up from his gas station in Oneida....Oh well, maybe the snow will melt before exams, and we can all escape over the wall by summer vacation.

Peter S. Muench

To the Editor:

I wish to point out a little publicized, but very pertinent dilemma--that of the transfer student. This year there are well over five hundred upperclass transfer students at Syracuse; and I daresay there are nearly five hundred unmatriculated students as of this date. We are placed in freshmen dorms, isolated from other upperclassmen, and forced to endure a third year of freshmen frivolities. Yet the inconvenience and frustration of noisy living and studying conditions are only one of the tragedies of our isolation. In deciding to transfer from the security of our former universities, we were willing to give up a lot in the way of friends, traditions, and attitudes; yet we were willing. And why?

By the nature of our desire for broader, more opportune horizons, there is also an implied deep concern and interest in our new university. Yet by the very definition of our condition, transfer, we are excluded. I do not suggest that it is any one's fault, just that it is everyone's responsibility. We would like, and can contribute to the university if only we may have the chance.

After many weeks of class a number of transfers have not met or gotten to know even one student in each class. Syracuse is supposed to have spirit, and indeed in some respects it does, yet I have been literally shocked that students attending the same university, and even the same classes, haven't enough spirit to acknowledge one another with a greeting or attempt to become acquainted. Consider the plight of a junior girl who is segregated in a freshmen dorm and attempts to meet other students by means of the sorority rush system, only to find that she must know someone in the sorority in order to be invited. Or consider the plight of a junior who has been involved in student organizations throughout high school and college, but has come to Syracuse for better academics. How does he become involved in Syracuse organizations? To be sure, he may read the DO daily to see what by chance may be open, yet there is no published guide available to him listing student government structures, or campus organizations. Consider the plight of the girl or boy transfer who may be interested in attending concerts, plays and movies, perhaps an advantage he did not have formerly, yet is unable to secure a date or is wary of using public transportation unescorted. These things may appear to be minor, as perhaps they are, yet surely no SU student would be happy if his activities were limited to a stack of books. College should benefit us all, why don't we all have the chance?

Grad raps

On Sports

By Jacques Lebel

There is a noble experiment underway. They are opening the SU men's gym from 2 to 5 p.m. Sundays on a trial basis. How perfect for the grad student (as well as the undergrad) who because of a job or assistantship, family responsibilities, or other time committments finds the weekday schedule inconvenient. Also you don't have to battle with intramurals, wrestling team, gymnastics team, swim team, ad infinitum for a few shots at the hoop or a jump in the pool. Finally, as Syracuse's finest don't man the gates on Sunday, you can actually park within walking distance from the gym...a real deterring factor during the week.

Have you guessed yet? It was utter chaos. So many students showed up that every basket had 5 on 5 games going, the weight room, handball and squash courts were full, and while I didn't look I assume the pool was mobbed too. Great! But if we can set aside the tradition of "Closed Sundays" for a moment I'd like to give my interpretation of the large turnout on Sundays. For undergraduates Sunday is a day with no classes, no parties, few stores open and little action. It is a day when you don't feel quite so guilty if you sleep late, do some extra tubing and maybe play a little ball. For married students, working students and most grad students it is all this plus the only day when you can temporarily forget your other responsibilites. Even when the old lady expects you home when not at work or class Monday through Saturday she'll let you out Sunday to jock it up with the boys.

So please, athletic power structure, give this some serious thought. If the student population needs and will use the services, you can justify the expense of keeping the gym open...24 hours a day if so indicated. But just like the notorious library there would only be one or two fools playing basketball at 4 a.m. so no one is suggesting that. But why limit yourselves to 2-5 p.m.?Why no 10 a.m. to 10 p.m.?For a relatively captive campus population Sunday is just another day only services and diversion are few and far between.

With the current emphasis on jogging I was surprised to find that only a few grad students and faculty use the Manley Field House for this purpose...that is I was surprised until I tried to arrange for someplace to put my clothes while I was working out. With the exception of a few close friends of the athletic staff who somehow manage to find locker space anyone esle has to fold his clothes up in a corner of the floor and hope they are there when he returns. With a locker room full of lockers (every S.U. track, basketball, football, baseball and lacrosse player...frosh and varsity...gets one) and an equipment room staffed all day it would seem that some system of checking valuables, allocating a few lockers for faculty and grad students use, or even installing some lockers around the periphery of the fieldhouse arena itself for this purpose could be arranged. It doesn't seem quite fair that some frosh who will never score a point for S.U. can go out for track and thus get a locker while a grad student, ineligible for S.U. competition by N.C.A.A. rules, is totally ignored.

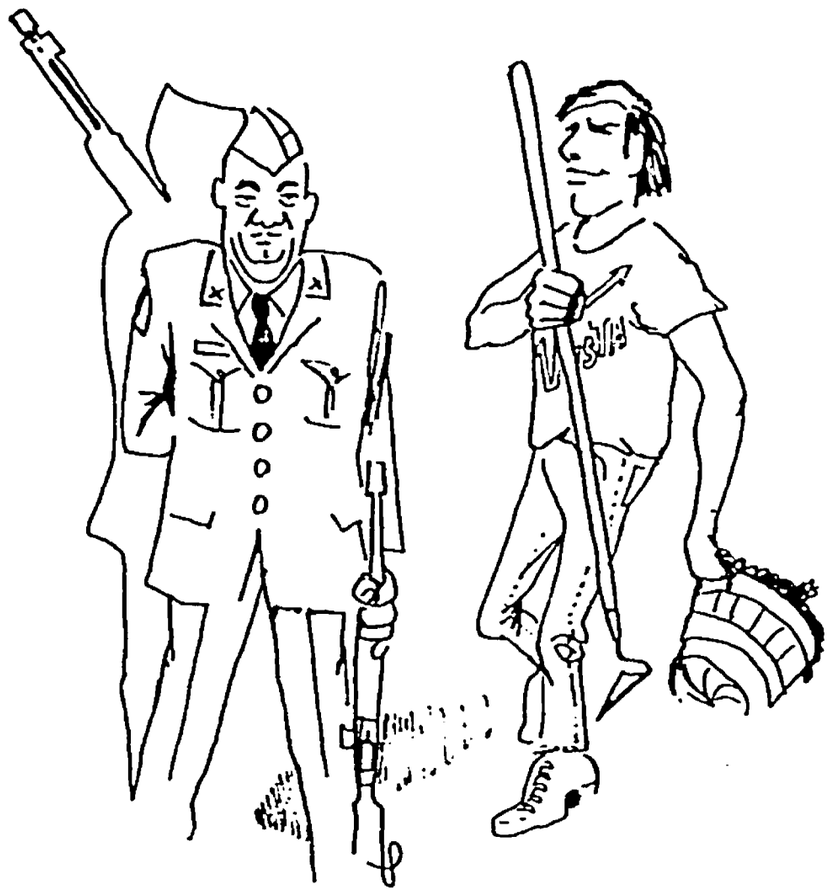
Volunteer army is not an alternative

By Lew Howell



Despite the interest in abolishing the draft among the conservatives and the demands for its abolishment from the left, there remains a very good case for retaining some sort of draft system.

First, there are many--myself among them--who have some fears about the nature of the army we would be creating. For a volunteer army is a professional army, one in which those who see the army even as a temporary profession will necessarily be of a personality type which needs and perhaps enjoys the militaristic way of life. Relatively few are going to view the army as a means of education or training when that same education and training can be gained elsewhere without the threat of getting killed. It is, instead, easy to envision the professional army as one gigantic Marine Corps, which one joins so that one can become a Man and which is, in a sense, human aggressiveness personified.

What shall we do with this professional army once we have it? Though there is obviously a possibility of exaggerating, it seems likely that a professional army will be less willing to sit around peacefully minding the missile sites. Abolition of the draft will mean that we remove all reluctant militarists from army organization and leave the army to the highly interested.

Such armies have spelled domestic trouble in other countries and could very easily spell trouble for ours. At the very least, a professional army would be a significant lobbying force with which our politicians would have to contend, and they already have a task in dealing with the army as it exists now.

At present, much of our army is outside the United States. Hopefully, for other countries, this will not always be the case. But then, if our professional army is not abroad fighting or occupying, it will be at home. But we don't want a professional army sitting around at home and other countries don't want it abroad. Thus, what do we do with the professional army? Provide it with a battle or two? Some riot duty?

As experts advising President Nixon have recently noted, too, a professional army would cost $17 billion more per year to support than did the drafted army of pre-Vietnam. There is little question that we need that yearly $17 billion in our cities and our education and welfare systems much more than we need it in a professional army.

In fact, the military difficulty at present does not really lie with the draft system. Switzerland, among others, has a universal military obligation for all males and cannot at all be considered as a militaristic nation. The problem instead is essestially a political one, originating in the policies which have created the mess in Vietnam and reflected in the

Not a "booze and broads" issue

Dorm autonomy: a living—learning process

By LOUIS JACOBS

Dorm autonomy tends to be many things to many people. The problem is that many of the things are different. The generalities of the proposal are indeed open to various interpretations.

This article and subsequent entries will discuss the implications of dorm autonomy and the general movement towards eliminating "in loco parentis." The students on the Council on Student Life (CSL) and the CSL board, an informal group working with CSL and other students, are the source for elaboration of the issues.

Each dormitory will determine its own rules or bylaws through referenda under dorm autonomy. Democratic processes including establishment of dorm courts and proper election of officers must be incorporated in dormitory constitutions. Inter-dormitory Council will review and evaluate residence halls and their constitutions to assure that each student is aware of all the aspects of the dorm autonomy proposal. Final passage rests in Student Senate.

There will be no double jeopardy involved in disciplinary proceedings as the university would remand responsibility to the students. Civil law remains valid for dormitories but all other regulations in a residence hall are determined, coordinated and disciplined by students.

The role of resident advisors and head residents shall no longer be that of a disciplinarian. The advising capacity of these lower level administrators will be emphasized. Residents will bear financial liability for damages obviously caused by members of the dormitory.

The dorm council, federation, or appropriate governing body established in residence halls shall assume responsibility for administering rules, programs and other student needs. The autonomous atmosphere is expected to facilitate programming such as faculty debates, concerts and advising services. CSL is now discussing the three-page proposal circulated to dorm councils which lists much of the potential for innovative programming.

Dorm autonomy is not a "booze and broads" issue. While the most readily recognizable implications concern social and disciplinary regulations, the future of a living-learning process at this university is really at question.

Dorm autonomy implies a basic trust in students governing themselves. The present system of centralized administrative control is both ineffective, as violations occur every day, and valueless in a student's education, as the dormitory remains no more than a pile of concrete blocks.

No one believes that dormitories will change over night, but implementation of dorm autonomy through the dorm council and town meeting approach now occurring on campus can work to clear the air for a new atmosphere.

Memorial services to be held for slain former professor

Memorial services for Dr. Eduardo C. Mondlane, president of the Mozambique Liberation Front who was assassinated Feb. 3 in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, will be held Saturday at 3 p.m. in Hendricks Chapel at Syracuse University. Mondlane was a former member of the Syracuse faculty.

Stephen K. Bailey, chairman of the Policy Institute at the Syracuse University Research Corporation, will deliver a eulogy at the service. Others participating in the service are the Rev. Norman O. Keim, United Campus Christian Fellowship chaplain; Sikhanyiso Ndlovu, a graduate student in the Program of Eastern African Studies; Robert F. Stephens, associate director of the Program, and the Rev. Dr. John H. McCombe Jr., dean of Hendricks Chapel.

Mondlane was an assistant professor of anthropology at Syracuse University's Maxwell Graduate School from 1961 to 1963 and remained on the faculty, though on leave of absence, until 1966. He received a bachelor's degree from Oberlin College in 1953. He earned his master's and doctorate from Northwestern University.

Mondlane was born June 20, 1920 in Mazambique, and until the age of 10 he lived a rural African boyhood caring for his family's cattle and sheep. He began his education at the age of 10 in Swiss Presbyterian bush schools and received a matriculation certificate of the Joint Matriculation Board of South Africa in 1947.

He continued his studies in Johannesburg, later going to Lisbon University in Portugal and in 1951 went to Oberlin.

In 1957 he began serving in the Trusteeship Council of the United Nations where he prepared background material on Tanganyika (Tanzania) and Southwest Africa. In 1961 he was a member of the UN plebiscite mission to the British Cameroons.

He was a member of the committee at Syracuse University which led to the establishment of its Program of Eastern African Studies. He left the University to return to Mozambique in "the pursuit of freedom and human dignity for the Mozambique people," according to Alan K. Campbell, dean of the Maxwell Graduate School. Campbell added: "As a firm believer in democratic principles and in non-violent change, he was ever willing to negotiate. Only when that course was closed did he organize a liberation movement. He gave his total energies and, sadly, his life to the betterment of human life.

"As part of a University closely related to the world community, we his friends and colleagues feel it would be appropriate to establish in the Maxwell School a lecture series bearing his name, on a subject reflecting his ideals."

Campbell said a memorial fund for this purpose is being established and that contributions may be made care of the Program of Eastern African Studies, Syracuse University.

Careers Week

SU women to receive professional vocational guidance

Professional women from the Syracuse area will tell Syracuse University undergraduate women about vocational opportunities in their fields during a Careers Week program Feb. 17 to 20.

Each evening will be devoted to a different area: Feb. 17, communications; Feb. 18, artistic and related occupations and technical fields; Feb. 19, education and social service; and Feb. 20, business and government.

Nearly all SU women graduates of the class of 1968 who replied to a recent survey said they wished they had had some kind of career information program while they were on campus, according to Mrs. Olga Kaish, counselor in the Dean of Women's office. The survey was conducted by the dean's office and the Placement Center.

Six speakers will be on campus each day from 7 to 9 p.m. Each will be at a different dormitory and a student may go to a site close to her residence or a site whose speaker particularly interests her.

Following is the schedule for Monday with the speakers, topics and places: Mrs. Liz Hannon, newspaper writing Shaw; Mrs. Sandra Anglund, public relations, Vernon; Mrs. Jane Read, speech and drama, Sherbrooke; Mrs. Nancy Duffy Mussacchio, television reporting, Day; Miss Walda Metcalfe, English majors who don't want to teach, Haven; Miss Anita Monsees, advertising, St. Mary's.

Tuesday's speakers and topics are: Mrs. Barbara Wortley, chemistry, Shaw; Miss Gloria Harty, biological science, Vernon; Miss Pat Lussow, computer science, Sherbrooke; Miss Sue Johnston, home economics, Day; Dr. Dorothy Lee, music, Haven; Mrs. Bettina Chapman, art, St. Mary's.

On Wednesday the speakers are: Dr. Ruth Lencione, special education, Shaw; Miss Carolyn Ruhe, social work, Vernon; Mrs. Marion Beauchamp, education administration, Sherbrooke; Mrs. Barbara Fisher, college teaching, Day; Dr. Claire Nicholson, anthropology, Haven; Dr. Ruth Burton, mental health, St. Mary's.

Thursday's schedule is: Mrs. Eleanor Theodore, law, Shaw; Miss Janet Knapp, banking, Vernon; Miss Martha Armstrong, federal civil service, Sherbrooke; Miss Mary Quint, library science, Day; Miss Ann Seymour, state government, Haven; Capt. Donna McLennan, USMC, armed forces, St. Mary's.

Prof. Meiklejohn slated to speak at Hendricks Chapel this Sunday

Donald Meiklejohn, professor of philosophy at Syracuse University, will be the guest preacher at the 11 a.m. service Sunday in the University's Hendricks Chapel. Meiklejohn's topic is "The Culture of Impatience."

Meiklejohn's appearance is part of a monthly program inaugurated last fall in which prominent campus personalities are invited to share the preaching with the Rev. Dr. John H. McCombe, dean of Hendricks Chapel. Earlier speakers were Prof. Michael O. Sawyer, Prof. Charles V. Willie, the Rev. Charles L. Borgognoni and Rabbi Milton H. Elefant.

Dean McCombe said: "The students are stressing the aim of making faith real on campus. They feel it is helpful if the professors and leaders they work with during the week have an opportunity to express on Sunday the faith and values which motivate them and which help all of us achieve our goals."

Prof. Meiklejohn, director of the public affairs and citizenship program, has been a member of Syracuse's faculty since 1963. He taught previously at the University of Chicago, the College of William and Mary and Dartmouth College. He did his undergraduate work at the University of Wisconsin and has a Ph.D. from Harvard University. He is the author of "Freedom and the Public."

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 21

This is a copy of a copy of an invitation to interview a company you may not know well enough.

Making copies is only part of the story.

You can get the other part straight from the source. Talk to our representative and ask him about R&D looking ahead to major advances in education...in areas like color xerography and 3-D imaging...about refinements in combined xerography and EDP systems to process and graphically reproduce any theory or fact available...at any distance.

Ask anything imaginable and you'll discover you're probing a company that's involved with every phase of the information and education explosion.

We place great emphasis on individual initiative. Additional schooling aimed at advanced degrees. Brainstorming. A variety of short-term project groups. And benefits. In short, your career, not simply a job for you to fill.

So while you're looking us over for career opportunities, we'll be looking you over for career potential. Fair enough?

Why not make an appointment with your Placement Director. A half hour of your time could be the start of a great future in research, engineering, manufacturing, programming, accounting, finance, statistics or marketing/sales.

Perishing Rifles?

SDS 'war on ROTC' rocks colleges from Cornell to Yale--is SU next?

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

If SDS here and on other campuses has its way, Pershing Rifles may become "Perishing Rifles."

Pershing Rifles is the fraternity of Army ROTC, which SDS would like to see disbanded--along with Air Force ROTC.

Last night's SDS meeting here may be the first step toward anti-ROTC demonstrations which have rocked other universities.

SDS views ROTC as another mode of "university complicity" in supplying cannon fodder for an "unjust and illegal war."

Unlike other student organizations, the ROTC program provides monthly stipends and academic credit for participants. The University further sweetens the deal by excusing cadets from their physical education requirement.

One major objection raised against ROTC is that the University has no jurisdiction over its curriculum. According to Army regulation 145-5, "ROTC instructor personnel will conduct only courses of instruction prescribed by the Department of the Army."

ROTC courses are the only ones here which exclude foreign students of certain nationalities or require a loyalty oath.

Despite the word "reserve" in the program's title, ROTC is officially recognized as a primary source of long-term career and regular officers--producing twice as many of them as West Point.

Last month, a Cornell University commission on military training recommended that ROTC be removed from control of military personnel and placed in regular academic departments without credit.

The commission also urged that military drills and indoctrination be relegated to extra-curriculum status or to a summer activity, and that the practice of granting faculty standing to military instructors be discontinued.

The commission, composed of student, faculty and administration representatives, was appointed by Cornell's President. It said courses on drill and "indoctrination should not be considered as suitable for a university."

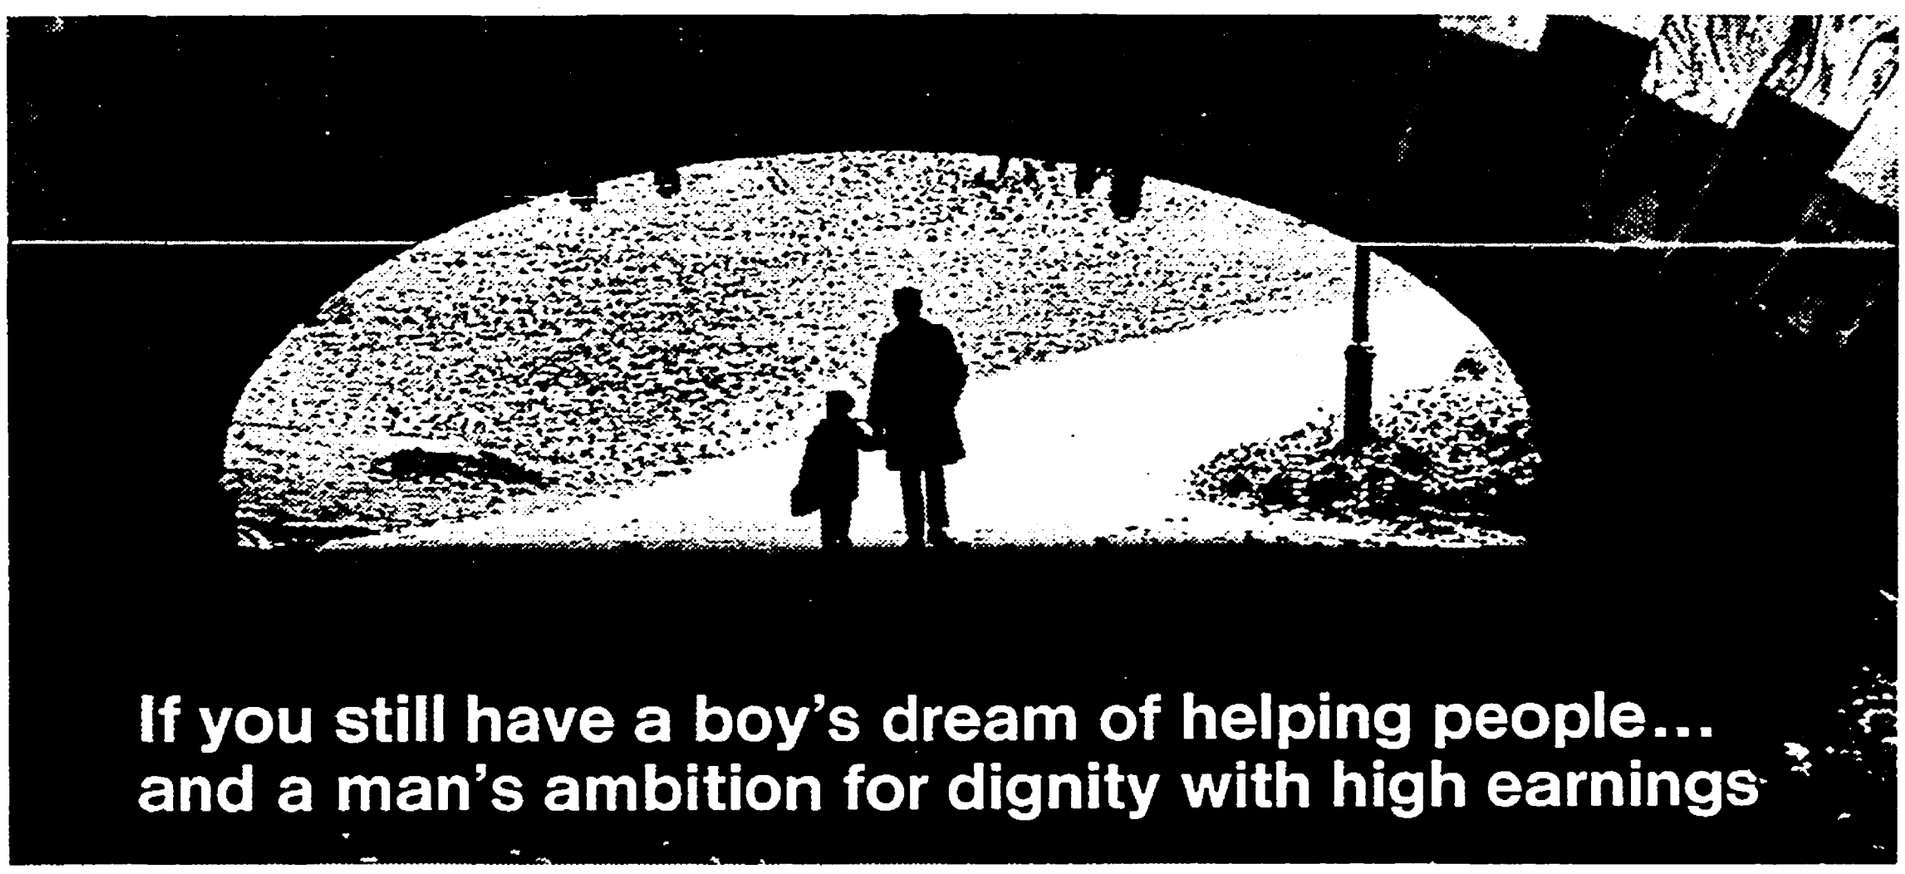
The study also found it "unacceptable that active military personnel teach courses with political and policy content"--such as military history, national security and others on strategy.

ROTC's impact at Cornell has declined since compulsory participation by male students was abolished in 1960. Enrollment has dropped from 3,000 then to 600 this year, out of about 7,000 eligible men.

Cornell and many other universities include ROTC as a means of fulfilling their obligation to the Federal Government under the Land Grant Act of 1862, also known as the Morrill Act.

This month, Yale's faculty voted to take academic credit away from ROTC and to strip officers of their professional rank. Yale accredited ROTC for 50 years before a faculty committee reported that "ROTC is like singing in the Whiffenpoofs--a perfectly fine activity, but one that we don't think merits any academic standing."

Harvard protesters recently mounted a sit-in to demonstrate their opposition to ROTC, which they followed with an open advertisement in The Crimson.



At Stanford University in California, Naval ROTC headquarters was gutted by fire.

Last month, the University of Minnesota's student newspaper editorialized: "An institution of higher learning is supposed to be dedicated to the pursuit of truth and freedom in thought and action, yet the University tolerates three-credit courses in 'military leadership' which include two hours of close-order drill each week. . .Military discipline is strict, unreasonable and degrading, and destroys the integrity of the individual. Respect for freedom of thought and conscience in the military is proportional to rank."

Last semester, the University of Pittsburgh's Undergraduate Council recommended to remove accredidation from ROTC. The Pitt News commented, "ROTC must be considered a group of students in an outside program. It is a student activity that grants incentives of financial payment and accredidation.

"This creates a campus atmosphere reeking of inequities. If ROTC is to continue to receive academic credit, other student organizations should be allowed to give. . .credit."

Prof. Carl Cohen at the University of Michigan recently debated students defending ROTC credit on the grounds that it was "occupational training." Cohen asked one student, "Suppose we offered a degree in plumbing. Would that be appropriate for the University?"

Youthful leader to speak at Hillel's 'Israeli Night'

One of Israel's youthful leaders, who is the director of the Overseas Student Programs of the Tel Aviv University, will be the guest of Hillel at its Sunday night dinner, February 16, at 5:30 p.m. in Watson Dining Hall.

Amnon Golan, who joined David Ben Gurion, Moshe Dayan and Shimon Peres in 1965 in forming the Rafai Party, will be speaking on the subject of "Peace in the Middle East — A Dream or Reality?" as part of Hillel's "Israeli Night" festivities.

Born in the village of Avichayl, Israel, in 1936, Golan graduated from the Reali school in Haifa and the National Military Academy. He received his masters at the Hebrew University in 1961 and was admitted to the Israeli Bar in 1963.

Upon graduating from the Military Academy, Golan was appointed Lieutenant in the Israeli army and served in the Sinai Campaign. Very active in political life, he was elected secretary of the Mapai Student Organization at the Hebrew University and in 1960 was elected National Secretary of the Youth Movement of Mapai.

Golan came to America in 1966 to study at California State College, where he received an M.A. in Government. He then achieved the position of Director of the Overseas Student Programs of the Tel Aviv University in New York.

Hillel's "Israeli Night" will feature Israeli foods such as filafel, chumus, charif and pitta, which are unavailable in this area. SU Israeli students will be present and will be prepared to give information regarding programs in Israel.

Winter Weekend features Fifth Dimension concert

Due to an error in Dates and Data, many students are under the assumption the Winter Weekend dates are Feb. 21-23, rather than the actual dates of Feb. 28—Mar. 2. This all-university weekend begins with the Fifth Dimension concert at the War Memorial at 8:30 p.m. on Friday. Tickets for the concert and other weekend events will be on sale at HBC starting Feb. 17.

Following the concert, there will be a happening at Kimmel Dining Hall. The event, sponsored by the Junior Class in conjunction with the Kimmel-Marion dorm council, features the Sidewinders, a light show and a Mass Media production entitled "Once Virgin Blood."

Beer will be served from 12:30 a.m. to 3 a.m. The price for the happening is $1.50 per couple and $1 per person. Curfews have been extended.

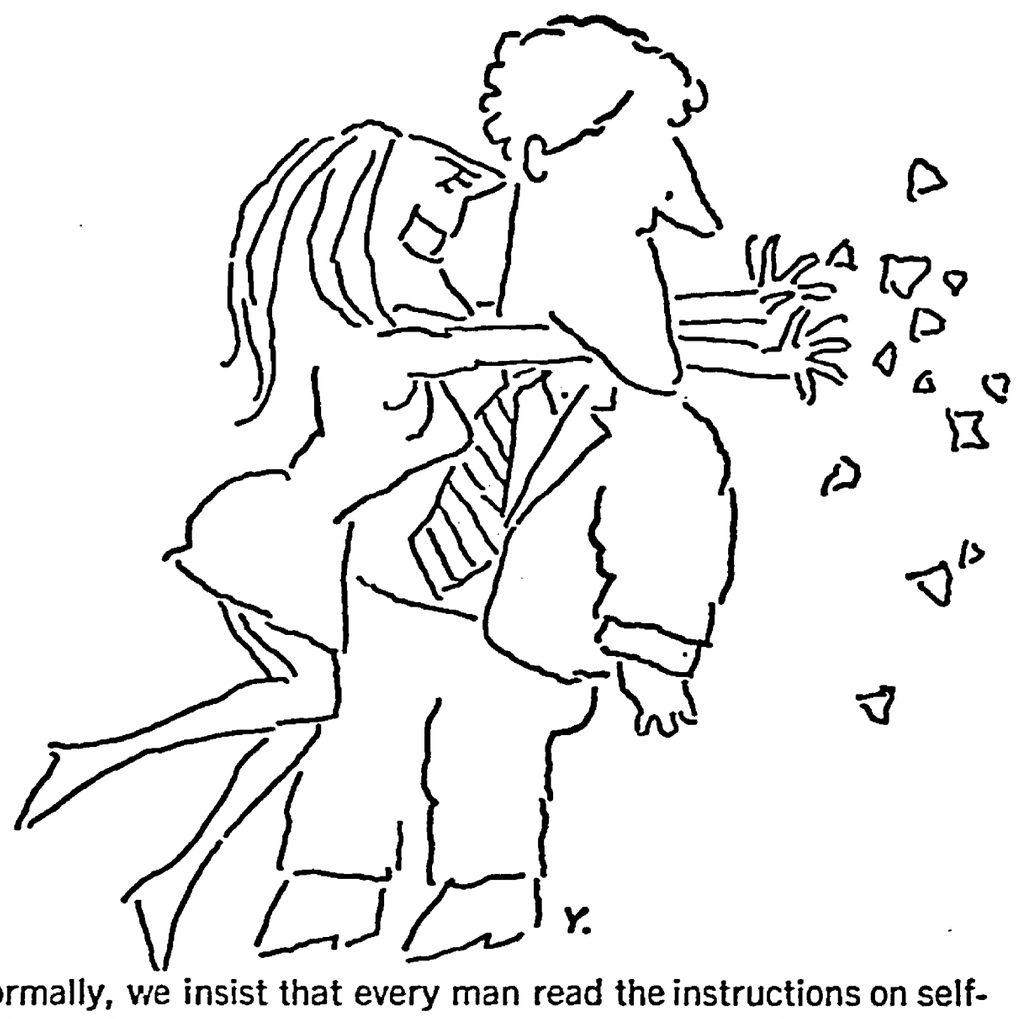
On Saturday, Mar. 1, a Winter Carnival at Song Mountain will also be sponsored by the Junior Class. For skiers the event begins at 9 a.m. when the lifts open. For skiers and others there will be continuous music and beer from 1 p.m. through 1 a.m. Transportation will be provided for all weekend participants with buses leaving every half-hour from Sims, beginning at 12:30 p.m.

Talent for the day includes the Sidewinders and the Eastern Graile. Tickets will be on sale at HBC at $7 for skiers and $2.50 for non-skiers.

Special ceremonies planned for crowning of 1969 Sweetheart queen

Fifty Syracuse University coeds representing sororities and living centers competed for the title of "Queen of the '69 Sweethearts' Ball" at preliminary judging this week at the State University College of Forestry.

Fifteen semi-finalists were chosen for the final round of judging to be held Monday at 8 p.m., at Lawrinson Penthouse, at which time the Queen and her court of four will be elected.



The 1969 Queen will be crowned at special ceremonies during the intermission of the dance tonight at Drumlins Country Club, by the '68 Sweethearts' Ball Queen. She is Susan Moore, a sophomore majoring in fine arts.

Music for dancing will be provided by Jack Kriescher's orchestra.

Sponsoring the annual Sweethearts' Ball, one major highlight on the social calendar for 1968-69, is the Wood Engineers' Club, a student organization comprised of undergraduates specializing in wood products engineering.

All fraternities, sororities, living centers, or other organizations were invited to sponsor two girls.

The urban university

SU and Syracuse, despite differences, are changing each other

The urban university in America is a reletively modern institution. Our first colleges and universities, primarily the products of our religious sects, preferred the peacefulness of the countryside to the temptation and sin of the city. Indeed, the pastoral image persists with such recent writers as George Kennan in "Democracy and the Student Left."

Of the ten largest cities in the United States during 1900, only four had universities with enrollments in excess of 2,000. But the population was already in motion from rural to urban areas and by 1930, the City College of New York, which had 1,694 students in 1900, had grown to 35,189.

Today there are approximately 200 urban universities with one-half the students in all degree-granting institutions. Even state systems are establishing branches in urban centers whereas before they preferred the town and hamlet. The non-urban university dominates its environment and host community. The nature of the urban university is different.

An urban university such as Syracuse exists as a city within a city. It has an identifiable population, an independent economy and a system by which the energies of its inhabitants are devoted to its preservation. It has its own police force, steam station and medical service, even if it occasionally calls the city firemen.

At the same time the urban university is inevitably tied to its host. If it wishes to expand it faces immediate obstacles. Syracuse University is contained to the south by a cemetery, to the east by a city park, and to the west by hospitals and a major highway.

Thus its manifest destiny is to expand northward toward Genesee Street and Erie Avenue or not at all. The interconnection of the University and the city is plainly evident to the residents in the universitys path.

SU was even forced to call on the city to invoke its right of eminent domain to obtain the land in Walnut Park for the future Byrd Library.

The University and the city may seem less inter-related and more antagonistic when it comes to such topics as tax-free property, over which it has fought legally with the city for several years, or social action programs such as the long-defunct Community Action Training Corps. In the former case, the antagonism, as Professor Alan Campbell points out, is only skin deep. "In a simplistic way Syracuse University does eat up the property tax and the tax base, since it is off the tax rolls; But this overlooks the contribution the University makes, even in straight revenue (SU is the largest inner-city employer with over 4,000 employees.)

"Higher education is one of the fastest growing segments of the economy," pointed out Professor Campbell. "The people graduated by the University get better jobs, are more skilled, make more money, etc. and the resulting total of taxes is greater."

Of course there is another side to the relation between the University and the city. How does one measure the contribution of the University Regent Theatre to the arts in Syracuse? Or there is University College, celebrating its fiftieth anniversary and offering the community its myriad courses and projects for continuing education.

The relation between the University and the city is a complex and subtle one. And the most important questions regarding the University's obligations to the city and its inhabitants, especially the disadvantaged, deal with the role of the University itself.

J. Martin Klotche, the chancellor of the University of Wisconsin–Milwaukee, tried to synthesize the university as a learning center and source of direct aid to our embattled cities in his book "The Urban University." Having defined the most pressing urban problems he concluded: "In all of these matters the urban university can play a central role. It can, in fact, become the single most important force in the re-creation of our cities."

'65 program stirred passions

Poverty's CATC killed

By JEAN HAVENS
Associate Editor

The city of Syracuse and Syracuse University found themselves in sharp opposition in 1965 over the supposed "rabble-rousing" techniques of an SU-sponsored program, the Community Action Training Center.

The Center was established with funds from a Training and Research Grant from the Office of Economic Opportunity (OEO), Syracuse University, the Ford Foundation and the Los Angeles Diocese of the Episcopal Church. It was scheduled to last for two years.

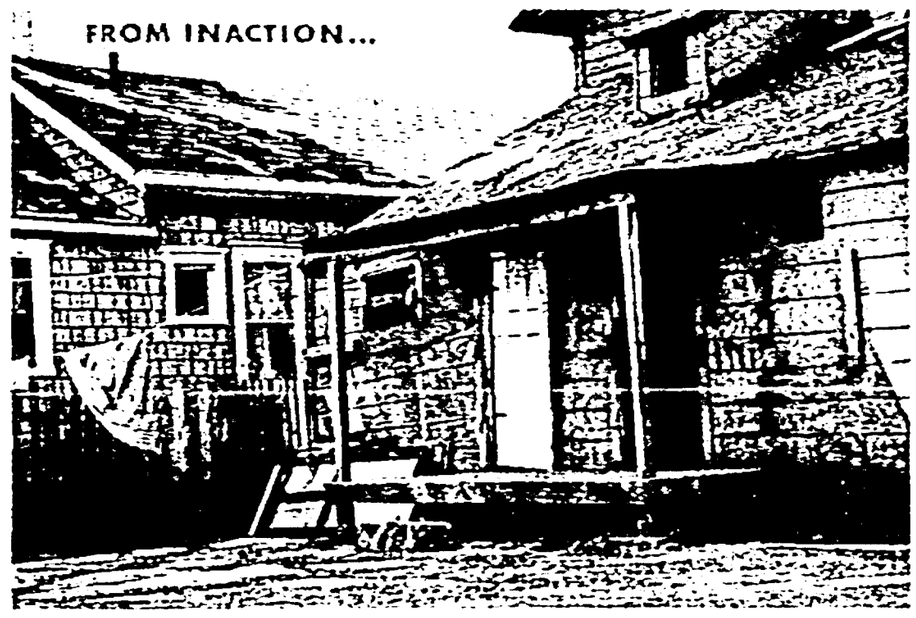
Dean Clifford L. Winters, Jr. of University College was the Center's overall supervisor, while Dr. Warren C. Haggstrom, an assistant professor in the School of Social Work at SU, was the project director. Of the program, Dean Winters stated in an April, 1965, "Post Standard" article that it "can mean new hope, new courses of action and new self-respect for people trapped in poverty and shut off from the good life enjoyed by most of our citizens."

Winters continued: "Basically we propose to train workers who can help the low-income person to help himself up the ladder to full citizenship. We plan to do this by assisting the poor in building democratic organizations that will focus on problems which the poor see as immediate and central to their lives."

The training center was designed to produce professional community development workers, and originally involved 16 students. The trainees were known as "organizers," and did their field work in local Syracuse neighborhoods.

The project was running smoothly when the Syracuse Housing Authority (SHA) accused the "organizers" of (among other things): refusing to identify themselves with the authorities; "creating a division between the races;" conducting a session "haranguing" the SHA, attempting to make the SHA the "enemy" of the action program, and harassing tenants.

Charles A. Walker, a SHA commissioner, sent a letter to President Johnson, declaring: "The Syracuse Housing Authority members were shocked to learn that the Syracuse University School of Social Work was installing and directing this program...it was also shocked to learn that the Federal Government was providing more than $300,000 to finance a project whose purpose seemingly is to harass an agency of the Federal and State Governments."



In an article in the "Post Standard," Walker stated that he "strongly questions the propriety of Syracuse University allowing its School of Social Work to engage in these activities which do no good and will ultimately cause serious trouble in our community if allowed to continue."

Charges of Communism and Marxism were leveled against the activities and techniques of the "organizers" as Walker stated that the University program was unable to join with the city's recognized social agencies in carrying out "a simple family service project."

In the same article, William L. McGarry, executive director of the SHA, said: "We are presently alarmed over the inevitable consequence of what appears to be complete irresponsibility on the part of the action organization and their gross immaturity in a mighty dangerous field."

In response to these charges, the Salt City and Central Village tenants' organizations (two of the six created by CATC) issued point-by-point refutations, staunchly defending the "organizers." Counter-charges were hurled as the two organizations accused the SHA of intimidation of tenants in order to gain information on CATC activities.

Dean Winters defended the Action Training Center by re-defining the purposes of the federal grant: "1) To train professional social workers and lay enablers in effective methods of working with low-income neighborhoods. 2) To form democratic organizations and neighborhood councils so that low-income families can work on their own programs of self-help, and 3) To research the process of training and neighborhood organization."

Winters called McGarry's statements "inaccurate and misleading," and stated that "all neighborhood organizations are bi-racial and democratically organized."

A Federal investigator was sent to Syracuse on April 20, 1965, to look into the CATC and file a report with OEO director, R. Sargent Shriver.

Nothing further seems to have been heard of the investigation, and the month of May apparently passed quietly. In June, however, the "Herald Journal" reported Syracuse Mayor William F. Walsh as accusing Dr. Haggstrom, CATC

Impact through research

Metro Studies trains new generation

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

"There is an ideal," wrote George F. Kennan in his recent "Democracy and the Student Left," "that has long been basic to the learning process as we have known it...It is an ideal that does not predicate any total conflict between thought and action, but recognizes there is a time for each."

This philosophy, perhaps more than any other, describes the primary aims of Syracuse University's Metropolitan Studies Program, a pioneering program in urban government research and instruction now in its seventh year.

DR. ALAN K. CAMPBELL

The program was the product of a 1960 committee created by former Maxwell Dean Harlan Cleveland and chaired by the study program's current director Guthrie Birkhead. And the product, said Birkhead in a recent interview, when put under the command of Alan K. Campbell--now dean of Maxwell--"worked like a charm."

The program's aims were well-defined from the beginning: to teach and write, and to conduct research beyond the Syracuse community.

The Metropolitan Studies Program is neither a "direct action agency" nor a primary contact between the University and the city. "We didn't feel these were proper functions of an academically-based operation," Campbell said yesterday.

But in times of "urban crisis," critics who see this as a "withdrawal" from participation in contemporary life--to concentrate on "thought" rather than "action"--have questioned the aims of urban government programs.

Campbell and assistant professor Donna Shalala, however, called such criticism "unfair."

"In the long run," said Miss Shalala, "training and research will have a much larger impact" on metropolitan government.

And, seven years into the program, this philosophy has produced impressive evidence in proving itself. Although it is difficult to find an effective measure of the impact which the Metropolitan Studies Program has had on the urban world, there are several that are at least suggestive.

The best measure, according to Campbell and Birkhead, is the output of the teaching program--the professionals who have been turned out by the program and the positions they are filling.

In its first five years the program graduated about 106 students, most with Master of Public Administration degrees.

According to a soon-to-be-published five-year report, "Today these graduates are about equally divided among positions in the federal, state and local governments, and in academic institutions.

The list of placements ranges from positions in the Health, Education and Welfare and House and Urban Development departments, in such institutions as Cornell University, Penn State and the University of Illinois, and as legislative assistants.

And, as Campbell pointed out, these graduates are still young.

Campbell considers the graduate program and the students who came through as his and the program's "greatest accomplishment. The greatest impact is through their work in the metropolitan field."

It is more difficult to measure the success of the program's research, but an indication, according to Campbell, is the influence it has had on scholars and public officials dealing with fiscal problems of urban government and in the urban education field.

In the education field, for example, Campbell has had an intense interest in revising state aid formulas, and the resulting research has been partly responsible for at least five law suits in five states (Michigan, California, Illinois, Oklahoma, and West Virginia), based on the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

Research also has produced waves in the fields of reapportionment, for which the program yesterday received a $63,000 grant from the National Municipal League to support a two-year study; and urban transportation (see page 12).

Despite the successes in research and training of the still young Metropolitan Studies Program, however, it would be inaccurate to assume that the program was without its more direct effects on the cities. It is not entirely "withdrawn" and "secluded," in Kennan's terms.

The program has been, for example, an important catalyst for the University College's Continuing Education Center and its community leadership programs.

"We really have provided basic materials in their teaching programs," said Campbell.

Thus, the Metropolitan Studies Program is at least minimally involved in "direct action" in the community via conferences and other educational efforts in which local community leaders and people throughout the state participate.

"We are not shying away," said Director Birkhead. "We recognize a certain amount of direct community responsibility. But we can fulfill that responsibility best by training a new generation" for positions in an increasingly metropolitan society.

Roving reporter

Salina St. views SU

By RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

Those who would care to see SU a hotbed of radicalism, allenated from a shocked, derisive community, may themselves be up against a wall, mother–a wall of cheerful tolerance, and yes, even affection on the part of Syracuse's citizenry.

They like us.

Not all of them, of course, but a fairly extensive, rather impromptu survey done on S. Salina street yesterday revealed a range of favorable attitudes towards both the University and its students.

Therefore, we must be doing something right, (or wrong?).

Patrolman Leo Dixon, for example, remarked that he did not care to generalize about SU students he had come in contact with, holding that he preferred to draw opinions on individuals.

Surprisingly, he did not seem especially alarmed about the use of drugs on campus, commenting demurely that "you can find it in the junior high schools."

And there are the more enthusiastic supporters, also.

Pete Mussi, owner of a newspaper stand, waxed eloquent on the subject of the SU student and his University.

"It's a great organization," Mussi roared, "you've got a bunch of up and coming citizens that all want to better themselves."

Where then might sources of ire lie? In students' bizarre dress? Their long hair? Their beards?

Surely, one motherly looking lady, a salesgirl at Dey Brothers, found mild offense in the appearance of some students. "I don't especially care for how they're dressing or those beards," was her gentle opinion.

But her comment was offset by that of three well-dressed women shoppers.

"I went through the flapper age," one lady said."Believe me, dresses were right up to where they are now," she laughed. "And my husband had a suit with bell-bottom pants."

Her campanions also leaped to the defense of the SU student circa 1969.

"There's good and bad in every generation; the people who are criticizing you were probably just as wild when they were young," was their fervent opinion.

It is not, of course, possible to overlook the effect of personal ties some Syracusans have with the University.

"Of course my impression of the University has to be good," a policeman laughed, "my son goes there." A lady describing SU as "just wonderful" added that her daughter had just submitted an application.

Nor has the news of our admirable reputation been limited to Syracuse. Witness the doctor from Oneida who gave assurance that "the impressions I have gotten have all been good."

In fact, out of all the people consulted in the survey, only one cared to mitigate a favorable opinion.

Asked about his thoughts on such subjects as campus unrest and drug use, a downtown businessman expressed faith in the judgment of the SU student so far.

"But I don't know how long it will last," he added ominously.

Roundtable scene

Weekly discussion lively

By ANGUS TWOMBLY

Syracuse University is receiving a subtle boost to its community image through a weekly discussion group for community leaders held downtown at University College. The group, called the Thursday Morning Roundtable, is described by its literature as a "public service provided by University College as a continuing channel of communication for civic leaders in the Syracuse metropolitan area."

Participants in the Roundtable sessions don't consider themselves members. According to one, they just "attend regularly."They do so, however, by invitation only.

The Roundtable group now numbers nearly 150 persons, with an average of 50 attending each session. Since the program was started in 1965, their ranks have included newspapermen, religious leaders, city and county government officials, attorneys, a few businessmen and a number of SU and UC personnel.

The chairman of the Roundtable is L.L. Smith, executive director of the Continuing Education Program at UC. Smith started the group when he joined UC in 1965. He says its main "emphasis is on social planning," a field which has led to discussion of topics from zoning to drug addiction.

The Roundtable is currently discussing the housing problems within the Syracuse area. The first of four meetings on the subject was held yesterday.

This was a typical meeting. Early arrivers appear at about 8:15 a.m. in the rather old and stark snack bar and lounge of Peck Hall. Coffee and doughnuts are waiting.

One of the first to come this morning was Don Rives, director of the Citizen's Foundation. Between sips of coffee, Rives described the Roundtable as an "excellent forum for people concerned with the community's goals and problems."

Rives is pleased with the variety of people that attend, describing them as "a good adequate sample. These are people in government, social agencies and industry–all leadership people. It gives an opportunity to meet and exchange ideas. This is a chance to hear from the top authorities what's going on."

While the University isn't an outright participant in the discussions, Rives thought its sponsorship helped to "project a good image."

One of the senior members of the group is Robert S.G. Maier, who has been going to the Roundtable since it began. As regional director of the State Commission for Human Rights, his interest in the social planning nature of the discussions is obvious. He smiled when he heard Daily Orange, offered his last personal card and settled back to talk.

When asked about the value of the Roundtable, he said "the obvious strongpoint is that certain moot questions are discussed frankly. We have considerable 'give and take' on a variety of opinions."

On the subject of the university, Maier said "we've had a proper representation of town and gown. There has been good representation from the university. At one time or another, most of the important people in the university have been here."

Maier said the group had been fairly well balanced, but he would like to see more representation from the major industries. He thought that the structure of the group was "loose enough" to allow for new people and new ideas.

Joseph Golden of the Cultural Resources Council has been attending Roundtable sessions for about two years. When asked if he considered the Roundtable a bridge between the university and the community, he said that aspect was really "inconsequential. The university serves a much better function by providing the idea,

Report to state

SU's social responsibility

The report "The University and Social Responsibility" recently issued by Dr. Allen Splete, Assistant Dean for Academic Affairs, is interesting for two reasons. First, its sheer bulk. It lists 135 programs at SU directed toward the disadvantaged and urban problems.

Second, despite the neutral conjunction in its title, the report itself assumes the role of the University is social responsibility.

"One of the basic responsibilities of higher education in serving the needs of contemporary society is to identify and seek out students from disadvantaged areas. . ."

"The University also is attacking many of the broad problems of the urban community on a variety of fronts through established educational programs, through the facilities and resources of the Continuing Education Center of University College, and through the Syracuse University Research Corporation. . ."

This report was sent to the New York State Education Department, Federal agencies, and foundations.

SU has three major programs to seek out disadvantaged students. "Project Opportunity" sponsored by University College, the adult and continuing education branch of SU, provides 43 full-tuition scholarships worth $19,000 for white and black students from the inner-city.

Another project to recruit disadvantaged students is underway through the Admissions office with the help of 95 student volunteers. The students, members of the Student Afro-American Society, make up the Freshman Action Committee. They encourage black students in their hometowns to apply to SU. "Applications from Negro students have increased 50 to 75 percent over a year ago this time," according to the report.

For black graduate students there are the Allen Funt Fellowships offered through the Newhouse School of Communications. They were established by two $16,000 grants from Allen Funt and a $30,000 grant from the Ford Foundation.

These programs are not necessarily unanimously approved by the black students on campus, however. Wednesday before a special subcommittee of the Council on Student Life, black students voiced the complaint that financial aid is not adequate, "especially in view of the rising price of education." There were also complaints of cutbacks in individual cases.

The black students also proposed that black deans be in charge of admitting black students and that the Freshman Action Committee along with other black organizations be given better facilities.

Performing arts as continuing education

UC provides city with Regent facilities

By JANICE H. LESNIAK

Well into its tenth year, the University Regent Theater (URT) is still operating on a deficit. But its directors feel the financial loss is justified by the URT's asset to the Syracuse community, educationally and culturally.

The man ultimately responsible for the URT is Clifford Winters, dean of University College, the continuing education college of Syracuse University. Dean Winters believes in continuing education through the medium of the performing arts. Consequently, the Regent's...

Owned and run by University College, the Regent is the first performing arts center tied to the community by an extension division of a university, and the only professional theater run by a continuing education division in the country.

Complex affects community

"If the complex was to fall tomorrow, the whole community would be affected," is the view held by Rex Henriot, managing director of URT and the Syracuse Repertory Theater (SRT). The Regent provides the academic and resident communities with professional and amateur drama, music, celebrities, children's drama, film and art galleries within the theater's lobbies.

Although many students consider the Regent is used for the university community only, the majority of last year's 76,000 attendance was comprised by non-student area residents. The variety of performances offered at the theater exemplifies the range of audience participation.

The SRT, the only local professional resident company, accounted for more than half of last year's attendance at the Regent, with 60 per cent community participation to 40 per cent university participation during its 1967-68 fiscal year.

In addition to the classic and contemporary plays offered by the SRT at the Regent, the Celebrity Series brought Marcel Marceau and Tom Paxton to Syracuse within the past year. The World Adventure Tours cater to the non-university audience this season with professional travelers narrating films on Polynesia, Scandinavia, Hawaii, Africa, Thailand and Europe.

Films are successful

The most successful student participation at the Regent is probably in the Film Series, which last year showed 57 films from Film Forum and the community Cinephile Series, with the URT's own films filling in between the other two groups.

Music lovers can attend symphonies and operas offered by the Chamber Music Society, the Symphony Opera, the Musique de Chambre and the Syracuse Choral at the Regent.

The SU drama department holds its productions at the theater, as well as its rehearsals. The Children's Series provides area youths with music and drama, including professional children's specials.

Interrelations between the University and community are perhaps best shown by the public rentals of Community Showcase. The Syracuse Little Theater, Syracuse Ballet Theater, Syracuse Musical Theater, Salt City Playhouse, Onondaga Community College drama department, Syracuse Alumni Ski films, David Shields Ballet Co., Ebony Fashion Show, church and school groups all partake in the facilities of the University Regent Theater.

For what Henriot considers a "ridiculously low" price, these groups are given the use of stages, dressing rooms, box office, front and back staffs and technical and design assistance.

Although Henriot is fascinated with this community-involvement idea, which made him decide to accept his position here in 1966, his impression as a newcomer is that the Regent complex is "much taken for granted in town and shouldn't be. Without the complex at this moment, the whole state of the arts in the area would become unimagineable."

"Because it's been here for ten years and so much is done here, the community tends to ignore that UC is operating at a low cost and bearing much financial burden itself as a responsibility to the community." Henriot feels that "OCC and UC are financing the arts in this community at cost. The Regent runs a large deficit every year. If UC makes a net income, it goes back to SU's budget."

Community objections

But members of the community continue to raise objections such as, "Why are you charging such outrageous prices for tickets?" He explained, however, that in many cases URT charges only 40 per cent as much as is charged in New York City for the same type and caliber of productions.

"We have never made a net profit on the Celebrity Series," he continued. "The fee is never even made up at the box office. For example, the fee for having Marcel Marceau was 115 per cent of what could be taken in at the box office, but this is the way for us to present him to the university and community. There was no other way for him to come here."

Henriot is disappointed that the community does not react more enthusiastically to all the URT offers. He agrees with two problems cited at the University College staff conference at Sagamore in May, 1968, as hindering attendance at the Regent. The neighborhood around Genesee Street and University Avenue where the theater is located, and limited parking facilities, are not conducive to care-free theater-going. But he feels the neighborhood is better than most in the inner city, and hopes the completion of the new Holiday Inn, in the vacinity, including a restaurant and parking ramp, will provide easier access to the theater.

University College, while continuing education through the performing arts, is also continuing to develop the physical characteristics of the Regent Theater. Since the acquisition of the old Regent Theater ten years ago, the stage house has been completely refurbished, and has a total of 1008 seats. The 200-seat open stage Experimental Theater was added to the old, and houses the drama department, rehearsal space, and dressing rooms.

Regent vs. Guthrie

Although attendance rates have more than doubled in the ten years of the URT's existence, and performances were up to 284 last year, Henriot said he would like to see the Regent become similar to the Guthrie Theater in Minneapolis, where attendance reaches 60,000 in ten weeks, including audiences beyond city limits.

"I'd like to see a homey yet elegant atmosphere of the art here," he explained, "where people go barefoot and levied and leather-jacketed, sitting next to men in tuxedos."

Urban extension plan

University begins focus on metropolitan problems

Editor's note: The following is taken from "The University, the City and the New Day," an article by Chancellor William P. Tolley, which appeared in "Event, a Journal of Public Affairs" in 1966.

Universities are still dedicated primarily to instruction and research. Nevertheless, they respond to the needs of the times, deal with emerging pressures and possibilities of contemporary life, and transform themselves in serving a changing society.

Yet it would be a serious error to describe the university as responding chameleon-like to the environment in which it is set. It is leader and creator as well as servant.

Integrated with a basic group of academic courses, instruction in the arts in the university setting provides a balanced and enriching educational experience for more and more of our citizens.

Some 63 percent of the population of the United States is now residing in 216 metropolitan areas. By 1990 it probably will be between 80 and 90 percent. It is estimated that practically all the growth in population projected for the next 25 years will take place in metropolitan areas.

With this tremendous concentration of human resources in our cities, the urban university should be the prime mover and source of significant new developments in higher education. The challenge posed by urban blight, traffic, noise, and ethnic and racial tensions, the special problems of elementary and secondary education in the central city, and the new opportunities in the performing arts are not likely to be ignored indefinitely.

Urban universities are just beginning to focus their attention on urban or metropolitan problems. To be sure extension or adult education divisions have been interested for a long time. Generally speaking, however, leaders in adult education have not had great influence with university faculties. The faculty is the center of power in a university, and it moves with deliberate speed. Only recently have faculties, and then with some misgivings, put their stamp of approval on international programs. If this was in part because of the size of Federal appropriations and the availability of generous financial support, similar interest in urban problems may follow the massive Federal grants to combat poverty and to help the disadvantaged in metropolitan areas.

In some university programs concern for social action is not balanced by an equal concern for objectivity of approach and a reliance on research. There is a tendency to prejudge social situations, to confuse the role of educator and propagandist, to condone emotional responses to emotional problems, to insist that human needs cannot wait for either objectivity or the findings of research.

The success of land grant universities through extension services to farmers suggests that perhaps they should now turn to the cities to perform a similar role for metropolitan communities. Unfortunately, the land grant colleges are usually located in rural areas. Moreover, their experience in extension has not been with urban problems.

Even if we turn from the land grant to the urban university, the analogy should be used with care. The services provided to agriculture through extension services were more easily focused than can possibly be true of urban extension services. Agricultural extension was concerned primarily with the production and marketing of agricultural products. As a result the services had immediate application to the livelihood of the farmer aided, and in general were willingly accepted.

In the case of urban extension the services which might be provided are usually not related to the profession of the people involved. Rather such services have to be relevant to all aspects of metropolitan life. They could range all the way from aid in the preparation of urban renewal plans to the provision of pre-school education and homemaking advice. Their range, therefore, does not lend itself to the concentration of university resources on any single need. Further, there is much less readiness on the part of the recipients to see the need for such assistance or to seek it.

...Urban extension should begin with specific fields. Urban teachers programs are examples of what a university might do specifically for its local community. Programs for training professionals in other areas would also be helpful. A case in point would be a program which tries to relate architectural design to the needs and desires of the disadvantaged in a particular segment of the city. Another possibility is the social work profession. Certainly there is a critical need for imaginative new approaches to the training of social workers.

Urban or metropolitan studies are now a part of the educational program of urban universities. One wonders why it took us so long to discover the importance of urban problems. Perhaps we forgot that in meeting our responsibilities we cannot disregard those in our front yard.

No one can blame the universities for the ugliness of our cities or the complexity of their problems. But if the problems are to be solved and the cities made beautiful, it will be through the leadership and service of the urban university and particularly through the programs of adult education.

Now that the Federal government has recognized that the involved domestic problems are those of its metropolitan areas, there is a fresh sense of hope. The commitment of the Federal government under Title I of the Higher Education Act of 1965 to adult or continuing education...may...prove to be news of the greatest significance for urban communities,

Construction prof to lecture here

Neal Mitchell, professor of construction at Harvard University's Graduate School of Design and head of Neal Mitchell Associates, will give a public lecture at 8 p.m. Friday in Grant Auditorium.

Mitchell's topic is "The System Approach to Low Cost Housing." He has developed a scheme called the "Mitchell Framing System" which includes three basic elements–columns, beams, and floor-roof slabs–all of precast light weight foam concrete.

Mitchell will illustrate his lecture with slides. Several prototypes of his framing system have been built in South America. In this country, three demonstration town houses using the system are being built in Lancaster, Pa.

Neal Mitchell Associates is a team of architects, engineers, planners, system analysts and social researchers headed by MItchell.

D. Kenneth Sargent, dean of the Syracuse University School of Architecture, said Mitchell's lecture should interest many persons concerned and interested in low cost housing.

difficulties which have been emanating from our lack of urban planning. The solutions for the difficulty should then be directed at the source–U.S. foreign policy which places us in military fryin pans–rather than at some distant manifestation of the real problem. A change in the policy of being world policeman, for example, would be a good start.

For those who really do have a personal conflict with military life, I would suggest a return to the idea originally presented by John Kennedy (and then retracted as a result of the opposition of Richard Nixon in 1960) that an alternative form of service be provided, such as Peace Corps or VISTA.

Countries such as France, which like Switzerland has a universal military obligation, have employed a system of alternative service and seem to have found it workable. There is no reason that the United States could not do the same, thus preventing the necessity of a professional army and at the same time allowing our energies to be directed at real problems.

director, of "complete and total enchantment with...guerilla warfare among classes."

Walsh said that the CATC was implementing the ideas of sociologist Saul D. Alinsky, who had developed similar programs to rid Chicago of areas of slum living. He charged that Alinsky's theories were "based solely on the principle of conflict for co flict's sake," and that Dr. Ha gstrom was using Alinsky's methods in the CATC attempt to move into public housing.

In July, 1965, it was announced that a non-profit organization of local citizens had taken over the direction of the six community action organizations which had been formed by the CATC. Known as the Syracuse Community Development Association (SCDA), the group was now in charge of the anti-poverty program.

Chancellor Tolley stated in the July, 1965, "Summer Orange" that CATC's original mentor, University College, had merely served as "a temporary umbrella for the entire program including social action."

The month of July also saw the House of Representatives considering the SU anti-poverty program–the Republicans were fighting the expansion of the War on Poverty, and needed an example. Their attempt to give state governors veto power over such programs as CATC was defeated by the House Democrats who said their proposed amendment threatened academic freedom by giving state officials power of review over university activities.

An August, 1965, issue of "U.S. News and World Report" discussed the CATC program in an article entitled: "A Poverty-War Project Under Fire: Training School for Agitators." Along similar lines, Mayor Walsh charged that the program was fostering teenage crime.

An incident involving two CATC trainees who had been arrested as demonstrators at the County Welfare Department, again caused comment in the House of Representatives.

Anti-poverty funds had been used as bail money for the two, causing Mayor Walsh to call for aninvestigation into the legality of such a move.

OEO head Shriver approved the CATC action, stating that the organization's budget provided for such use. At this time, however, a CATC probe was being considered by the House Committee on Education and Labor, headed by Rep. Adam Clayton Powell. This probe was still in question in October, and was put off indefinitely the following month.

A Nov. 30, 1965 "Herald Journal" article reported that Mayor Walsh was attempting to block CATC (which had been granted a one-month extension of its original nine-month authorization) from receiving future federal grants.

In a reported statement, Walsh told Rep. James M. Hanley: "You can perform a major service for this community by becoming directly involved in saving $500,000 in federal funds which will be wasted if granted to CATC." Walsh's wish was not granted, as a three-month renewal of $111,657 in federal funds was granted to CATC in December.

Accusing the program of bringing in outside agitators, Walsh condemned the extension, saying: "The bulk of the grant is used to pay fat salaries to staff members of CATC. Not one cent is used directly to alleviate the conditions of any public welfare recipient in our community."

Further blasting CATC, Walsh said: "Its concept, its purpose and its methods are totally alien to our American way of life. It is a disgrace and should be discontinued."

The battle raged on throughout December as the SCDA was told to go to the local Crusade for Opportunity for assistance–and refused. The SCDA and the People's War Council Against Poverty claimed the Crusade did not represent the poor and was backed by City Hall. Their protests included two trips to Washington, D.C., and one to the Texas "White House" in attempts to gain recognition for their cause.

The expiration of the three-month CATC extension in March, 1966, was accompanied by the announcement of the awarding of a "terminal" grant of $187,312 in federal funds which were to be used to "phase out" the program.

Consequently, the CATC, which had been plagued by as much internal dissension as external resistance, slowly but surely faded from the scene–a cooperative city-SU venture which received little cooperation.

the facility and the professional staff to organize the program. It reflects extremely well on the university."

By this time, the Peck Hall snack bar was nearly filled with well-dressed men. A woman in purple with lots of jewelery sat alone looking a little lost. Mrs. Maria Farr of the Syracuse Common Council smiled when she heard her name and explained her miid dismay saying that her fellow Council member Mrs. Norma Coburn, the only other woman in the Roundtable was ill and not present. Mrs. Farr held her own though and indicated she had known most of the men before she joined the group.

There were no women in the Roundtable in 1965. The two Council members were asked to join only after a protest from the National Organization of Women (NOW), the same group that picketed the Hotel Syracuse when it wouldn't allow women in its bar.

The speaker of the day was George Schuster, executive director of the Syracuse Community Housing Development Corporation, an agency which gives financial aid to deserving families to acquire housing. He explained the housing situation in the city and the potential for progress through state and federal legislation.

During the speech, several reporters scratched busily and a television camerman filmed the speaker. When Schuster's talk finished, some men slipped off to busy offices across the city and others stayed to ask questions. The meeting adjourned at 9:30, the usual time.

One of the last to leave was the Rev. Harvey Bates, a SU chaplain. When asked to evaluate the Roundtable, Bates said it had its "high points, but every once and a while you feel like you're getting a pro forma situation."–something said for a matter of form. Asked what the high points were, he responded, "some people really open up."

Transportation Institute receives additional funds

The newly-established Urban Transportation Institute at Syracuse University has received additional funding of $50,000 from the U.S. Department of Transportation, Guthrie S. Birkhead, director of the Metropolitan Studies Program in the S.U. Maxwell Graduate School of Citizenship and Public Affairs, announced today.

The Institute, originally established under a $100,000 grant from the Department of Housing and Urban Development, will admit its first students in September, 1969.

David R. Miller, assistant professor of economics at the Maxwell School, is executive director of the new program of training and research in urban transportation.

"The Maxwell School at Syracuse University is particularly suited for this institute, because it is in a medium-sized city," Miller said last month. "There are more Syracuses in the country than there are New York Cities or Philadelphias. The situations we can study here are more typical than those in very large cities."

The Urban Transportation Institute will train scholars and personnel for local, state and federal transportation agencies and private transportation concerns. Its research will focus on the relationship between transportation systems and comprehensively planned development of urban areas.

An Urban Transportation Committee, composed of faculty members from political science, economics, civil engineering, architecture planning and sociology, will formulate general policies for the institute, award fellowships and select research projects.

"One of the projects we might undertake would study mass transportation systems in several cities," Miller said. "We would try to determine what things persuade people to use or not use the systems now in operation – such things as speed of the system, closeness to the user's departure point and destination, how frequently the system is available and price of service.

"Another project we are considering would study how decisions are made about the allocation of public funds for transportation improvements, and why sometimes one mode of transportation is favored over another," Miller said.

"We are also planning to set up a training program for people already working in urban transit planning and development," he said.

Miller, who as executive director will be responsible for the day-to-day operations of the institute, received his bachelor's degree at Temple University, his master's and doctoral degrees from Northwestern University.

He held fellowships at Northwestern under the National Defense Education Act and the National Science Foundation. He joined the Syracuse University faculty in 1966.

The Metropolitan Studies Program, under which the institute will operate, was founded in 1962 as one of the first programs in the country combining several academic disciplines organized with a focus on urban studies. In its first five years more than 100 students have graduated. About half of them now hold positions in federal, state and local governments, and the others in academic institutions.

Members of the Urban Transportation Committee are: Jesse V. Burkhead, professor of economics; Max R. Bloom, professor of real estate and urban land economics; Paul J. Brennan, professor of civil engineering and chairman of the department; Robert J. Bartels, associate professor of architecture planning; William Pooler, assistant professor of sociology, and Miller, with Birkhead as chairman.

theirs, but the SAT's are white language-oriented. With lower scores, these black students are almost automatically considered academic risks, and are therefore not admitted.

One main task of the Committee is to convince the administration that these risks must be taken, according to Ruhe, and that once the University commits itself to taking these risks, it must recognize and be able to spend time developing those skills to which the black student is oriented.

Another major problem is finances. Ruhe said there is a critical $1,000 which is not available to the black students seeking admission.

In a rough break-down estimate, Ruhe stated out of the $3,900 which the financial aids department feels is the average cost of a year of schooling, $1,000 can be gotten from a source such as an NDEA loan, another $900 from a campus job and another $1,000 from scholar incentive or the Educational Opportunities Grant.

This totals $2,900, the last $1,000 consistently lacking. To the black student, this money often is an insurmountable obstacle, and should be provided by the University, he said.

Another point in the MHEC program is the admission of the academically handicapped black student. The Freshman Action Committee already is working on a special summer orientation program for incoming black students to identify specific problems. Similar projects, much farther along in development, have been established at Oswego State, Cortland State and Cornell University, said Ruhe.

Enrollment of the American Indian student also is under consideration by the committee. Peace Corps and Vista workers, according to Ruhe, plan to go into reservations throughout New York State and meet with tribal councils.

Two problems for Indian students, he said, are culture shock and alienation. Ruhe believes remedial programs must be established which are sensitive to Indian heritage, and these students should be allowed to form their own community within the student community.

Ruhe feels the University, particularly financial aids and admissions, are progressing but in the long run they can do little until the upper administration is ready to officially sanction these "academic risks," he said.

Above all, Ruhe and his committee want to "make sure that the University acknowledges the diversity of culture" among these students, and that it does not exclude them out of a fear that these students will cause the standards of the school to lag.

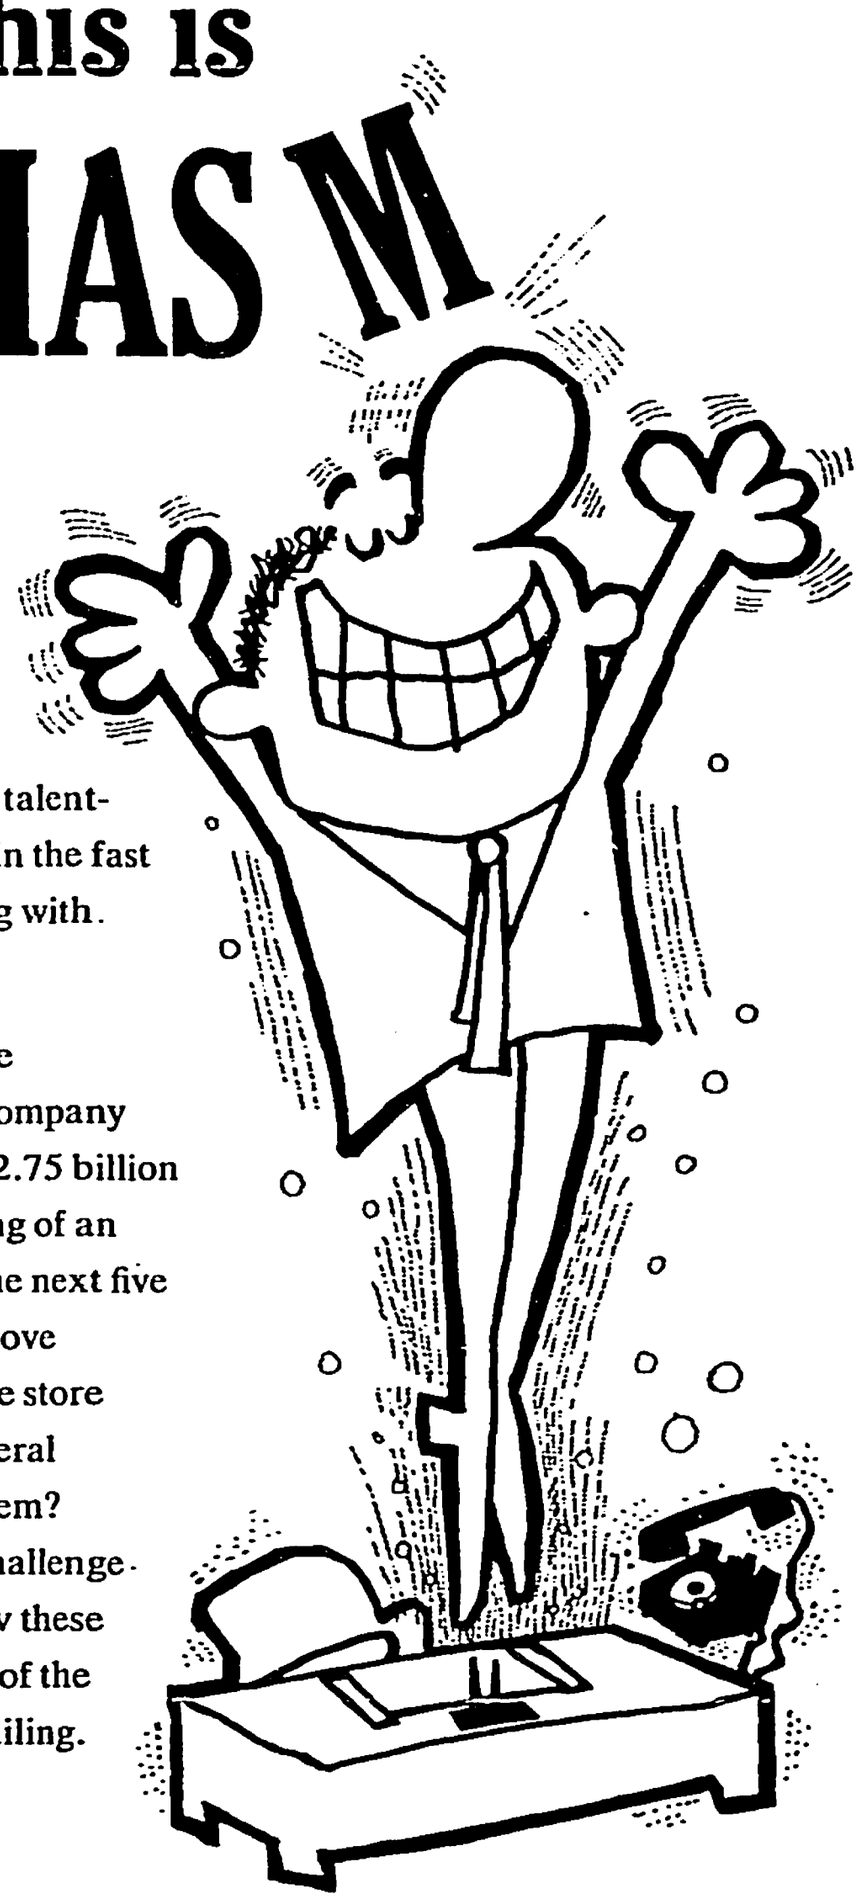
New carnival set for Mar. 1 at Song Mt.

By CHARLES SHAPIRO

What is believed to be the first campus-wide winter carnival is being sponsored by the Junior Class on March 1 at Song Mountain. Two to three thousand people are expected to participate.



For the 1000 skiers who are expected, activities begin at 9 a.m. when lifts open. The main outdoor event is a slalom race. Every living center may enter three-member teams in one of these categories: Men's large dorms, men's small dorms, fraternities, women's large dorms, women's small dorms, and sororities. Prizes will be awarded to each team category winner as well as to individual winners. An engraved trophy will be presented to the dual team winners from the men's and women's divisions. In addition, there will be a beer party for the winners at Song Mountain on Sunday, March 2, from 2-5 p.m.

Carnival games will begin at 1 p.m. These include a snowshoe obstacle course race, tray sliding, saucer sliding, a three-legged race, a beer race, a Gelande jumping contest, and many others.

For both the skiers and non-skiers, there will be a continuous party from 1 p.m. to 1 a.m. Music will be provided by the Eastern Graille from 1-5, the Soda Ash Six from 5-9 p.m., and the Jam Factory from 9 to 1.

Information about the Carnival has been posted in each dorm. Buses to Song Mountain will leave Sims every half-hour beginning at 12:30 p.m. Details about buses for skiers leaving at 9 a.m. will be published in a future issue of the Daily Orange. Tickets for Winter Carnival '69 will be on sale Monday at HBC at $7.00 for skiers and $2.50 for non-skiers.

Orange hustles off to Buffalo in search of 3rd straight win

By LARRY CENTER

The improving Syracuse Orangemen will try to mount their second three-game winning streak of the season tomorrow night when they travel to Buffalo to face Canisius.

The Golden Griffins are 5-10 on the year, having lost to Villanova Wednesday night, 75-54. Before that, though, they lost to Manhattan by just three and beat Niagara by 10. They will have a big home court advantage, since SU always finds it tough to win in the Buffalo Civic Auditorium.

Canisius relies heavily on Captain Tony Masiello, a 6-4 forward who averaged 18.2 points and 10.5 rebounds last year. This season he's hitting at near 20 a game. Alternating at the other forward are Dave Mack and Tim Richardson.

Senior Tom Hardiman, who plays good defense and has an accurate long jump shot, and Roger Brown, start in the backcourt.

The Griffins' biggest problem is a lack of height. Center Tom Pasternak, at 6-6, is their tallest man. This is the same weakness Colgate had, and Bill Smith should have another field day hitting the boards.

Bob MacKinnon's club was 7-17 last year, but one of their victories was a 66-65 trim of Syracuse here at Manley.

Coach Roy Danforth, after the one-point win over Colgate, said, "We're improving every game now. We're running better and rebounding, controlling the boards better." The coach thought "we played real well the first half, but their press bothered us a little the second half."

He was happy to escape with the narrow victory, since SU-Colgate games are always so unpredictable: "They've got a fine ball club and some good, smart boys. If they had a big man, they'd really be tough."

The Orange gain in recent games is reflected in the more balanced scoring. Smith has his average up to almost 18 and Bob Kouwe, who had 27 Wednesday night, is hitting at 14.7. Ernie Austin, who had an off-shooting night at Hamilton but played good defense and made some fine passes, and John Suder, are both near 10 a game.

CENTER TAPS: Canisius leads in the series, 23-18...MacKinnon, after an outstanding cage career at Canisius, played pro ball with both the Brooklyn Dodgers and the Syracuse Nats...Their last great year was '64, when the Griffins were 19-6, second in the NIT, and MacKinnon was Eastern Coach of the Year...Smith is shooting at 56.5 from the field and Kouwe 86.7 from the line... WAER will broadcast the varsity contest and preceding frosh game...Orange hope to establish momentum for Wednesday's game with sixth-ranked St. Johns.

Wrestling battle is a 'minor' conflict

THE WINTER OF OUR DISCONTENT. Several ex-members of the wrestling team voiced their disapproval of the coaching methods of Ed Carlin, although current team members were not as harsh in their comments. The controversy continues, and in the middle of it lie the policies of the athletic department toward minor sports. (Photo by Biggar)

By MIKE WEBER

Ed. note-this is the last of a three part series about the current problems of the wrestling program. The author, Mike Weber, conducted 21 interviews over a two week period

The stage has been set in this series on the current wrestling squabbles for a summation and evaluation of the problem.

What appears to shape up are two smaller skirmishes taking place within a broad scale conflict between the Syracuse University Athletic Department and all "minor" sports on campus.

One skirmish involves the chastisement of the ex-team members by those remaining active. The second involves the direct and indirect criticism by former and current team members levelled against their coach, Ed Carlin.

The dispute between Carlin and his wrestlers cannot be separeated from the SUAD-minor sports battle. As pointed out by co-captain Joe Palmieri, Carlin has the severe obstacle of apathy to overcome before he can begin coaching. A formidable hindrance to be sure, but nevertheless, one which must be overcome, or better still, eradicated.

Apparently, this is where Carlin has failed most drastically. When his charges needed strong leadership, most claim they found little. A general lack of respect permeated the team until the break occured.

When talking with Carlin about the situation in which he finds himself, one is almost compelled to feel a certain amount of honest sympathy. He appears to be a man who has been completely defeated by the "system" at Syracuse.

Carlin admits, "I'm handicapped here. I can't do for the boys what I'd like to do. I'm frustrated and disgusted the same as they."

However, while feeling compassion, one also has to wonder whether Carlin is emotionally drained and exhausted. If so, the answer to the problem could possibly lie in a new coach. Perhaps a staff change could revive the lagging morale of the team and bring about a concentrated effort to deal with the athletic department, which appears to lie at the heart of the issue.

Whatever is the eventual outcome of the coaching situation, one area remains in need of a drastic and immediate revamping. That, very simply, is an improved system of communication between the athletic department and the wrestling staff.

Jim Decker, the head of SUAD, believes that wrestling has gotten a fair deal. Decker commented, "We're doing as much or more for wrestling as we do for any of the other so-called minor sports."

Carlin however, sees things differently. "If they think they've done a lot for us," stated Carlin, "that is their opinion. For instance, we now get fewer scholarships now than we used to get."

Carlin feels that material examples of athletic department support are not the only way it can be shown. Carlin noted that as far as he knew, no wrestler who won a title in the Coast Guard tournament received any recognition from the athletic department.

Hopefully, these articles have brought into the open a problem which has been simmering for some time. Hopefully, the copies of the DO in which these articles appeared will find a more suitable resting place than adorning a waste basket bottom.

Is it inconceivable to hope that there are people on this campus who have interests which go beyond d dollar signs? Is it outside the realm of sanity to believe that enough people are upset about the lackluster picture of "minor" sports at Syracuse to demand a review?

Where does the blame lie here? Is it with Carlin and his alleged coaching shortcomings? With the wrestlers who may be guilty of a poor attitude? With the athletic department and their apparent devevil-may-care attitude towards wrestling and minor sports in general?

Co-captain John Terboss summed up the situation quite well when he said, "There's something very wrong with the whole picture here. I hope somebody puts their finger on it before another year goes by."

Swimming and wrestling here

Heavy weekend for SU

A full slate of action is on tap for Syracuse teams this weekend. On the home front are the swimming, wrestling and track teams. The symnastics squad leaves for a two meet road trip, and the fencing and ski teams will be traveling as well.

The swimmers, now 4-1 under coach Jon Buzzard, will meet Pittsburgh in the Archbold pool Saturday at 2 p.m. The Orange will be back near full strength this week, with the return of freestylers Dave Crockenberg and Gerry Gagliardi. Both missed last week's loss to Bucknell because of law boards.

The wrestlers, who will be hosting Pitt at the Field House at 2, will be bolstered by the return of Vinnie Paolano. A sophomore, he has been injured for all of this season, after going undefeated as a frosh. The team beat Ithaca on Wednesday night, and now stands at 2-5.

Fresh from a triangular win last week, the track team entertains Colgate and Cornell in what should be an extremely close meet. Coach Bob Grieve predicts that the mile in the Friday night action will be one of the highlights of the indoor season. Larry Zuller, who won last week in 4:18, will carry the SU banner in that race.

The gymnastics team, with a 1-3 record, travels to the University of Massachusetts on Friday night and to Springfield on Saturday. George Stalter, a sophomore on the still rings, gave the Orange their only first place in the loss to Penn State last weekend. Ernie Santangelo, the team captain, is the only other consistent performer on the team.

Utica College will face the SU ski team in a meet at Old Forge, N.Y. It is a two-day affair that will not end until Sunday.

The fencers will be at Rochester Institute of Technology on Saturday, while the rifle team will shoot it out with Siena here in Syracuse.

Students contest policies seen as restricting rights

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

The power of the students' voice on SU's campus could possibly be broadened after the introduction of dormitory autonomy and in loco parentis proposals at Friday's meeting of the Council on Student Life (CSL).

With the passage of these two bills, students would have legitimate power to determine their own social, academic and cultural laws of the University.

The dormitory autonomy proposal states that each University dorm be allowed to determine its own rules through Inter-Dormitory Council. The students would thus have the right to "run" their dorms--making their own decisions on the allowance of drinking, visiting hours, etc.

Feldman Philosophy

CSL member Ed Feldman will present a six-page philosophy, "In Defense of Dorm Autonomy" at Friday's meeting which calls for a change in the in loco parentis situation. Feldman says the University must re-evaluate this theory and change its position from a controller-protector of the student to an advisor-protector.

According to the present theory of in loco parentis, the University assumes parental control of students and is also responsible for the actions of students. Such workings gives the University the right to decide upon curfew limits, drinking laws, meal times, etc. On the other hand, the University can sometimes prevent the issuance of civil action directly on the student, but carries the task of disciplinary decisions itself.

Changes of the in loco parentis theory as presented by Feldman are dependent upon the dorm autonomy proposal's acceptance. If the University refuses to allow students to make their own dorm rules, it is obvious that they will not be permitted to determine their general rules on campus. It is most probable, also, that the effect of the change of in loco parentis would be realized through dorm rules.

Students' Rights

Thus, the crux of both proposals is students' rights. Neither proposal would necessarily change University regulations, but would change the relation of the University to the student. Instead of the University enforcing rules and regulations upon students, the students themselves would be enforcing their own rules, according to majority rule. The students would be making their own decisions with the University acting in an advisory capacity.

Although the dorm autonomy issue has been presented to SU students and has received a favorable response, the in loco parentis proposal has not been publicized to the campus. Feldman admits that he is "railroading" the proposal. But, he claims that the student has the chance to accept or not to accept policies on an individual basis under his proposal.

"Now," Feldman emphasized, "students must accept University policy." He wants the campus to have the privilege of a choice of policy according to the will of the majority.

So, will such proposals be passed by the scrutinizing eyes of administration members of CSL and the other student members? "I haven't the vaguest idea." said Feldman. "But, I hope so."

A Council on Student Life subcommittee yesterday held a second hearing on "the quality of life of minority students on campus." Yesterday's session followed the pattern of last Wednesday's hearing (above), which appeared congenial and open.

CSL's black hearings show progress hints

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

About 40 black students and a Council on Student Life subcommittee yesterday completed the second of a dual session of hearings on "the quality of life of minority students on campus."

Yesterday's hearing, like last Wednesday's, was conducted in an apparently congenial atmosphere, as black students wound up their formal list of general grievances and recommendations.

What results from these hearings now depends in large measure upon smaller meetings between black student representatives and Dean of Student Service Jim G. Carleton, who is also chairman of the CSL.

These meetings will be designed to get down to "specifics" that Dean Carleton and the CSL can then channel to administrators able to correct grievances and institute recommendations.

Already, however, progress has been made in at least three areas discussed at the first hearing, CSL members told black students yesterday.

These include Food Service and the Men's Gym, which black students charged with discriminatory practices, and University housing.

Several CSL members said they had been assured by Food Service officials that the alleged discrimination, which was said to consist of checking black students in dining hall lines while allowing white students to pass through, "would not be repeated."

Prof. Benjamin P. Burtt reported that he had spoken to administrators of the Men's Gym and found that official rules regulating checking procedures there permitted gym employes to request ID's from those not wearing issued gym uniforms and from those who appear younger than University-student age.

These checks, according to Burtt, are aimed at keeping non-University members out of the gym. It was charged last Wednesday that a number of black students were being checked when entering the gym while white non-students entered unchecked.

Black students at the first hearing also requested a more conscientious effort by the administration to allow black students to have black roommates if they choose. Dean of Women Marjorie Smith reported yesterday that a black student has been chosen to sit on a committee which will draw up housing plans for next fall.

Two additional items were put on the list of grievances yesterday, involving athletic department practices and

SU Senate opens fire

Does ROTC belong on this campus?

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

Syracuse may join the growing number of universities that have shot down controversial ROTC programs.

University Senate's agenda committee fired that first volley yesterday by recommending that ROTC be excluded from the College of Liberal Arts and be made a separate department.

The committee will present its suggestion at tomorrow afternoon's full Senate meeting.

George J. Alexander, professor of law and chairman of the agenda committee, said the report will also recommend studies of the value of military science courses here and the justificaiton for their academic credit.

Stanford University's Academic Senate voted last Thursday to eliminate academic credit for military training and education, beginning with the 1970 freshman class. The 25-8 vote followed recommendations of a five-month study by a faculty-student committee.

Also last week, Bowdoin College's governing board asked the school's president to negotiate with the Army to end ROTC's academic credit on that campus in Brunswick, Maine.

One major objection raised against ROTC is that the University has no jurisdiction over its curriculum. According to Army regulation 145-5, "ROTC instructor personnel will conduct only courses of instruction prescribed by the Department of the Army."

ROTC courses are the only ones here which exclude foreign students of certain nationalities or require a loyalty oath.

Despite the word "reserve" in the program's title, ROTC is officially recognized as a primary source of long-term career and regular officers-producing twice as many of them as West Point.

Last month, a Cornell University commission on military training recommended that ROTC be removed from control of military personnel and placed in regular academic departments without credit.

The commission also urged that military drills and indoctrination be relegated to extra-curriculum status or to a summer activity, and that the practice of granting faculty standing to military instructors be discontinued.

The commission, composed of student, faculty and administration representatives, was appointed by Cornell's president. It said courses on drill and "indoctrination should not be considered as suitable for a university."

The study also found it "unacceptable that active military personnel teach courses with political and policy content"--such as military history, national security and others on strategy.

Cornell and many other universities include ROTC as a means of fulfilling their obligation to the Federal Government under the Land Grant Act of 1862, also known as the Morrill Act.

This month, Yale's faculty voted to take academic credit away from ROTC and to strip officers of their professional rank. Yale accredited ROTC for 50 years before a faculty committee reported that "ROTC is like singing in the Whiffenpoofs--a perfectly fine activity, but one that we don't think merits any academic standing."

Meanwhile, here at Syracuse, anti-ROTC

Six radicals in search of an issue

Narrator: Ladies and gentlemen, it is our pleasure tonight on WAER, We Are Everlasting Radio, to present six campus radicals who will air their views so that the older generation may glimpse the thinking of the Now Generation. At the request of our guests, there will be no structure to tonights program, only a spontaneous exchange of opinions. Would our guests like to make an initial statement?

Radicals, in unision: "We are the victims of petrified institutions in a racist, imperialistic society which represses our liberating energies. The system is so corrupt and incapable of change that change can come about only through Creative disorder. Since there should be greater communication between the sexes, we will take the chicks into our dormitory rooms and LOCK the doors!"

Narrator: Doesn't your dormitory have visitation hours?

Radicals: "Yeh. The administration really cut the ground out from under us on that one."

Narrator: What other burning issues are you committed to?

Radicals: "We intend to purge the hypocrisy and double-standards of our parents from our souls. Our fathers claim they are against war. Yet they fought in World War II, and one admitted that when he was 12 he joined a rumble between two street gangs on Chicago's East Side.

Narrator: Didn't you engage in battle with the Chicago Police recently?

Radicals: "Yes, but that's different. The Chicago Police were kind enough to assist us in our endeavor to divide the country and radicalize the population. Chicago, New York, San Francisco—it really doesn't matter where we confront the Establishment. It's rotten all over.

Narrator: But in the confrontation situations you provoke, what specifically is it you hope to accomplish?

Radicals: "The situation gets specific enough when the fuzz arrive bearing nightsticks."

Narrator: True enough. But you sould as if the reason of for a confrontation is to get your heads cracked.

RAdicals: "Of course. Though we don't expect you to understand, that is the climax of the Movement."

Part One—Dorms in revolt

Secession

By Bob Tembeckjian

"Good evening. This is WAER news, reporting on the latest word concerning the 'dorm autonomy' issue which has raged on the Syracuse campus for the last few weeks.

"Tonight, only weeks after the University granted all dorms the right to make their own decisions concerning liquor, visitation, and other issues, unrest has been reported.

"Day and Flint Halls have issued a joint proclamation declaring their secession from Syracuse University. We have no word on which other living centers plan to join the secession.

"The proclamation, which was drawn up by the presidents of Day and Flint, was endorsed unanimously by their dorm councils and supported by well over 90% of the Mount residents in a referendum three days ago. It read in part that the women of this university have been dealt with unfairly by the Office of the Dean of Women and we can no longer tolerate injustice. We are tired of excessively severe punishments for petty offenses.

"Chancellor William P. Tolley stated moments after the announcement that 'secession at the University is a privilege and not a right. The University has not granted anyone the privilege of walking out on this united campus. Only the administration determines who stays and who goes.'

"As a direct reaction to the secession, Dean of Women Marjorie Smith suspended the entire Mount population. When UJB Chief Justice Paul Snyder demanded a list of and jurisdiction over the suspendees, Dean Smith, with a broad smile on her face, handed Snyder a list with over 2000 names.

"In a strategy meeting last night, SG President Chuck Hicks addressed the Flint and Day dorm councils.

"I'm with you baby, if you don't run out. I'll bust my head if that's whatchu want. Butchu gotta know whatchu want, people. You gotta know.'

"Inspired by Hicks' statement, the councils decided to secede immediately--in the dead of winter--rather than wait for pleasant spring weather. That turned out to be a crucial decision, for when Chancellor Tolley attempted to climb the Mount this afternoon to talk with the dissidents, he was met with a barrage of snowballs. He turned back after climbing only eleven steps.

"The first overt sign of revolution came early this moring when a vigilante group of Mount women abducted the members of the Food Service Office and forced them to eat their own product.

"Chancellor Tolley immediately said that such hostilities would not be tolerated and that he would attempt to settlement only after the Food Service people were returned. However, the group has not been heard from since that meal.

"It is rumored the Chancellor has requested the presence of the National Guard on campus 'to prepare for any eventualities.' This act follows the failure of the ROTC to recover possession of the Mount. They, too, were met by a barrage of snowballs when they tried to crawl up the hill. Using Dean Smith to walk up the steps as a decoy, three ROTC commando units, known as the Pink Berets, tried to take the Mount by surprise from the rear. The attempt was foiled by an alert freshman who spotted the invaders and warned her confederates.

"In the closing paragraph of their proclamation, the secessionists wrote that 'we are firm in our beliefs and united in our purpose. We shall meet the administration on its own battlefield, the Quad, if they wish open confrontation. But we will not talk with those who refuse to listen. And in order to facilitate more unity among our ranks, we have renamed our home from the administration's choice of Mount Olympus to a more suitable, egalitarian name, Mount Hicks.'"

Letters to the editor

'M' Street

To the Editor:

I write to the entire student body as well as the editor of this paper. For some time I have been concerned with the artificially high prices of the Marshall street complex and the manner in which students are treated by some of the merchants there. This concern has been from the position I hold in regard to student services.

But as a student I ask what recourse I have in the following case: my shirts have been laundered by the 7 Hr. Cleaners for some time. Recently four of six shirts were returned with a one quarter-inch slit slightly above the left cuff of each shirt. The cleaners refuse to correct the problem--they claim they didn't do the damage. So "Whodunnit?" No one else has cleaned my shirts for several months. The man said that he guessed I'd have to get a lawyer.

Well, people, that's the story. It represents about $20 worth of shirts. The man knows I wrote this letter--he didn't think it would make any difference. What can I do?

Autonomy

To the Editor:

I would like to clarify the basic intent of the dorm autonomy proposal. Various persons have made charges that dorm autonomy is a political gambit, a collection of nonsense, an irresponsible anti-paternalistic revolt, and merely a new imposition of regulation, now by Student Senate and IDC. None of these speak the truth. Unfortunately, the DO has not published the entire proposal, nor has it been possible to provide copies to the campus at large. Therefore, the student body has not had the information necessary to refute these charges. Through dorm meetings an attempt has been made to inform the students of the proposal's content.

Quite simply, the proposal gives the students the right to decide for themselves what regulations they shall live under and delegates to them the responsibility for the enforcement of those rules. Autonomy does not mean dorms will have academic and cultural programming, will have drinking, or will have visitation hours. Rather, it places these affairs in the hands of the students on a dorm by-dorm basis. Under the present system, the administration, through the legal mechanism of In Loco Parentis, imposes arbitrarily all academic, governmental and social regulations on the students. The students are not given the opportunity nor the freedom to assume the responsibility and experience the fulfillment or self-regulation and self-government. Autonomy seeks to reverse this policy and hand to the students the control of and responsibility for the rules governing their behavior. This is an educational institution and as Dooley said, "self-government remains the purest form of education."

Golan: 'Israel has no chance of peace while present Arab leaders in power'

By IRA SILVERMAN

"As long as Nasser is in power in Egypt, I believe Israel doesn't have any chance of reaching a compromise and peace in the Middle East. He wants to go back to the times before the establishment of Israel," according to a young Israeli leader.

Speaking on the topic of "Peace in the Middle East -- A Dream of Reality?," Amnon Golan told a crowd of about 150 people at Sunday night's Hillel dinner that "Israel now for the first time does not face a dangerous situation of war."

Golan, director of the Overseas Student Programs of the Tel Aviv University, said that the information that we get in the United States concerning the situation in the Middle East through television, radio, and newspapers shows that Israel is in a bad situation. "But in Israel this is not so," he explains.

"Things changed after the six-day war in 1967," Golan continued. "The entire Sinai Peninsula is under Israeli control. Whereas we had only three minutes to prepare for a secret attack by the Arabs before the war, now we have 45 minutes."

Golan, who joined with David Ben Gurion, Moshe Dayan and Shimon Peres in 1965 in forming the Rafai Party, came to America in 1966 to study at California State College, where he received an M.A. in government.

Golan said Israel's first concern is to exist, thus a primary concern is the ability to defend itself.

"Israel will not just give up the occupied territory," Golan assured his audience. "We will then face the fear of war every day. We will pull back only if secure and definite borders would make things safe."

After expressing his fears that peace is impossible if Nasser remains in power, Golan said that the situation of Hussein in Jordan "is even worse."

"Hussein is not really in power," commented Golan. "The guerrillas are in power. He is just a figurehead, but he can get more from the Western nations than the guerrillas can.

Golan said that people in the Middle East must be realistic. "This is the point of view of Israel's leaders. We don't have hawkish and dovish people. Everyone goes his own way to reach a compromise."

Golan concluded that "Israel will continue to keep the same policies. We won't give in even one inch unless we can achieve peace."

Sees university 'in a paradox'

Meiklejohn stresses need to cultivate students' impatience

By CHARLES SHAPIRO

Dr. Donald Meiklejohn, professor of philosophy, spoke on "The Culture of Impatience" at Sunday's service in Hendricks Chapel. His sermon was part of a monthly program begun last fall in which prominent campus personalities are invited to share the pulpit with the Dean of Hendricks Chapel John McCombe.

Meiklejohn viewed the university as "in a paradox." While not "a scene of action" itself, "it is the special garden for developing the impulse for action." He saw the academic function of the university as not merely providing a tactical educational training, but rather, "to present to young people...such an account of their world of the next sixty years that they will become desperate to be at the correcting of it," that they will have a "passion for setting things right."

While he noted that not provoking impatience was a failure of academic duty, Meiklejohn added, "so too we fail if impatience in not also subjected to culture, to refinement, to challenge and reflection," because students must become aware of society's failures. It is the academic responsibility of adults to "intellectualize that impatience," for "impatience without culture is mere vexation of spirit."

Meiklejohn said that in the past year impatience was notable among students as well as among faculty and administration. He added, "I think the lack of culture in the impatience of students often has been matched by a like lack of culture in the impatience of their elders.

Meiklejohn summarized the feelings of faculty and administrators "in the presence of really urgent and impatient student demands." "Where once we worried because they cared so little, now we tremble that they care so much." Rather than imposing academic burdens upon students, Meiklejohn saw the job of faculty and administration as helping "students as they learn to cultivate their impatience." Both students and teachers must learn "how to conserve and nourish the impulse to challenge and critize and also make it accurate and enduring."

DONALD MEIKLEJOHN

In order to stimulate this fiery impatience in students, Meiklejohn said that teachers must "do it by learning, by what we call the liberal arts." "...Not just the ceremonial decorations of the socially privileged, they are the essential ways in which impatience is channeled, disciplined, informed, made tough and durable." He noted that resistance turns impatience into "explosive frustration," while genuine cultivation is achieved with "techniques of infinite gentleness."

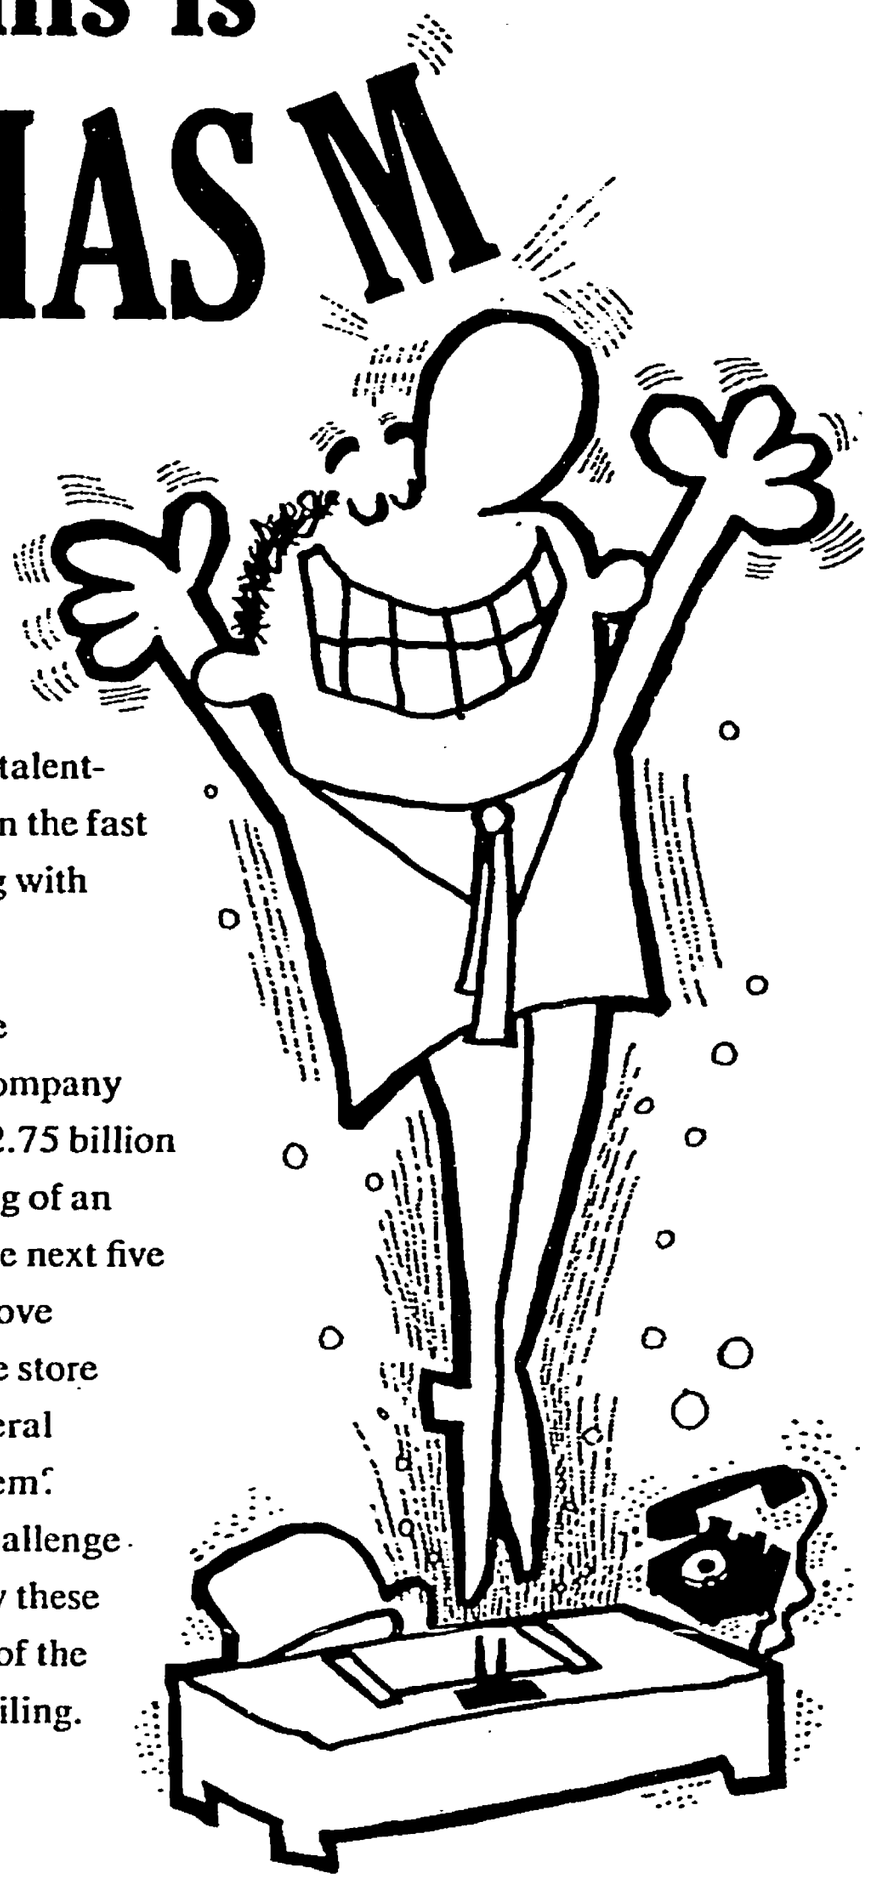
"We must expect our students, whether black or white, to be impatient with their teachers--or chaplains--as well as with our society."

Rather than repressing this impatience, Meiklejohn viewed the teachers' task as channeling it, to "make maximally effective the renovating impulse they convey annually to our society."

Biafran advocate will speak here

The Nigerian-Biafran Relief Committee announced yesterday that Paul Connett, head of the Keep Biafra Alive Organization, will speak at the University Tuesday, February 25, in Maxwell Auditorium After Connett's address, starting at 4 p.m. coffee will be served in the Founder's Room of Maxwell where there will be an informal discussion. Later, Connett will speak at the May Memorial Unitarian Church at 8 p.m. In addition to the address, Connett will show films of the Biafran situation.

Connett, 28 years old, obtained a BA and MA from Downing College, Cambridge, England. He concluded his formal education at Cornell University with two years of graduate study. After working extensively with the McCarthy campaign, he became interested in the Biafran situation. Currently, he is president of the Keep Biafra Alive Organization and works actively with those organizations engaged in transporting food and medical supplies to Biafra. Connett has conferred at length with people returning from Biafra, including many in the Peace Corps.



The local organization has recently begun to circulate a formal petition to President Nixon asking him to help end the Biafran situation. The wording of the petition has been approved by the Graduate Student Organization, the Executive Board of the American Association of University Professors, and the Student Senate which also offered to help circulate the petition. The local group hopes to stimulate a grass roots movement of opinion to influence the President.

The local group is a non-partisan, non-political organization trying to inform the public as to what is happening in Biafra. They feel that aid should be distributed also to the Nigerian people who are suffering because of the war. The group also is interested in raising funds to send to the organizations shipping food, medical supplies, and medical help to Biafra.

The Nigerian-Biafran Relief Committee started meeting in October with a core of six members. These six members staged the Biafra teach-in that occurred on Dec. 16. Since then the membership has swelled to thirty and associations have started with other such groups at Cornell and, also in the city of Rochester. The group has started a speaking program available for living centers, and has also inaugarated an exchange program with other universities. They are also working with LeMoyne and intend to work with local high schools.

The local committee has already received some donations and has sent them to religious and UN groups doing relief work.

Bailey criticizes suggestion to punish campus dissidents

Stephen Bailey, former dean of the Maxwell School, offered strong criticism last Friday to the attempt by New York State legislators to withdraw state aid from students involved in campus disorders.

Addressing some 500 college presidents and trustees at the state-sponsored Conference on Leadership and the Role of the Trustees in New York, Bailey said of the students involved, "We can beat them in a fight. But, my God, they have a life to live and the best of them are trying to tell us something."

"Soon enough," he continued, "many of them will subside and conform and enable us to sigh, 'Well, now they have grown up.' But the magic of dreams and beautiful claims of the irreverent and the restless will have died as well."

Bailey said he thought enacting the legislation now being considered would do "infinite harm." He said the university already had great advantages over its students in the form of "the cops, the Army, the registrar's records and the keys to the library."

"We in our generation did not create all of the ugliness and unjustice in the world," continued Bailey, "but we have perpetuated far too much of it, and we have been uncommonly slow to recognize and to ameliorate the most subtle indignities and tyrannies of our culture."

The conference dealt with the role of the policy-making bodies on campuses in the light of current student unrest and the relationship of the university to Federal and state governments, which both subsidize higher education.

Bailey, who is chairman of the policy institute of Syracuse University's Research Corporation, called sloth and pride the two greatest sins on college campuses today.

"We resist systematic evaluation by peers, students, alumni or administrators," he said, "and are thereby thrown into a jungle of unsystematic evaluations by the very same groups."

Tom Wicker hailed Bailey's outspokenness in an editorial-page column in Sunday's New York Times. "Mr. Bailey put his finger on the connecting link between the disorders, whatever their degree of justification and however widespread they may be on any one campus," the Washington columnist wrote.

Among other SU administrators opposing the legislation is Bailey's successor, Dean Alan Campbell, who indicated that "such matters should be entirely in the hands of the University."

Kenneth G. Bartlett, vice-president and dean of public affairs, said he was sympathetic toward the proposed bill, which would ban state financial aid to college students convicted of crimes "committed on the premises of any college."

Maxwell professors Michael O. Sawyer and Donald Meiklejohn criticized the vagueness of the bill.

Sawyer said the legislation should be redrawn because of the use of general terms. It ought to be more specific because of the effect it will have, he added.

Meiklejohn said the reported Democratic objections on the grounds of "looseness and breadth of language (in the bill)" seem well taken. (Some Senate Democrats have criticized the bill as unclear and loosely written.)

"Most of all," said Meiklejohn, "the bill severely invades an area which belongs to the colleges and universities–the determination of who should study or be helped to study. Punishment for crimes is the duty of a civil authority but the decision whether a student should be aided is the business of the college or university," he added.

CSL progress . . .

The black students objected to two practices of athletic teams, particularly the football team.

The football team, according to Byron Merritt, who acted as spokesman for the black students, "overloads" certain positions (putting a number of black players at one position). This both increases competition among black athletes and limits the number of black players who will actually play since only one of the competitors will win the position.

The students also cited a case in which a black football player was deprived of a road trip when a coach suddenly switched him from a position he had been playing throughout the week to a position that already was filled for the trip. The following Monday he was returned to his original position.

Referring to the financial pressure on most black students, Merritt suggested an optional board plan be instituted at SU. Such a plan, which presumably would be open to all students, is already under the consideration of a CSL subcommittee.

One of the most conspicuous indications of the CSL's efforts to find acceptable solutions to black students' requests was the presence yesterday of Lester H. Dye, director of admissions.

Part of the black students' dissatisfaction centers on admission procedures, which Dye attempted to clarify.

"I'm as interested as you are in bringing black students to the University," said Dye, who had been invited to the hearing by the CSL.

He said his office was working with organizations at SU, such as the Freshman Action Committee, and across the nation that "try to direct students toward college."

He said that his staff has spent "a good deal of time" in the inner city schools of larger cities, and that once applications are in, "we do as much research as possible. The applications get a great deal of personal attention."

There are no class-rank or Scholastic Aptitude Test score "cut-offs" at SU, he said, and no quotas on black students. He discounted suggestions of financial pressure from the federal government to increase black enrollment.

"We choose the student whom we feel can fit into this kind of academic environment," he said.

He added that the Admissions Office will have a black staff member "probably by August or September."

Also present was Charles Thompson, director of the foundations program in the Development Office. This office is responsible for future planning and money-raising for the University.

Thompson told the students that he has submitted to private foundations 40-50 proposals for fellowship and scholarship money "specifically for black students."

Both the CSL and the black students appeared pleased with the hearings. "We're highly appreciative of the attitude of the CSL," said Merritt, "and hope to continue to use this channel."

Students plan new union

University Union will attempt to coordinate its planning with other organizations in an open meeting in 307 HL tonight. Leaders of campus groups which might be expected to use student union facilities have been invited to speak separately, beginning at 6:45 p.m.

Several new ideas came out of a general student meeting two weeks ago, according to UU Development Director Rob Rockefeller.

In addition to a large auditorium suitable for classes and concerts, student suggestions included a shopping arcade to replace the Marshall Street area, music rooms, hobby rooms, an indoor sports area, and a garage.

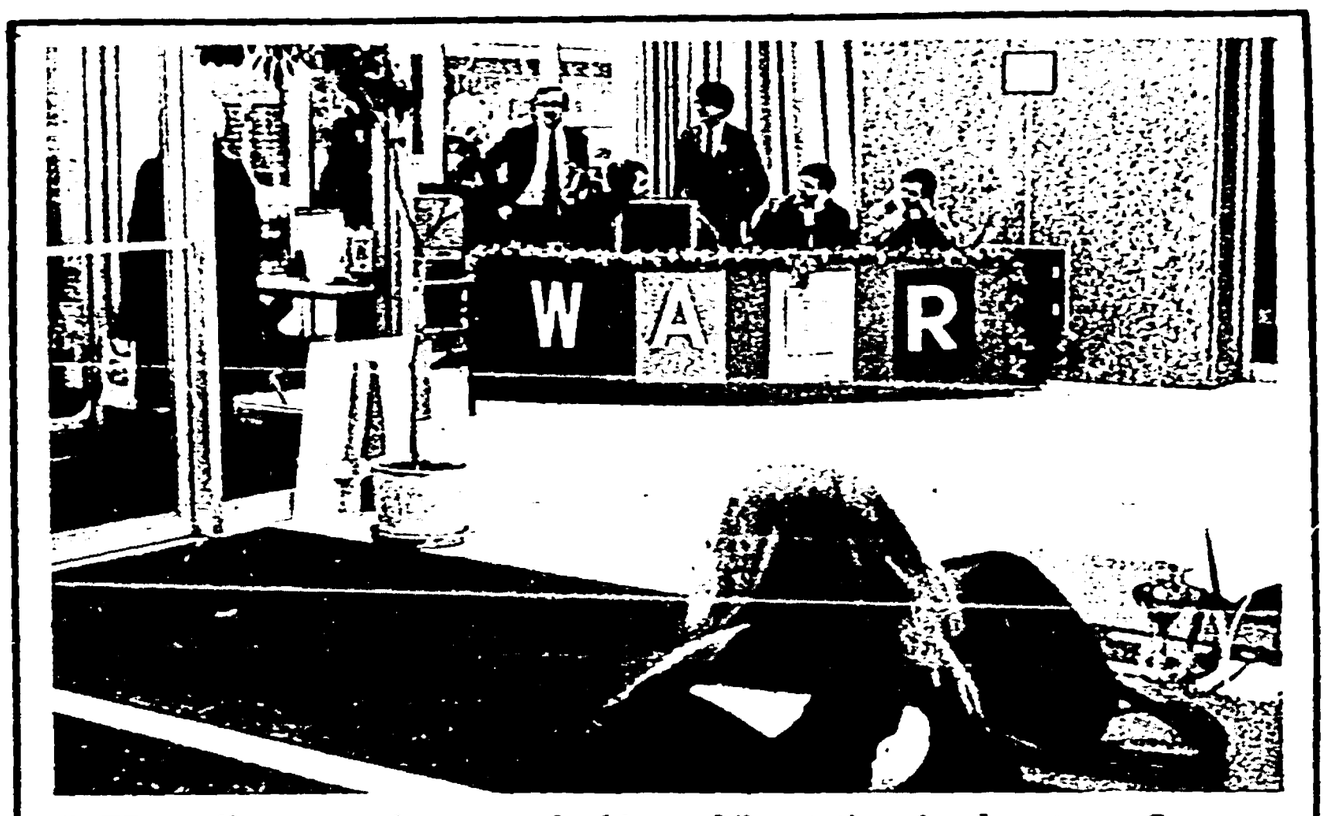
SUSKI to meet for trip planning



There will be an important SUSKI meeting tonight at 7:30 in 117 Lyman for members who wish to participate in future activities. Due to an unusually long ski season, many additional events are being planned.

This Friday, from 3-6 p.m. there will be a free TGIF. Non-members will be charged $1.50. On the same night a bus will leave Slocum at 7:00 p.m. for Intermont for the Ski-athon, and return at 5 a.m. Those interested in going must sign up at the meeting. The cost is $4, which includes the bus transportation and lift ticket.

There is still room available for the trip to Gore Mountain on Sunday, February 23. The bus departs at 6 a.m. and the cost is $11.

The two trips to Vermont this year have been a success. Now that snow is in abundance, another trip is being planned for March 7-9. Places under consideration are Mt. Tremblant, Canada; Mt. Sutton, Canada; and Jay Peak, Vermont. The price will be approximately $35. By next Tuesday night more details should be available. If anyone wants to assure himself of a place on the bus a $10 deposit is necessary.

Tonight's meeting is also mandatory for Winter Weekend committee members and those students who are helping to coordinate dorm activities.

WAER staffers recently manned this mobile station in downtown Syracuse.

WAER conducts orientation program

By VIC LIVINGSTON

Campus radio station WAER will conduct a mid-semester orientation program tonight in 200 Newhouse at 7:30 p.m. for students interested in working for the FM outlet.

"This is the first time the station has conducted an orientation program at mid-semester," said Jason Squire, program director. "Many students who wanted to work for the station needed a chance to adapt to college the first semester.

"Also, we want to attract people who want to work for WAER but didn't get a chance to come around during the fall orientation," he continued.

Each participant in the program will be directly assigned to a senior staff member in the field of his choice. The various areas include announcing, promotion, personnel, engineering, writing, news, producing and programming. New members will also be offered positions in specialized programming areas such as public affairs and music.

Auditions for announcing will be conducted Sunday, Feb. 22 from 2 to 6 p.m. at the station. Persons interested may sign up at the studio this week.

The new WAER program schedule is available at the studio or by mail.

Will ROTC be shot down?

momentum has been mushrooming since last year.

On April 3, 1968, the Senate agenda committee requested that the Senate Committee on Curricula examine the likely consequences of a College of Liberal Arts faculty resolution stating that "The Departments of Military Science and Aerospace Studies shall no longer be members of this College, effective on concurrence of the University Senate and the Board of Trustees." On Nov. 20 the Senate approved in principle the Liberal Arts faculty recommendation. At the same time the agenda committee was asked to find a home for the ROTC Departments and the resolution was held in abeyance pending a recommendation.

Alexander said a sub-committee of the agenda committee consisting of Nelson L. Nemerow, professor of civil engineering, chairman, Walter M. Beattie, professor and dean of the School of Social Work and Oliver E. Clubb, associate professor of political science, met with military personnel, College of Liberal Arts, faculty members and student representatives to obtain a cross-section of campus views.

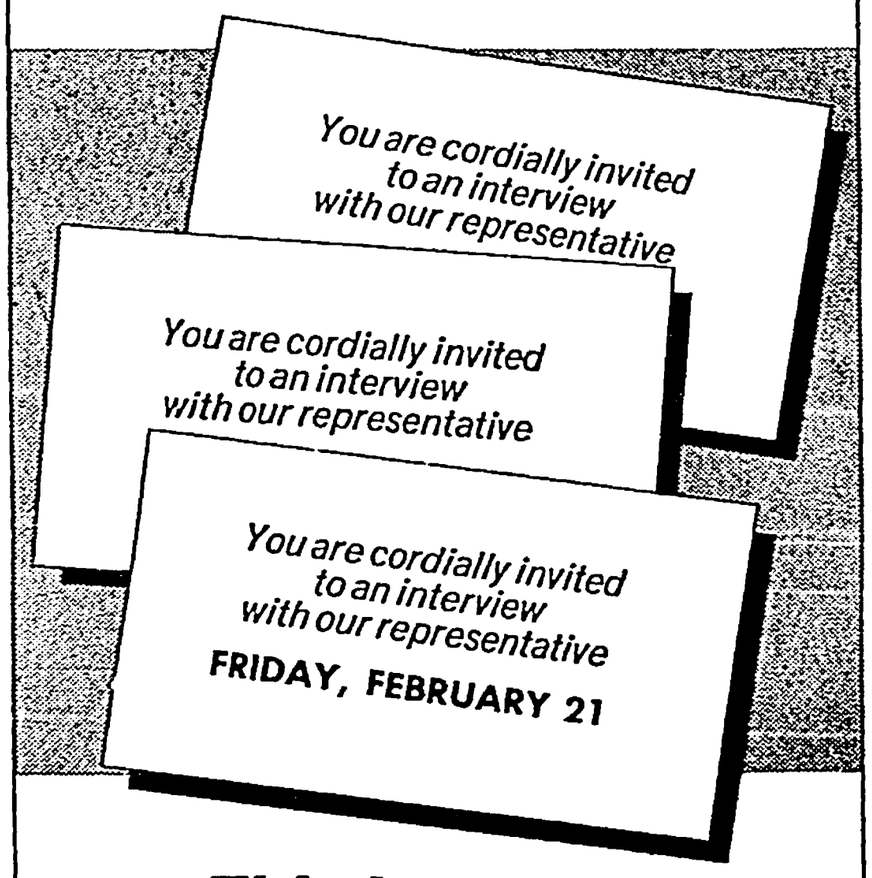
More recently, Students for a Democratic Society has begun circulating an anti-ROTC petition in dining halls and other strategic campus locations.

Free hearing tests

Free hearing tests for the public will be given at Syracuse University's Hearing Clinic, 805 S. Crouse Ave., until Friday from 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. each day.

Dr. Richard H. Nodar, head of the clinic, said "the hearing screening evaluations" are offered as a public service and as part of the graduate training program in the University's Division of Special Education and Rehabilitation.

Graduate students in audiology and education of the deaf will administer the hearing tests.



Registrar on WAER

Did you ever want to speak to an administrator of a large university? On "Speak-Up" over WAER-FM you will have the opportunity tonight at 5:30 p.m. when the Department of Public Affairs presents the Registrar of Syracuse University, Edwin D. Smith.

"Speak-Up" is a listener 'call-in' program in which the audience is asked to express its views and to comment on the statements made by the guest for the evening.

Host Bob Kravitz will receive phone calls in the studio at 476-5541, Ext. 3801, and Registrar Smith will attempt to answer and reply to all comments which are received.

This is a copy of a copy of an invitation to interview a company you may not know well enough.

Making copies is only part of the story.

You can get the other part straight from the source. Talk to our representative and ask him about R&D looking ahead to major advances in education...in areas like color xerography and 3-D imaging...about refinements in combined xerography and EDP systems to process and graphically reproduce any theory or fact available...at any distance.

Ask anything imaginable and you'll discover you're probing a company that's involved with every phase of the information and education explosion.

We place great emphasis on individual initiative. Additional schooling aimed at advanced degrees. Brainstorming. A variety of short-term project groups. And benefits. In short, your career, not simply a job for you to fill.

So while you're looking us over for career opportunities, we'll be looking you over for career potential. Fair enough?

Why not make an appointment with your Placement Director. A half hour of your time could be the start of a great future in research, engineering, manufacturing, programming, accounting, finance, statistics or marketing/sales.

Undefeated Rust stars in two sports

By ADAM DAWSON

Comparatively few students earn a varsity letter at Syracuse. It is even more of a rarity when one athlete gets letters in two different sports.

One of these "rarities" is Bob Rust. He not only wrestles, but he plays football as well. Not only does Bob participate in both sports, but he excels in both, also.

During the fall he plays linebacker for Ben Schwartzwalder's Orangemen and in the winter he wrestles for Ed Carlin's grapplers.

Now in his junior year at Syracuse, pursuing a major in physical education, Rust came here on a wrestling scholarship (when such things existed) after an intensive recruiting campaign was waged by Ed Carlin and ex-frosh coach Dick Slutsky.

One of the main reason's he was in such demand after high school was his showing in the 1966 New York State Wrestling Championships. On his way to winning the state championship at the 167 pound weight class, Rust not only beat all his opponents, he pinned them all the way through the tourney.

In his freshmen year at Syracuse Bob wrestled 177 pounds and won the Freshman Easterns at that same weight.

With Rust at 177 and Lee Castner at 191, and Lee Zwicker at heavyweight (all Freshmen Champs that year) it looked likew wrestling was on the move at Syracuse. Now two years later only Rust is still out for wrestling.

During his sophomore year, Rust missed half of the season with bursitis of the elbow. Still he managed to wrestle 167 in the Easterns, where the absense of weight (he normally weighs in at 195 pounds) and the stiff right elbow limited his competition.

This year he arrived at wrestling practice just three days before the first match because the football season didn't enc until the week before. His first match was against Mark Baretz of Temple, who took third in the Easterns last year at 191. Rust went out and soundly beat Baretz, 9-2.

Against Navy, in the matmen's next match, Bob got the only Syracuse win with a one-sided decision.

The first match of the new year was against Cortland. Since Cortland does not wrestle the 191 pound weight class coach Carlin moved Rust up to heavyweight. A 13-2 Rust victory was the result, despite the 50 pound weight advantage that his opponent enjoyed.

The highlight of the season for Rust came against Lehigh when he pinned Frank Paquin in :50 of the first period. Paquin had taken fourth in the East as a heavyweight last year, and was down to a trim 191 this year.

A hard fought 3-1 victory over Joe Ferraro of Army followed. It came on a takedown with just ten seconds remaining in the match.

A default from Penn State and a victory over the Ithaca heavyweight complete Bob's undefeated 7-0 record.

A knee injury that a trainer says "rest will heal" kept Bob out of the Pitt match.

POISED AND READY. Wrestler Bob Rust awaits the charge of his opponent in a recent match at Manley. Rust is undefeated this season, and is pointing toward the Easterns at Princeton in March. (Photo by Biggar)

He expects to be ready to wrestle against Springfield Saturday and Colgate next week. The Colgate match could be Bob's toughest of the season because he faces Gene Detwiller, who took second in the Easterns last year at 191.

After that match the Easterns and the Nationals lay in front of him.

Stickmen begin work soon; Simmons will drill in snow

With a spring trip beginning on April 1, lacrosse coach Roy Simmons is busy getting through his paperwork and preparing for the start of practice next week.

Simmons has scheduled a meeting for all candidates for lacrosse, both freshman and varsity. This will be held at 7:30 tonight in the Trophy Room of Archbold Gym. Physical exams and the start of practice will be discussed. If the weather cooperates, practice for the varsity will begin on Feb. 24.

The lacrosse team will be forced to limit its drills to conditioning and stickwork until the Field House becomes available. This year it will be a little later than usual, because the bleachers cannot be removed until the indoor track season is over.

Simmons hopes to be out of the Manley parking lots and into the Field House by March 15, when he has scheduled the team's first practice game, against the downtown Syracuse Lacrosse Club.

The Orange ranked 10th in the nation in the final lacrosse tally last year, and Simmons is hoping to move up with a veteran outfit.

The team is led by captains Jeff Davis and Cliff Ensley. Davis, a junior, is on attack, while Ensley, a senior, plays a defense.

Another standout on the team is attackman Verne Doctor, a senior who earned honorable mention All-America last year.

Instead of a southern trip this year, the team will head west for spring vacation. Syracuse will play four games in five days against the top teams in Ohio. The schedule opens with Ohio Wesleyan, followed by Denison, Ohio State and Kenyon.

Denison, the Orange's second opponent, has lost only one game in the past two years. That was a one goal decision to Washington College last year. SU topped Washington, also by one goal.

COACH ROY SIMMONS

In the Bullpen

Love or money?

By DOUG GARR

With the current wrestling and other minor sports controversies brewing on the hill, it seems time to evaluate another aspect of the situation–the athlete himself.

Since everyone has been busy blaming someone else, it seems only fair for the athlete to look at the situation objectively. Jerry Beach may have touched upon the real problem of minor sports when he said (with regard to wrestling) that he was "just tired of it." If you don't play football or basketball at SU, you are probably playing for yourself. Because minor sports only get a minimum of financial aid, the dedicated athletes are the only ones that participate. It must be said of these gentlemen that they have nothing but sheer love for the sport.

If an athlete comes to Syracuse with full scholarship, he is in a sense paid to be an athlete. That is why there are dozens of complaining football players and basketball players riding the bench each fall and winter. Football and basketball players are in the "minor leagues" os professional sport. And if they don't make it in the professional world, as most do not, they have a free $14,000 degree.

On the other hand there are the minor sports athletes. Many freshmen who played minor sports in high school but shun the opportunity to go out in college. The main reason is "why should i?" Some, like Jerry Beach, are too tired of it. Maybe Beach has a good point. Athletes participated in high school for a number or reasons. Some liked to have extracurricular activities to impress admissions offices. Others became athletes because it was "the thing to do." After all, being a jock meant you were a big man on campus, especially if you were a member of a winning team. Students in high school came out to support winning teams no matter what sport it was. Who at SU goes to track and swimming meets or fencing and wrestling matches? Unfortunately, only a select few die-hard fans.

It would also be interesting to find out how many students attend football and basketball games. Archbold Stadium is filled in the fall with alumni and townies. Basketball attendance is at a low. Maybe sports are no longer the "in" thing for students. It seems that student protest is the only unifying school spirit that exists today. Maybe taking over an administration building is more fun than watching 22 brutes beat each other up for 60 minutes on a Saturday afternoon.

Anyway, it is time to face two important realities: First, that minor sports at SU will never, ever get as many scholarships to attract athletes that will be good enough to produce an eastern or national championship team. The reason is logical. Fencing matches simply don't attract rich alumni, don't attract 40,000 people, and don't bring in thousands of dollars to the university. Secondly, athletes who partake in minor sports in college do it no simply because it is fun and for no other reason. When it stops being fun, they quit, and who can blame them? In high school athletics were fun, in college there is more emphasis on winning, practicing, and general attitude. So then it may stop being fun.

The highest respect for college athletes should be for those unknown crewmen, wrestlers, trackmen, fencers, and swimmers not football and basketball players.

'Unanimous support'

Johnson seeks position on Board of Education

By ANGUS TWOMBLY
News Editor

A black SU educator is claiming "unanimous support from the black community" in his quest for a seat on the Syracuse Board of Education, but Syracuse Mayor Walsh is looking elsewhere for the Board's first Negro commissioner.

Dr. John Johnson, an assistant professor in the special education department and coordinator of the Croton-on-Campus school, said his efforts to gain the Mayor's appointment to the partially completed term on the Board was a "united campaign by the entire black community." Johnson claims he is "competent and able to do the job," and says the black community "isn't going to support any other black person."

DR. JOHN JOHNSON

A spokesman for the mayor's office said yesterday that the Mayor "has no objection to Dr. Johnson personally, but feels that the next commissioner should be a citizen and not a professional educator." He explained that according to the Mayor's philosophy, the Board of Education "is no place for a professional educator," and said such people should be on the Board's staff instead.

According to Johnson, the Mayor's objections to his appointment may be more extensive. He said that in a recent TV news broadcast several other factors were cited. The first is that Johnson is not a Republican and thus is politically undesirable and second, that Johnson is waging a pressure campaign for the job.

In reply to the objection to Johnson's professional status, he says that with "the problems in Syracuse, certainly there needs to be a varied kind of involvement on the Board."

Asked about the Mayor's polltical objections, Johnson quipped, "I am not about to play politics with the children of Syracuse." Johnson also claimed that his campaign is not pressure-oriented. He said his support has shown itself through various letter campaigns and that the "black community has unamimously said it wants me."

While admitting that Johnson had considerable support, the Mayor's spokesman indicated that he is still looking and Johnson's chances are dim.

Hicks tells Student Senate: honesty is the best policy

By COLETTE STALLINGS

Delivering his state of the campus address to Student Senate last night, Undergraduate Government President Chuck Hicks declared honesty to be the only way to avoid a "collision between students and administrators."

Hicks urged Senate to be honest with itself and with the student body. He suggested that if such honesty is impossible that he and Senate should resign in order to give the student body the chance to either do without or elect a new government.

"I'll admit that this year all hasn't been well," continued Hicks. "I've played a game. I'm very very ashamed that I played games -- all the problems around here -- it's time it stopped. I'm not going to play these games anymore."

Pointing out progress that had been made: students on the committee for the selection of a new dean of the College of Liberal Arts, in the various academic departments, on the Committee on Instructions which instituted the pass-fail option and any new courses, the work of the student committee for the selection of a new chancellor and of the Committee on Student Life, Hicks explained, "We cannot do everything, but what we can do we should do, and what we should do we must do."

"There are black students on this campus who are very angry and will not tolerate any more discrimination by the administration. I propose that we join these students. We take too much around here."

Hicks went on to enumerate student grievances: the $100 general student fee that has "been stolen from our pockets," the condescending attitude of the administration concerning dorm autonomy, the inability of students to live off campus, and the food service.

According to Hicks, the answer to these grievances has been silenced. "We're not going to be silent any longer. Sounds of silence will beat no more at Syracuse University. And I am asking the Senate to act and break the silence with me."

Senate responded to Hicks' plea by unanimously approving a motion to postpone any action concerning a private bill submitted to the state legislature granting the university eminent domain over properties surrounding the university until "a complete investigation has been made." The motion did state however that "until such time the Student Senate stands against any such private bill of granting Syracuse University eminent domain."

Under eminent domain the University would be able to buy any such private bill of granting Syracuse University emminent domain."

Under emminent domain the University would be able to buy any sale property at tax value if it were the only bidder.

If the bill passes the state legislature, according to Lou Jacobs, "The University stands an excellent chance of being a brilliant example of slumlords."

Senate approved a change in the proposed judicial code amendment that supposedly eliminates the possibility of double jeopardy in cases of civil crime.

The amendment taken from the statement made at a joint meeting of the National Student Association and the American Association of University Professors, states that students who violate the law may incur penalties "prescribed by civil authorities but institutional authority will not be used to duplicate the function of civil authorities."

Plans for research strike supported by SU committee

A group of professors and graduate students at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology recently scheduled a voluntary research halt on March 4 "to focus attention on how the misuse of scientific and technical knowledge presents a major threat to the existence of mankind."

A committee of Syracuse University professors and students has announced its support of the nationwide "reassessment of scientific research."

The committee and "interested members of all departments" will meet this afternoon at 12:30 in 202 physics building to discuss plans.

The "March 4th Committee" said it supports the following proposals made in the M.I.T. statement last month:

-"To devise means for turning research applications away from the present overemphasis on military technology towards the solution of pressing environmental and social problems.

-"To convey to our students the hope that they will devote themselves to bringing the benefits of science and technology to mankind, and to ask them to scrutinize the issues raised here before participating in the construction of destructive weapons systems.

-"To express our determined opposition to ill-advised and hazardous projects such as the ABM system, the enlargement of our nuclear arsenal, and the development of chemical and biological weapons."

Organizers of the Syracuse strike said they already had received the support of individuals from at least six of the University's departments.

The idea of stopping research as a "practical and symbolic" expression of the "apprehension felt by scientists," according to the Jan. 24 issue of "Science" magazine, "seems to have originated among graduate students and professors in the M.I.T. physics department," but afterwards spread to other departments as well.

Initially, according to the magazine article, the graduate students' concern centered around Vietnam, "but due to faculty feelings, the aims of the research halt have been expanded."

A consequent faculty statement said: "Through its actions in Vietnam our

Congressman raps today

During his visit to Syracuse today, U.S. Rep. (D-N.Y.) Benjamin Rosenthal will make two public appearances at Syracuse University. He will speak at 4 p.m. in the Maxwell Hall Founders Room and at 8:30 p.m. in Maxwell Auditorium.

Congressman Rosenthal, a Democrat from New York's Eighth District, will discuss "The Role of the House in Foreign Policy" at the 4 p.m. session sponsored by the Public Administration Program of the Maxwell Graduate School.

His evening appearance will be as part of a student-organized course on "Black and White in America." Rosenthal's topic is "Congress and the Race Crisis."

Prior to his 8:30 lecture, a film will be shown in Maxwell Auditorium at 7:30 p.m. also open to the public. The film is the CBS documentary "Black History--Lost, Stolen or Strayed?" which features entertainer Bill Cosby.

Restraints within or without

A former member and advocate of ROTC stopped in yesterday to flail the Daily Orange for giving so much coverage to SDS and other anti-ROTC elements. He was about to draw his bayonet and run us through when the phone rang.

"Hello?"

"Hello. I'm from SDS and I want you tc know the editorial today was filled with falsehoods and lies. You should run a retraction."

The prevalence of advice to large metropolitan newspapers is a comment on the divisions and dissent of our times. The man without a cause is something of a man without a country in America today.

What is distressing is not that there is so much dissent. The dissent itself is a good sign, a positive undercurrent amid all that is wrong, that we still have an open society aware of and concerned about its problems.

What's distressing is that coupled with much of the passion is intolerance and hatred, a self-righteousness that breeds cruelty and a short-sightedness that does not see human shortcomings.

With the draft setting its random traps for us after graduation we too understand that the passions we distrust were begotten by problems that are also big.

Nevertheless, "Society cannot exist unless a controlling power upon will and appetite be placed somewhere, and the less of it there is within, the more there must be without." Edmund Burke.

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

I wish to thank you for publishing the recent articles concerning SDS and their activities. They contributed greatly to my knowledge of, and insight into, the mind and spirit of the SDS movement. However, there are some inconsistencies between the two articles which leave doubt as to where SDS stands. If "SDS maintains the right of the student 'so inclined' to participate in officer's training, but objects to the administrative support of the program," then why should it be said that "Pershing Rifles is the fraternity of Army ROTC, which SDS would like to see disbanded....?" Pershing Rifles is a completely voluntary organization supported only by dues from its members. Syracuse University does not provide any funds for its use, though Pershing Rifles is an active student organization which provides the color guard at football and basketball games among its many functions. Does SDS contribute to the University beyond its function as a sounding board for opinions of its members?

Also I do not agree with the University of Minnesota's student newspaper's editorial that stated "Military discipline is strict, unreasonable and degrading, and destroys the integrity of the individual." To be true, military discipline is strict, yet there is much reasoning behind this. As John Baynes showed in his book "Morale," the soldier desires discipline. "Strict obedience is a challenge which sets a man on his mettle. To allow a soldier to disobey orders is really to insult him. A good man, in any walk of life, knows what he can do, and what he should do. If he fails, he expects the just reward of failure--punishment, disgrace, ruin or whatever it might be....tolerance of poor performance implies that a person's efforts are unimportant." In addition, discipline does much to build integrity, rather than to destroy it, by providing an unwavering basis for men to measure their conduct against, and by forcing those men who lack the moral strength to meet the standard. John Baynes adds "As long as he went through the motions correctly he could think his own thoughts; his daily round was ruled by Military Law, but his soul was his own." There is nothing degrading about having freedom of thought.

Sincerely yours,
Franklin Gohde

To The Editor:

I would like to clarify several issues for "Name Withheld" who is "dubious about the function of the Undergraduate Student Court" for its series of guilty, no action decisions on cases involving violation of dormitory social regulations.

It is quite true that the rules are made by the Administration and Board of Trustees, and that the function of the Student Court is only to interpret them and pass judgment as to whether a student is guilty or not. And this is precisely what has been done. Students accused of violating the rules are required to appear before the Court, and those proven to have committed the offense have been declared guilty.

"Interpretation" of the rules, however, includes disciplining offenders with a penalty commensurate to the crime. It is the opinion of the USC that such has been done. Recently a female student caught entertaining a male guest in her dormitory room opted to have the Dean of Women decide her case rather than the USC. She was sentenced to disciplinary probation for an indefinite period, thereby losing all rights, privileges, and financial aid from the University, in addition to being required to spend several hours each week doing clerical work for the Dean of Women's office, also for an indefinite period. Is this penalty commensurate to the crime?

I do not agree that "the effectiveness of the Court will dwindle to nothing" if we continue to use the "Five questions" in determining whether a decision of GUILTY: NO ACTION should be handed down. These criteria—no one hurt, no one inconvenienced, no Federal, state or local law violated, no harmful results, and

Part two—Peace talks

Secession

By Bob Tembeckjian

Good evening. This is WAER news with a recap of events concerning the dorm autonomy issue which has had Syracuse University in a state of emergency. Only 35 days ago, Flint and Day halls began a secession movement from the university which has since been joined by Sadler, Lawrinson, Washington Arms and Lehman Apartments.

Event after shocking event has awakened the Board of Trustees to meet for the first time in 98 years, but the group found no answers to the problem.

Three weeks ago, a group of football players from Sadler took possession of the College of Forestry and offered to exchange Forestry Dean Payne for Chuck Hicks, who had been captured by the administration. At first university officials were skeptical but they finally consented.

Just two days after the Forestry takeover, a group from Lehman and Washington Arms, led by the men from Parsons Cottage who now reside at Lehman, took over Haven Hall. Director of Housing Jack Rade was heard to comment, "We should have expelled those guys while we had the chance."

Chancellor William P. Tolley, in an effort to facilitate peace talks, announced that a cessation of hostilities toward the dissidents was being initiated. "We are looking for reciprocal action," said Dr. Tolley.

Meanwhile, in a public meeting of the Council on Student Life, Dean of Student Services Jim Carleton delivered a ringing condemnation of the CSL student representatives. "We're fed up! They said there'd be no trouble. It's evident that the CSL students have done nothing but feed us a pack of lies."

With that statement, Carleton and six faculty and administration members walked out of the meeting. Remaining behind, Professor Michael O. Sawyer said, "Fellow students. One thing we must remember is that a university is a fun, happy place. This place of learning, in which students share things with the faculty, is open to all—including Democrats. I just don't understand why there's so much trouble. After all, Syracuse is the finest place on the globe."

Shortly after the ill-fated CSL confrontation, a group of 50 administrators entered the Carnegie Library and refused to open it to students. "We'll keep it shut for 24 hours a day untill these hippies come to grips with reality," said one administrator. The school was embarrassed into opening it, however, when a picture on page one of the New York Times showed the Chancellor refusing admittance to an eager student. He just couldn't explain why a place of learning closed its library to students.

The unfavorable publicity forced Tolley to declare a suspension of hostilities. In a secret meeting, Tolley and Hicks agreed to open talks. Tolley suggested a crew boat on the Onondaga Lake as a place to negotiate. Hicks, however, insisted on meeting at Geneva Cottage to stimulate a sense of friendliness.

But the SG president ran into opposition from his confederates. None of the dissidents could agree with Tolley on the shape of the negotiating table. Tolley insisted on a round one, but the rebels wanted a four-sided one. Since the rebels seceded in groups of two each pair would sit at a side, and the administration would have the other side.

Doug Snelson, a spokesman for the rebels, said the representatives at the talks would all be "puppets" anyway, and a four-sided table would be needed to preserve the integrity of the secessionists.

After deciding on a two-sided arrangement, controversy developed over the shape of the chairs. Should armchairs or desk chairs be used? Then a problem arose over what refreshments to serve. Tolley insisted on no beer, and Washington Arms demanded Fresca. After two consecutive days of endless argument, the haggard group of negotiators ran out in desparation to the sound of the Dingle Man.

Caught in power struggle

Mondlane—leader of Mozambique independence movement

By JEFF RADFORD

Special to the Daily Orange

LOURENCO MARQUEZ, MOZAMBIQUE. Portuguese authorities here expressed apprehension over the time-bomb assassination last week of Dr. Eduardo Mondlane, leader of the Mozambique independence movement.

The 49-year old former assistant professor at Syracuse University, the most successful and best known leader fighting white rule in Africa, is believed to have been killed in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania, by pro-Chinese elements in his own movement, the Liberation Front of Mozambique (FRELIMO). These dissidents have long sought to capture leadership of his 10,000-man liberation army.

His removal will probably bring not only a Peking-oriented leadership to FRELIMO, but also a fanatical turn toward race hatred. Since he had a white, American wife, radical dissidents in his movement insisted that he was incapable of leading the struggle against white oppression.

Dr. Mondlane had been caught in an international power struggle between ideologies of the east and west. Trying to steer an independent, non-aligned course, the tall, US-educated African was receiving arms from communist states while obtaining considerable financial support from private American sources.

He left a widow and three children. Mrs. Mondlane was in Stockholm, another major center for raising FRELINO funds, when notified of her husband's death.

The Harvard-educated sociologist was killed instantly when a time-bomb set under his chair exploded on January 3 in a beach front home lent to him just outside Dar es Salaam.

A week before his assassination, he was reported to have said that "some members in my organization despise me because I am not anti-white." A few days before his death he mentioned to friends the possibility that he might be killed by dissidents within FRELIMO.

In an exclusive interview last December, Dr. Mondlane steadfastly denied that FRELIMO was racist in outlook. He said there were two white Americans working for the movement at that time.

In a separate interview with other FRELIMO leaders a short time later, however, the liberation movement was said to be open only to Africans.

Asked about the possibility of attempts on his life, Dr. Mondlane said, "Of course, there are constant threats of this nature. I can only assume that the Protuguese would rather see me dead than alive. But we take precautions."

Although the possibility that he was killed by Portuguese agents have not been ruled out, most observers here and in Tanzania regard the political murder as the work of dissatisfied FRELIMO members.

Under his leadership since 1962, FRELIMO had engaged Portuguese troops here in a war of independence which Dr. Mondland had pronounced a "protracted" one after his re-election as head of the movement at a congress held on FRELIMO-held territory within Mozambique last July.

"Our strength is increasing each year, but not fast enough for us to say we can defeat the Portuguese in one or even two years," he said. "But their days are counted. What sustains Portugal here is the support she gets from her western allies."

His pressure as well as that of other independence movements in Portugal's African possessions, Angola and Portuguese Guinea had forced Lisbon to consistently escalate defense spending to maintain control in Africa. In 1969, 48% of the entire Portuguese budget was allocated to military expenditures.

Portuguese commitment of troops to the three colonies had topped 120,000 by mid-1968. In Mozambique, perhaps up to 1,000 of them had become fatalities in the hard, guerrilla war that rages in the northern districts, Cabo Delgado and Niassa.

Dr. Mondlane claimed that his forces controlled all of the territory of these two districts except for the urban areas. While it is undoubtedly true that Portuguese authority was no longer sovereign in these regions, Dr. Mondlane's claim is less significant in the light of these districts' sparse population. In guerrilla warfare, holding land without people is of little value.

Furthermore, an increasing number of the local people were being herded into fairly successful government strategic hamlets.

FRELIMO opened a third front last year in the Tete district in the west near Rhodesia. Dr. Mondlane's intention was to destroy the giant hydroelectric project, Cabora Bassa, which is being constructed on the Zambezi River in this district.

The dam was an important target since it had come to symbolize for the average citizen of Mozambique the belated commitment of the Portuguese government to develop the colony.

Authorities in Lisbon had finally awakened to the fact that the success of Dr. Mondlane's independence movement was due to neglect from the mother country. Mozambique is now experiencing a rather impressive development (a direct result of FRELIMO pressure) to be culminated by the Cabora Bassa dam complex.

DR. EDUARDO MONDLANE

Realizing that this economic improvement would make independence seem less urgent to the people of Mozambique, Dr. Mondlane set out to destroy the symbol.

Jungle fighting has gone on in these isolated districts since 1964. Although both sides exaggerate the losses of the enemy and minimize their own, it is nonetheless true that the war has been a bloody one. During 1968, the Portuguese claimed to have killed nearly 900 rebels.

The liberation army seems to have been largely stalemated during the past year. Even so, Portuguese losses mounted ever higher, mostly as a result of FRELIMO's generous use of explosive boobytraps and mines.

FRELIMO's successes can be generally attributable to cooperation by the Tanzanian government, which allows the rebel army to stage military operations across its southern border with Mozambique.

Furthermore, weapons from communist countries reached rebel hands directly through the Tanzanian port of Dar es Salaam.

Dr. Mondlane seems to have enjoyed the full support and confidence of Tanzanian President Julius Nyerere. This did not prevent elements of the youth movement of Tanzania's ruling party from launching open attacks against him as an agent of US imperialism.

To the Editor:

It is, alas, apparent that although we have our own slim cigarettes, we women have a long way to go.

Miss Ardito (Feb. 11, DO) correctly points out that the mindless 36-24-36 smiling blond beauty queen is a very anti-woman kind of symbol. Miss America is fine in her place, which should of course have about the same degree of importance in American life as does Mr. America: It's nice to be beautiful, if that's your bag. The American boy can also aspire to be President of the United States.

In the same issue of the DO (Feb. 13) that reports black student demands for relevant courses, self-determination, in short, demands for self-respect, we have a letter from Mr. Lewis, correcting the criteria for Queen from beauty to "personality and poise," presumably less degrading standards for judging a person than calf shape.

The issue is not whether SU living units should sponsor county-fair-like contests for women. It is whether women will unite to change their image to one with human dignity. We live, on this campus, in the dark ages. Women hesitate even to speak in class, for fear of "alienating the men students." The number of women in high administrative or teaching posts is miniscule, as is the number of women in graduate and professional schools.

Hopefully, if there are more politically articulate women like Miss Ardito, the women's revolution will come to SU.

To the Editor:

As I write this it already seems inevitable that the student members of CSL will be successful in their attempt to make "dorm autonomy" an issue of student power. But before they do so, I would like to draw attention to some aspects of CSL behavior which I have been observing over the past month.

According to CSL students, their reason for originally withdrawing was frustration with the Administration and a feeling that they were being lied to, used and manipulated. They called for students to support them and maintained that there were no alternatives to doing otherwise. In the meantime, they launched such a barrage of self-serving publicity that everyone seems mesmerized to what has been actually happening around them.

Let me say beforehand that I am not a neutral observer: as a member of Peace and Freedom Party, I have been following CSL's activities as best I can. I am not making a "radical" analysis; but I am writing with the hope that many people will make the effort to stop and ask themselves if they are not being used and manipulated by people around CSL.

My most serious criticism is that they have mislead people about their intentions and have violated openly the trust they said students should show in them. CSL clearly gave the impression in the DO and in speeches, that the students at their second public meeting Dec. 17 would determine the issues, but CSL has instead decided it will decide for them. Thus, they decided the "library demand" was the issue before Christmas; now it is "dorm autonomy." Students may remember how in Grant Aud. they were told little more than "Support us!"

A series of four meetings were held over intercession by CSL people without any publicity until after most people had gone home. I was told these were "advisory meetings," and that no publicity had been put up because there was no time (exams)--rather strange considering a notice in the DO would have sufficed. I feel these meetings were held to keep dissidents out, including SG leaders who are, I think, rightfully suspicious that campus politics is behind some CSL activities: Lou Jacobs was clearly the de facto leader of the two meetings I attended.

I need say little about issues: the library was not a serious source of student frustration; "dorm autonomy" is mostly what students have already or can get without all the rhetoric CSL is generating. CSL has yet to tackle a serious issue of student power.

All this will stop when students and their representatives demand an open meeting, like the one held in Grant, to determine the issues--like CSL publicity claimed would be done. Town meetings are not acceptable since they disperse opposition, and their leaders abjure responsibility for past actions while telling students to follow CSL into a future that may never come. If you feel as I do, demand the open meeting. And if you want further info about CSL activities, please call me at X 3549.

To the Editor:

It seems that whenever I pick up a copy of the DO these days I can find nothing more than a series of repetitive complaints by the "dissatisfied" students on this campus. Are we thriving on these complaints? Is there nothing of any value to do on this campus besides complain? I personally am sick of ruining my breakfast with a never ending stream of sob stories.

Monday night a small group of students, fed up by the apparent lack of concern for the students' health displayed by the administration, decided to do a bit more than talk. A few of us were already suffering from the famed Hong Kong flu (contrary to the infirmary's formal statement that it is non-existant on this campus). Despite the supposed enormity of dissatisfied students on this campus the vast majority of those challenged to join us prefered to sit on their collective...and mock those of us who had the guts to do something.

It is my suggestion that if the mighty writers on our campus (and the students who sit around nodding agreement with them) really have something to complain about that they get out and do something and if it's not worth acting on then save the otherwise satisfied customers the boredom of your lovingly arranged war cries.

"You're treated like a professional right from the start."

"The attitude here is, if you're good enough to be hired, you're good enough to be turned loose on a project," says Don Feistamel.

Don earned a B.S.E.E. in 1965. Today, he's an Associate Engineer in systems design and evaluation at IBM. Most of his work consists of determining modifications needed to make complex data processing systems fit the specialized requirements of IBM customers.

Depending on the size of the project, Don works individually or in a small team. He's now working with three other engineers on part of an air traffic control system that will process radar information by computer. Says Don: "There are only general guidelines. The assignment is simply to come up with the optimum system."

Set your own pace

Recently he wrote a simulation program that enables an IBM computer to predict the performance of a data processing system that will track satellites. He handled that project himself. "Nobody stands over my shoulder," Don says. "I pretty much set my own pace."

Don's informal working environment is typical of Engineering and Science at IBM. No matter how large the project, we break it down into units small enough to be handled by one person or a few people.

Don sees a lot of possibilities for the future. He says, "My job requires that I keep up to date with all the latest IBM equipment and systems programs. With that broad an outlook, I can move into almost any technical area at IBM—development, manufacturing, product test, space and defense projects, programming or marketing."

'Going has been a lifetime dream'

Rabbi leaves for Israel tomorrow

By IRA SILVERMAN

Sitting behind his mahogany desk strewn with papers, books, and correspondances, the gentleman looks like a counselor or advisor. His office in the basement of Hendricks Chapel still smells of fresh paint, and workmen continue to add the finishing touches to the woodwork.

Rabbi Milton Elefant is not officially a counselor or advisor, but one would never know it from the parade of students that come in to see him every day. He is leaving tonorrow on a five-month sabbatical to Israel, and the students who visit him regularly with their problems will have to find another kind ear to help solve them.

Acting as both campus rabbi and Director of B'nai B'rith Hillel, Rabbi Elefant finds that the two positions cannot be taken separately. "I think they are one in the same," the Rabbi commented. "As Hillel Director, which is a formal title, I am the director of an organization. As chaplain to the Jewish students, I have a much more informal position. I am the community rabbi and I feel I serve all members of the community."

Rabbi Elefant has been at Syracuse for five years, and has seen the membership grow in that time from under 500 to over 1,250. Although he is leaving for only five months. Rabbi Elefant has mixed emotions about his trip.

"These four years have been the most active organizationally for Hillel at Syracuse. I've been in contact with so many students--intimate contact--that it is hard to break away, especially from our senior kids.

"But," he continued, "we have a wonderful group of experienced students who can continue Hillel's work. This makes it possible to take the sabbatical granted to us."

This will be the Rabbi's first trip to Israel. Travelling with him will be his wife, Chana, and their four sons, Jonathan, 17, Mayer, 15, Danny, 13, and David, 12.

"Going to Israel has been a lifetime dream," commented the Rabbi. "Chana and I have been looking forward to it since we got married 18 years ago. All our lives we have been in contact with Israel through our studies, emotions and feelings, and finally we have been able to come to the point of achieving it."

Rabbi Elefant who has a Master's degree in psychology, intends to do thorough research in Israel, working in the area of "Values."

"I'm going to do work in an area started by Viktor Frankl,"explained the Rabbi. "He established in Vienna a new school of psycho-therapy. He said that people msut have some values in life to order to live healthfully. I'm going to try to find out if there is a drive towards values in life for students in Israel. I will put the information on a scientific scale and evaluate it against students here in America."

While the Rabbi is gathering his information, his wife will be touring and his sons will be attending school. The boys will be studying English subjects in Hebrew. All four already have an exstensive background in the Hebrew language.

He answered charges that he was pro-American by saying, "Just because I studied in America and lived there for a few years doesn't make me pro-American. That is like saying Ho chi Minh is pro-French because he lived and worked in France for many years.

"If my critics point out that I have an American wife, I say so what? There are many revolutionary Americans."

The members of his movement greatly admired the Viet Cong, and had studied their techniques, he said.

But whether or not Dr. Mondlane was pro-American, the fact remains that many Americans were pro-Mondlane. He had proven extremely successful in raising funds in the US for his revolution, and this was naturally unacceptable to the pro-Chinese elements of his movement.

In the final analysis, it may be shown that his assassination was at least in part a result of his popularity in the US.

Leaders express needs for future union building

By TRISH MURRAY

Three student leaders--Student Senate Speaker Ed Feldman, IFC President Bob Kelly and Bonnie Urciuoli of the Commuting Students Association--listed their needs for organizational facilities in a future union building at UU's open meeting last night.

UU Vice-Chairman Mary Franciosi termed the turnout of leaders disappointing, as many more had been invited to speak.

Feldman's ideal facilities for Student Senate included three offices, with phones directly connected to offices and dorm rooms of the officers. He also asked for duplicating equipment and storage space for Student Government records, which date back to World War II.

Feldman cited the need for a meeting room for larger organizations. It could possibly have interchangeable nameplates, providing representatives of different organizations with a sense of identity.

As a general meeting place, Feldman would like the Union building to have a pub, a large auditorium for meetings, and an informal gathering place similar to the HBC lobby.

Bonnie Urciuoli explained that the Commuting Students Association needs only an office and a phone, but that students themselves would like lockers, more parking space and a place to mingle with resident students.

Bob Kelly of IFC also asked for only a desk, typewriter, and filing cabinet. He sees no need for another large auditorium on campus, but believes the first priority should be meeting rooms for groups of 50 or less.

Commenting on the poor attendance of student leaders, UU Chairman Jerry Tatarian said, "We are optimistic about our chances for a union building, but in order to raise a great deal of money, we must have a clear idea ready for presentation in a few weeks. Donors won't pay for a union if they don't know what will be in it."

"We have administration backing, and there will be a union. If students want any say in its planning, they must speak now; otherwise it will be built without regard for their ideas."

In answer to Kelly's charge that no student really believes there will be a union in the next ten years, Tatarian said that the university must prove its intention to students by choosing a final site and hiring an architect to draw up preliminary plans.

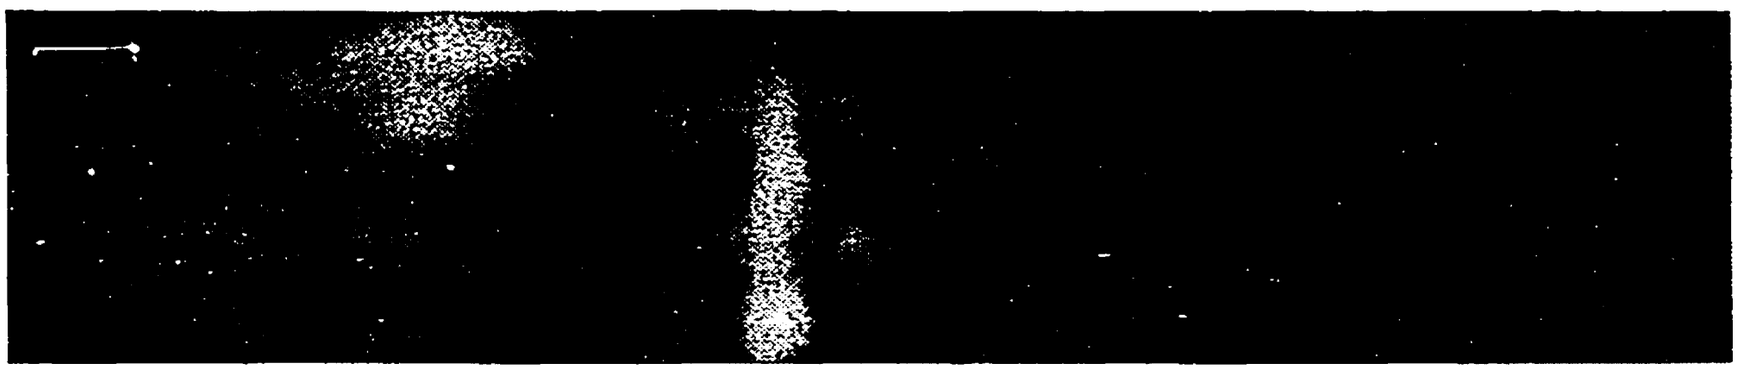
UC honors Steigers

University College, the continuing education college of Syracuse University, held a dinner last week in honor of Rod Steiger and his wife, Claire Bloom. Assistant Dean Frank Funk presented the actors with a limited edition of "Ben Shahn: The Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti," published by SU Press and autographed by the artist and the author Martin H. Bush.

During the presentation, Dean Funk said that both Shahn and the Steigers have a common bond in their fight against intolerance and oppression. Like the Steigers, Shahn is an artist who makes a strikingly personal statement about the dignity and honesty of man. "It is particularly appropriate to give this book as a gift since it is an illustrated account of Ben Shahn's intense interest in the Sacco-Vanzetti case. The culmination of Shahn's artistic treatment of the two martyrs was memorialized finally in the magnificant mosaic mural on the Syracuse University campus."



Dean Funk pointed out the great similarity between Shahn's statement about his dependence as an artist and the views expressed by Rod Steiger to the drama students one afternoon in the University Regent Theatre Complex.

Urban distress

Black power chairman discusses education crisis

By DOROTHY NASH

An exploration into the crisis in urban education was begun last night with the first of five seminars being presented by the Syracuse University Department of Religion in cooperation with various religious councils from the Syracuse area.

Dr. Nathan Wright, termed by Prof. Ronald Walters of this University as the "most effective black man in America" was the speaker for the first session. In addition to being an author, clergyman, social worker and educator, Dr. Wright is currently chairman of the Conference on Black Power.

Dr. Wright discussed briefly the causes and issues of the educational crisis, commenting on the state of institutions today and the relationship of the urban education crisis to blacks.

"As a black man I know more about urban distress. Today's institutions are antithetical to the purpose and we must subvert this. They're just bad news. It's time they got in tune to see if what we've got to do is going to work."

Self-awareness and self-acceptance were major points through which Dr. Wright outlined steps to deliver the educational system from its current state into an effective means of "facilitating human fulfillment."

A de-emphasis of the rehabilitation of physical fabric in the schools is needed and greater stress should be on ethical behavior. He suggested a complete review of the agenda of public schools and the "shift of emphasis" from the traditional "good teaching" to a pupil-centered classroom.

"Teachers are servants and not masters. They must learn to recognize this. In some cases computers could do less harm than teachers. But society is to blame, not the teachers. Teachers need skills that should be paid for at public expense."

The black man is the best resource for answers on urban problems according to Dr. Wright.

"The superior white men go to science and the inferior white man goes into education. The best educators today are black because they have to be. The superior black man is forced to go into religion or education. Most cities ought to be having a blackman as superintendent of their schools. Blacks should be setting the agenda for education across the nation."

Education is the one means that can encourage the "growth in self-directed ways for personal fulfillment."

"We've been given the most creative handle in human history to test whether what we do works to make life human."

Dr. Wright urged black awareness to enable the black man to be able to cope with the education crisis.

"White people who teach in our cities and teach black children are an inappropriate resource. But the worst resource is the unaware negro--with a small "N"--who is a carbon copy of white folks."

Dr. Wright suggested his book "Let's Work Together" as a resource for following up on the ideas of his discussion.

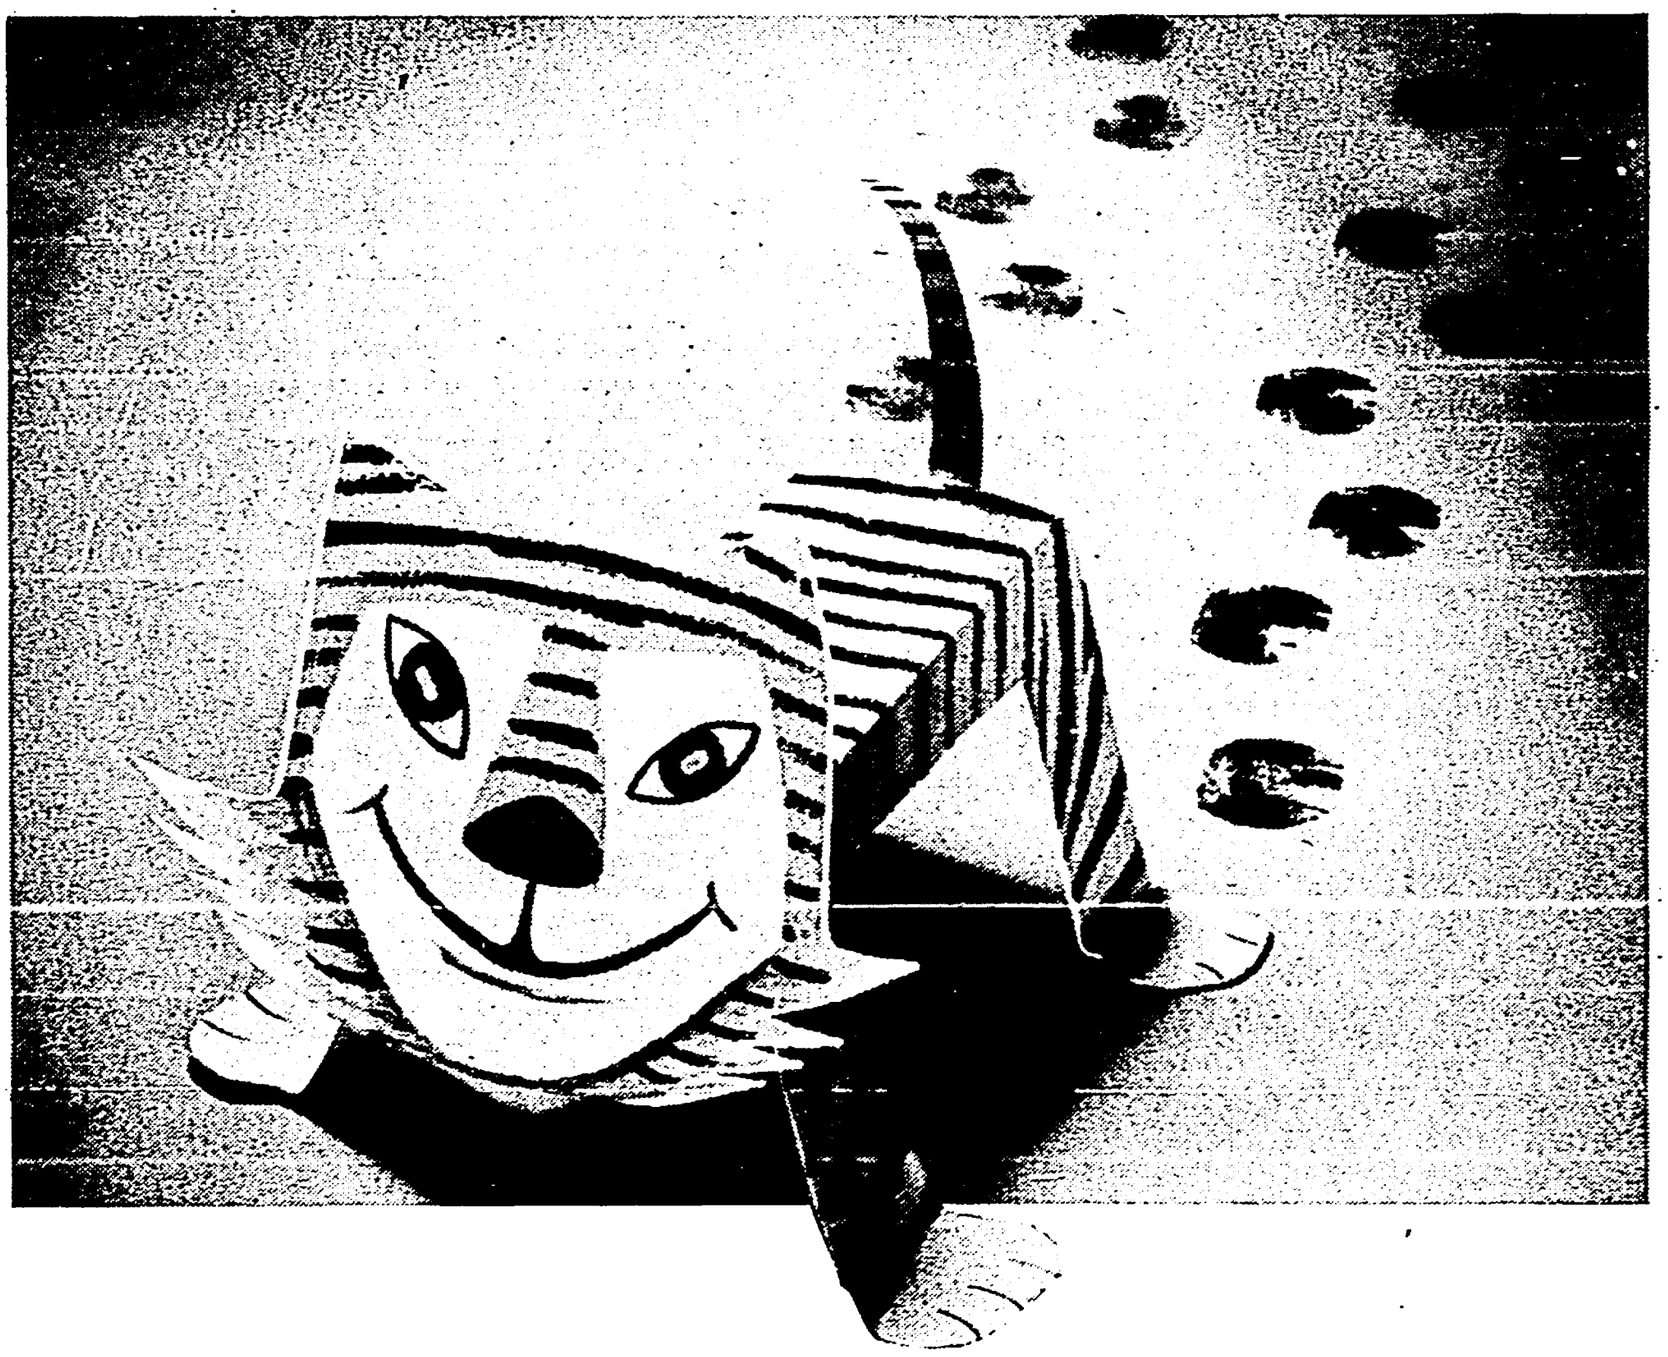
Rosenthal, 45, is a graduate of Brooklyn Law School and earned a Master of Laws degree from New York University.

During the 1950's, he rose upward through Queens County's Democratic machine.

By 1962 he was rewarded with the congressional nomination when Lester Holtzman was elevated to the bench. Rosenthal won his seat in a special election.

After being relegated to the veterans' affairs and agriculture committees, Rosenthal was recognized with a berth on the coveted Foreign Affairs Committee. In 1967, he led the fight against supplemental arms appropriations.

Also in 1967, he spoke to Queens College students who were fasting to protest the war.



"My doing that gave them legitimacy," he told The Village Voice. "I'm not inhibited by the conventional definitions of politics."

International students plan festive week

This year's International Student Week, when Syracuse University's 800 students from other lands entertain local residents, is scheduled for March 1 through 9, it was announced by Emmanuel Anise of Nigeria, president of the SU International Student Association.

Events will include a talk by Dr. H.R. Abdulgani, Indonesia's Ambassador to the United Nations, a talent show, and a "world's fair" and fashion show featuring students from many of the 78 countries represented among this year's student body.

Also scheduled for International Student Week are an informal dance at St. Thomas More House, an Italian film and a concert demonstration of piano and African drums by Prof. Halim El Dabh of Howard University.

PAPER TIGERS NEED NOT APPLY.

Thanks, but they're just not our type. Young engineers who join us are expected to move in on some rather formidable programs . . . with alacrity and lots of gusto. And a willingness to assume early responsibilities on demanding assignments is an attribute which we welcome warmly. It's the kind of engineering aggressiveness that has brought Sikorsky Aircraft to dominant stature in a new world of advanced VTOL aircraft systems.

If our criteria parallel your outlook, you'll find an excellent career environment with us. You would enjoy working (with a select group) on exciting, full-spectrum systems development. And you can watch your talent and imagination assume reality in such diverse forms as Heavy-Lift Skycranes—Tilt Rotor Transports—High-Speed VTOL Commercial Transports—and much more for tomorrow.

Does this responsibility stir your imagination? Then you probably should be with us. There's ample opportunity for innovation in: aerodynamics • human factors engineering • automatic controls • structures engineering • weight prediction • systems analysis • operations research • reliability/maintainability engineering • autonavigation systems • computer technology • manufacturing engineering • information systems • marketing . . . and more.

And your career advancement can be materially assisted through our corporation-financed Graduate Study Program—available at many outstanding schools within our area.

Consult your College Placement Office for campus interview dates—or—for further information, write to Mr. Leo J. Shalvoy, Professional and Technical Employment.

Winter Weekend '69

Fifth Dimension Up, Up and Away to SU

"THE FIFTH DIMENSION"

The Fifth Dimension, winners of four 1968 Grammy Awards will appear in Syracuse during Winter Weekend '69 sponsored by the class of 1970.

The quintet of three men and two girls, performing February 28 at the Syracuse War Memorial, have within one year become one of the top vocal groups in the nation, being awarded Record of the Year for their rendition of "Up, Up and Away."

Along with this honor, their single gained for them Best Performance by a Vocal Group, Best Contemporary Single and Best Contemporary Group Performance.

"Up, Up and Away" was released by the Fifth Dimension in February 1967. The title of their first single soon became the title of their first album. Their second album is "Magic Garden."

The Fifth Dimension's initial success has led to varied personal appearances ranging from the Shrine Auditorium in Los Angeles to Carnegie Hall. They have also appeared on such television shows as Hollywood Palace, Jackie Gleason Show, Ed Sullivan's Show and the Red Skelton Show.

'One Virgin's Blood'

Winter Weekend features mixed media show, dance

When the Fifth Dimension play their final encore at the Winter Weekend Concert, the show will just be half-over. After the Friday night, Feb. 28, performance in the War Memorial, there will be a mixed media show and dance in Kimmel Dining Hall sponsored by Kimmel-Marion and the junior class.

Titled "One Virgin's Blood," a new, experimental form of mized media show will start at 11:45 p.m. and be followed by a light show and dancing until 3 a.m. to the Sidewinders. Curfew was extended in order to permit students to attend what may be a unique attempt in new theatre.

Ken Grant, an electronic composition major, and his roommate Ted Kneeland are producing the show which will involve as many different mediums as possible. Music, drama, print, films, slides, lights, etc. are examples of the recipe for a mixed media event.

The distinguishing factor of "One Virgin's Blood" is the introduction of a theme into mixed media. Appealing to many levels of conciousness, the show will be inter-related by a message. Although obvious implications from the title lead one to guess that sex is the topic for Kimmel culture, that is not the case.

The theme will be relevant and it is very important for the fullest participation of the audience that everyone arrives by the beginning of the show. Tickets covering the light show, the Sidewinders band, and a final enticement of free beer will be on sale in HBC lobby starting today from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Cost for ducats has been held to a minimum so that more students will be able to take part in the theatre experience and is $1.50 a couple and $1 stag. Tickets are in a limited supply but hopefully all those who wish to cram some cultural and social entertainment into one night will be accommodated.

Kimmel-Marion, in approaching the junior class, reached an agreement that "One Virgin's Blood" would round out the weekend in terms of adding more diversified entertainment, offering a place to go after the concert, and involving a dormitory and, more particularly, independents in the weekend.

Tickets will be on sale at the door and beer along with less intoxicating beverages will flow freely after the mixed media show. In the interest of a true aesthetic experience, no beer will be served before the show is over.

Fred Feld, X3109, will answer questions and fill requests for large blocks of tickets.

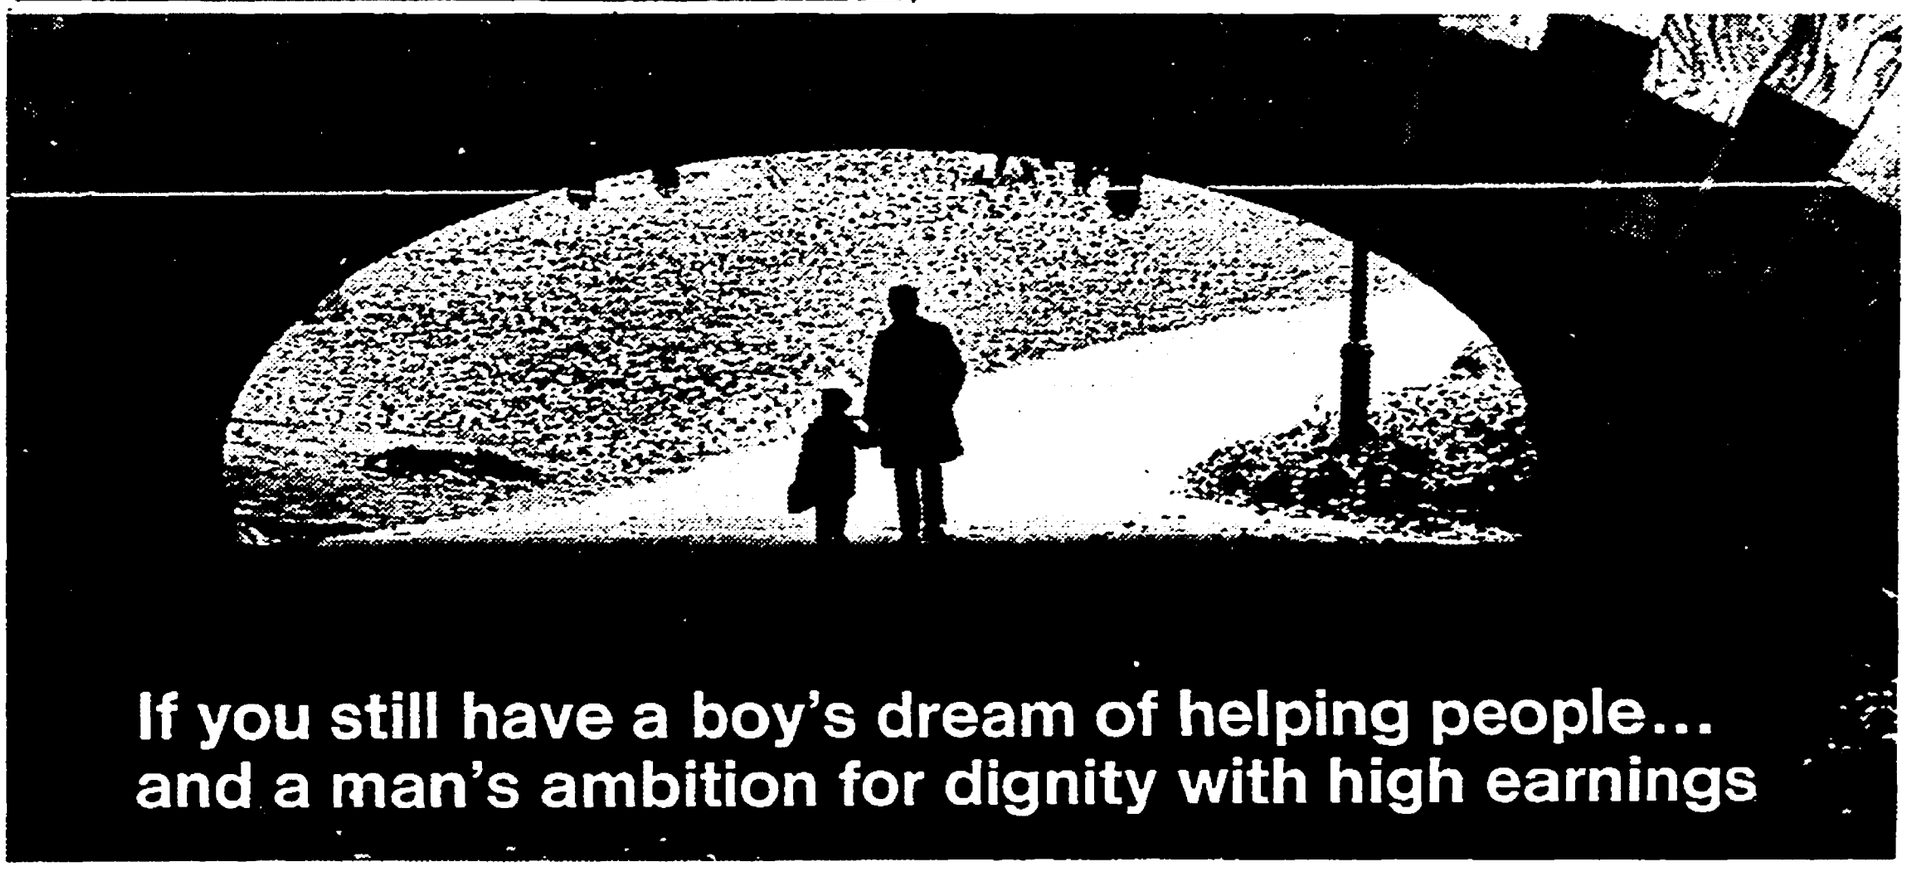
Controversial city designer speaks today

Paul Rudolph, the architect whose design of a proposed City Hall for Syracuse has caused considerable controversy, will visit Syracuse University today to deliver the annual Dillenback Lecture in the School of Architecture.



The lecture, honoring Lemuel C. Dillenback, dean emeritus of the School, will be at 8 p.m. in Grant Auditorium. Rudolph's topic is "The Twentieth Century Trick." There will be a question and answer session after his illustrated lecture.

Rudolph, who has a private practice in New Haven, Conn., was dean of the department of architecture at Yale University from 1958 to 1965. He did his undergraduate work at the Alabama Polytechnic Institute and received a master's degree in architecture from Harvard University in 1947.

He has served as a visiting critic to schools and departments of architecture at Cornell, Tulane, Harvard and Princeton Universities, and at the Universities of California and Pennsylvania.

If you still have a boy's dream of helping people... and a man's ambition for dignity with high earnings

...we offer the rare chance to satisfy the boy's heart and the man's head. We look for the highly motivated young man (or young woman) who hopes to find an honorable career combining dignity and dollars... and is sensitive to the welfare of the world's people.

We can best introduce you to Ortho by saying that here, medicine and science meet to promote better maternal and feminine health, as well as necessary conception control. Ortho is the only company offering a complete choice of medically accepted methods of birth control and gynecologic drugs. From Ortho Diagnostics have come many important reagents for identifying blood antibodies, for hemoglobinometry and coagulation testing; slide tests for pregnancy and infectious mononucleosis and such life preservatives as Pap stains for cancer detection and the recently-introduced globulin for prevention of Rh hemolytic disease of babies.

As a sales representative of Ortho, you'll be welcomed by pharmacists, doctors and top hospital personnel. And because they need our products for their patients, you'll find that being a salesman is more like being part of the medical team. And therefore, doubly rewarding.

At Ortho, your material rewards are much above average: a top starting salary; a car for business and personal use; a full package of benefits, which includes a liberal retirement income program, plus free stock of our parent company, Johnson & Johnson, for those who qualify.

How far can you go at Ortho? 49 former salesmen can tell you—they are now in top executive or management levels—starting with the Chairman of the Board!

We start you off with the finest on-the-job and in-plant training—at full pay. For interviews on campus with our representative Mr. Dudley N. Carpenter on February 24, please see your Placement Director. If an interview is not convenient, please write to Mr. R.L. SU committee supports research strike government has shaken our confidence in its ability to make wise and humane decisions....The response of the scientific community to these developments has been hopelessly fragmented....The concerned majority has been on the sidelines and ineffective. We feel that it is no longer possible to remain uninvolved. We therefore call on scientists and engineers at M.I.T., and throughout the country, to unite for concerted action and leadership."

As well as stopping research, March 4 will be devoted to a series of seminars, colloquia and speakers.

At SU, problems to be considered include:

-The draft and the graduate students.

-Classified research vs. university--are they compatible.

-University-owned research corporations (such as SURC) vs. the university--are they compatable.

--Government contracts.

--Relation of the physical to the social sciences.

--Job opportunities in non-defense-oriented industries.

According to a tentative schedule, the speakers, panel discussions and audience participation will take place in the afternoon.

Participants will then take part in a number of smaller colloquia, each one devoted to a particular topic. These colloquia will be chaired by graduate students "who will have thoroughly researched the subject."

In the evening, according to committee organizers, "a major speaker" will discuss "a topic of interest," followed by a question and answer session.

The topics to be considered reflect a separate statement signed by M.I.T. graduate students last month, affirming that technology "should be redirected from destructive to constructive ends," and protesting the control exercised by the Selective Service System over the work of young scientists and engineers.

Business leaders talk here today

Syracuse University's Association of Graduate Business Students will conduct a franchsing seminar at 3:30 p.m. today in Arnold M. Grant Auditorium.

Sol M. Edidin, vice president and corporation counsel of The Hertz Corporation, will discuss "Finance Structure and Organization Requirements."

Clifford S. Peelman, chairman of Lums, Inc., will speak on "Specialty Food Franchising."

Kenneth J. Coomer, vice president of Kentucky Fried Chicken, will talk on "Operating Policies and Management Assistance."

The program will be preceded by a coffee klatch with any interested students at 3 p.m. in the lounge adjacent to Grant Auditorium. A question and answer period will start at 4:30 p.m.

The seminar is part of the Association's spring semester business lectureship program

The silent forum can communicate

By MAR POELKING

No smiling, no looking, no showing of interest--keep your cool. Such is the code of college life on the street.

But things must be done. Someone has to communicate, somehow. So, the forum is created. Signs sprout on bulletin boards, in windows, on poles and trees. Not the faces, but the signs present the lives of Syracuse students.

"For sale. Inexpensive, but extremely attractive furniture. One year old. Intern moving from city," followed by a neatly typed list of goods. Where to call, when to call, it's all included in the notice. Precise, just the kind of young man to make a good doctor.

"Need ride to New York. Call Mike. 6/15." The sign's still there. Maybe Mike got the ride--maybe not. Anyway, it's too late now. What about the girl headed for Boulder? She's willing to share expenses. She wants badly to get there.

Signs in laundromats serve as public notice. Anyone can post a note, and anyone can read it. Being on such public display can lead to complications. Witness: "call this number" scratched out and replaced with "see me in person."

To preclude such experiences, one "for rent" is fussy before the fact. "Two of three SERIOUS minded graduate women to rent a home in the UPPER section of town."

Another, not the least bit choosy, announces, "House. Male or Female. Need 1-2 roommates." (sic)

When expenses need cutting, signs hawk every conceivable means of transportation--Hondas and Yamahas--"TR-4's in excellent shape with tonneau and only 11,000 miles." A plaintive note in blue on yellow paper reads, "TR Spitfire for sale by single girl who cannot keep up monthly payments."

No precedence is accorded notes firmly established. Others come later and are tacked or stapled over those already there. Notes in stores and laundromats are always looking for a buyer.

Usually notes on telephone poles are in a lighter vein. On a Marshall St. pole, the Sandal Shop suggests, "Buy one sandal, get the other free."

"Danger. This is a telephone pole. Do not eat!" It's effective. Since it went up, not a nibble has been missing from the pole. Under the danger sign a single line on another sheet of paper demands, "Read other side of this pole." Who can resist? Other side sports an ad for Mass Hysteria, as do many trees along Walnut Ave. between Marshall and University. Mass saturation reaches the saturation point. The next pole promises a phone number. That sign is missing, no doubt torn down by some censor who disapproved of Mass Hysteria or was driven to it by the signs.

But the communication must be effective, for this forum has become a campus and world tradition.

Maelstrom

Feb. 21 is the deadline for all contributions of poetry, essays and short stories to be considered for the March issue of Maelstrom.

A mailbox has been provided in the English office 203 HL for the use of contributors.

The editors regretfully were unable to use most manuscripts for the first issue. These may be picked up at the English Office.

Urban Crisis

Students invited to forum

Syracuse is one of 200 schools in the Eastern United States which will be invited to send six student delegates to a convention- symposium on "The Urban Crisis--The Students' Response" at Wake Forest University March 20-22.

The symposium is called "Challenge '69" and is conducted every other year at the Winston-Salem, N.C., school on various problems confronting the country.

Speakers who already have accepted invitations include the keynoter, Sen. Edmund Muskie (D-Maine); Harvey Cox, author of "The Secular City;" Saul Alinsky, director of the Industrial Areas Foundation; Robert Wood, former under-secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development; and Herbert Kramer, former aide to Sargent Shriver and presently a consultant to the Office of Economic Opportunity.

Other speakers who have been invited include Sen. Fred Harris (D-Okla.), a member of the Kerner Commission; Daniel P. Moynihan, urban affairs adviser of President Nixon; and Michael Harrington, author of "The Other America" and chairman of the board of the League for Industrial Democracy.

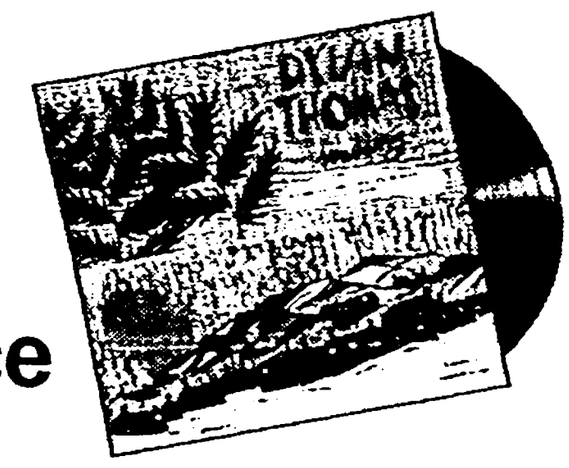
The symposium has three major divisions. The first day, delegates will consider the student's role as a citizen and voter, on the second day his role as a volunteer and on the third his role as part of -the university's participation in community problems.

Officials from over 200 major Eastern cities have been invited to conduct workshops which the delegates will attend in addition to lectures.

According to Miss Norma Murdoch, executive director of CHALLENGE'69, "our program exists as an expression of our anxiety over our nation's plight."

She added, "CHALLENGE '69 will bring together authorities from the various sub-areas of the problem to plant seeds for constructive action by students and their universities."

Works of 28 SU artists selected for exhibition



The works of 28 artists from the Syracuse University School of Art have been selected for the 32nd annual Artists of Central New York exhibition which opened Sunday at the Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute, Utica.

From more than 600 entries submitted by nearly 400 artists, 144 works of painting, sculpture, graphic arts and drawing were selected. William C. Palmer, director of the Munson-Williams-Proctor Institute School of Art, and Joseph S. Trovato, assistant to the director, made the selection.

"A regional show is a sort of proving ground for artists in their own area," Trovato said. "It gives opportunity to everyone--professionals as well as beginners and amateurs. The entries we selected show the best work being done in Central New York."

The Institute will purchase about $2,500 worth of the works shown for its permanent collection.

The exhibition continues to March 16. The Institute is open, except holidays, Monday to Saturday, 10 a.m. to 5 p.m.; Sundays, 2 to 6 p.m..

Voluntary meal sign-away to assist Projection '70

Tomorrow, representatives of the University Religious Council (URC) will be present in the dining halls to allow people to sign a statement that they will not eat the evening meal of February 26 in University dining halls. The University will reimburse the Religious Council for the number of students not eating that meal, and this money will, in turn, be given to Projection '70.

Projection '70 is an example of a student's dream becoming a reality. The idea that Syracuse University should be more involved in bettering the community of Syracuse came to Bob Gladden, when he was running for president of the class of '70, and he dreamed up Projection '70. Gladden based his campaign on the idea of helping Syracuse and he won. The next year Projection '70 began as a voluntary tutoring program, helping slow learners of neighborhood schools. The group ran into problems, like having nowhere to meet. But through the efforts of several members of the class of '70, the hardships were overcome. (Churches donated rooms to be used for meeting.) Not totally satisfied with their one year of success, Projection '70 leaders decided it should be changed into an accredited course to guarantee its existence. Over the summer and last semester Projection '70 was changed to Education 104. Now students receive credit for tutoring neighborhood children and being taught the methods of teaching. But in the transition Projection '70 leaders ran into financial difficulties, and had to cut the number of tutees down to fifty.

Even with this number of leaders, they found it hard to run a valuable program with the available funds, so they appealed to several organizations. URC was one of these organizations.

The funds are still needed to allow Projection '70 to enhance, enrich, and possibly expand their program. URC leaders are hoping for a good showing of students' support for this student-initiated program, in the form of names on the meal-sign-away list.

Free hearing tests

Free hearing tests for the public will be given at Syracuse University's Hearing Clinic, 805 S. Crouse Ave., until Friday from 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. each day.

Dr. Richard H. Nodar, head of the clinic, said "the hearing screening evaluations" are offered as a public service and as part of the graduate training program in the University's Division of Special Education and Rehabilitation.

Graduate students in audiology and education of the deaf will administer the hearing tests.

Mission Impossible?

Danforth readies forces for Redmen

By ED AGRANOWITZ

Good morning Mr. Danforth.

The man you are looking at is Lou Carnesecca, the energetic basketball coach at St. John's who has been making life unpleasant for opposing coaches and players for several years.

This season, he has already pulled the rug out from under North Carolina and Davidson, who have each gone as high as number two in the national rankings.

The latest atrocity by Carnesecca and his Redmen was a 51-46 win over Fordham Saturday night in the magic world of Madison Square Garden Center. Lou and his boys accomplished the deed by holding the Rams scoreless for the last seven minutes and ten seconds of play.

Carnesecca's chief weapons are a well balanced scoring attack, a sticky defense, good rebounding strength, and a deliberate, methodical offense that plays for the percentage shot and makes opposing coaches brown their skivvies.

LITTLE LOU Carnesecca casts a big shadow between Roy Danforth's IM Force and its fourth straight win.

Carnesecca has at his disposal several dangerous accomplices. Leading the way are senior forward Johnny Warren (6-3) and junior guard Joe DePre (6-4). Warren (19 ppg) and DePre (17 ppg) are both talented all-around performers and both go to the boards exceptionally well.

High leaping Ralph Abraham (6-5) is the other forward position for the Redmen, while slick ball handling Carmine Calzonetti, (6-1) completes the backcourt.

At center, Carnesecca has two reasons to smile. 6-9 Dan Cornelius is a strong rebounder and fine team player. Lou doesn't lose any effectiveness when he replaces Cornelius with agile 6-11 soph Bill Paultz, a superb shooter.

Your own force, Roy, should need little encouragement to want to accept this assignment. Carnesecca and the Redmen have brought nothing but misery to Orange teams in the past two years.

Two seasons ago, the Orange were ranked eighth in the nation on the strength of a 19-2 record. The Redmen invaded Manley Field House and snapped the Syracuse win streak, eliminated Orange NCAA tourney hopes, and robbed the team of its momentum.

Last winter, the Orange drew Lou's boys in the first round of the ECAC Holiday Festival. A hard fought five point Redmen win broke the Orange spirit.

And now, Roy, with your Orangemen riding a three game winning streak, Carnesecca again looms as the likely spoiler tonight. It will take more than pre-game soul sounds to turn the tables.

This mission may be impossible, Roy, because the Redmen apparently do not suffer from off nights. The only blemishes on their 18-3 record are close losses to top twenty team Duquesne and top ten team Villanova (overtime), and a setback at the hands of number one UCLA (but not before big Lew and his buddies had some uneasy moments).

Your mission, Roy, regardless of whether or not you wish to accept it, is to stop Carnesecca and the Redmen, and lead your young, improving Orangemen to their fourth straight win.

As usual, if you or any member of your team makes a bad showing, the Syracuse fans will disavow any knowledge of your action.

If you win, St. John's number six national ranking will self-destruct.

Good luck, Roy!

QUIET WATERS of Archbold Pool will be alive with action this afternoon as the Orange meet the Big Red of Cornell University in the biggest home meet of the year. The varsity will begin at 3:30, after the conclusion of the frosh meet. (Photo by Biggar)

Cornell swim meet today is most important for SU

By MIKE WEBER

In every sport, there is one game, one meet, which means more to a team than any other. That one confrontation which stands out over all the others. The meeting which a team points to, regardless of what has come before or what will follow.

Such is the aura surrounding the Archbold pool area, where the SU swimmers finished preparations for their meet against powerful Cornell tomorrow.

Team captain Pete Schacht said the mermen have all the incentive they need by looking at the results of last year's SU-Cornell meet. The Big Red humiliated the Orangemen 80-32 a year ago, to slap the worst defeat of the season on Coach Jon Buzzard's crew.

"They are a tough team," said Buzzard. "But, they always manage to lose some really good freshman swimmers and slip a bit in team strength. If they don't swim any better than they have been, we'll have a good shot at taking the meet."

Buzzard will be counting heavily on Schact, as well as Ross Prossner and Tom Skuce. Prossner is unbeaten in the 200-meter backstroke while also being a top competitor in the 100-meter version. He holds Syracuse records in both of his specialties.

However, Buzzard declined to say where Prossner will be entered, a testament to the junior's fine all-around ability.

Skuce is likewise unbeaten in his specialty, one-meter diving. He has been beaten once in three-meter competition.

Of Skuce, Buzzard said, "He will be involved in a tought matchup with Tim Millhauser of Cornell. We're counting upon a strong showing from Tom "

Schact holds SU records in the 500, 1000 and 1650 yard freestyle events, and will be seeking to better his pace-setting performances against the Big Red.

He summed up his teams chances by saying, "If we swim our best times of the year and they do the same, we'll win. But they'll be up and ready to go."

He recalled that the SU squad will be seeking a measure of revenge when the meet gets underway at 3:30 in Archbold pool. "They just destroyed us last year," he said. "We want to get them this time."

Providing some of the opposition for the Orangemen will be All-American George Boizelle. He won Eastern Intercollegiate titles in the 200 and 400 meter individual medleys and placed high in the national tournament.

Buzzard said Boizelle is "a really good one. He can do a great job in any of the swimming events so we don't know at all where they'll put him "

Another of the Big Red mermen who could give the home team fits is a boy with the unlikely name of Tom Cornell. Buzzard rates Cornell as one of their best in the freestyle events, as well as another product of the jack-of-all-trades mold.

Team captain Schact said the squad's current success (5-1) is due mostly to a well-balanced team. "We haven't had any really great performances by anyone," said the Brooklyn, N.Y. senior, "but our overall effort has been enought to overpower our opponents."

Buzzard strengthened Schacht's statement when he said, "This is the first really well-balanced team we've had since I've been here, either as a swimmer or a coach. I'd love to see the stands full today, because this meet will be a good one."

And so the stage is set for the Orange swimmers meet-of-the-year. With the 80-32 thrashing at the Big Red's hands still stinging, Buzzard's mermen could prove tought to beat.

For the band

To the Editor:

I am sorry to hear that the Orange Basketball Band is solely responsible for the shortcomings of our illustrious Orange basketball team, as implied by Mr. Agranowitz in the DO (Feb. 4).

Accordingly, the group was voluntarily disbanded, when it was seen that it was banging its head against a brick wall, as far as psyching fans is concerned. It is not the fault of the band that patriotic music is not "in" at Syracuse - indeed, patriotism of any kind seems to be verboten on this campus.

The only conclusion one can draw from stories of garbage being thrown - not only at the band - but at the cheerleaders, is that the student body as a whole is terribly sick. Next time you listen to an away game, listen for the band. The bands at Fordham, Cornell, and particularly Penn State's Blue Band are an integral part of student spirit at the courtside.

Correction

Dear Mike:

I see in the January 31, 1969 issue of the Daily Orange that this is the second year of swimming at Penn State. Sorry, but they started in 1936 and Syracuse was their first meet. They swam through 1950 before dropping out. We swam them every year but the war years, and we won all but one of those meets.

In the first meet Al Atterbury of Syracuse won the one meter diving (10 dives) and set a SU record that still stands. Give Al a call. He lives at 201 Craddock St., Syracuse. Jon Buzzard has the original summary sheet of this meet.

Sincerely,
Theodore Webster

Feldman advocates autonomy

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

Students must have the right to establish their own university government to make the educational experience valid, states Council on Student Life (CSL) member Ed Feldman in his statement on dorm autonomy.

This seven-page argument, "In Defense of Dorm Autonomy," will be presented at the Friday CSL meeting, at which a proposal establishing dorm autonomy at SU will be voted upon.

Feldman, also speaker of student senate, has researched the proposal from which could evolve a major policy change of the University. Advocating that the University transform its role from that of an advisor-protector to one of controller-protector, Feldman believes this would help fulfill the university's purpose of educating students.

"This (education) must necessarily include those portions of the community in which he had the potential to learn how to make decisions which will govern his social and domestic life," reads the argument. ". . . However, to the majority of college students the opportunity to develop the ability to make these decisions and the opportunity to exercise this ability are limited."

Feldman then points out a paradox -- that upon graduation the college graduate is expected to be able to decide his social behavior immediately; whereas he has had no opportunity to "learn the skills necessary to make these decisions" during his college education.

Thus, a question is posed by Feldman. "Where and how does the adolescent college student learn the skills that are necessary to the adult college graduate? The answer, according to Feldman, is dorm autonomy. Under the present dorm autonomy proposal each University dorm would have the power to determine its own rules through Inter-Dormitory Council.

Under such a system where students would determine their own governmental workings on a majority-rule basis, Feldman believes students would learn the decision-making process which would help prepare them for the adult world.

REPRESENTATIVE ROSENTHAL

Rosenthal hits inaction

By RONI ZLOKOWER
Associate Editor

"We can keep our present society if steps can be taken to let people believe we are trying," said U.S. Representative Benjamin Rosenthal (D-N.Y.) in an address last night to students of the Black and White in America course.

Speaking on "Congress and the Race Crisis" he conceded that there are only two roads left to follow in solving today's problems: one which involves making some adjustments within existing institutions and the other which involves changing through violence.

"Congress," he said, "will resist the change until the bitter end being the least amenable of all American institutions. You must change America before you can change Congress since Congress is a reflection of its constituents."

Calling the plight of the black man basically an economic problem, Rosenthal compared him to the poverty stricken man of Peru. The Peruvians in the hills had problems similar in nature to the poor blacks' problems of rats, welfare, and unemployment. The Peruvians, however, in moving from the hills to the city of Lima, acquired hope and mobilized this hope into working cooperatives.

In the U.S., Rosenthal feels, the poor man has little hope and feels there is no longer a chance to make it. This lack of hope, combined with a physical despair, "has left the black man leading the most inhumane existence in the Western world."

Rosenthal agreed with the findings of the Kerner report which placed the blame for this existence on the whites, since they have been the perpetrators of the racial problem. Further espousing the recommendations of the Kerner report, he proposed that massive expenditures can be made to provide for decent schooling, housing, and employment.

"In this nation Congress has given in changing the attitudes yet to deliver. We are not yet on an irreversible path." If Congress is incapable, he conceded that maybe some degree of violence may be necessary. "Some people don't move until they are jabbed and maybe a modest amount of violence can do the jabbing." He added that Americans in comfort have forgotten that other societies have "come down."

"The chips are down and the crunch is on. Something must be done to give everyone his piece." First of all, some degree of optimism must be maintained. Secondly, a massive amount of energy and attention must be

Business has hand in foreign affairs

By ANDRIJ BILYK
Associate Editor

Business has fantastic leverage in foreign policy, said House Foreign Relations Committee member Benjamin Rosenthal in Maxwell yesterday afternoon.

"We almost had war with Denmark because a year ago some American businessman was going to undercut the price of chickens and destroy that country's economy," he said.

Rosenthal, a New York Democrat invited to speak on "the role of the House in foreign policy," willingly strayed from his topic to include such things as American-Russian relations, military waste and Africa.

We play strange games with the Russians, said Rosenthal. They keep us on the loose, creating tensions in the Middle East and Germany, but help us negotiate in Vietnam.

"They want to cooperate with us when it's in their interest," Rosenthal said. "Take the Pueblo for example. We've got spy ships-they have spy ships, we have fishing fleets--they have fishing fleets. The North Koreans just didn't know the rules of the game. The Russians used their influence to help us."

Rosenthal said that in his opinion the Russions fear Germany more than they do us. "They want to destroy or weaken NATO since they are afraid that if Germany got nuclear weapons, she would use them."

At one point, an exchange student from Zimbabwe asked Rosenthal to explain the ambiguity of the United States' position which on the one hand supports self-determination of peoples, while in the case of Africa allows for the interests of former colonial powers; for example Portugal.

"We try to maintain a hands-off policy," Rosenthal said. "It is unfortunate that the arms which we send to Portugal through NATO are used to defend that country's interests in Angola. I think our policy has been wrong in that area, I can't support that policy."

Rosenthal said that Africa offers a challenge for the United States. We have never been a colonial power there, and should cultivate African friendships. They constitute a huge voting block in the General Assembly of the United Nations, Rosenthal added.

The Congressman then turned his attention to the homefront. We can, by eliminating waste and duplication, get $80 billion worth of defense for $60 billion, he said.

"I've been in South American capitals and you fall over American generals getting off the plane. There are some who

SU Senate votes to change academic status of ROTC

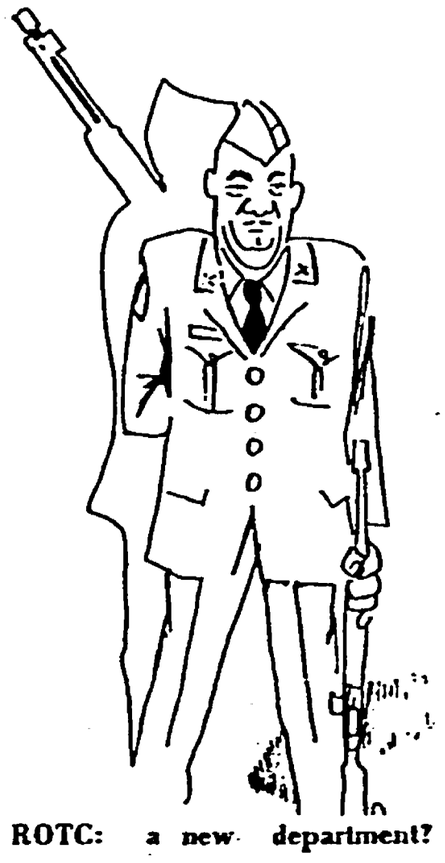
The University Senate last night voted to house the Reserve Officer Training Corps (ROTC) in a new all-University unit.

The vote now needs only the formal approval of the Board of Trustees to make ROTC's exclusion from the College of Liberal Arts official. According to an informed source, the Trustees' approval is almost certain.

The faculty's move came after a recommendation on Monday by the University Senate's agenda committee that ROTC be made a separate department.

Few in opposition

The vote, according to one observer at the meeting, which lasted nearly two hours, was "overwhelmingly" affirmative. He said that only two or three Senate members voted against the recommendation.



However, the Senate voted not to make the change in ROTC's status, when instituted, retroactive. Thus, those students in the present program will not be effected, and will in no way be penalized.

Evaluation planned

The agenda committee's report also recommended studies of the value of military science courses at the University and the academic justification for military science courses.

An expanded committee of the agenda committee will make the studies, it was decided last night.

The attempt to shift, ROTC to a separate department comes within a month of similar action at several universities. At Cornell University, it was recommended that ROTC be removed from military control and placed in regular academic departments without credit. At both Stanford and Yale, academic credit was taken away from the program.

ROTC: a new department?

Financial aid

The Financial Aid Office announces the opening of the application period for financial aid for the 1969-70 academic year.

All students desiring financial aid or its renewal for the coming year must file an application by April 15.

Applications are currently available at the Financial Aid Office, 205 University Pl. Applications received after April 15 will be termed "late applications" and will be considered on that basis.

Notification of awards will be issued in July.

Self-governing dorms statement

The six page philosophy on dorm autonomy, drafted by Ed Feldman for presentation to the Council on Student Life, is an honest attempt to synthesize an idea of education and a current student issue. The result, however, pays too much attention to the issue at too great a cost to education.

According to the statement, an education, in addition to training and enriching the mind, "must also include the process whereby an undergraduate learns to become a member of the society which he will enter upon graduation."

It may follow from this assumption that "the university must place itself . . . in a position in which the university has no immediate control over the social and domestic lives of the undergraduates, but is ultimately responsible for the well-being and actions of the undergraduates."

This, too, is a future point of debate but what we are primarily concerned about is the idea that the university must prepare you for the society you are about to join. Pushed to an extreme this idea is translated into such absurdities as "Cocktail Hour 710" and "Country Club 109." The author of the statement of course meant that the social environment in the University should approximate that of the outside world.

Obviously the social environment is related to the academic environment at a university, as the statement assumes. But must we accept the limitations of the outer world as the only potential for the University social environment?

A major part of training the mind is developing its critical faculties. Thus to train the mind and also prepare the individual for the society he will join implies a continuing tension between acceptance of what is that society and dissenting from it.

We think a rough idea of education is to transmit knowledge of what is and to develop a critical capacity for what could be. Our complaint is that the University prepares us all too well for the "real" world; too many of us are destined to accept the same shortcomings and fall into the same grooves which we reject in our parents.

The idea of dorm autonomy, which we support as a gradual goal, should stand primarily on its own merits. It offers the potential of creating a better environment rather than duplicating the model offered by the outside world.

And it leaves open for experimentation the best way to resolve within the total academic environment the tension between our "real" social shortcomings and our potential.

Mickey Mouse Club

Student Senate

By Richard L. Gelula

As a Student Senate representative over the past few months, I have had the advantages of seeing government and various student representative bodies at work in a manner few freshman can. Unfortunately I now find that I must give up my job, but before I do, I'd like to relate my views in the hope that a better system can be developed.

On arriving at Syracuse, the basic problems were not too hard to discern. Though the issues were various, all the problems eventually seemed divided between the students on one side and the administration on the other. The students generally wanted a liberalization of rules while the administration wished to retain their power and the status-quo.

Since I had four years to plan, I felt I had much at stake in the fight for greater student power. I decided to act, but was not quite sure how, what with the tremendous array of representative bodies, councils, committees, etc. Eventually I became a member of Student Senate. I thought this group would permit me the opportunity to get truly involved in obtaining something concrete from the administration.

Needless to say, I was disappointed. I found that Senate was little more than the "Micky Mouse Club" it was accussed of being. I found its voice very ineffective. It definitely didn't seem to be making effective strides for the benefit of students, though not for the reasons commonly believed.

I found that the problem with Student Senate was that the students themselves would not permit it to function in its proper way. It seemed that there were just too many student leaders, too many who wanted to be consulted, and too many who wanted a slice of the power pie. Most important of all, the administration was using an overly organized, but inefficient student body to it benefit in maintaining the status-quo. The parietal hours issue is a perfect example.

To submit demands on a university campus, one would think that a single unified voice would be best. Student Senate representing all living centers should best fullfill that role. Somehow Inter-Dormatory Council has decided that parietal hours is within its jurisdiction too (whether it is or not matters little). Also I.F.C. and A.W.S. can't be left out, and let's not forget Council on Student Life and various other committees. Now match that disarray against the same disarray of deans, committees, and trustees that the administration offers and you have a static situation. The problem first becomes now to get movement and then, how to get parietal hours.

Ideally this shouldn't be too hard to solve, but realistically it may prove to be. First we must all realize that we are working for the same goal, the students. Secondly the hard part, we must try to unify ourselves into one voice, the Student Senate voice. Unfortunately for the power hungry this may mean taking a rear seat, but at least something might happen.

Now, the alienated students might for the first time see hope and join together resulting in whatever the students desired, be it parietal hours, better academics, or anything else. All that is needed is a unified student body behind a unified voice.

I'm sure anyone looking at the situation can see why and how the system is not working. The administration already has. Now its time that the students too get smart, for if they really want progress they'll unite in their demands. If progress is not their goal, then Micky Mouse games will result, and the students will suffer.

Letters to the editor

Library checkers?

To the Editor:

A complaint: The library turnstile checkers aren't checking. Or, if they are checking, it's a sporatic thing at best. When walking out of the library with library books in my hand I get perfunctory waves through the turnstile, or sheepish grins telling me that the kid is just too embarrassed to ask me if I stole something, or maybe not even a glance, the checker being so engrossed in his own reading.

I suppose the turnstiles were set up and the checkers placed at the exits to reduce pilferage, insure better library control, and prevent creeping frustration from overtaking those of us who keep getting told that the books we want "seem to be missing."

Being able to get the books we need is a very serious business. I hope the library authorities consider this matter.

Island of commitment

To the Editor:

I've been tempted many times since September (when we acquired the nomenclature "Parents-of-a-Freshman--at-Syracuse") to write a letter offering accolades or arguments pertinent to an editorial or article which captured our interest. Fortunately, the realization that your newspaper is primarily an organ of and for campus inhabitants permitted good judgement to prevail.

Nevertheless, I decided to sit down and get off a few kudos to Marty Gordon for his article "Search for Identity: alienated vs. radicals" in the January 31st issue. It was a well presented, ambitious undertaking; made more meaningful written by a student rather than an analyst long past his college days.

We've enjoyed your newspaper, and appreciate the time and effort it involves. You seem to be an island of commitment in a sea of lethargy!

No legislative decision yet, but . . .

Grads may continue to receive incentive award

By MARY McDANIEL

The New York State Scholar Incentive award, narrowly saved for graduate students this year, may be reinstated for next year as well.

This was the opinion expressed by Dean James Harrison of the Graduate School at the Senate meeting of the Graduate Student Organization (GSO) last Wednesday night, Feb. 12.

The Scholar Incentive awards were designed to help pay the tuition and costs of students from New York State. Although these awards were intended mainly for undergraduates, graduate students receiving tuition waivers of some kind, have also received them.

Awards to these students were to have been discontinued next year.

Harrison, appearing before the Senate at the request of the Assistantships and Fellowships Committee, said that although no official word had come out of the State Legislature as to the reinstatement of the awards, neither had any new policy of state aid been decided upon to take their place.

Owing to this delay, he said, the state will probably have little choice but to continue the present system of incentive awards for the academic year 1969-'70.

Funds in the amount of 1.1 million dollars have been appropriated to fund the program for the rest of the year, Harrison said, referring to a report by Vice President Kenneth Bartlett, a Representative to the Legislature.

Despite the present "grace period" however, he pointed out that a major policy change in state aid to higher education is anticipated within the next two years. Such a policy change will effect undergraduates as well as graduates.

The major alternative to the present Scholar Incentive program is contained in the Bundy plan.

Under this plan, the institution would receive a lump sum, the amount of which would be determined by the degrees granted, (ie: so much for the BA/S, MA/S, and Ph. D times the number of these degrees granted in a year.)

No money would be awarded the individual student under this plan; but, it is theorized, the money granted the institution would help hold the line of student costs and prevent a rise in tuition.

A constitutional conflict may arise in the adoption of this plan over the question of state aid to church-related schools such as Syracuse.

Dolch and two other members of the GSO Executive Committee attended a recent meeting of the Council. At this meeting they emphasized the fact that graduate students constitute over 40 percent of the student population and therefore should have representation on the Council.

As a result, the Council invited the GSO to send two representatives to be on the reorganization committee. Graduate representation will be determined in this committee.

Dorm autonomy . . .

operates according to the policy of in loco parentis. Under such policy the University assumes parental control of students and is also responsible for the actions of students.

"This gives the university the right to arbitrarily make binding decisions concerning the life of the undergraduate student," comments Feldman.

Thus, Feldman proposes that the University adopt the role of advisor rather than ruler, which would permit students to make their own decisions.

"The University community, in order to be a community whose basic goal is a true educational experience, must establish an environment where the adolescent can make mistakes, learn from these mistakes, and correct them himself, without 'parental' interference," reads the statement.

"I advocate an enlightened university which allows its students to explicate the advantages of the privileged community in which they exist so that the ultimate goals of that community may be more fully accomplished," concluded Feldman. "A system of dorm autonomy is the first step in that direction. It is a step where the University realizes what its rightful position would be and where the students are given the chance to have their first experiences in acting as mature adults."

...is personal development programs

As a graduating engineer, how can you position yourself so that your career chances are constantly optimized? Answer—get with an aerospace company where the optimum conditions are . . . Grumman. Here we take a keen interest in seeing that our engineers and scientists develop personally. We are sincerely interested in their personal progress within the company . . . that they keep abreast of the sweeping advances in technology, not because they can contribute more (although this is true), but more because it makes for greater individual progress and well-being. Job satisfaction, if you will. Let's look at these personal development programs.

Tuition Reimbursement Program
Directly applicable to their work, these programs offer engineers and scientists financial assistance for graduate studies at the many institutions in the Long Island-New York area.

In-Plant Courses
Engineering courses, particularly those not available at neighboring institutions, to deepen technical knowledge to the specific needs of the engineering sections.

College-Industry Courses
Selective attendance for rapid technical updating on fundamentals, theoretical methods and design information. (One to two weeks' duration.)

Engineering Masters Fellowship Program
To enhance creative design capability, one-year fellowships, renewable for a second year, are awarded to new engineering Bachelor of Science graduates and engineers with a year or more company service. The program combines two days of graduate school study with three days of in-plant engineering (in fixed or rotating assignments) and covers payment of full tuition, books, fees, a stipend, and a salary at engineering hourly rates for the hours worked.

Professional Development Programs
Lasting for 2 years, participants are given, in 4 six-months' terms, an exposure to Grumman operations which broadens their technical knowledge, sharpens ability to make sound decisions, and raises their career potential. Separate programs serve individuals in Business Systems, Engineering and Manufacturing.

Senior Engineers' Program
Intended to overcome the threat of technological obsolescence, individual disciplines are updated with regard to new scientific discoveries, new or expanded applications of long existing knowledge, and computer applications to problem solving.

Senior Management Development
Selected individuals within Grumman junior and middle management groups are nominated to attend management development programs such as the MIT Executive Development Program, the Program for Management Development or the Advanced Management Program at Harvard University.

Basic Principles of Supervisory Management
A series of discussion sessions provide a course in management principles to group leaders who show technical management ability.

Here then is a real opportunity for graduating engineers in AE, CE, EE, ME, IE, Physics and Chemical Engineering . . . to take their place in the continuum of technology that is Grumman. Grumman representatives will be ON CAMPUS TUESDAY, MARCH 4.

Medical professors urge abortion reform during Upstate forum

RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

About 300 persons gathered at the Upstate Medical Center last night to hear a forum on abortion sponsored by the Medical Committee for Human Rights for the National Organization for Women.

Participants in the forum included several gynecologists, psychiatrists, two Assembly representatives and a Catholic priest. It was moderated by Dr. Howard Osofsky, associate professor of obstetrics and gynecology at the medical center, and Arlene Hayman, an Upstate English instructor.

A very effective and moving opening was provided by the use of a tape in which three women narrated their experiences with illegal abortion.

Of the four gynecologists participating in the forum, three strongly urged reform liberalizing abortion laws.

Dr. Kenneth Niswander, associate professor of obstetrics and gynecology at SUNY Medical Center at Buffalo, held that at the present time legalization of abortion is "not a moral problem."

"American women have already decided it for us," he said. The great number of women who have been having abortions is, in Niswander's opinion, sufficient evidence that reform is necessary.

Concurring with him was Dr. Philip Ferro, clinical associate professor of obstetrics and gynecology at Upstate.

"I am convinced of the determination of women to seek the end of unwanted pregnancies," Ferro said. He deplored the fact that "despite the great deal of talk about birth control, it is often not considered until after pregnancy occurs."

Probably the strongest plea for liberalization of abortion laws came from Dr. Owen Fairchild, director of Syracuse's planned parenthood Center. "As I have talked to people with a real need for abortion and sterilization," she said, "I have become more and more liberal." "The biggest roadblock to women getting help is men over 45 who hold public and political office."

Only Dr. Raja Abdul-Karim, associate professor of obstetrics and gynecology at Upstate, dissented with his colleagues, holding that "abortion may not solve the ills that it is supposed to be removing."

Father John McCrea, a Catholic priest, represented a religious viewpoint long opposed to abortion. "It's good to be among friends," Father McCrea joked as he began to speak.

Father McCrea explained that his main concern was whether a fetus is a human being from the time of its conception.

He held that if it is, then the law should be obligated to protect its life, and urged that "we give the issue the greatest study."

Other speakers included Dr. Thomas Szasz, professor of psychiatry at Upstate, who spoke briefly on the psychological effects of abortion.

Dr. Kenneth Bartlett, and Mrs. Constance Cook, New York State Assembly representatives, from the 119th and 125th Districts respectively, described recent abortion bills that have been presented to the state legislature for approval.

Treasurers needed on finance board

Applications are being accepted for positions on the newly created Student Finance Board, according to Ross Starek, treasurer of Student Government.

The board, which will allocate all funds for student activities and organizations, will be composed of two Student Senate members, one faculty member or administrator, three treasurers fo campus organizations and the SG treasurer, who will serve as chariman.

The three organizational treasurers will be chosen on a rotating basis. No organization will have representation more than one year and the same people may not hold a position on the board longer than a year.

Those treasurers interested in applying should submit applications including name, address, organization and a brief summary of the concepts of student funds and why students should control them, to Starek at Phi Kappa Psi, 113 College Place.

Politics, athletics at SU discussed on WAER

Lecture of the Week on Saturday presents Congressman Benjamin Rosenthal (D.,N.Y.) in a broadcast of his lecture yesterday.

Congressman Rosenthal's topic is, "Congress and the Race Crisis." This lecture is presented as a part of the Lecture Series of the new Syracuse University course studying the black man in America.

Ernest Grafe, Director of Public Affairs, will host this program and will offer commentary about the lecture and the new University course.

Dave Cohen discusses the "lesser publicized" athletic teams of Syracuse University, tomorrow at 5 p.m.

As part of the continuing sports coverage of the WAER Sports Department, "Orange Sportlight" will feature representatives of the Fencing Team, Track Team, and Gymnastic Team. Captain Peter Lai, Guy Roberts, and Ernie Santangelo will discuss the problems of being members of teams classified as minor sports.

"Orange Sportlight" is aired every week and is heard at 5:00 p.m. Fridays on WAER FM, the Voice of Sports in Syracuse.

think we don't need military missions in South America."

The Congressman said that the House Foreign Relations Committee, which has so far been overshadowed by the Fulbright committee in the Senate, will become more critical since a Republican is President.

"It is very distressing if you're a Democrat in the House to be harshly critical of a Democratic president."

Fulbright disliked Johnson and the President's cabinet, Rosenthal said, but he may ease up now. He was heard to remark that Rogers was a great guy. Yet much depends on House chairman Dr. Thomas Morgan, the Congressman added, and he isn't really about to shake the world with foreign policy.

of this country. Thirdly, strong steps of progress must be made in individual communities.

Following his opening statements, students began questioning the politician. Some pointed to the failures of Congress with past programs.

Other students expressed their doubts that Congressional appropriations would go where they are needed without an end to the war.

Leonora Brazell, who had spoken to the Congressman during the discussion as a black student who had experienced the futility of laws in regard to integration felt that the speech "was more or less jive. His statements were glossed over and he contradicted himself many times."

"He's caught in the typical liberal bag," commented Alan Weinstein, another student who sought dialogue with Rosenthal. "The problems he spoke of immobilized him. He realizes the necessity for change in society but his commitment to the 'liberal Democratic system' puts him in a position where he can't do anything."

Currency in a Common Market nation is devalued.

Help wanted:

How can we protect our automotive investments on the continent?

Situation: If a member nation of the Common Market devalues its currency as the speculators appear to be betting, other Common Market nations may follow suit.

Question: Faced with this possibility, could you develop a plan of action detailing how we can best protect our large automotive investments in each of the member nations?

Consideration: Remember the importance of the Common Market agricultural agreement concerning price stabilization, cost considerations and exchange restrictions. Need your thoughts on this A.S.A.P. Thanks.

Want to work on an exciting assignment like this?
A new member of the financial staff at Ford Motor Company does. Today his job may be solving a complex Common Market problem. Tomorrow, it might be an analysis of profit potentials.

Criteria discussed

Students cite perfect dean

The Student Committee for the Selection of a New Dean of Women has created the perfect dean–but only in theory.

Peg Johnston, committee chairman, described the criteria the committee has discussed for use in selecting a successor to Dean Marjorie Smith.

"A Dean of Women must have two faces," she said, "one for the outside world and one for the students. But she should say the same things with both faces."

A sensitivity to students' feelings was considered essential to a good Dean. Even when student opinion differs from her personal views, a Dean must represent both sides when dealing with trustees or administrators.

"The Dean should be ready to allow students to make mistakes," Peg Johnston stated, explaining that the new Dean should not be overly sensitive to parental pressure.

The Dean's administrative load should be cut down, Peg added.

Peg defined the committee's role as more informal than formally structured. The committee will interview nominees and have a voice in the final decision. They have also decided to use publicity and communication with the student body as informal powers of influence. Committee members are: Willette Hunte, freshman; Ellen Rogers, sophomore; Barbara Brinckerhoff and Carol Bates, juniors; Mary Melita, senior transfer; Michelle LeMoal, first-year graduate student; Karen Blank, second-year graduate student.

PFP organizes to face charges

By MITCH LANEL

Two Peace and Freedom Party organizers, Larry Alexander and Bruce Augustyniak, will face charges tomorrow in City Criminal Court stemming from a disorder at the Nixon rally on October 29. The two have been arraigned for disorderly conduct and resisting arrest and are currently free on $1,000 bail each. Assistant District Attorney Scillin, who will be prosecuting the case, claims a simple case and expects no trouble convicting the pair. Maximum sentence for the two counts is one year and fifteen days.

Defense Counsel Richard Mosher, recommended to the pair by the American Civil Liberties Union, feels that the case involves the constitutional question of symbolic speech.

The first amendment of the constitution guarantees the right to free speech, including protest. Mosher contends that the actions of the two were limited to demonstrating and placard carrying.

Alexander claims that the Syracuse Police Dept., after initially agreeing to allow The Peace and Freedom party free admittance, changed their minds after advice from Nixon aides and made it clear to him that their group was not wanted at the Nixon rally. Alexander arrived with the group anyway and was denied admittance because of overcrowding. At this point, Alexander said he attempted to pass out leaflets to the public outside the War Memorial. He claims he was physically ejected from the area and warned by the policeman that if he attempted to do that again, he would be arrested. Alexander walked around the building and stood with Augustyniak and others attempting to gain entrance to the building.

Here, Augustyniak and Alexander with others, demonstrated against Nixon and the Vietnam War. The two called the police "pigs" and made noises imitating the grunting of pigs. The police moved to arrest the two leaders for obscenity.

The leaders claim they were advanced on and knocked to the ground. While being led away to the Public Safety Building, through a series of underground tunnels, Alexander claims that he and Augustyniak were beaten by police. Counsel arrived twenty minutes after the pair. He immediately requested medical aid for Alexander who was hospitalized for a head laceration.

Augustyniak claims that it is a "political crime that we are accused of....dissenting against Nixon. It is important for people to realize where their freedoms are being abridged and the source of the threat to their freedoms" explains Augustyniak as the reason he has insisted on a jury trial.

Beats Cornell, 67-46

Orange rocks its way to swim win

DIVER JEFF KECK was nosed out of the money in both diving events yesterday, but the Orange got a big win anyway, beating arch-rival Cornell, 67-46. The Syracuse team now sports a 6-1 mark on the year, with two meets remaining. (Photo by Clemens)

Maybe Jon Buzzard did lose a week's sleep before his swim team met Cornell yesterday, but he was in his office rocking with the rest of the team after SU notched a 67-46 victory yesterday afternoon in Archbold Pool.

Buzzard allowed the Beatles' Sgt. Pepper to be piped over the loudspeaker before and after the meet. "The music helped," captain Pete Schacht observed. "We were psyched."

Schacht himself brought sweet music to Buzzard's ears with two individual victories and a leg on the winning 400 freestyle relay team. He set a new university record in the 1,000 after going head-to-head with Cornell's captain, Tom Cornell, for almost 30 of the 40 laps. His new record of 10:53 eclipsed the mark set earlier this season by frosh Brian Krause.

"When he began to drop back, I decided I wasn't going to let him catch up," Schacht said. "He's a good boy. He's been beating me for three years."

Schacht came right back to defeat Cornell again in the 500 freestyle, drawing away after the Big Red swimmer kept at his side for the first 17 laps. "Schacht did amazingly well today," beamed Buzzard after the meet. Pete, however, was less awed by his own performance, which included a 50.7 leg in the final relay. "The only thing different today," he claimed, "was shaving off my moustache."

His elated teammate, Ross Prossner, saw things a little differently. "For the first time today," Prossner explained, "he started looking like what he's capable of doing."

Prossner himself won two races and a relay, and set another university record of his own. That came in the 200 backstroke, his specialty. He set a new mark of 2:08.1 despite the ease of his victory, and the fact that it was his third race of the day. "I think I can go faster," he admitted. Although the ease of his win was apparent, the efficiency of Prossner's underwater stroke is what deceives his opponents and the fans.

Syracuse jumped out to a quick 25-9 lead in the meet, but Cornell drew to within five, at 33-28, before a come from behind effort by Larry Shulman and Dave Crockenberg gave the Orange a one-two finish in the 100 freestyle. Crockenberg also anchored the two victorious SU relay teams. In the final event, the 400 freestyle relay, Crockenberg made up a two body length disadvantage to win by almost a length. His time for his 100 yard leg was an excellent 49.7.

For Cornell, George Boizelle also scored a triple, winning the Individual Medley, the butterfly and the breaststroke. In the latter race, SU's Al Comly grabbed a second at the wire with a Garrison finish, giving the Orange enough points to clinch the meet in front of the near-capacity crowd.

"It makes a lot of work worthwhile," Buzzard said about the win. "This is the first time we've beat them when we've had teams of equal strength." The last SU win over the Big Red came two years ago, when Cornell was having an off year.

The swim team now has only two dual meets remaining--with Rochester and Colgate, which now looms as the major obstacle. "We're moving now," said Buzzard, whom team members say would rather beat Cornell than Colgate any time. "The whole team needed this."

What Sgt. Buzzard and his Lonelyhearts Club Swimmers need now is a little bit of luck, or strong Colgate might just capsize their beautiful yellow submarine.

St. John's clips SU, 71-63; Syracuse close, but no cigar

By LARRY CENTER

The game was two minutes too long for Syracuse last night.

The Orangemen scared seventh-ranked St. John's by keeping pace for 38 minutes, only to hit a cold spell and bow, 71-63, before the largest crowd of the season at Manley.

The fans gave SU a standing ovation when Bill Smith's layup gave the Orange a 58-56 lead with 7:08 left in the game. After a time-out by Redman coach Lou Carneseca, though, his team outscored Syracuse, 9-1.

After the St. John's time-out, Dan Cornelius and then Bill Paultz played in front of Smith and prevented him from getting the ball. SU was forced to throw up outside shots and couldn't hit. The Redmen's slow offense forced the impatient Orange to foul and see their chances evaporate.

The first half saw the teams trade baskets for most of the 20 minutes, with St. John's holding the biggest lead at 17-11. Each team used a deliberate offense and worked for good shots, as Smith kept moving to the basket with the ball and working effectively against the 6 ft. 9 in. Cornelius.

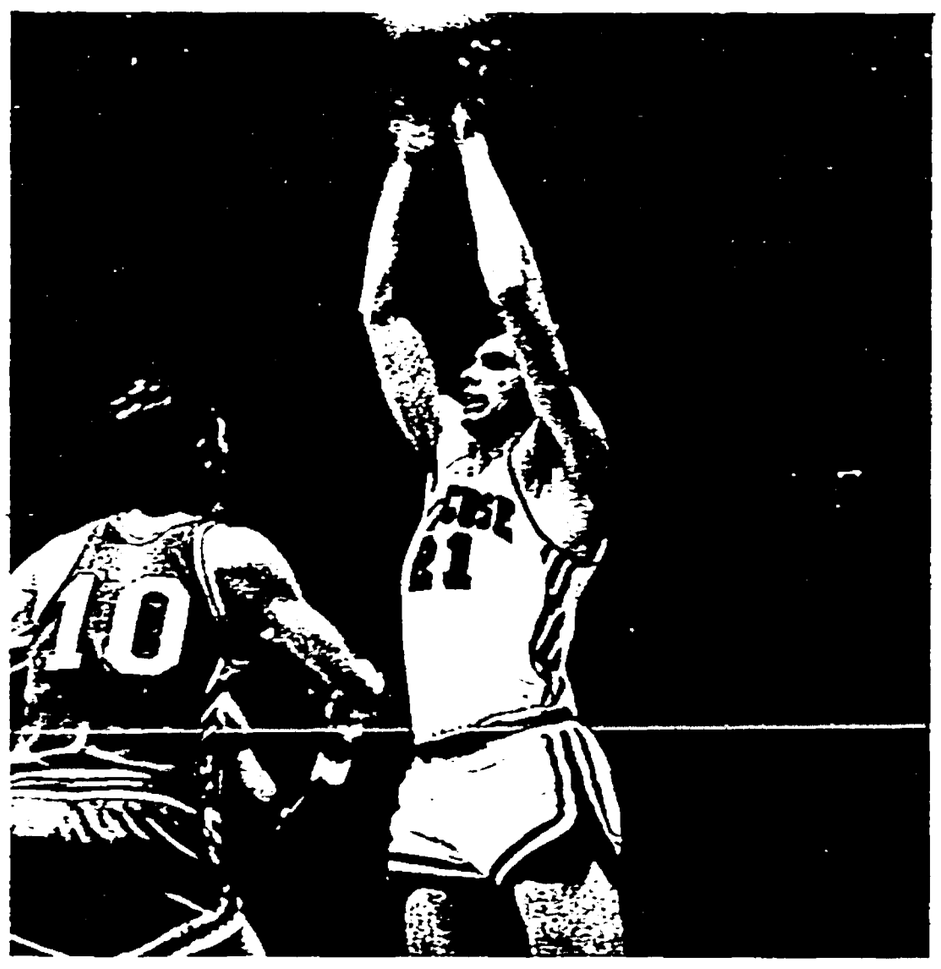
SU trailed for most of the way until Smitty and supersub Bill Finney led a comeback. The Orange outscored the Redmen, 7-1, over a two minute period to take a 31-29 advantage.

With the count knotted at 35, after a Bill Case tip off a missed Smith free throw, the tall center's famous temper showed itself for the first time in the game as he and Redman Joe DePre squared off at mid-court after some shoving under the boards. The ref separated them, though, as play continued.

St. John's steadily pulled in front at the start oft the second half. Once Syracuse gave them five chances at the hoop before John Warren scored to maintain their lead at 43-36. The lead increased to 47-37, the biggest margin of the game, as SU was outscored, 10-2.

The momentum suddenly changed, however, and the Orange stormed back with five straight points to narrow the gap. In the spurt, Smith led with four consecutive points.

With the score at 51-44, ERnie Austin swiped the ball and went in for a layup. After a St. John's free throw, Ernie hit again. Bob Kouwe stole the ball twice and the second time he fed Smith for a basket that got Syracuse within two.



Finney found the range again and hit on two of his long jumpers as the crowd was really getting psyched. The score was tied at 56 when Case connected on a follow shot. Then came Smith's layup and the St. John's time-out.

The complexion of the game changed, and Syracuse slowly went downhill. The Orange couldn't buy a basket for a few minutes, while St. John's held the ball for the good shot. A DePre drive and Calzonetti steal with three minutes to go iced if for the Redmen.

After the game, Chancellor William Tolley presented Smith, the game's high scorer with 22, with the Varsity Club's Most Valuable Player Trophy. Warren led St. John's with 20.

Wrestlers lose

The SU wrestlers bowed to Cornell last night, 23-21 in Ithaca. Among the Syracuse winners were Vinnie Paolano, on a pin, Eric Greenberg, by decision and Bob Rust on a forfeit. The frosh beat Cornell, 21-18.

NEW SUPERSUB Bill Finney came off the bench to score 10 points last night as St. John's squeaked past the Orange, 71-63. Largest crowd of the year at the Field House saw the Orange drop its 15th game of the year. (Photo by Haxo)

Come from behind

Tangerines upset Broome Tech

By FRED KRAVER

Broome Tech Junior College was ranked seventh in the nation among junior colleges before they met the Tangerines last night in the preliminary game at Manley. Broome Tech will not be rated that high in the next poll. Syracuse pulled off an outstanding upset with a 65-61 victory.

It appeared as though the SU frosh would be blown off the court in the opening minutes, as Broome Tech jumped off to a 9-0 lead. But Gil Guerrero hit a free throw after 4:27 had gone, and the Tangerines were on the way.

The Hornets opened in a shifting zone defense that baffled the frosh in the first few minutes. The game plan was to work for the good shot, and gradually it became effective. Syracuse whittled the lead down, and trailed at halftime, 36-32.

After the second half tip-off, both teams were red hot. Greg Kohls and Paul Piotrowski were hitting consistently to counteract the phenomenal shooting of Tech's Al Crews. With 9:15 gone in the second half, Guerrero tied the score at 47, and 24 seconds later, Kohls put Syracuse ahead for good.

Syracuse continued to play according to the game plan as Tech shifted to a man-to-man defense. Later, in desperation, they returned to their rotating zone.

With 1:30 left, Guerrero made the score 61-57 in the Tangerines' favor. Crews then put up a 20 footer. It bounced off the rim, and Kohls pulled down the crucial rebound. Time was called with 1:10 remaining. Tech's Al Reid then fouled Kohls with 47 seconds left, and Kohls converted a one-and-one to account for the last two points.

Coach Bill Vesp was drenched with perspiration after the game, and was extremely happy over his team's upset. "We played an excellent game as a team," he said. "We worked the ball very well."

Defensively, Vesp had the Tangerines going man-to-man. In previous games, Syracuse was hurt by their lack of height. Last night, they only had to worry about Tech's 6-7 center Frank Robinson. Robinson finished with ten points and six rebounds, as SU's defense nullified his height.

In the final statistics, the Tangerines out-rebounded Broome Tech 35-28. Syracuse shot 51.1% from the field, while Tech shot 45.6%. In scoring, Greg Kohls led the Tangerines with 17, Paul Piotrowski had 15, Gary Rainbow had 12, Gil Guerrero had 11 and Ken Gray hit for 9. Crews led Broome Tech with 31 points.

The Tangerines' next game is Feb. 22 here against Cornell. Tonight's win brought their record to 7-6.

Biafra

Relief workers lift Biafran infants into a plane for evacuation to an orphanage in neighboring Gabon. They and thousands of others have been victims not only of war but also of starvation. Next Wednesday a group of students will begin a 5-day fast in order to "educate themselves in the experience of hunger," and thus better understand famine and dramatize the urgency of the Biafran situation. Object of protest, bad professors

There is something flimsy and sham about much of the anti-administration student issues today. Of course there is need for change and improvement in our dorm environments, disciplinary procedures, and social regulations. But those who have real control over the lives of students and who sometimes exercise it tyrannically are the faculty.

Although the administration may be aggravating in its insistence on certain policies, they are usually not central ones but peripheral social issues. Although the rule may say no drinking on campus except at registered University social functions, it isn't all that hard to get off campus or to the Orange for a nip or two.

What is central to the atmosphere of a university is the quality of its teaching. Perhaps in our inability to change the tyranny of poor teaching, unprepared lecturers and unfair grading, we turn to the simple issues of challenging administrative authority.

Not that Syracuse University lacks many outstanding and excellent teachers. It doesn't. But the few who are incompetent, using the devices of tenure and academic freedom to exercise classroom tyranny, deserve to be challenged. And this could be a legitimate aim of student power.

What more eloquent expression of dissent than an empty classroom staring at the unprepared professor?

But Daddy said it was O.K. to drop acid, Mommy!

What's cooking with ROTC

Briefly noted

By Abe Wagner

The question of ROTC's place in the College of Liberal Arts seems to come under increasing indictment with each passing semester. If it has not already been expelled from the ranks of the Liberal Arts, at least the runners are greased and both students and faculty alike are pushing with all their might. Little consideration, however, appears to be given as to where a poor, dispossessed ROTC should go.

One obvious and rational alternative that has been grossly overlooked is to place ROTC safely within the bosom of the College of Home Economics. One might be prone to ask what relation the science of pillage, rape and the like have to do with the fine arts of the home and family. A little consideration though provides the clear and natural link.

To recall man in the state of nature, it was the man's function besides being a provider, to defend and protect the home. As he progressed into society and formed a social contract with his fellow man, he found that certain economies of scale and the division of labor dictated that some men train themselves as full time defenders of this society.

Now that we have reached this advanced state of socialization, he often loses sight of the purpose of the military. Yet their still remains this fundamental role of the man as protector of the home; economically and otherwise.

Thus, if ROTC is to be drummed out of the ranks of the Liberal Arts, as it rightly should, it may yet return to its place as a true science of the home.

Letters to the editor

Pro-ROTC

To the Editor:

I see where the SDS, with the aid of the DO, has launched a campaign against ROTC. How nice of them to decide for us that, like Dow Chemical and others, ROTC is a no-no. It does seem a lot simpler this way, doing away with all the formalities of asking the students what they want and simply deciding it for them. Or, perhaps the SDS is going to tell us that a majority, even a vast majority, of the students favor abolition of the ROTC, and that alone is sufficient reason for kicking the military boys out. This explanation would naturally have to be accompanied by a statement to the effect that the "fanatical few" who favor keeping ROTC should be cast aside and ignored as irrelevant. Well, stop me if I'm wrong, but wouldn't that be in dire contrast to the SDS's normal advocacy of unpopular causes, ones which are defended only be falling back on minority rights as opposed to majority rule? Or are minority rights important only when the SDS is not in the majority?

It seems as though when the SDS prototypes decided to leave our mindless, formless society to set themselves up as free thinking individualists, by some freak accident they all wound up changing themselves into individualists who act, dress, think and look exactly the same. Undaunted by that they are now busily endeavoring to force the rest of society's "stereotypes" to conform to their "individuality."

One more thing puzzles me about this. As I understand it, one of the primary gripes of the radicals is relevancy of college curriculum. If that is so it follows that they should advocate abolishing the entire university except for the ROTC, since more so than any other course offered at SU, ROTC prepares one for a future in that field in a practical and well rounded way. Compare, if you will, requiring twelve hours of military tactics for an individual advocating a military career, to requiring twelve hours of chemistry, biology, geology, etc. for an individual such as myself who is majoring in American Civil War history. I believe that it narrows down to one of two objectives as far as the aims of the SDS is concerned. Either they have decided that they should have control over what a student may or may not learn at Syracuse, or else they feel the ROTC is a competitive threat to their own militarism.

Lastly, I believe a lot of young hearts would be broken by an abolition of ROTC. Haven't you noticed all the little boys and girls running around campus wearing field jackets, complete with name tags and shiny insignia? When they grow up surely they plan to trade in their toy soldier games for the real thing.

Food lines

To the Editor:

I have one basic gripe to make, but in a way it concerns three different campus groups, the food plan.

The first is directed to the University or administration itself. Why must the dining halls be overcrowded? I eat in Kimmel and for the last week or so this cafeteria has been way overcrowded. There aren't even places to sit unless you go at 4:30! I would think the bulk of students could be redistributed or the cafeteria enlarged.

The second is the cafeteria service itself. The process of serving food was completely out of pace with the students needs. At 5:30 I couldn't get seconds, a dessert or practically a piece of bread, not to mention any silverware or trays for ten minutes. Then I had to find a table?

This brings me up to the third which I guess is directed to the students, for it's their cafeteria. Not only was there a table problem but many pelple left their trays at the tables, and if this wasn't enough they had to play with the food ON the tables. Salt, pepper, milk, vegetables, meat, everything mashed together all over the table. It made you sick to look at it. Being in college is one thing but I guess being adult-like and responsible is entirely another thing.

David Moeri

The Food Service at Kimmel has been a culinary sore spot on Campus almost since its beginning. Although manifest wrongs are committed by the management, students are too often partially at fault as you point out. If it makes you feel any better to know that things could, and indeed have been worse, we reprint below a picture of Kimmel one day when the line just to get in was on the order of an hour. Ed.

Groups aim at minority enrollment

By KAREN WIEDIGER
Executive Editor

An organization has been formed at Syracuse University which is drawing its working force from groups vitally concerned with the recruitment of students who are members of minority groups

The Minority Groups Enrollment Committee, which was described by Ed Ruhe, a spokesman for the group, as "an informal organization of concerned SU community members," met last night to discuss plans and ideas to bring more black students to the University.

Ruhe said all the groups which are working on the minority committee are related in two ways: they all want to bring more students from minority groups to the University and they want to be able to recruit these students outside the top five or ten per cent of their classes.

"You have to make an effort to recruit blacks beyond the top and offer those from the lower percentiles remedial programs because their verbal skills are different," said Ruhe.

The students who are drawn from the lower percentiles are known as "high risks." However, in a paper which Ruhe wrote as an undergraduate, he said "As more and more institutions of higher education come to see the urgent need for compensatory programs, they find out that many of the so-called 'high risk' students they bring in are soon competing very successfully with the rest of their classmates."

Ruhe also mentioned in his paper 12 areas in which universities can develop a unique variety of services and activities as part of a program of compensatory education. Among them are recruiting, special admission, financial aid and special remedial courses. These appear to be the areas in which the committee is working.

The problem of financial aid for minority groups was discussed with Arthur J. Fritz, director of Financial Aid, who attended the meeting. Work-study programs and scholarships were discussed. Emanuel Anise, president of the International Student Organization, talked about a problem which developed with the former program.

He said students who need remedial help and financial aid cannot work the 10 to 12 hours a week in Food Service or in a dormitory job and still be expected to maintain the academic standards.

It was also pointed out that there already are remedial programs for students at SU, but that a separate program would have to be established to deal with minority groups because their skills are different and they will need help in other areas than the established programs now provide.

A plan has already been formed by the Maxwell Graduate Student Organization to recruit black students to attend graduate school at Syracuse. A spokesman for the group said they hope to be able to send representatives to some of the colleges this spring to speak about Syracuse and the opportunities it holds for blacks.

Representatives from Aspiration '72 spoke of their plans to talk with juniors in the area high schools telling them about the University and the possibilities of financial aid.

Analysis

Society and race viewed philosophically

By Lew Howell

The organization of society is a philosophical problem which usually is only debated in compulsory classes and graduate seminars. It is, however, a question which is of great concern to all of us who must live in society and survive in it while keeping our mental processes in some semblance of order.

Societal organization should be of particular concern to us now because, in our attempts to correct injustices and to alleviate the emotional hang-ups that have resulted from them, we are also attacking the fundamental order of society and in many cases there is little awareness of this. It has been given some consideration by SDS and other groups similarly driven into existence by events surrounding the war, but they have been primarily conscious of and concerned with American society in particular and its economic foundations.

There is a social foundation, though, which we should also be conscious of, especially in the universities since such "academic" questions tend to get lost in the bread-winning world.

Aspects of the societal organization question are particularly evident in attempts to resolve the problem of racial discrimination. There are very few societies in which racial bias and even separation of some sort are not "accepted" facts (Hawaii and Brazil being possible exceptions). And it is not, of course, always the blacks who are discriminated against--in Africa there is substantial black bias toward the Arabs to the north and toward Indian immigrants in the east. In Asia, Malays discriminate against Chinese and vice versa, Vietnamese despise the Montagnards, light skinned Indians don't like dark skinned Indians. In each case there is perpetual conflict which not only causes innumerable deaths (estimated as high as several hundred thousand in the Arab-Black conflict in the Sudan, for example) but which involves so much of society's energy that economic development becomes a problem of secondary interest.

Shall we accept this obsession with skin color as an unalterable given fact in our orgainization of society? In most philosophical discussions we would obviously say "no," but our philosophical thoughts do not always rule our actions. Humans instead have built racial separation into the societal order by acting on their emotions and on their learned racial prejudices and reactions. We are not on the verge of doing this in American society.

Prejudice has always existed here but thus far we have been able to keep from institutionalizing it. A hope for a more sane society has always existed. But now, when many American blacks have endured frustration long enough, some are prepared to retreat from it into a "proud isolation" determined according to color. And it is, I would emphasize, a color or racial determination, not a cultural one as some contend. Thus, presently we must face both blacks and whites demanding society's division according to race.

What, then, of the society which would exist based on racial isolation within it? There is little evidence to suggest that it would not continue to exist in perpetuity just as all racially divided societies exist today--in hatred, in fear, in violence, in limitation of human progress. It's a philosophical question, somewhat remote perhaps, but nevertheless one which affects us and should concern us. Before events provide their own reasoning, what do we intend to make of our society?

ROTC in Liberal Arts favored by Dean Cope

Assistant Dean of Liberal Arts Alfred H. Cope said yesterday he had favored the continuation of the ROTC program in its position in the College of Liberal Arts. However, he said he saw the possibility of "flexibility" concerning the academic standing and credit of the military program.

The Syracuse University Senate voted Wednesday night to house ROTC departments in an all-university unit, thus excluding it from the college of liberal arts.

"I believe in a democratic society," he said. "It is better for potential army officers to study under the College of Liberal Arts. I object to the professionalization of the American army--well-educated officers are needed in today's military. I am opposed to the efforts by some to drive ROTC out of the University," he said.

Dean Cope indicated what he considers to be several alternatives to the ROTC structure. Through "intellectual discussion," he said, there is a possibility that the ROTC program could be given credit similar to the physical education requirements.

Four semesters of ROTC would then be an alternative to the physical education requirement, possibly the only credit granted by the ROTC program.

But Dean Cope said the details of any structural change in ROTC would have to be the result of thorough discussion.

Cope added, however, that he thought "the motive behind the anti-ROTC movement seems to me political rather than intellectual. The attack on ROTC is merely a 'chip' in the movement against international events, such as the war in Vietnam."

The move to exclude ROTC from Liberal Arts began in October 1967 when the Liberal Arts faculty began a study of a resolution which said "by no generally accepted understanding of the terms 'Liberal Arts' are the fields of 'Military Science' or 'Aerospace Studies' included therein, since they are neither scholarly nor scientific disciplines."

Panelists hit U.S. aid, Communism

By BOB DAVIS

Developing countries need "some radical economic and political changes," according to a Somalian graduate student in public administration.

Such a radical change might come about through a Communist revolution, but whether communism is the solution is a source of controversy among Asian and African students who participated in the Great Decisions discussion series at the International Student Center last night.

The Somalian, Ali Galied said he doesn't think that "communism will necessarily lead to a great purge and big brother." He said that this "is not inherent in the system."

But another panelist, Jargan Gomatam, a graduate student in physics from India, disagreed. He said that "communism breaks moral standards and personal initiatives and leads to long-time stagnation." Gomatam added that communism "can't be a solution for lasting progress."

American foreign aid was attacked by both Galied and A.M. Babalola as a means for developing Africa and Asia. They called American foreign aid "patronizing." "Developing countries are suspicious of the American dollar," said Babalola. He said the U.S. puts "too many strings on its aid, and added that he favored "a large sum of money," without strings, to developing string.

Galied said that "foreign aid has been an utter failure and has retarded development and a sense of pride." He then asserted that 70 per cent of foreign aid is used for military purposes.

Galied started the discussion by decrying the "myth" that the U.S. and Europe are "providing capital for the underdeveloped countries." Actually, Galied said, the United States gets a "$16.6 billion inflow from the underdeveloped countries."

Babalola later said that the real problem in the developing countries was the "lack of a common ideal." He said the developing countries "must breed idealism into the next generation."

Babalola said that colonization "killed the spirit of the people." He wants "foreign countries to keep hands off the developing countries and let them regenerate themselves."

He said programs such as the Peace Corps could "actually set back developing countries, because the foreigners take the side of some tribes over the others." Babalola is a Nigerian and implied that the Peace Crops volunteers took the side of the Biafran Ibos over the federal Nigerians.

Gomatam of India said that many of the Indian problems stem from the fact that the Indians were originally more concerned with industry than agriculture. Gomatan said that India "has changed its emphasis to agrarian methods. However, bad planning has made it ineffective."

India's problems are further complicated by its "tremendous population unmatched by a corresponding economic progress."

"You can't expect India to develop in a short time," Gomatam said. The Indians "must improve their own land and they are tied by the ball and chain of tradition."

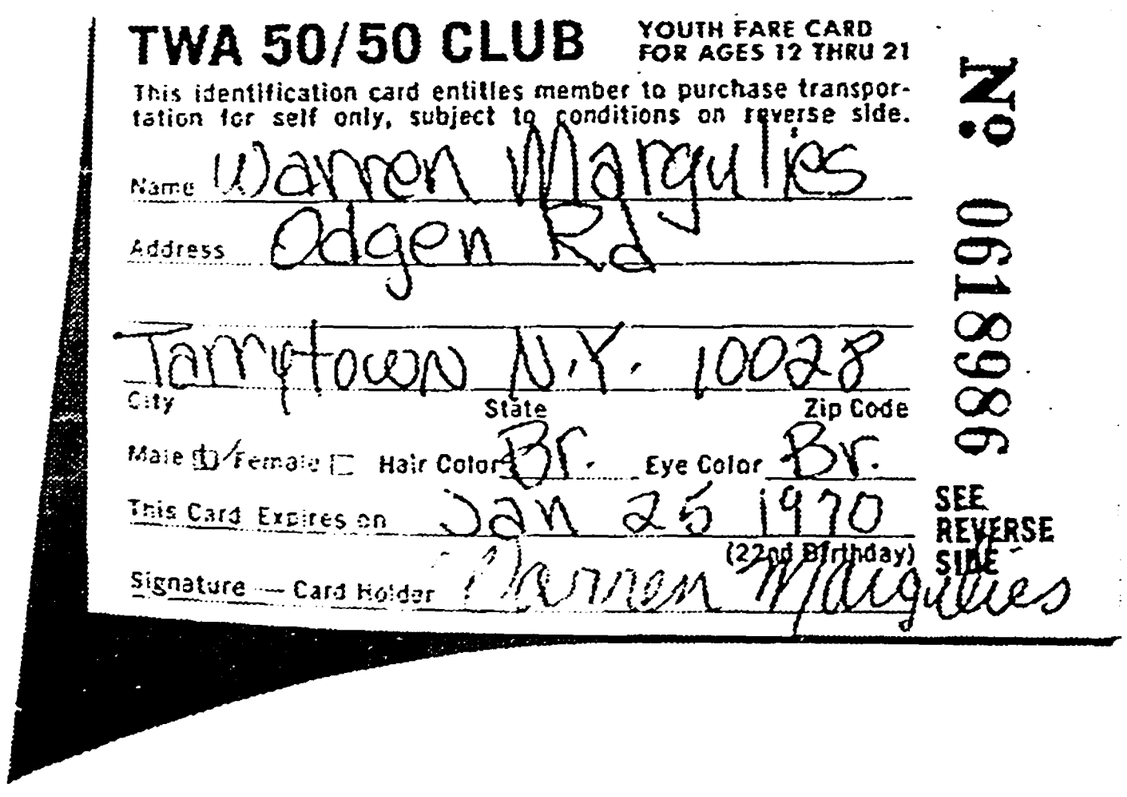
King Alliance for Progress will create black library



Editor's Note: Following is a statement from the King Alliance for Progress by Ed Brown Jr.

King Alliance for Progress has dedicated all of its efforts and resources to the establishment of a King Memorial Library which will have books and records covering all aspects of Afro-American culture. It will cover Black literature, arts, social and political thought. Its purpose will be to provide Black students and the Black community with a center of scholarship.

Black students are presently negotiating for special aid to needy Blacks through Operation Shoestring and other programs. The establishment of a Black course is now totally under the Afro-American Student Course Committee of the Student Afro-American Society.

And so all our efforts are to secure a library. We hope we will have it by the end of the semester.

Here's one card from the establishment that no student will ever burn.

It'll give you a great trip on your spring vacation.

It's TWA's 50/50 Club Card. And if you're between the ages of 12 and 21, it entitles you to fly TWA anywhere in the United States at half-fare (and it's good for discounts on most other airlines too). Now's the time to get one, so you can take off on your spring vacation. Fly skiing, fly swimming, fly home, fly anywhere. TWA flies just about everywhere. See your travel agent, TWA Campus Representative or stop by the local TWA office. Forget about classwork and fly TWA somewhere at half-fare. Even if your parents approve.

TWA

The things we'll do to make you happy.

SU's research operation hit hard by cutbacks

By BOB ZUER
Associate Editor

Funds available for Syracuse University's research operation were cut by $150,000 during the first seven months of the current fiscal year (July 1--Jan. 30) as compared to the money spent during a similar period the previous year, the Daily Orange has learned.

John C. Honey, SU's newly appointed Vice President for Governmental Affairs and Research, pinpointed the Vietnam War as the primary reason for the cutback. He noted especially that the Lyndon B. Johnson administration's policy to decrease all non-military spending has resulted in a decline of federal grants to colleges and universities throughout the country.

Syracuse University received $6,000,000 worth of grants for contract research in 1967 and that figure rose to $6.5 million last year. Nearly 75 per cent of that amount came from the federal government. Federal grants to all colleges and universities ($1.5 billion) last year represented only a slight increase over the 1967 figures, according to Honey.

Because the increases were not enough to compensate for rises in the cost of living, what looked like a leveling off of funds was really a cutback in the research program, he emphasized.

Honey said because of high inflationary pressures on the economy, former President Johnson felt the tax surcharge was needed, and Congress agreed to pass it only when $6,000,000,000 was cut from the federal budget.

Private universities like SU were hit hardest by federal cutbacks because they do not have state governments to make up the lost revenue, he said. Syracuse University has its own particular problem because it is so large and has such a wide variety of interests with only "modest endowments" to take care of its academic needs, he added.

Honey said he was "extremely optimistic" that as we withdraw from Vietnam, local, state and especially federal governments will turn their resources to the university in hopes of finding some answers there to social problems both here and abroad. The future of research at SU is bright, according to Honey, despite a report by a Middle States Evaluation Team which commended the large and "distinguished" research program here but criticized its poor organization and inability to set priorities or be discriminating in the kinds of research it accepts.

Honey hopes to incorporate various facets within the university to establish guidelines for the future of the research effort here. The guidelines, according to Honey, would permit SU to "take advantage of the great oppurtunity ahead," while being "highly discriminatory as we proceed." (By discriminatory Honey meant only research efforts should be undertaken that make contributions to the public interest).

Universities should avoid what does not contribute to the educational process, he said. In this regard, they should reject research projects engaged in classified work which restricts free dissemination of knowledge.

SU students attend model U. N. session

SU students and delegates from ten other American and Canadian colleges are currently participating in the 21st annual session of St. Lawrence University's Model United Nations Council in Canton, N.Y.

The council, one of the oldest of its kind and the only one believed to include international participation, will continue through Saturday.

The three-day council, designed to duplicate as much as possible the workings of the parent body in New York City, is hearing debate on five resolutions pertaining to Portuguese Territories.

Participating in the sessions are students from three Canadian colleges -The University of Western Ontario, Royal Military College and Carleton University. U.S. delegations come from Skidmore College, Union College, Syracuse University, Canisius College, Colgate University, Hamilton College, Cazenovia College and St. Lawrence University.

Each delegation has prepared position papers and speeches on the topics under discussion. Members of the St. Lawrence history and government department are assigned to each delegation for consultation and advice.

Engineering and Science at IBM

"The interdisciplinary environment keeps you technologically hot."

"Working in data processing today pretty much means you work in a broad spectrum of technologies," says Nick Donofrio.

An Associate Engineer at IBM, Nick is a 1967 graduate in Electrical Engineering. He's using his technical background to design circuits for computer memory systems.

"Circuit design used to be a narrow job," he says. "Today it can take you into the front yard of half a dozen different fields. In my job, for example, I work with systems design engineers, chemists, physicists, metallurgists, and programmers."

Nick describes a hypothetical case history: "A memory systems man comes to me with memory circuit requirements. Before I can start designing the circuit, I go to see a physicist. He helps me select an appropriate technology for the monolithic circuit.

"As the design develops, I work with a test group and also check back with the systems and semiconductor people to make sure I'm on the right track."

Keeping up

The interdisciplinary environment at IBM helps you keep up to date technologically. As Nick puts it, "You're constantly exposed to what's happening in other fields."

IBM needs technical graduates to work in research, design and development, manufacturing, product test, field engineering, and space and defense projects. We also need technical people in programming and marketing.

The faculty

'Scholar-teachers' demanded in the University market

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

The university campus has become a market place, and the commodity most in demand is the professor—and in particular the so-called "scholar-teacher" who is able to divide his devotions between instruction and research.

Syracuse University in this world of scarcity apparently is willing to pay more than the going price in an attempt to secure its faculty member, who may otherwise be carried off in the next raid by another searching university.

According to recent figures, the average compensation for the 233 full professors at Syracuse University falls just short of an A rating by the American Association of University Professors (AAUP), and substantially exceeds the national average compensation of $18,000 for full professors. The A rating is $21,500; SU pays $20,557.

In all other categories Syracuse University has an A or AA rating--A for associate professors and AA for assistant professors and instructors.

For the 204 associate professors at SU the average compensation is $15,011, compared with AAUP's A standard of $13,500.

For the 243 assistant professors at SU the average salary plus benefits add up to $12,391, compared with the AAUP's top standard of $12,000.

For the 86 instructors and lecturers here the average compensation is $9,567, compared with the AA standard of $9,000.

But money, although a most persuading factor, is not the sole means of attracting faculty. According to Dr. Frank P. Piskor, provost and vice chancellor, the university's willingness to provide

Today's teachers

'Scholars in Orbit'

The American University's preoccupation with the outside world has degraded its teaching, said Jacques Barzun in "Scholars in Orbit," the second chapter of his recent book, "The American University." Barzun is the former Dean of Faculties and Provost at Columbia University, a position similar to Vice Chancellor and Provost Frank P. Piskor's at Syracuse. He held the position for 12 years and his account of modern university faculty is filled with detail.

The debasement begins when graduate students are initiated into the ancient art of teaching—without ever being taught to teach. Usually the graduate teaching assistant is given section work in Freshmen or elementary courses "but the choice among candidates is based largely on the capacity to do research. The presumption holds that anyone who possesses certified knowledge and is not a deaf-mute can teach."

The worst are weeded out, Barzun observes, but those who survive the minimum requirements of teaching the first year are then expected to begin work on their dissertation. Some find it necessary to moonlight on an outside teaching job in order to support young families. Outside jobs and dissertations reduce the teaching assistant's time and energy to devote to teaching.

Once his dissertation is completed, however, the graduate assistant is transformed into an assistant professor with $1,000 or $1,500 added to his salary. An average assistant professor at Syracuse is paid $12,391 a year.

Ten years ago, Barzun observes, the graduate assistant who earned his Ph.D. would spend several years as an instructor, an intermediary rank, where he would refine his teaching abilities. Today a university that imposes the instructor rank on the Ph.D. bearer will lose him to another university that offers the title of assistant research and study leaves is a vital condition, as are the university's summer research grants to younger faculty members and modern facilities for those in the sciences and communications.

Scholar-teachers: symbiotic relation

The attractiveness of a university also rests upon the whole set of internal intangibles that add up to reputation—the School of Social Work's environment, for example, or the historical initiatives of the School of Art and School of Architecture, the nearby hospitals for the School of Nursing and the units within the university that have already made their marks, such as the Maxwell School and the School of Journalism.

But attraction is only half the process. The demand is for the person who will enhance both his students' knowledge and the university's prestige. Whether it be by recruitment or raid, the university must be highly selective.

"We look for the person who has promise in his discipline as a scholar." says Dr. Piskor. "He must know and understand the structure and the substance of his discipline, and be able to reflect it to undergraduates as well as graduates."

This, of course, is the definition of a "scholar-teacher," and although recent controversies have questioned whether faculties can--or should--compromise teaching with research, Dr. Piskor and SU insist that without one, it would in fact be difficult to have the other.

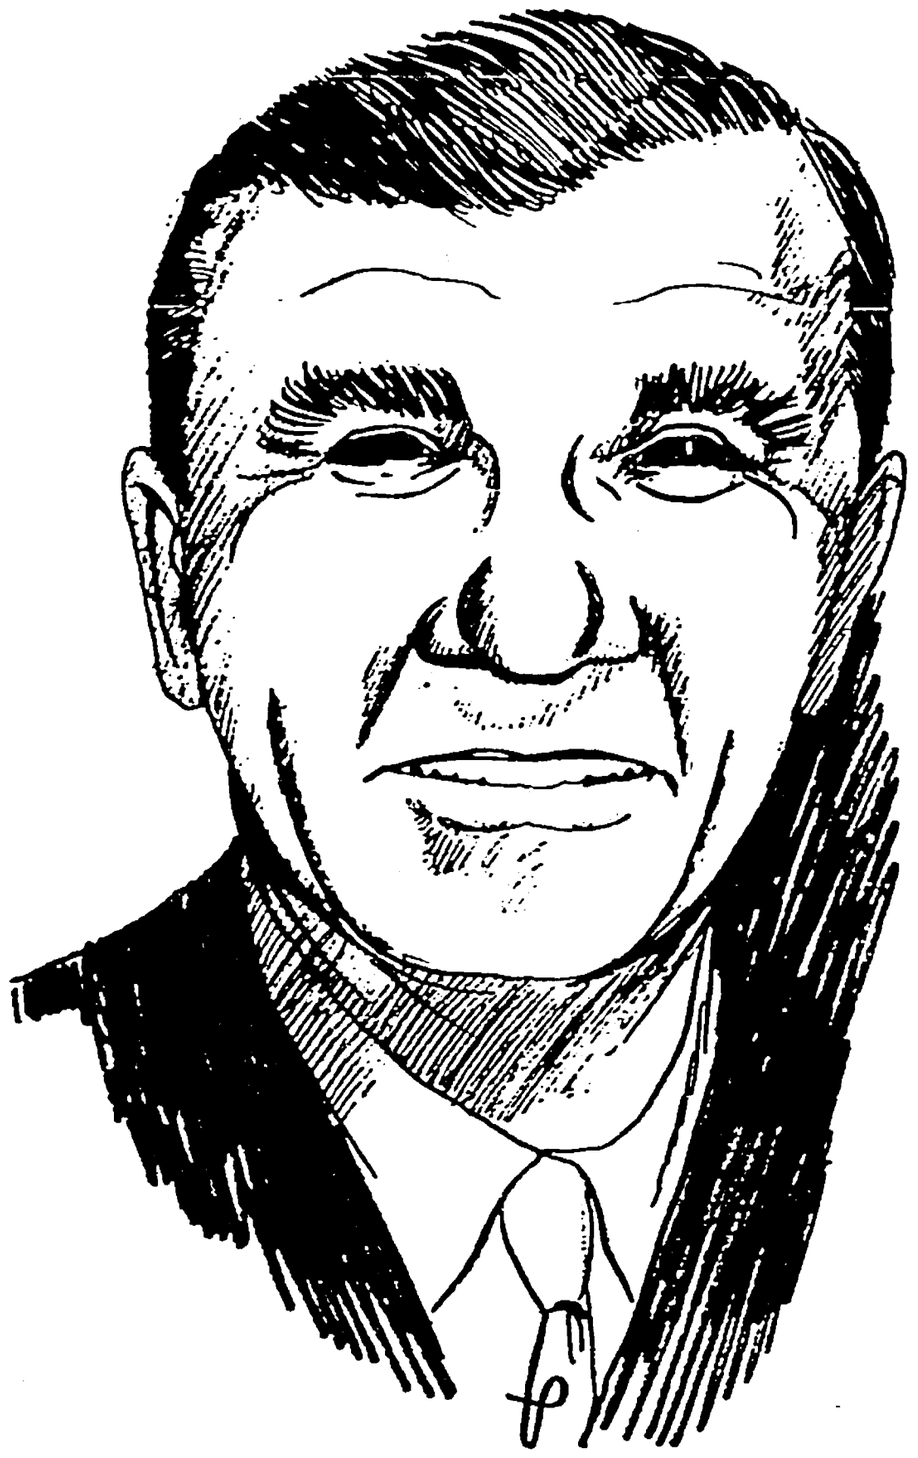
"Research," says Dr. Piskor, "is the basic lifeblood of the teacher. Never has this been more demonstrable than today, when the rapidity at which knowledge is accumulated quickly dates insights. I'm convinced that effective research promotes better teaching, rather than vica versa."

By the same token, research professorships--where research would be the professors sole duty--are banned by the university. "Research professorships," according to Dr. Piskor, "are inimical to the notion of a University."

A system therefore is set up which accomodates both research and teaching, based on the notion that the one nourished the other.

The teaching load varies by rank. Instructors spend the most time in the classrooms, teaching four classes for a total of 12 hours. Professors teach least--six to nine hours. Assistant and associate professors spend nine hours apiece in the classroom.

The rationalization for this pattern is that as one moves up in the ranks of his discipline, the University should contribute a larger amount of time toward not only the refurbishment of the professor's scholarship, but also toward its expression, in the form of books and articles.



The instructor or assistant professor, on the other hand, "is younger and can have an immediate and greater impact in the class room," says Dr. Piskor.

There are, of course, students who question this reasoning and who in some cases would prefer the full professor's unrefurbished scholarship to the instructor's enthusiasm. But administrators have recently introduced a self-evaluation system they hope will benefit both the instructor and the student.

The system is voluntary, according to Allen P. Splete, vice president for academic affairs, although the administration "encourages" the instructor to take the initiative. "I'm a great believer in this kind of evaluation," says Piskor.

The evaluation actually is made by students, who are asked a series of questions, such as "Did the course content meet your needs and expectations?" and "Did the course stimulate thinking and problem-solving?" and "Did the instructor have an appreciation of the student view point and an ability and willingness to answer relevant questions?"

Instructors apparently are responding to these kinds of evaluation; according to Splete, they often accompany instructors' requests for promotion. "Self-evaluation" may therefore have added the student's voice in the market's demand for capable "scholar-teachers."

Faculty manual

Editor's note: the following is taken from "Faculty-Student Relations" in the 1967 Faculty Manual.

The complete education of the student is a basic purpose of a University. Syracuse University is aware of its responsibility for the academic, emotional, and physical welfare of each student.

It is the philosophy of this University that a student's first responsibility is to the academic side of college life. In like manner, an instructor's first obligation is to his classes and students.

Students are encouraged to go to their instructors for assistance even in matters not academic. A faculty member, as he works with the student, may recognize a difficulty and may be competent to help the student directly or be able to advise him where to go for assistance.

External stimuli debase teaching...

professor. The demand for faculty is obviously much greater today.

The demand for professors who have distinguished themselves is also greater. Some schools offer a "name" professor who will supposedly build up the department something like this: "We will pay you $10,000 more than your present salary. You need not teach. You will have $12,000 for research assistants and books. You may be away from the campus every third term. If you do want to teach, you will receive additional compensation at the rate of $1,000 for each semester course."

Barzun concludes that "just because the bidding is feverish, choosing the right headliners takes experience; it is easy to be deceived by glitter and vogue and to pay a ruinous price for them."

Raiding is another aspect of the contemporary university scene. The federal government, foundations and private corporations have spread vast amounts of wealth through the national structure of education and in the process created the mobile faculty following the shifting concentrations of wealth and opportunity.

Knowledge of a raid usually causes the home institution to make a counteroffer. It increases the professor's pay, rank, research budget, office space, staff or anything else it deems necessary and worth the cost to keep the professor.

In addition a university could hold an exceptional professor by giving him frequent leaves.

Barzun strikes his most critical note when he says "taking down the gate and walls is not contrary to the original spirit of the American university; rather it is the carrying out of its clear intentions. From one side, the land-grant colleges and state universities purposed to bring science to bear on dairy farming, forestry, and the extraction industries, in addition to health, education and the general welfare. From another side, the raising into high-theoretical professions of the practice of law, journalism, business, and architecture...multiplied the contacts between the university and the world." All of these external stimuli have contributed to the mobile faculty and the concurrent debasement of teaching, according to one tuned-in theorist, Jacques Barzun.

Hard to be grad assistant

Liberal arts dean talks on teaching

The faculty manual of Syracuse University lists as the institution's first objective "instruction at all levels of higher learing." Its second is "to add to knowledge through basic research..."

For some faculty members at SU it is possible for the priority of these objectives to become confused. Graduate teaching assistants, for example, must teach, work toward their Ph.D. and sometimes hold a part time job to support a growing family. Which must take priority?

"It really depends on the individual. I wouldn't want to venture guesses which comes first for the majority. It does put great strain upon their time and energies," commented Dr. Frederick J. Kramer, Dean of the College of Liberal Arts.

He added that the teaching assistant's first classroom experience tends to engross most his attention during the initial year.

The exact number of graduate teaching assistants at SU is not known at this time since the University has not completed its categorizing of graduate students for computerization. Teaching assistants are chosen by departmental committees on the basis of progress toward an advanced degree, ability to communicate, and departmental observation of them during their first year in grad school. Teaching experience is also considered when any exists.

There is no formal, organized program to train graduate teaching assistants who teach in the freshmen and elementary courses in the College of Liberal Arts.

"It varies from department to department. Most departments make some attempts at supervision; some attempt to impart those skills and attitudes essential to teaching," said Dean Kramer.

Some departments meet with the graduate teaching assistants on a weekly basis, others have informal conversations with them to help improve their teaching.

"Some departments reserve the right to send in senior faculty to observe graduates and have them visit a senior faculty member's class to observe him teach."

Evaluation of graduate student teaching, like evaluation of any teaching, is difficult to do.

Said Kramer, "In most departments there are multiple section courses. After two years of mid-terms and finals we get some idea of how the graduate does in preparing his students for tests and for the next course. If the students in one section performed consistently badly, this would certainly make the supervisor raise an eyebrow, a query. Of course before reaching any conclusions he would want to know the quality of students in the section."

He noted that faculty and deans of departments were always attuned to informal comments from students and fellow faculty members on teaching performance.

The dean of a college today has fewer guarantees that the faculty he hires have more teaching experience than when he was hired.

"For the Ph.D. today the normal rank is assistant professor. The instructor still exists and used to be the first rank. Now it's a pre-doctoral rank. The scarcity of teachers and educational inflation generally have made the instructoral rank reserved for pre-doctoral stage," said Kramer.

Dean Kramer added that it is hoped when an assistant professor is hired that he gained teaching experience while a graduate student. But he said "a small minority (of assistant professors) have had no teaching experience."

Promotions from assistant professor to associate professor with more pay and tenure and then to full professor come about through recommendations from the departmental committee, the college committee and the University Senate.

"The departmental judgment on teaching is very significant. The daily contact with peers allows them to make some sort of judgment. If his students do badly we get some line-through conversations with them--on how well he's doing," observed Dean Kramer.

SU 'Symposium'

Students attempt to evaluate professors

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

There is an anecdote that deans tell over and over -- sometimes without realizing that the joke is on them. The tale involves a newly-installed university president, famous in non-academic fields, who told a group of professors that some policy they disliked would be "good for the university." Up stepped a Nobel Prize winner, speaking for his colleagues. "But sir," he explained, "WE are the university."

While arrogant instructors try to establish this ivy perch, students at some universities are instituting a new threat to tenure --the survey of courses.

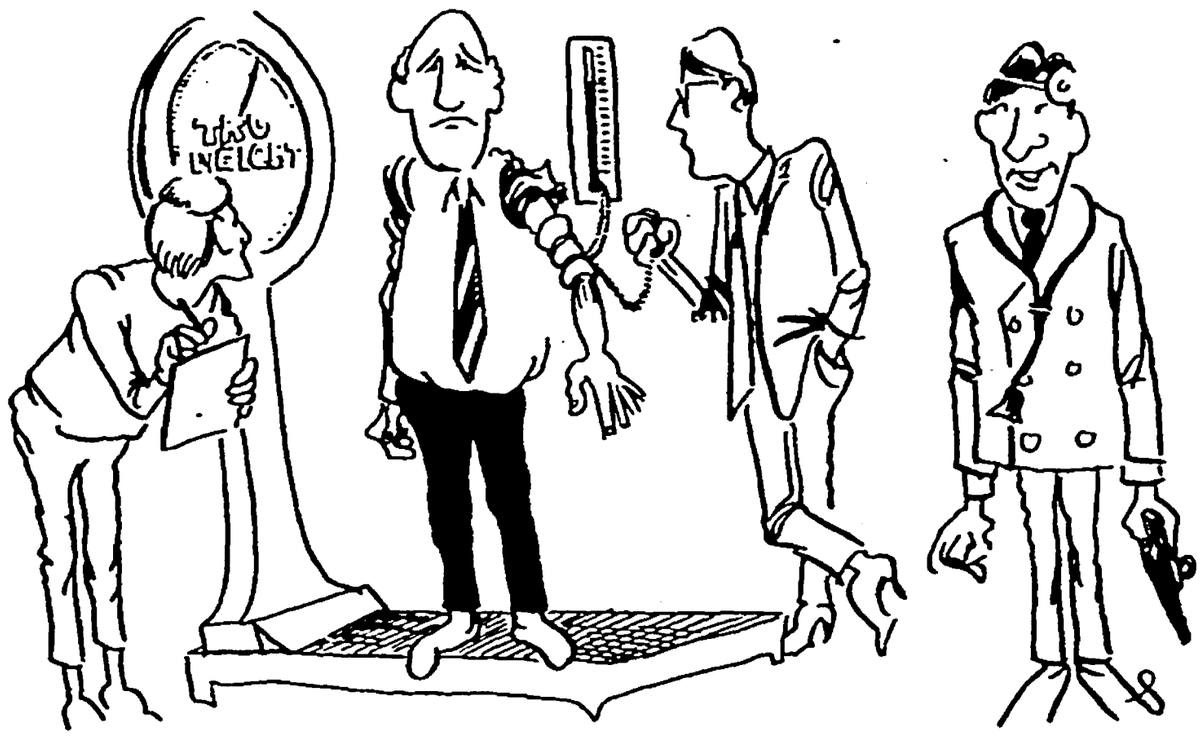
College students have been grading their professors unofficially -- and sometimes unprintably -- for years. In recent years, however, their constructive evaluations have been routed through official circuits in addition to traveling the grapevine.

In 1965, a Yale University committee recommended that seniors graduating with honors be invited to submit written appraisals of their instructors' strengths and weaknesses for consideration in granting tenure. The committee included president Kingman Brewster Jr. Such a system was already employed at Reed, Antioch and Bennington.

Most student surveys that progress beyond the verbal level take the form of published pamphlets sold by student entrepreneurs. In addition to helping students decide what to take and what to avoid, the surveys occasionally provide stimulating feedback for lethargic instructors and may show department chairmen which courses should be expanded, reorganized or eliminated.

Harvard undergraduates printed the first student survey in 1925.

At Berkeley, the left-wing student political party ("Slate") started selling its "Supplement to the General Catalogue" in 1963. After one course was highly praised, its enrollment suddenly jumped by 200.



Syracuse's first published evaluation appeared in 1966 as "The Symposium: A Student Survey of Courses." Printed by Student Government's executive branch, the 38-page booklet covered only 64 courses.

Sales were disappointing, as many students admittedly still preferred the informal grapevine which they had relied upon since freshman orientation. Many faculty members were critical of Symposium on several counts. Some felt it asked inappropriate questions and thus failed to accurately reflect students' opinions. Others charged that results were largely dependent upon the middlemen who interpreted students' IBM-card responses.

SU's survey was revived by Allan Ramie for 1967-68 courses, under the sponsorship of Student Senate. Excerpts were published in the Daily Orange, thus reaching almost all students.

Several professors here, recognizing the necessity of student opinion and the shortcomings of generalized surveys, have distributed questionaires of their own. One of the most extensive is a seven-page dispensed by Dr. Karl M. Schmidt to his political science classes.

When asked if he thought students should be given a voice in evaluating their professors' performance in the classroom, Dean of Liberal Arts Frederic J. Kramer said: "I don't know. I'm not convinced it would be an effective device. But I would be willing to see some experimentation in this area."

'Maximize intellectual frenzy'

Meiklejohn in favor of writing books

By JOAN TULLY

The way to get ahead at Syracuse is still to write a book.

"Our business is to maximize intellectual frenzy," Dr. Donald Meiklejohn, director of the Public Affairs and Citizenship Ptrgoma, said in defense of the book-writing syndrome. A professor has to stimulate and maintain intellectual activity among his colleagues as well as his students, he explained.

"You really ought to write a book," Meiklejohn, who sits on the University Senate Committee on Promotion, said. He does not see the necessity for separate teaching and research faculties, which some education critics now advocate. He feels it is possible to identify people who are good at both. Writing a book qualifies a person to become a doctor, he said.

Instructors in Public Affairs, he said, must be serious, good teachers, although not necessarily popular ones. A teacher is "good" on the testimony of qualified witnesses-good students and his own colleagues, Meiklejohn said.

These men are usually not encouraged to stay at Syracuse after becoming doctors, both to give them a change and to guard against intellectual inbreeding here. Meiklejohn has four instructors now working for degrees who probably won't stay beyond two or three years, he said.

He doesn't believe the testimony of the old Student Survey of Courses was held in regard by the faculty because it felt student answers may not have been thoughtful or deliberate enough. "Although, the grapevine may have been corrected to some extent by the survey," he admitted. Before beginning a new one, Meiklejohn suggested students re-evaluate its purpose.

Meiklejohn believes that little happens between teachers and students in big lectures or even discussion sections. Rather, he believes in the one-to-one conference. He said his faculty all have office hours and have extended general invitations to students.

Full time teachers, he said, spend 40 hours in conference, teaching, and preparation. When an assistant professor starts, he will spend most of the first year in teaching and preparation with little time spent on his own project. He will probably put two hours of preparation into a one-hour class, he said. The second year, however, when he is familiar with the material, he can spend more time on his project.

Meiklejohn also believes teaching assistants should be able to teach. One of the most effective checks on this, he said, are the weekly staff meetings where the faculty discusses lecture material and how it should be taught. Also, freshmen who come to him with complaints about a teaching assistant are switched into another section if possible, he said.

Meiklejohn also wondered if students talked about the lecture material. He is excited about the two public affairs sections meeting in DellPlain because he feels they will encourage students to talk about courses where they live.

He doesn't believe in student-taught courses, however. He said he'll be interested in how the student-taught Black-White course turns out. He sees two drawbacks, however: one, that students may not know enough no matter how intelligent they are and two, that one course may take up all of their time.

Dr. Nahmin Horowitz

AAUP aims at academic freedom, salaries

By ELIZABETH REYES

The American Association of University Professors (AAUP) is the faculty's voice on the SU campus. It functions primarily as a discussion forum and secondarily as a pressure group.

According to Dr. Nahmin Horwitz, current president of AAUP at Syracuse University, the group concerns itself in two different areas: first, the broad field of academic freedom; and second, the economic status of the teaching profession. In both areas the function of AAUP is peripheral to the University's structure.

What does AAUP have to do with classroom teaching and student academic and off-campus freedom? How does AAUP relate to the administration and student body?

The local chapter of AAUP, composed of 450 members of the SU faculty, functions as a forum for crystallizing faculty opinion and policies on University issues. According to Dr. Horwitz, the AAUP has no legal status within the University structure but it is a sound group voice composed of about 60 per cent of the permanent SU faculty membership.

"The AAUP gives professors the chance to discuss University issues among themselves. A formulated policy may then be urged through the proper and formal channels, that is, the administration or the University Senate. Our effectiveness in the University community is as a catalyst," explained Dr. Horwitz.

At various times the AAUP has been called upon by both the Student Senate and administration for the faculty view of campus disputes. A statement of support from AAUP usually facilitates the negotiation of new University policies.

As a representative group, AAUP last year urged the administration to temporarily ban military recruitment until the lifting of the Hersey directive. Last fall AAUP sent monetary support to the state professors in the continuing Stony Brook College case.

AAUP concerns itself with total academic freedom for the promotion of a healthy university community. Among discussion topics for recent weekly meetings were: "Student Role in University Government;" "Faculty Role in University Government;" and "Due Process for Students."

Of the last topic Horwitz says "We have now produced a position paper on what constitutes acceptable, proper, student due process. That is rights to hearing and to counsel, etc."

The paper probably will be a follow through of the national AAUP statement of 1967 on Academic Freedom of Students. This statement advocates "proper procedural safeguards ... to protect the student from unfair imposition of serious penalties." It recommends explicit definitions of standards of conduct and formal hearing committee procedures.

"AAUP does not agree that the University policy of dismissal without given reason is a desirable way to run a university. The University should establish certain procedures," said Horwitz.

Horwitz was questioned on AAUP's policy concerning the professor's role in the classroom. Asked specifically to comment on the amount of extracurricular research done by University teachers, he replied that AAUP makes only general policy of professional conduct.

"In my mind teaching should not suffer for the sake of research," he said. "Faculty members are more exciting and vital if they are involved actively in their field. They have to strike a balance between research and teaching." No serious breaches of professional conduct have been brought to the attention of the AAUP.

"A case of serious impairment of teaching would be a legitimate area of concern for AAUP. Then we would not act with legal power but rather with the certain power which a peer group can exert on its members."

Asked for his opinion on student evaluation of professors, with reference to various attempts at published commentaries on the campus, Horwitz said "more power to them."

AAUP serves its members in the area of teachers' salaries by acting as a pressure group to the administration. In this indirect way, AAUP and SU act to educate the trustees on the needs for higher salaries for teachers. Says Horwitz, pressure is brought on the administration by means of comparative reports from other universities and statements on the great competition for quality professors."

Finds ideal combination

The teacher-student

Miss Cathy Covert, associate professor in the Newhouse School of Journalism, offers the points of view of both student and teacner. She is teaching two journalism courses and taking six hours as a history student.

She is seeking a Ph.D. in history and is currently working on her dissertation. She finds that her time is divided about evenly between teaching and her course work.

"Being a teacher and student is an ideal combination. I would like to go on being a student forever.

"I can see how other people teach. I can learn what annoys and pleases students first-hand."

She added that teaching ability seems to make little difference concerning faculty promotions. The most important criteria, she thought, included length of time on the job, degrees obtained, excellence in the field, and number of times a professor publishes his writing.

Measuring teaching performance isn't done because "no one comes into class and observes how an individual teaches and no one asks what the students think," she said.

She recognized the "hang-up" over how to measure teaching ability. "I'm sympathetic to administrators who have to judge."

She noted practical experience when teaching a skill or craft such as journalism was necessary for effective teaching. She was a reporter for 15 years and is the former science writer for the Syracuse Herald-Journal.

"Continuing research in your field makes you a better teacher," she said. One way she suggested that professors with no formal education in teaching methods be made aware of developing these methods is through reading.

"As a reporter the feedback on the quality of your work is feeble. In the classroom you know right away if you are good or bad from the reactions of the people you are teaching."

She spends from three to four hours preparing for each class.

Students to dramatize hunger with 5-day fast

By GREG SMITH

Participants in two-day and five-day fasts slated to begin next Wednesday will endure the ache of hunger in order to educate themselves in the experience of starvation.

Taking only water for the fasting period, those students involved will undergo the test to "signify the meaning of hunger and starvation" to themselves, according to Ed Ruhe, group spokesman.

"We believe that this is the first organized fast in the United States to be held for quite so long a period," stated Ruhe. "For many, fasting on this issue will have religious significance and will be an attempt to enlarge the individual sense of religious commitment. It may be the beginning of a commitment to a lifetime of action.

"It is the responsibility of all human beings to be concerned with hunger. We want to dramatize to the Syracuse community that starvation and malnutrition, where ever they may be, are intolerable conditions. The campus community, except for a few, cannot begin to conceptualize what famine is. This is why we're attempting to get a body of Syracuse students to understand what these things are. We're trying to make it possible for people to understand what we're talking about."

Ten persons have pledged to fast thus far and recruiters are still working. Ruhe said it will be impossible to estimate the ultimate number involved.

There will be two groups of fasters. One group will fast for two days, while the other will continue for five. The participants will begin by skipping breakfast Feb. 26 and will attend daily meetings between 11:30 and 1:30 in Hendricks Chapel. A "library" of reading material on hunger will be arranged in Hendricks for anyone wishing to use it.

"We want to create a sense of urgency and yet one of patience also," Ruhe remarked. "In these daily meetings and in small groups which may meet in dorms and other places, certain issues will come up. For instance, why haven't pressure groups been organized to influence Congressmen on this topic. Why wasn't there any action in Biafra for over a year?

The fast has been endorsed by the Biafra-Nigeria Relief Committee, where the idea originated, Student Government, and the University Religious Council Executive Committee. The Society for Afro-American Students met to consider endorsement last night. The fast will coincide with the meal sign-away for the benefit of Projection '70.

Ruhe emphasized that the fast's success will not be based on a public reaction to it. "The success will depend on what each individual participating gets out of it," he said. "If one participant benefits, it will be a success."

Biafran mother and child are among victims of severe food shortage resulting from the current civil war with Nigeria.

Author describes Biafra as 'a pocket of pain'

BIAFRA JOURNAL by Michael Mok, Time-Life Books, 96 pp., $1.95.

"Eight hours from London by air is a pocket of pain called Biafra where thousands of people die of hunger every day."

So opens Michael Mok in his agonizing picture-book account of Biafra, its people and its war. Mok was sent to Biafra twice in 1968, and out of his pen and camera came "Biafra Journal."

The account is not political, but simply one of an outside observer who describes a split people. But neither is the account necessarily objective:

"We who were witnesses from outside knew that our own part in the tragedy was insignificant; we had our tickets home. But it was hard to eat the food we had brought with us because every bite swallowed made a man feel like a war criminal...Therefore the following pages lack objectivity...This is the fragmented and often angry testimony of one witness. There isn't much these days that just one man can do--but he can tell a story the way he saw it."

Science strike

March 4 set as day of questioning

By MONTYE CHAFEY

As part of the nationwide "reassessment of scientific research" a committee of Syracuse professors and students plan to observe March 4, not as a day of protest, but as a day of questioning, said assistant physics professor Joseph Schechter, one of the committee's organizers.

"Technology has involved changing the environment so quickly that humans are not evolutionarily fit to live in this world," said Schechter in explaining the problems raised by science. These types of issues will be discussed under "Environment and Ecology," one of the six discussion group topics decided upon at the committee's Wednesday meeting.

The March 4 Committee plans to hold lectures and seminars on these six topics on the afternoon of March 4 "as a time to sit back and look at the situation," said Schechter.

"Human Aggression" is the second topic and questions on this proved Schechter's statement that "the group members don't necessarily have the same opinion."

"The problem seems to be one of supressing aggression," said William Meggs, a graduate student in physics. Immediately another committee member replied, "Many aggressive qualities come from supression."

In discussing the topic "The Ethical Use of Science" Schechter said that a scientist cannot tell how his discovery will be used 100 years later. "But if he's working in missile production he can be pretty sure what the results of his work are," he said.

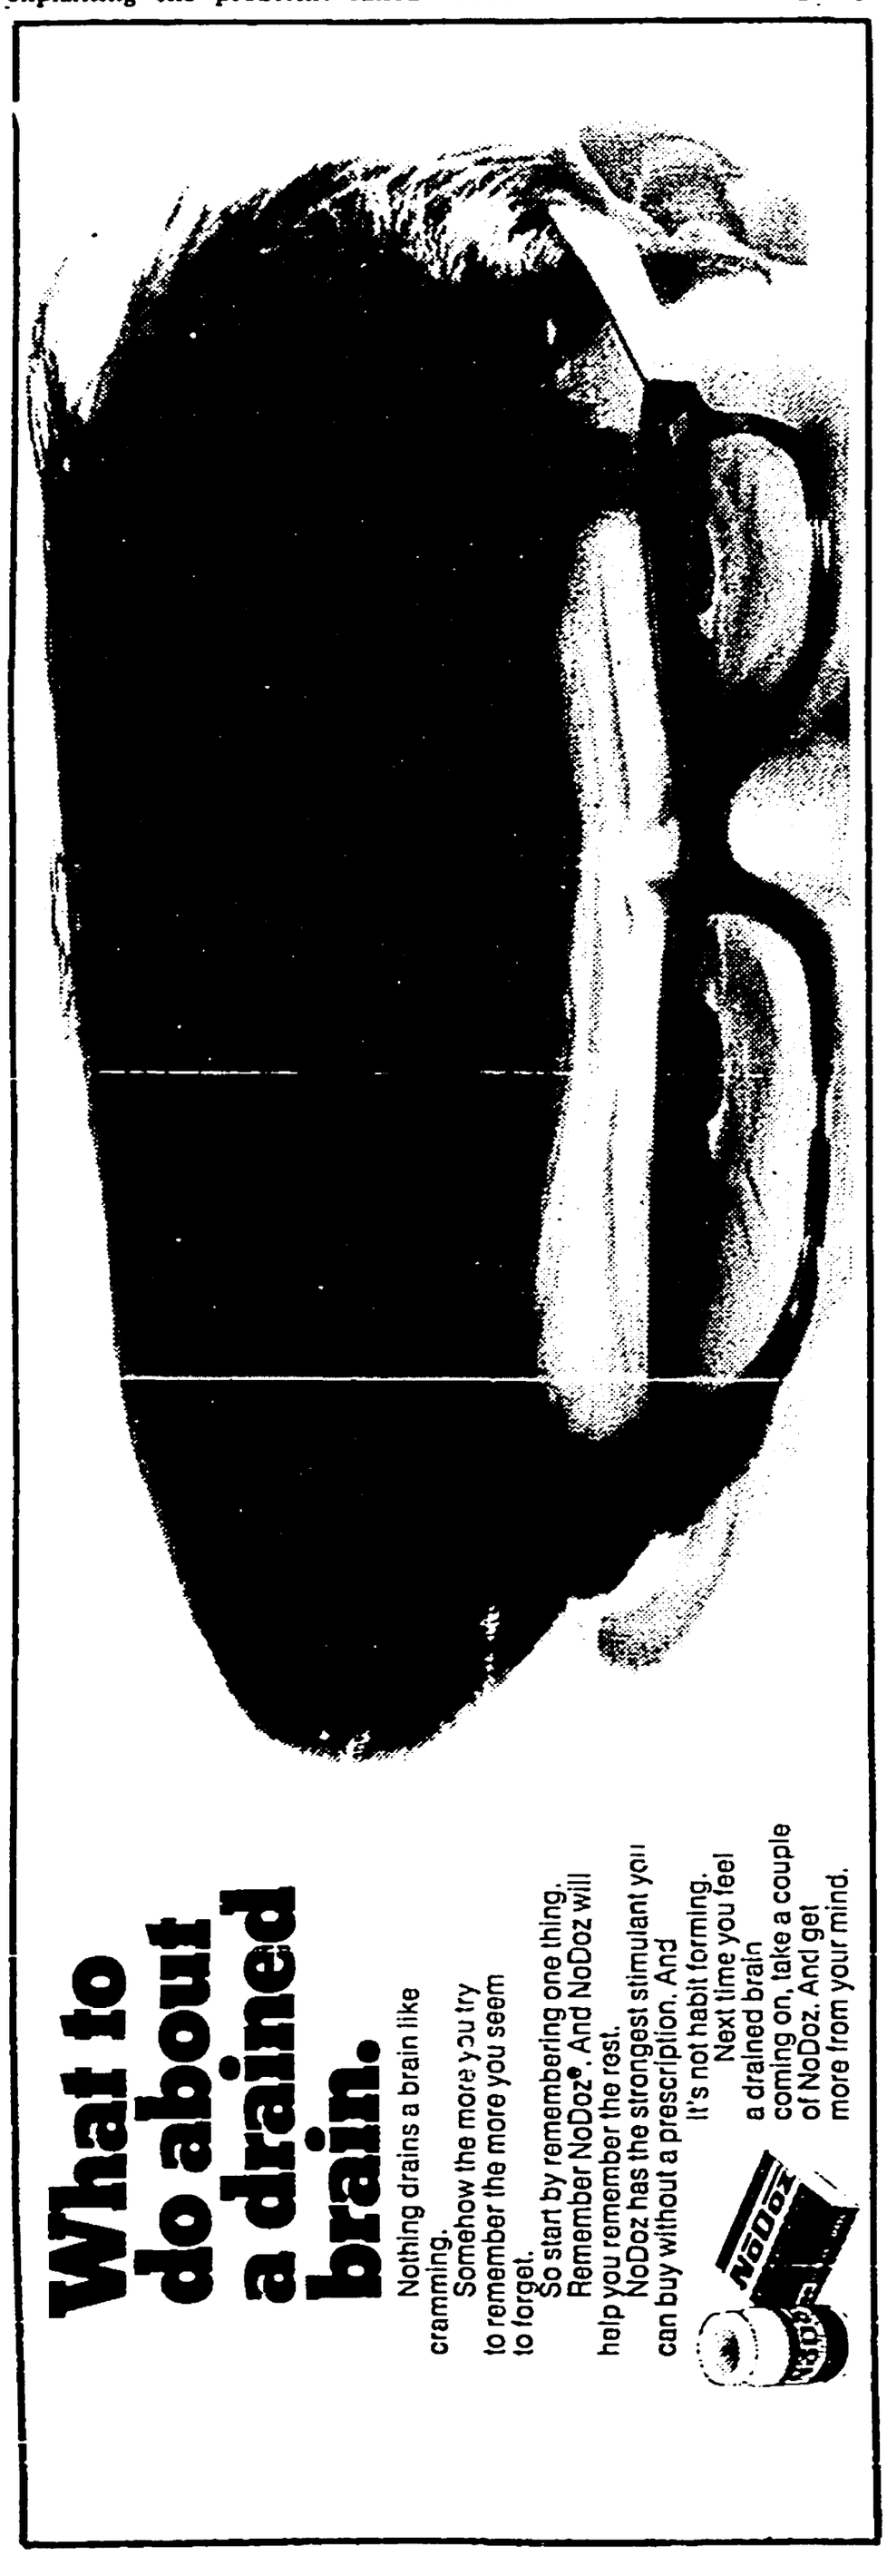
"In principle a university operates in an ideal or ivory tower situation. If it is producing weapons is its purpose being subverted? Schechter saw this as a vital question in relation to the fourth topic "Syracuse University and the Department of Defense."

He also questioned the effect of doing government work on how and what a professor taught.

Schechter said that the situation seemed to be that to keep the economy running smoothly many businesses produced armaments. In addressing the topic "Economics and the Political-Industrial Complex" he asked, "to what extent does this situation affect the United States actions, or entrances in wars?"

Schechter cautioned that his comments were not meant to be foregone conclusions, but as questions. "We are not going to prejudge any of the issues," he said. He expressed hope that all sides of these issues will be presented in lectures and discussions.

In discussing the relation of science to the military committee member Meggs said, "Most people seem to believe that we're producing weapons we don't need. We're in a spiraling arms race and historically these have resulted in wars."



Danial Hakim, a graduate student in chemistry, saw the problem of government complicity with science as "part of a much more general suppression of individuals...the question is how the scientists can break their chains."

When asked if examining science in relation to morality was new Schechter replied, "Most scientific questioning began in 1945. After the bomb exploded scientists realized they had opened a Pandora's box."

"We aren't doing this just for scientists," Schechter said in describing the committee's plans. Member of political science, Russian, English and religion departments have attended the group's meetings.

Schechter admitted that perhaps people primarily interested in changing the status quo would attend the March 4 discussions. But, he added, "These topics affect self-interest. People want to stay alive."

The March 4 idea began among professors and graduate students at M.I.T. who plan a voluntary research strike for March 4th to focus on the threat which misuse of science could cause to mankind. Cornell and other universities have planned similar programs for the day.

Tribute to assassinated leader

Mondlane 'dedicated life to independence'

Dr. Eduardo Mondlane, assassinated leader of the Mozambique independence movement, is seen to have dedicated his life to a cause much bigger than freedom in Mozambique by his fellow African Sikanyiso Ndlovu, vice-chairman of the Zimbabwe African People's Union.

Ndlovu delivered a tribute to Mondlane at the fallen leader's memorial service on campus Sunday. In his statement which ranged from eulogy to political comment, Ndlovu said Mondlane "was not fighting against the Portuguese only, but also against the forces actively involved with the arming of the Portuguese terrorist soldiers and supporting the Portuguese economy in Mozambique and Angola, and Guinea Bissau.

The problem of black African independence is connected not only with Mozambique, but with South Africa, Zimbabwe Angola and Guinea-Bissau, Ndlovu proposed.

Ndlovu spoke bitterly of Portugal, a colonial power in Africa, and criticized NATO for alleged support of Portuguese guerrilla activity.

He reasoned that "Portugal is a member of the North American Treaty Organization, (NATO). Portugal's military power depends on the supply of arms she gets from the NATO allies....We would like to know why such a fascist and undemocratic country, Portugal continues to be given arms which in turn are used for the purpose of oppressing the African people?"

Mondlane himself criticized the West for its alleged involvement. Ndlovu quotes him as saying: "We see the West helping through NATO to train the Portuguese army; even special training in guerrilla war-fare; when we are fighting as we are, we see French, German, and British weapons being used by Portuguese soldiers."

Ndlovu went on to cite a number of cases of foreign economic involvement in African nations and said these circumstances coupled with the death of Mondlane would lead to an intensified struggle in Africa.

The nature of that struggle was hinted at by Ndlovu. "I am sorry to say that the strength of the friendship of some (of Mondlane's) friends is doubtful and remains to be seen. Those who remain to finish the struggle must make a thorough reappraisal of the situation and friendships." He may have been hinting at the Peking-oriented elements in the Mozambique liberation Front that are suspected of being Mondlane's assassins.

Ndlovu spoke of the non-violent elements in the movement, and indicated that they were perhaps incompatible with revolution. He said "it must be clear that Africans in Mozambique and Southern Africa are directing liberation wars after all forms of peaceful means have failed and after being provoked into war by colonial war mongers, and racists of most debased specimens of mankind."

Yet, in an interview this week, Ndlovu emphasized that such movements as Frelimo and leaders as Mondlane were not rebels. Rather, he said, "the Portuguese and Rhodesian regimes are."

Ndlovu cited the goals of the movement as human dignity and opportunity prevailing regardless of "race, creed or color."

SU community evaluates grading system

By VIC LIVINGSTON

The present grading system employed by most universities is once again under scrutiny by the academic community. Recent articles in The Harvard Crimson and The Colombia Daily Spectator have condemned current grading policies; a recent analysis in The New York Times stated their claims:

1) "Grades create an authoritarian relationship between teachers and students, giving the teachers excessive powers over the curriculum.

2) "Grades promote conformity...oriented to the status quo,

3) "Grades represent 'an undesirable reward structure,' aimed at socializing students into the work force."

At SU, opinion on the validity of grades varies among students, faculty, and administration personnel.

Assistant Dean of Liberal Arts Alfred H. Cope believes that grades are a necessary means of evaluating academic performance.

"If we didn't have grades, how would grad schools evaluate applicants? How would universities admit students and get rid of failing students?Our society must be disciplined and cannot be anarchistic. All societies are a combination of inductive policy and authoritarianism."

In reference to grades representing "an undesirable reward structure," Dean Cope said:

"Human nature unfortunately is, in many cases, so materialistic that it is necessary to have material incentives for society to survive. Education is utilitarian--the student is putting money down for an education hoping to make more money. Learning for learning's sake would be ideal, but too many people don't want to learn without incentives. This market place effect tends to make people achieve."

Dean Cope favors the pass-fail system on a limited basis. "Pass-fail in limited areas is not a bad idea because there are still enough grades in other areas to show ability. However, the pass-fail system makes it much harder to evaluate the students' performance."

Conceding that there are students who seem to over-emphasize grades, Dean Cope said this is "a necessity of life." Dean Cope sees room for "more innovation and experimentation concerning grading procedure, but views grades as a necessary and reliable reflection of academic performance."

Others on campus, however, do not share this view. One freshman English instructor, views grading as worthless and invalid. He believes the emphasis on grades hampers the learning process and serves as a barrier between student and teacher.

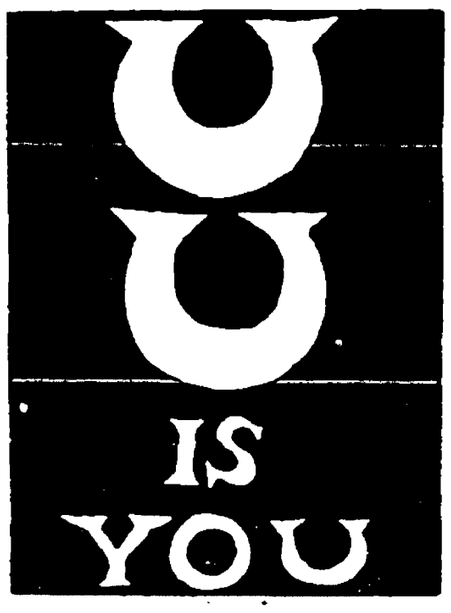
"There is no such thing as a 'good' grade," he said. "Grades indicate only how the student has conformed to the grading system itself. Grades do not accurately measure students' performance or ability. The grading system is immoral and should be abolished."

Similar sentiments are echoed among some students although opinion among students differs on the subject of grades. "The present college grading system," says freshman David Prutting, "is hypocritical. Grades are over-emphasized and the system, with its various discrepencies, doesn't present an accurate reflection of what the student has learned. Attaining good grades is not necessarily synonomous with attaining knowledge. Some viable alternative must be substituted with more emphasis on the utility of the course material."

Fellow classmate Mike Gilden, however, disagrees:

"Grades are a necessary evil. Even if you cram for exams, you can't help but learn. Grading is the best way to see who's on the ball. There are faults in the current system, and they should be taken into consideration by universities and grad schools."

Freshman Robert Burns believes testing should be eliminated, except for a pass-fail final.



"In this way," he said, "the learning experience would be of more value to the student than the mark. Presently, the mark is the major goal."

Marty Goldberg does not see pass-fail grading as a solution.

"If the average college student came to college merely for an education, pass-fail grading would work. But students come for other reasons; socializing, beating the draft, and satisfying parents. With a total pass-fail system, SU would be one big country club."

Burns argues that the pass-fail system would work "because a student would not be able to continue in his field by just learning the minimum--a fair test or a board of review could determine the students' success or failure."

The limited pass-fail system at SU seems to be working well, accepted by most of the academic community. However, controversy over the existing grading system seems likely to continue at SU and at universities throughout the nation.

West Virginia next foe for orange hoopsters

By MIKE WEBER

After giving the fans their finest performance of the year against St. John's, the SU basketball forces will take on a hot and cold West Virginia team tomorrow night at 8:30 in Manley Field House.

The Mountaineers, who lost to Penn State 81-67 while the Orangemen fell to St. John's, now have a 12-12 record.

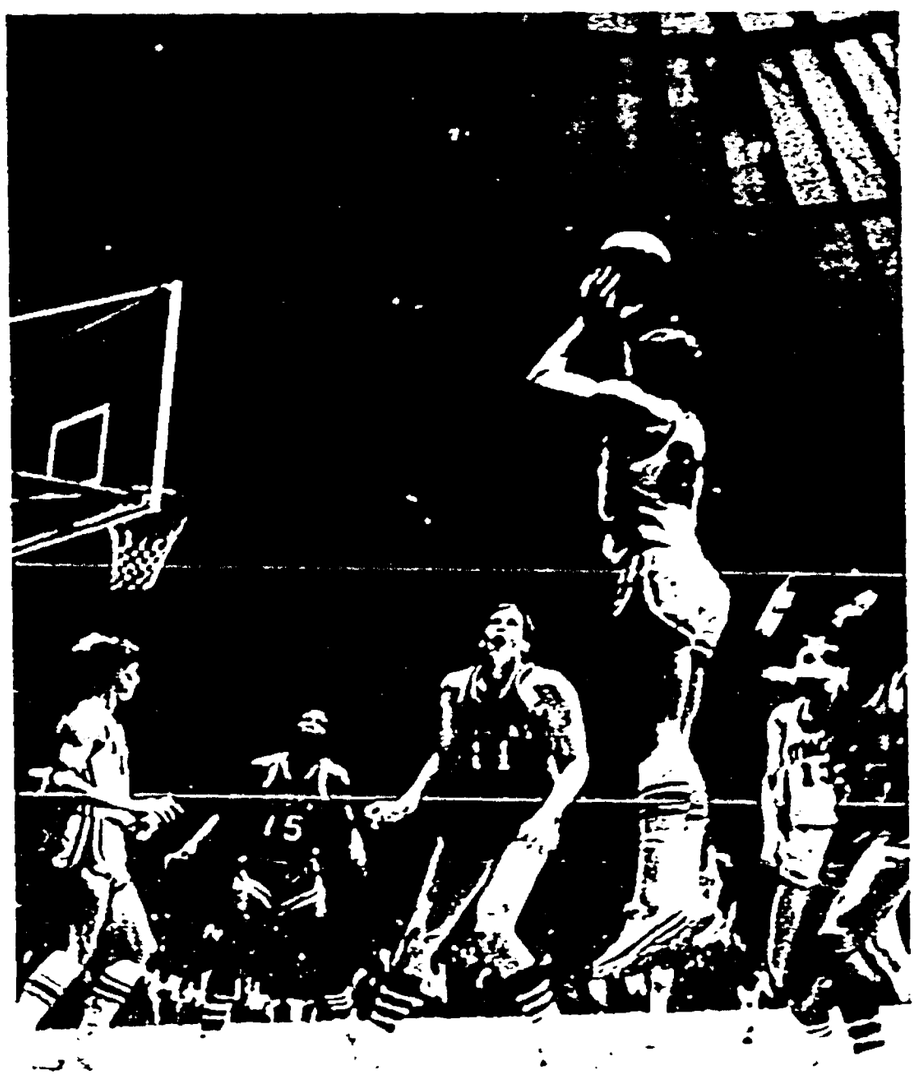
Leading the attack for the visitors will be a 6-2 junior guard, Bob Hummell. He has been averaging close to 16 points a game while being the playmaker for the Mountaineers.

West Virginia will have the height advantage at forward no matter who starts for the Orange. The Mountaineers have a pair of 6-5 entries in Carey Bailey and Larry Woods.

Bailey is the big rebounder for the club and may give Bill Smith some bad times under the boards. The West Virginia native can touch the top of the backboard (13 feet) from a standing jump position. In addition to his acrobatic act, Bailey has been hitting the hoop for about 11 points a game.

Woods had averaged over 15 points a game during the season's first half but has fallen off as of late.

The middle man for the Mountaineers is 6-6 Greg Ludwig. While not setting the West Virginia basketball world afire, Ludwig has turned in steady performances, averaging about 10 markers per contest.



The hottest man of late has been sophomore Skip Kintz. His season average of 13 points a game belies the fact that he has been scoring at a pace of 26.4 counters for the last five games.

Kintz appears to be ready to live up to the rave notices coming out of Morgantown following his freshman year. While a frosh, the 6-5, 195 pounder averaged 28.7 ppg.

The game could be won under the boards. If Bill Smith plays the inspired brand of ball he did against the St. John's big boys, the picture could be bright. Smith scored 24 points and showed fans that he can mix it up under the boards and come out on top. In addition to leading the game in rebounding, Smith was superb on defense limiting the two opposing centers to 10 total points.

Bill Finney appears to have won a regular place in the SU lineup on the strength of his back-to-back double figure performances. When he and Ernie Arustin are on the scene at the same time, a bit of the old-time SU zip reappears.

In the preliminary contest, the SU frosh (7-6), still flying after their upset of powerful Broome Tech, take on the Cornell yearlings at 6:30.

A betting primer

GINA BELL

When April arrives, if it ever does, Doug Draper will scrounge all his money together, take an evening off, drive east for 45 minutes, and hopefully return a few hours later with several hundred dollars in his pocket. A profit like that sounds delightfully illegal, but Doug's activities are all on the level. He makes (and occasionally loses) his pile at Vernon Downs, the local harness racing track.

According to Doug, with a little bit of luck, anyone can do well at the Downs. All you need is a system. Of course, there are systems and there are systems. Everyone claims to have his own. I personally have several, wavering between the Cute Name (checking the program for the horse with the most whimsical name), the Color (selecting the horse whose owner has the prettiest racing silks) and the Underdog feeling soory for the horse with 40-1 odds and betting on him to give him confidence) system. On paper, I do surprisingly well.

Doug Draper does a whole lot better. His system is far from foolproof, but occasionally it enables him to leave the tract with up to $800 in his pocket. Doug isn't too big on $2 bets. He likes to wait until he has a sure thing before he bets, and then he puts down big money. He has a list of factors which must be taken into consideration before he bets heavily, though. These are basically the same for flat and harness racing, but in each case, the emphasis on precedence is shifted.

Because Doug prefers harness racing, his system for picking trotters is more highly developed. He goes to elaborate lengths to choose a horse to invest his pile on. First he checks to see what horses are running. The track secretary rates each trotter according to its excellence, and all horses of the same class race together. If Doug notices that a horse is running in a lower class than usual, he will bet on it because the horse will be racing against poorer competition.

The type of race is equally important. If a horse which usually runs in a $5000 claiming race is entered in a $3500 claiming race, there's an excellent chance that it is worth betting on for the same reason.

The physical condition of the horse is a vital factor. Doug generally checks the track program to see how often the horse under consideration has run in the money in recent races, and how his times stack up against those of the rest of the field. The sulky's driver is another important factor to consider, since certain driver's techniques are more effective than others on a given track.

Doug also ascertains whether the horse is a trotter or a pacer. He prefers trotters, since they are less likely to break stride. He notes the condition of the track and checks whether the horse he likes runs well under present conditions.

He weighs the tips which he frequently receives carefully, and is as critical in scrutenizing the tipster as he is in deciding whether ot bet on the tip. He occasionally falls back on "intuition," but more often than not, he will pass up a race without betting if most of these factors don't check out.

Sometimes Doug Draper's system lets him down. Like last May. He had a sure thing--it checked out with all the requirements of his system. The only hassle was that he was broke. Although it was only a week before finals, he sold all his books and bet $60 on the horse. The sure thing broke stride in the middle of the race and finished last.

DO court clash with WAER is last try for Chicken coach

It's the World Series and Super Bowl rolled into one.

Once again, the mighty Daily Orange Chickens, the basketball behemoths of Tolley-Town will square off against the wily WAER Wolves in the yearly campus hoop classic that has the fans in a frenzy.

A record breaking crowd is expected this year, as the hardcourt spectacle will be moving for the first time to Manley Field House. The move was necessitated by the riots which took place last year by the several thousand fans who were denied entrance to the game in the cramped confines of Archbold Gym.

The Chickens return three starters from last year's squad which dropped a hard fought 65-55 decision. Crafty player-coach Mike Greenstein, a 6-0 jumping jack will handle one forward post with rookie Doug Garr in the other corner.

The DO backcourt returns intact from last year with slippery Evan (the Eel) Richert and floor general Ed Agranowitz.

But the DO's hopes for victory will rest almost solely on the shoulders of long Mike Weber, the rookie center. Says Coach Greenstein, "If Mike has a fantastic day, then we will have a chance. But our forwards will have to help out on the boards."

If Weber gets into foul trouble, Greenstein is likely to turn to stocky Ira Silverman, a fierce rebounder. Silverman packs 208 lbs. of solid muscle into his 5-6¾ frame, and is a terror on defense.

Lee Shirvanian, player-coach of the Wolves has refused to name his starting lineup, but informed sources report that the Wolves are desperate for personnel and are offering Bill Asnes and Dan Schlossberg as trade bait.

As always, the players will be vying for the coveted Chadwick Cup, symbolic of the outstanding individual performance.

The usually optimistic Greenstein was somewhat forlorn in analyzing his team's chances. "Our bench is somewhat thin at the moment," he admits. "We lost high scoring Jon Breault to the pros, and several other team members have left since they didn't like the way I was running things. Unless some of our new blood comes through, like young Fred Kraver, we will be in trouble."

It does not appear the Greenstein is handing out the coach's usually line of bull since he wants this game badly. "I have already announced plans to leave the coaching ranks after this game," he says. "Since I have been riding the crest of a two season losing streak, you might say it's now or never. Right now, it is my sole amibition to return the Chadwick Cup to its original home, the DO office."

The game is scheduled for a 10 a.m. tip-off tomorrow with the freshmen prelim immediately following the main event. Student tickets are priced at $1 each with the first 5,000 fans being admitted free of charge

Gym, ski teams face Army

By MARK ZWERNER

Two Syracuse teams will face the usual stern opposition afforded by the United States Military Academy this weekend.

The gym team, coached by Paul Romeo, will host the Black Knights in Archbold Gym, beginning at 2 p.m. Syracuse, with a 1-5 mark on the year, has been hurt by a lack of depth in its previous meets. Army has a record of 3-3, not including its Wednesday night meet.

Last weekend the SU team dropped both meets on a road trip to Massachusetts and Springfield. The lone bright spot on that excursion was the performance of sophomore George Stalter on the still rings. Stalter got a second and a first, with a near perfect mark of 9.5 in the second outing. He, along with captain Ernie Santangelo, are Romeo's main hopes against Army.

Also facing an Army team this weekend is the ski team, coached by Elt Fairbank. This meet is scheduled for Saturday, on the West Point slopes.

Coach Alexander Dako's fencing squad is at home this weekend, meeting the fencers of Rochester Institute of Technology. Both varsity and freshmen teams will compete, with the action beginning in the upstairs gym in Archbold at 1 p.m.

The wrestling team rounds out the weekend's activities with a meet Saturday night at Springfield College. The Orange was narrowly nosed out by Cornell on Wednesday night by a 23-21 count, when heavyweight John Cherundolo was pinned in the final match.

SU's Bob Rust remained undefeated with a forfeit victory in the 191 lb. class. Eric Greenberg, at 152, won his 11th match of the year, and Vinnie Paolano, the sophomore at 177, got his third win of the year.

The freshman team, which defeated Cornell, 21-18, is idle until Tuesday night, when they wrestle at Oswego State.

The swim team, fresh from its big win over Cornell, is also idle this weekend. The next match for the mermen will be Friday afternoon at Rochester.

Twombly elected as DO editor

By COREY SANDLER

Angus H. Twombly was elected Editor-in-Chief of the Daily Orange last night by the University Board of Publications. He will take office Mar. 3.

Outgoing Editor Charles W. Babcock praised the selection of Twombly. "There were three well-qualified candidates running, and I felt that Angus was the best. Angus' critical approach gave him the best grasp of the weaknesses of the paper and will give him the best chance to correct them. I wish him luck," said Babcock.

Besides Twombly, currently news editor of the DO, also running were Karen Wiediger, executive editor, and Harvey Schwartz, former editor of The Promethean and currently on the Maelstrom staff.

The Board of Publications is responsible for the selection of editors of the Daily Orange, Maelstrom, and the Onondagan. Voting members of the group include Student Services Dean Jim G. Carleton, Chairman, Dean Smith, Dean Tatham, Publications Financial Advisor Francis O'Brien, Student Government President Chuck Hicks, V.P. Jeffrey Portnoy, and Senior Honoraries Presidents Joan Tully, Jeff Davis, and Marty Gordon. Non-voting members include Charles Babcock, Don Bredes of Maelstrom and Steve Strobridge, Business Manager of the DO.

ANGUS H. TWOMBLY
Incoming Chief

Twombly set forth his recommendations in a written presentation to the Board. He called for the institution of a broader base for the paper in the University community, to include graduate students and faculty as well as the undergraduate student body.

Greater organization within the paper and broader sources of news were important aspects of the presentation. A recent interview in the Journalism School newspaper, Newhouse News, suggested that the DO serve as a lab paper for the school. Twombly rejected this concept. Instead, he said that under his leadership the DO will strive for closer ties with the J-School, and will invite advice and criticism from professors there. He noted that there was no representative of the School of Journalism on the Board of Publications.

Twombly's plans for changes in the DO include biographical sketches of campus newsmakers, similar to The New York Times' "Man in the News" articles. Also due to be changed is the range of the Friday Perspective Close-up magazine. Twombly indicated that he will attempt to return to five issues weekly.

CHARLES W. BABCOCK
Outgoing Chief

Babcock, winner of the Second Place Hearst Award for Editorial Writing this year, will graduate this June.

"I've really enjoyed this year," Babcock said "I think the world of this staff and I'm tremendously grateful to them."

As Editor-in-chief, Babcock was responsible for the institution of the Friday magazine. The supplement was focused on a single topic each week. New man Twombly plans to keep the section. He calls Perspective "one of the paper's most outstanding features."

Twombly will talk on radio station WAER tonight at 5:30 in a telephone interview show.

Tolley sees faculty as university threat

Chancellor William P. Tolley Saturday night claimed that the faculty represents a "great threat to the future of our universities."

He said he was referring to only a minority of the faculty, but added, "It is the same minority that gives such strong support to student activists and revolutionaries...it is a powerful minority and its strength is increasing. We should not underestimate the threat from this group to all we should hold dear."

Speaking at the 94th annual dinner of the Onondaga County Bar Association, he said there was also a threat from without--"the danger of overreaction from a public fed up by the worship of youth and angered by the misuse of educational opportunity."

But, he said, the threat from within--"from faculties who should know better,"--is just as dangerous.

Student revolutionaries on campus, said Tolley, in a text released Saturday, number just a handful. "The number at Syracuse may be closer to "half a dozen and some of these are non-students," he said, but, "this is the group whose mission is to destroy."

College youth as a whole, said the chancellor, "has been much maligned..the majority of the students can be described only in superlatives. They are the most wonderful youngsters I have ever known."

Editor's note: the complete text of Chancellor Tolley's speech will be run in a series, beginning tomorrow.

And, speaking in particular of black students, he said, "Unrest among black students occurs perhaps at the wrong time but it comes because there is progress, not because the doors are still closed.

"When the boat is rocking, we don't need more people to shake it," said Tolley. "Colleges could profit more from stability than peace. The black students are being given bad advice, particularly from outside, but we must remember that many of their grievances are real."

The threats to the university, he said, are from the public, the legislature, the congress and the unions, "but these are no more serious than the threat from within. And this danger is not so much from the students as from the faculty. If universities are destroyed it will be by their own hand."

The interest of the faculty in administrative power, said Tolley, is much greater than the same struggle for power by members of the student body. "And like the interest of the unions it is a search for power without responsibility."

Many of the faculty, said the chancellor, appear to want to change the nature of the university. "They would make the university a propaganda agency committed to partisan political ends. It is no longer to be an institution in search of the truth. It is to announce what the truth is, and deny dissent to anyone who disagrees."

CSL still inches toward clearing autonomy hurdle

By DOROTHY NASH

The controversial question of Dorm Autonomy remains as the central issue being pursued by the Council on Student Life (CSL). Last Friday's meeting of the CSL failed to produce any definite yes or no answers to the question but action was taken which appears to be a step forward. Three proposals were agreed to by a majority of the members.

The first was a statement in which CSL "strongly supports and endorses the concept of Dorm Autonomy." One of the biggest stumbling blocks to the introduction of the autonomy concept was difference of definition, or better yet, lack of definition of Dorm Autonomy. As a general proposal, the idea of self-regulation of the living-centers was acceptable to most of the members of CSL. But it was never specified as to exactly what the concept entails. At Friday's meeting of the Council this was defined to mean "the governing and determining of rules for all activities of its residents collectively."

Any action suggested by the Council must be in conformity with six specific rules outlined in Dates and Data. These include the regulations concerning alcholic beverages in the dorms and the in loco parentis rules. If Dorm Autonomy were to be implemented, such matters would be regulated by the individual dorm councils. This, in essence, is the second motion passed by the CSL. The Council states that "the first matter to be considered is the regulation of the students' cultural and social life."

Panel reports

Students' voice pondered

By MITCH LANE

"To disregard the student revolt, to dismiss it as the work of agitators manipulating issues that are entirely beyond control of the educational enterprise, is to risk politicization of the university–to lose the ideal of an independent intellectual community, not regain it," states the Final Report of the Hearing Panel on Student Participation in Campus Governance.

The report, released this weekend by the 12 member Hearing Panel established by the Committee on Students of the University Senate, further stated that "Some members of the faculty and administration have long been aware of the need for reforms in University processes, and have labored over the years to bring them about."

The University Senate charged the Committee on Students in May 1968 with "exploring the problem of student representation in University government. The resulting Hearing Panel consisted of faculty, administrators, trustees, and elected representatives of the undergraudate and graduate student bodies.

The Panel invited all students and faculty to a series of hearings held between Oct. 29 and Nov. 5, 1968. A total of 22 students and 14 faculty and administrators appeared before the panel or submitted written recommendations.

Because most speakers moved to broader issues relating to the general university, rather than limiting their comments to the question of student representation in the University Senate, the findings of the hearings were summarized in two sections.

Concerning student representation, most speakers very strongly favored increased participation and responsibility for students, although some faculty favored a stronger voice for the faculty.

Considering the general university, most students felt that their interests were not being sufficiently considered. Most speakers felt that the University should play a crucial role in social progress, a role that the university is currently unable to perform because of outmoded structures and indifferent leadership. Other comments were made concerning the quality of life in the dorms,

The post-industrial university

The university of post-industrial America, the era during which machines will lift the major burden of work from the backs of men, will be different from the American university of today.

The American university today is not so different in principle than those of earlier days. Ever since the land-grant colleges of 1862 and before, many American universities and colleges have lived with financial insecurity. The land-grant institutions won public funds for teaching mechanical and agricultural arts and sciences, while not totally ignoring the liberal arts. (The land- grant colleges also offered the forerunner to ROTC on campus.)

Private colleges and universities, observing this fresh supply of funds, sought private support by offering other vocational programs for the public. Schools of business, nursing, architecture, journalism, education, and engineering were established to prepare students from the growing middleclass for life in industrial society.

There of course was a need for such schools. State economies were growing more and more interdependent, a network of railroads was linking the country together, resources were discovered and great corporations were organized to develop them through new technology. The highest rationale for all this was that there were great human needs to be filled. Not everyone had enough to eat, to wear, or a decent place to live.

The American colleges and universities helped answer these needs. But is this the proper role of the university in advanced industrial society?

As industrial society advances, there is a diminishing need for man-power to run it. Today fewer auto workers produce more cars, etc. because machines can do more of the work. Today we face the prospect of machines liberating man not for more recreation of television and card playing but for the "re-creation" of our lives.

The vocational education of industrial society is no longer relevant because it has succeeded so well that it has lost its former rationale.

In advanced industrial society the university is free to pursue the true goal of education, the development of whole persons and wise citizens for an advanced democracy.

Congratulations, editor-elect

Congratulations to editor-elect Angus Twombly. We are proud to say two of our best qualified staff members competed for the position of editor along with Harvey Schwartz, an outstanding journalist who doesn't happen to work on the Daily Orange.

A serious grievance recurred this year, as last year, with a few student members on the Board. The students control the outcome of the Board since it is made up of five students, two administrators and one faculty member. Two students in particular, one a non-voting member and the other a voting member, considered their opinions all-important at the Board meeting and yet had made no effort to acquaint themselves with the real problems of the Daily Orange. We think they used their influence and vote unfairly.

We wish the new editor and his staff happy publishing during the forthcoming year and may they have better luck than we in ridding the Board of Publications of its greivous shortcomings.

Eyebrows raised

Promiscuous tells it all

By Jim Brubaker

Anybody read the last issue of the Promiscuous? The male grad students are furious over their poor showing in the survey.

Peter, a grad student now starring in "Peter and the Wolf," said he grabbed a tail while up a tree but some nearsighted hunter came along and shot it. Needless to say that one didn't answer the survey.

Snow White, now down at the Follies, said she filled out seven of the questionnaires. She said that one wouldn't have told the whole story. Donald Duck said Daisy Duck lied on the questionnaire and he's got three ducklings to prove it.

One of the local wolves said he was giving up women after reading the Promiscuous. He said he was soured on the average SU female and was jumping after grapes from now on.

The City Police Department said after raiding a sorority the other night that the girls there thought it was a promotion gimmick for rush. A local publisher said he would publish the letter "Dear Linda" and put it on the paperback stands if only he could rewrite the last three paragraphs so something happened.

Playboy magazine said they were a little worried about the competition. But they seemed reassured that the sex survey was in "too bad taste" and they added the main theme of the articles was to downgrade the college coed, something Playboy avoids as a matter of policy.

God was interviewed and said he didn't like his name being used in the title ". . .And God Created Woman" because he couldn't, in good conscience, endorse the product.

Maybe some of you can remember when you had to wait in line to buy a copy of the Pro. The print was small and what they said was controversial. Maybe you didn't agree with it, but they had something to say. Yes, "you've come a long way, baby."

The need for change

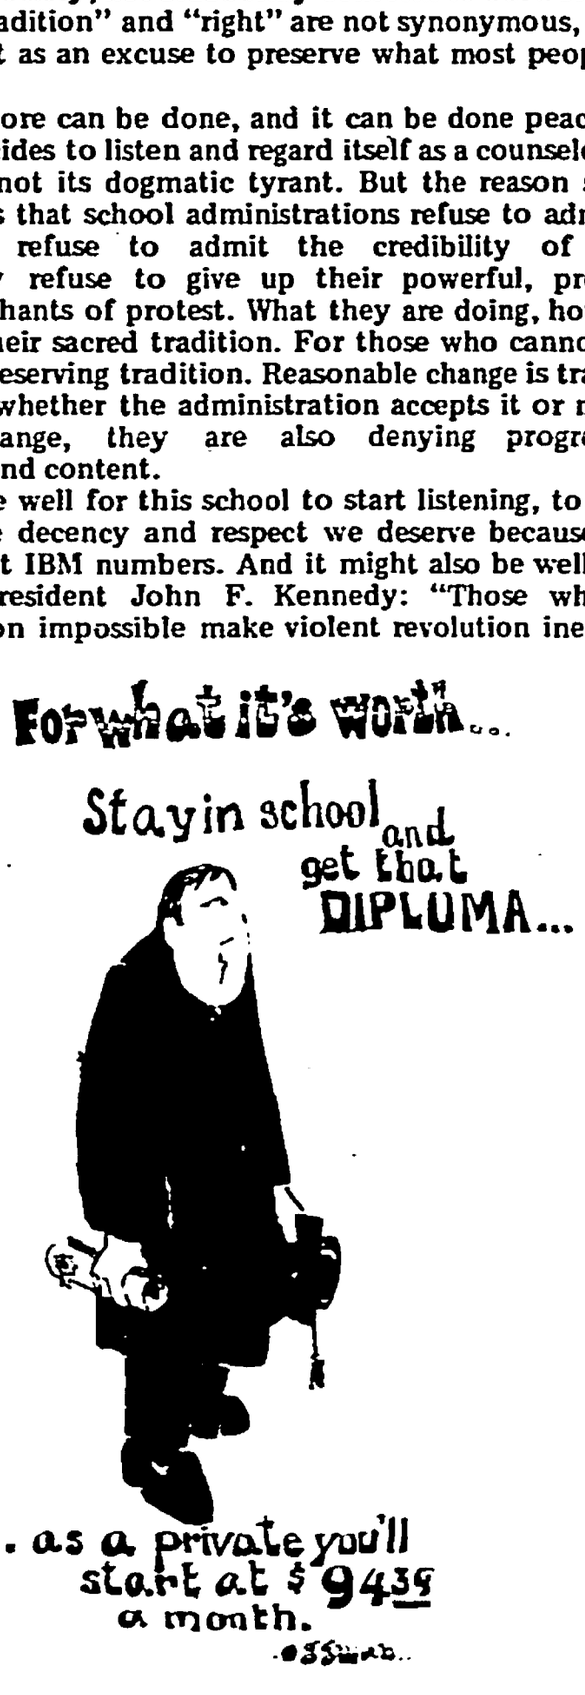
Mistrust

By Bob Tembeckjian

In less than seven months, Syracuse University will observe its centennial anniversary, and the school administration might well be expected to speak of its many accomplishments over the last one hundred years. But it would be wise to do more than celebrate and publicize the successes of the past century. For Syracuse University is far from perfect, and there can be no better way to improve the state of this university than to examine our shortcomings. The failures of this school will not disappear until we stop ignoring them and decide to correct them. After one hundred years of existence Syracuse University has yet to catch up with the times and accept Emerson's belief that "the secret of education lies in respecting the pupil."

There appears in this University an unfortunate mistrust of students, a tendency to regard those who protest as deviants from the status quo. But that is a dangerous appraisal of this university's students. Change is natural and protest is inevitable in every society. And only when wrongs are righted will criticisms end. Only when the administration admits its mistakes will the students of this university be able to respect it.

It is hypocritical to allow students to drink liquor on Marshall Street but not in their rooms. We may use incense in a religious service, yet the university frowns upon its use in dorms. It is perfectly acceptable for students to have members of the opposite sex in their rooms during certain designated hours, but it is forbidden to do so during the week—except for a couple of dorms in which the legality of parietal hours allows weekday visitation. In short, there is no consistency in the university's actions and very little justice in its rules.



Just what kind of game is the University playing? This school and its students must realize that education is more than a game which ends in a handshake and a diploma. Education is a mutual process of enlightenment and sharing experiences in which both students and teacher learn and mature. It is not merely a classroom situation in which the student and teacher are equated with the subject and master. But that is the attitude many teachers at this and other universities hold, and it does not appear to be radically changing.

The problems of this University are many, and they go beyond student-teacher relationships. There is too little stimulation of student interest, for the university does not appear to be making a conscious effort to instill an educational incentive in its students. How often do faculty members debate public issues? How often do interesting guest speakers visit the campus? How long has it been since the academic curriculum at this school was completely reviewed and cleansed of its many inadequacies?

Change, therefore, is necessary for the growth of this institution, and it must come despite the attitude that Syracuse University is a traditional school. Let us hope the administration and even some students adopt a more enlightened view of what a university supposedly represents--an institution that teaches men to change what is unjust in society, not stubbornly conform to outworn beliefs or traditions. "Tradition" and "right" are not synonymous, so let us not hide behind it as an excuse to preserve what most people want changed.

All this and more can be done, and it can be done peacefully if the university decides to listen and regard itself as a counselor of the student interest, not its dogmatic tyrant. But the reason so many campuses erupt is that school administrations refuse to admit their fallibility. They refuse to admit the credibility of student complaints. They refuse to give up their powerful, prestigious positions to the chants of protest. What they are doing, however, is far from saving their sacred tradition. For those who cannot accept change are not preserving tradition. Reasonable change is traditional in every society whether the administration accepts it or not. And by denying change, they are also denying progress and accomplishment and content.

So it might be well for this school to start listening, to treat its students with the decency and respect we deserve because we are human beings, not IBM numbers. And it might also be well to heed the words of President John F. Kennedy: "Those who make peaceful revolution impossible make violent revolution inevitable."

Hard on minorities

Campbell attacks recent legislation to withdraw state aid

By HELENE MACDONALD
Associate Editor

Albany--Recent legislation withdrawing state aid from college students convicted of felonies for crimes committed on college campuses was criticized by Dr. Alan K. Campbell, dean of the Maxwell Graduate school, in a speech given Monday in Albany.

Campbell, addressing the 22nd Annual Legislative Seminar of the New York State Council of Churches, said the legislation is "particularly hard on the lower-income students, rather than on high-income students who can well afford to pay their own way."

He added that such legislation denies the ability of universities to run their own businesses and substitutes the universities' judgment for that of law enforcement institutions.

Such actions by the state legislature leads students, who Campbell counts with blacks and lower-income citizens as the "dissenting minorities," to feel that the government is not living up to its professed goals.

These minorities are challenging democracy and the performance of national, state and local governments and the tendency has been to attribute the discontent to a "few soreheads," Campbell noted.

He believes, however, that "the real test of a democratic society is not its ability to follow a solid majority view, but rather to find acceptable compromises." People in public life must listen to dissenting voices for these voices define the problem areas.

"The complaints of all these groups are similar when looked at objectively," he pointed out. "All of them are arguing that democracy will not survive until we restructure our institutions to deliver services on the basis of need.

"They simply are attacking different aspects of the failure of the system to meet the real needs of the society, he said. Until this inconsistency is recognized, legislators can hardly be described as adequately performing their democratic responsibilities.

Campbell considered the possibility that the actions of student groups and blacks may lead to a more repressive society, rather than positive responses to their demands.

He asked whose fault it would be if such repression occurred, those making objections or those responding with repression?

"It is a historical fact that other societies have indeed become repressive as a result of some of the activities which are occurring in this country," he said. Repression depends on how elected representatives respond.

SU places third in debates

Syracuse sent two teams to intercollegiate debate tournaments each of the past two weekends, scoring 23 wins to their five losses and bringing home two trophies.

At Columbia the weekend of the 14th were 56 teams from as far south as Miami. In the preliminary rounds senior Bob Tannenbaum and freshman Jim McHugh were 4-2, while senior Chuck Dworkin and junior Bob Putnam were 5-1. This was good enough to make Dworkin and Putman third high qualifiers, while Tannenbaum and McHugh narrowly missed giving Syracuse two teams in the quarter-finals. In the quarter-final round Syracuse defeated C.W. Post in a 3-0 decision, while Cornell, Brown, and Scranton were winning in their rounds. Syracuse then dropped a 2-1 decision to Scranton, to finish third overall.

This past weekend at Buffalo, Syracuse competed with 30 teams representing schools from Vermont to Ohio. Tannenbaum and McHugh were 5-1 while Dworkin and Putnam were 6-0 in the preliminary rounds, good enough for fifth and first place going into the elimination rounds.

establishment of an ombudsman, and strengthening of the advising system.

The Hearing Panel discussed three basic alternatives providing for increased student participation in University grovernance structure. The first proposal was a single governing body consisting of 50 per cent faculty, 25 per cent administration, and 25 per cent student. The second concerned a more powerful Student Senate with Joint Committees established a deal with areas of mutual concern involving Student and University Senate. The third proposal considered a Tri-Cameral House and University Council. Under this plan there would be three separate Senates with delegates from all three meeting in an all University Council.

The Hearing Panel listed among its recommendations that the present University Senate vote on the three proposals to determine their acceptability. They called for a spontaneous reorganization of many graudate departments to include graduate students in departmental deliberations. They asked that the University take steps to reduce the scope of in loco parentis. They also recommended serious consideration to the question of establishing an ombudsman.

Maxwell Review focuses on 'identity crisis'

By BOB ZUER
Associate Editor

Universities are currently in the midst of an "identity crisis," according to Dwight Waldo, Professor of Political Science and Public Administration in Syracuse University's Maxwell School.

Waldo, who has held the Albert Schweitzer Chair in the Humanities here since 1967, makes this charge and examines the proper role of the university in today's society in the Winter Volume of the Maxwell Review, a journal published by the graduate students of the Maxwell School.

The journal will be on sale today through Thursday in the lobby of Maxwell Hall. Prospective articles for the Spring volume will also be taken now through March 30 in the Maxwell Review Office in Room 403 of Maxwell Hall. The Spring volume is expected to be released for publication during the last week of Spring classes.

That issue will deal with social conflict in the United States. It will examine the disenchantment of minority groups with existing political, social and economic institutions themselves as well as with the output of the existing systems. It will basically deal with "value questions," i.e., the values held highly today that differ from traditional ones, the roles social scientists must perform and the concrete issues and problems of our time, according to co-editor Bill Davis.

The Winter volume, however, is a general issue and is not focused on any one topic. In the only article written by a faculty member entitled "The University as a Power Center," Waldo examines the relationship between "knowledge" and "power," the increasing importance of the university as a producer and disseminator of knowledge, and the implications of the power of knowledge for the present and future of the university.

Waldo argues that the increasing involvement of the university in the politics of the non-academic world, the challenge to the essentially conservative tradition of the university, the increasing pressure for government involvement in (and regulation of) university affairs and the "crisis of authority" which characterizes the current university situation all contribute to the university's experience of the "identity crisis."

The probable outcome of these forces, Waldo writes, will be the rapid evolution of new institutional arrangements and the restructuring of old patterns.

Also included in this volume are book reviews on Black Power by Stokely Carmichael and Charles Hamilton.

Pleading innocent

Student released on bail after parking dispute

By RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

Larry Kelcourse, a junior in Liberal Arts, is being charged with disorderly conduct and resisting arrest as the result of an argument with a police officer over a parking ticket last Thursday.

He said yesterday he plans to plead innocent to the charges.

Accordingly to Kelcourse, he was sitting in a friend's car in front of the University bookstore shortly before 4 p.m. when a motorcycle policeman pulled up and ordered him to move the vehicle.

Parking in front of the bookstore is illegal between the hours of 4-6 p.m., and although Kelcourse said it was not yet 4 p.m. he consented and moved the car up to a meter several yards away. Shortly afterwards, his friend returned to the car.

"As soon as he began to move the car, the cop slapped a ticket on the windshield," Kelcourse said. Kelcourse said he and the policeman began to argue violently, at which time the officer grabbed him and according to Kelcourse threatened him with physical violence.

Kelcourse was then placed under arrest and taken, in a patrol car, to the corner of South Crouse and University Place, where he was placed in a paddy wagon and taken to the public safety building.

According to Kelcourse, handcuffs were fastened so tightly around his wrists that he was "bleeding profusely all over the back of the police car." He was subsequently treated for wrist lacerations and possible fracture at the Student Health Center.

Upon arrival at the public safety building, Kelcourse was charged with disorderly conduct and resisting arrest, and told to appear in court Feb. 28. He was released on $1000 bail.

Kelcourse holds that the policeman began ordering him to move before 4 p.m. while the car was still legally parked. He noted that in the policeman's report, "he described the time the ticket was issued at about 4:30."

"I hope something will be done about the parking situation," Kelcourse said. "I think the police put more effort into ticketing students than they do to solving serious crimes. We have about 12 unsolved murders in Onondaga County." "I can see enforcing the laws, but it is apparent that there is discrimination in the University area as far as parking tickets go," he continued. "It is obvious in the hiring of meter maids that police expect to ticket students."

CSL decree . . .

The third step taken by the Council was to recommend that a sub-committee be established to investigate implementation of Dormitory Autonomy policy setting March 7 as the deadline for a final report.

Ed Feldman, who was instrumental in the introduction of the autonomy proposal, sees Friday's action as indicative of progress.

"All the CSL did before was yell and scream about how great it (Dorm Autonomy) was. But they did nothing. Now we're finally getting specifics down."

Feldman saw as significant the fact that the Council passed the three motions and specified an exact deadline for final reports. He also spoke highly of Dean of Women, Marjorie Smith who has been effective in "pushing for Dorm Autonomy."

"She has been extremely cooperative and extremely progressive. We're very grateful for her help." He cited both Dean Smith and Dr. Weeks, a faculty member of CSL, as "instrumental" in the pursuit of the self-rule policy.

Another recommendation was made by the Council regarding the Visiting Hours experiment which was conducted by the University. During the five week period, fourteen selected living centers were given Parietal Hours which allowed them visitors in the dorm room during specified hours. When the experiment was recently concluded, visiting hours were rescinded to allow the Council time to evaluate the results. Friday the Council recommended that the Visiting Hours policy be re-established immediately in those dorms in which the experiment was conducted.

The only negative vote to the recommendation came from Dr. Burtt, a faculty representative. He questioned the decision to reinstate visiting hours to just the fourteen test dorms and not to all dorms requesting such privileges.

However, Cindy Baily, AWS president and member of CSL, said that it would be sufficient beginning to allow Parietal Hours to the original fourteen living centers. She said she expected "a lot of pressure" from those dorms without visiting hours.

Blues, jazz featured on WAER today

This evening on WAER Carl Apter presents urban blues bands from the south side of Chicago as he hosts Over Yonder's Wall, from 7:30-9:20 p.m. The purpose of the program is to properly recognize blues as the basis of all popular American music.

Then, from 9:30-11:25 p.m., the Village Caller presents the works of Gabor Szabo. This show features contemporary jazz sounds including small groups of the 60's, Latin jazz, and the new big band jazz. The host is Rick Gentilcore.

Thursday, Carl Apter presents "Folkworld," from 7:30 to 9:20 p.m. The program, which is presented every week, delves into some of the lesser known and fascinating aspects of folk music.

In keeping with the show's continual emphasis on traditional and non-faddish folk songs, Thursday's program will feature the music of folksinger Tom Rush. Last year Mr. Rush was heard here under the auspices of the Syracuse Folk Society.

Our manufacturing program is for engineers who want to run things as well as design them.

Do you like the idea of running a factory as well as designing one? The idea of controlling the quality of products as well as developing systems to produce them? The idea of motivating people as well as supervising them?

If you do, you'll like the idea of the General Electric Manufacturing Management Program.

It'll prepare you for a management position in a variety of engineering areas: manufacturing engineering, plant engineering, quality control, materials management and factory management.

And don't let the "program" part throw you. You'll start working the first day. And you'll work hard. Because you'll be working on real problems. Problems that have to be solved now.

Our representative will be on campus soon. So if you think you've got what it takes to take charge of things, why not talk it over with him?

SU minister arrives in time to help thwart suicide attempt

John H. McCombe, dean of Hendricks Chapel, began wondering when Rev. Thomas Boghosian failed to report for work on time yesterday morning.

It wasn't like his associate to be tardy without explanation, and Dean McCombe wondered what his excuse would be.

It was a legitimate one.

Rev. Boghosian helped thwart a suicide attempt in Kirkville after a five-hour shotgun seige which involved 20 police officers.

Rev. Boghosian, director of Chapel House here, was called to the scene and joined a doctor and Harold Gilbert's wife in talking him into giving up.

Gilbert, 48, was taken to Mercy State Hospital by ambulance. He held policemen at bay with a 12-gauge shotgun and .22-caliber rifle, before allowing Rev. Boghosian and the others to enter his home.

Rev. Boghosian works closely with Dean McCombe in handling students' religious matters on this campus. He is also a part-time minister at Wesleyan Methodist Church.

He is reporting for work on time today -- hopefully.

Wrestling outlook

Fearsome freshman five form fine future

By ADAM DAWSON

To the average student, the names Dennis Coupe, Jimmy Schenk, Tony Losito, Rick Russo, and Rich Johnson may not sound very familiar. However, to the wrestling afficionado these five boys are Syracuse University's wrestling future. These boys are the backbone of the freshman wrestling squad.

As frosh coach Dave Agone says, "They are tough in spots, but the lack of depth hurts us."

Despite this lack of depth, which has caused the team to forfeit two, and sometimes three, weight classes per match, it has managed to have a commendable 6-1-1 record with two matches remaining.

Only a narrow loss to Army with two forfeits keeps the frosh from an unbeaten record.

Jim Schenk wrestling at 145 and 152 pounds for the frosh is a former New Jersey schoolboy runnerup in his state. Jim settled on Syracuse because, "they wrestle a big time schedule and it is a fairly big school." Agone is glad Jim decided on Syracuse because Jim is one of the two boys on the team with an unblemished record. Jim has won all eight of his matches decisively.

The other undefeated wrestler is ex-Ohio State wrestling champ Dennis Coupe. Dennis wrestles 177,191 and heavyweight, filling in wherever Agone thinks he will do the most good.

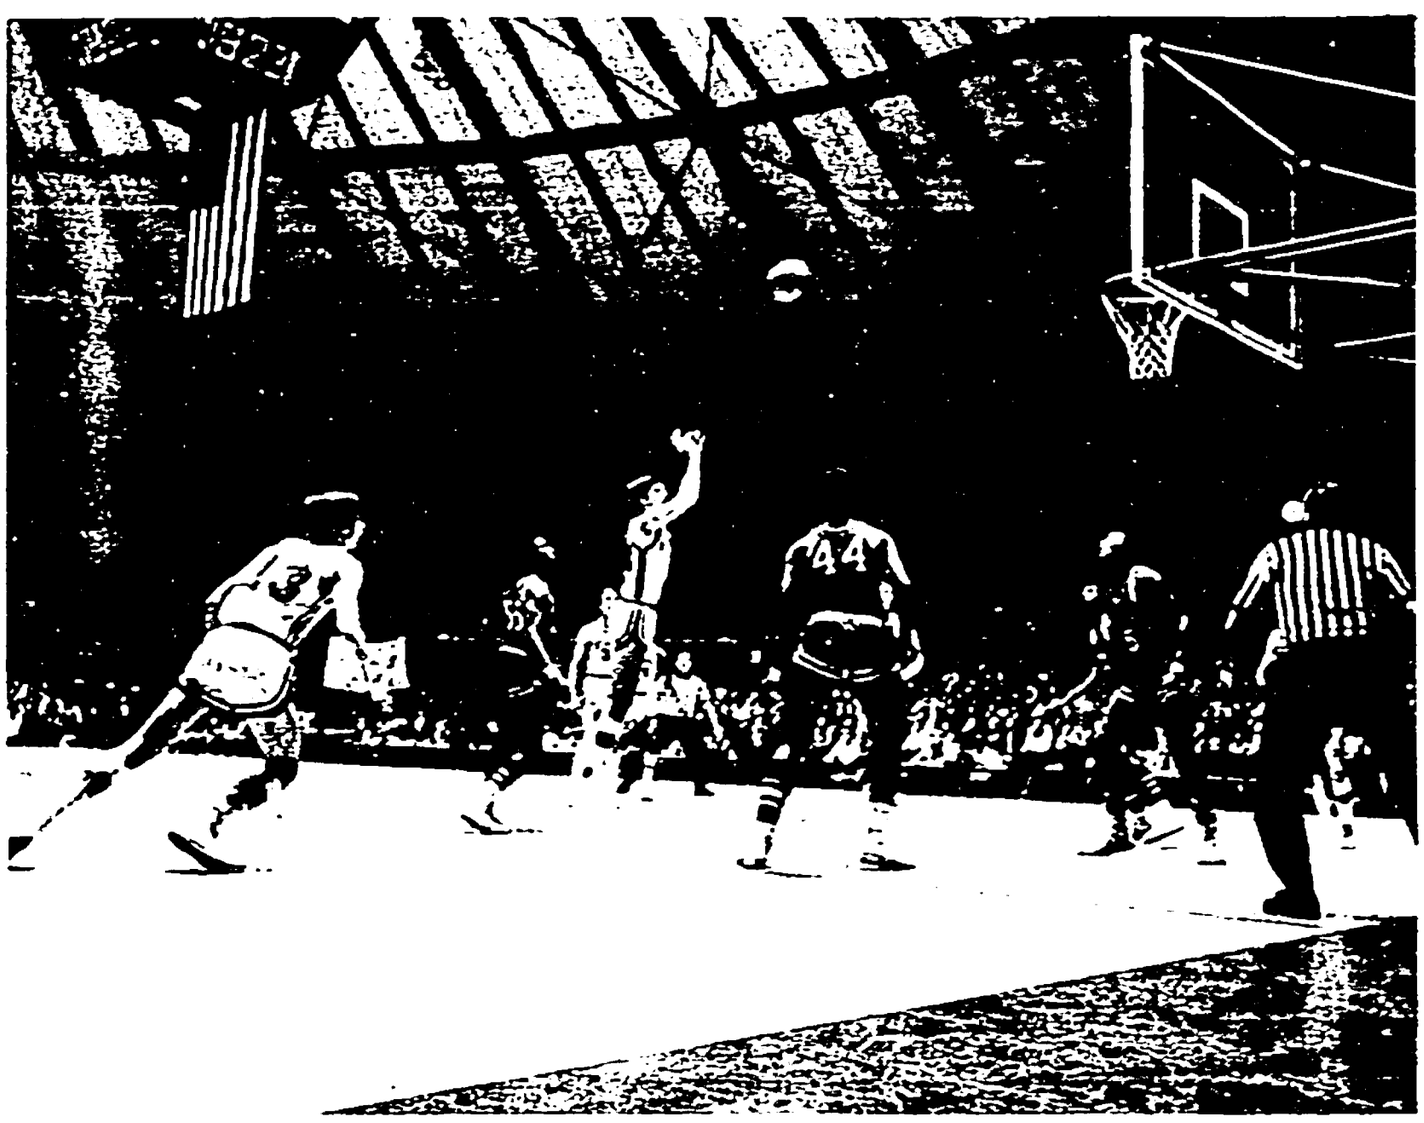
Dennis attends Syracuse on a football scholarship so he is one of those rare "two sport men."

He says, "I can greatly improve my wrestling due to the competition afforded to me in practice by Bob Rust and Vin Paolano."

The third member of this quintet is Tony Losito. Tony, who comes from Elimra, decided on Syracuse because of "its big name and its relative proximity to home."

His specialty is the 160 pound weight class, although he has gone 167 in some matches. Tony, who is called A.J. by his teammates, has only one defeat to mar his record. That was a one point loss to Cortland that he would like to avenge.

Rick Russo with a 5-1 record at 152 and 160 and Rich Johnson with a 6-1 record at 167 and 177 form the last two members of Agone's Fearsome Frosh Fivesome.



The Fivesome plus Ian Gertner, Wayne Babcock, and Rick Pratorius will put their record on the line tonight when they travel to Oswego to take on a revenge—crazed Oswego team.

After the Oswego match the frosh tangle with the Colgate frosh Saturday afternoon at the same time the varsity takes on the Colgate varsity.

The grand finale of the frosh schedule is the Freshman Easterns which will be held at West Point.

Dennis Coupe expects to wrestle 191 at the Point and "he expects to take it all." While Jim Schenk, Rich Johnson, Rick Russo, and Tony Losito expect to enter at their lowest weights, and do just as well.

As Vin Paolano and Bob Rust said, "Coupe, Schenk, and Losito will go all the way this year, while Johnson and Russo should do well, also."

Roy wears winner's smile

By ED AGRANOWITZ

It's hard to be happy about a loss, but Syracuse basketball coach Roy Danforth is all smiles when he talks about his team's latest setback. Last Wednesday's 71-63 defeat at the hands of nationally ranked St. John's was the Orange's only losing effort in their last five tries.

"That game definitely had a positive effect on us," says Danforth, "We realized then that if we played our game, we can be winners."

The 8-15 Orangemen will finish with, at best, a 10-15 slate, hardly a winning season. But this is a different team than the one that started the season, and the label of "winner" is not out of place right now.

The biggest change in the team, according to the coach, is the attitude. "At the beginning of the year we'd fall behind by a couple or three points, and be out of it," explains Danforth. "But now if we fall behind we know we'll catch up."

The team's latest success, a 95-83 win over West Virginia Saturday night, supports Danforth's statement. "It would have been easy for the guys to fold against West Virginia," he says, "but they kept their heads and we beat a good team.

Primary reasons for the teams resurgence have been the steady improvement of the three Bills—Smith, Case, and Finney, and the hustling play of Ernie Austin.

The team's biggest headache at the season's start—rebounding—no longer has Danforth reaching for the Excedrin. "Smith is getting better every game," says Roy, "and Case and Kouwe are doing a tremendous job of blocking out. This makes Smith more effective on the boards."

"On the offensive boards, Case has been unbelievable," continues Danforth, "He's been giving us a tremendous effort."

Finney, just another man on the bench for most of the year, has come up with consecutive efforts of 22, 10, and 20 points in the last three games. At 6'4", Finney is the ideal man to have on the bench. "He just came out of nowhere," marvels Danforth, "and Finney's just what we needed because he can replace either a guard or a forward. He's not making the mistakes he made earlier in the year, and that man can shoot."

Austin, ineligible for the first 16 games, has come back to give the Orange offense stability. Ernie is playing just about the opposite game now that he played as a freshman when he scored 20 points a game on a wide assortment of shots.

Now, Ernie is handling the ball, running the offense, making key steals, and playing excellent defense. "His shooting touch is not yet back to par because he still isn't in top shape," says Danforth, "but he's been making the big play when we need it the most."

Austin's biggest test will come tomorrow night when he will start off on Calvin Murphy. Murph hit for 68 points in his last appearance against the Orange.

Case is a doubtful starter for the Niagara because of an ankle injury he suffered against West Virginia. If Billy is unable to go, Danforth will probably call on Gerry McFadden. "Gerry has been really hustling hard in practice despite the fact that he didn't get into two games," says Danforth. "If possible I'd like to keep Finney available as a reserve.

Danforth is hopeful that the crowd will increase in size for the last two games. "We were disappointed at the turnout after the St. John's game," he said. But we're winners now. We're going to beat Niagara."

Chickens lose another; coach retires after game

Syracuse University's ski team came from behind to take second place in 13-college West Point Invitational Ski Meet held at the Military Academy at West Point this weekend. The Cadets took first place on their home grounds.

The fine showing by Walt Ryan, Dave York, Alan Seeling, Jeff Crary, Dave Maass and Steve Marcks put underdog Syracuse next to Army at the end of the ski jumping event on Sunday afternoon, edging out divisional ski powers Cornell, Cortland and Paul Smith.

In a field of over 70 competitors, it was SU's Alan Seeling who was the skier of the meet. Al carved his way to a first place in both slalom and giant slalom, soared to a third in jumping, and ran a lung-bursting eight miles to place sixth in cross country skiing.

The warm weather hampered many teams, but coach Elton Fairbank guaged out snow conditions accurately at the last moment to give SU the proper wax combination for both cross country and jumping.

Combining a sticky man-to-man defense with a blistering fast break, the WAER Wolves throttled a game, but outclassed Daily Orange Chicken ballclub 59-48 Saturday morning at Manley Field House.

Rich Rose, with 26 points, mostly on fast break layups, did most of the damage for the hustling Wolves. Rose was presented with the Chadwick Cup immediately following the game.

"It was a great team effort," said MVP Rose, "and I'm delighted with the award. The Chadwick Cup is something every athlete dreams of."

For the Chickens, center Mark Zwerner rebounded well and was high scorer with 16 points. Playmaker Ed Agranowitz chipped in with 10 points and had several fine assists. Gina Bell did not show up, because she was too tired from her Eastern League game the night before.

Chicken player coach Mike Greenstein, obviously disheartened after his third loss in as many tries as DO mentor, announced his retirement following the game.

"Who needs the aggravation?" asked Greenstein. Next week Greenstein is expected to accept an athletic director's job with the Promethean.

Speculation immediately began for Greenstein's successor. Most fingers seem to point to long and rangy Mike Weber. "I'll only say that the matter is under consideration," said Weber, "but if I am the next coach of the Chickens, this losing streak will come to an end – that I promise."

The box score:

Wolves	G	F	T	Chickens	G	F	T
Rose	10	6	26	Weber	4	1	9

Sports sidelights

The SU swim team will be in quest of its seventh victory of the season this afternoon at Rochester. The meet was originally scheduled for Friday.

In another schedule change, the team will close out its dual meet season Saturday at Colgate, instead of the original date of March 4.

The frosh meet will follow the varsity in both instances.

The Orange track team won the team title over 21 other colleges in the Rochester Invitational track meet on Saturday.

SU took five firsts, and totaled 39 points to runnerup Cortland's 32.

Orange winners were Roger Taylor in the shot, John Fitzpatrick in the high hurdles, Guy Roberts in the quarter and Larry Zuller in the mile.

Education crisis

Two NYC educators note reaction to community school decentralization

By JEAN HAVENS
Associate Editor

"Every child can learn, but sometimes a situation is so structured that a child's learning processes stop." Thus reaffirming his belief in the teachability of children, the Rev. C. Herbert Oliver, chairman of the controversial Ocean hill—Brownsville Governing Board, last night discussed reaction to the decentralization of his community's schools.

Rev. Oliver and Father Kevin Kelley, Harlem school administrator, spoke in conjunction with the five week "Crisis in Urban Education" program. Last night's topic "Educational reform--case study and insight from the New York City school crisis" was the second in the series.

Speaking first, Father Kelley described the experimental program being carried on at St. Thomas the Apostle School in Harlem. For the first time, non-Catholic students and those who cannot afford the tuition are being admitted on an equal basis with the regular students.

Declaring that the Catholic schools should drop their exclusive admissions requirements and become "in fact, divorced from the church," Father Kelley stated, "If there is to be freedom in a community and freedom in education, so should there be freedom in the church."

Fighting the lack of communication between the school and parents as one of the basic problems encountered, Father Kelley said, "We are attempting to demonstrate that a parochial school can make a vibrant contribution to the community--and that the community can make an equally vibrant contribution to the school. Parental involvement is encouraged, with the parents becoming partners in education."

In his speech, Rev. Oliver also stressed the importance of interested parents. Summarizing the events which resulted from the decentralization of the Oceanhill—Brownsville school, Rev. Oliver noted that much of the confusion surrounding the issues was due to biased reporting by the news media. "We kept waiting for some smart reporter to come along, discover the truth and print it," he explained, "but no one did."

PAUL CONNETT, president of the Keep Biafra Alive Organization

Head of 'Keep Biafra Alive' urges world powers to defuse civil war

By VIC LIVINGSTON

Paul Connett, president of the Keep Biafra Alive Organization, yesterday urged the U.S. and other world powers to outwardly support Biafra's right to exist as an independent nation, and to "defuse" the current civil war by exerting a political solution to the conflict.

Connett, speaking in Maxwell Auditorium at a program arranged by the Nigerian-Biafran Relief Committee, claimed that the U.S. has not, as is widely believed, maintained a completely neutral position regarding the Biafran conflict, but has encouraged a strong Nigerian federal government at the expense of the secessionist state.

"The basic reality of this situation is Biafran existence. The Biafrans, a strongly nationalistic people, will not surrender, regardless of Nigeria's or the world's power. The Biafrans seek to have self-determination, to control their own destiny. If this means they must be killed, they will continue to die," Connett said.

Connett reviewed the events leading to the current conflict. Promises of a "loose confederation" were forgotten by the Nigerians, while the U.S. and Great Britain pressed for a strong centralized government. A proposed 12 State System, which would have divided the Eastern region of Nigeria, coupled with a series of massacres in Biafran cities, led to the secession of Biafra and civil war, Connett said.

U.S. aid to the starving people of Biafra has been delayed because of the U.S. desire to keep Nigeria united, Connett claimed. By President Nixon declaring Biafra's right to exist, the U.S. could then exert its influence to obtain a political solution to the conflict, ending the starvation and war, he said.

Connett feels that U.S. policy to date has tried to discourage "further fragmantization" of Africa by encouraging the efforts of the Nigerian Federalists. He feels that the U.S. fears further civil wars and thus supports a centralized government. By allowing the Biafrans to starve, he charged, the U.S. seeks the eventual collapse of the Biafran state, ending the war with a united Nigeria.

"If the U.S. has exerted its influence one way in the past, it can exert it in the other way to obtain a settlement. The U.S. would then be a peace-monger, using the type of influence the people of the world want to see. A political solution is vital."

"The U.S., to pursue this policy, has put pressure on other African countries not to recognize Biafra," Connett said. "The U.S. holds the belief that if the Biafrans secede, everyone form here to Honolulu will secede. The U.S. has used this myth to set up another domino theory.

"American support for Biafra would serve as a warning to other nations throughout the world for humane treatment of minorities within a nation. For the way the Biafrans have been treated, they jolly-well ought to secede," Connett said.

Regardless of political developments, Connett said, the U.S. and other world powers should immediately begin a massive aid program to save the Biafran people from starvation.

"Looming in the background is massive starvation. In a matter off months, another six or seven million people may die. The U.S. must cut through the diplomatic red tape and get food to the people. We must change our attitude from one of sympathy to one of empathy."

American reluctance to intervene, Connett said, also stems from the Vietnam

'Some personal opinions'

Tolley not the only 'drip'

Editor's note: following is the text of Chancellor William P. Tolley's speech to the 94th annual dinner of the Onondaga County Bar Association given Saturday night.

When Ponce de Leon looked for the Fountain of Youth at St. Augustine, Florida, he was on the right continent but in the wrong town. Moreover, he came more than a century too soon. According to the history books, he visited St. Augustine in 1513. At that time there were no colleges in America. We didn't get our first one until 1636. Surely, if one is looking for the Fountain of Youth the place to go to is a college campus. If my age were not a matter of public record, I should be tempted to conceal the fact that I came to Syracuse as a freshman in 1918 and have been on a college or university campus ever since. Thus in September 1968 I had been privileged for half a century to be at the place Ponce de Leon sought to discover. Perhaps the reason it seems only yesterday is that when one drinks at the Fountain of Youth time has no duration.

Because it has been half a century perhaps you will let me pose as an expert on universities. The word expert, however, gives me pause. The syllable "ex" suggests one who has made an exit. There is no denying I am not too far from that time. The second syllable has been defined as a drip under pressure. How better can you describe an American college president? But I want you to know we are not the only drips on the campus.

I shall share with you tonight some of the opinions I hold with respect to the current education scene. I have no illusion that wisdom will die when I leave this earthly scene. But each of is entitled to a few opinions.

CHANCELLOR TOLLEY

Science strike

Class absence requested

Students wishing to participate in the March 4 research strike and symposium here are being urged to request excused absences from their instructors.

A statement released by the SU committee corrdinating the strike requests professors of afternoon classes on March 4 to permit students to attend the symposium instead of class.

Professors wishing to attend the symposium are being urged to cancel their afternoon classes.

The purpose of Tuesday's symposium is to examine the role of Syracuse University Research Corporation and discuss the desirability of universiti[illegible] participation in scientific research.

"Misuse of scientific and technical knowledge presents a major threat to the existence of mankind," according to the Undergraduate March 4 Committee's statement. "Through its actions in Vietnam our government has shaken our confidence in its ability to make wise and humane decisions. There is also disquieting evidence of an intention to enlarge further our immense destructive capability.

"Much confusion surrounds the activities of universities in scientific research sponsored by government and military. Little information, for example, is known of the activities of the Syracuse University Research Corporation. Rumor prevails that SURC supposedly engages in research concerning missles, biological warfare, and intelligence training."

The March 4 symposium will consist of workshops and discussions to be held in the auditorium and rooms of the Physics Building. Four separate workshops with speakers and discussion leaders will concentrate on these issues: Environment, Human Aggression, Ethical Uses of Science, Syracuse and the Department of Defense, and Economics and Politics of the Military Industrio Complex. During the evening, panels will attempt to reach some conclusions and recommendations with respect to the afternoon workshop issues.

The research strike idea was originated by a group of professors and graduate students at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. It has since spread to colleges throughout the nation which are also concerned about the threat which misuse of science could impose upon mankind.

Cornell University has scheduled similar programs for the day.

The liberal arts at SU

It might be assumed that the American system of higher education concentrates less on vocationalism, although still too much so, and more on a general, well-rounded education. What do the oft-saluted liberal arts really offer?

Ideally they constitute studies that tend to develop different abilities in the individual, giving priority to the arts of communication. In addition, they supposedly develop the mind to think critically, search for truth and synthesize differing concepts.

What in reality constitutes the liberal arts at Syracuse University and, we presume, elsewhere?

The specialization that is usually associated with vocationalism has sliced something called "knowledge" or "widson" into digestible but unenlightening pieces. The liberal arts major, like boarding house hash, doesn't get made, it just accumulates.

There is no effort to inter-relate courses in history, English and sociology outside of a few coincidences and a few flexible concentrations such as American Studies. A graduating liberal arts student has bits and pieces of knowledge from many different areas, but one day we'll see how far short this falls from an education.

Letters to the editor

ROTC

To The Editor

Your three articles on ROTC over the past week have been fascinating attempts at maintaining the slanted objectivity toward this issue that would sway the largely apathetic bulk of the student body here.

Apart from your out-of-context quote of an Army regulation, there was no attempt to obtain the views-official or otherwise-of any Army personnel at all.

What has yet to be examined, and what the DO evidently has no intention of looking into, is exactly whose interests are served by the abolition or dilution of ROTC. If a student takes ROTC to skip the University's Phys. Ed. requirement, he is disadvantaged by the proposed dilution of ROTC.

The responsibilities and burdens assumed by anyone accepting an officers commission are not to be taken lightly and certainly are not the kind a person will want to take simply because uniformed personnel walk around on campus. A person desiring an officers commission will nine times in ten pursue it by any means possible. Such a person usually takes ROTC because this is the only officer-preparation program through which he can keep in step with his general college education outside of the U.S. Military Academy. ROTC is also the least inconveniant in terms of time consumed, money spent and geographical displacement.

Yet there is in the three DO articles and in the petitions and pamphlets of SDS an attempt not to abolish ROTC because of its so-called lack of "academic and intellectual worth" but to use ROTC as a convenient road to lead Syracuse University onto the Peace bandwagon.

To obtain an objective consensus of opinion for action against some part of the University is one quite valid idea. For a group of willful individuals, whether faculty or students, to try to abolish something they find personally objectionable is 180 dangerous degrees opposite.

Harold Edward Foster

To the Editor:

While trying to stay clear of the question of whether or not ROTC is a "liberal art," I would like to attempt to clear up a few general misconceptions about the program that seem to exist on campus, at least as far as the Air Force in concerned. The most important of these is the issue of indoctrination. In my four years of taking AFROTC I have never been subjected to anything that could be even remotely referred to as indoctrination. Classes are free to discuss and criticize Air Force policies and doctrines, and where it is germane to the lesson government policies as well. I have stated several times in class that I felt our involvement in Vietnam was wrong, and this was accepted in a free academic spirit. Since the military is obligated to uphold our national objectives, there must be restrictions on what a military man can say at public gatherings. This is a logical regulation to prevent the military from becoming a possible rival to our civilian leadership. But in private, and in class, we are as free to express our personal opinions as anyone on this campus. To those who criticize the curriculum of the ROTC, I would suggest that they don't know much about it. The colleges and universities are not dictated to by some mad general sitting in an office deep in the Pentagon--the curriculum is in fact made up by a committee of twelve college and university presidents who act as advisors to the Air Force on academic matters concerning ROTC. There is a curriculum review currently under way. As far as drill is concerned, it is nothing more than a teaching tool through which cadets learn the necessary military attributes of leadership, discipline, teamwork, and willing (not unquestioning) obedience to constituted authority.

Another area of misinformation concerns the status of women with regard to ROTC. Contrary to the popular belief that women cannot take ROTC, there are six women currently enrolled for credit in the freshman and sophomore courses. They may also take the junior and senior courses for the normal three credits per semester. No loyalty oath is required since they cannot receive a commission. Departmental permission is required to take any course.

Finally, I would request that members of the campus community make an effort to divorce their emotional feelings over the Vietnam war from their attitude toward the ROTC. It would be another tragedy of a tragic war if as a result of it the military were to lose their prime source of educated, professional officers. For those who view all ROTC cadets as war-loving hawks I can only say that the military man hates war as much as anyone, because it is he who must fight it, bear the pain of it, and die as a result of it.

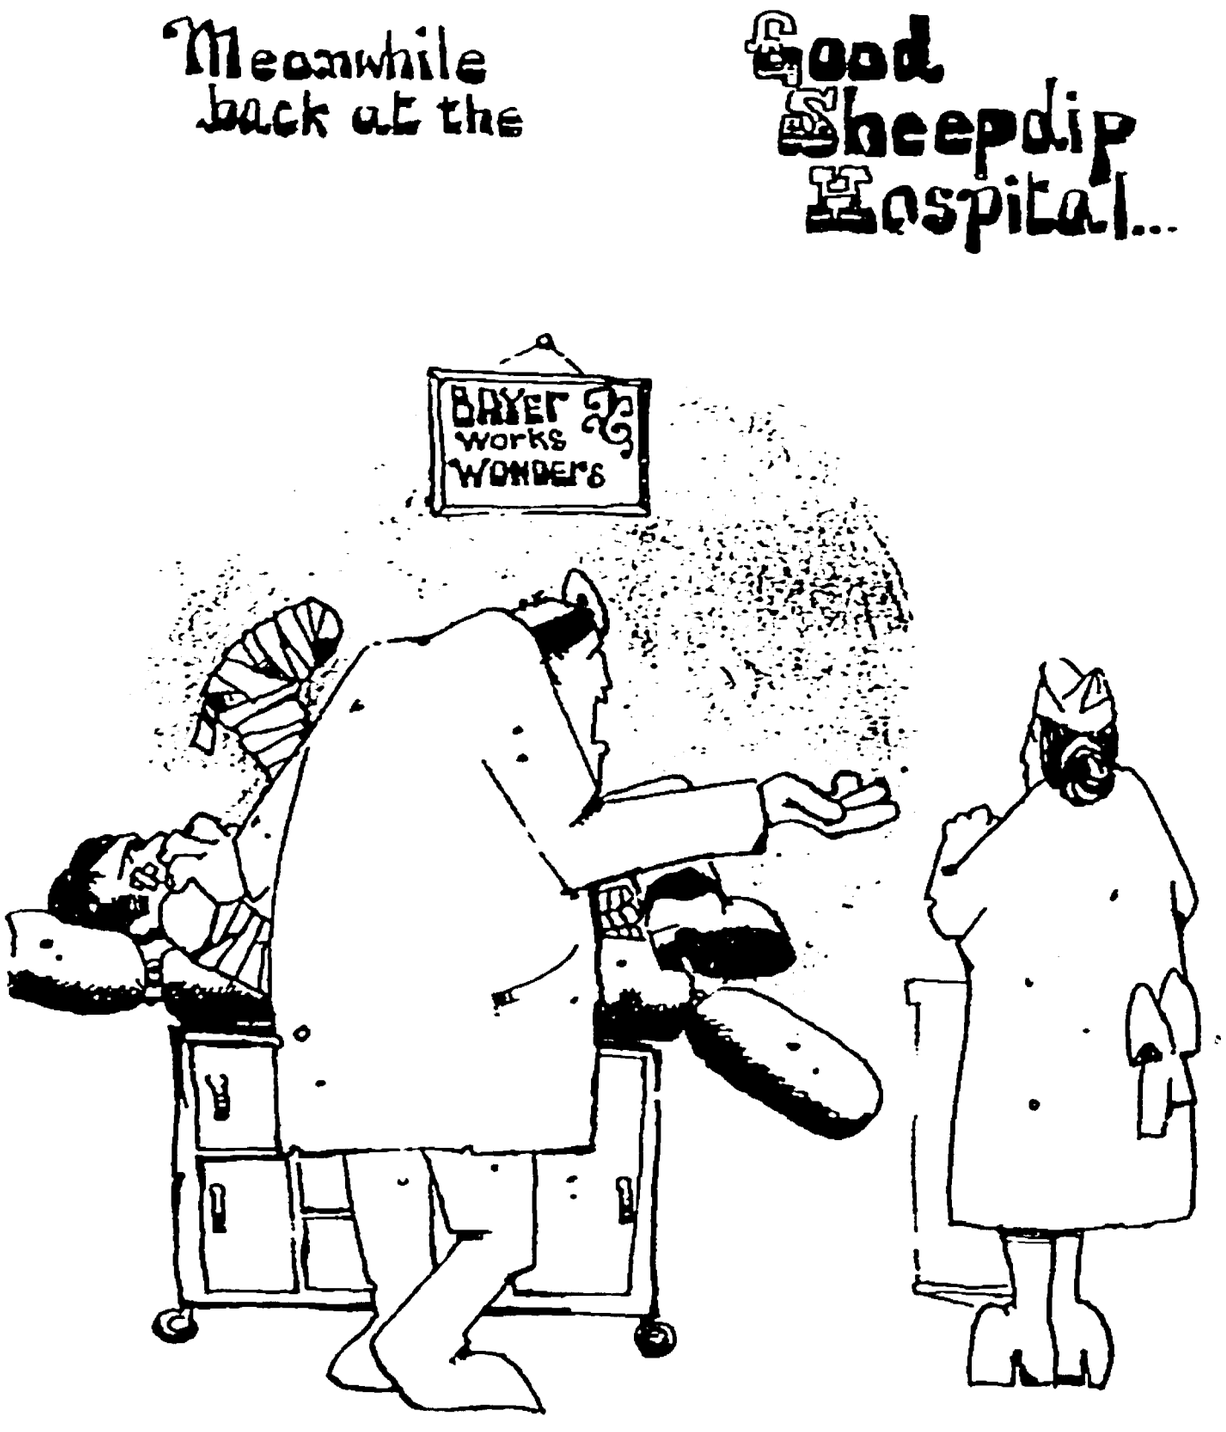
Academic community

Behemoth

By Paul Stavis

I borrow this expression from Professor Russell Kirk to describe what seems to be the tendency of a non-mythical Syracuse University over recent years.



What is going on? Where is the concept of the 'academic community' with its personal relationships, and recognition of scholarly acievement. If things get much worse here they will be measuring accumulative averages in 'yard gained' and research monies will be granted for investigation of fraternity parties.

This criticism is intuitive to me, but the same has been articulated by men of recognized stature. Professor Peter Stanlis of the University has said: "The best hope for the superior student to cut through the jungle of anonymity, mediocrity, and organized anarchy created by the uncontrolled growth of Behemoth University, is to find those rare good professors who sacrifice their advancement in order to teach." As the saltine warrior is my witness there esists such professors on this campus, who shall remain nameless.

Anyone who doesn't know who George F. Kennan is 'go to your room.' In his latest book Democracy and the Student Left, he capsulizes my feeling: "In many instances the university has itself impaired the residential quality of the campus by over-expansion; by stretching out the campus itself to a point where it becomes dependent on the automobile for internal communication; by forcing faculty to live miles away from the students; by crowding students into the dormitories to a point where all comfort and privacy are lost; by replacing attractive dining halls with noisy, sloppy cafeterias with turn-pike-restaurant food; by forgetting, in short, that there is a critical maximum to the sixe and density of the residential scholarly community. In this way it has hollowed its own pretenses and made a caricature of its own function." Meditate on Mr. Kennan's words and think of such cases as Walnut Avenue parking, Dellplain and the Mount as dorms, food service, etc. Correlate much? You might think Prof. Kennan was in residence at Syracuse.

There are things that haven't even been mentioned, such as football, 'social fraternities,' and the de-emphasis of things academic, for example — debate, and the lack of interest in scholarly clubs. And if I hear the argument that football makes money and this is its raisond'etre I will get nauseated for it misses the point entirely. I believe all of this significantly detracts from Syracuse University as an academic community, which holds a high potential for greatness.

Behemoth University seems to be the trend. Maybe it is a necessary evil of our affluence? Maybe we should devise a dual system which will have large mass education 'colleges' for those who desire an education for adaptation in the 'real world' and small centers for scholars. But, in any case, let us not loose sight of the traditional purpose of college, that is, the pursuit of knowledge for its own sake. Pretty Please!

'A new emphasis'

New policy allows business students to voice their opinions

By BOB DAVIS

For the first time in the history of the college of Business Administration at Syracuse, students will have representation on the faculty meetings, standing committees and Dean's committees.

There will be six student representatives admitted to the faculty meetings. Each representative will have a vote.

Two of the six students will be undergraduates. The undergraduates will be selected by the Student Council of the College of Business Administration from its membership. The Student Council is open to all business students.

In addition, there will also be four graduate representatives, selected from the Association of Graduate Students. Two of the representatives are working for their doctorates. They will be elected by the 44 doctoral candidates. The other two graduate students are masters candidates elected by the 300 masters candidates.

There will also be one graduate assistant representative and one teacher's assistant representative allowed in the faculty meeting. They will have a voice, but no vote. Students will have a total of 6 votes out of a possible 58 votes.

Students will be allowed on the eight standing committees, if the individual standing committee invites them to join. Dean Robert G. Cox; of the College of Business, thinks that most of the committees will invite the students and give them a vote. The committees are not forced to do this however.

The eight standing committees in which the students may be included are the Undergraduate Study and Curriculum Committee, the Rules and Regulations Committee, the Honors Committee, the Library Committee, the Student Counseling Committee, which helps plan for freshman and sophomores, the Disciplinary Committee; the Undergraduate Academic Committee, which reviews the performance of students on academic probation; and the Placement and Alumni Committee.

In addition, students will be also represented on special Dean's Committees that are set up by Dean Cox.

One main goal of the plan is to facilitate a two way communication with students and administration. The administration will pay heed to the contributions that the students make in part because they want to obtain more student participation.

Dean Cox is hoping that the students can add "a new emphasis" to the college of Business Administration. One possible program suggested by students would give credit to graduate students who assist ghetto businessmen to improve their businesses.

Dean Cox said that students have been added because there "is much to be gained from the contributions of knowledgeable students." He denied this decision was a reaction to the student uprisings at Columbia.

Entry blanks available for oratory competition

By CHUCK DWORKIN

Paul F. Stavis, President of Delta Sigma Rho-Tau Kappa Alpha, the forensic honorary, has announced that entry blanks are now available for the White-Denison Contest. The competition carries a first place prize of $125 and is open to all full-time seniors of the University in good standing.

White-Denison is a contest in public speaking ability. Contestants are to speak for 7-10 minutes, making only minimal use of notes and/or visual aids. The speech, on any topic of the student's choosing, must be original. Judging will be on the basis of skill both of delivery and management of ideas. Members of the University faculty will act as judges, their names to be announced shortly.

The final round of the competition will take place on Wednesday, Mar. 19, at 7:30 p.m. in Maxwell Auditorium. Depending upon the number of applicants, elimination rounds will be scheduled for Monday and Tuesday nights, Mar. 17 and 18.

In addition to receiving the monetary award, the winner will be honored at commencement and will receive recognition at the Honors Convocation.

The White-Denison contest combines two speech contests held for many years at S.U. The Horace Keep White Memorial Prize for Oratory was established in 1916 by his sons, Horace and Ernest Ingersol White, as a tribute to their father, a Syracuse banker. The Denison Contest was Founded in 1927 by Howard Denison, a prominent Syracuse attorney, Law School Class of 1915.

Entry forms are presently available at various points around campus, including the School of Speech Office, 200 H.L. All applications must be returned to 200 H.L. no later than Mar. 7.

Biafra . . .

experience and increased African civil strife.

"No one wants to see the U.S. intervene—there is a difference between intervention and involvement," Connett said. "Let American acceptance of Biafran nationhood be the first step to a further and even bigger goal of a West African Confederation. This would be a gigantic step toward African unity.

"Africans have been tricked into killing other Africans. We must stop the obstacles to West African Confederation. Such a confederation would lead to economic independence and true African social and political unity. Rather than pursue the totally unrealistic destruction of Biafra, the U.S. should respect the self-determination of the Biafran people. Shipments of food are needed, but that is not the solution. It is not humanitarian to feed children today and let them starve tomorrow."

Stimulating careers for graduates in Geography, Geology, Transportation.
Apply your knowledge of Geography or Transportation to intelligence studies for the Defense Intelligence Agency

The Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) is a unique, independent organization responsible for gathering and interpreting information to meet diverse intelligence requirements of the Department of Defense. The nature and scope of our mission create unusual, challenging opportunities in geography and transportation for graduates with career interests in research and analysis.

Representative openings are in:

GEOGRAPHY—Perform research and analysis required in the preparation of regional studies dealing with transportation, urban features and physical geography and the assessment of their effects on military operations. A degree is required in Geography or Geology.

TRANSPORTATION — Perform research and analysis involving transportation data relevant to assigned geographic area. This includes describing physical characteristics and operational status of transportation systems, routes and facilities; evaluating construction and maintenance capability to support military operations; and considering their relative importance and vulnerability. A degree is required in Geography or Transportation.

Depending on your degree level, starting salaries will range from $6,981 (GS-7) to $8,462 (GS-9). Salary increases are frequent, and you will enjoy the broad, liberal benefits of Federal employment including generous vacation and sick leave, insurance and retirement programs. You will also have the chance to participate in a comprehensive academic study program, at DIA expense, leading to advanced degrees.

All applicants for DIA positions must be U.S. citizens and are subject to thorough background inquiries and physical examination. For further information please send your resume or Standard Form 171 (available at any post office) including college transcript or summary of grades to:

Decision pending

Student air fare discounts may be terminated

By ALAN STAMM
Assistant Managing Editor

Half-fare airline tickets for college-age passengers may soon soar up, up and away if the Civil Aeronautics Board (CAB) upholds its own decision banning them.

The Board is currently reviewing its Jan. 21 ruling to eliminate stand-by fares as "unjustly discriminatory" to adult passengers. If CAB reaffirms its original stand, youth fares could vanish like Ford's Trimotor aircraft within one month.

Two dozen U.S. airlines currently offer youth discounts of up to 50 per cent on regular jet-coach fares. Complaints from several bus companies triggered CAB's January action.

National Trailways Bus Systems filed its first complaint two years ago, but CAB sustained youth fares. Trailways appealed to the Fifth Federal Circuit Court of Appeals, which called for hearings by the Board.

Trailways also challenged military furlough fares, but the Court did not call for review of that practice.

CAB's January ban brought a swift influx of letters and telegrams from outraged students and parents. Dozens of campus newspapers editorialized against the decree, and CAB agreed to review its decision.

Among airlines, reaction was mixed. Fourteen U.S. lines support youth discounts, while ten oppose them or take no position. The youth fare was started in 1966 by American Airlines. Competition led other firms to follow.

Legislators responded differently, perhaps in reaction to a deluge of mail.

New York State Senator Edward J. Speno wrote to CAB's chairman to protest the cancellation threat. He cited several "benefits" of youth fares:

For the students, it is an opportunity to attend colleges in other parts of the country. For the parents, it is the benefit of cutting the interminable rise of college cost. For the airlines, it is the acquaintance and encouragement of young people to fly and a logistical method of filling seats that would otherwise be vacant while the country benefits with a broader knowledge base for its young.

In Washington, Rep. Arnold Olsen (D-Mont.) has emerged as one of the most outspoken CAB critics.

"No one would benefit from an elimination of these fares," Olsen said last Wednesday. "As a matter of fact, it would very likely lead to a general fare increase because seats would otherwise go vacant."

Olsen said feeling is widespread in the Congress that the youth fare, currently under fire,"has been an important factor enabling thousands of our young people to attend the colleges and universities of their choice. It reflects the increased emphasis governments at all levels have placed on strengthening educational opportunities in recent years. In addition," he added, "we believe the fare has provided many thousands of our young people with the unique educational experience that travel alone provides."

Olsen said elimination of half-fares would "encourage thousands of young people to resume the illegal and dangerous practice of hitch-hiking or to attempt long, exhausting automobile trips, frequently in unsafe vehicles."

Youth fares, according to the Montana legislator, are a "bright spot in a world that generally discriminates against the young."

The battle is not being waged at the expense of Olsen's sense of humor. He wryly wrote college editors last week, "I think we have our crusade off the ground."

'Once Virgin Blood' will flow Friday evening after concert

"Once Virgin Blood" rightfully should follow a concert by the Fifth Dimension as the mixed media show will indeed add another dimension to culture at Syracuse University. Kimmel-Marion along with the junior class are sponsoring the show and dance on Friday, Feb. 28 starting at 11:45 p.m.

The synthesis of different media under one theme will offer a novel usage of electronics and audience participation. In the terms that Marshall McLuhan uses, the medium is the message. "Once Virgin Blood" introduces content of the medium as the message.

Carrying the McLuhan philosophy back to content is a logical extension to reach the highest effect on the audience. McLuhan would argue that the medium remains supreme. The experiment of "Once Virgin Blood" will actually test the compatability of medium and content.

Aside from the relevance of the cultural part of "Once Virgin Blood," the social aspect as a service to students by a dormitory is also important. Independents often get lost in the shuffle of private parties or lack of transportation, "Once Virgin Blood" with free beer and the Sidewinders in Kimmel dining hall fills out the concert night and offers good low cost entertainment on campus.

Tickets on sale this week in HBC lobby and at the door cost only $1.50 per couple and $1 stag. The curfew has been set back an hour so this mixed-media event and dance could be offered to the campus.

With the campus heading towards dorm autonomy, Kimmel-Marion's work is an example of the type of involvement that more dormitories can offer the campus.

It's not every day you can line up an engineering job at General Electric.

It's Thursday, March 6

That's the day the GE interviewer will be on campus. He's coming to talk to engineers. All kinds of engineers.

He'll be talking about the opportunities at General Electric. All kinds of opportunities.

Opportunities in research and development. Where an engineer can work on everything from jet engines to x-ray equipment to ways to prevent air pollution.

Opportunities in manufacturing. Where an engineer can be responsible for designing a factory or developing a new production system or getting the most out of other people.

Opportunities in sales. Where an engineer spends most of his time with GE customers, using his technical knowledge to help them solve a variety of problems.

So no matter what kind of engineer you are, you'll probably find that General Electric has exactly the kind of job you're looking for.

Why not line up an interview now? And you might line up just the job you want on Thursday, March 6.

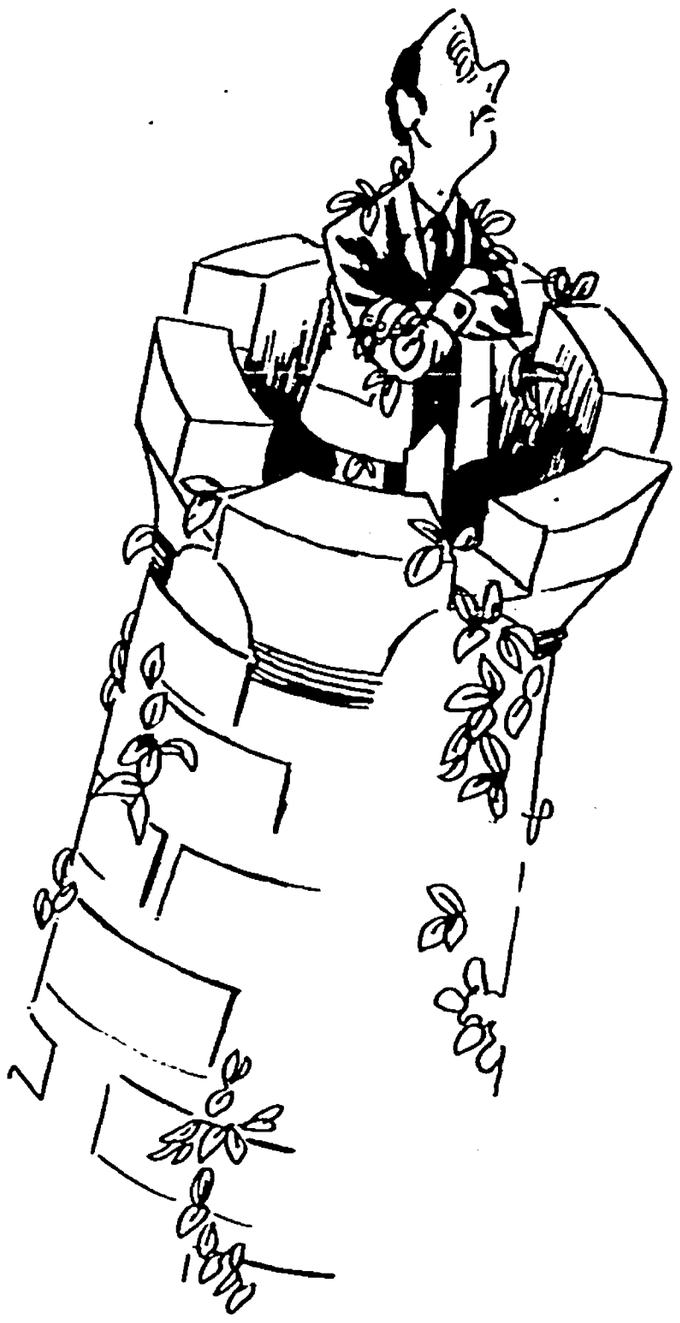
Computers discussed on WAER

Computers on campus will be the subject of WAER's Syracuse University Forum today and tomorrow at 5 p.m.

Today, Peter Mackey will interview Dr. Otway Pardee, director of the Syracuse University Computer Center, on computers, teaching and research.



Tomorrow Mackey will discuss "How a University Uses a Computer" with Gordon Lovell, manager of systems, and Paul Lance, manager of operations, of the Syracuse University Data Center.

Barzun polishes the classic

What role, the university?

By CATHY COVERT
Associate Professor

Jacques Barzun. The American University: How It Runs, Where It Is Going. Harper & Row, New York. 1968 319p.

The university may have failed the student, suggests Jacques Barzun, former provost of Columbia University, but not in the way activist students may think.

Conceding that students have often suffered bad lectures, slipshod grading, inattention to assignments, and lack of professorial attention, Barzun nonetheless insists the primary "student" questions for the university are two:

1. Is he primarily a student?

2. If so, and if, being a student "he elects to be secondarily something more, is he willing to take the risks and burdens of his ulterior purpose?"

As to the first answer, Barzun is perfectly clear in his own mind. "Now all the university can demand is studentship, it must indeed enforce it; academically in class, and by discipline where appropriate in other situations. Otherwise, why are we all there?"

He indeed holds the university responsible for failure, for failure to insist on the rigorous disciplines of learning, for failing to provide genuine difficulty, by failure to insist that the student in choosing to learn must enforce discipline on himself.

The university, he suggests, through not demanding enough has "brought on the unrest and yearning for genuine difficulty and pain and thus disrupted the institution."

Though it is important to understand conditions precipitating violence or apathy among the young, he says, it is "equally important to remember that students have as much free will as anybody else."

Having chosen a course of action, he charges, many then refuse to recognize they are responsible for what happens next.

Their minds are "monopolized by their inner life...and consequently they do not readily picture a chain of likely events leading to a predictable conclusion."

The book they need they will keep, regardless of the needs of other borrowers. The loan they have taken out they will not repay on time, despite the needs of others for funds. And the damage they wreak seems to be undertaken in the conviction that sabotage is a kind of communication and "free from boomerang effects."

Some do appear innocent of even the most rudimentary hunch that there is a reciprocity in things...step on the teeth of a rake and the handle will smite you.

"It is required of the young to show a stronger moral sense than the old," Barzun declares, asserting that it is not morality that is at issue, but the "arrogant pretensions and airs of holier-than-thou put forward by the institution goaders.

"They can seize the privilege of irresponsibility if they will take the consequences. But they cannot turn it into a right to run the budget and lecture the trustees."

Universities are not participatory democracies, he concludes. They are places for learning. And though he proposes many changes for facilitating that basic objective, to this classic purpose he remains steadfastly devoted.

Though the volume was written and dispatched to the publishers before the late lamented disturbances at Columbia, Dr. Barzun maintains that even now he would not change a word of it.

One section of the work, however, does seem particularly fascinating in light of the action that put the Columbians up against the ivied wall.

When it comes to faculty attention, wrote Dr. Barzun smoothly, students "come last, not by selfish choice, not on any theory, but simply because everything else is a group activity having a rhythm of its own.

"The group commands and the individual is neglected."

Blueprint for group action, anyone?

Drug usage

Author attacks society and education

By MARTY GORDON

Drugs on the College Campus, by Helen H. Nowlis, Ph D. Anchor Books, Doubleday & Co., Inc., Garden City, N.Y. Jan. 3, 1969, 137 pp.

"American society and education are doing little to contribute to the richness of life that students sense can be theirs."

Problems like drug abuse will continue to plague us until we are able to provide, within the framework of the educational institution itself, ways in which students can satisfy some of their important non-cognitive needs. Statements like these reflect the general method of presentation followed in Dr. Helen H. Nowlis' "Drugs on the College Campus."

With great candor and a strict sense of objectivity Dr. Nowlis has produced a relevant and readable account of the drug situation on college campuses today. The book was written as a result of a nationwide study made by the National Association of Student Personnel Administrators and the Food and Drug Administration. Her concern for facts unmasks many untrue notions about "drugs" often shrouded by the complexity of scientific presentation or mystical beliefs.

Dr. Nowlis defines her terms--addiction, tolerance, drug, head, etc.--and relates them to the student. The laws--both federal and state (in general)--are clearly and simply stated and evaluated. ("The widely shared view that savagely punitive laws will effectively 'stamp out' drug use among college students has no evidence to support it.")

In one section--"Facts about drugs"--the problems and issue involved are discussed in perspective to the student and his culture.

Part II of the book is devoted to "selected drugs." Here four drug types--Marihuana, Barbituates, Amphetamines, and the psychotogenic (LSD--acid)--are thoroughly discussed as to general characteristics, tolerance and dependence, chemical uses, ideosyncratic and toxic reaction, and behavior and social considerations. Dr. Nowlis is careful to separate fact and fiction and destroy several widely believed "myths." (LSD's effect on chromosones, for example.) For comparison, Dr. Nowlis includes like analyses of ethly alcohol (whisky) and aspirin.

Another chapter is concerned with the "Response of the educational institution." The depth and broadness of the problem is shown by the large number of issues intimately related to drug use--role of the school in society, academic freedom, right of privacy, in loco parentis, philosophy of social control of the individual. What is intimated is a need for a major re-evaluation of goals and society's reaction to them.

Self-restraint, drive and technical competence are increasingly being replaced by expertise, cognitive skill, and the PhD as passports to success. Older virtues of the Protestent ethic are being left behind by social change. Adults often confuse youthful adaptation to social change with gross immorality.

In conclusion, the book is interesting and thought provoking beyond the limits of the central topic. It is also a conscious effort to provide accurate and up to date information on current drugs and their use. Dr. Nowlis has provided a valid reference. In essence she seems to add that mankind today is still making history without having any conscious idea of what it really wants or under what conditions it would stop being unhappy. It seems to be making itself more unhappy and calling that unhappiness progress. This is what the drug problem is all about. Adults with their alcohol and tranquilizers and students with their marihuana and LSD, "reacting to condition would negate human values and human worth." Students seeing drugs rightly or wrongly, as an attempt to strike back at, to seek insight into, to protest what they feel to be the causes of pain.

The University in Transition

Rejects student management

Dr. James A. Perkins, president of Cornell, begins "The University in Transition" by considering the historical backgrounds of knowledge and of the University. The Greeks were among the first to decide that the individual man could discover truth by use of his own mind. Man was rational.

They also made a decision which affected Perkins' interpretation of knowledge. They connected three ideas: "... that reason could be applied to the results of observation, that knowledge so obtained had a validity apart from things observed, and that this knowledge could be applied to the whole range of human experience" — the acquisition, transmission and application of knowledge.

From these three ideas Perkins derives the three main missions of education and of the university.

The acquisition of knowledge is the mission of research. The transmission of knowledge is the mission of teaching. The application of knowledge is the mission of public service.

Perkins notes that during the history of education the emphasis has always been on one of the missions to the exclusion of the other two. At one time or another the emphasis has shifted from one mission to another. This excluding emphasis has restricted the completeness of the university's position in the world. With the advent of the Morrill Act in 1862, Perkins sees the beginning of a new period for higher education.

The three missions were then connected together in one institution. Perkins feels that this joining together "... changed the whole relationship between the university and society." The university has changed now from an institution of limited capacity into a modern marvel of unlimited capacity. The conception of the university has been altered. Perkins considers the modern university the "dynamo of the modern world."

He is enthralled by the new concept of the university with its union of missions. "The university and the other institutions of society--including the corporation, the farm, the cultural center, and the government agency--have now been joined together by a new kind of blood stream, made up of the ideas, the trained intelligence, and the manpower which provide the driving energy for our society. And the university is the great pumping heart that keeps this system fresh, invigorated, and in motion."

He believes "the interplay of forces that the modern university has thus triggered has transformed our whole society--and the university with it. Our university is the engine of change and is transformed by it." Perkins sees great possibilities for the university which properly unifies the missions of knowledge.

The university is being asked to cope with an enormously increased instruction load, a tremendously improved secondary education system, a scarcity of available professors, federally-backed research, and increasingly numerous public service contacts while insuring the proper balance in the university's missions at the same time. The University has finally identified its proper roles. It is growing continuously. It must meet the needs of the future by solving its problems of internal cohesion and external relations.

In Perkins' second chapter he discusses the internal coherence of the University. He feels that the university's integrity is involved "with maintaining the coherence of its various parts." He has suggested that "the explosive power of knowledge might be traceable to an interaction of its attributes, and that in like manner the growth and current power of the university in the United States might derive from the fact that it, and perhaps it alone, had fully embraced its three missions."

Perkins establishes two criteria for maintaining and increasing the internal coherence of the university with regard to its internal decision-making: one, how interrelated are the university's missions, and two, are the university's capabilities in any of the areas strengthened by its decisions in any of the other areas?

He then discusses the relatedness of the various areas to each other. The ideal relationship between teaching and research is found in the teacher-researcher.

A variety of problems arise which make this combination less than ideal in its presently existing combination. The fields with which the professor is involved in are oftentimes unrelated. Two fallacious assumptions have hindered the ideal from occurring. They are that the first two years of higher education must be the same in all institutions and that all students who enter the liberal arts college or university have the same educational needs and motivations.

The relationship between instruction and public service for the student should be closely coordinated in an effort to activate student interest and participation in university affairs. For the faculty the outside activities should be limited to those which provide a feedback or use to either the students being taught or the research being done. This includes the faculty's relationship between research and public service. The university will maintain its integrity by developing its capabilities in each of its chosen specialties with regard to the three missions of the university today.

Perkins rejects the student as university manager except in rare cases. The student is at the university only temporarily. "He is at the university to learn, not to manage; to reflect, not to decide; to observe, not to coerce."

The faculty has a very special relationship with the university's management. It is too involved with its own particular problems to have time or interest for all the university's affairs. However, "the faculty must always largely determine the shape and content of educational standards and educational policy."

A special group of people must be involved in the entire university. The administrator as the manager of the university "must be concerned with the institution as a whole, the activities it supports, the public face it presents, and the private concerns with which it is occupied."

The internal coherence of the university depends not only on the balanced approach to its missions but on a balanced approach to the groups of people involved in the university's roles--the students, the faculty, the administrators. "No university can function properly unless it has a balance of these groups who are preoccupied with its health and vitality. No university can develop in sensible ways unless a general consensus has been achieved at the heart of its institutional life among those concerned with its future."

Self-sufficiency being no longer possible, it is necessary for the universities to work closely together. Each university must specialize because it is no longer possible for one university to explore all avenues of knowledge.

'The Academic Revolution'

Must young faculty assert selves?

By DONNA SHALALA
Assistant Professor

The Academic Revolution. Christopher Jencks and David Riesman, Doubleday and Co., Inc. Garden City, New York. 1968

Faculty power is already changing the nature of the university.

The authors of the Academic Revolution conclude that what Chancellor Tolley describes as a growing interest on the part of faculty in administrative power is already in fact the case.

Faculty control over curriculum or their right to choose their own colleagues is rarely challenged.

Faculty, in fact, are also playing a role in choosing administrators. The administrators Jencks and Riesman explain are the enemy. "Academicians, are neither a tolerant nor an easy going species, and their apparently congenital feelings of irritation and frustration require scapegoats." Thus, a role for the administrator.

The reason for the apparent ability of faculty to influence the university is their growing independence. The availability of grants which often pay their salary and are given directly to the individual rather than the university provides the base for this independence.

Protected by their own professional organizations from being ousted, and from the requirements--tenure gained by those organizations for them to many they seem to have the best of both worlds.

Critics of faculty including the authors insist that professors have become less and less preoccupied with educating young people and more and more concerned with educating one another by doing research which advances their discipline.

The critics also insist that little curriculum change will come from faculties.

Few faculty respond with anything but amusement at this description of their alleged power.

Many committed faculty would argue that they are in fact without real power to move universities to respond to their various communities.

What we have yet to see is whether the young faculty without tenure will take whatever risks necessary to change the nature of the university. The young faculty might be a different breed with real committment to building a different world.

Whether they will revive the faculty/student coalition is still an open question.

Jencks and Riesman suggest that the reforms might actually come from "the enemy"--the administrators.

The old quote that university politics is the roughest of all because there is so little at stake has little meaning as the various groups committed to its survival and change move to their battle stations. For those interested in the battle about to commence there is one advantage--it will be within walking distance.

The Experimental College

Education adjusts to societal change

Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn's book, "The Experimental College," is the report of an experiment in higher education by the University of Wisconsin.

The Advisors reached two tentative conclusions. The planning and teaching of educational endeavors should be done by small, independent groups of teachers who would be representatives of different academic fields. Education should be the development of intelligence rather than the development of technical skills or the accumulation of knowledge.

The liberal college was seen on a continuum—from the primary grades to the graduate schools. The work along the scale should be planned as a continuous enterprise. The liberal college had as its aim the development of intelligence, which Dr. Meiklejohn defined:

"Intelligence, it seems, is readiness for any human situation; it is the power, wherever one goes, of being able to see, in any set of circumstances, the best response which a human being can make to those circumstances. And the two constituents of that power would be, first, a sense of human values, and second, a capacity for judging situations as furnishing possibilities for the realizing of those values. It is very near to 'wisdom'."

During the first two years at the liberal college the individual student was assisted in the process of developing intelligence by formal lessons. During the last two years at the liberal college the student assumed responsibility for his further growth in intelligence. The last two years provided an opportunity for the further acquisition of knowledge and the selection of a special interest.

Graduate schools assumed the growth in intelligence had already occurred before admittance. It was only a technical school in which the student was involved in the limited procedures of his special interest. The primary goal of the liberal college was the growth in intelligence. Scholarship was the instrument it used to develop this growth.

With these thoughts as a basis and background, Meiklejohn developed his ideas regarding the experiment that was conducted at the University of Wisconsin. It involved the freshman and sophomore years at the liberal college.

The first year students explored Greek civilization at Athens. A variety of aspects were to be studied—art, recreation, social institutions, intellectual activities. Each area studied was to be understood as a whole and in relation to the larger whole which was the Greek civilization. The Greek civilization was chosen because its literature seemed well adapted to the endeavor.

The sophomore year was involved in the study of American civilization. The problems it was facing were the problems the student would have to resolve soon as a voting citizen. The thinking the student would do in this year would be indicative of the thinking he would be doing shortly when he assumed his intellectual responsibilities.

Dr. Meiklejohn and the Advisors used a variety of techniques in their teaching endeavor. A regional study of an American community was done during the first part of the sophomore year. Examinations were used only as an estimate of a student's achievement. They were not considered grade determiners. Science was part of the curriculum, and although foreign languages were to be part of the curriculum, they had not been included yet.

Each week students submitted a paper in either rough draft or final form. Great books, like the Republic and the Education of Henry Adams, were part of the required work. Independent reading of important books was encouraged. Each student was involved with only one area of study at a time.

Three methods of presenting guidance to the student were used. They were meetings attended by the entire class. The Advisor in charge make comments on and discussed the readings with the students. The students were to organize and interpret the readings for themselves. This was not a lecture.

Students also had individual conferences with an Advisor once a week. The Advisor criticized the student's work. He and the student worked together to develop the student's papers and projects.

The Advisor also met with a small group of students. For the most part, the Advisor decided what the agenda for each meeting would be. Its primary purpose was to create an active social interest in scholarship. Most of the student's time was spent outside of formal classes in an effort to encourage development of the student's freedom of thought.

Dr. Meiklejohn has set down the problems that arose and the suggestions that were made. Cleavages had developed among the students along the following lines: fraternity-nonfraternity; radical-conservative; Jewish-Gentile.

That the experiment should be continued, Dr. Meiklejohn had no doubts. He even commented regarding areas where extensions in the experiment could be made. He felt that four experimental units should be set up to study the problems of the freshmen and sophomores. One unit should be comprised of men living in a dormitory. A second should involve women living in a dormitory. A third and fourth should be men and women without dormitory arrangements. Each unit would have its own Advisors and curriculum. Dr. Meiklejohn felt a corresponding arrangement should be made for juniors and seniors.

This experiment had attempted to maximize the student's development of his intelligence. Intelligence was an important attitude for individuals to achieve. It helped the student attain self-direction in his personal life and to respond to public problems in a way which would further the state's civilization.

If the reader had read only this book and not Dr. Meiklejohn's later book, "An Education Between Two Worlds," he might be disappointed by the lack of philosophical underpinnings in the present book.

Dr. Meiklejohn tells of the close connection between the character of education and the character of society. He does not, however, explain how or why this is so. If the two are so closely connected, why is it that colleges and universities are failing so badly to prepare its youth for participation in society's activities. To blame the failure on the tremendous advances of science and technology is to avoid an elementary fact of social life today and yesterday. Science had made tremendous advances before the twenties and thirties. It will continue to do so. A scheme of education must prepare students for a dynamic world. To plan for a static society is to be in a state of confusion continuously. Dr. Meiklejohn's experimental college seems to prepare the student for a dynamic world.

Dr. Meiklejohn and the Advisors have prepared a very fine report to the University of Wisconsin. The consternation resulting from the early deadline imposed on them is easily understood. They have, for all the unresolved problems, presented a very thorough analysis and account of the experimental liberal education at the lower college level. The book is a diplomatic and resourceful report. It is not, however, a thoroughly developed educational philosophy in itself.

'The Trancendent Aim'

Preserve central values

William P. Tolley, The Transcendent Aim. (Syracuse University: 1968) 163 pages, $5.00.

By ABE WAGNER

The angry student opposition that has grown to become commonplace today has produced what appears to be an equally prolific response from high level educators throughout the nation.

The publication of "The Transcendent Aim," a collection of the selected addresses of Chancellor William P. Tolley avoids this classification as a defensive response to the current 'crisis' in the American university, and evolves as a thoughtful running commentary on the evolution of the multiversity.

Beginning with the crisis of the Second World War, Dr. Tolley has come to recognize, even perhaps before his time, the integral role of the university in society. He envisions the modern university and many of its peripheral functions such as the university press, adult education, research, and the rest that have now become commonplace long before Jacques Barzun of Columbia was to call them "residual functions."

Most important to the "Transcendent Aim" is the philosophy of education which runs through the speeches, summarized by Dr. Tolley as "education for our common life." Here the Chancellor finds the liberal arts college often "guilty treating our young people as if they were preparing for a few select professions. All...do not need to become doctors or lawyers or research specialists. They do need to learn how to become healthy individuals, successful breadwinners, parents and citizens."

In this particular address, Dr. Tolley calls for general education responsive to the needs in a changing society. In reflecting on the nature of this changing society, as he sees it, Dr. Tolley finds that "we live between ages...we do not know whether western culture is moving toward disintegration and collapse...or if we live in a period like that when civilization was moving from the Hellenistic world of city-states to the Imperium Romanum."

"Temporarily the supremacy of Christian culture has been challenged and the outcome is still in doubt. Nineteenth century liberal democracy has been liquidated and we shall never see it again. The old order is dead and the shape of the new order is not yet clear." Writing these particular words in 1943, Dr. Tolley anticipates the emergence of the new left, which he currently takes to task, by some two decades. It would seem almost a crime that a collection of Chancellor Tolley's writings published so recently is unable to include his most recent personal reflections on the new order of today.

Clearly, Dr. Tolley defines his own position, calling for a "clear purpose" and a "high ideal" in a time when eduation is adrift in a reality that doubts and mistrusts all values." Tolley would argue with contemporary critics, holding that "certain values — timeless and unchanging — must be kept central and inviolate."

Those of opposing belief who find themselves personally at odds with the Chancellor might do well to at least glance at this picture Dr. Tolley himself has painted during his tenure.

Viewing this picture as portrayed in the "Transcendent Aim" one must at least acknowledge his forsight and vision; if not his purpose and method, and conclude that possibly today's so-called "liberals" do not after all maintain a sole monopoly on the truth.

The biggest error in the "Transcendent Aim" seems to be one of omission, rather than of commission, where editor Frank P. Piskor has left out Dr. Tolley's address "The Promethian Faith," often regarded as one of Chancellor Tolley's best.

In the final analysis, Dr. Tolley appears as I believe he would like to be remembered; a true student of St. Augustine, who learned from Plato that "The wise man lives after the manner of that city and no other, and in looking upon that city sets his own house in order."

The uses of the University

Universities must lean on society

Clark Kerr's "The Uses of the University" is an amazingly exciting and interesting book to read. Every entering freshman should read this book before arriving in the fall. Perhaps then he would be more aware of his real position as an undergraduate at a large private university.

The first chapter is "the idea of a multiversity." Kerr defines a multiversity as "a whole series of communities and activities held together by a common name, a common governing board, and related purposes."

He contrasts this modern notion of a university with earlier notions. Newman's university sponsored liberal education and considered useful knowledge worthless. It prepared individuals "to fit any post with credit, and to master any subject with facility." The German university is the other notion of a university considered by Kerr. This university disclaimed the master of any subject approach of Newman's . Specialization and an emphasis on social rather than individual needs became the dominant motifs of higher education.

Kerr feels that the competition between the three "competing visions of true purpose, each relating to a different layer of history, a different web of forces, causes much of the malaise in the university communities of today."

Kerr traces the development of the multiversity from Plato with his truth for truth's sake and for philosopher-kings to the Sophists and Pythagoreans. He agrees the university is decidedly a Middle Ages institution. It derives many of its prominant features — masters, students, lectures, exams, degree procedures, faculties — from this period.

After a period of regidity and stagnation, the German notion of a university revitalized the early university. Americans had already built universities and colleges on the British-Newman model by the time of the German university. Nearly seventy years after the university at Berlin was established, Johns Hopkins became the first American university based on the German methods. Others soon adopted its procedures — graduate school, electives, importance of departments, creation of research centers.

At about this same time the land grant movement began. This added interests of more proletarian nature, opened higher education's doors to lower classes. Other changes followed. More community contacts were established; a greater emphasis on student life existed. Service activities developed.

Kerr in a discussion of the administration of a university calls the multiversity an inconsistent institution, several communities, a name, a mechanism held together by rules and powerd by money. He also likens it to a city, or a city state. The city state, despite its fractionalization, must be governed. Students have power in American universities when they use their electives. Their choices of courses and professors determines where the university will grow.

Kerr notes that little discussion of general educational policy has been done by American faculties lately. The faculty's power is substantial, however, in the area of research grants and institutes. In American public authority has rested in a lay board, and in some cases a state board has existed.

Kerr also considers some external and semi-external influences — alumni, donors, foundation, federal agencies, professional and commercial groups, trade unions, public school communities. The growth of the administration in the multiversity has been forced by circumstances of growth and increasing complexity.

He considers Robert Maynard Hutchins, former chancellor of the University of Chicago, to be the last of the giants — the last of the breed of presidents who really treid to change his institution in any fundamental way. The president can no longer be a dominating leader.

The new role is that of mediator. His primary purposes are to keep the peace among the various power groups and to make progress by reconciling the past with the present and future. Progress is the more important purpose. The president in this role makes few friends and wins few victories. He strives to accomplish what is least distasteful to all concerned.

The multiversity has its frustrations but on the whole Kerr weems to be impressed with the latest development in higher education.

"It has few peers in the preservation and dissemination and examination of the eternal truths; no living peers in the search for new knowledge; and no peers in all history among institutions of higher learning in serving so many of the segments of an advancing civilization. Inconsistent internally as an institution, it is consistently productive. Torn by change, it has the stability of freedom. Though it has not a single soul to call its own, its members pay their devotion to truth."

Kerr begins a discussion of "the realities of the federal grant university" by considering federal support of scientific research to be one of the two great impacts on American universities; the other was the land grant movement.

This federal support has arisen from public needs and has provided a stimulus to haphazard university development. The better universities have been favored by this aid. Only a small percentage of the universities receive most of the grants.

Kerr sees two phases to the federal grant development. The first was the phase of "intuitive imbalance." In this phase the universities developed haphazardly - Whereever funds were available. The second phase is that of "bureaucratic balance." Now that the problems of the university have been studied and identified, it is time for planning.

The first phase was created by a Congress that was quite willing to subsidize research in defense, scientific and technological progress and health without considereing thoroughly what the national priorities were. This state of affairs resulted in an alteration of the previous "balance" in a variety of ways.

Federal influence became a factor in university priorities. The university also lost some of its own decision-making power. Individual faculty members rather than presidents or departments were bringing in funds, loyalities were shifting to Washington. It has also increased the conflict between the scientists and the humanists. The concentration of funds in a few universities has widened the gap between the first and second-rate schools. Graduate level education has benefited tremendously at the expense of under-graduate instruction.

The university is seen to be basically a conservative institution which must adapt to a dynamic environment. The university cannot be a law unto itself for it has been governed by history. Within the university the faculty has been remarkably rigid regarding changes. Changes and innovations have been forced on faculties by outside pressures and changes. Alumni are past- oriented and conservatice also. Students are restive and are seen to be at the throes of a possible revolt because of the lack of changes that have occurred in their instruction.

The three greatest areas of adjustment for the university are growth, shifting academic emphases and involvement

Kerr's book has covered a great many of the university's present problems. His introduction of the multiversity is an appropriate description of the university's present state. He seems to have grasped the problems of the students, the faculty, the administrators. He rejects any attempts to consider the university as independent of society. The imbalanced university has managed to maintain its diversity and its creativity in dealing with a dynamic world.

"The university started as a single community--a community of masters and students. It may even be said to have had a soul in the sense of a central animating principle. Today the large American university is, rather, a whole series o communities and activities held together by a common name, a common governing board, and related purposes. This great transformation is regretted by some, accepted by many, gloried in, as yet, by few. But it should be understood by all."

'University of Utopia'

Hutchins illustrates our potential

The University of Utopia. Robert Maynard Hutchins. University of Chicago Press, Chicago and London. 1953 103 p. $1.50

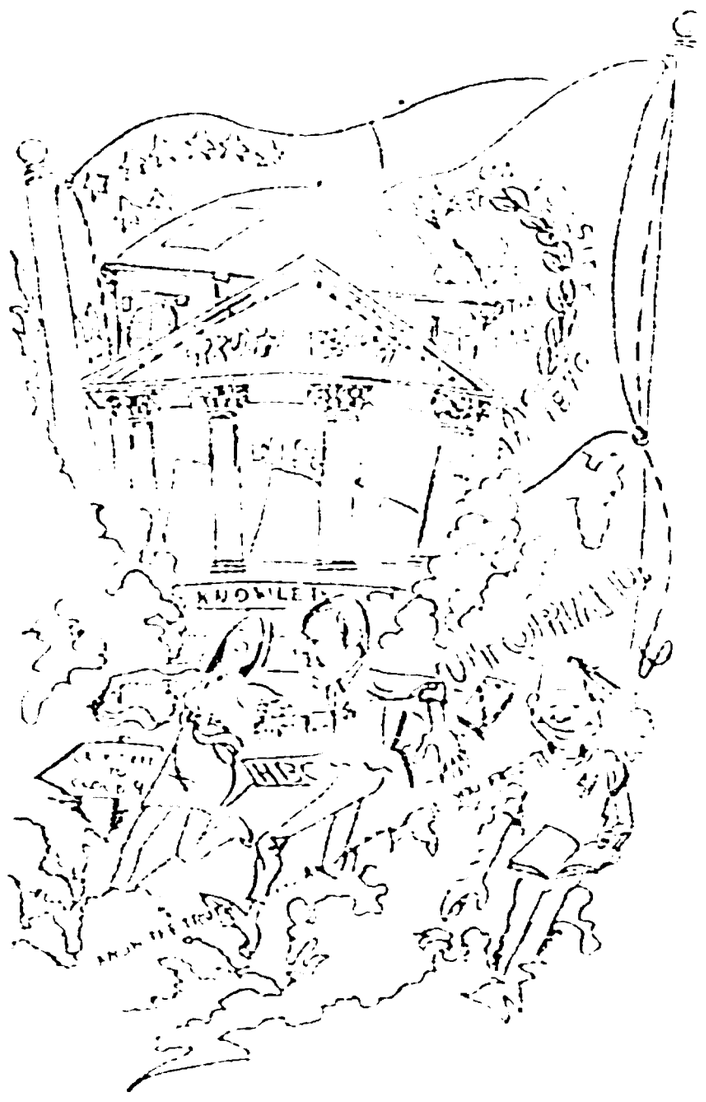
The former chancellor of the University of Chicago has written an excellent little book on the aims of education in the university of Utopia--which could be, but isn't in the United States.

In it he discussed 15 years ago the same basic theme in regard to education that Eric Fromm discusses in regard to psychology and Herbert Marcuse discusses in regard to capitalistic society. But unlike Marcuse and like Fromm, Hutchins evinces great hope. The United States, he thinks, is capable of hosting the university of Utopia.

Utopia to Hutchins is not heaven but a country like our own, inhabited by human beings. It is a scientific, industrial democracy, rich and powerful, whose goal is to educate its people to use its power and industry wisely.

"Industrialization seems to charm people into thinking that the prime aim of life and hence of education is the development of industrial power."

This of course is going astray since we are advanced industrially. "When industrialization and mechanization have reached a high point, they minimize the necessity for such training."



Yet our educational system continues to prepare students for success--the pursuit of money, power, and publicity. This is coupled with a decrease in the amount and significance of work in our lives and no increase in the meaningful use of free time.

What does this presage for democratic society whose educational system molds its future citizens? "The wisdom that a democratic community needs is the wisdom of the entire population."

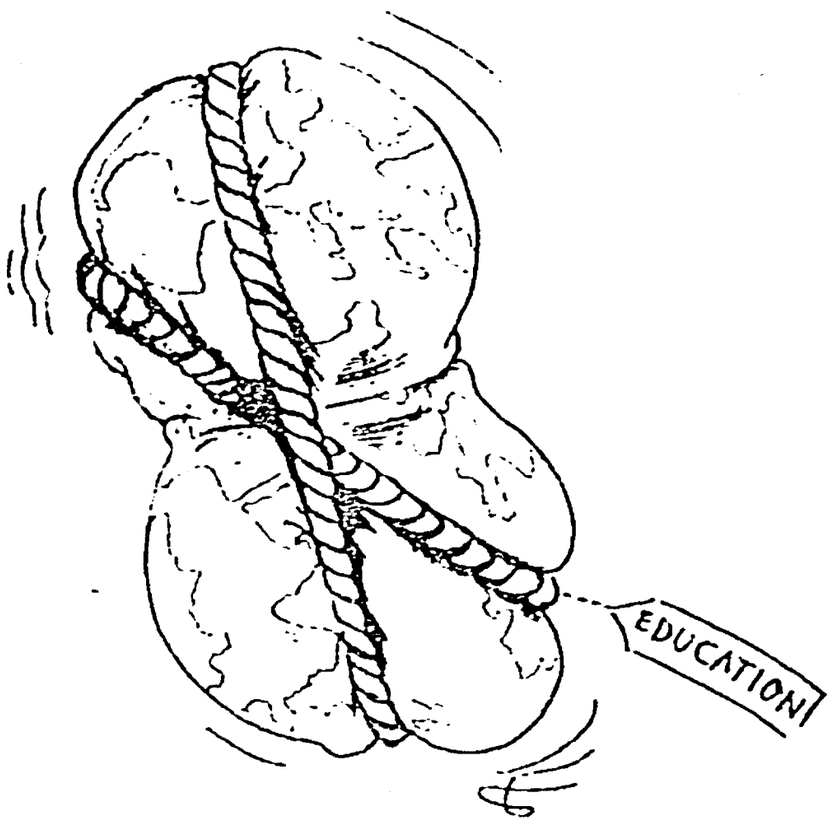
One mark of an educational system that serves industrial society through vocational training is specialization. Knowledge is divided and subdivided into tight little compartments so that each person may have detailed knowledge of a small portion of the total. ". . .at some point we have to put it together again in order to understand it."

Given specialization the result at a university is the antithesis of a community of scholars. Professors do not learn from each other unless they happen to dwell in the same department, and then only about their own narrow field. In order to learn from a fellow professor from a distant department, one must be able to communicate with him--which presumes familarity with many basic concepts and a broad enough background in each to discover common ground.

One might think a lesser virtue of specialization would be diversity. How could anyone get three professors together on the same thing? Hutchins thinks, however, that specialization, rather than leading to philosophical diversity, ends up in political and social conformity.

The University of Utopia, as opposed to the American universities, "is one in which the most lively controversy was continuously underway. The award for the Most Controversial Person, which is bestowed with great ceremony on the anniversary of the day on which the Utopians declared their independence of the Philistines, is usually won by a professor of the University of Utopia."

Also, the Utopians "could not imagine themselves being afraid of ideas, or of talk, or of discussion. They therefore decided that any Utopian could say anything he liked on any subject at any time."



And later, "the real academic crime is indoctrination, which is only slightly worse in Utopia than the crime of refusing to discuss. . . For these crimes a Utopian professor can be removed after a hearing by the academic body."

"The Utopian professor is supposed to have convictions, the deeper the better. He is not supposed to pump and pound them into his students."

Hutchins throughout his book is too hard on the American university. Specialization and conformity are evident but there are too many exceptions and eccentrics around to take his criticisms at face value. Perhaps, though, he would say the eccentrics and exceptions are those who have managed to escape the confines of the institution to create their own subterranean community of scholars.

Education Between Tw

Education seen as society's binder

By CAROL KEPPLER

Dr. Alexander Meiklejohn's first two worlds in "Education between Two Worlds" are religious and secular in nature. The emphasis has shifted from Protestantism to capitalism in a revolutionary movement which has taken three hundred years to accomplish.

The state, as an official representative of secularism, has replaced the church as the dominant motif of the times. Today, in America, it is responsible in almost all cases for the education of the future generations. Once, the church had this responsibility. It alone of all other institutions had the values and direction necessary to sponsor a system of education. The state is the only institution in a similar position today. The church has relinquished its educational domination except in the field of religious training. Dr. Meiklejohn sees a definite difference in the church's method and that of the state.

Today, in America, society--the state--does not know what it would have taught in its public schools and colleges. It is unaware of its groups' common goals. It has not yet reasoned logically to achieve a definite direction and set of standards for its educational system to teach.

This is the dilemma in today's schools. The state is confused. It is torn between two contradictory movements and philosophies--both of which it claims as its own. Americans claim descent from both Locke and Rousseau. These philosophers are not espousing the same creeds. The confusion in American education can be resolved in part by careful separation of the philosophies of Locke and Rousseau.

Before Meiklejohn begins a discussion of Locke and Rousseau, he comments briefly on the negative and positive conceptualization of the function of a state. He typifies a negative interpretation of the state as an Anglo-Saxon attitude.

This negative interpretation must be discouraged and eliminated from realistic thinking. The state is not a brute without vision, arts, morality, or freedom. It is more than an agency of regulation and limitation. The state is positive in its functions, if its functions are properly defined. The proper functions of a state are the advancing of learning and the making of civilization.

The proper outlook on the state and on education can be seen from a study of Rousseau's "Emile" and "The Social Contract," both of which Meiklejohn examines. Rousseau is seen with respect to the philosophies of John Locke, a man whom Meiklejohn bitterly criticizes.

The acceptance of Locke's philosophy has caused much of what Meiklejohn sees as wrong with American education--individualism, laissez-faire, specialized learning. Locke sees men as created by God with certain rights. The state is a man-made institution. It protects man from his fellow man. The individual is superior to the state. Men alone are divinely created. The philosophy of the state becomes that of laissez-faire. It allows the collection of men to follow their own paths. The power of the church is weakened by a private appeal to God. Each man faces his creator alone rather than with the help of the church. The

'The Urban University'

Education for life in the city?

The Urban University: And the Future of our Cities. J. Martin Klotsche. Harper and Row. New York. 1966 149p.

By CHARLES WALTER

The Chancellor of the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee views a university in an urban center as a select institution with a mission.

He is impressed by the newness of urban universities. His own, the second major campus of the University of Wisconsin, was opened in Milwaukee in 1956. Most early American colleges and universities followed the British pattern of Cambridge and Oxford by settling in a rural setting or small town rather than a city.

This was especially true of our private denomination colleges. ". . . an urban location was contrary to the spirit and intent of their founders. To them, a secluded hamlet or the prairie was more likely to safeguard the morals of the young than the city with its distractions and corruptions."

Klotsche notes that the pattern of founding colleges changed with the distribution of the population. Now with megalopolis the leading universities are found in urban centers. This he considers a valuable development.

"Bringing university education to people where they live will provide for many a chance to become educated with a minimum of financial sacrifice. Thus the urban university can become the capstone of American higher education bringing reality to the ideal that all should be educated. . ."

This is still true, of course, but the challenge of the present is greater. "All urban universities, public or private, large or small, single or multi-purpose, in blighted areas or in attractive residential sections, are struggling with their environment." Chancellor Klotsche then describes the mission of the urgan university.

Klotsche has an accurate picture of the plight of our cities and their many problems. In chapter three, "Urban Needs and University Resources," he outlines four basic functions for the urban university to fulfill: 1) train technicians and leadership personnel for the cities, 2) research the problems and environment of the city to increase knowledge about them, 3) interpret the "process of urbanization" to metropolitan leadership, and 4) help the public understand the city and its problems.

In addition Klotsche has an accurate sense of the physical relation between the university and the city. He seems to comprehend better than did the administration of Columbia that for a university to expand it must establish genuine lines of communication with the surrounding neighborhood and make careful advance plans. And he assumes the university has a responsibility to the neighborhood around it as well as a concern for its own safety and interests.

In chapter six, "The Urban University and the Arts," Klotsche touches upon a theme he might have paid more attention to. He acknowledges the contribution most urban universities make to the cultural life of their host city.

His final chapter consists of 22 specific challenges faced by the typical city and the proper response by the university. For example, cities need trained man-power. "Universities have traditionally trained personnel to meet the needs of society. Urban universities should now extend this tradition to the field of urban affairs." And later, "it is in the areas of investigation and fact finding, and of applying the knowledge of the scholar to the practical problems of city life, that urban universities can make their most distinctive contribution."

It is this devotion to solving the practical problems of the city that limits the book. He is right that the American college has traditionally trained personnel to meet the needs of society, but is this vocational training all that society needs or the best that it can hope for?

Henry Steele Commager wrote: ". . . the first responsibility of the university is not to serve its immediate community but to serve the much larger community of learning of which it is a part. . . those urban universities that resolutely act on this principle are also those that command the most ardent support from their communities. . . The first purpose of the University is not to serve the practical and vocational needs of the local community but to serve the needs of the society at large. . ."

It is not so far-fetched to argue that if the inhabitants of cities had received a general rather than vocational, a moral, intellectual, aesthetic rather than economic-interest education in the first place then our cities might not be the plight they are in today.

Education unites two worlds . . .

church can no longer help a man.

Education becomes a question of occupational usefulness. The aristocracy, who have one set of occupations, are taught values which will help them most. Friendship, reputation, good fellowship and breeding take precedence over learning in the development of the human individual. For the working class, the manual, technical wisdom that will be useful in the factory and on the farm is to be taught. There is no common learning for the two classes.

Rousseau sees both the state and the individual as creations of man. The individual has only those rights which the state is willing to accord to him. The state is superior in power to the individual. The freedom, equality, and justice which Locke saw coming from God to the individual is for Rousseau available only from the state. Since the state is the maker of justice, equality and freedom, it can teach these qualities to its members.

The state has a positive function to perform. It creates civilization. All men are taught how to cooperate in the continuous creation of this civilization. Each has his proper role to play in this venture. The cooperativeness of Rousseau's conception of the state is amenable to Meiklejohn's ideas of the world's needs. By emphasizing commonalities between social groups Meiklejohn would have a world-state evolve.

Having discussed the confusion arising from the adherence to two different philosophers, Meiklejohn discusses reasonableness and unreasonableness. For him reasonableness seems to be human brotherhood, kindness, riendship. Reasonableness is hinking together on common problems in an effort to effect common solutions. Unreasonableness is violence. It is war, slavery. It is self-preservation. It is individualism. The function of the state is "to organize, to harmonize, to make reasonable all the activities of its constituent groups and its individual members." By cooperation of its members the state seeks to promote the general welfare. The human race is potentially one state.

A single, world-state is the triumph of collectivism over individualism, as a philosophy. The state is not hostile to the individual. The individual is both governor and governed. As the governor, as the public interest, he has certain rights. As the governed, the private interest, he has certain duties.

Meiklejohn sees the state as the creator of civilization. Civilization should not be considered as a burden but rather as an opportunity for advancing the common good. A free society needs the participation of all its members according to their individual capacities. He feels we must become citizens of the world because the world is the ultimate, the broadest, level of reasonableness. The state is equipped to teach for the state is the best of us. The state is "ourselves seeking to be reasonable, to live in justice and freedom with one another."

The state must be strong in order to maintain the freedom and equality of all its citizens. Laissez-faire government has not provided peace and tranquility.

Meiklejohn's elegant and poignant style leaves little to be desired stylistically. It asks the right questions. Should the state teach? What should it teach? What is intelligence? What is reasonableness? Meiklejohn spends a great deal of time discussing theories of state. It is understandable that he should since he feels teaching is the expression of the cultural authority of the group which is sponsoring the teaching endeavor.

The sponsoring group is the state. The teacher is commissioned to provide good students--student who will fit into society and serve its common cause, which for America is freedom. The teacher is an active advocate of a particular social group. He imparts intelligence to his students which is both knowledge of facts and principles of judgement. Both the teaching and the scholarship can be assessed by the state in terms of their contribution to the wider purposes of the state. Academic freedom for teachers and the students exists only because the democratic society in which we live wants people to be free.

It is difficult to reconcile the illusory conflict between individual and state. Laissez-faire government has long been considered the only valid form of government. Emphasis in education has not been on the common features but rather on individual distinctions and approaches. Government actions have been condemned as infringements on individual prerogatives and rights.

In America today people have vocally rejected the imposition of federal control on local issues. Dr. Meiklejohn would respond to his popular clamor not with less federal intervention but with more. This is a very difficult idea to agree with. Regardless of how difficult it may be to accept, Dr. Meiklejohn has presented an overwhelmingly cogent and logical argument for increased emphasis on the rights of the public will.

For the die-hard individualist, the immediate reaction is to reject the ideas presented as impossible to achieve and difficult to personally accept. A glimpse, however, should convince many that today's world is rapidly shrinking, and that if men are to survive the horrible instrument of destruction that has been created by men to use against men, then laissez-faire government must die. Men are being forced to accept what they thought unreasonable and unpleasant by the sheer physical closeness and presence of billions of human beings on a small sphere.

The message Dr. Meiklejohn presented twenty years ago is still true today. Perhaps it is more real now than it was then.

Men could maim and destroy then; they can obliterate now. Physically and logically the argument is viable. Dr. Meiklejohn has left very little unsaid in presenting his case for the state's competence to teach. If all men cooperate in achieving a common culture, then the ideas presented should work successfully.

Tolley: mass media does 'grave disservice'

I shall speak to each of them but just let me state them in summary form. First, the mass media continue to do the educational institutions of America a grave disservice. Second, parents have a deeper influence on their children than is generally believed, even by them. Third, most college youngsters are wonderful. I have devoted my life to them and it has been a great privilege and a joy. Fourth, youth rebellions are world-wide. They preceded those in the United States. There are both communist and non-communist student movements but the patterns are the same. Five, college faculties did not create the youth rebellions but here in the United States they have greatly aided and abetted them. In general faculties are more sympathetic to campus discord than are the rank and file of students. Without faculty support the student troublemakers wouldn't get very far. Six, the latest development is unrest among the black students. It couldn't have come at a worse time. It comes, however, because there is progress, not because the doors are still closed. The blacks have a new sense of dignity and pride, a new self-consciousness. For the first time there is opportunity and hope for them. They may be pushing too hard but they need a lot of sympathy, understanding, help, and T.L.C., (tender loving care). They too, however, must learn the limits beyond which they cannot go. Seven, there are several threats to the future of our universities. There is the threat from without--the danger of overreaction from a public fed up by the worship of youth and angered by the misuse of educational opportunity. There is the threat from within-from faculties who should know better and particularly from the new left. Power without responsibility is the new name of the game. The students want it. The faculty wants it. The labor unions want it. The legislature wants it. In this struggle for power the quality and the freedom of the university may be destroyed.

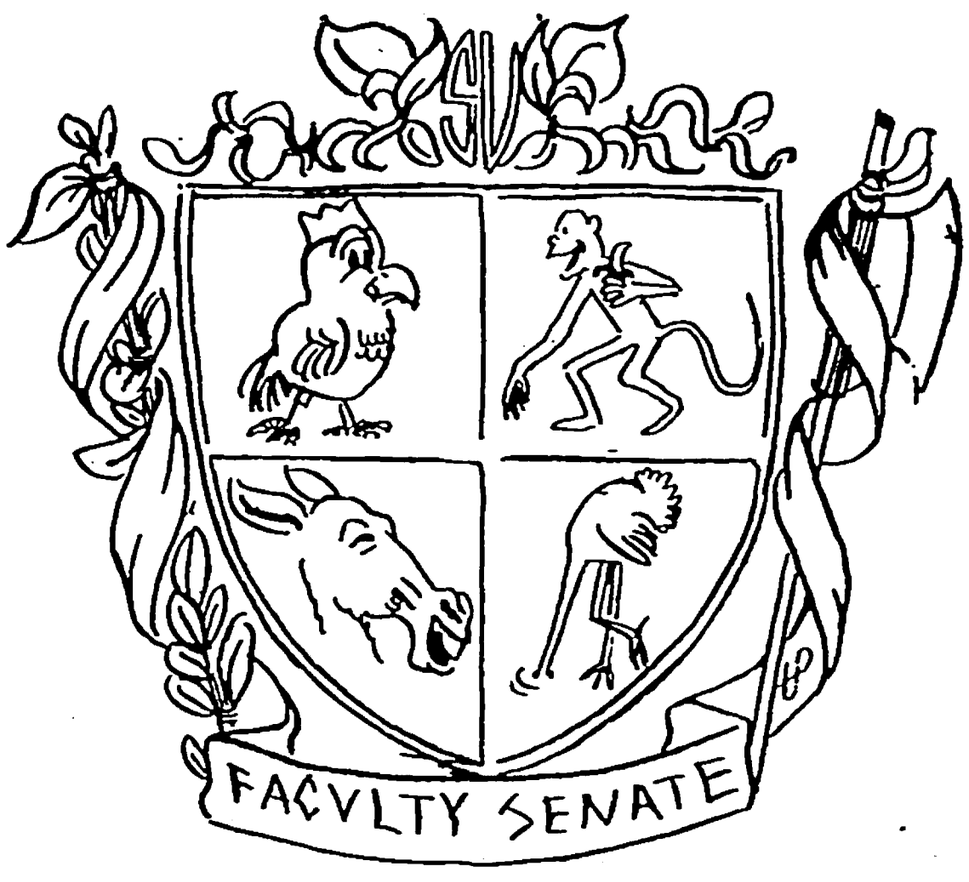
It sounds a bit grim, doesn't it? Perhaps it is a good thing the program committee plans to have my speech followed by some light-hearted skits. But first let me state my opinions in more detail.

I said the mass media do education a grave disservice. They focus their attention on two minor aspects of the educational scene, athletics and the public tantrums of undisciplined brats. Education they do not understand, and they leave it unreported. The day by day advances in scientific knowledge are largely ignored. When they are reported they are jazzed up and sensationalized. Significant developments in the social sciences and the humanities--developments that may contribute far more to the solution of our urban ills than the billions poured into jerry-built congressional programs--these take place completely unobserved. The hundreds of meaningful programs of service to the disadvantaged launched and paid for by the private universities without state or federal help, and maintained because of deep concern and commitment--are seldom adequately reported in the press. One would think we have been sitting on our hands, doing nothing.

As a consequence the universities are perhaps the institutions least well understood by the general public. They are the institutions that perhaps no one knows fully, and when I say no one, I include faculty and students.

When you analyze what you read in print and what you see on the television screen, it is no wonder the public is outraged. When sixty reporters and thirty television cameras appear in response to a mimeographed handout from the Students for a Democratic Society and report in detail the antics of a handful of students and non-students launching a campus demonstration, something is wrong with our mass media. And unhappily, after endless TV exposure of dissent and rebellion, faculty and students accept the distortion as true and they begin to clamor for a piece of the action. They begin to think "If this is in style, why aren't we doing it?" Is it unfair to suggest that the mass media have encouraged the contagion of student and faculty discord? From my experience the evidence is overwhelming. Nor am I alone in feeling that the mass media no longer limit their role to reporting the news. They create it.

Even in reporting the news exaggeration is the rule, not the exception. This is true whether the topic is the use of drugs, the so-called new morality, the much abused "in loco parentis," or the pressure from small groups for change in parietal rules in dormitories, or for permission for booze and broads in fraternities.



Even the generation gap--as old as the first family--is treated as if it were the most recent of discoveries. Did you not experience the generation gap when you asked if you could stay out a little later and your parents said no? Did you test your teachers and parents to see what you could get away with? Did you think the older generation had a lot of wrong answers and that you, of course, had the right ones?

To be sure, in a time of very rapid change the generation gap is wider than ever. But human nature doesn't change. The basic problems between parents and their children are what they have always been. Don't let the press or some college professor convince you that this is a brand new phenomenon or that cocky and ill-mannered children need even more permissiveness because they are trying to tell us something.

A second conclusion I have reached is that the influence of parents is far greater than they or the general public have been led to believe. The children of politically conservative parents are themselves politically conservative. The children of outspoken liberals are outspoken liberals. In at least 80% of the cases the religious, social and economic views of students reflect the views and the experience of their parents. In many cases the young people will not admit this even to themselves. Again they respond to peer pressure to experiment with vices they know are wrong. But I continue to be astonished by the strength of parental influence. We put a stamp upon our children that is a lasting one.

Even in apparent exceptions the views of the children frequently turn out to be very close to those of someone in the family. A recent study indicates that the maternal influence on the present group of campus revolutionaries is in most cases very strong indeed. They learned the art of protest at their mother's knee. It did not begin when they went away to college.

much maligned. Taken as a group they have been seriously libeled. No one talks about the majority of students. Their behavior is unreported. Yet they can be described only in superlatives. They are the best equipped in science and mathematics, the most widely travelled, the most art conscious, the most literate, the best prepared students we have ever had. They are taller, heavier, stronger, and better looking.

They can run faster and jump higher and break all kinds of athletic and endurance records which not too long ago were cause for world-wide wonder. This remember is the description of the great majority of college students. They are the most wonderful youngsters I have ever known.

The percentage of young people who warrant no such accolades varies from region to region, from town to town, and from college to college. There are permissive institutions where the kindest thing you can say of faculties and students is that they deserve each other. These are colleges where a goodly share of students can be described as abrasive, arrogant, rude, and in the words of George F. Kennan, "floundering around in drugs, pornography, and political hysteria." They are unwashed, they are a sight toto behold, and they are enamoured of themselves. They have been told that they are wonderfully gifted and they believe it. The number is larger than it should be and it is a group to be reckoned with. Most of them however, will turn out very well. The problem is how to endure them until they grow up.

This, however, we can do. What poses a different problem is the handful of true nihilists, the campus revolutionaries. This is a miniscule group but it appears to speak for all students and increasingly for the many of the faculty as well. Small as it is, its ranks include high school and college drop outs. No matter how liberal the campus may be the number of real revolutionaries is seldom as many as thirty. The number at Syracuse may be closer to half a dozen. This is the group whose mission is to destroy. The objective is anarchy. These were the leaders at Berkeley and then Columbia, and now at San Francisco State.

In the case of both the revolutionaries and the activists hatred of America is so deep and bitter as to be almost pathological. You will hear no word of criticism of China or North Vietnam, no syllable of protest against the seizure of Czechoslovakia by the Soviet Union. At a recent meeting at Princeton sponsored by the International Association for Cultural Freedom the point was made by some of the guest speakers from abroad that they found less conformity and more dissent among young people here than in their own lands. Eugene Loebl, who fled from Czechoslovakia during the last summer's Soviet occupation but who is still a Communist, made this comment after listening to the criticism of America by radical American youth. "If we didn't know the rest of the world," he said, "we might conclude that this is the worst country in the world."

Seymour Martin Lipset reports that, "Although the events which precipitated student activism vary from country to country, and the targets of student attack differ, there are more common themes than differences in the tactics and ideologies of the movements. Unlike the youth and student movements of the 1930's which were linked to adult political parties, the dominant ones of the present constitute a genuine youth rebellion, one which is almost as much levied against the major parties of the left...as it is against the moderates and conservatives. The lack of involvement in adult politics has given free rein to the propensity of youth to adhere to absolute principles, to engage in expressive rather than instrumental politics. Little concerned with the immediate consequences of their actions, the new left student movements appear ready to destroy all existing structures, including the university, and to use tactics which alienate the great majority, in order to make manifest their contempt, their total rejection of the intolerable world created by their elders. This rejection of responsibility characterizes student groups in Japan, France, Germany, the United States, and many other countries."

Youth rebellions are not new, and particularly not new on college campuses. On this point the medieval universities afford some bloody and memorable examples. In more modern times the lawless behavior of students in Latin American Universities has reduced the value of their diplomas and made their institutions the laughing stock of the educational world. The loss of control by the civil authorities in Tokyo, Rome, and Paris has seriously impaired the academic reputation of what until very recently were great universities.

Student unrest was a phenomenon abroad long before it was imported here. Authorities are divided as to whether it is communist controlled. The truth probably is that there are both communist inspired and non-communist inspired student rebellions. But they always tend to merge. One sees the same names, the same faces in a score of countries. The patterns are the same, whether or not there is a central apparatus.

The faculty did not create the world wide movement of student disorder. They did not create the confrontations and demonstrations that began with Berkeley in the United States. Here student rebellion grew out of the civil rights movement. The recent large scale disorders, however, have been encouraged by members of the college faculties. They could have been easily controlled but for the faculty.

The Vice President and Provost of Columbia, Dr. David Truman, told the truth about events at Columbia when he said that members of the Columbia faculty "substantially and decisively contributed to the catastrophe" that struck that campus in April of last year. The story is the same wherever there has been prolonged or repeated campus disorder.

It was de Tocqueville who remarked that tensions tend to increase when times begin to improve. The unrest of black students is not unrelated to the fact that their numbers have vastly increased and their social position on college campuses has been greatly improved. Institutions that have done the most in too short a time may expect the most trouble. Disorders are most likely in institutions where there has been an explosive change in the ratio of blacks to whites. The timing of the unrest is most unfortunate. When the boat is already rocking we don't need more people to shake it.

The black students are being given bad advice, but we must remember that many of their grievances are real. This is a new day for them. They are no longer resigned to things that connot be changed. They know that things can and will be changed. What they are trying to do is to stop the stalling and overcome the inertia. They are giving rapid change an extra push. We will have to say no when their demands are unreasonable, but we should act quickly on some of their requests.

And now I approach my final point. We have the greatest universities in the world. In terms of quality there is nothing in Europe to compare with them. But they are in danger. The danger is both from without and from within. The first threat from without is from the general public. The public has reached the limit of its patience. The public desires an end to violence, and particularly an end to violence by students and faculties it supports through public taxation. The public will get what it wants--but it may also get far more. The danger is an overreaction that may destroy both the freedom and the autonomy of the university, and with this, the high quality of the education offered.

A second outside threat is by the labor unions. A year ago the New York State Legislature took away the exemption of colleges from the requirement of collective bargaining. We will begin to pay the price of this in the spring of this year. The prediction is that all the units of the State University will be unionized--including the faculty--within the next five years. Can you see the feather bedding of the future? Can you avoid the retention of the most unfit teachers on their automatic promotion to the highest ranks? The faculty unionization of the units of the State University can spell nothing but disaster to the dreams of Chancellor Gould for a State University of the highest quality. And the private colleges face the same deadly threat.

But the threats from the public, the legislature, the congress and the unions are no more serious than the danger from within. And this danger is not so much from the students as from the faculty. The student rebellion has about run its course. It is the faculty rebellion that is still strong. If universities are destroyed it will be by the collective stupidity of the members of the faculty.

The interest of the faculty in administrative power is much greater than the interest shown by members of the student body. Like the interest of the unions it is a search for power without responsibility. Someone else will have to provide the money--they simply want the pleasure of spending it. They think they should run the university. They want power without limit.

Some of them also appear to want to change the nature and purpose of the university. The members of the new left would make the university a propaganda agency committed to partisan political ends. If they had their way it would no longer be an institution in search of the truth. It would announce what the truth is, and deny dissent to anyone who disagrees. It would have the answer to every question of public policy, although here they would have to wait until they are informed of the party line.

The favorite game of the faculty leftists is follow the leader. Any public pronouncement from a handful of radicals has a domino effect. An activist committee from Yale, Harvard or Stanford has only to stumble in the dark and all the new left will genuflect. Their behavior is predictable. The knee jerks are automatic.

In a very few minutes we shall be listening to skits prepared by members of the bar. If I were writing a skit for a faculty show, I would have an artist appear and paint a coat of arms for certain faculty groups. In the upper left hand corner I would have him paint a pompous parrot, in the upper right hand corner a group of chattering monkeys (monkey see, monkey do), in the lower left a braying ass, and in the lower right an ostrich standing with great dignity with his head in the sand.

But I should say this with a smile and I must correct myself. I should like to make it clear that I am speaking of a minority of the faculty--not of the faculty as a whole. It is the same minority that gives such strong support to student activists and revolutionaries. It is the same minority that presses for unlimited faculty power. It is the same minority that would change the nature and the purpose of the university. Numerically it is not large but its strength is increasing. We should not underestimate the threat from this group to the search for truth and freedom.

Let me repeat what I said at the outset. Power without responsibility is the new name of the game. The students want it. The faculty wants it. The labor unions want it. The legislature wants it. There is even evidence that the courts want it. In this struggle for power, the autonomy and, with it, the auality and the freedom of the university could be destroyed.

are your contact lenses more work than they're worth?

If you're tired of using two or more separate solutions to take care of your contact lenses, we have the solution. It's Lensine the all-purpose lens solution for complete contact lens care—preparing, cleaning, and soaking. ■ Just a drop or two of Lensine before you insert your contacts coats and lubricates the lens surface making it smoother and non-irritating. Cleaning your contacts with Lensine retards the buildup of foreign deposits on the lenses. ■ Lensine is sterile, self-sanitizing, and antiseptic making it ideal for storage of your lenses between wearing periods. And you get a removable storage case on the bottom of every bottle, a Lensine exclusive for proper lens hygiene. ■ It has been demonstrated that improper storage between wearings may result in the growth of bacteria on the lenses. This is a sure cause of eye irritation and could seriously endanger vision. Bacteria cannot grow in Lensine. ■ Caring for contact lenses can be as convenient as wearing them with Lensine, from the Murine Company, Inc.

Professionalism at Grumman
...is personal development programs

As a graduating engineer, how can you position yourself so that your career chances are constantly optimized? Answer–get with an aerospace company where the optimum conditions are . . . Grumman. Here we take a keen interest in seeing that our engineers and scientists develop personally. We are sincerely interested in their personal progress within the company . . . that they keep abreast of the sweeping advances in technology, not because they can contribute more (although this is true), but more because it makes for greater individual progress and well-being. Job satisfaction, if you will. Let's look at these personal development programs.

Tuition Reimbursement Program
Directly applicable to their work, these programs offer engineers and scientists financial assistance for graduate studies at the many institutions in the Long Island-New York area.

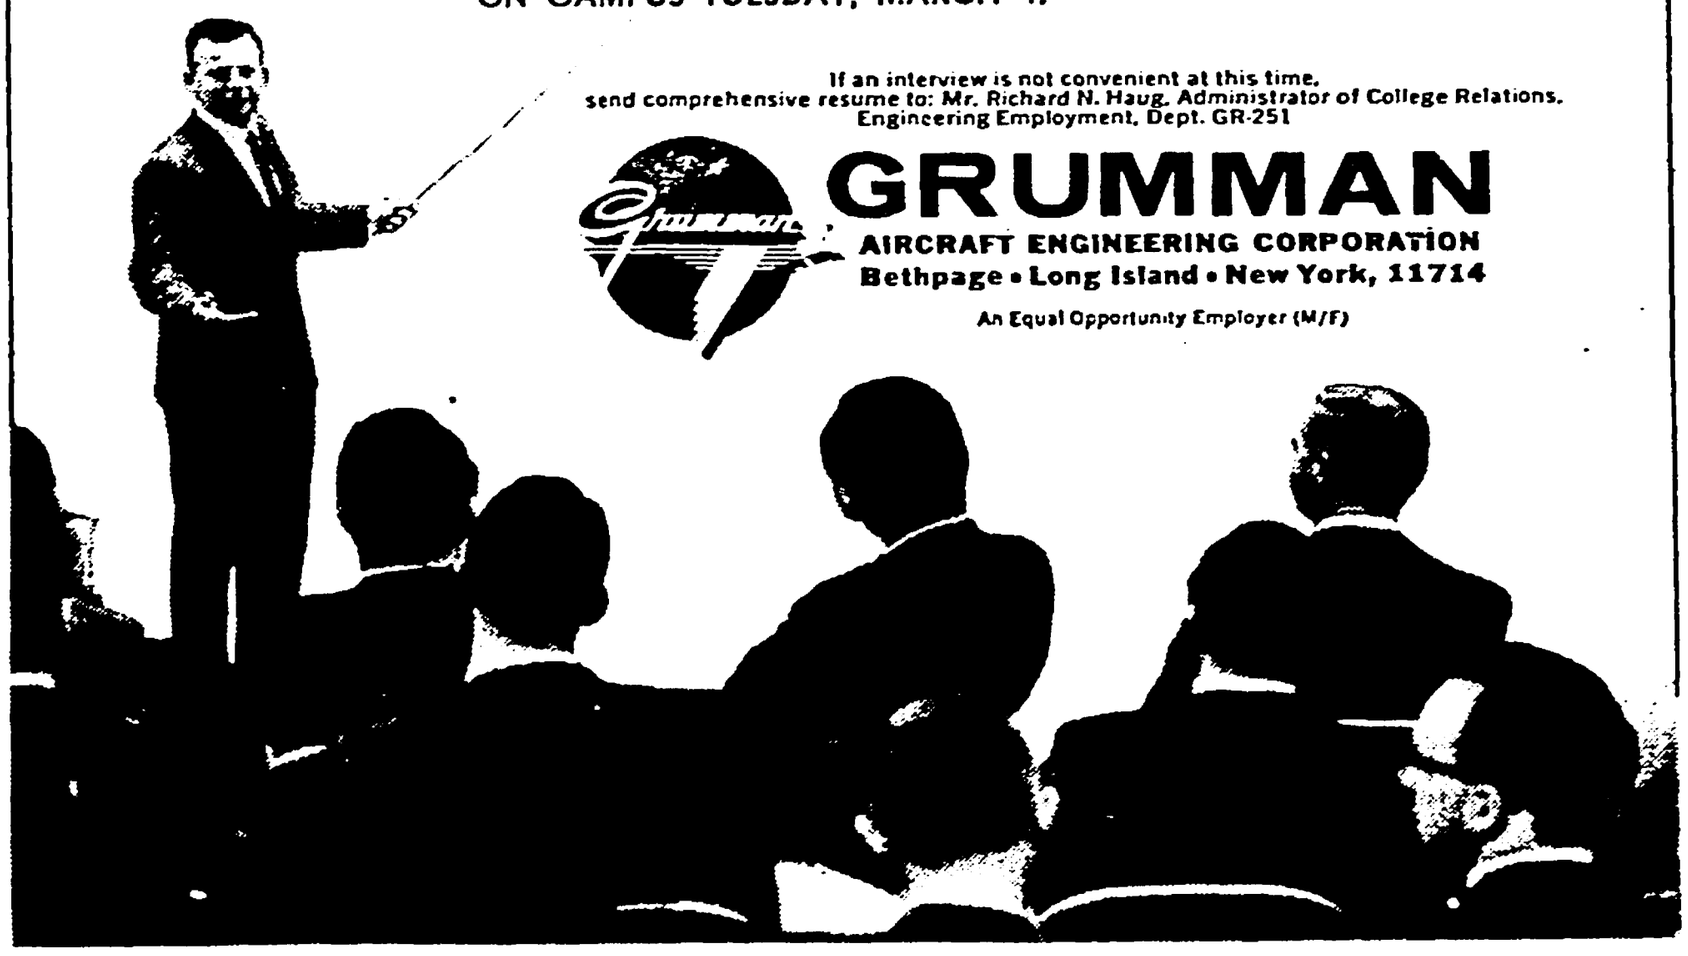
In-Plant Courses
Engineering courses, particularly those not available at neighboring institutions, to deepen technical knowledge to the specific needs of the engineering sections.

College-Industry Courses
Selective attendance for rapid technical updating on fundamentals, theoretical methods and design information. (One to two weeks' duration.)

Engineering Masters Fellowship Program
To enhance creative design capability, one-year fellowships, renewable for a second year, are awarded to new engineering Bachelor of Science graduates and engineers with a year or more company service. The program combines two days of graduate school study with three days of in-plant engineering (in fixed or rotating assignments) and covers payment of full tuition, books, fees, a stipend, and a salary at engineering hourly rates for the hours worked.

Professional Development Programs
Lasting for 2 years, participants are given, in 4 six-months' terms, an exposure to Grumman operations which broadens their technical knowledge, sharpens ability to make sound decisions, and raises their career potential. Separate programs serve individuals in Business Systems, Engineering and Manufacturing.

Senior Engineers' Program
Intended to overcome the threat of technological obsolescence, individual disciplines are updated with regard to new scientific discoveries, new or expanded applications of long existing knowledge, and computer applications to problem solving.



Senior Management Development
Selected individuals within Grumman junior and middle management groups are nominated to attend management development programs such as the MIT Executive Development Program, the Program for Management Development or the Advanced Management Program at Harvard University.

Basic Principles of Supervisory Management
A series of discussion sessions provide a course in management principles to group leaders who show technical management ability.

Here then is a real opportunity for graduating engineers in AE, CE, EE, ME, IE, Physics and Chemical Engineering . . . to take their place in the continuum of technology that is Grumman. Grumman representatives will be schools resulted in violent reactions such as teacher walk-outs and chaos in the classrooms at first, but slowly the program began to make progress. When the problem of integration came up, Rev. Oliver replied, "I think if we get hung up on color we're in bad shape. You're as much of a man no matter what your color."

"I would say that we have shown that integration can work," he continued, pointing out that the Government Board had appointed the first Puerto Rican and the first Chinese school principals in the history of the United States.

Of the future prospects of such a program, Rev. Oliver said, "I feel we will see community control--because it's right, because it's American."

Responding to the two speakers was Dr. John Johnson of the SU School of Education. He stated that his own personal reaction is "favorable to community control...When we are in control of our environment, we can hold our heads up high and make the type of decisions which are right for our children."

Student Senate regulates SG publications

By COLETTE STALLINGS

As the direct result of a publication of the executive branch of Student Government, called the SG News, Student Senate last night passed three acts concerning SG publications.

The Student Government Publication Responsibility Act states that "When publications of a questionable nature are distributed under the name of Student Government...the Student Senate shall have the power and authority to take whatever action it deems necessary to correct any problems that might arise from such a publication."

According to speaker pro tempore, John Diamond, the act merely outlines what is the basic premise of Student Senate, "that students elected to Student Senate should act in a responsible manner."

Commenting on the act, Speaker Ed Feldman said, "It makes irresponsibility a no-no in the Student Senate—in the Student Government."

Under the Student Government Publications Control Act, "Any and all publications printed under the authority of Student Government...require the signature of the author and the co-signature of the person that has authorized the publication."

"It has been suggested to me that often students are not aware of what goes on at Student Senate," commented Diamond while urging passage of the Student Senate Publications Act. The act provides for the publication of a Senate News Letter "for the sole purpose of promoting a general understanding of the workings and the concerns of the Student Senate."

In answer to a plea of the March 4 Committee the senate passed a resolution to be sent to the faculty that March 4 be made a "no-cuts given" day in order to allow interested students to attend the symposium sponsored by the committee.

The March 4 Committee is made up of graduate students and professors in research who are trying to initiate a continuing examination of research programs. The proposed symposium would coincide with similiar symposiums at MIT and Yale for the purpose of acquainting students with the nature of the committee's work.

Senators Bob Conner and John Ross were elected to serve on the Student Finance Committee for the next fiscal year. The committee is responsible for the appropriation of funds to all campus organizations.

Speaking to Senate on the possibility of having Yoga instituted as part of the University curriculum, Miss Lillyan Richter said, "Before this the door has been politely but firmly closed in my face by Dean Piskor. Man has found a way to get to the moon; he can't find a way to get Yoga into the university?"

HENRY DAVID THOREAU CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE
Read by Archibald MacLeish

HENRY DAVID THOREAU said it all, as far back as 1849, in CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE: and now Archibald MacLeish reads it all on Caedmon Records (TC 1263). Listen to it, it has so much to say to you right now — in 1969.

And while you're at it, listen to some of the other exciting Caedmon releases: THOREAU'S WALDEN (TC 1261), also read by Mr. MacLeish, "the" two soliloquies from James Joyce's ULYSSES (TC 1063), read by Siobhan McKenna and E. G. Marshall, and ERNEST HEMINGWAY READING his own work (TC 1185).

Austin to guard Murphy

Orange will test Eagles' scoring ace

By FRED KRAVER

The best method coach Roy Danforth could use to stop Calvin Murphy tonight would be to install a fiberglass plate over the basket which would cover the hoop every time Murphy shoots. However, the NCAA would frown upon such a device, so Danforth will assign Ernie Austin to bottle up Calvin.

The last time Syracuse faced Murphy was December 7. Murphy scored a career high of 68 points in a Niagara victory.

The 5-10 All-Everything is constantly described with superlatives. His shooting is phenomenal. His speed is like lightning. His jumping ability is almost inhuman. He can dunk with two hands--frontwards and backwards. In short, there is very little Calvin cannot do.

But there is one thing that super-Calvin has been unable to do, and that is turn the Niagara Purple Eagles into a winner. They are currently 9-12, and going downhill. On Feb. 13, they were trounced by the same St. John's team that edged SU, falling to a 97-60 pummelling. Their last game was Saturday, when they lost to St. Bonaventure, 98-90.

Niagara coach Frank Layden has had difficulty with the administration as well as with dissenting players. For example, last spring there was a rumor that Murphy intended to transfer to Houston, partially because he was fed up with the way Niagara treated black students.

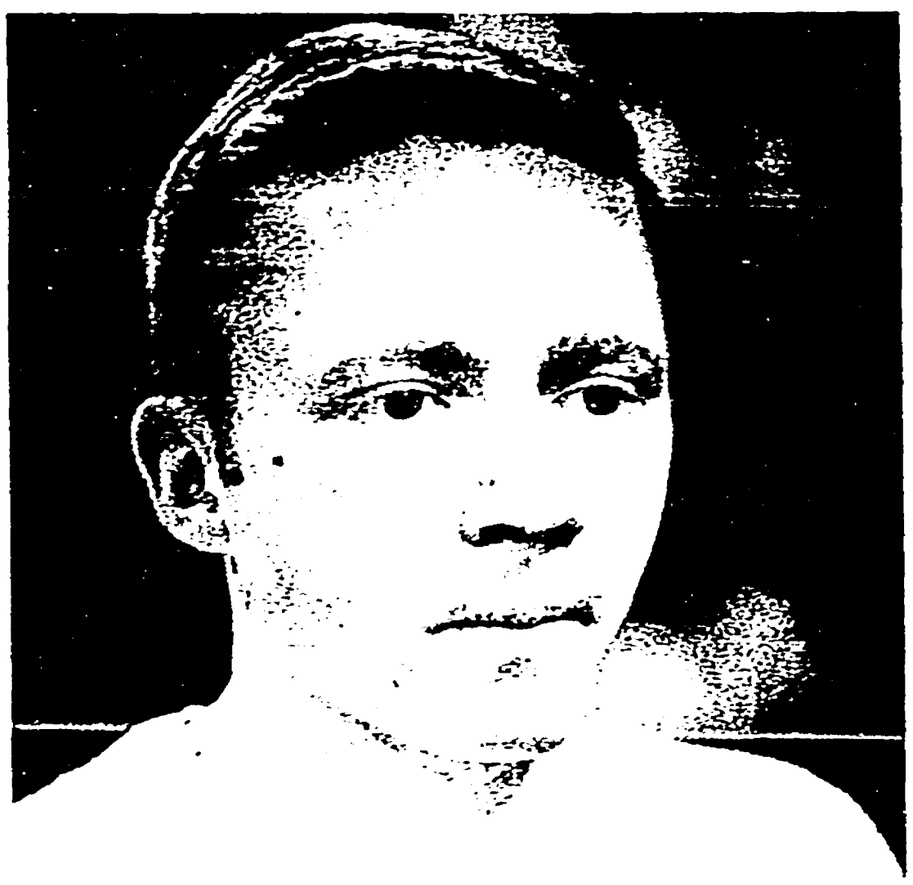
Among Calvin's supporting cast include Niagara's fine 6-6 pivotman, Bob "Sweet Church" Churchwell. He is an excellent rebounder who gave Bill Smith a rough night in their last encounter.

At the forwards for the Purple Ealges are 6-5 Steve Shafer and 6-3 Mike Samuel. Shafer is an aggressive senior who works very well with Churchwell off the boards. Samuel is a product of Brooklyn schoolyard hoop wars. He does a good job of rounding out Niagara's frontcourt.

Working the backcourt with Calvin is 5-10 Mike Brown. Brown is a defensive standout who is usually assigned to take the opposition's high-scoring guard. Of course, it is Brown's job to absorb the fouls that might be called on Murphy and he is therefore destined to take the tough defensive job.

Meanwhile, Syracuse has won four of its last five outings, losing only to seventh-ranked St. John's. Even in defeat, the Orange have shown vast improvement over the last month. The team has become a more cohesive unit, and plays with confidence.

Danforth calls his team's improvement "tremendous. Bill Smith is improving every game, and Bill Finney is giving us a lot of strength off the bench."



Bill Case is a doubtful starter for tonight's match, since he is still ailling from the ankle injury he suffered Saturday night in the West Virginia victory. Gerry McFadden will probably start in Case's place as a cornerman.

The formula for extending its winning ways is for the Orange to limit Calvin Murphy. It is Austin's problem. Danforth expects Ernie to "do a good job on Murphy." Whether he does or not, the huge throng is in for excitement tonight in Manley.

COURT NOTES: Syracuse leads the overall series 37-25. The first game was played in 1905... The score of Niagara's win earlier this season was 118-110... Niagara assistant coach Dick Conover was the captain of the Orange basketball team in 1959-60... Frank Layden is in his first year as the coach of the Purple Eagles... The Tangerines take on the Niagara frosh in the first game. The score of their first encounter this season was 81-80, Syracuse on top. The Tangerines go into the game with an 8-6 record, with Saturday night's meeting with Colgate their last game.

BULLING IN for two points is SU center Bill Smith against St. John's Dan Cornelius. The shot developed into a three point play, that was almost the turning point in that game.

Managing athletic equipment keeps Phillips a busy man

By BOB GALLAGHER

In the spring a young man's fancy usually turns to love, but for Jon Phillips, the athletic department's equipment manager, spring just means more hard work.

At this time of year, when people are looking out their windows for robins, Phillips from his Manley Field House window sees 175 athletes, all of whom require practice gear daily. "This is the most hectic time of the year," says Phillips, "because there are two lacrosse and baseball teams, outdoor track and football."

The practice gear which is given out daily consists of jocks, socks and towels. Half T-shirts, shorts and sweatshirts are also distributed regularly.

Every day before practice the athlete brings his soiled whites from the day before to Phillips, and in return he is given clean gear. The used gear is then put into baskets and sent to the gym to be washed. It returns clean and in tight little towel rolls, to facilitate redistribution.

Phillips' work just does not just involve practice, but also includes getting the players' and the team's equipment ready for both home and away games.

On the day of a home game, the athlete exchanges his dirty practice gear for clean gear and a game uniform. Phillips must also make sure the field is ready for play, and that benches are available. Game equipment, like extra balls for lacrosse and baseball, are also essential.

He must also provide for the visiting team. They are given soap, towels, and anything which their equipment manager has forgotten. Phillips remembers many instances where the visitors have forgotten something. This past fall, for instance, the University of Maryland football team left its jocks at home.

The officials are also supplied by Phillips. The men in stripes are afforded soap, towels, showers and a private lacker room to change in.

For away games, Phillips packs bags with game gear for all players on the trip. After making sure everything is in them, he gives them to the athletes, who pack their own shoes, gloves and pads. When the team comes back, all the bags have to be unpacked, the uniforms commercially dry-cleaned, and the rest of the stuff sent to the gym to be washed.

Rain complicates matters for the equipment manager, since everything has to be dried out before it can be cleaned, and parkas have to be distributed to everybody. Also making Phillips' job rougher is the fact that all other teams are practicing when only one has a home or away game.

Besides distributing the equipment, Phillips is also in charge of purchasing it. "I try to stagger the buying, so that everything does not need replacing at the same time," says Phillips. "I would rather buy a dozen helmets than 50. By having the tears in jerseys and pants re-sewn, they can be used for four or five years."

Phillips got interested in the job when he was manager of the football team from 1958 to 1960. "I worked closely with Al Zak, the previous equipment manager, and I got to like the job, and I enjoy athletics. I came here in March, 1966, and Al retired in July, 1966."

Despite the long hours of the job and the lack of assistants (the 73-year-old Zak helps out three hours a day), Phillips feels the job is nevertheless rewarding. "I really enjoy seeing a kid develop from an average player to a real fine one," he admits. "It's also great to see some of these guys come back after they have graduated, and see that they have become successful in life. I think it's important to cultivate the body as well as the mind."

In addition to his job at the Field House, Phillips is the MIlitary Property Custodian for both the Army and Air Force ROTC programs at the university. "I'm in charge of cleaning and buying the ROTC uniforms of the cadets, and also make sure that the military funds go to the right areas," he explains.

This spring Phillips will fill up the equipment bags without any recognition, but just ask any SU athlete, or Maryland football player, how well he does his job. As usual, it is those who do their jobs efficiently who never get the recognition they deserve.

Pistons will meet 76ers in War Memorial Thurs.

Former SU All-American Dave Bing will lead the Detroit Pistons into Syracuse for an NBA game against the Philadelphia 76ers on Thursday night.

Bing, who led the Orange to the finals of the 1966 NCAA Eastern Regional, is the last SU player to be chosen in consensus All-American in basketball. He was selected as rookie-of-the-year in the NBA in 1967, and was the league's leading scorer last year.

The 76ers formerly played in Syracuse as the Syracuse Nationals and made several appearances each year in the War Memorial. The team is currently second in the torrid NBA Eastern Division race, while Detroit is in 6th place.

The game, the last NBA contest of the year in Syracuse, will start at 8:30 on Thursday night.

Swimmers

The SU swimming team won its seventh meet of the season yesterday by defeating Rochester, 56-47. The team has only one loss with one meet remaining.

Double winners for Syracuse were Peter Schacht in the 500 and 1000 freestyle and Ross Prossner in the 200 backstroke and the 50 freestyle. Prossner set another university record in the backstroke.

Sports sidelights

Coach Andy Mogish will meet with all candidates for the freshman baseball team on Thursday at 4 p.m. Frosh should assemble in the Field House, in the section of bleachers inside the running track.

WAER will broadcast both ends of tonight's SU-Niagara double header, beginning at 6:25 with the freshman game.

University as power center

Many critics of student protest today base their over-kill attacks on assumptions of a mythical university where truth is pursued objectively and fearlessly and guarded from the evil forces beyond the academic sanctuary. Jacques Barzun, George Kennan and even parts of Chancellor Tolley's recent speech before the Onondaga County Bar Association demonstrate this approach.

The university probably never was and certainly is not today a detached Ivory Tower where truth is pursued for its own sake and passed on to students for the sheer joy of handling the product. This is not to say objective, scientific knowledge is neither sought nor transmitted to students at the university.

Rather, the acquisition of knowledge seems to be guided, especially in the case of scientific and technological research, by motives that originate from outside the university.

In some cases such as Defense Department contracts or business contracts the "truth" that is sought is both specific and determined by an outside agent. The motive, in addition to the fearless pursuit of truth, appears to be grants and, given productive results, status and power. Productive research may mean the professor will be invited to Washington to work for an agency or to consult a private firm.

The humanities are also acted upon but by more subtle external forces. Professors who study and publish within the humanities are acting in part on motives of status and a desire for independence to move to better pastures once they become "stars" of the academic world. Status of course is determined by how others view their work and so a professor's peer group influences what he studies and publishes.

Those who succeed in gaining status in the academic world are at least given the alternative of becoming members of the mobile faculty, baited by institutions across the continent. The primary motive of many faculty, then, is not to teach but to gain recognition from their peers through published research. Jacques Barzun suggests this is a major reason why universities may be shortchanging their students and then proceeds to blister the students for objecting to their institutions.

Students may be mistaken in what they think the university should devote its resources to and how it should use its power to change society. But those who rise up in righteous indignation to condemn attempts to change society from the base of the university are less than totally honest.

It is too late to prevent the university from losing its innocence. The real debate is over how the increasingly important knowledge produced at a university is to be applied to society. And if some students have a different sense of priorities than the swordsmen in the Ivory Tower, it is not simply because they are Huns in disguise.

Some personal opinions

Universitas

By Abe Wagner

The trials of working on a newspaper such as the Daily Orange, added to those of being a full time student are not without their just rewards, as any member of the staff can testify. Perhaps the most valuble of these experiences is that day-to-day contact with the University as a whole, that enables the astute observer not only to understand more fully the operations of the institution, but also the practical manifestations of the philosophy of education in practice.

The current controversy over the Chancellor's speech before the Onondaga County Bar Association could hardly provide a better example of the conflict of ideas existing not only within the Syracuse University Community, but throughout the universities of this nation as a whole.

Central to this entire issue is, of course, a philosophy of education with an understanding of the role of the modern university in a society in crisis. In the heat of the current crisis it has been popular to suggest that the university adapt itself to the needs of the times, making itself in a sense the moral judge and conscience of society. This is contrary to the traditional notion of the university stated by Neuman and others that a university be a 'community' of scholars set in the advancement of knowledge, truth and beauty.

Some critics, however, would argue that even this lofty and permanent goal requires some degree of moral judgement in and of itself. While it is not the central aim of the university to "aid and abet" budding revolutionaries by fostering the activities of "a few activists" and sympathizers on the faculty.

What this mandate for moral responsibility does require is that any institution purporting to teach and disseminate knowledge and values to the youth of the nation, must force itself to at least the minimum of ethicacy it would expect from its student body.

To some critics, this problem manifests itself over the issue of Dow Chemical Company, manufacturers of napalm to recruit on campus. Another example less often looked at would be the list of 135 community related programs run by the University. In this list there is no mention of the fact that some of these so-called "programs" would offend even the most common of moralities. One program allows Mount Olympus to be transformed into a drunken orgy for several weeks each Summer, with liquor salesmen plying their wares on the corridors usually reserved for the "pink luggage set."

This activity is condoned and encouraged by the University, to its own profit of course, yet our own Chancellor would have it that a movement calling for change, threatening to wrest the reins of administration from his hands is to be condemned for its attempt to destroy the nature of the system that has produced this freedom

On the occasion of the 1968 Honors Convocation, President John Olson of Oklahoma City University delivered an address with the ambitious title "The Future of Learning," which seemed to leave an entire pew in Hendrick's Chapel full of top level administrators cringing when he broached the subject of a "moral committment," by suggesting that the university had just that sort of obligation.

It seems a shame that Olson's speech was so singularly lacking in other merit, but the idea of a university, responsive to those pressing needs of society; the need for education to preserve those traditional values while trying to attain 'relevancy' to contemporary life was at least put before the University community by one other than the faculty-activist sympathizer the Chancellor would portrey.

In any event, it certainly does not compliament either side of the argument to resort to vindictiveness and name calling. What is in essence a fundamental philosophical dispute cannot allow itself to be reduced to a personal tirade before the community at large, if the university is to truely serve the community at all.

Letter: Response To Dr. Tolley

To the Editor:

In his speech before the Onondaga County Bar Association this past Saturday evening, Chancellor Tolley has once again revealed how the world looks to him and the nature of his contact with the real world. In the Chancellor's world students are the younger of those people whom he sees as he looks, occasionally, out of the windows of his second-floor office in the Administration Building. In his world the Faculty is a body, a sample of which is seen by him at a distance on those occasions when he presides over the monthly meetings of the University Senate. Since the Senate is a body which includes both representatives of the Faculty and all high-level administrators of the University, it should be pointed out that it is only among those Senators who are Faculty members that he finds Senators who talk back.

It is a nice simple world. One can, in that world, easily identify the good, the weak and the bad. They are, respectively: a) most students, all administrators and some members of the Faculty; b) students who are dupes and therefore troublemakers, and that large group of Faculty members who are merely stupid; and c) that small minority of the Faculty who are evil and their willing assistants, the revolutionists among the students. But such worlds do not really exist, and in setting the community afire with a story which designates the Faculty, whether stupid or evil, as the cause of all the trouble, the Chancellor has been thoughtless at best, dishonest at worst, destructive in either case. He has done a real disservice to the University in putting out such a story to the community at large, which is always anxious to hear a simple explanation for complex reality.

The Chancellor might have been surprised, had he consulted any of those particularly malign members of the SU Faculty whom he seemed to have in mind on Saturday night, or had he read an account of the disorders at Columbia University last Spring. In such an eventuality he would have learned that nothing those faculty members who were closest to the concerned and activists among the students at Columbia and at SU last spring (and it seems a generalizable conclusion) might have said would have made any difference in what occurred on those campuses. . .except, perhaps, to exacerbate the situation by breaking all lines of communication between those students and an administration which only then began to consider listening to students who had fundamental concerns.

The Chancellor has a low opinion of the character of many students, and a high estimate of the Svengali-like powers of Faculty members. In both he is in error. It is to be hoped that he will attempt to repair the damage he has done. No one else can as surely as he could.

Silent protest at game

Students make Black Power salute

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

A demonstration by about 100 black students preceded the SU-Niagara basketball game in Manley Field House last night.

During the playing of the national anthem the blacks filed out of the stands and stood en masse on the running track which separates the court from the bleachers. They raised their fists, many covered with black gloves, in silent protest during the song. After its conclusion most of them filed out of the building, chanting, "Um-gowah, Black Power."

Fans in the Field House remained emotionless during most of the demonstration, with a few boos being heard at the end.

There had been speculation all week concerning a possible protest at the game. Rumors centered around unconfirmed reports that a number of black athletes had been suspended from the football team for refusing to stand for the national anthem before the St. John's basketball game last week.

Neither the athletes nor the athletic department would comment on these rumors. A team meeting is scheduled for 4 p.m today.

The blacks who demonstrated last night did not include any members of any athletic teams. The group has no comment on the reasons for its protest, other than saying that a prepared statement had been left inside the Field House prior to its departure. No such statement could be found, however.

CSL Committee reports:

Survey urges campus visiting hours

Ninety-two per cent of the students who participated in the Council on Student Life's visiting hours experiment and then responded to a CSL survey feel that visiting hours should be extended to all living centers according to a preliminary report prepared by Standing Committee 3 of CSL.

The 17-page report includes the results of individual surveys and results, dorm council, evaluations, parental reactions, implementation, philosophy and positive and negative veiws of the experiment.

The report stressed the emphasis on considerations and respect for roommates and other floor members and the responsibility accepted by participants in the experiment.

One-third of those queried responded to the questionnaire which the report calls "a statistically significant return." About 83 per cent of the respondents hosted at least one guest during the experiment and statistics show that visiting hours were used for "social and study purposes."

The study found that few violations had occurred and those were "handled effectively within the governing process of the living center." Large dorms used the more formal structure of a dorm court in enforcing regulations of their programs while smaller living centers usually "talked out" their problems.

While 73 per cent of the respondents said that sign-in sheets created no problems, only 44 per cent felt that they were advisable. The function of the sheets differed form dorm to dorm so the committee recommends that they not be standard operating procedure.

Sign-in lists were used because the committee felt the experiment required something on which to base a quantiative analysis of the experiment.

Dorm councils reported favorable changes in atmosphere as a result of the experiemnt. Changes ranged from a decrease in apathy, neater and quieter floors and a "more realistic, human atmosphere."

"Students generally accepted the responsibility of the visiting hours experiment," the report stated. Visiting hours were not a detriment to floor unity and consideration for roommates caused more group awareness.

Only 37 parents replied to the more than 1000 letters inviting comments about visitation from the offices of the personnel deans. Questions raised by parents indicated a lack of complete understanding of the program.

The committee recommends that each living center establish a proposal for governing visiting hours with these guidelines: 1) that hours be within the maximum set by the committee, 2) that guests be escorted to and from private areas, 3) a disciplinary procedure for violations, 4) no alcoholic beverages, 5) procedures for emergencies and 6) rights of residents.

Visiting Cambridge scholar lectures tonight; prolific writer is African Studies authority

Professor George Shepperson, distinguished scholar from the University of Edinburgh, is currently visiting SU and will lecture at 8 p.m tonight in Maxwell Auditorium

Professor Shepperson is a Scholar of St. John's College, Cambridge University, where he completed his studies following wartime service as an infantry officer in Burma and India with a Nyasaland battalion of the King's African Rifles.

Since 1948, he has been a member of the History Department of the University of Edinburgh. In 1963 he was appointed to the Chair of Commonwealth and American History.

Professor Shepperson has published broadly and prolifically in such scholarly journals as the Journal of African History, the Rhodes-Livingstone Institute Journal, the Journal of Negro History, Phylon, and Africa among others.

His scholarly reputation, however, is based on his Independent African: John Chilembwe and the Origins, Setting and Significance of the Nyasaland Native Rising of 1915 which he authored in collaboration with Thomas Price and which was published by the University of Edinburgh Press in 1958. It has since been reprinted and is generally regarded as one of the pre-eminent works of African historical scholarship yet produced.

Professor Shepperson has presented papers at a number of international conferences on African history. Since its inception in the early 1960s he has been the co-director and then director of the interdisciplinary Centre for African Studies at the University of Edinburgh.

Afro-American Studies

Program will give black students a 'relevant education'

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

A formal proposal for an Afro-American Studies program at Syracuse University was released yesterday by the chairman of the committee that is formulating the program

The proposal, which was first made public two weeks ago at a Council on Student Life sub-committee hearing, states:

"We, the Black students of Syracuse University, in order to make college education more relevant to the needs of Black people, to provide for, the development of Black communities in America, and to help Afro-Americans identify with their African roots, do hereby propose the establishment of an Afro-American Studies Program."

The Afro-American Studies committee of the Student Afro-American Society (SAS), chaired by Edward Brown, will meet tomorrow with Dean of Liberal Arts Frederic J. Kramer to ask Kramer to make room in the Liberal Arts College for the proposed program's courses.

Kramer and other administrators, including Alan K. Campbell, dean of the Maxwell School, have been receptive so far, said Brown.

The program according to the proposal, "should be under the Liberal Arts department," and would have a black chairman. The policies of the program which would be at an undergraduate level, "will be decided by a committee of Black faculty and Black students."

The process of selection for this committee, says the proposal, will be determined by the Afro-American Studies committee "at a later date."

The program will be of an interdisciplinary nature, and will therefore draw on courses from all disciplines "relative to Black people."

According to the proposal, students would be able to choose Afro-American Studies as a straight major or a dual major.

The proposal, according to the committee, "is just a brief outline of the general direction of the structure the courses should have," and is "in no sense absolutely binding." Research on course content and references will begin immediately, the proposal says.

Brown said yesterday he hoped to have as much of the program as possible instituted by September. The committee's most immediate task now he said, is getting "qualified professors."

Related to this, he said, is getting money from the administration to attract these professors. "The Maxwell School is making an effort to get attractive salaries," Brown said.

The program's vital role, according to Brown, is to give black students "a relevant education.

"If you're thinking in terms of black people developing black communities," said Brown, "a liberal arts education is irrelevant. It is important for black people to take relevant knowledge back to their community."

To know what it's like

Biafran sympathizers fast

By GREG SMITH

How can one really know what the Biafrans and the world's hungry suffer? Go on a fast and feel something akin to what they must endure.

A number of SU students are doing just that—participating in a fast that began yesterday and will last up to five days, depending on each participant's limit.

"Now I will know something about how a Biafran woman feels as she goes about her day," said soph Patty Riposo at a faster's meeting yesterday in Hendricks Chapel. "This will be a personal teaching device so that now I will know the definition of hunger. This type of experience is truly a part of my education here."

An informal get-together will be held in the Hendricks Colonial Room from 11:30 to 1:30 each day during the fast. The first meeting was held yesterday and about 30 people attended.

Stated Ed Ruhe, one of those in the vanguard of organizing the fast, "I don't know if I can do it; that's why I'm participating."

Jagan Gomatam a grad student from India and a member of the SU Nigeria-Biafra Relief Committee commented,

"I want to experience this anguish of hunger along with the others instead of standing by and saying that I know how it feels." Gomatam has fasted before in his own country.

A myriad of topics was discussed at yesterday's meeting. Paul Connett, president of the Keep Biafra Alive Organization, was criticised for his "over-politicalization" of the Biafra situation. Previous fasts that some of the participants had undergone were described. Possible medical consequences of fasting were explained by Stevie Street secretary of the Nigeria-Biafra Relief Committee. Film footage of the meeting was taken by a company making a history of Hendricks Chapel.

But not all of those fasting are visible. There is no concrete number of those involved available. Steve Persensky, a grad student and Watson Dorm Resident Advisor who experienced a four day fast this summer has acquired a list of Watson residents who are fasting. Many of them have firm convictions about what they are doing.

"If you have never known what it is like to go without food for a length of time then you can't relate with the people of the world who are starving," said frosh Bill Francis.

Stated Howie Mandel, "I want to see how much hunger I can withstand. I am in sympathy with the Biafran situation although I don't think this is a very successful method of drawing attention to it."

Don Abelson, who will attempt to fast the full five days, remarked, "I cannot stand by any situation such as this and just sit there and not do anything about it. I want to feel what it's like to starve and I think this is worthwhile."

Jagan Gomatam drew an allusion by saying, "Unless you go and live in a slum you don't know how it is."

Those participating in this fast are finding out the hard way about what hunger is all about. But to them it's the only way.

We encourage job-hopping. We do try to keep it intramural—within Du Pont that is—and we do have a more formal title for it, "planned mobility."

Saylor Gilbert, CH.E., V.P.I., 1962, tells it like it is.

It only means we don't put you in a training program. We put you in growth jobs—to help you get to the top of your field the way you want to get there.

"Take a good look around you, and you'll see people at Du Pont who've had a lot of movement through very different kinds of jobs. There's no doubt that this diverse experience helps you. For example, I had four assignments concerned with different aspects of polymerizing, casting, stretching and finishing our polyester film base."

"Having had all this, I feel I was better prepared for my present position of training supervisor. But aside from the fact that variety can help you, I believe most people just like a change after working at one job for a period of time."

Your Du Pont recruiter will be a guy like Saylor.. Ask him about planned mobility—or anything else you'd like to know about Du Pont. Mailing the coupon is the surest way to get in touch with him.

Alan Stamm awarded $200 for spot news

A third student in two months has brought laurels and award money to SU's Journalism Schools.

Several hours after learning of his promotion to Daily Orange managing editor, Alan Stamm received another tidbit of good news – a $200 fifth place prize in February's William Randolph Hearst Foundation newswriting competition.

A matching grant is also presented by the Foundation to the Journalism School.

Stamm, a sophomore from New York City, won his award in the "spot news" category.

The Hearst competition is conducted throughout the nation each month. Last month's winners included SU's Charles W. Babcock and Bruce Chadwick.

'Mosaic' brightens SU

The passion of Ben Shahn

Ben Shahn: The Passion of Sacco and Vanzetti, Martin H. Bush Syracuse University, 1968

By Allan Ludwig
Associate Professor of Fine Arts

This colorful little book is a ringing testimony to the lavish support of the arts and their study within the Syracuse University community.

The volume is divided into two parts, the first of which is devoted to a short essay on the famous Shahn mosaic which students may contemplate outside H.B.C. The second part is devoted to an essay by the artist himself on the state of the arts at mid-century and dated 1951. (The text fails to inform us if this interesting essay had been previously published). It is to be regretted that Mr. Shahn's comments on art are now some 18 years old and much has happened in the meanwhile about which Mr. Shahn would have been more than qualified to comment upon.

Assistant Dean of Academic Development, Martin Bush, must be congratulated for putting this little volume together so gracefully, but the scholar will regret some lost opportunities. The origins of the Syracuse mosaic, the contractual negotiations together with relevant letters and other documents have not been included in an Appendix. A public commission has major dimensions beyond either the artistic vision of the artist. or the taste of the patron. There is always a give and take in these matters, only hinted at in the text, which would have been far more useful to future scholars had these documents been carefully edited and presented. For example, who chose this particular subject matter and what were the reasons behind it? Shahn, after all, had other pictures which might have been suitable. What were the thoughts of the administration about so public an exposure of a theme still controversial? Certainly

Poems by Stuart Radowitz

TODAY

I walked through a sky
once blue with clouds and fluffy white snow
now gray
with a boiling cauldrons eruptions
I climbed a high high mountain once sunny orange warm
now
only dusk covered
I ran in a field of green
where people once made love
now bloody stained
And touched a tree that had lived and blown in many a breeze
cold
with but a single leaf

And the day is still young

EVENING IN DECEMBER

Lay down in a field of Willows
And cry for all to hear
Climb a hill
And cry
So all can see
My tears could fill
The oceans of the world
And rust
The brightest steel
I'll cry for the world
And for myself
For people who have suffered
And

Those that will
For a lovers ache
Born on a spring breeze
Shall I cry
Till
Perhaps I cry myself to sleep

BROTHERHOOD

The begging arab who some say has no pride works for the government.

And in his spare moments might glimpse a gazelle
and long for his life.

The starving jew who some say is wealthy works for himself.

And might see a sparrow who can fly when he will
and long for his life.

And the begging arab and starving jew will go to war to kill the other for what he has.

Shahn mural strengthens a tradition

these issues were discussed but we are informed little about them.

Historians of art will be dismayed that Dean Bush did not expand upon his treatment of the actual genesis and chronology of the mosaic project itself. Apparently an original color sketch, in the painter's collection, went through a series of simplifications as the scale and media of the work were changed. Just what these steps were is not examined in detail, nor is the original giant cartoon for the mosaic shown save in fragments. The historian of art will also find it most curious that the larger completed painting titled "Sacco and Vanzetti" and dated 1932 (now in the collection of Mr. and Mrs. John Heinz III), is nowhere mentioned nor illustrated, although well known to critics of modern American art. It is also to be regretted that Dean Bush tends to overestimate the importance of the Syracuse mosaic by suggesting that for a similar mural project supported by academic institutions one must go to Mexico. Similar mural projects exist at Pomona College, Dartmouth College, the New School for Social Research, Bowdoin College and Yale University, to name just a few. Dean Bush probably meant to suggest that mosaic projects are few and far between in America, although he calls the "mosaic" a 'mural' throughout his otherwise well written essay.

Dean Bush, then, should be recognized for attempting to make the Syracuse "mural" more widely known and for putting together so attractive a book, although his efforts show certain signs of haste.

Both this volume and the mosaic itself are an affirmation of a great university's interest in the humanistic tradition in the arts and all those concerned with this most noble of projects ought to be saluted. In this age of science and technology it is most refreshing to see creative institutional patronage for the visual arts and let us remember that such projects are made possible only because of Syracuse's "tradition of freedom, liberalism and tolerance."

Negro psychiatrists on black rage

No more dreams, opiates or patience

By STAN HUNTERTON

For a white man to review a book written by two black men, about black men and women, may be sacrilege to some people — I don't think so. The explosion which Dr. Grier and Dr. Cobbs are talking about is not festering inside the minds and hearts of black people because there is a "Negro problem" in America, but rather because there is a white problem. "Black Rage" stands outside the standard socio-economic agreements about the Afro-American. It looks instead at psychic rape which has been methodically performed in this country for more than 300 years.

To illustrate their case the authors have chosen to narrate the mental disturbances of quite everyday black people — teachers, manual laborers, business men, domestics and the unemployed. In so doing, I think that they effectively dispel the most comfortable myth our white society holds. It quickly becomes obvious that the black man is not happy munching away on watermelon. Whatever "trouble" has been caused recently can no longer falsely be attributed to outside agitators and imaginary communists; when every man feels shut out and fed up every man is his own leader, and potentially his own firebrand. The authors decribe the general confusion of a riot situation and the specific frustrations of black community leaders as they attempt to find the leaders of a mob, only to realize that the people are carrying themselves along individually. Their tirade is sustained by generations of collective, but very personal and individual depression, not by any one man. The black rage of America's Afro-Americans calls itself to the streets; only the particular time and place is decided by a personality and/or incident.

None of this is meant to imply that Dr. Grier and Dr. Cobbs played down the social and economic repression that blacks have so catagorically experienced in the United States. Their perspective, as psychiatrists, helps them establish causal relationships and develop explanations for many of the mores and cultural phenomena of black people, beyond the ability of the social sciences to do so. By admitting that there is a small amount of truth in each of white America's popular sterotypes concerning blacks, they can (and do) proceed to expose the psychic roots of depression, schizophrenia and paranoia which play to varying degrees on the minds of black people as individuals. These and other mental disorders, according to the authors, are the inevitable outcome of the conflict between being happy about oneself and surviving in a world that defines black in only negative terms. Since survival is the first law of nature, the black man sells himself out; that is, he must accept and perpetuate certain myths and stereotypes which are foreign to any human's natural state of mind, but which are necessary for survival simply because he is black. Fortunately, for his own sanity, the black man has been able to turn about these stereotypes and use them to frustrate and at times intimidate "the man." But this kind of game is draining as well as degrading to the essential self of every black man who plays it, the string eventually runs out in many cases and the tragic result is mental illness.

"Black Rage" discusses the entire spectrum of the black man as an individual in a white society, from childhood through the family. No doubt everything the authors have said is academically accurate, but I think there is something beyond the cognitive understanding of the black man's psych and how it has been developed. Long after white America has gotten over (for the most part) the idea that blacks are a high order of pet, there still remains the syndrome that somehow "they're all alike" and not quite capable of full sensitivity and feeling. "Black Rage" is saying to white America, look if blacks can dream enough, want enough, hurt enough, feel enough so that it twists their minds, isn't it time you realized and admitted that they do have minds?

But where is the rage in "Black Rage?" Obviously there is a good deal of depression and grief for a black man or woman who tries to reconcile his or her inner self with the harshness of living in a pervasively racist country, but what of rage? Psychiatrists Grier and Cobbs feel that "there are no more psychological tricks blacks can play upon themselves to make it possible to exist in dreadful circumstances. No more can they lie to tell themselves. No more dreams to fix on. No more opiates to dull the pain. No more patience. Only a welling tide risen out of grief, now a tidal wave of fury and rage, and all black, black as night.'

This book is not the first warning that the United States may soon 'inherit the wind," but the warning seems now to be ringing closer and more loudly.

'Soul on Ice'

An admitted rapist looks for his masculinity

By LOUIS JACOBS

Soul on Ice. Eldridge Cleaver. Ramparts Book, Dell Publishing Co. 210 pages. $1.95.

Eldridge Cleaver smuggled Soul On Ice out of Folsom Prison and escaped along with his collection of essays chronicling the castration of the black man's mind and virility. Asserting the powerful themes in "Soul On Ice," Cleaver openly exorcises black weaknesses which were imprinted by a white colonialization that did not stop with the Emancipation Proclamation.

"America has come alive deep down in its raw guts. . .," and the Americans Cleaver describes be they Black Panther, white radical, or right-wing Kleagle will feel "Soul On Ice." For more than other black autobiographers, Cleaver has stripped himself naked and made himself vulnerable just as he invites his female lawyer to do in two moving love letters.

"Soul On Ice" is that invitation engraved in the violent testimony of a nation of black eunuchs paying homage to the Ultra-feminine Ogre, the white woman. White and black readers alike but in different ways must "become sitting ducks for each other" interacting with the world Cleaver vomits at our feet in his invitations.

Too often the white reviewer (my status) tests works like "Soul On Ice" for its militancy, stinging indictments, or revolutionary capacity. This book should not be hidden in such categories. A new collection from Random House, "Eldridge Cleaver: Post Prison Writings and Speeches," can be added to Ramparts articles and the Nat Hentoff Playboy interview in order to satisfy any need for theatrics.

"Soul On Ice" is about a beautiful person, the conflict within, and his philosophy. This does not exclude Cleaver's basic frame of reference: a black man in a white world. But his agonizing search for what makes him tick, an admitted rapist and by white standards a violent man, reveals the struggle that we must both understand and more importantly feel "deep down in the raw guts."

The first essay is titled "On Becoming" and the collection carries that theme throughout. What Cleaver becomes and the relationship to the black movement is clear but unfinished. A parenthetical remark to the black woman mentions "that before we could come up from slavery, we had to be pulled down from our throne" and so the realization of a history which had been negated.

Elsewhere Cleaver deals with masculinity, inferiority, the elimination of a black man's use for a brain, and the rest of a list which everyone reading it will recognize quickly for either as oppressor or oppressed we have helped write that list.

As for the future of the "radical dilemma," Cleaver following teacher Malcolm X finds hope for a solution other than strict separatism "The sins of the fathers are visited upon the heads of the children—but only if the children continue in the evil deeds of the fathers."

For those who wish to discontinue, "Soul On Ice" offers understanding of the man and then of the many insults our generations have perfected.

'1-Dimensional Man'

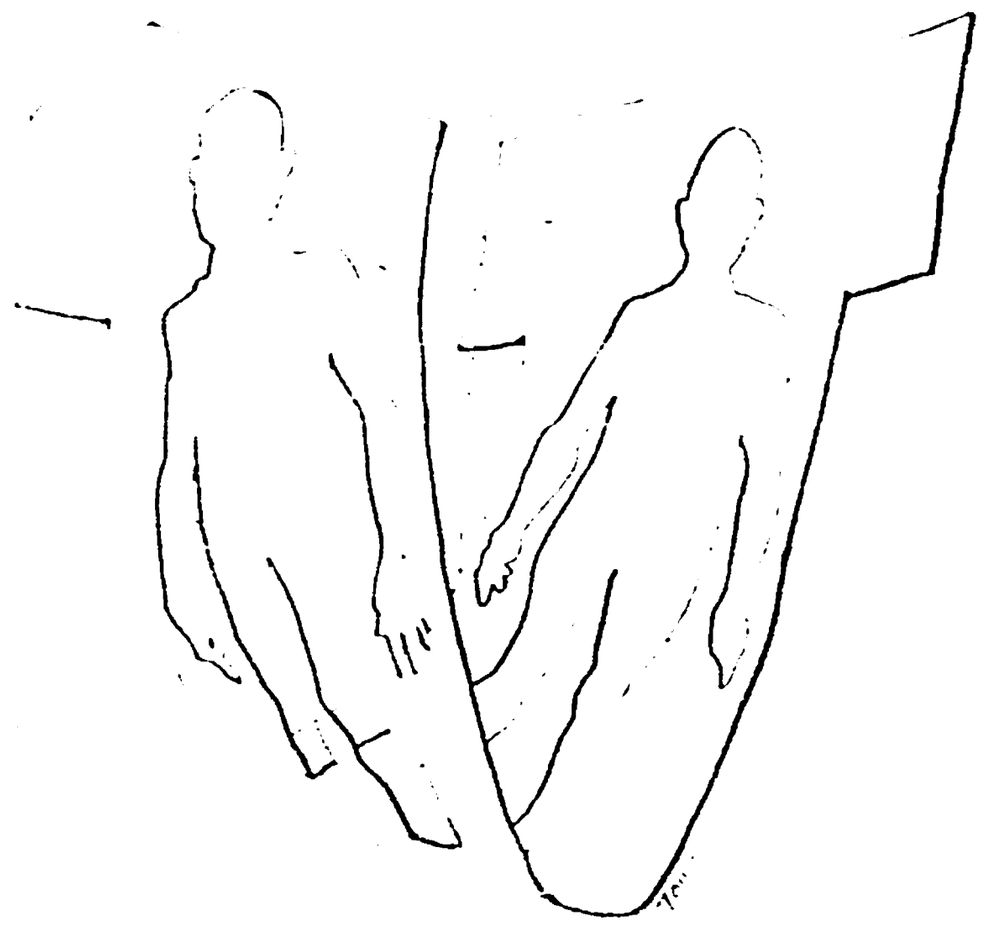
By CHARLES WALTER

"One—Dimensional Man" by Herbert Marcuse. 257 pp. Beacon Press, 1964, $2.25.

Herbert Marcuse, the philosophy professor at the University of California at San Diego, is the prophet of our time--though perhaps a false prophet.

He has given the New Left it rationale of violence and disruption and he is read by militant German, French and Japanese students. Although he may be associated with anarchists and nihilists, he is profoundly optimistic about the nature of man.

He is concerned with qualitative change in our society and does not believe any society that stock piles nuclear bombs and bases its economy on "defense" industries can be Great or even rational.



"...the established rationality becomes irrational when, in the course of its internal development the potentialities of the system have outgrown its institutions," he writes.

This is an abstract way of saying ideas once true become outdated and don't perceive what really can be accomplished within new conditions. From this conservative springboard Marcuse leaps into the doctrine that we are all trapped in an outdated industrial society that succeeds in forcing us to consume more and more material goods we do not need.

Our freedoms have enslaved us and only a break with the system will free its iron grip on our "one-dimensional thought." We are molded by powers we do not comprehend and only revolution can bring change.

The springboard of his thought--that industrial democracy has achieved its goals and goes on functioning only at the enslavement of the people--has elements of truth in it. The original goal of business at its highest level was to organize the financial and material resources of a nation to feed, clothe, shelter, educate, etc. an expanding population.

It would seem now we could use our resources, expecially our technology, to create a less hurried, less materialistic society capable of pursuing human potential rather instead of shiny new cars that fall apart in three years. And while our society as a whole is well-off materially, there remain pockets of poverty and outcasts who for no fault of their own cannot enter and run the race.

Furthermore, advertising, one of the biggest and fastest growing industries, creates demand for new products by playing upon the insecurities and desires for status of the mass market.

Bur Marcuse's main concern is not the alternatives of post-industrial society. He is convinced discussion of them is pointless since we are enslaved in the current society.

Part of the difficulty of answering Marcuse's analysis is the cumbersome, abstract style in which it is written. There is no lack of imagination in the effort and the abstract style enables it to be comprehensive--he does not condemn this or that isolated aspect of society but the total system. But at the same time he does not illustrate his abstractions by showing how they relate to the lives of the "enslaved." At one point he briefly condescends to give "banal" examples of what he is talking about and they are illuminating. But he chooses not to or can't illustrate his major theme of enslavement in American democracy.

In the introduction Marcuse cites such authors as C. Wright Mills and Vance Packard as illustrating the facts of enslavement. Mills wrote in "the Power Elite" that American society was run by a group of men who all went to the same schools, joined the same law firms, attended the same country clubs and followed the same routes to power as did their fathers and fore-fathers.

Daniel Bell in "The End of Ideology" argued to the contrary that we have an open society with opportunities for upward mobility. Policies in our country could not be formed by an inner elite group because so many of them were simply responses to events outside this country. The policy of containment that was to absorb great industrial resources was formulated by George Kennan, an independent intellectual and diplomat.

The most basic criticism of Marcuse's analysis is his failure to refute the possibility that current consumption—oriented society may be what men want rather than what they have been conditioned to accept. When the colonists came to the raw American frontier from different parts of Europe to settle at disconnected points on the coast, they had the option to create whatever kind of society they choose. Even the Puritans choose to increase their material comforts and we have been moving toward an integrated, accelerated national economy ever since.

What guarantee does Marcuse have that the revolution he hopes for will bring qualitative change? Will and Ariel Durant write "The Lessons of History:" "In some cases outworn and inflexible institutions seem to require violent overthrow, as in Russia in 1917. But in most instances the effects achieved by the revolution would apparently have come without it through the gradual compulsion of economic developments. ...To break sharply with the past is to court the madness that may follow the shock of sudden blows or mutilations."

Hence, when the French revolted against the King in 1787 they created the society of the guillotine and eventually turned to Emperor Napoleon.

Marcuse believes men are capable of being perfectly just, wise and peace-loving, given revolution, tomorrow. He does not explain how he and so many students escaped the enslavement of industrial democracy or the corrupting influence of power.

Warren Harding

An ineffectual President

The Shadow of Blooming Grove, Warren Harding in his times. Francis Russell. McGraw-Hill, New York $12.50 1968 663p.

By CHUCK STOFFEL

Francis Russell has gone further than most biographers in his preparation of "The Shadow of Blooming Grove." Not only has he written a major work but his discovery of Warren Harding's love letters to his mistresses has helped in an analysis of the man. In these letters we sense the inhibitions and scandal of Harding that were to be left as a legacy to his administration. We can also see the simple naivete and trust that made Harding believe his friends uncorruptable.

Warren Harding was born in Blooming Grove, Ohio. The shadow that followed him throughout his life was a story spread during the smear campaign of 1920 that he was part Negro. Russell tells all too well of the affable, insecure and basically unresponsible man that was President from 1920 to 1923. Russell spells out his reasons for disbelieving that Harding's wife poisoned him

In short, Russell answers many questions and myths about this neglected President and aids us in understanding the man who governed the nation at a time when it failed, like its President, to carry its responsibility. We even look into the "smoke filled rooms" of campaign managers attempting to get their man nominated.

A major weakness of Russell in this book is the length of his description. It seems that he could have achieved the same results without the immense detail. Russell rambles on over moments that are not really consequential to Harding's life. They only add an element of Blooming Grove flavor.

Russell has achieved his objective. His book is a good biography of the President with the most tarnished reputation and the least biographical acclaim. This biography will not only endure but it will be a sourcebook for his administration and his life. My surprise is that it took forty-five years to document this important era in American history.

The nature of life

Each day life, each day death
With the darkness creating new prismatic light, stabbing to and beyond the horizon.
Non-dimensional and uncontained,
Finite and infinite,
Uncertain but certain.

And the rains rush over the waves and sneak away leaving a child-like green of new life.
A new fire burns, leaving the ashes to the wind.
The fire spreads, and the floods come, lightning flashes, and thunder cannons its voice.
Man trembles and cries out in pain and joy.

The ashes pour foundations;
New men and new women burn with passion.
Yet, the jackals still howl a sickening cry of death,
The barrels roar, the stages spin,
And the bones still clatter in a darkened pantry.

Lay waste to my soul and the ashes will haunt you,
For ashes pile and grow
And the wind scatters them
To the Mother who returns them to her recreating womb
For a new image, a new image contained only by man.

Starve my soul and you will feed it,
Feast me and you will starve,
Cast timbers about me and I will build a tree,
Fell me and I will crawl.
But, I will rise again, I will rise to cast new shadows of light.

Death penalty strongly opposed

By BOB STRUGATZ

"Only when we accept the fact that we're not so nice, we'll do something about it."

This was a statement made by Dr. Charles Willie, chairman of the sociology department at SU, concerning the controversy over capital punishment, a topic discussed at yesterday's University Union Bull Session.

Dr. Willie opened yesterday's session with a brief speech concerning a recent conference on the subject of Crime and the Press. This conference, held under a grant which Dr. Willie received from the National Science Foundation, brought together a group of social scientists and newspaper people in order to give the press a better understanding of the problems which confront today's society from the point of view of the social scientist.

According to Dr. Willie, the conference covered five major areas. The first of these was the area of capital punishment. Attorney Franklin Williams, from Columbia University, was on hand to discuss this topic. Dr. Willie stated that ours is a "society which is concerned about the breakdown of law" but is "actually contributing to that breakdown." He went on to say that this penalty is unjustly selective, citing facts which prove that more men than women who commit murders suffer the death penalty, more black murderers than white, and more from a poor background than an affluent one. Some states feel that the retention of capital punishment will act as a deterrent to prospective homicides, but Dr. Willie stated that his research proves that some states with no capital punishment have lesser homicide rates than some states which do demand the death penalty.

The second area under discussion was the FBI crime reports. Dr. Willie stated that these reports employ absolute figures rather than rates, which establishes a discretion in interpreting social importance of the FBI findings.

The conference then went on to discuss the judicial system in the United States. Present was Howard James, Pulitzer Prize winning author, whose book, Crisis in the Courts, was a major reference point for the discussion. Dr. Willie stated that many judges are not fulfilling their responsibilities, and that black and poor citizens often do not receive the justice that is due them. He went on to say that newspaper people must become "justice reporters" rather than just "police reporters."

Fourth under consideration was the riots in our cities. Dr. Willie accused the press of toning down the events of the riots, which he felt was a grave injustice to the American people. He stated that "society will only be able to make changes when they know exactly what's going on."

The fifth major topic on the agenda was that of law and psychiatry. Dr. Willie spoke of the "inappropriateness for a person to be kept from trial because he's thought to be crazy." He went on to say that if psychiatry is to be applied, then it should be in the sentencing of the criminal, not in the decision of his guilt or non-guilt. Dr. Willie further commented that "many mental hospitals become subsitute jails," and that if a person cannot be brought to trial, he has the right, in essence, to be set free.

The last major topic to be discussed was youthful offenders. Dr. Willie claimed that environment must be considered in the question of these youthful offenders, many of them within the ages of ten and fourteen. He stated that mixed neighborhoods have a higher rate of crimes performed by youths than homogeneous ones, because the former have less community control due to lack of trust among the differing populace.

Following Dr. Willie's remarks, there was a brief discussion with the students attending. One major question posed was: How does a social scientist, after making his findings, get out of the academic realm to make the necessary changes within the society? Dr. Willie's answer was that the social scientist makes his findings, draws the inferences from those findings, and then takes over his role as an American citizen rather than a social scientist to apply those findings to the society.

Arbelaez, true Spanish 'caballero,' to discuss Colombian poetry here

According to the old Spanish tradition, a true caballero is one who is knowledgeable in many, diversified fields. From poetry to politics and clairvoyance to cuisine, a man's knowledge must be comprehensive.

Syracuse University and the Department of Romance Languages will welcome Friday a "caballero" in the true sense of the word.

Fernando Arbelaez, poet par excellance of Bogota, Colombia, will speak at 4 p.m in Gifford Auditorium. "The Scope of Recent Colombian Poetry," his topic, is one about which few men are more concerned. Himself a member of the litery generation, 'Mitos,' Arbelaez is one of the most widely acclaimed authors of Latin America today. His most recent publication, 'Antologia de la Nueva Poesia Colombian,' has been lauded, and he is now in the process of compiling an anthology of the best contemporary short stories of his nation.

His own book of poems, "Canto Llano," was awarded the National Prize of Poetry in Colombia. To his credit also must be noted the Spanish translations of the Nobel Prize winning book, 'Misthistorema,' by the Greek poet, T. Seferis.

Literature, however, is not Arbelaez's only interest. As a member of the Colombian diplomatic corps, he has been his country's representative to United Nations committees, and he has held the post of Colombian Ambassador to Sweden (where he learned the art of gourmet cooking.) More recently, as an invited member of Paul Engle's International Writer's conference, sponsored by the University of Iowa, Fernando Arbelaez has seen his ability to read the future in the palm of the hand cause almost as much fascination as his literary contributions.

While in Syracuse, the author will be staying at the home of his close friends, Doctor and Mrs. Jaime Ferran.

International festival slated for next week

A week-long schedule of events will be offered during International Student Week (March 1-9) by Syracuse University students from all over the world. Their objective is to show their appreciation for the hospitality accorded them throughout the year by area residents. The schedule includes an evening's entertainment at an international talent show Saturday, March 8, and ends with a "world's fair" and fashion show Sunday, March 9, when articles and food from their homelands will be on display.

The festival opens 8 p.m Saturday, March 1, with an informal dance at St. Thomas More House, 112 Walnut Place. "Mandragola," a film based on the classic Renaissance comedy by Machiavelli, will be shown Monday, March 3, at 7:30 and 9:30 p.m. in Gifford Auditorium. Admission is $1. Prof. Halim El Dabh of Howard University, will perform on the piano and drums Wednesday, March 5, at 8 p.m at the Physics Building auditorium Admission is $1. On Thursday, March 6, Dr. H.R. Abdulgani, Ambassador to the United Nations from Indonesia, will speak in Maxwell auditorium at 8 p.m

All events of International Student Week are open to the public. Emanuel Anise of Nigeria, president of the S.U. International Student Association, urged Syracuse residents to attend as many events as possible. The program is co- sponsored by the World Affairs Council.

We want engineers who want to get away from it all.

If you're the kind of engineer who can't stand the thought of sitting at the same desk in the same office day after day, then you're the kind of engineer we want to talk to.

We want to talk to you about a career in technical marketing.

Engineers in this field spend most of their time out in the field. Sales, application and field-service engineers are always on the go. Talking with GE customers. Selling GE products and systems. Solving other people's problems.

To do all that, you have to understand a lot more than engineering. You have to understand people and how to communicate with them. And that can be one of the hardest jobs there is.

If you'd like to know more about a career in technical marketing, plan to talk to our representative when he comes to campus. He can tell you how you can get away from it all and, at the same time, get ahead.

Coronation, skiing plans for active Winter Weekend

One of these SU coeds has been chosen Winter Weekend Queen and will be honored at the Fifth Dimension Concert on Friday. They are from left Ronnie Kemper, Tina Goff, Joyce Bleiman, Susan Moore and Judy Coleman.

The 1969 Winter Weekend Queen will be announced during the Fifth Dimension Concert Friday, according to Leslie Shiff, chairman of the Queen Contest.

The Queen was chosen Tuesday night during the last round of teas at the Alumni Lounge in the Women's Building from among five finalists.

The finalists include Joyce Bleiman, a Liberal Arts freshman from Larchmont, New York, sponsored by Phi Epsilon Pi. Miss Bleiman is a pledge of Sigma Delta Tau. Her interests include horseback riding and gymnastics.

Judy Coleman from Concord New Hampshire is a sophomore sponsored by her sorority Alpha Phi. Miss Coleman, an international relations major, is a Phi Kappa Psi little sister.

Susan Moore, a sophomore from Dallas, Pa., is a sister of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority and is being sponsored by her floor Day 6. An advertising major in the School of Art.

Tina Goff, a sophomore from Fayetteville, New York, is a sister of Kappa Kappa Gamma sorority being sponsored by Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity. She is a physical education major.

Ronnie Kemper, a freshman from Miami, Florida, is being sponsored by Zeta Beta Tau fraternity. She is a pledge of Alpha Epsilon Phi sorority, probably majoring in either English Literature or Political Science.

The judges for the Queen contest included 16 students and 7 members of the faculty.

A full day ski party, including ski races and dancing at Song Mountain, is also being sponsored as part of Winter Weekend '69 by the class of 1970.

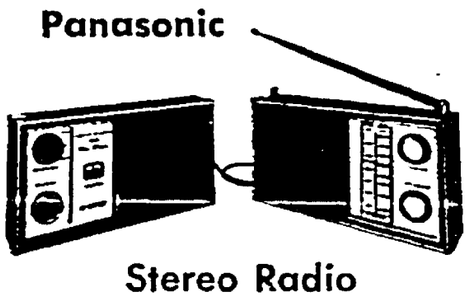
Featuring activities for the skiers and the spectators, the party on Saturday, March 1 will include skiing from 9:30 a.m until late afternoon. Three bands including the Sidewinders, the Eastern Graile and a special Song Mountain band will provide continuous music from 1 p.m until 1:00 a.m

Two tickets of $7 for skiers include access to the lifts, transportation to and from Song Mountain and all the beer one can drink. The normal tow fee is $6; thus for $1 additional charge a skier is entitled to the transportation and beer.

A non-skier for $2.50 per person also is provided with unlimited beer and bus transportation to the ski lodge, leaving from campus every half hour. The buses will leave during the evening from Manley Field House following the basketball game with Colgate.

Ski activities, sponsored by the Ski Club in conjunction with the Junior Class will include slalom races and various novelty ski races. The ski activities featuring a grand slalom race, will entitle the winning team to a free beer party the following evening.

Tickets may be purchased at the door beginning at 9 a.m the morning of the party. These overall tickets entitle the holder to leave and return at his desire for no extra charge, thus the ticket holder may leave the party in the afternoon to attend the Colgate game, and return later that evening.



The Song Mountain party will be in a private building closed for Winter Weekend participants.

Help wanted:

Can you design a door that eliminates this problem?

Situation: It is often difficult to get into and out of today's cars without bumping into the car beside you.

Question: Can you design a door that uses minimum out-swing space when opening?

Disciplines: It can go over the car, under it, slide into the frame, swing parallel to the body . . . AS LONG AS IT'S NOT TOO EXPENSIVE TO MASS PRODUCE. Door must also provide an electrical channel to the chassis to provide for power operated windows. Need your ideas in time for meeting next month. Thanks.

Schaefer SKI TIPS BY ROXY

Don't fall for the wrong skis

When you buy a pair of skis, remember: buy skis designed for your type of skiing. Often, beginners fall for a pair of expensive skis made for racing conditions. And then find themselves falling down on the turns.

Skis are made for all sorts of skiing and snow conditions. If you're a beginner or even a good weekend skier, you don't want shaped and extra-flexible skis designed for slalom racing. Instead of making you a better skier, they'd probably hold you back.

Skiing is supposed to be fun. Keep that in mind when you buy skis. Get the pair most suited to your height, ability and the conditions where you usually ski. You'll save money and you'll enjoy the sport a lot more. You'll ski better, too.

For the most reliable reports on ski conditions in the East, listen to "Ski Reports by Roxy" with Roxy Rothafel, the voice of skiing. On WFBL Radio 1390 in Syracuse—and on other stations throughout the Northeast.

And on your next ski trip, be sure to enjoy Schaefer—the one beer to have when you're having more than one.

Schaefer Breweries, New York and Albany, N.Y., Baltimore, Md.

SHIFTY MOVES displayed by Ernie Austin, who scored 21 points for the Orange last night. Austin played a fine all-around game, running the SU offense and acquiring a hot hand in the second half. He couldn't do it all, however, and fouled out en route to the Orange's 103-92 loss.

Murphy prevails over Syracuse soul, 103-92

By MIKE WEBER

The soul sounds returned to Manley Field House last night and along with them came a revival of the old-time SU spirit. However, Calvin Murphy and his Niagara teammates also rolled into town and outshot the Orange basketball team 103-92.

With Murphy leading the way on offense, and he and Mike Brown playing cat-like defense, the Purple Eagles simply outlasted the homestanders.

Niagara got the opening tap and with just four seconds gone in the contest, Murphy was fouled while shooting by John Suder. The All-American converted both and Niagara led 2-0.

The Eagles kept a safe lead through the first eight minutes of play, and when Bob Churchwell made two free throws Niagara held a 25-19 margin.

Syracuse then began to move as Bill Smith tossed in a charity throw, while Suder added a pair. Ernie Austin then made a fine steal and converted it to make the score 25-24.

Murphy countered with a jumper of his own but Smith, Suder and Kouwe all added two-pointers to put the Orange on top for the first time in the game, 30-29.

Eagle coach Frank Layden then called time to regroup his forces and from then on, the first half was a see-saw affair. SU led until 2:47 showed on the clock, when Steve Schafer hit on a layup to shove Niagara up front, 45-44.

The Orangemen again went ahead at 48-47 only to fall behind, 54-48, at the half as Niagara successfully converted seven consecutive foul shots.

Murphy and the Eagles came out running in the second half and nearly blew Syracuse off the court. With Murphy and Mike Samuel doing the most damage, Niagara raced out to a 75-59 lead before SU showed any signs of life.

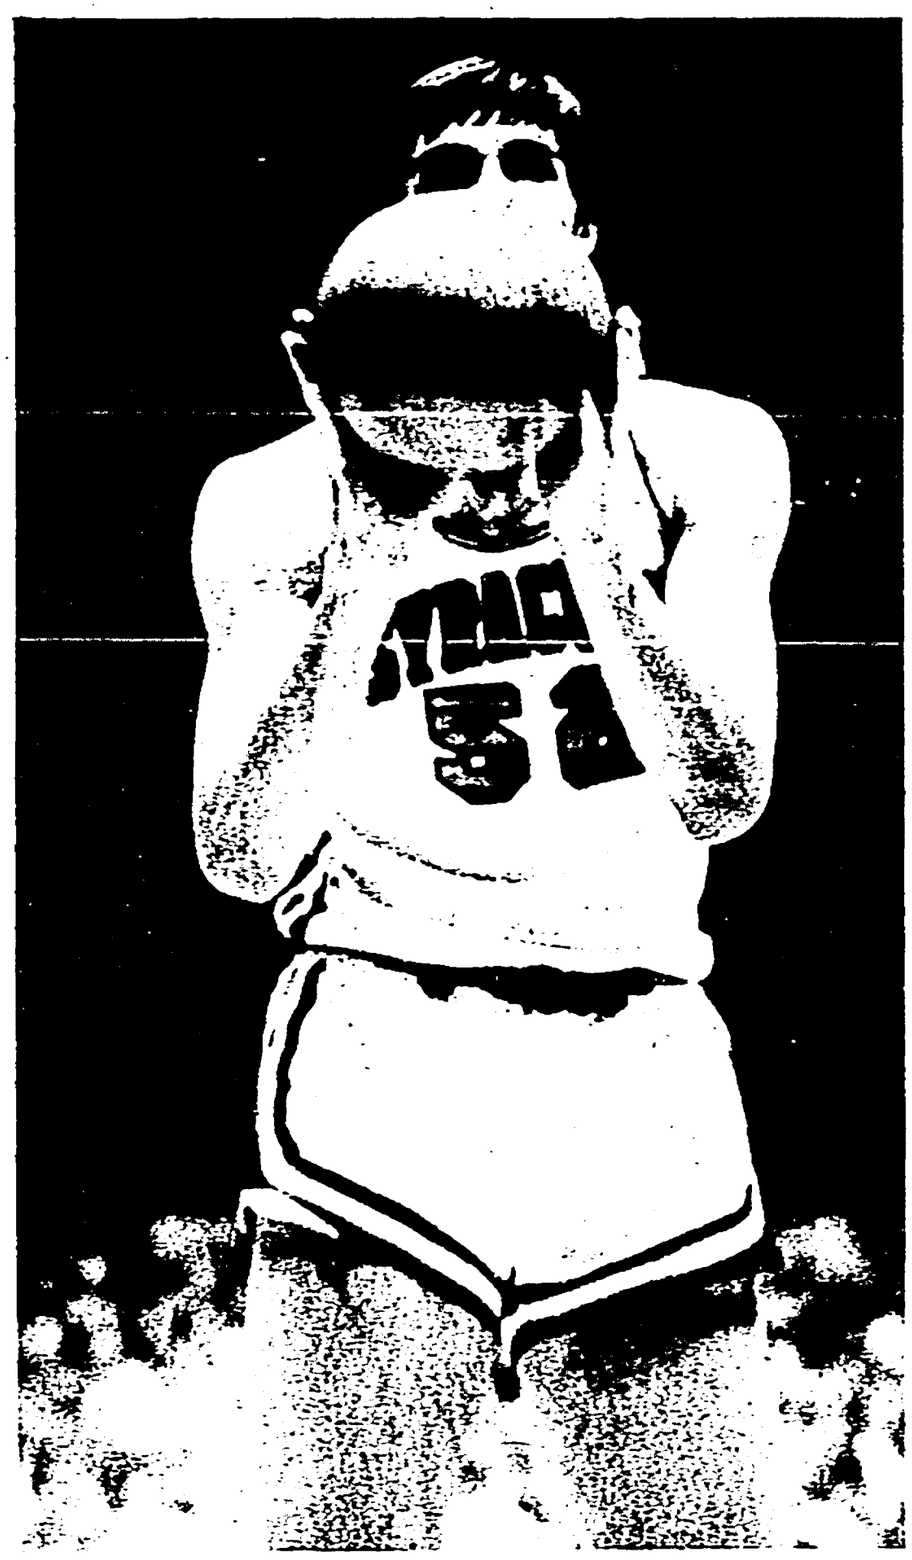
Austin, who has really been coming around lately, hit on three buckets in a row and when Bill Finney tapped one in, the count read 75-67.

Both teams traded baskets before the SU group hit for four quick points to draw even closer at 77-72. The spread stayed the same until the magical Murphy registered foul number five on Smith's arm to bring about a Niagara time-out.

Austin, playing like the demon he was two years ago, made another pretty ball-hawk play and laid it up to make an 87-83 ballgame. However, just 44 seconds later, the fans bade a fond farewell to high-scorer Smith, who left the game on fouls with 33 points.

The exit of Smith sealed the doom of Syracuse for with the big man gone, Roy's Boy's became just another team. Austin quickly followed Smith via the foul route and with both the height advantage and the ball-hawk sitting on the bench, Niagara made their final crushing move to victory.

Dave Aldrich entered with 33 seconds remaining and he made good on his only attempt from the field on the final buzzer with the final count reading 103-92.



Murphy tallied 32 points for the winners and dazzled the fans with his uncanny shooting ability before fouling out. Samuel and Bob Churchwell both had 17 markers while Steve Schafer chiped in with 16 for the Purple Eagles.

Austin followed Smith for SU scoring honors with 21 points while Finney contributed his fourth consecutive double figure effort, finishing the night with 12 counters.

The cagers close out the season at home against Colgate on Saturday night at 8:30.

SWEET 'BOUND, by Bob "Sweet Church" Churchwell, the Niagara center. Niagara, usually all Murphy, got help from some of its other players last night, as Murphy fouled out with about five minutes to go in the game.

Tangerines dump Baby Eagles 81-60

By ED AGRANOWITZ

The Syracuse Tangerines opened up an early lead and then coasted to an 81-60 victory over Niagara's Baby Eagles last night.

Coach Bill Vesp's crew, now sporting a 9-6 slate, made easy work of the team that they downed 81-80 earlier in the season.

For Syracuse, 6-1 guard Greg Kohls continued to set the nets afire with 7 for 12 from the field and 11 for 13 from the charity stripe for a game high of 25 points.

Six foot 3 Paul Piotrowski chipped in with 19 markers and was the game's leading rebounder with 11 caroms and shot a gaudy 8 for 12 from the floor.

Roosevelt Wingate was the lone bright spot for the little Purple with 21 points and 20 rebounds.

The Tangerines finished the game with a 49.2% field goal mark and 54.3 from the line.

The Tangerines had spurted to a 47-21 lead at halftime largely on the scoring of Kohls (17points) and Pitrowski (10 points).

The Syracuse yearlings shot a sizzling 56.3% from the field in the opening half as compared to Niagara's 34.5.

Wingate, who gave the Tangerines fits earlier in the year at Niagara, was the Baby Eagle's only offense in the first period with 12 points on 6 for 13 shooting.

Ken Gray picked up three first half fouls for the SU frosh and was glued to the bench for the first six minutes of the second half.

Niagara went to a full court press midway through the second half, but Vesp's charges had little trouble solving it. The young Orange continually sliced through the sticky Eagles for the percentage shot.

Vesp began to empty his bench early as the lead swelled to 25 with about seven minutes to play.

Winter madness

Jim Vermeulen of SUSKI tosses some snow at "Paul Bunyun" as he grows up on the quad. The snow sculpture for the Winter Weekend is intended to be the largest ever made at SU. "It was originally going to be something else. But now it's Paul Bunyun and his Beer Kegs. Or somebody with his beer mug. I don't know. It's up to your imagination. But it's. . . it's somebody." commented Lee Kalna, president of SUSKI. "Winter Carnival '69 of Winter Weekend this Saturday will feature skiing at Song Mountain 9:30 a.m to 4:30 p.m Slalom races begin at 11 a.m for living center teams. There will also be winter games such as traying, snow shoe race, tobagganing, and gelande, a form of ski jumping. All skiers and non-skiers welcome. P.S. Thanks and farewell to our friends

It is time to pause a moment, look back at what we have done and what it means, and say farewell. We stated in bold phrases our aims at the beginning of March, 1968. We would pursue the truth fearlessly, raise the crucial questions and find some of the answers. We would report the university in its totality, stripped of its pretensions, naked before our critical eyes.

We have failed in this mission. Our news columns did not reveal or explain all that they should have. Our comments were not as insightful or enlightening as they should have been. We have not given you a sense of your university in its totality.

Yet we take a certain satisfaction in our journey. If we have failed it is not because we didn't try. We have put our limited abilities before your critical scrutiny where they often fell short. But we reserved for our compatriots in this greatest of all professions an uncritical concern and affection.

We have shaken a rigid financial structure and rejoiced in the lightened burden of ancient barnacles.

We were happy when we explored and explained that which hadn't been examined before and we were saddened by the flotsam and jetsam of our inaccuracies and inadequacies.

Behold. We have humanized our technology! We buried the efficient wire machine, Mr. United P. International, who always spoke to us with such a distant voice, and replaced him with a warm and friendly, though temperamental, coffee pot. Due to all of you who have shared with us your ideas and knowledge, as well as our coffee, we have never missed Mr. International.

To those of you who read books--and like them: hurray! To those of you who don't, our apologies.

More important than our lesser innovations and setbacks, our minor triumphs and failures, we have come to know one another and ourselves better during this journey. We are fortunate to be in a process where the old and tired are graciously but firmly escorted out of their offices and frozen assumptions so that the young and eager can replace them before they grow senile. But we are saddened by our parting--Evan, and Abe, Karen and Sherry, Alan and Angus (Good luck, Angus!) Clint and Bob, Mike and Charlie--after sharing so much together.

So it is time to say farewell--to Chuck who is rebellious, and to Barry, the only president whose class keeps sending him back until he does the job right. To Dean Smith, Dean Tatham and Dean Carleton, who we have pestered and annoyed and laughed with.

To Vice President Wingate who almost seems dishonest with his blunt and brusque honesty, and who helped us get new typewriters when no money was available and our Mayflower models irreparable.

To Dean McCombe for his humanity. To Cathy Covert for her concern and gentle guidance. To a man named Sawyer, about whom nothing more need be said. And to Jim, made today an honorary staff member, who is so human and yet who is so great.

And most of all to Evan, the best newsman on campus, who as much as anyone made the Daily Orange what it has been during the past year. To Evan and Joanie together (Evan and Joanie is love forever!) without whom our weekends as well as our office days would have been something less.

And finally to Janice who has shared all the grief and few of the rewards and has gone on loving anyway.

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

When I first read excerpts from Chancellor Tolley's speech at the Onondaga County Bar Association dinner, I was terribly surprised by his naivete concerning major issues of the day. After learning that he had spent practically all of his life in the ivory tower - at a university or school of some type or another - I, of course, was no longer surprised.

As a black person, I was particularly moved by the Chancellor's statements concerning blacks. His paternalistic attitude in such remarks as, ". . .they need a lot of sympathy, understanding, help, and tender loving care" and ". . . black students are being given bad advice" is exactly what black people do not need, and, in fact, is what we actively deplore. Implicit in these remarks is the "great white father" image which incorporates the identity of the black man as an inferior being. Moreover, black students are not being motivated by "advice" from an outside source, but by a sense and desire for what is rightly, justly theirs.

"They the blacks too must learn of the limits beyond which they cannot go," says Tolley. I think Mr. Tolley should be made aware of the fact that, if black students in the past had accepted the white man's "limits" they would still be wandering aimlessly on the campuses of white shcools trying to find something to fit in. They would still be wandering in a fog of scorn and derision perpetuated by the institutions' racist bureaucracy. The few advances that have been made would be non-existent. I as a black man am not willing to accept the limit or one third, or even two thirds, of my rights, and will continue to fight to the extent of my abilities until I have all of them .

To the Editor:

For possibly the first time in history, Syracuse University has chosen an issue it feels worthy of discussion, namely R.O.T.C.

To those who say R.O.T.C. has no place within the framework of a university, I suggest the opposite is true. An individual being trained for the military while attending a large university would quite probably become more politically sensitive and aware than his "brain-washed" counterpart of the various military academies. Unlike such strictly structured and controlled institutions as the academies, a university hopefully constitutes a wide range of people and ideas. Therefore, a R.O.T.C. officer would without doubt know more about "life," thus producing a more sensitive and aware military system. Perhaps, we should expand our R.O.T.C. program and instead attempt to abolish West Point.

Personal opinions — Part two

What we leave..

By Abe Wagner

With this issue, the Daily Orange changes hands to a new staff of Senior editors. Many of those who will assume the jobs we leave, have already been long time staff members. It is to their credit that they already know much about the day-to-day running of the paper. What remains for the new staff to learn: what remains for all conscientious students to learn is a comprehensive notion of the nature of the university.

What appears as a lifelong and overly ambitious project can at times be just that. For those who will be charged with administering the major campus media this involves learning a few basic "facts of life" and applying them in their day to day experiences.

As each succeeding staff has in the past taken over, the charge is generally made that the paper has indeed been co- opted by the "Administration" and become the devil's advocate. To the Greeks the paper has always appeared bitter an independent. To the non-Greeks we have appeared a conspiracy of the pro-Greek editors, except for those few occasions "our masters" force us to condemn this Greek happening or that.

The reasons behind this general conception of a campus paper stems not only from the effects of student psychology, but from the very nature of the university itself.

Thus what we leave to our incoming staff is a few notions of the microcosm in which we operate, in the hope it may aid them in their efforts to analyze and criticize future happenings on the hill.

The first idea, and probably the hardest one to contend with is the fact that no simplistic notion of the university exists. It is just this proposition that Professor Wolfson addressed his letter-to-the-editor yesterday. Where Dr. Wolfson would accuse the Chancellor of such thinking, I would accuse many students of the same crime.

For the majority of Syracuse students, the "establishment," that crusty old group of men led by a Chancellor who might as well be an actor hired twice a year to greet the freshmen and to moderate at Commencement, exists for the sole and greedy purpose of extorting the student body. It is hard to estimate the number of my own classmates who honestly believe the "administration" meets each morning in some lofty chamber to plan its next moves against the students and faculty.

To this end, they have devised their own personal autocracy, manifested in slave camps called dormitories, money mills such as food service and the bookstore, and ministered to by that un-godly trinity: the Dean of Women, the Dean of Men, and Jim G. Carleton.

For a student body that is responsible for little else than mid-terms and finals, talk and criticism is cheap. For those few students responsible for the publication of a newspaper with a circulation equal to that of many dailies, all is not so simple. It is to the end of informing the University that we have, in these past few issues, attempted to explore in depth the nature of the university and its many facets. It is in this quest to fulfill the responsibility of the press that the paper is prone to appear "managed" to many readers. But, rather than adopt a cloak of irresponsibility in search for popularity, we have sought to use the medium at our disposal to present the range of alternatives, as we ourselves see them.

From the very obvious, such as this former example, we have run the entire gammit from loco parentis to black studies. In each case there have been at least two sides to the issue. It has been our goal to report these sides faithfully, and criticize them responsibly. From our new staff we can ask no more. We can only leave them the solace that we too, as our predecessors did, have had to grapple with the unpopular burden of choice.

We also leave to our successors a raft of problems unsolved. It is with deep regret that we leave office having failed to cope with all the misgivings of the universe. I would urge those who follow us to deal forthrightly with those problems arising especially out of the application of a 'double standard.'

For example, it is difficult to comprehend how ten students can be severely punished in the colleges of Business Administration and Liberal Arts, while two students found guilty of academic dishonesty in the School of Architecture are left unblemished.

It would seem unfair that women are charged more for the same dormitory rooms because of a "tradition" that no longer has the least bearing on reality and charged more for athletic privileges because of past decisions that no longer have meaning.

One wonders why a new residence complex, occupied for its second semester still has no name – why a suggestion to name it after the beloved Dean Noble has been tacitly ignored when Noble's only crime in life was not having enough money to leave the University to warrant a building in his name.

It is this wisdom and understanding, as well as these endless problems we now leave you. We have solved some of them, like the women's washroom in H.L. and even a few of the larger ones like the case of the good sisters of Alpha Delta Pi. To the really major issues, we can only claim that at least we have tried to address ourselves to them and at best we have begun to see the light.

Released statement explains black protest

By MIKE GREENSTEIN
Sports Editor

Manley Field House was quiet again last night after a week of activity that threatened to blow the roof off the seven year old building.

The Orange football team held a regularly scheduled meeting yesterday afternoon in the Squad Room of the locker room The team met for about an hour behind closed doors. Besides Ben Schwartzwalder and his staff, Athletic Director Jim Decker was present, along with his assistant, Andy Geiger, Dean of Student Services Jim Carleton, Sports Information Director Larry Kimball, and Father Charles Borgognoni. The presence of these gentlemen in itself indicated that some important issues were being discussed.

"The coaches spoke and some of the players spoke," said on the football players after the session. "I think we're all a little better off because of it."

Although none of the people involved would confirm it, the topic under discussion could have been the role of the black athlete at Syracuse. The meeting by coincidence or not, followed on the heels of a demonstration by black students at the Niagara-SU basketball game on Wednesday night.

After the blacks walked out of the game, following their silent protest during the national anthem, they released a short statement explaining their action. This statement has now been located, and reads:

"This demonstration is in protest of the racist attitudes existing in Syracuse University, as well as in the community, that affect blacks of Syracuse, as recently exemplified by the treatment of black athletes and students.

"If this reflects any disrespect to the national anthem or the country, it is minor when compared to the blatant disrespect shown to the blacks in this country.

"We stand united as black students."

Rumors had been circulated before the demonstration that a number of black athletes would be suspended from the football team for refusing to stand for the national anthem before the St. John's basketball game last week. No one, however, has been removed from the team

The treatment and alleged discrimination against black athletes has been a major area of protest across the country in the past year, especially after the series of articles in "Sprots Illustrated" last summer. Although this is the first open incident at Syracuse, there are indications that it will not be the last.

"The issue is not dead," another player said after the meeting. "The issue of the black athlete will never die."

American aid needed, but not liked

Asian students call for pride, dignity

By ANDRIJ BILYK

Harvey Rabiner, assistant director of the Foreign Policy Association and Great Decisions moderator at the International Student Center last night, cornered a Japanese exchange student into revealing the dualism with which Southeast Asians view the United States.

"The Chinese are politically and militarily dominant," said Rabiner, "but the Japanese are on top economically--in view of this, how do the Japanese feel toward the Americans being in Southeast Asia?"

"I think they should stay," replied the student. "Where?" asked the moderator, "On the mainland?" The Japanese nodded his assent. "What about Okinawa?" The Japanese hesitated long enough to demonstrate that American presence there bothered him.

Last night's topic was "Southeast Asia: More Vietnams in the Making." And though the participants could not agree on the validity of the domino theory, it soon became apparent they all believed economic stability and national unity to be the sore spots in that part of the world.

The discussion was based primarily on Thailand and the Philippines. Prinya Wanchupela, of Thailand, disputed the domino theory. Thailand is a unified country with a national language, a national religion, and with deep loyalty to the king, said Wanchupela. "I don't think the majority of the people think there is much threat from China, but if there is, it will be more of a political one. American help is needed. I would like to see foreign investments and foreign aid," he said. Wanchupela believes that Southeast Asian countries, nationally unified, must develop economic stability to offset any political gains the Chinese might reap from dissatisfied people.

Not all of Southeast Asia is as strong as Thailand, however, and Philippine student Florange Rosario revealed her country's troubles.

"The present crisis is in leadership and economic development. The political grassroots structure is carried out on a personal level. This has led to corruption and the undermining of the whole system. You have people who are free but not really. They have hands but nothing to put their hands on."

Miss Rosario, like Wanchupela, feels that there should be more Western foreign aid, but without seeming like hand-outs. There is a clamor for pride, self-esteem, and dignity, she said.

Moderator Harvey Rabiner then said that a country is likely to fall to outside forces and subversion only to the degree that it is not a politically and economically strong state. It must have the support of the people, he said.

"We have been looking to America as a kind of umbrella," said Wanchupela. "Southeast Asia is becoming increasingly aware that it can no longer depend upon the United States."

What the Southeast Asian countries want, it seems, is American economic aid to offset Chinese political ambitions but no personal American interference.

This fourth in a series of Great Decisions discussions was sponsored by the World Affairs Council.

Towards black unity

FAC establishes recruitment program for black students

By VIC LIVINGSTON

"Our main purpose is to make black students aware that there is a Syracuse University, and that SU needs black students."

Oliver Quinn, President of the Freshman Action Committee (FAC) of the Student Afro-American Society (SAS), in this light outlined the main goals of the new organization--informing black high school students about both the academic and social aspects of the life of a black student at SU. FAC, in cooperation with the Admissions Office, sends representatives to high-schools in their communities to speak about college life, centering around their experience at SU. The FAC provides interested black students with information, catalogs, and SU application and financial aid forms. Students subsequently accepted to SU are then personally contacted by the FAC and given additional information concerning the day-to-day life of the black student at SU, including literature about black student organizations, course offerings, and activities of interest to the black freshman.

"We want to inform new black students about SU so they won't enter blind to the school like we did," said Quinn. "We'll let them know just what the school is like in all areas."

In addition, the FAC plans a black student orientation program, to be held during the general Freshman orientation period.

"During the orientation this fall, SU had nothing black students could relate to," Quinn said. By conducting a program for new blacks, Quinn hopes to help the students to become aware of their new surroundings, and to become acquainted with other black students attending SU.

The FAC, through their high-school recruitment and orientation programs, will analyze various aspects of the black student's life in the coming weeks in special investigative committees. Each committee will compile information to be sent to students applying or accepted to SU. Also, comprehensive plans for the new orientation program will be formulated at these sessions.

Both Quinn and FAC Vice-President Phil Clendeninn hope for a great increase in black enrollment at SU this fall. "We are shooting for a black enrollment of 10 percent of the total undergraduate enrollment. With the present black enrollment, even 3 per cent would be an increase," said Quinn, commenting on the Administration's quoted figure of 2.7 per cent black enrollment this year.

"The Admissions office has been very helpful, especially Mr. (Lester H.) Dye," Clendeninn said.

The FAC has already spoken to hundreds of black students through assembly programs at many high schools this semester. "If we attract black students to SU, it will be to the benefit of the whole black student body. We don't want them to think SU is perfect; we want them to know what it's like and what they should prepare themselves for," Quinn said.

Clendeninn, commenting on the University's view of black recruitment, said: "The Administration's idea of attracting black students is to have their white students come in contact with minority opinion. However, our job is not to educate whites. In certain Public Affairs courses, the black students end up teaching the white students and even the teacher, because we've seen things they've never experienced."

Quinn also feels that the black student must not be looked upon as a "teaching device," but as a person wishing to pursue his own education. "If by educating white students we can get educated, that's fine. But that's not the way it's going here-- it's a one-sided deal. We know all about the white culture, but whites know very little about ours," Quinn said. "Educating the white man is not our problem -that's not what we're here for."

Both officers hope that their organization will contribute to black unity on campus, leading to a better understanding by whites of black culture and a feeling of mutual respect between blacks and whites.

"By being unified here," Clendininn said, "whites will be able to see what life will be like on the outside. They will eventually have to deal with unified groups of blacks. By bringing blacks together, whites must come to recognize blacks as a cultural group."

Working together

Mayor praises university-city relationship

By ROZ MAZER

In light of the expanded role many urban universities have assumed in recent years, not only in advisory and investigatory capacities but in directly confronting gut issues of the cities they inhabit, Syracuse Mayor William F. Walsh revealed some ideas on his conception of city-university relations.

"Relations have been closer in recent years. I guess it began with the Center for Continuing Education and then with the Minnowbrook and Sagamore conferences. These created a great awareness of the resources of the University on the part of the city and in the role the University can play in the life of the city.

"Out of this grew a mutual approach to the problems of the city and the University. As the University developed its research potential, the city was able to utilize the Research Center in a number of ways. Right now, we are using the University to help prepare applications for federal aid in law enforcement, code enforcement, and transportation."

The Mayor had mostly words of praise for the cooperation between SU and the city in traffic and street problems. He noted that Syracuse sold the University Walnut Park and made certain street changes so SU could build on the property it was sold. But when asked what the main problem areas are, Walsh mentioned two: parking and pollution abatement:

"I think one of the main problems is parking near the hospital. People don't realize that if we didn't enforce meter parking there wouldn't be any available parking space. The meters there are for turnover parking. If the students had their way they would park in these areas all day long."

Another problem the Mayor sees as creating a somewhat unhappy situation is pollution abatement with the University steam station.

"I understand it takes time and money. I believe they plan to spend a million dollars over the next couple of years to alleviate the problem."

Mayor Walsh seemed to disagree with Maxwell School Dean Alan K. Campbell who, in February 14th's Daily Orange, called the notion of the University eating up the tax base of the city as a "simplistic one" because of the large number of people SU employs. The Mayor explained city finance this way:

"There is so much income the property tax can bring into the city. If you look at it as a pie, any part of the pie that is cut out deprives the city of its potential income. The University takes out a substantial portion of property tax. During the last ten or twelve years the increase in the University's tax exempt property has been tremendous. (Tax exempted property at SU has increased $14 million or 113 per cent from 1954-1966). The fact that the University employs a certain number of people doesn't change one bit the fact that we are deprived of that potential. The property tax is the backbone of city financing. Because there is no income tax, the number of employees doesn't change the amount of money we get."

Mayor Walsh was hesitant to comment on the possibility of reinstating any direct social action programs like the Community Action Training Corps of 1965 which raised opposition because of the manner in which it was funded. Although he had no overriding philosophy on these programs, he said he would have to consider any specific proposals that would be presented to him. Walsh said, however, that students participating in such programs should "get involved rather than influence; understand rather than dictate."

The Mayor's main contention with regard to student programs that involve city problems is that he feels they are organized on the basis of a sporadic rather than consistent philosophy:

"There isn't a continuity of interests among students in the community. Many programs are conceived, many of them not even developed, where a group of students get together and say they're going to do something this week or this month without preparation for a permanent organization. The first couple of years at college, students probably aren't involved in these types of programs. By the last two years they're already thinking of moving on. If programs were set up under the auspices of, for example, the School of Education or the School of Social Work or the Metropolitan Studies Program, they should be set up on a permanent basis."

Citing the "scores and scores of areas" in which he feels students may participate in the community, Mayor Walsh mentioned Mental Health, child training, educating illiterate citizens, teaching mothers how to get maximum use out of surplus food, and "clean-up and fix-up programs" established on a year-round basis.

In summing up his feelings on the role of the university and the city, Mayor Walsh said:

"I would consider the University probably the biggest asset of the city. There is a skilled pool of professionals to which we can turn--everywhere from Metropolitan Studies to the School of Social Work down to research. The University has recognized the fact that the city has worked closely with them, it made certain that the Mayor is a member of the Board of Trustees. I think this is a very good thing."

Maxwell critic views Nixon cabinet choices

By LARRY KRAMER

In the first of a series of lectures, Professor Karl Schmidt of the Maxwell School spoke Wednesday to Zeta Beta Tau on the topic of the "Nixon Administration, and what to expect from it."

Schmidt, a strong anti-Nixon man during the campaign, nevertheless advocates a wait-and-see attitude. He pointed out that, "The nation didn't collapse on Jan. 21, as a lot of people predicted."

One of the first means of evaluating Nixon, according to Schmidt, is to look at his cabinet appointments. "He has made some excellent choices," commented Schmidt, "but he's also made some grave mistakes."

Remarking first on Nixon's top choices, Schmidt said, "(Robert H.) Finch is turning out to be one of the top people in Washington. His work in the Department of Health Education and Welfare has been quite a pleasant surprise." He added, "(William P.) Rodgers was a very good Attorney General, and I trust his work as Secretary of State will prove equally as well."

Schmidt had kind words of Henry Kissinger, Nixon's right-hand man on the Nationa Security Countil. "He adds a fresh look to the foreign policy area, and that new look is needed."

Among those not very high on Schmidt's list were Secretary of the Interior, Walter J. Hickel, and Secretary of Defense, Melvin Laird. Of Laird, Schmidt says, "Under him the military will be unleashed. The decision to pick Laird will turn out out to be a real disaster."

After his cabinet remarks, Schmidt went on to discuss Nixon's foreign and domestic policies. He gave Nixon a "mild plus" on foreign policy, if only for the reason that "the Anti-Communist crusade hasn't begun, as anticipated."

Domestically, Schmidt expressed some concern however, especially for consumer protection, problems of the inner city, and the Office of Emergency Planning, to be headed by Spiro Agnew. Schmidt called Agnew, "Something less than an inspiring choice."

Jim Brodsky, member of ZBT, asked Schmidt, "Could you apply the term 'untapped potential' to Spiro Agnew?"

DR. KARL SCHMIDT

Schmidt replied, "Yes, untapped potential for disaster."

Another member of the house, sophomore Jim Papadakis, asked a question on the Middle East situation. Schmidt felt that a lesser involvement by all major powers will probably come about, and he added his approval of this plan.

The final question of the evening was posed by Steve Hutler, coordinator of the speaker's program and student member of UJB. Hutler asked Schmidt to comment on Chancellor Tolley's recent remarks about "faculty as a threat to the University."

Schmidt listed an 'order of priority' of a University. The order is: 1) students, 2) faculty, 3) administration, 4) buildings, 5) athletic teams. He felt that the Chancellor's comments reflected a behind-the-times image.

Communication channel provided by GSO groups

By MARY McDANIEL

The locked doors of an Administration Building last spring and the subsequent discovery of "locked doors" in the channels of graduate student-faculty-administration communications were the prime movers in the establishment of what has been called, by certain University officials, one of the most potentially innovative and influential organizations on campus: the Graduate Student Organization (GSO).

Graduate students at Syracuse University traditionally have had no representative body encompassing all departments and disciplines, nor have they felt the need for one. The University itself, as of last spring, had nothing in its structure to provide for channelling of graduate communications to higher officials and administrators, leaving this responsibility to the various departments of the Graduate School.

If this arrangement had proven awkward before, it was blatantly proven last spring; in the wake of confrontation, positive action was initiated to provide graduate students with the voice and channel of communication, now obviously needed.

The steering committee of the Graduate Student Government, as it was then called, held its first meeting in July, 1968, in conjunction with an administration committee on graduate welfare headed by Dean James Harrison of the Graduate School.

At this time, Henry Bowman, chairman of the steering committee, set forth the purpose of the GSO as the "bringing together of representatives of various departments into a body concerned with issues affecting graduate student life," and the interpreting of graduate students needs to faculty and administrators, closing the communication gap which was a major block in the formation of a true University Community.

Of the original steering committee, Joan Howard and William Rubin are active senators in the organization. Donna Shalala, vice-chairman of the steering committee, is now an associate professor in the Maxwell School.

The steering committee then appointed graduate program liason personnel, students representing all degree-granting programs in the Graduate School, to stimulate interest in the organization within their departments.

A constitution committee, headed by Donna Shalala, prepared and drafted the organization's constitution, which was ratified by the senate in the fall.

Other interim committees formed at this time were the committee on community participation, (now the liason committee), chaired by Joan Howard; committee on operations, concerned with securing headquarters for the organization; and the committee on elections, which made arrangements with all graduate departments for the selection of their representatives.

On the basis of this groundwork, the GSO convened its first senate meeting on September 30. The final draft of the constitution was passed at the next two meetings, with amendments to the articles on membership and selection of delegates.

Its constitution passed, the organization has moved quickly toward obtaining full recognition from the University and the Board of Graduate Studies. Recognition by the Board followed a series of meetings between its executive committee and GSO executives; and in recent action, the Board granted full participating membership to the organization on its executive committee.

To date, the GSO has accomplished the original goal of the steering committee: the formation of a representative body of graduate students. 54 elected senators represent degree-granting programs within the areas of the humanities, social sciences, sciences, engineering, and the professions.

Nine senators-at-large currently represent special interest groups at the graduate level.

"Representativeness" is a key word in the organizational philosophy of the GSO. Through its system of departmental representation and its provision of the eeating of at-large delegates the GSO seeks to represent the graduate students on all levels.

The organization is a participant in the reorganization of the University Senate. It has been the channel of informatio: . .ne State Legislature where issues of vital concern to graduate students (i.e.: the status of the New York State Scholar Incentive awards) are being considered.

Its academic affairs committee, chaired by Robert Silver, is working in direct conjunction with the committee on graduate welfare of the Graduate Board under Dr. Theodore Denise.

Graduate representation on all-university committees affecting graduate students (i.e.: Council on Student Life, committee on the reorganization of the University Senate, centennial committee, University Union) is being obtained through the liason committee.

Graduate representatives are now on the committees for the selection of the Chancellor and the Dean of the College of Liberal Arts.

Recently, efforts of GSO representatives have precipitated the reorganization and redefinition of function of the CSL.

The GSO of Syracuse University is one of four of its kind in the country. Other organizations are on the campuses of the University of Michigan, Michigan State University and a west coast college.

SU graduate students, through their departmental representatives to the GSO, now have a direct channel of communication to the faculty and administration. Participation on GSO committees is open to any interested graduate student by contacting either the departmental representative or the appropriate committee chairman.

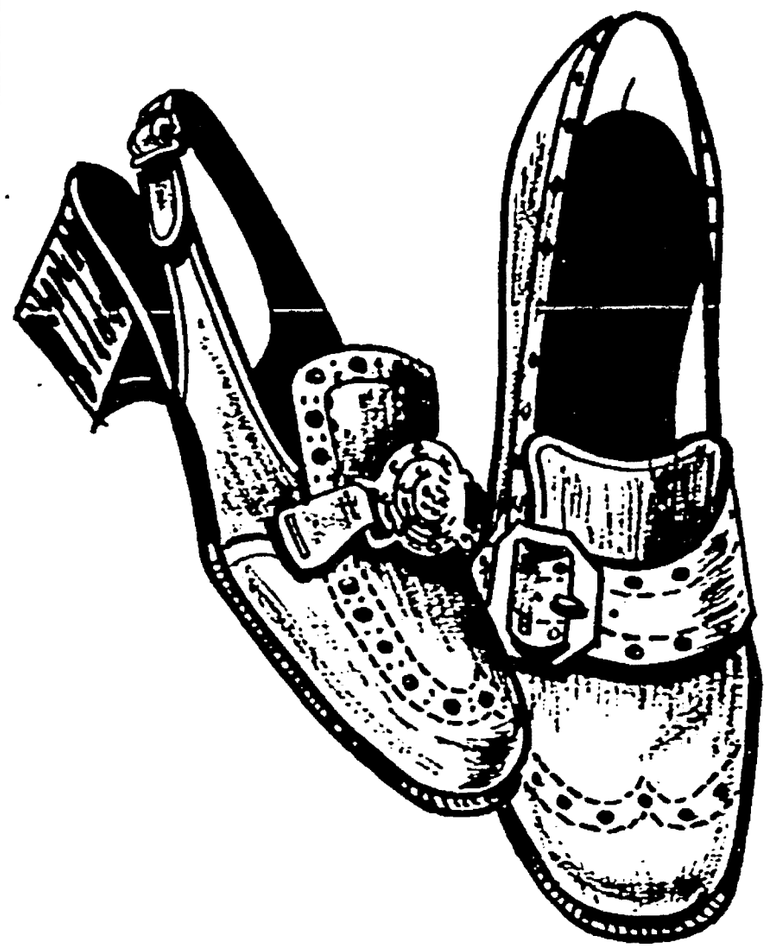
Scientists concerned about misuse of term 'strike' in describing symposium

By MARGARET ALLAN

Among the speakers at the March 4 science symposium at the Physics Building will be Dr. Daniel F. Jackson, professor of Civil Engineering.

As an expert in Environmental Pollution, Dr. Jackson will speak on the conservation of air and water resources. For several years he has been involved with county executives in his attempt to save Onondaga Lake, which he feels "has a great potential as an urban recreation area."



Complete schedule of March 4 symposium will appear in Tuesday's Daily Orange.

Unlike many observers, Dr. Jackson does not view Tuesday's symposium as a strike," he notes, adding that newspaper coverage may be implying actions that "mature scientists" are not taking.

"What we are concerned with is not a strike, but an evaluation...we'd like to see a reappraisal of the direction of work," declared Dr. Jackson. It is his intention to "reflect" on a topic which he believes is neglected. He indicated "a significant need for research" in his area.

Dr. Jackson will be joining other scientific researchers who are calling for a reallocation of research projects to areas which will benefit, rather than harm, mankind. However, he plans to do some "propagandizing" of his own next Tuesday. He thinks something can be done about environmental pollution; "people must be interested."

Media show after concert

Innovative experiment at Kimmel

When the Fifth Dimension play their final encore at the Winter Weekend Concert, the show will just be half-over. After the Friday night, Feb. 28, performance in the War Memorial, there will be a mixed media show and dance in Kimmel Dining Hall sponsored by Kimmel-Marion and the junior class.

Titled "Once Virgin Blood," a new, mixed experimental form of media show will start at 11:45 p.m. and be followed by a light show and dancing until 3 a.m. to the Sidewinders. Curfew was extended in order to permit students to attend what may be a unique attempt in new theatre.

Ken Grant, an electronic composition major, and his roommate Ted Kneeland are producing the show which will involve as many different mediums as possible. Music, drama, print, films, slides, lights, etc. are examples of the recipe for a mixed media event.

The Sidewinders

The distinguishing factor of "One Virgin's Blood" is the introduction of a theme into mixed media. Appealing to many levels of consciousness, the show will be inter-related by a message. Although obvious implications from the title lead one to guess that sex is the topic for Kimmel culture, that is not the case.

The theme will be relevant and it is very important for the fullest participation of the audience that everyone arrives by the beginning of the show. Tickets covering the light show, the Sidewinders band, and a final enticement of free beer are on sale in HBC lobby from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m.

Cost for ducats have been held to a minimum so that more students will be able to take part in the theatre experience and is $1.50 a couple and $1 stag. Tickets are in a limited supply but hopefully all those who wish to cram some cultural and social entertainment into one night will be accommodated.

Kimmel-Marion, in approaching the junior class, reached an agreement that "Once Virgin Blood" would round out the weekend in terms of adding more diversified entertainment, offering a place to go after the concert, and involving a dormitory and, more particularly, independents in the weekend.

Tickets will be on sale at the door and beer along with less intoxicating beverages will flow freely after the mixed media show. In the interest of a true aesthetic experience, no beer will be served before the show is over.

Fred Feld, X3109, will answer questions and fill requests for large blocks of tickets.

Our manufacturing program is for engineers who want to run things as well as design them.

Do you like the idea of running a factory as well as designing one? The idea of controlling the quality of products as well as developing systems to produce them? The idea of motivating people as well as supervising them?

If you do, you'll like the idea of the General Electric Manufacturing Management Program.

It'll prepare you for a management position in a variety of engineering areas: manufacturing engineering, plant engineering, quality control, materials management and factory management.

And don't let the "program" part throw you. You'll start working the first day. And you'll work hard. Because you'll be working on real problems. Problems that have to be solved now.

Separatism: beneficial or harmful to race dilemma?

Editor's note: The following articles came out of a Black and White in America discussion section, led by Larry Sampson. Sampson had the students in the class agree or disagree with the concept of separation of races. The articles here represent extreme points of view; a number of students took middle-of-the-road positions, advocating temporary separatism in hopes of future integration.

For separation

At this point in history, the only realistic solution to racial conflict lies in separatism. Separatism of blacks and whites.

In the past, it has been shown that the two races are unable to live peacefully together. Whites have always been controlled by their fear and hate for the black man. In turn, blacks have been controlled by their feelings of inferiority and hate for the white man.

What is now needed is a complete psychological revolution for blacks that cannot be effective in a mixed society. Blacks must be taught to appreciate black values, culture and etc. How can this possibly be accomplished with a white man present?

Too often, the white man has sold out the black community. Even today, in a smaller perspective, we can see where the white man is once again selling out the black students at this supposedly liberal college. The only way to gain power is to alienate those forces that would suppress you and deceive you.

Blacks need to develop community control. They need to develop a sense of pride and ambition. Through working together with other blacks, and not whites, this goal can be achieved.

The white man is incapable of understanding black needs. He is incapable of directing blacks toward black awareness. In effect, the white man cannot, now or ever, be an effective model for the black man.

Through the years we have often heard the phrase--"Pull yourselves up by the bootstraps." Well that is what black power is all about. Blacks will help themselves and they are going to do it without the "help and support" of the white man. Perhaps many years from now--if the black man develops a sense of pride and power--then we'll be able to talk about integration again. But at this stage, when so many blacks need to be educated in the culture of blackness--integration appears infeasible, detrimental and totally unrealistic.

Separatism is very beneficial to the black man. It seems to me that if a people chose to develop and enrich their own cultural heritage no one should have the audacity to question them Why is it necessary to assimilate into the mainstream of white America which has suppressed all attempts by the black man to establish himself? It sounds like a refreshing alternative to me.

Against separatism

I feel that a strict policy of separatism can only harm the issue of racism. By completely divorcing the interchange of ideas, thoughts and the physical, social, political, economic, religious and educational co-mingling of blacks and whites, we are hiding behind our own myopia. We are evading, dodging, or denying the basic truth: we are stating that we cannot accomplish anything together. We cannot live in one country but be equally divided into two (black and white.) Whether we want to admit it or not we are not two completely different species. Why divide and work for our own separate and probably selfish goals at the expense of the "other," when in common we could achieve so much more. I think that black studies programs are necessary, but let's clarify the aims: for a better understanding of the black man, his history and his past plight--not to emphasize and clearly define differences which in the future, and ever after, should be prescribed to. Why should we look on a black studies program any differently than at a course on the cultural patterns of Japan or African art, etc. Unity is sought--fine--then let Black Panther groups be established and flourish, but do not confine interests only to the black man. Exclusive clubs have been in existence since organizations first began (on a childish level there are no boys in girl scouts), but the basic aims and purpose of such clubs is what is important. The question is one of outlook--trying to view the situation beyond your own immediate perspective. How can one condone separation when the alternative has not ever been attempted on a large scale. With a strict policy of separation we are only defeating ourselves. We are admitting that there are blatant, observable differences and that we cannot exist peace[illegible]v together. We are seeking answers which ave unity, because maybe this is what we really want though we will not dare to admit it. It might be enlightening to ask any person who advocated a strict policy of separation how many black people they know, how many they have come into contact with.

Responsive theater

'Three Penny Opera' opens SRT new season

By PATTI WILLIAMS
Associate Editor

Theater that responds to what's happening now is this season's aim of the Syracuse Repertory Theater, says Rex Henriot, managing editor of the Syracuse Repertory Theater.

"Both in form and content the plays we're doing this season deal with what's going on now," said Henriot. "The oldest play we're doing was written 43 years ago."

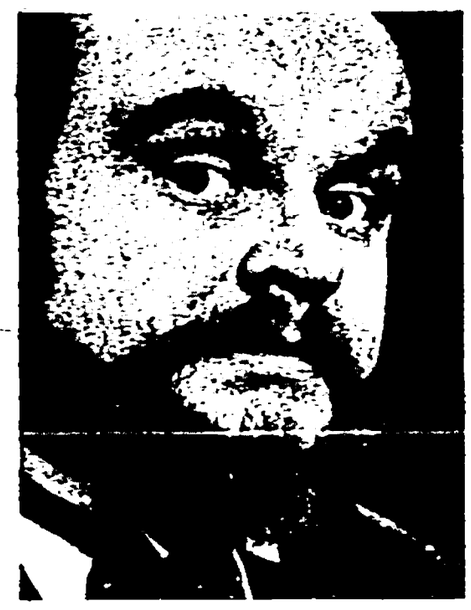
The S.R.T. began its season last night with Bertolt Brecht's "Threepenny Opera." This play contains the famous song "Mack the Knife."

Henriot said like Mack, everyone in the play is cruel and without a redeeming feature. One of the often quoted lines is "What keeps a man alive? He lives on others."

Although the play depicts the lower class of London in the late 1800's, Henriot said it has contemporary significance.

"Brecht prevents you from becoming emotionally involved in the play because he wants you to watch intellectually," said the director. "If you don't like his view of the world, he wants you go to out and do something about it."

Following "Threepenny Opera," the S.R.T. presents Luigi Pirandello's "Six Characters in Search of an Author."



" 'Six Characters' is kind of the father of modern theater," said Henriot. "It deals with 'What is man?' He's one thing to himself and another thing to others."

After "Six Characters," Harold Pinter's "The Homecoming" opens. Henriot calls it "the most controversial play done on Broadway in the last 50 years." According to him, it deals with the relationships among the members of a family when one of them returns home bringing his wife for the first time.

Next will be Christopher Fry's "The Lady's Not for Burning." It's a verse comedy that Henriot says "talks in modern terms." It's about a man, tired of living, who wants to be hanged until he falls under the spell of a girl about to be burned as a witch.

The final play of the season will be an anti-war play called "Summertree." It was written by 23-year-old Ron Cowen last year and it deals with the Vietnam war.

This year each play will be presented on two consecutive weekends (Thursday through Sunday), unlike last year when the plays were done in repertory. "In repertory" means that one play alternates with another so that one one night you might have one show and the next night have a different one.

Edgar Daniels, who plays J.J. Peachum, the head of a group of beggars, in the Syracuse Repertory Theater's production of "Threepenny Opera." Daniels has had major roles in such Broadway shows as "Man for all Seasons" and "Baker Street."

Two of the actors this season, Erica Yohn and Edgar Daniels, are former members of the Repertory Company of the Lincoln Center in New York. They have also both had major roles in Broadway plays, Miss Yohn in "Caucasian Chalk Circle" and Daniels in "Baker Street," among their many credits.

Collin Hamilton, who was in the Broadway hit "Joe Egg" until it was forced to close by the actors' strike, is another addition to the S.R.T. this season. He's appeared in shows ranging from Shakespeare to a political satire on the LBJ administration.

Returning to the S.R.T. is Adail O'Brien, who has been with the S.R.T. since it began. Last summer, in addition to playing parts in commercial theater, she also acted with a group that produces plays for inmates of New York State penal institutions in and around New York City.

With the S.R.T. for the "Threepenny Opera" are Michael Norell, who plays Mack, and Alice Cannon who plays Mack's girlfriend, Polly Peachum. Norell is a former drama critic who's done regional theater work. Miss Cannon is a graduate of Cornell University and played the female lead in "The Fantasticks" Off-Broadway.

This season is a critical one for the S.R.T. because, for the first time, the S.R.T. is without a foundation grant. According to Henriot, this season will probably determine whether or not the S.R.T. survives.

"Everyone thinks we are safe and secure with Syracuse University," said the director. "They should be aware that the S.R.T. can't be supported forever by a university which has money problems of its own."

This lack of knowledge about the theater is typical, according to Henriot. He says people are so naive about the theater that some have asked him why actors should be paid. He even said one woman was surprised to learn that before a play is presented it is rehearsed.

What role, the university?

Our final supplement attempts to touch upon some of the sensitive and debated points concerning the role of the university. It is an ancient debate, usually resolved in America on the basis of what are the immediate needs of society and where does the money lie? Today the stalwart defenders of the detached, apolitical institution must answer the perceptive observations of Dwight Waldo in "The University as a Power Center." Chancellor Tolley has indicated where the answer may lie in "Searching for the stars that guide us." So we end, as we began, with a question Where do you stand?

SU plans residence college

Academics in the home

By EVAN RICHERT
Managing Editor

Syracuse University has deliberately become an urban university. The reason for this, say university officials, is to establish a more complete intellectual and cultural environment than could be provided by the classroom alone.

Yet, most educators concede, when the student leaves the classroom, he in effect leaves the University. A major reason is that Syracuse University, like every major expanding university, suffers under the curse of impersonality.

The result is that the role of the University is drastically and perhaps tragically narrowed to one of pure academics.

The social and psychological experiences of the student are left to grow without the stimulation of the University. And when the student's culture becomes one of student politics, fraternities and "fun," say the educators, the extension of the influence of the classroom into life and leisure is effectively resisted, and originality often stifled.

Confronted with the developments of the growing urban university, there is now a movement afoot to bring the intellectual experience to the student's home, the dormitory.

The movement is toward a "residence college," a concept already introduced at numerous universities in the U.S. It has received the enthusiastic backing of both faculty and administration members here, and at least one committee has its sights set on next fall for the baptism of SU's first such college.

"It has become painfully apparent that our large and impersonal dormitories are inadequate," says the Danforth report, perpared in 1967 by four administrators and faculty members.

The residence college would transform the dormitory into a kind of living-learning center where students, faculty and curriculum would meet to form the elusive "academic community."

It would house classrooms, faculty and administrative offices next door to the student's living room, in an attempt to crash the communication barrier now plaguing the student and professor.

Must raise questions

The university: molder of society

"As an undergraduate I was displeased that the graduate assistants were given complete control of the class," remarked Ted Estess, graduate teaching assistant under religion professor, David Miller. Estess, thinking back to his days as an undergraduate at Baylor University in Texas, found conflicts and contradictions in the purpose of a university.

"One cause for some alarm is that the grad school takes the primary place the majority of time, and money and interest are directed toward graduate students. So undergraduates are shortchanged."

He thought the graduate teaching assistant could be helpful in the teaching of undergraduates but was against them being free to run the class. He also acknowledged, however, that "one business of the university is to teach teachers. Being a graduate assistant has been an apprenticeship." He plans to teach upon completing his PhD.

Estess thought the purpose of a college education was both to prepare students for their future work and to give them a broad background.

"Society expects colleges and universities to prepare students for jobs. But it must also raise the questions of values, life styles, and meaning. They are not necessarily contradictory. Each must be made to contribute to the other."

"In both of these functions the university makes a contribution to society. Can you expect society to support the university if it doesn't answer this need? The university must in addition raise the same questions to society that it raises to students on a personal level."

The university should not be so dependent on society that it cannot raise the questions that may give rise to proposals for radical change in society, he thought. The student must have one place he can go where he can ask what the alternatives are for his life.

"At all times society needs an institution that raises these questions. It has to come from somewhere."

Although it must perform this vital critical function, Estess said the university is closely tied to the society. "When you try to talk about the relation of the university to society, the university is so close it's difficult to extricate it." This closeness, especially the universities' dependency on outside financial help, makes it difficult for the university to question some aspects of society too seriously.

"All of us are caught in that bind, wanting to preserve society and yet hoping to change it. We must preserve certain values but occasionally chang eht structure of things."

Because the university is expected to prepare students for jobs, Estess thought that it tends to overemphasize specialization in educaiton. He preferred a liberal education but "a liberal education now seems to me also a fragmented, disintegrated experience. I think this relates to the course."

"For my own education I want a more cross-disciplinary inter-disciplinary study. Breadth. Not a superficial approach, but to have some general competence."

The ability to generalize or find breadth in learning, Estess said, depended in large part upon the students own motivations. He saw this motivation in people between 35 and 40 years old more often than he saw it in college students.

"I have the feeling many undergrads would really rather not be here. They would rather be doing something else. But society really doesn't offer them much choice."

He thought the university of the future "must solve the problem of mass. That's the critical issue right here. How do you achieve personal participation in a mass university system? That's part of the problem in today's student disorders."

He added that the university of the future must at all costs preserve the dialogue between people, "the dance of ideas between individuals."

Ted Estess

A residence college at SU...

The 1967 Danforth report, prepared by Assistant Dean of Liberal Arts Alfred H. Cope and three professors, made the first formal proposal for a residence college at SU. The report urged that one dormitory be set aside for assignment to Liberal Arts freshmen electing to enter a residence group with an integrated living and study program.

The proposal last spring received the official recommendation of the University Senate.

Currently, a Pinebrook committee chaired by AWS president Cindy Bailey is working toward a residence college for September. One-tenth of the incoming freshmen, according to the plan, would be selected for the college, and would remain for their first two-years--the years most noted for educational irrelevance and disillusionment.

Miss Bailey said yesterday that although the administration appears somewhat skeptical of the September deadline, her committee is now getting down to specifics and is "hopeful" for the fall date.

Administration and faculty support of the concept is encouraging. The idea was, in fact, theirs.

"Modern civilization," according to Dean Cope, "simply has too many people. The result is massive institutions, and between the massive institutions and the individual are very few intermediate, personal intellectual associations."

He believes the resident college can be an intermediary. "The resident college," he says, "is not meant to just find a new way of teaching, or to try permissive rules and regulations, but is meant to find a more direct development of the individual."

According to Chancellor William P. Tolley, "...residence colleges would provide a much closer relationship between students and faculty and make possible needed experimentation with curricular materials and new approaches to learning."

Dr. Michael O. Sawyer of the Maxwell School also sees the resident college as a way of bridging the student-professor gap.

"In this age of specialization," he says, "there are all sorts of forces driving students and faculty members in different directions. The residence college is one way to help bring them together. It's the best scheme I know."

The real question no longer is whether there will be a residence college or colleges at SU, but rather how they will work.

The consensus appears to be that the college would be for underclassmen-freshmen and sophomores. "My personal feeling is that it should not be a four-year college but a college for freshman or a college for freshmen and sophomores," says Chancellor Tolley.

"It is at the freshman and sophomore years that undergraduate education needs overhauling."

"In the first two years," Miss Bailey points out, "the student is forced to take an unrelated dabbling of subject matter that has little relevance."

It is also in the first two years that the student begins to find that he is but one cog in the multiversity machine, and, says Miss Bailey, the residence college will aid in curing his "disillusionment."

Most also seem to agree that the student make-up of at least the initial residence college should be

Tolley on today's university

Searching for the stars that guide us

Editor's note: The following is from the January Alumni News by Chancellor William P. Tolley.

To be educated involves more than disciplined intelligence, more than encyclopedic living. It is the possession of knowledge developed with moral sensitivity. It is the knowledge of one who is also a moral and spiritual being. The university is dedicated to freedom of inquiry, but it is also concerned with a civilized life, and so with honor and courage, the dignity of man, and the pursuit of moral, intellectual, and aesthetic excellence.

Beauty and goodness are as important as truth. Each of the three is essential. We have reached a point in the organization of society where the problems of beauty and goodness are far more vexing than those of knowledge. More attention to these elements is long overdue.

In our technological culture we have been concerned with the improvement of machines. The thrust of science and technology has been to master nature, control energy, and automate production. In building the most affluent society this planet has ever seen, we have given too little attention to the aesthetic and spiritual needs of man. As a consequence, we have wasted natural resources, polluted lakes and streams, produced smog and toxic air, slums and ghettos, and some of the ugliest cities in the world. Moreover, many of the suburbs are as tasteless, unimaginative, and poorly planned as the cities they surround.

Almost none of the problems introduced by the industrial revolution has been solved. To be sure, we have much shorter working hours for labor, infinitely better working conditions, much higher pay, greater security, and a significant improvement in education. These are no mean achievements. Indeed, they are without parellel in the history of man. Nonetheless, the problem of ugliness is with us on a greatly exploded scale, and with it the problems of race, housing, welfare, education, pollution, and all the rest. To design a society for man, instead of subordinating man to the needs of an economic society, is the great challenge of our time. It is not only our chief domestic problem but is also the central problem of developing countries in every part of the globe.

When Thomas Carlyle was writing in 1831 he observed that "Soot and despair are not the essence of (the industrial revolution). . .; they are divisible from it." We should all agree. To separate them, however, to make them divisible from it, we need a major readjustment in our scale of interests and values.

If an adequate education involves attention to arts, ideas, and values—what about ideas? Fortunately, one doesn't have to argue about the importance of ideas in a college or university. Periodically, however, we need to make sure that the university really is a free market for ideas.

Other institutions may have equal influence in the shaping of character or the encouragement and development of religious faith. But not even a free press renders so great a service in freedom to challenge, criticize, and create. In a university there are no forbidden subjects or forbidden ideas. If Senators McCarthy and McGovern are welcome to speak at Syracuse, so are Governor Wallace and Senator Muskie. If we permit Timothy Leary to speak, we also provide our students with an opportunity to talk with recruiting teams from the Armed Services and corporations like Dow Chemical.

Open recruitment in the University Placement Office, an open platform for controversial speakers, open debate and discussions of any idea—these are evidence of the university's commitment to freedom in the search for truth regardless of the tides of public opinion or the resistance of dissident students or faculty members. It should be noted, however, that we make no claim to the possession of truth. We have no brief for the views of any member of our faculty, or any of our guests. Our interest is to make sure that there is no interference with freedom of thought and speech. What we hold in trust is the quest for truth, the freedom to ask questions, the opportunity to seek knowledge and understanding.

Everything we have said about the search for beauty and truth applies to our search for ethical and spiritual values. To some questions we have no ready answers. Nevertheless, we are not neutral about our dream of a democratic society or our ideals of justice, brotherhood and freedom. The goals are clear even if we may not always agree as to the means to achieve them. Again we are not indifferent to the importance of religious faith or silent on life's deepest questions. We are a privately endowed university, not an agency of the state. We, therefore, have both an opportunity and a duty in this neglected area. But while we have vital interests and concerns, and with them minds and hearts and consciences at work, the accent is on the search. There is no place in a university for arrogance or dogma.

The university is not Madison Avenue. It is not a propaganda bureau. It is not a political party. It is not an organization for social change, except as education is always a means to social advance. The function of the university is education and only education. It exists to provide a home for learning, a place for objective, disinterested study, and for instruction, training and research.

What students and faculty hold in common is the quest for beauty, the search for truth and goodness. And with this quest, of course, are dreams of a new and more perfect city and of a truly great society responsive to the highest human hungers. Nonetheless, we approach all problems with humility. We are better at raising questions than we are in answering them. And because the answers are not final our search is never over.

Saint-Exupery reminds us that, "If the traveller, climbing a mountain toward a star, becomes too absorbed in the problem of climbing, he may forget which star is guiding him. If he moves only for the sake of movement he will reach no destination."

We all need this reminder. In particular, those of us who hold universities in trust need to look beyond the many problems that beset us to sense the purpose of our undertaking and to see the stars that guide us.

Academic restructuring

Let students teach

By NANCY SARGENT

Given: the private university unless restructured cannot survive. Suggested: the private university be restructured to provide instruction and pursue research on the basis of benefit and necessity.

Today's students object especially to feelings of anonymity in relation to their professors and irrelevancy with regards to their course work. The dirth of qualified teachers plagues almost all private universities with resulting overcrowded classes and an inevitable academic distance between students and faculty.

Tradition perpetrates this lack of relationship as it offers forth an aloof scholar protected from his students by mysterious yet secure social taboos. The student acknowledges the teacher as the possessor of wanted knowledge and expertise, but the likelihood of interaction between these two is small, and hence the possibility of the student's benefitting from the professor's attributes also slight.

Yet definitely, even those students who demand the university become progressively more active in policy research, determination and instigation where very significant social issues external to the university are involved, want the institution to continue in its internal instructional role. Possible restructuring so as to make peer group instruction the core of the academic experience is the answer.

Both the benefits in and necessities for such a transition are clear. The lack of personnel at the teaching level is answered. The academic and social distancing factor is overcome. What is more, interaction among students necessitates individual and group development of competency. And certainly there is no better way to learn, that is develop expertise in a field, than to teach it.

Removing much of the lecture burden off the faculty opens tremendous possibilities in terms of research. As the professor is free to pursue new thought patterns and channel himself toward adapting them to societal needs he becomes even more valuable as a resource for the students. Majors and graduate students in seminars can tap the scholar for insight and new data and then transfer and translate these to their fellows.

Economically, socially and personally a peer group based instruction system seems extremely advantageous. Hence, it may be a wise direction towards which dying private universities should turn.

Causes 'divisiveness and suspicion'

Faculty member denounces Tolley speech

February 27, 1969

To the Chancellor:

It was with no small degree of consternation that I read the text of Chancellor William P. Tolley's recent address to the Onondaga County Bar Association. The Chancellor argued his views on the "current education scene" clearly and forcefully. The content and general orientation of the speech, however, leads one to carefully consider several of the points advanced in greater detail. For if Dr. Tolley has accurately portrayed the state and nature of dissenting groups and faculty members, it should be of grave concern to us all.

Of the seven points made by Chancellor Tolley, the first four are relatively moderate. It is generally accepted that the mass media often focus disproportionate attention on campus disorders, although agents of the mass media have generally refrained from describing the actions of student radicals as "the public tantrums of undisciplined brats." There should be little objection to the points that parents influence the political views of their children more than is generally accepted or admitted, nor to the generalization that "youth rebellions are world wide." The thesis that the great majority of college youngsters are "wonderful" is probably even a valid value judgement.

I cannot, however, agree with the implication that in order for students to remain "wonderful" they continue to print meaningless social prattle on the mall fence and resists political forms of expression engaged in by so-called "abrasive, arrogant, rude....(and) unwashed" activists.

There is admittedly an element of misapplied Marxism and inflammatory rhetoric manifest in a number of radical student organizations, but to argue that the major problem in dealing with dissidents is "to endure them until they grow up" reflects an intellectual rigidity which would serve only to stifle the consideration of ideas considered too juvenile to be tolerated. Such an approach would exacerbate tensions and promote the likelihoo;of confrontation, developments which Dr. Tolley evidently deplores but has unwittingly fostered.

The remaining three points made by the Chancellor are of a more disturbing nature. Black student demands, it is argued, should be acted upon quickly when reasonable and rejected when unreasonable. What force is to determine the limits of reason is left undefined, and it is also left unclear as to who would fill the blacks' cup of "tender loving care" when it needs replenishing. Especially disturbing about Dr. Tolley's approach to black grievances is that he is unwilling to accord white radicals the same rule of reason he extends to black students. While black activists have "real grievances" to be considered judiciously, it is implied that white radicals have manufactured grievances which should be endured "until they grow up." Should this inconsistency be interpreted as a problem of inverse racism or practical campus politics?

The other two problems outlined by the Chancellor are quite similar since they appear to come from the same unsavory source...the faculty, or at least an element within the faculty. It is primarily charged that recent campus unrest "could have been easily controlled but for the faculty." The evidence advanced to support this contention is a statement by Provost Truman of Columbia - rather limited docuamentation to offer for so sweeping an indictment. Moreover, the attempt to find scapegoats for existing problems does little to attack the underlying causes of campus unrest. Much to his credit, Chancellor Tolley fought against those who saw university problems in the fifties as caused by a few dangerous "subversives" on the faculty. It is therefore especially disturbing to read arguments which are so reminiscent of the scapegoating one who has traditionally stood against such methods.

To compound the sins of the faculty, Chancellor Tolley further argues that along with labor unions, students, legislatures, and perhaps even the courts, the same few professors are engaged in a struggle for "power without responsibility." If the sin of the faculty is to attempt to power, as is implied, there should be neither guilt nor misgivings. There is simply no effective argument advanced as to exactly how increased faculty voice in administrative matters would lead to a change in "the nature and purpose of the university."

By drawing a comparison between "certain faculty groups" and pompous parrots, chattering monkeys, braying asses and ostriches, Dr. Tolley simply does himself a disservcie and embarrasses the university community in general. Is there no better manner in which to communicate disenchantment with faculty members other than a public speech? Certainly institutionalized channels of communication are more operative.

Lecturer Morgner

The charge that the "new left" among faculty members, which Dr. Tolley leaves undefined as to ideology, program and personnel, wishes to make the university a "propaganda agency" which would "deny dissent to anyone who disagrees" is perhaps the gravest issue of all. The denial of dissent to students, or any other group, is even greater intellectual chicanery than enduring dissent until it disappears and should not be protected under academic freedom, tenure, nor any other device. Syracuse University has its obvious disadvantages and weaknesses, but as yet I have not met nor heard of colleagues who are dedicated to "announcing what the truth is" and stifling any dissenting voices.

If the Chancellor has evidence to support his contentions, it might prove beneficial to clear the air and produce it. Until this is done, the Chancellor has discredited the university through the nature of his address and has cast a pale of divisiveness and suspicion over the relations among students, faculty members and administrative officials.

Sincerely,
Fred G. Morgner

'The University as Power Center'

Knowledge at university is power

Dwight Waldo, a Maxwell professor of political science and public administration who also holds the Schweitzer Chair in the Humanities, has an article entitled "The University as a Power Center" appearing in the Winter Volume of the Maxwell Review.

The article first appeared as an address delivered at the inauguration of Ferrel Heady as President of the University of New Mexico, Nov. 9, 1968.

Waldo is in his second year at Syracuse University after having taught at the University of California at Berkley. There he observed some of the first stages of campus unrest that have since spread throughout the country.

While Waldo recognizes that the university's role and involvement in its community is changing, he said in an interview yesterday that the university will still not be free to effect a social reconstruction. "No society will set up an institution to destroy that society. It always has to be acceptable enough to be there."

Waldo indicated that while the barriers between the academic and non-academic world are dropping, what the final result will be is hard to predict The lines between the two worlds "are anything but clear."

In his article, Waldo suggests that more government regulation in some form may develop in universities. He says that he would prefer this sort of regulation of a more general nature than that which might be imposed by a college committee lacking a generalist's perspective.

Waldo laments the extent to which campus disorder has gone and said that no "significant student revolution" could succeed without aid from the faculty.

The text of the Waldo article appears below.

What was on my mind when I chose the title, "The University as a Power Center," was this: One of the prominent and arresting theses in the recent writings undertaking to tell us where we are and the direction in which we move is that "knowledge"--or a certain kind of knowledge--has more power than it had in the past, and that in the future it will be even more powerful.

For comparative purposes let me recall some of the argument made by John Kenneth Galbraith in "The New Industrial State"--"new industrial" rather than "post industrial," but for present purposes, no matter. Put down beside Bell's argument it illustrates the difficulties that are presented in trying to reason from the general position that knowledge is becoming the prime mover of a new society to any specific conclusion about the nature, function and future of the university.

Galbraith argues that in human experience--in the history of the West at least--there have been three bases of power, that is, basic sources of wealth and of the exercise of dominion by some over others. The first was land. The second, associated with the rise of industrialism, was capital. The third, now well along towards replacing capital, is knowledge. Or more exactly, organized knowledge. Knowledge organized and applied by the leadership of the modern industrial enterprise, by what he designates as the technostructure, is the pivot of the contemporary American reality.

Galbraith and Bell present contrasting emphases, not unrelated perhaps to the fact that one is an economist and the other a sociologist. Galbraith is interested in knowledge-in-action, in production precisely, and all else tends to be derivative or secondary. But there are many insightful, or at least arresting, implications pertaining to the problems and potentialities of the university drawn from his theses. Bell asserts the primacy of theoretical knowledge: "What has now become decisive for society is the centrality of theoretical knowledge, the primacy of theory over empiricism and the codification of knowledge into abstract systems of symbols. . . ." He seeks to draw out the meaning of this (I refer to his "Notes on the Post-Industrial Society," in The Public Interest) thesis for a new condition of man, in an analysis that ranges across all major institutions. But the university, not the technostructure, is at the center of his attention. He presumes that the university will be the "central institution" of the next hundred years, as the business firm has been of the past hundred.

Both in their convergence and in their divergence Galbraith and Bell are instructive. They are as one in telling us that societal changes of the most fundamental sort are under way and that the institutions and processes of higher education are at or near the center of these changes. But despite a significant amount of agreement on the general nature and direction of these changes there are notable differences in emphasis and diagnosis. Neither of them sets out, of course, with the end in view of giving guidance to harried university officials, but it is obvious that if they undertook to do so their prescriptions might differ.

We come to this: If we accept as valid--as I do--the proposition that knowledge, or more precisely certain types, configurations or applications of knowledge, have increasing power in human affairs and that this knowledge increasingly is centered in and emanates from the university, then we must accept the conclusion that the university is a "power center." Or, if you don't like that, a center of power or at least at the center of conflicting powers. But what this means is not at all clear.

The ideal university

Prof. Meiklejohn: the theme is unity

By DONALD MEIKLEJOHN
Professor of Philosophy

Editor's note' The following is reprinted with permission from the July, 1968 issue of Alumni News.

A University is a place where even parents can learn. This may express a hope more than an achievement, yet it is, I am sure, thoroughly defensible. For a university it, negatively, not only a college--a place for undergraduates merely, where young people receive that concluding general education that fits them for adult life. Nor is a university, in our context, merely a graduate school, or a collection of graduate schools, in which our future professionals are to be trained. A university is not even, primarily, a place in which future professional scholars and teachers are to be trained. A university must have an undergraduate college, and graduate schools too. But it must have also the capacity to educate those whose current role in American life we may thoroughly designate as parental. In this sense, a university is the natural enemy of that intellectual tranquility into which, at long last, any good citizen may decently decline after the intellectual agitation of his college days.

Clark Kerr, whose successes and troubles at the University of California surely qualify him to speak on this topic, has coined the term "multiversity" to apply to the many great educational aggragations which now adorn the American landscape. The term clearly is responsive to that great variety of activities which these aggragations carry on. In addition, "multiversity" appears to reflect that attachment to pluralism to flexibility, to tolerance which have since the last great war achieved such popularity in American political thought. Yet so emphatic and insistent on multiplicity in American universities seems surely a sad concession of defeat. For it appears to concede that we cannot make any really coherent sense of theses institutions--that the best they can do is efficiently to serve the unrelated interests of an indefinite number of customers, that they should muster up faculties whose excellence consists in attracting to the academic premises maximum numbers of students and government grants.

A university is not a universe. Though I speak as one whose life has been lived for the most part in academic surroundings, and as one deeply grateful for the kind of life which that makes possible in America, still I think it is essential to acknowledge the university's limits--to state those principles which literally define the university, and which distinguished it from the non-university world which lies outside it. Please note that I say "distinguish," and not "separate." I am sure that continuities and conversations between the university and the outside world have to be strengthened and enriched indefinitely. There can be no wall of separation around any campus. Yet the university will not play its proper role if on its campus there is not an entirely distinctive mode of activity.

A university is not just a haphazard collection of separate, financially solvent activities; a university is not the sum of all the activities which a human society carries on. A university is a unity--a university is not all. What kind of unity, then, should a university exhibit, or seek?

Though I am uncertain how the word "university" came into being, I suppose that it reflects the notion that in it attention was turned toward everything. The university was the place where anyone in the universe could come with any question about the universe, to receive there a thoughtful and responsible answer, an asnwer potentially relevaant anywhere in the universe. In any given society, then, a university would have the kind of unity, or the lack of it, which is found in the process of raising and answering questions. What kind of questions? All those about the conceptions of the universe in which that society is set, to which that society is responsive.

To talk about the university in America, then, is to talk about America, and Americans; it is to talk about those who commission the university, those persons--and of course this means you--who commend to it their most treasured possessions, their children, or their somewhat less treasured possessions, that is, their money. To criticize the American university is beside the point, except as it is seen in relation to its society. To find the university disunified is only significant as one reflects on our society's unity or the lack of it. To find the university eager, hospitable, cooperative but also inarticulated, sprawling, drowned in computerized mass production techniques, as so many are, is only to see it as a reflection of that larger society which also is delightfully friendly and deplorably confused. We please everyone, as well as wy can, and we have no standard to criticize pleasures and put them in right relations with one another.

The question I am trying to formulate here is the modern expression of that inquiry which Plato long ago set forth in his Republic: how can a city, which is many, become one? I have been suggesting that the university quite naturally draws its existence and its function, from its undertakings which American society asks it to carry out, and that the university is incoherent because American society is incoherent, too. The university can hardly achieve a greater unity than the society which is its parent, its own alma mater. And so I am saying, the university is the victim of modern culture; it serves a society which does not really understand its mission in the universe.

Now to this, in principle, either of two rejoinders might be offered. You might say that American society has in fact a unity to which this analysis does not accord adequate recognition. Or you might say that the university can find its own principles of coherence, and then can--through training its young--impart these to the society. The first of these, when it is taken to an extreme, runs the risk--as in the totalitarian--of making the university a shadow or image of the political ical ideals of the country. The second hopefully declares that if the university faculties and officials are wise enough, if they can successfully mingle principle and practice, then we can achieve that rule by philosophers which was Plato's dream, and which could transform a confused America into a well-organized human enterprise.

Both these suggestions have their possibilities, both have their followers. Many Americans put first in the university's responsibilities its conformity to the nation's values and traditions; and as our universities become more and more to depend on public funds, this conception is likely to gain ever wider acceptance. On the other side, a smaller but no less devoted band of Americans, both inside the university and outside, look with distrust and fear upon makithe university a mere instrument of political or social forces. The university must stand apart, must criticize, they say--it is from an independent university that the ultimate intellectual direction of society must come.

Neither of these suggestions is intellectually satisfactory; both suffer from acceptance of a separation between the outside world, and the university; both cnceive the relation between the two, in a merely external fashion. We cannot just tell universities to be American in the sense that it is just a red, white and blue American, a textbook version of Constitutional government and free enterprise. But neither can the university hope to make American society over on the pattern of Plato's republic.

The University is a place for learning, and for the scholarship which disciplines and promotes learning. And the unity of the university must be found in the processes of learning and scholarship. The simplest fact about our universities is that they do not, to their students or to the students' parents, really make clear what learning is, or what scholarship is, or what their uses can be to the community. Needless to say, by the same token, there is a like failure of communication of purpose toward the community. The problem, as well as the opportunity of the university, is so to bring itself, and its students, into the context of the outside community so that the students will understand that frontier of understanding and culture which the community has obtained, and will see where it is the community is now trying to go. They will come to see that learning is simply the community in the process of development.

It often has been thought that the purpose of undergraduate education at least is to bring the students up to date, so to speak, with the intellectual achievements of his culture, to enable him to go on from a college to the grand common adventure of developing that science, that practical wisdom that taste which the modern community still has in such small measure.

The university needs to become so involved with the community that the community is seen as needing, asking for, and responding to the process of learning. The community must so far take on the learning habits of the university that it is self-consciously asking itself, and especially its younger members, how it can more nearly fulfill the promises which have constituted American life. The primary task of an America that will achieve a really effective understanding between the generations is to develop universities in which the young can see and believe that their parents are willing to learn--and, even more amazing, are able to learn as well.

Professor Meiklejohn

mixed, rather than, say, all engineer majors or journalism majors. Liberal Arts students, therefore, probably would be selected.

Such a make-up would be conducive to an experimental curriculum. The Pinebrook committee's plans would call for "a lot of independent studies," according to Miss Bailey, and would permit the student "to pursue out of the ordinary disciplines" in an attempt to make the education relevant to the individual.

Most of the courses would be taught in the dormitory classrooms. According to Dr. Tolley's idea, science courses would continue to be offered on the main campus but in the freshman year at least all other courses could be offered in these classrooms.

Chancellor Tolley also would call for a library, music listening room and language laboratories in the dormitory.

The major obstacle, of course, is money, particularly when the planning begins to include more than one residence college. Dormitories for example, would have to be remodeled to accommodate the educational facilities and apartments for faculty-in-residence.

But other universities apparently think they can overcome the financial barrier. The University of Michigan has had a "pilot program" in effect since 1962.

These universities also have found that the student's experiences outside the classroom on the fringe of the academic world, are powerful agents for change, and that it is desirable to help develop them.

They have attempted to recover some of the academic and social interplay that characterizes the traditional small liberal arts college, while still reaping the benefits of a metropolitan university.

Despite the obvious difficulties, I suggest that the foundation for intelligent action in many spheres of perplexity and travail is in addressing ourselves frontally and energetically to finding out what it means. That is, to assessing the degree and the types of truth in the proposition, and in drawing out the implications for possible actions and desirable actions. My argument is not that this will give "answers;" its effect in many cases will be to question answers already given. What is proposed is adoption of a perspective which, certainly better than most, enables us to view ourselves "from the outside." Or if you prefer: the adoption of a hypothesis about ourselves to be examined speculatively and critically, and to be tested empirically for its correctness and relevance.

Now it is proper for you to ask--and you probably are--whether I can illustrate the "yield" from my proposal, or at least indicate the type of insight or wisdom to which it gives rise. I will try to do so, but I want to do two things by way of preface. One is to suggest a "perspective on the perspective." The other is to say something about the myths of academe that induce myopia and hinder self-knowledge. These two matters are not, in fact, unrelated.

As to the first, the claim of novelty for the perspective must be guarded. All societies rest on knowledge, and knowledge--or what was regarded as knowledge--has always had power. Universities have always been centers of power in some sense, and sometimes they have had considerable power. The relevance of the power perspective I urge rests rather upon both qualitative and quantitative changes in knowledge--I have in mind especially of course the increase in scientific--technical knowledge--and in the university's involvement in it. The trick is to discern clearly, with reference to the university, the relationships between knowledge and power in past situations, to be sharp-eyed with reference to what is enduring pattern with lessons for the present, and what in the present situation is unprecedented and decisive.

As to the myths of academe: The most mischievous one is that there is a True University or Genuine University that presents a standard of judgment for any present case. Sometimes faculty members renown for their sophistication and hard-headedness engage in flights of pious rhetoric about the True University as though it were a Platonic form or a medieval essence. Sometimes the True University is conceived to have existed in fact in times past--when professors were giants in the earth. In this style of the myth we have contemporary academe's version of the primitive myth of the falling away from goodness, the myth of the Everlasting Return. There is still another version: The True University exists now but always far away: on the banks of the Seine or Charles, perhaps, or framed by the Golden Gate. The several versions of the myth often blend together. All can be heard at a faculty meeting addressed to any Big Issue.

Though obliged by the conventions of speech to refer to "the university," I am on this subject a strict nominalist. Universities, not the university, have existed and do exist. They have exhibited and do exhibit incredible diversity. They are always changing reciprocally with changing contexts. There is no way to discover their "true" nature by etymology, history or logic. The academic game of Finding the True University is so popular, however, that one finds himself playing it perforce, if only to prove the opponent's error. As I am about to do.

I play the game, briefly, because so many varieties of the True University with which we are presented obscure the fact that the university is a power center, or misrepresent the nature of its power, and hence prevent us from thinking realistically about present problems and future developments.

One version of the myth holds the True University to be a community of scholars. This is a poetic and noble sentiment. But as a statement of what has been, or is, it is chiefly nonsense; and as a statement of what should be it is at best unrealistic and at worst dangerous. There is more realism in the old Continental aphorism that God created the professor but Satan created colleagues, and more relevance in Clark Kerr's observation that the contemporary faculty is a collection of entrepreneurs held together by a common interest in parking space. On any reasonable construction of the term many creative and useful members of a faculty are not "scholars;" and as to "community," this exists only in small--and mutually indifferent or hostile--enclaves.

Another version of the myth holds the

Professor Dwight Waldo

True University to be the place where knowledge is pursued for its own sake, objectively, This is a more dangerous myth precisely because it is not so demonstrably mythological, because it invests a notable amount of truth with an aura of unreality and nonsense. A tremendous amount of "new knowledge" has been and is produced in universities; more so than in many settings knowledge is pursued for its own sake, perhaps, or more "objectively." But as I read the record the agenda for universities has in the main been set for them, not by them in a process of subtle (and sometimes not so subtle) interaction with the societies in which they were situated. The type of myth-manipulation I find misleading and objectionable is represented in an essay prominently before the American public this month: "It is certainly an open question these days whether the university is engaged in research in order to pursue 'truth' or to acqure status, power, and profit." How divorced from reality can you get? When was "the university" ever pursuing truth for its own sake, apart from considerations of status, power and profit?

A third myth of the True University holds that the university was once a force for reform and social reconstruction, as against the present situation in which it is the complaisant, even eager, tool of the Establishment. Again, there is a core of truth. Much of the social, economic and political change of the recent centuries was related to and even sometimes "caused" by what took place in universities. But this fact will not support the conclusion that it is the "real" function of a university to engage in radical reconstruction of society. Plainly, universities have generally been established and supported by, and as an adjunct to, the established order. Thus they have been part of a complex of power, not so centrally as now, but sometimes importantly. If they have been instruments of societal reconstruction, this has been as a by-product--or by accident. No established order is going to create and support universities for the purpose of radical reconstruction of the established order, and it is occasionally necessary to make the point that to have a by-product it is first of all necessary to have a product. Or even the unintended consequence I referred to as an "accident."

There is still another myth of importance to viewing the university as a power center. This is the myth that the True University is concerned with Higher Things, typically supported by the presumption that it once was but has now sunk to the level of "a mere utility," the implication being that it once was free of worldly pressures and existed simply to elevate men's minds and exalt their spirits. The reality is, of course, that universities have been founded and supported precisely as utilities, that is, to serve the purposes of Church and State, of professional men, businessmen and farmers; for such practical purposes as training clerics, judges, generals, comptrollers, prefects and engineers. In present contexts they are many things, including utilitarian; they ready people for roles in society--and supply a living to professors of liberal arts. Whatever they were or are, they are now engaged in and by the exercise of power.

There are other myths of academe to which I should like to speak. But I am sensible of the fact that it could be useful to leave some part of my audience unoffended. Presumably I have said enough to make my point that it is difficult for us to view historically and inevitably, as well as increasingly, and in new ways, as power centers.

The subject of the university as a power center deserves a book, and no doubt will soon get it, if it hasn't already appeared. I want now to indicate matters to which, in my opinion, such a book should be addressed. I will proceed by more or less disjointed theses, predictions, hypotheses and questions.

The universities are now deeply involved in national politics. There are many dimensions and aspects of this; for example, direct involvement of professors in partisan and "issue" politics, increasing--and increasingly complex--institutional and financial connections with the Federal government, and Congressional struggles over the regional allocation of resources. The increasing visibility of the university man in Washington is arresting; some universities maintain a continuing "presence" in Washington.

The importance of the university in state politics needs neither emphasis or elucidation. Suffice it to observe that legislators and governors can be seated or--more likely--unseated by university events. As to the local level, I simply note that many universities are now about to engage themselves in an unprecedented way, in scale and openness, with racial and central-city problems, the storm centers of domestic politics. I think they should. But some will be torn apart as a result.

What are some implications of the simultaneous and related increase in the importance of knowledge and increase in political relevance and involvement? Let me suggest some "items" for consideration:

(1) Academic politics will become increasingly enmeshed in the politics of the non-academic world and vice versa. This is inevitable because old boundary lines are disappearing, academia and non-academia are becoming ever more enmeshed.

(2) Politics in the university are certain to become more intense and likely to become more heated and bitter. What happens in each case will, of course, depend on the configuration of issues and interests. In some instances the university will present a fairly united front against an "outside" threat. More frequently, political lines will cut across what university boundary there may be, and across the faculty-student boundary--which is also increasingly indistinct. There will be amazing combinations of forces "conservative" for the university with those "radical" for the environment, and vice versa.

(3) The institutions and practices of the university that are the most traditional, and in some sense also the most conservative, are going to be severely pressed and threatened--and will mount strenuous counter-pressure. They will have back of them long traditions, plausible rationales, and persuasive ideologies. At center will be certain functions and values for which autonomy and freedom have been deemed essential; these come to focus most sharply in so-called academic freedom. In the struggle and turmoil over these matters--which I confidently but painfully predict--there will be near intellectual and moral chaos.

(4) There will be increasing pressure for governmental regulation of university affairs. This is not only inevitable but, from certain perspectives, desirable.

There is, of course, an old and deep-seated American fear of concentrations of power. Our governmental arrangements seek to prevent concentration of governmental power, and governmental policy has repeatedly sought to disperse, regulate or counter-balance concentrations of power. To the extent that universities become centers of power they may expect to have this feeling, this tradition, directed towards them. And desirably so. Forced to choose between a faculty senate and the U.S. Senate, I should choose the latter. But with luck such a stark choice will not be necessary.

(5) Universities will increasingly funciton as organs of government. This is implicit in the "power thesis," and it can be read from many current signs and portents. Patently we face a crisis in the "power to govern" by the regular and traditional organs of government, both with respect to the making of policy and with respect to executing it.

(6) The university is the central and main place where institutional arrangements appropriate for a new condition of man will be evolved and tested. This, too, is implicit in the knowledge-is-power thesis, and follows from what has been argued to this point.

To evoke an over-used--but apt--expression, the university is presently experiencing an "identity crisis." It is placed in severe stress by the conflict of old and new, the multiplications of functions, the increase in size, the rising hopes, expectations--and fears--that focus in it. For my part, I don't expect it to endure "as such." Rather, I expect rapid evolution of new institutional arrangements. I expect some problems to be solved by institutional separation, some by geographical or functional devolution, some by restructuring of the old and new into different patterns. In all this it will be well not to hold too rigidly to those categories we inevitably use to guide our thinking, for example, the trinity of teaching, research and service, and the division of our world into students, professors, administrators, trustees and alumni. Again, the flexibility in thinking we urge for others is appropriate for ourselves.

'Penny Opera' evokes ironic audience response

By JIM KING

"The Three-Penny Opera" is a grim and grotesque little musical that tries to evoke outrage from its audience. The audience at last night's opening at the University Regent Theatre seemed to be enjoying itself too much, though.

The years have softened the impact of this musical by Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill, just as the incessant jazzing up of the "Ballad of Mack the Knife" has taken most of the bitterness and meaning out of that song. Still, this production, the first one of the Syracuse Repertory Theatre's third season, usually succeeds at conjuring up the cynicism of the work. So I guess we have to put the blame on ourselves.

Brecht's objective here seems to be to keep us from getting emotionally involved, which is a neat trick, since people generally stay away from musicals to avoid getting involved in their saccharin charm. The characters, therefore, are all decadent and corrupt and vidious: Macheath, of course, is the worst, being a bigamist, a rapist, a murderer, and the representative of several other major vices. Tiger Brown, the police commissioner, protects Macheath and allows him to continue his rampage because the two of them were buddies in the service. Jenny Diver betrays Macheath and collects on it.

And yet the audience, myself included, likes them, and this is the same kind of response that made "Bonnie and Clyde" a success--the urge to pat the criminal on the back, but in the safety of a theater. The audiences at the Regent last night seemed to revel in the roguish and plainly anti-establishment adventures of Macheath.

Brecht's trick is to sneer at us and release Mack the Knife at the conclusion, having brought him into the threshold of his death. After all, the playwright smirks, musicals are supposed to have happy endings. Today's audience is turning the trick in again on Mr. Brecht when it heartily approves of the hero's salvation and rewarding.

"Three-Penny Opera" is as daring and audacious in its own right as Broadway's current "Hair"--but where the characters in "Hair" are celebrating life, the characters in this musical are settling for it because nobody has found a better alternative for it than death. So it mocks our loftier values and feeds us its own bristling little bits of philosophy--"For once do something bad and you will survive" and "The bulging pocket makes the easy life."

As for the actors, Michael Norell as Macheath manages to convey the impression that he doesn't give a damn: his performance is casual, off-hand, perhaps even a little underplayed. But it suits the character. Erica Yohn's Jenny Diver conjures up images of Lotte Lenya (the wife of Brecht) performing the role in past productions: Miss Yohn's voice crackles with experience and wisdom.

But Rex Henriot has conceived a production that is visually stunning: the setting by Leonard Dryansky is so raunchy and tawdry and perfect for the mood that I expected rats to crawl out of it.

Dorm autonomy

CSL student members told they must play by university's rules

By DOUG GARR

Last night an open panel discussion was held in reference to the dorm autonomy issue sponsored by the DellPlain Dormitory Council in conjunction with the Council on Student Life. Moderator Dick Lopyan directed questions to the panel and then opened discussion to the floor.

The members of the panel were David Tatham, dean of men; Dr. James K. Weeks, faculty member on the CSL; Ed Feldman, member of the CSL; and Peg Johnston, president of the Inter-Dorm Council.

Dean Tatham immediately asked the question "What exactly is dorm autonomy?"

He pointed out that there is a whole series of meanings that can be given to dorm autonomy. He said he could react to the question of dorm autonomy if it exclusively concerned "drinking, entertaining members of the opposite sex in living centers, and general social atmosphere. If a deeper, thicker, more opaque idea, then I can't catch on to it yet."

In instituting dorm autonomy, Dean Tatham said he would see how the DellPlain Dorm Council's proposals could hold some weight if they could answer these questions: "What is there to change or do away with? If there is to be a change, what do you propose to change? And if you do away with something, what do you prpose to replace it with?"

Ed Feldman said, in answer to a wuestion on the aims of dorm autonomy that he wanted to 1) endorse a concept of dorm autonomy, 2) insure this concept would concern the students' social and cultural lives, and 3) set up a committee to implement these changes.

Feldman also proposed that if DellPlain received dorm autonomy, that other leading centers on campus could draft their own constitutions and subsequently govern autonomously. He continued saying, "Dorm autonomy would have a positive effect on the academic atmosphere on campus."

Feldman emphasized that the social rules such as drinking and visiting hours were what concerned most students primarily. Ultimately, he said, all living centers would govern themselves socially and then the students would more readily shift to an atmosphere of an academically oriented university.

Both Dean Tatham and Dr. Weeks agreed that they couldn't see how the students' proposals could better the educational atmosphere.

Dr. Weeks admitted that the idea of dorm autonomy "did not concern most members of the faculty. They're just not terribly interested."

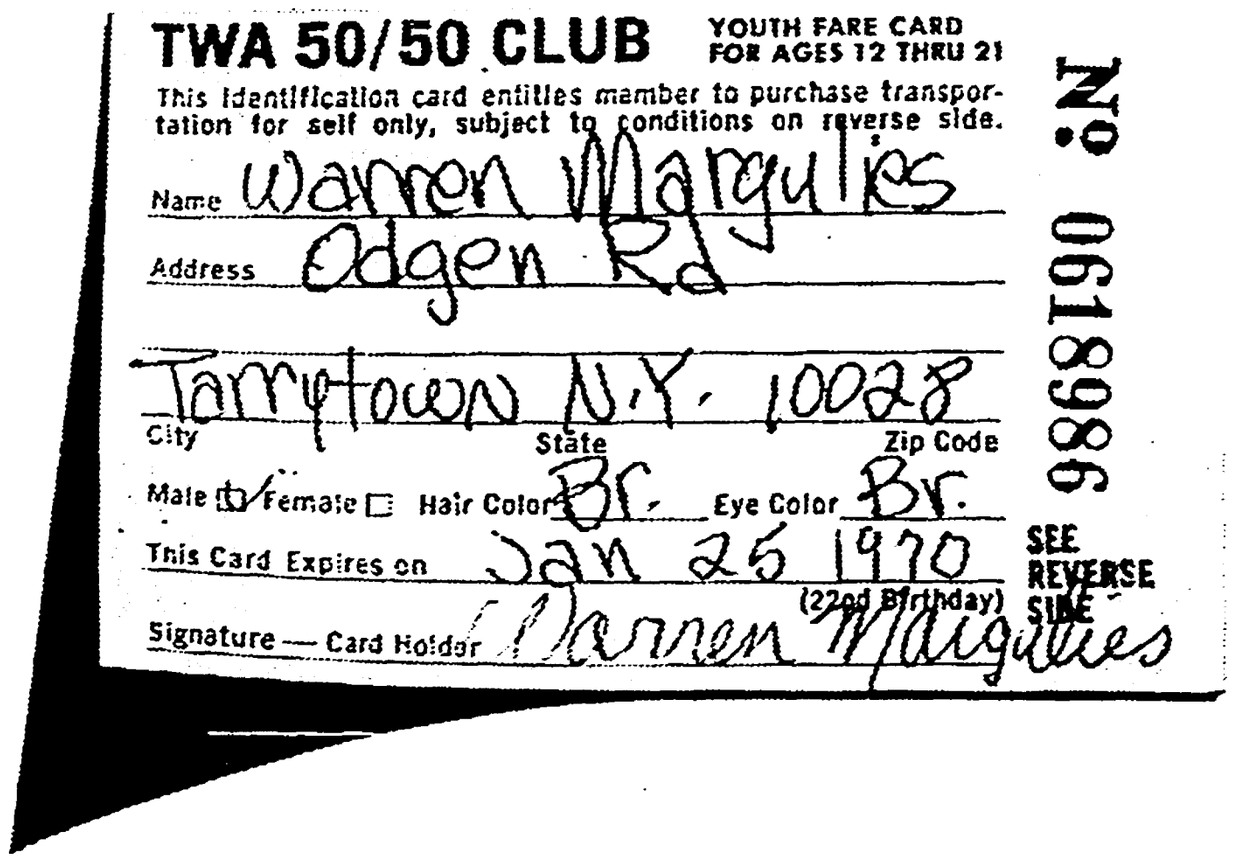
He did say, however, that those members of the CSL feel some necessity for students to be autonomous if the demands they made were reasonable.

Feldman also said, "If dorms were self-governing, they would be more attractive to graduate students and fill some of the vacancies the administration has in its housing."

Dr. Weeks attempted to sum up the situation of the students' desire for rapid changes and policies. "When you're in our ball park, you have to play by our rules part of the time. If there is a rule you're not particularly happy about, it's easier sometimes by following than changing it. Nobody is going to satisfy everybody.

Why Are You A Poor Talker?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports a simple technique of everyday conversation which can pay you real dividends in social and business advancement and works like magic to give you poise, self-confidence and greater popularity.



According to this publisher, many people do not realize how much they could influence others simply by what they say and how they say it. Whether in business, at social functions, or even in casual conversations with new acquaintances there are ways to make a good impression every time you talk.

To acquaint the readers of this paper - with the easy-to-follow rules for developing skill in everyday conversation, the publishers have printed full details of their interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "Adventures in Conversation," which will be mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Conversation, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 173-412, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

The University Branch Office of SYRACUSE TRAVEL BUREAU at 943 South Crouse will close as of April 15. All tickets which are now on order will be serviced until the above date.

The downtown office at 239 East Genesee St. will remain open.

Here's one card from the establishment that no student will ever burn.

It'll give you a great trip on your spring vacation.

It's TWA's 50/50 Club Card. And if you're between the ages of 12 and 21, it entitles you to fly TWA anywhere in the United States at half-fare (and it's good for discounts on most other airlines too). Now's the time to get one, so you can take off on your spring vacation. Fly skiing, fly swimming, fly home, fly anywhere. TWA flies just about everywhere. See your travel agent, TWA Campus Representative or stop by the local TWA office. Forget about classwork and fly TWA somewhere at half-fare. Even if your parents approve.

Glib society overlooks war

Remember Vietnam? Several years ago this small country was the unquestionable topic of conversation wherever groups gathered. No student, particularly, was worth his salt if he hadn't learned the arguments which inevitably would be dragged out the next time he met with his group. It didn't really matter which side he was on, although for a while it was especially popular to be "against."

Now, other conversation topics have come to the fore. There's black power, student power, Biafra. Vietnam is difficult to force into any conversation, even where the participants have heard of it. What has caused this seeming death of conversational Vietnam?

This has not resulted from a solution of the issue itself, certainly. If one digs into the middle pages of The New York Times, reports on the war indicate that the level of violence has not subsided. As negotiations are conducted in Paris, Americans and Vietnamese continue to die at a rate of thousands per week. No one even mentions those other thousands who are still being permanently disfigured or dismembered.

The death of Vietnam conversations has not resulted from an end to the draft threat at home, either. The draft continues under the old system at a 30,000 plus per month rate, and more graduate students and married men are being included in the call. But even though the likelihood of being drafted has increased, conversation on Vietnam, the "cause of it all," has decreased.

Is Vietnam less of a problem, less "important" than student and black power? For some Americans, perhaps, but certainly not for the Vietnamese and others in Asia for whom the current conflict is a part of their cultural and national history and is significant in determining their nations' destinies.

The Vietnam conversations and debates began to die out the day negotiations began. A lid was put on them with the bombing halt. There still remains, however, a question as to why. Why have conversations, debates, and demonstrations turned elsewhere for a focus of interest?

Part of the reason might be that the talking does little good anymore. Everyone has his position on the war and ears and minds have subsequently closed. Why hash over old issues when it won't make any difference. Why recite your doctrine on the war only to know you're going to have the other guy's doctrine recited back at you.

There is more vitality in the black power debates or in the Biafra question. Emotions are more easily stirred up when discussing student demonstrations, and people like to get stirred up emotionally. It helps them remember they're alive. Vietnam doesn't seem to stir people up anymore.

Unfortunately, now is the time when we should be most interested in Vietnam. In the years of arguing about the need for negotiations and a bombing halt, all the talkers tended to put aside the question of what would happen during negotiations. But while quiet diplomacy continues in Paris, the war continues in Vietnam. And whereas last year we could criticize politicians in Washington and elsewhere for the conduct of the war, the war's conduct and length now lie in the hands of a very few men in Paris. All our minimal attention designated for the war is focused there and we've forgotten all the other avenues to peace that we talked so ardently about before. But we have no influence over negotiations and negotiators.

Perhaps we need to be reminded now and then that the war has not faded into the inscrutable east. It is still there, the same problem it always was. But now we're doing less about it, thinking less about it, and talking less about it.

Here's some sound financial advice for liberal arts majors.

Look into the General Electric Financial Management Program.

You don't have to have an extensive background in economics or accounting to get into it. All you have to have is an aptitude for numbers and a bachelor's degree.

Our Financial Management Program is designed to do the rest. It'll fill in the blanks in your background and, at the same time, give you a chance to show what you can do on a responsible job.

When you finish the program, you'll have a working knowledge of the basis of every business: finance. And that means you'll be qualified to work in any one of the 170 separate product departments of General Electric.

Our representative will be on campus soon. Why not plan on talking finance with him? It just might prove profitable.

SU wrestlers, swimmers face Colgate Saturday

By MIKE WEBER

The Syracuse varsity wrestling team closes out its 1968-69 season tomorrow afternoon when the Red Raiders of Colgate journey to Manley Field House.

The meet gets underway at 2 p.m. with several top matches on tap. Joe Palmieri (123) will be pitted against tough Steve Scrieber, who has a 6-3 dual meet record thus far. Orange grappler Keith Clark will have his hands full when he tangles with Pete Stathis, who has a 6-3-1 dual meet slate at 130.

At heavyweight, the Orange will send winless John Cherundolo against once-beaten Jim Locke. Locke scored the deciding points in last year's freshman contest when he flattened Ron Sherman in just 52 seconds.

However, the main atrraction will be a battle of unbeatens at 191. SU's Bob Rust, 7-0 on the campaign, will face Gene Detweiler, who boasts an 8-0 slate.

Detweiler, who also served as co-captain of the Red Raider's football team, has not lost a dual meet in two years. He also finished second in the Eastern Intercollegiate Wrestling Tournament a year ago, losing only to Penn State's Rich Lorenzo, who was named the tourney's outstanding wrestler.

Rust, meanwhile, has wrestled superbly despite a painful knee injury. He has missed two of the last three meets but says he will be ready for this one.

The match is all-important to both wrestlers since the top-seeded position in this year's EIWA event is on the line. From the fans point of view, it will in all probability be a preview of the tournament finals, which take place in two weeks.

The Colgate squad has a 5-5 record while the Orangemen have won only two in ten outings. The freshman match against the Red Raider yearlings will take place simultaneously with the varsity.

In other sports activity this weekend, the sswimming team will travel to Colgate in search of their eighth win of the season.

The fencers will also see action when they meet Buffalo while the gymnastics team (1-6) entertains Pittsburgh.

Schaefer SKI TIPS BY ROXY

Don't fall for the wrong skis

When you buy a pair of skis, remember: buy skis designed for your type of skiing. Often, beginners fall for a pair of expensive skis made for racing conditions. And then find themselves falling down on the turns.

Skis are made for all sorts of skiing and snow conditions. If you're a beginner or even a good weekend skier, you don't want shaped and extra-flexible skis designed for slalom racing. Instead of making you a better skier, they'd probably hold you back.

Skiing is supposed to be fun. Keep that in mind when you buy skis. Get the pair most suited to your height, ability and the conditions where you usually ski. You'll save money and you'll enjoy the sport a lot more. You'll ski better, too.

Orange to play out the string vs. Red Raiders

By LARRY CENTER

The Syracuse Orangemen, coming off a foul-marred loss to Niagara and Calvin Murphy, will try to close out the season on a winning note tomorrow night when Colgate invades Manley for an 8:30 tip-off.

Frank Hamblen, who saw action Wednesday as a replacement for Bill Smith, and Dave Aldrich, who scored SU's last two points at the buzzer, will be making their farewell appearances, as will Bob Kouwe. If Kouwe can duplicate his performance against the Red Raiders, he will be insured of going out with a smile. In that one, he led SU with 27 points and grabbed 11 rebounds.

The Orange squeaked out a victory at Hamilton, 87-86, as Smith hit the boards for 18 bounds and canned 25 points. If tomorrow night's contest is as exciting, the St. John's and Niagara games will seem mild by comparison.

Rick Camputo is Colgate's "big" man. The 6-3 guard hurt the Orange last time with his outside jumpers. John Reid, who quarterbacks the Raider attack and leads their break, and Mike Greenlow, start in the backcourt. Don Ward is the other forward.

The Raider's tallest men are Dick Schaefer and Nick Scaccia, both 6-5, but the starter at center is Dennis Cronin, a 6-4 senior. Smith had a good game against them last time, and if he can use his height to such advantage again tomorrow night, the Orange will be tough to beat.

Another improvement since that game has been the scoring resurgence of Ernie Austin. Before his parents and friend Dave Bing, who convinced him to come to Syracuse, Ernie showed his frosh form as he hit for 21 points and played his usually fine ballhandling and defensive game.

Syracuse was hurt badly Wednesday night by their fouls. Although they outscored the Purple Eagles in field goals, 40 to 34, the Orange hit on only 12 of 20 free throws, while Niagara converted 35 of 47 for a hot 74.5%. In a close game, which SU-Colgate affairs always seem to be, the game could be won at the chairty stripe.

Roy Danforth's men have come a long way since the beginning of the season, and the improved play could be an indicator of a full-season revival next year. Starters Smith, Case, Austin and Suder all will be back, as will supersub Bill Finney. The big plus, however, could be the hoped-for return of 6-6 Bob McDaniel, last season's leading frosh scorer and rebounder.

But first comes Colgate. Many fans may be absent, busy at parties and dances. But a win tomorrow night to close out his first season would assure a perfect Winter Weekend for Roy Danforth.

CENTER TAPS: Smith only needs 17 points to become fifth highest scorer in SU history and 37 to achieve a 20-point average for the season...Colgate's Ward is the brother of Gerry, former player with the 76ers, Pistons and Bulls...The freshmen, now 9-5, take on the Colgate yearlings in a 6:30 prelim.

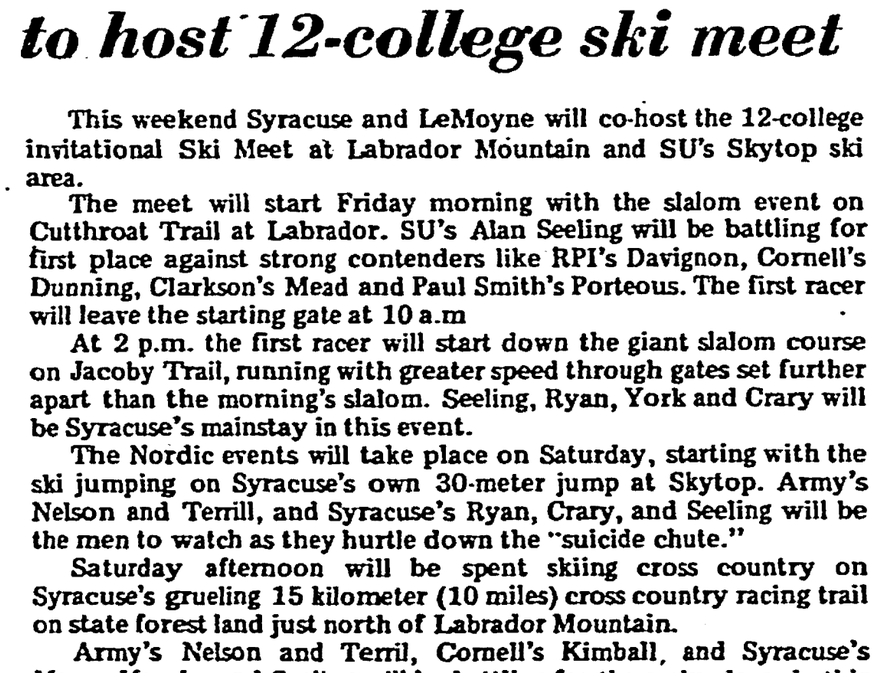
Different roads to top taken by Zuller, Roberts

By GINA BELL

Guy Roberts and Larry "Zeke" Zuller are co-captains of the track team. Each has recently broken a long-standing record in his event, and each has been invited to compete in the National Collegiate Championships on March 14 in Detroit, the zenith for college runners.

Each has a good-to-excellent chance of qualifying for the All-American squad, and each has earned the respect and liking of his teammates as well as the warm praise of coach Bob Grieves. Beyond this point, any further comparison of the track team's current heroes is totally meaningless.

Zeke Zuller is living proof of the validity of the Horatio Alger myth, which holds that hard work can get you as far as you want to push yourself. Four years ago, he'd come here with one season of mediocre high school running behind him Two weeks ago, he ran a 4:10 mile, setting a University and field-house record. What happened in the interim?



Zeke won't tell you much; he's shy as long as the topic of conversation is Zeke Zuller. He is slow to tell you about the time and energy he puts into his running--the four to six miles run each morning and the two hours of stamina-building in practice are dismissed as being standard for a runner, as is the 11-month season.

It's practically impossible to get him to mention the medical problems which gave his career such a late start. All you can do to gain an appreciation of the obstacles he's overcome in four years is watch him run, and see for yourself the lines of pain and determination that are etched into his face. You'll be able to see the lonliness of the long-distance runner personified in the slight figure whose funny little steps don't seem capable of carrying him a mile in five minutes, let alone 4:10.

The only things Zeke isn't reticent about are his love for the sport and his preparation for each race. "I like to get mean--really mean. A few days before each meet, I want to be alone, so I don't talk to anyone and hope no one talks to me. When I run, I'm too mean to let anyone get away from me, and I don't feel the pain as much. All this comes from a guy whom Grieves refers to as "one of the nicest kids I've ever coached."

If a description of Zeke Zuller reads like a rehash of the old Alger myth, Guy Roberts', in contrast, sounds like an ad-man's version of the American success story. Tall and nice—looking, he even looks the part; outgoing and intelligent, he carries it off nicely.

Guy Roberts is involved in lots of things, including a partnership in the Record Runner. Somehow, he makes everything he does look easy. His coach describes him as a stoic, concealing his pain, but to watch him lope around the track in a quick 600, you'd think he was just warming up for the real

Syracuse and Le Moyne to host 12-college ski meet

This weekend Syracuse and LeMoyne will co-host the 12-college invitational Ski Meet at Labrador Mountain and SU's Skytop ski area.

The meet will start Friday morning with the slalom event on Cutthroat Trail at Labrador. SU's Alan Seeling will be battling for first place against strong contenders like RPI's Davignon, Cornell's Dunning, Clarkson's Mead and Paul Smith's Porteous. The first racer will leave the starting gate at 10 a.m

At 2 p.m. the first racer will start down the giant slalom course on Jacoby Trail, running with greater speed through gates set further apart than the morning's slalom. Seeling, Ryan, York and Crary will be Syracuse's mainstay in this event.

The Nordic events will take place on Saturday, starting with the ski jumping on Syracuse's own 30-meter jump at Skytop. Army's Nelson and Terrill, and Syracuse's Ryan, Crary, and Seeling will be the men to watch as they hurtle down the "suicide chute."

Saturday afternoon will be spent skiing cross country on Syracuse's grueling 15 kilometer (10 miles) cross country racing trail on state forest land just north of Labrador Mountain.

Army's Nelson and Terril, Cornell's Kimball, and Syracuse's Maass, Marcks, and Seeling will be battling for the early places in this strenuous event.

All scores for the four events will be immediately recorded and computed for the meet at LeMoyne's computer center, providing competitors and spectators alike with rapid and accurate results as each event ends. LeMoyne will also host the awards banquet for this final collegiate ski meet of the season.

Some classes off for research halt

MOST LABORATORY RESEARCH like this will grind to a halt here today as professors, graduate assistants and undergrads participate in a one-day "slide rule strike" aimed at re-examining the precarious relationship between scientists and society. (Photo by John Reed)

Science's responsibility weighed today

By DOROTHY NASH

SU professors and students will engage in a "strike by displacement" beginning at 1 p.m. today in the Physics Building. The purpose of the "strike" is to provide opportunity and atmosphere for a re-assessment of the responsibilities and committments of science to society. According to Professor Joseph M. Schecter of the Physics Department, the strike is not to be considered a strike as such.

"We're merely taking a day off to think about the relationship of science to government and government to society. The idea is to get people interested in attending, not just cutting classes," he emphasized.

The research strike will take the form of a series of lectures and discussion workshops to be conducted by graduate students and professors. Short talks will be presented dealing with social, economic, political and military significance of science to the public. Speakers will include Daniel Jackson, SU professor of civil engineering on the topic The Environment and Dr. Robert Seidenburg, a practicing psychiatrist, on Human Aggression. Prof. C.L. Hardin of the SU philosophy department will discuss the Ethical Uses of Science. Charles Wayne of the SU Research Corporation will speak on the relationship of SU to the United States Defense Department, and Douglas Dowd, a professor of economics at Cornell, will be here to offer comments on the Military-Industrial Complex.

The research symposium has been organized by members of the March 4 Committee in conjunction with similar committees on campuses across the country. The idea of a research strike was initiated at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. An exclusive group of scientists and engineers began the movement to forego attendance of regular classes and all research work of one day for the purposes of bringing to public attention the social and military aspects of scientific involvement.

Their primary concern is the "overemphasis" of scientific weapons research. Symposiums

Up, up and away

Tuition climbing

Syracuse University will increase tuition, fees and room and board for freshmen, effective Sept. 1.

The new tuition rate will be $2,100 a year (two semesters), compared with the current rate of $2,000. General University and student fees will be $150 instead of $100 as at present. The new room and board rates range from $1,000 to $1,150 for the academic year, compared with $950-1,100.

SU upperclassmen received the news with not-so-fond memories of other perennial increases. With spring's annual balm comes the decree of a tuition increase -- ostensibly only for freshmen, but eventually extended to all studehts.

Remaining true to form, Dr. Frank P. Piskor, vice chancellor and provost, has announced that "no decision has been made about next year's tuition and fees for students other than incoming freshmen."

Defense brings in most research $$$

By MARGARET ALLAN

"Defense Systems, the Corporation's largest division, works on the development and study of tactical electronics systems for the Department of the Navy and the U.S. Army Signal Corps."
--SU Research Corp., 1968 Report

Aside from the fact that approximately 15 per cent of its yearly budget comes from the Department of Defense, the Syracuse University Research Corporation (SURC) gives little information on its "largest division" in its annual report.

Of the $13,254,463 budget, $1,982,506 is listed for Defense Department projects. That total excludes classified projects, which are not listed in the report, and only part of the $9,962,662 (75.2 per cent) SURC receives from the Federal government. The remaining federal funds come from such sources as the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Peace Corps, the Department of State and the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Most of the lengthy and detailed explanation in the 1968 annual report is devoted to research in "peaceful" fields.

The corporation is involved with local health care facilities, proposed housing rehabilitation projects and air sampling stations throughout Onondaga County to collect dust samples and measure amounts of dust and sulphur dioxide in the air.

The information collected by the air sample stations is then applied to the task of defining the nature and extent of air pollution in the area and to determining what basic pollutants are to blame.

University scientists are also attempting to develop a means of detecting charged particles in the artificial atmosphere of spacecraft cabins. Agricultural projects include experimentation with improved insecticides.

One of the most ambitious projects is the establishment of an Educational Policy Research Center. Under a grant from the U.S. Office of Education, the Center will study the projected educational needs of American society for the years 1980 to 2000.

But the contrtroversial part of SURC's work is the part funded by the Federal Government and, more specifically, the Department of Defense. The concern of scientists and engineers about the university involvement in weapons research is apparently leading to, if nothing else, an airing of the issue.

Faculty considers Tolley's speech as folly

By MITCH LANE

Faculty reaction to Chancellor Tolley's attack ten days ago continues to grow this week as faculty groups organize to register their collective outrage at the Chancellor's charges.

The University chapter of the American Association of University Professors will sponsor a symposium on "University Governments: Power and Responsibility" at 8 p.m. March 12 in the Physics Building Auditorium. The symposium will deal with issues raised in the Chancellor's speech and will include administrators, faculty and students.

The symposium will be chaired by Nahmin Horowitz, physics professor and president of the local chapter of the AAUP. Chancellor Tolley will be invited to attend. Chuck Hicks, student government president, contacted by the faculty committee and reportedly expressed "much interest" in the idea of a symposium.

In a more humorous vein, the University Senate is considering adopting the coat of arms that the Chancellor described for them in his speech. As the Chancellor described the coat of arms: "In the upper left hand corner I would place a pompus parrot, in the upper right hand corner an obsequious ape, in the lower left a braying ass and in the lower right an ostrich standing with great dignity with his head in the sand."

It has been suggested that the Senate adopt the coat of arms and also a crest of like description to wear on special University Senate blazers.

Collective opposition to the Chancellor's speech is being expressed in several departments on campus where letters are currently being drafted which will be endorsed by the entire department and mailed to the Chancellor. These letters are generally critical of the Chancellor for both what he said and the place he chose to say it.

Although collective action remains in the planning stages, swift reaction was registered by several faculty members who spoke out publicly. Robert Wolfson, professor of economics, wrote a letter to the Daily Orange last week in which he called the Chancellor's speech "thoughtless."

History lecturer Fred G. Morgner wrote a letter to the Chancellor which claimed that "the Chancellor has discredited the University through the nature of his address and has cast a pale of divisiveness and suspicion over the relations among students, faculty members and administrative officials." Morgner said that he was advised by another faculty member not to write the article because he might lose his faculty position.

Professor Karl Schmidt, member of the political science department, was "very alarmed at his comments on unions." Schmidt feels that the University has been anti-union for a long time and that Tolley's statement was a reiteration of the same policy.

In defense of the Chancellor, Professor Robert Iversen of social sciences felt that there was indeed a small group of radical faculty on this campus.

In general, for one reason or another most members of the faculty refused to comment publicly on the Chancellor's speech. Some members of the faculty thought that since the Chancellor was retiring soon there was no real reason to make an issue out of his speech. Others, who were outraged by the Chancellor's speech, were reluctant to challenge the Chancellor and maintained an outwardly neutral viewpoint.

Hands off

State Senator John Hughes of Syracuse was quoted in the local papers over the weekend as supporting a bill to punish students involved in campus disorder that was stronger than a measure already passed by the Senate. The Senate bill causes a student convicted of crimes in any court to lose his state scholarships. Hughes expressed support for a stronger bill that might stretch to include infractions against the rules of a university not only by students but by faculty and administration as well.

The Hughes statement is but another manifestation of the over-indignant, ill-informed middle class backlash to the rising problems of campus disorder. In the past several weeks, not only has the legislature tried its hand at campus regulation, but certain parties at the National Governor's Conference and the President of the United States himself suggested that federal control of the problem might be necessary.

It is discouraging, but not surprising, that public reaction to the problems of campus unrest should swiftly rally to the side of law and order at any cost. Public reaction suggests no understanding of the basis for conflict -- the disenfranchised, non-participating student or faculty member.

But these are problems for the universities. Neither the federal government nor the state--NOBODY but the university itself can solve the problems of power distribution and representation. Why does Sen. Hughes have to threaten a teacher's job or a student's scholarship when the university can and has done it just as easily? Remember Hank Woessner? Why does John Q. American in downtown Syracuse think he can handle our University's problems or Notre Dame's or Columbia's when he knows little about the questions and less about the students?

If any laws are broken during campus disorder, or any property is damaged, prodecures for legal action already exist. If they aren't followed, a university reluctant to prosecute, or inefficent law enforcement agencies, are at fault.

American universities are facing the greatest challenge ever. How do we make them relevant, responsive and respresentative? We won't do it with repression or ironhand tactics in Albany or Washington. We'll solve them among ourselves or not at all. Hands off our universities.

The new editor

It is traditional for a new editor to depart from the austere pronouncements of editorials to offer an introduction to himself and his policy. That editor takes over with enthusiasm and gratitude, but most of all a humble regard for two hard working and devoted journalists, just replaced.

To Evan Richert and Charles Babcock go the thanks and admiration of the entire staff. They worked harder than all others to put the news before the community in a manner not simply to please, but to inform. They worked not only with a desire to improve the university, but with a regard and esteem for the members of its community.

With that esteem, the new editor will continue. He will work to reach across the campus to offer responsible and professional commentary and coverage. He will do so obliged to no one. The Daily Orange shall speak independently with a clear voice. We shall criticize and praise, challenge and accept. The new editor asks consideration as we teach and patience as we learn.

New dormitories

Fountain of youth?

By Paul Finkelman

And so a man rambled on about how he had discovered the fountain of youth hidden behind the ivy walls of an old brick building. But the man missed one important thing--that if the fountain is to continue to give off its youthful waters it must remain youthful in its outlook. It must change with the times so that it will always remain ahead of the status quo, and not merely be content to mirror it. It must realize that its lifeblood, the source of its youthful waters, is found not in the ivy covered administration buildings, for they are old and filled with older men, but will be found in those new dormitories filled with the essence of youth itself.

The man did not understand that if the students are the best ever (to be described in superlatives as he said) then they must be given the responsibility and power to go along with their studies. And the man also failed to see that when power is not freely given to those who are capable of handling it, it will be taken by force, if that is the only way to take it.

And then the man said that the professors are to blame because they side with the students who demand their rights. But the man never looked into why they do this. He couldn't. He would see the administration, his administration, treating the faculty like the students. He would see the faculty ask for a moratorium on recruitment only to be overruled by the administration and see the students protest. Then he would know why the faculty supports the students. He would see that the intelligent students, those who think and reason, are among those who protest and he would know why the faculty sides with them.

And the man said, the trouble with them (the students) was that they protest against organized politics instead of joining in them. But he didn't try to find out why. He couldn't do that because he would see thousands of students, his students, trying to take part in politics and getting their heads beaten in. He would see blacks having to beg for a day of mourning on campus as Martin Luther King was buried. And he would see that the politicians, of the practical and viable parties, don't want our support. They don't let us vote. They only ask us to die. And he would see his university sponsor programs for the army, even though the army isn't wanted on the campus.

And then the man said "power without responsibility is the new game." The students, unions, teachers and courts want it. But he never asked himself why. And he never asked why shouldn't they have it. Why should only the old men around the country have it? Why should old men send the young to die? Is this not power without responsibility? Why should old men govern universities without the consent of the governed? Is this not power without responsibility? Why should they evade us, about wars and about tuition raises? Why should they laugh at us, and refuse to discuss our grievences? Why should they call the troops out when we try to assemble? Power without responsibility is what the old men should fear, but only if they should lose it.

And the fountain of youth? Old men--come out of your ivy buildings and help us all find the fountain of youth before it is destroyed forever!

Letters to the editor

What's wrong?

To the Editor:

I have been following with avid interest the discussion of ROTC on campus, and there are several points which I feel are not being raised in this discussion. The ROTC programs at SU and elsewhere provide many programs and services which have been patiently overlooked or ignored by those groups which advocate its removal from campus.

In the first place, ROTC provides a viable alternative to those male students who wish to provide a continuity in their studies from undergraduate to graduate levels. Each student that matriculates into the final two years of the ROTC program, has a 1—D selective service deferment which upon request may be extended to cover a graduate school deferment. There is no other organization on campus that can provide for such a vital need. With the current talk in Washington about further selective service overhaul, the prospects for graduate school deferments are steadily diminishing. Would you remove this alternative to the male students at SU?

Secondly through various programs of financial assistance, ROTC provides full tuition scholarships for students. In several cases this aid has been extended where scholarships have been denied by the University which after all is limited in the funds it may distribute to deserving students.

Thirdly the ROTC programs provide access to leadership development programs in preparation for a commission in the military service, so that college trained men may serve their duty as officers in a responsible position and further develop experience in fields for which they have been trained. This puts men in positions of forming policy decisions and has provided an impetus for much of the change in the military establishment. If there are features that individuals find repugnant about the military, what better way is there to accomplish this change than to provide for intelligent and well trained leadership?

Fourthly, ROTC provides many students with concepts of history and political science in the classroom that many would miss. We are all aware of the scheduling binds that many of us face. If you cannot fit in a course in political science or history or military concept, ROTC helps fill this gap through a program of intensive classroom study with excellent materials prepared by experts for the Department of Defense. In addition these materials are often presented in an open discussion format so that these concepts are freely discussed and understood. This is far more free than a formalized lecture and provides students with the type of intellectual challenge which is consistant with the finest tradition of the Liberal Arts education.

Lastly ROTC is free. It costs the student nothing. Credit hours and books, along with all other necessary materials, are provided to all students who wish to take it.

What's wrong with ROTC? Nothing, except the fact that it provides alternatives to a prison term or the draft. It provides many with money to finish their education. It provides training in many areas that may otherwise be overlooked. It provides the nation with leaders rather than followers. No, there is nothing wrong with ROTC because it provides logical alternatives to those who seek it.

What's wrong with ROTC and what will others provide in its stead?

Report on campus politics may create Senate conflict

The long-awaited report of the Senate Committee on Political Equity (SCOPE) will be submitted to Student Senate tonight at the start of what is likely to be a bitter debate over the elections article of the new Undergraduate Government constitution.

SCOPE chairman Fred Tuccillo, who initiated the five-month investigation of the campus political system, said yesterday that the abuses and inequities uncovered were far beyond the things he expected to find.

"If civil authorities had carried out this investigation there may very well have been indictments for everything from petty theft and fraud to grand larceny and assault and battery," Tuccillo said. "As it is, we have access to enough evidence on one particular incident to call for the impeachment of two officers in class and student government."

No such call will be made, however. "Our basic goal is a democratic political system for this campus, free of the abuses of the present system," said Tuccillo. "We were never interested in conducting a witch hunt. We promised the Senate and the people who confided in us that no names would be used in the report and that the findings would not lead to disciplinary action against any individual. We will keep that promise."

The committee's sources included testimony given at several open hearings and confidential information from people connected with both campus political parties.

The debate over the elections article of the constitution is expected to center around the issue of registration in parties. The SCOPE article would have provided for public registration at a central location by all individuals wishing to join a political party. "We can't have an equitable system until we take it out of the Greek houses and into the open," Tuccillo explained.

The central registration provision was killed in the Government Structures Committee two weeks ago. Also killed in Structures last week was an addition to the new constitution's Bill of Rights which would have read: "No student shall be compelled to join any campus organization." Representatives of the campus political parties led the attack on both measures, calling central registration "too complicated" and the Bill of Rights addition "unnecessary."

SCOPE co-chairman Lance Wisniewski promised a floor fight on the two measures, though both he and Tuccillo conceded that the parties would probably succeed in legally "packing" the Senate by presenting petitions for unused seats from dorm floors and Greek houses. "All we can do is hope that the Senators outnumber the hacks," Tuccillo said.

By DIANE WEATHERS

Solon Ice, formerly a community organizer in Chicago's south side, will participate in a panel discussion directly following tonight's showing of the movie "Nothing But a Man."

The movie and discussion are part of a series sponsored by the School of Social Work and Film Forum, dealing with the use of film as a medium for expression of contemporary social problems.

Ice is currently the planning director for Black Youth United of Syracuse (B.Y.U.S.). In conjunction with B.Y.U.S., he is working to establish a permanent Afro-Americna cultural center which would include a black library, tutoring and employment programs.

Ice has considerable experience in community organization. While in the Chicago area, he was assistant director of the Blackstone Rangers—Devil's Desciple Program, and established that area's first community health center. The film will start at 7:30 p.m. in Gifford Auditorium. Admission is 75 cents and tickets may be purchased at the School of Social Work or at the door.

CAMPUS INTERVIEWS NEXT WEEK

Graduates at all degree levels are urged to investigate the career opportunities at

NIH

The world's largest center for conquest of disease and improvement of human health

The National Institutes of Health—NIH—is the principal research arm of the U.S. Public Health Service, and conducts many of the most advanced programs in medical science today. These programs require specialists in a wide range of disciplines. Example: Right now NIH has openings in the following areas:

CHEMISTS . . . BIOLOGISTS . . . NURSES . . . MEDICAL TECHNOLOGISTS . . . SOCIAL WORKERS . . . LIBRARIANS . . . ENGINEERS . . . COMPUTER PROGRAMMERS . . . MATHEMATICIANS . . . STATISTICIANS . . . SYSTEMS ANALYSTS . . . MANAGEMENT INTERNS . . . PERSONNEL SPECIALISTS . . . ACCOUNTANTS . . . INFORMATION SPECIALISTS . . . MANAGEMENT ANALYSTS . . . CONTRACT SPECIALISTS

These are permanent positions that offer high professional challenge and the benefits of career Federal employment. Starting salaries are attractive and opportunity for advancement is excellent.

CAMPUS INTERVIEWS MARCH 17, 1969

An NIH representative will be visiting your campus next week to discuss these positions with interested students. You may arrange an interview during this visit by contacting the Placement Office. Or, if you prefer, you may write or call are being conducted at Cornell, Yale, Harvard, University of California at Berkely, Stanford and more than 15 other schools across the United States. It is expected that most programs will be conducted according to a similar format on all of the campuses.

Research halt...

"Misuse of scientific and technical knowledge presents a major threat to the existence of mankind," 48 professors state in a document distributed at M.I.T. and on dozens of other campuses. "Through its actions in Viet Nam, our government has shaken our confidence in its ability to make wise and humane decisions."

Like many other scientists, the 48 professors and dozens of graduate students backing the March 4 movement at M.I.T. are most incensed about plans for an anti-ballistic missile (ABM) system, which they call "ill-advised and hazardous."

They are also opposed to the development of chemical and biological weapons and the enlargement of the nuclear stockpile. Instead, they suggest that scientific research should be turned increasingly toward solving the nation's environmental and social problems. As the first step toward bringing about such a change in U.S. scientific policy, they call upon scientists "to unite for concerted action."

At M.I.T., March 4 speakers will include South Dakota Senator George McGovern and Nobel Laureates Hans Bethe (physics) and George Wald (medicine).

The format for the SU strike will include a series of short talks, a discussion period, a workshop and a panel discussion to be moderated by Prof. Dale Tussing of the Economics department. From 1 p.m. until 4 p.m. the lectures will be given in room 101 of the Physics Building. There will then be a short recess and the symposium will reconvene for informal discussion and summary of the lectures and after a dinner recess the panel will be seated in Maxwell Auditorium at 8 p.m. Prof. Tussing will conduct the discussion and the panel will attempt to arrive at some conclusions or resolutions as a result of the research strike. Members sitting in on the panel will include the speakers, two additional physics professors, Joshua Goldburg and E.C.G. Sudarshan, and Robert Woolfson, a professor of Economics at Syracuse. The workshops are to be conducted by physics graduate students. In the event of a maximum attendance of the symposium, close circuit TV will be transmitted into room 200 of the Physics Building from the auditorium to provide for an additional 75 seats.

Some confusion has stemmed from the use of the word "strike" in referring to the scheduled symposium. As a result students and professors have considered the program in a negative connotation. Professor Charles Bachman of the Physics Department stressed the fact that he is in favor of the talks. But he added that "if it's a strike, I want no part of it."

Professor Austin Gleeson agreed with Bachman insofar as the use of the term "strike" is concerned.

"I don't look upon it as a strike. It is an afternoon of evaluation of the position of science and society." The consensus agreed that the project was misrepresented at first as a simple boycott of classes. However the actual significance of the symposium has been made known through the professors that have decided to cancel their classes in favor of the "strike."

Student Senate passed a resolution that the faculty consider today a "no cuts given day" to allow students to attend the symposium without the worry of an unexcused absence. However this action was merely a suggestion and does not guarantee an excused absence from class.

Gleeson, who is one of the instructors cancelling classes, explained his feelings on the research strike.

"The students are going to think about a slightly different physics problem, that's all."

Officer lectures on self-defense

By STEVE TOBER

The childhood aspirations of many people are often dismissed as quixotic, but for Alfred Di Staola, what began as "kid notions" has become a way of life.

Sgt. Di Staola, of the Syracuse Police Department, has successfully developed these notions into a career of high achievement in the areas of self-defense, juvenile delinquency, and civic affairs. In 1966, he was named "one of the ten outstanding police officers in the nation," by Parade Magazine and the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

Di Staola has devoted much of his time in the Community Relations Section to lectures and clinics on self-defense for women, his topic for tonight at 7 p.m. in room 305 of the Women's Building. The self-defense clinic is WAA-sponsored, and will include a film.

As a youth, Di Staola participated in athletics under police auspices. It was through this personal contact with police officers that he developed an interest in police work as a means of assisting youngsters. He was assigned to the Youth Djivision after one year on the force, and has served in that capacity for eighteen years.

Di Staola came in contact with the basics of self-defense while going through combat training in the service.
employed were mainly for breaking holds.

In his lectures and clinics, Di Staola concerns himself with teaching women the vulnerable, as well as strong, areas of the human body, and such maneuvers as breaking strangle-holds and dropping the attacker. The course mixes wrestling, karate, and judo.

Reaction by the women has been enthusiastic. Recently, Di Staola held a clinic for Onondaga county, in which over 1200 women participated. "They were crazy about it, he said. Di Staola recalls many instances in which his students reported that they were able to avoid "getting into serious trouble," in such places as homes, automobiles, and on the streets.

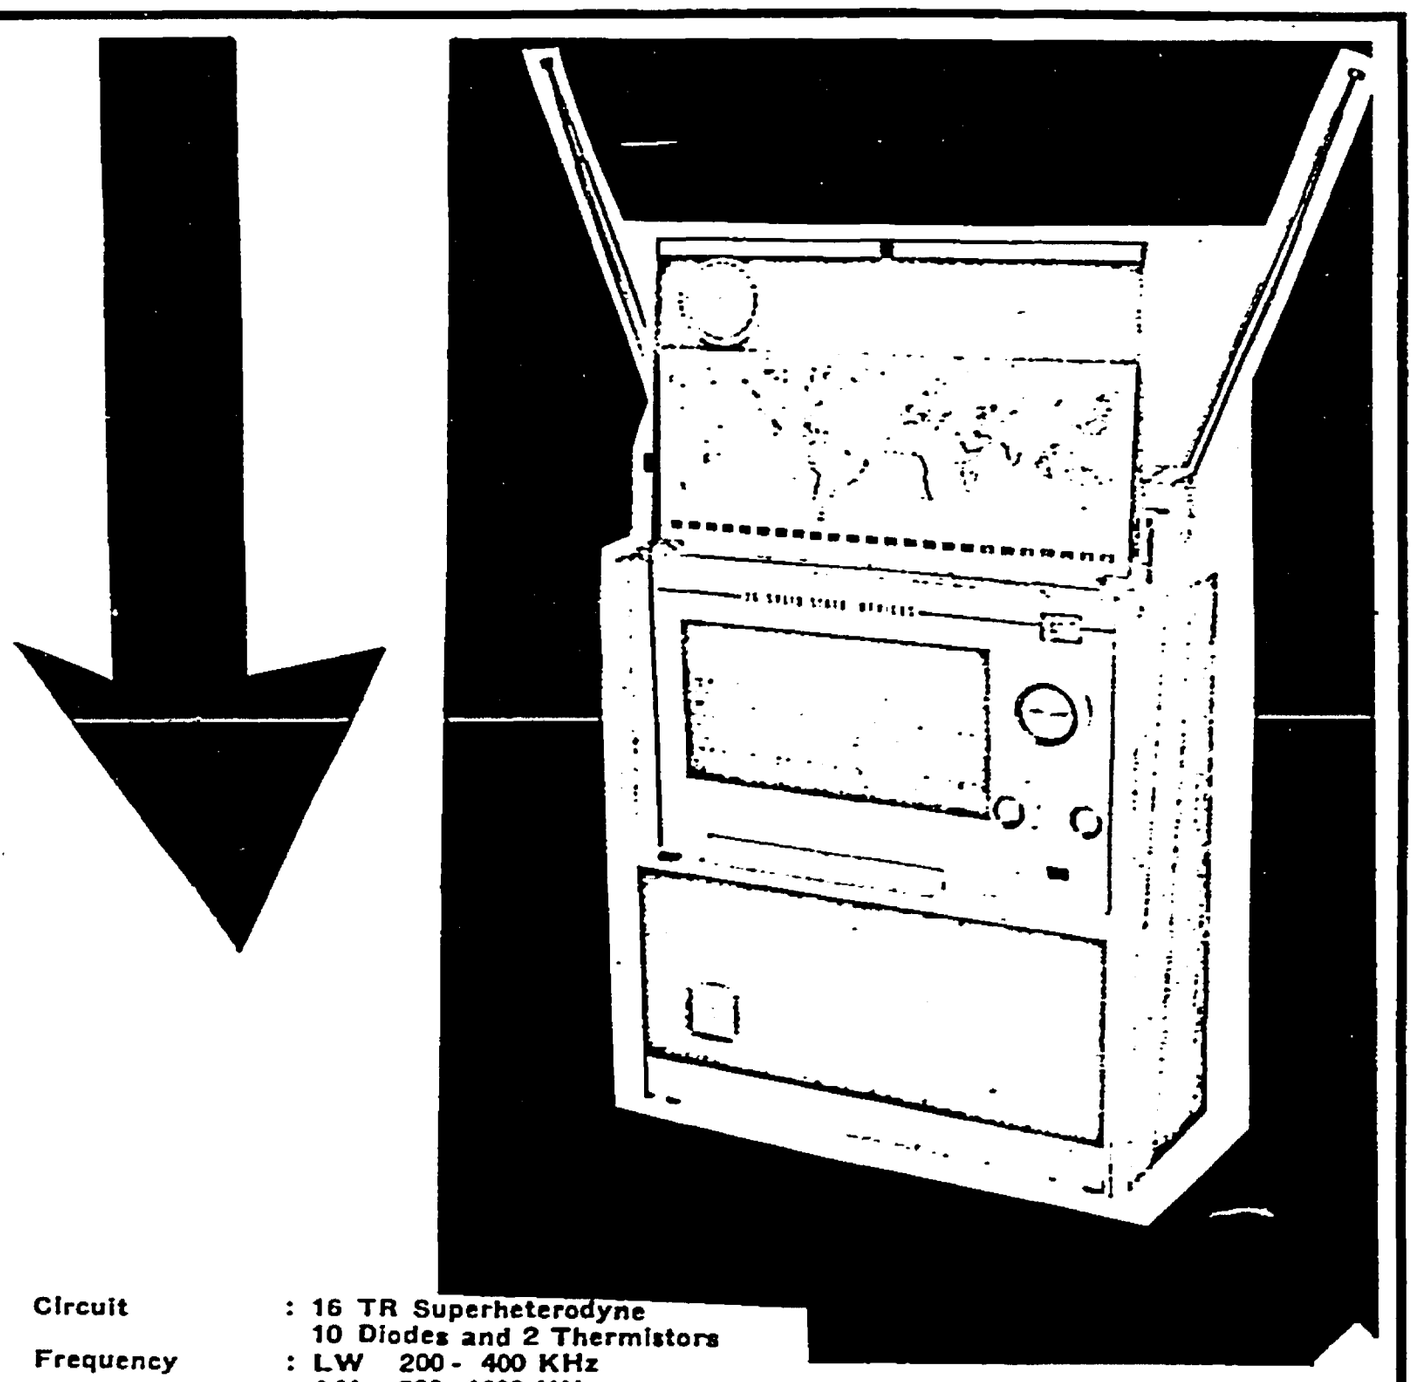
Advancing the power of peace . . . by maintaining the nation's leadership in munitions, missiles, rockets and special weapons systems. This is the mission of Picatinny Arsenal, a vitally important research and engineering center within the Army Materiel Command.

Today's projects cover the entire spectrum of advanced technologies. Picatinny technical people are leaders in their fields — their assistance is sought by industry in cooperative applications of research and engineering. Their papers can be found in the leading technical publications.

Picatinny Arsenal offers you an unusual opportunity to advance in your chosen field of research and engineering.

Consider the career advantages: an excellent salary program with full Federal Civil Service benefits, paid graduate education programs, and a wide array of modern laboratories and test facilities.

Picatinny, readily accessible to some of the country's finest engineering schools, is ideally situated in the lakelands of Northern New Jersey. The area is unparalleled for family living and recreation.



We have a challenge waiting for graduates at all degree levels in Winter Weekend: losses and gains

By GINO GROSSO

Winter Weekend co-chairmen Meryl Kramer and Mike Silverman are measuring originality against profit and calling this year's version of the annual Junior Class event a success.

Though the Weekend lost an estimated $1,000, it gained two new events--the Ski Party and the Kimmel Happening.

The Ski Party co-sponsored by SUSKI dominated Saturday's activities as approximately 1,200 people traveled to Song Mt. between 1 p.m. and 1 a.m. for skiing, beer, and dancing to the sounds of the Eastern Grail and the Jam Factory. Approximately 300 people took part in the ski events.

"The purpose was to bring back the idea of the ski party," said SUSKI vice-president Henry Mason. "Years ago they were popular but they gradually faded out until Winter Weekend was reduced to one major event--the concert."

Mason said the Ski Party broke even and that the response was good enough to reinstitute it as a major part of the Weekend.

The Kimmel Happening is also likely to become an annual event. Director Fred Feld reported that sales, "slow at first," built up enough through Thursday and Friday to give the new event a $450 profit, which will be split evenly between Kimmel-Marion and the Junior Class.

More than 1,000 people crowded into Kimmel Dining Hall to dance to the Jam Factory and watch the light show. "We'll definitely do the whole thing again next year," said Feld.

The $1,000 loss was apparently the price the Junior Class had to pay for one of the best-received concerts in recent years. The Friday night show starred the Fifth Dimension and cost the class an estimated $12,000 to bring the Grammy Award-winning group to Syracuse.

The American Airlines strike caused a last minute hike in concert costs. American was unable to fly the Fifth Dimension's equipment and costumes to the city and the Jam Factory was signed on to open the concert while Mohawk Airlines took over the shipment.

See the campus, do some walking--join the Orange Pages! The official SU tour guides are seeking new members and urge interested persons to attend tonight's meeting at 7 in 307 HL. The short meeting will include an explanation of the group's activities, including tours, college nights and the annual Orange Page banquet.

Following the meeting, interview times for prospective Pages will be set up. These interviews will be conducted on March 13 and 14 from 9 a.m to 4 p.m. Anyone who cannot make it to tonight's meeting call Jane Hixson, ext. 3055.

The Orange Pages presently give four tours a day, Monday through Friday, with two tours on Saturday. Each individual Page, however, gives only one tour a week.

Is it immoral?

Catholic professor to discuss the 'contraception dilemma'

One of the most controversial issues of our day--contraception--will be discussed today at 6:45 p.m. in Grant Auditorium by Germaine Grisez, Ph.D.

In his book, "Contraception and the Natural Law," Grisez confronts the question: "Is contraception intrinsically immoral?" In addition, he presents illuminating comments on the morality of the "Pill" and on subjective factors that must necessarily be considered in any adequate moral theory.

The free lecture, "Contraception--Catholic Crisis," is being presented by the Newman Forum Lecture Series.

A HAUNTING MOVIE!

Wash, wet, soak, hunt, squint, wash, soak, wet, cry a little.

Contact lenses were designed to be a convenience. And they are up to a point. They're convenient enough to wear, once you get used to them, but, until recently, you had to use two or more different lens solutions to properly prepare and maintain contacts. You needed two or three different bottles, lens cases, and you went through more than enough daily rituals to make even the most steadfast individuals consider dropping out.

But now caring for your contacts can be as convenient as wearing them. Now there's Lensine, from the makers of Murine. Lensine is the one lens solution designed for complete contact lens care . . . preparing, cleansing, and soaking.

Just a drop or two of Lensine before you insert your lens prepares it for your eye. Lensine makes your contacts, which are made of modern plastics, compatible with your eye. How? Lensine is an "isotonic" solution. That means it's made to blend with the eye's natural fluids. So a simple drop or two coats the lens, forming a sort of comfort zone around it.

Cleaning your contacts with Lensine fights bacteria and foreign deposits that build up during the course of the day. And for overnight soaking, Lensine provides a handy contact canister on the bottom of every bottle. Soaking your contacts in Lensine between wearing periods assures you of proper lens hygiene.

Improper storage between wearings permits the growth of bacteria on your lenses. This is a sure cause of eye irritation and, in some cases, it can endanger your vision. Bacteria cannot grow in Lensine. Lensine is sterile, self-sanitizing, and antiseptic.

Let your contacts be the convenience they were designed to be. The name of the game is Lensine. Lensine, made by the Murine Company, Inc.

Are you cut out for contact sports?

Carlin's matmen have ups and downs; Rust top candidate for Eastern crown

By ADAM DAWSON

If someone had looked at the wrestling lineup at the start of school this year, he would have rated the SU grapplers high in the pre-season poll. The wrestling world's Bible, "The Amateur Wrestling News," tabbed the squad for honorable mention in the top 10 national rankings.

However, while completing the entire dual meet schedule, the team never approached its potential.

One of the prime reasons for this failure was a lack of depth. The pre-season lineup boasted Ralph Manaker, Joe Palmieri, Richie Haagen, Eric Greenberg, John Terboss, Woody Barry, Steve Parker, Vince Paolano, Bob Rust and Jerry Beach. In fact, Carlin had such a fine lineup that he could afford the luxury of having Doug Garr and Lee Castner as reserves.

With the absence of Beach at heavyweight, Carlin began a search which turned up footballer John Cherundolo. John volunteered to wrestle despite the fact that he hadn't competed in three years.

However, injuries, dissension and non-appearance prevented the championship calibre lineup from ever leaving the dreams of coach Ed Carlin and entering competition. Except for a brief "curtain call" by Beach, neither he nor Castner returned to the mats following football season.

The start of the season found the grapplers in New London, Connecticut, vying for team honors in the Coast Guard Academy tournament. First place finishes by Paolano, Parker and Barry plus a second by Greenberg, gave the team enough points for the title. The victory left such fine teams as Lock Haven, East Stroudsburg and The Maritime Academy in their wake.

With this good performance came some very bad news. Haagen suffered a severe shoulder separation and Terboss tore some ligaments in his knee. John attempted a brief comeback later in the season, but it proved hopeless.

The team lost three of its first four meets and following a 34-7 thrashing at the hands of Lehigh, dissension surfaced. As a result, Barry, Parker, Garr and Manaker were no longer with the team. This, and the ineligibility of Paolano left Carlin with quite a few holes in his lineup.

Losses to Penn State, Army, Pitt, Cornell and Springfield sandwiched a victory over Ithaca. A final win over Colgate closed out the regular season with a 3-8 team record.

With just the Eastern and National tournaments remaining on the schedule, success can only be measured in individual performances.

Consistently fine performances were turned in by Rust, Greenberg and Paolano.

Rust's 8-1 season log speaks for itself. One only needs to say that it came against some of the toughest 191 pounders in the East. His loss came in the season's finale against Gene Detwiler of Colgate. Detwiler is the same wrestler who defeated Tom Schlendorf when he was on his way to the National Championship.

The 4-3 loss came on a penalty point which Detwiler was awarded because the ref called Rust for intentionally going off the mat. As Carlin said, "To call the awarding the point questionable is a compliment. We'll protest to the highest authorities and we have films to back us up."

Needless to say, Bob will be hungary for revenge when, in all probability, he will meet Detwiler in the Eastern tournament finals next week.

Another of Carlin's bright spots was senior, Eric Greenberg. After taking a second in the Coast Guard event, Eric has compiled a 7-1-2 slate.

Eric beat or tied such stellar wrestlers as Army's Marc Hoffman and Lehigh's Tom Muir. Only a defeat at the hands of Penn State's Clyde Frantz mars his record.

Meanwhile, Paolano has chalked up a 5-0 record. Seemingly unaware that he should be out of shape after being out of action for over a month, Paolano has registered decisions of 12-3, 6-0 and 15-2 in addition to flattening two opponents in the first period.

All three of these boys will be counted upon heavily in the EIWA tournament, but for the team as a whole to make a creditable showing, Carlin says, "a lot of boys will have to come around."

Track, gym teams win; mermen drop close decision

Three SU athletic teams closed out their 1968-69 meet seasons over the weekend with the gymnastics and track teams winning while the swimming team dropped a close decision.

The gymnasts notched their second win of the season in outscoring Pittsburgh, 109.875-97.075. Pitt's record falls to 0-7 for the season.

Ernie Santangelo continued his fine showings for the Orange as he took a first in the long horse event while finishing second in the high bar and floor exercise.

Harvey Silverstein copped the parallel bar event while Bill Wismann triumphed in the high bar and Tony DeStefano took first in the side horse. George Stalter scored 9.10 in winning the competition in still rings.

The track team copped 10 of a possible 11 first places en route to a crushing victory over Rochester and the University of Buffalo in a triangular meet at Manley Field House. SU had 73½ points while Rochester and U of B were far behind with 28 and 11 markers respectively.

Guy Roberts cracked his own Syracuse record in the 600 yard run by two-tenths of a second as he streaked home in 1:11.3. Larry Zuller, the other half of the cindermen's dynamic duo, won the two mile run and tied with teammate Dave Crans for a first in the mile. Both Roberts and Zuller will participate in the NCAA meet later this month.

The SU pole vault mark was tied during the meet when Orange vaulter, Don Siddon, flew 13 feet six inches over the bar. He failed in three tries at 14-1. The team will now prep for the IC4A meet to be held in New York City this weekend.

Meanwhile, the swimming team narrowly missed in a bid for its eighth win of the campaign as Colgate triumphed, 53-51. A disqualification of an SU entry who had apparently finished second in the 200 meter breaststroke proved to be the margin of defeat.

The mermen won seven of the 12 events but poor showings for second and third spots proved costly.

Pete Schacht, co-captain of Jon Buzzard's swim unit, scored a double as he copped the 500 and 1000 freestyle events. Ross Prossner took a first in the 50-meter freestyle and later swam on the victorious 400-meter freestyle relay squad.

Other winners for the Orangemen were Tom Skuce, in one-meter diving, Larry Shulman, in the 100-meter freestyle and Al Comly, who finished first in the 200-meter breaststroke.

Good bye, Mick

By MIKE WEBER
Sports Editor

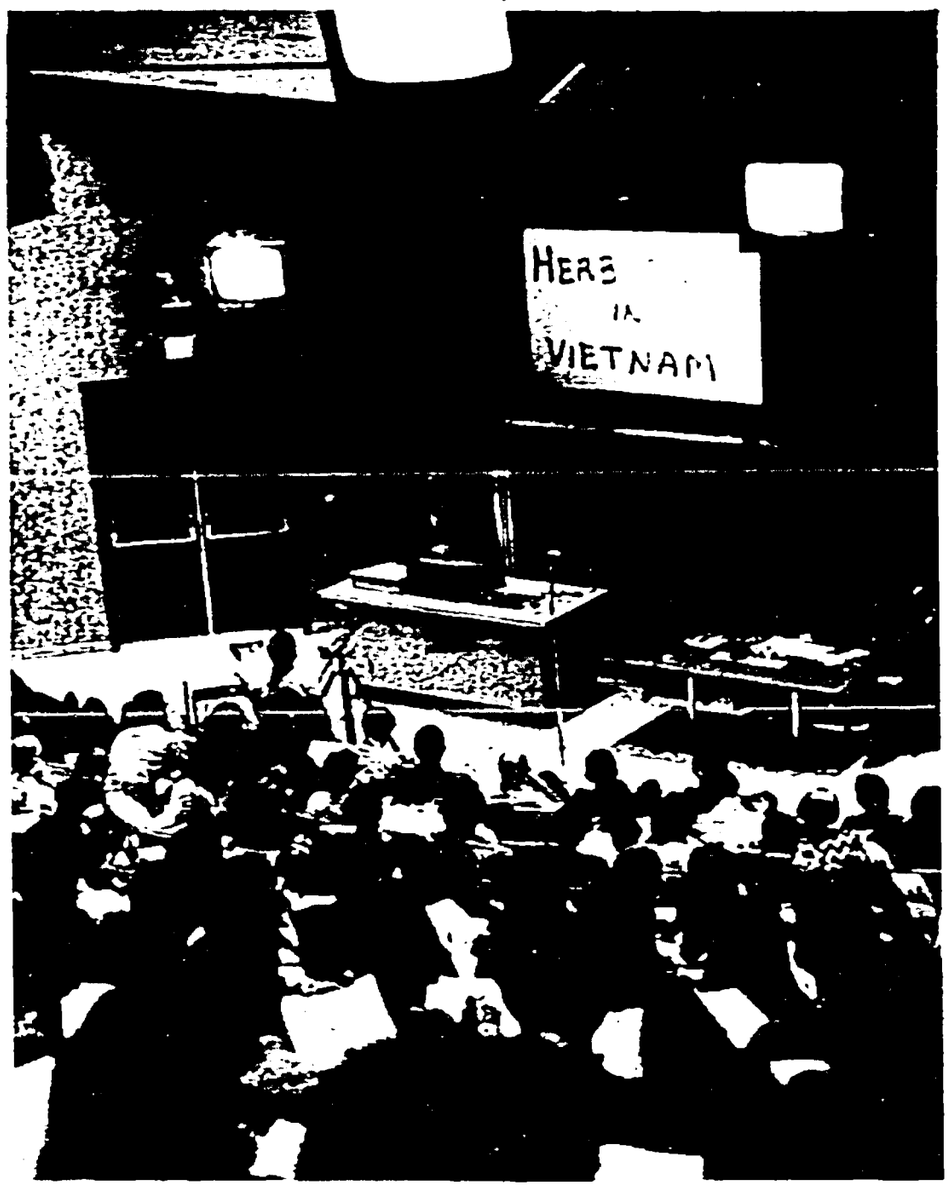
A piece of our youth has just died. All we have left are magical memories provided by the blonde bomber from Commerce, Oklahoma.

"The Mick" has hung up the spikes. Incredible, unbelievable, you name it and it's not an exaggeration. Mickey Mantle is an institution with New York sports fans. He is the last "superstar" in the long line of Yankee greats. Ruth, Gehrig, Dimaggio-Mantle.

But, Mick was ours. He was the man who grew up as a major leaguer as we grew from children to young adults. He was breaking in to the "bigs" the same time many of us were breaking out of our playsuits.

In 1952, his first full season with the Yankees, he hit .311 with 23 home runs. It was a fine season to be sure, but just a small sample of what the "Commerce Comet" had in store for us all.

Of course, it was 1956 when he reached the pinnacle. The triple crown went to Mantle on the basis of a .353 average, 52 homers and 130 rbi's.



But, statistics are just numbers. Mickey will be more remembered for what he was than what he did. He was the most dramatic player to don a uniform in recent times. When there was a big play to be made, a clutch hit to get, "the Mick" was there.

The countless great catches he made, coming out of nowhere. The blazing Mantle speed which matched the best for so long. His pinch hit home run against Baltimore in 1965. The circuit shot against Barney Schultz and the St. Louis Cardinals in the 1964 World Series. These memorable events and more, make up the legend--the true legend of Mickey Mantle.

He was a team leader without equal. Even as his legs began to give way and severely hamper his playing ability, the Mantle magic was there. Just to see the "big man" on the bench was enough for the Yanks to make the big effort.

And, now, it's all over. There'll be no more standing ovations as number seven takes his place in the batting circle to pinch hit. No more mysterious tingles inside the fans when Mantle strides towards home plate.

The end of an era? Yes, and much more. With baseball's interest beginning to wane under the onslaught of football, the game can ill afford to lose a great like "the Mick." But, we, the fans. We are the big losers. Mantle has retired and we will miss him

AVID LISTENERS AND PARTICIPANTS crammed in the Physics Building Auditorium yesterday afternoon for a discussion and re-examination of the relationship between researchers and society. Here, Daniel F. Jackson, SU professor of civil engineering, lectures on Herbicides in Vietnam. (Photo by Haxo)

Research and society scrutinized intensely

By STEVE TOBER

Several hundred SU students and faculty members yesterday supported the March Fourth Research Strike, conducted at major universities across the country. An overflow crowd, including those required to attend, filled the aisles of the Physics Building Auditorium to hear speakers discuss the impact of science and technology on modern society.

The first speaker, Dr. Daniel Jackson, professor of civil engineering, concerned himself with the problem of "Environmental Pollution," or what he called "the problem of having too much of the wrong thing at the wrong time at the wrong place." Aided by a series of slides, Jackson counterpointed views of natural beauty with pollution. Local eyesores included Onondaga Lake which the professor described as "a cesspool with a bad case of halitosis."

He compared the inadequate percentage of national expenditure for environmental science to the military budget expenditure. According to Jackson, the Federal budget for the fiscal year 1968 was 194.1 billion. Of this, forty percent, some $79 billion, was designated for defense. Some $448 million was geared for National Science Foundation; not an adaquate amount, said Jackson, to deal with the pressing problem of pollution. "I wonder if we can afford the Department of Defense," he commented.

He ended his speech by recalling the civilizations of Rome and Greece, of which he said, "They fell from within from conflict." Relating their degree of civilization to present conditions, Jackson questioned the future of the United States, if the consideration of internal environmental improvement remaines secondary to defense. Calling upon the undergraduate to understand the "outside world," Jackson said "Our hope is with you."

The next speaker was Dr. Robert Seidenberg, a practicing psychiatrist, who discussed "Human Aggression." Differing from Jackson's view on environmental pollution, Seidenberg discussed what he called "internal pollution," man's instinct for violence. By using interpretations from both Freud and Einstein, he pointed out that open aggression may serve to preserve the Self; but more importantly, Seidenberg emphasized, aggression is engrained in human nature, and is thus everpresent. He continued, however, by saying that in today's society, with the threat of quantitative destruction, man's instinct for aggression has lessened.

By channeling man's inherent hostility, Seidenberg said, "we must act aggressively today to stop such things as overkill. We must stop institutionalized violence, against the blacks, the youth, all under the heading of law and order."

Professor C.L. Hardin, a member of the SU philosophy department, spoke on the "Ethical Uses of Science." "The main thing which characterizes our society," Hardin said, "is science and technology." The ethics lie in question when we try to impose our technology onto new

SCOPE challenge

Political report echoes in Senate

By COLETTE STALLINGS

"My contention is that there is no need to look to Chicago nor Miami nor Washington for the evils our generation professes to hate."

Giving a full report of the Student Committee on Political Equity (SCOPE) to Student Senate last night, Chairman Fred Tuccillo continued, "We are practicing the very same evils here and some will stand tonight and tell you to let things stand."

Calling attention to the unusually well-attended meeting and the large number of guests, Tuccillo continued, "They are the people with the highest stake in this. Take a good look around. Look at the size of tonight's crowd. Look at the faces. Faces we never see in this Senate unless someone challenges the power of the political parties on this campus."

After citing past instances of political corruption, Tuccillo recalled that : "Under various pressures earlier this year, both parties went to 'individual membership' instead of membership by Greek house or living center." He indicated that corruption is apparently not at an end, "giving the testimony of the president of the Inter-Fraternity Council (IFC) who, according to Tuccillo, said, "Fraternities will join en masse. They say they will do it. I'm not sure, although I know they will do it."

Saying that he wanted to prove the sincerity and freedom from political bias of his work with SCOPE, Tuccillo resigned from Senate and pledged not to run for any political office while a student at Syracuse University.

Concluding the report with a plea for reform, Tuccillo warned, "This senate has a small enough claim to the respect of the students of Syracuse University. Back down tonight, and it will have no claims at all."

Senate proceeded to approve the initial sections of the SCOPE—prepared elections article of the UG constitution, but adjourned before the controversial section concerning membership in campus political parties was brought to discussion.

The legislative articles, including creation of the office of president pro tempore of Senate who is to be vice president of UG, a committee on finance to review the UG budget and a credentials commission to review the qualifications of senators, were passed.

Senate approved the resolution presented by the Peace and Freedom Party calling for opposition to any bills presented to the New York State Legislature regarding witholding scholarships.

National merger planned between ZBT, Phi Sig

Two local chapters of national fraternities are in the process of learning, the hard way, the meaning of brotherhood.

A proposal has been drawn up for presentation to March 29 national conventions of Zeta Beta Tau and Phi Sigma Delta concerning a possible national merger between the two fraternities.

According to Paul Addams, administrative secretary of the National Interfraternity Conference, "This will be the biggest merger in a couple of decades." The last large-scale merger ten years ago, involved Phi Sigma Delta, merging with Phi Alpha.

Details involving the merger have been the subject of much controversy here in the past week. Rumers have circulated since early last week concerning the status of the two local chapters involved.

Larry Reichenberg, president of the local chapter of Phi Sigma Delta, commented during an interview, "It will be a merger, but not a 50-50 one. The fraternity will be called Zeta Beta Tau in cases where there were campuses with chapters of both houses present. However, nothing is definite, and we're leading the opposition to the merger at the convention."

In a letter to all chapters, Phi Sigma Delta National Council outlined the proposal and its meaning. The combination would result in a 110-chapter fraternity with an operating budget of well over $350,000. Of these 110 chapters, ZBT has 75, Phi Sig has 49, with conflicts reducing the total.

In stating reasons for the merger, Phi Sig wrote "We realized the geographic composition of Zeta Beta Tau would uniquely compliment our own. The organizational structure of Zeta Beta Tau afforded much to our undergraduate chapters. Above all, we were aware of Zeta Beta Tau's national reputation, one of quality and excellence."

Peter Benvenuto, president of the local chapter of ZBT remarked, "Anything that we would say would be premature. Until March 29, nothing is definite."

History repeats

Tuition getting 'uppity'

By MITCH LANE

For the third straight year the administraton has announced a tuition raise for incoming freshmen. Although the raise was announced only for the new freshmen, other students are suspicious of the administrations' intentions concerning upperclassmen. Their suspicions are not without merit.

In 1967, the raise for freshmen was announced early in March. When questioned, the administration, speaking through the News Bureau, specified that the tuition raise would apply to only freshmen. One month later it was announced that the tuition raise applied to all undergraduates.

In 1968, the freshman tuition raise was announced on Feb. 23. The next day, the administration said a tuition raise for upperclassmen was "under study." The upperclass tuition raise was formally announced April 17.

This year the freshman tuition raise was announced on March 1. The administration has said that "no decision has been made about next year's tuition and fees for students other than incoming freshmen."

Judging from past tuition raises the administration runs little risk of student dissent if it hits upperclass bankbooks once again.

One student commented that she was "accustomed to tuition raises" and therefore didn't think anything about them. The 1967 raise was opposed by a "Go State Committee" which sponsored a rally on the quad drawing 400 people. A week after the rally, F.A. Wingate, now vice president and treasurer, said "Syracuse will not be a state school in the next ten years."

Student government also opposed the tuition raise and called for a meeting with the administration. Wingate and Dean Carleton appeared to answer the polite questions of twenty interested student citizens. Similar opposition was also met and dealt with in 1948.

Pay as you grow

The latest increases in tuition, room and board and the General Student Fee are about as justifiable as another hike in federal income tax. The government can't really ask for higher taxes when it's already spending too much on war and too little to provide services and welfare, and doing that shoddily besides.

Likewise, the University raises its fees as it builds and builds, but does nothing to improve the education it gives or the spirit it engenders in its students.

It is indeed admirable that a university should have a monumental library and a towering dorm complex, but why devote so much energy and money to buildings and none to filling in the gaps between them? In the past several years we've had a physics building, we've had Newhouse, St. Mary's the new wing at Sims and now the engineering building. An impressive list, but what are they doing to psyche up an apathy-ridden campus? Where is there some real SU spirit? Where is the student union?

How can the administration rationalize a hike in our tuition (you may as well accept the fact that it will hit us sooner or later, no matter what they say) when a professor in the prestigious Maxwell School can urge students to avoid certain courses in the school because of an inept instructor, or a popular instructor in Newhouse can console students to accept the bad courses with the good ones? For $2100, why should we?

While realizing that without facilities a university isn't much good, somewhere in the plan to stretch SU from Erie Boulevard to Rock Cut Road, there should be at least a token attempt to make SU college life a little more stimulating, and an increase in costs a little more deserved.

Greek merger

The proposed merger of Zeta Beta Tau and Phi Sigma Delta national fraternities presents an awkard situation for campuses like SU where each has chapter representation.

Rather than expect that the local chapters will either merge or become unaffiliated locals, the national offices should propose a plan allowing for a gradual unification of the local houses, or allow them to remain independent until unification is more desirable. The immediate situation is unfortunate for the brothers of both houses. But it may have some implications that will be a needed boost to the fraternity world.

Fraternity chapters on many campuses and national organizations as well are suffering from a decline in membership. Rather than letting these fraternities die a slow and discouraging death, some attention might be given to the idea of fraternity mergers. Not ever fraternity at SU is strong; more are weakening with each less successful rush.

The Greek life still offers advantages that the University has denied independents, and it does not deserve to dwindle away through attrition. The Greek system has done little to thwart its slow death, and now a serious consideration of the fraternity conglomerate might be worthwhile.

Observations

SU is a poor host

By Dan Schlossberg

It's too bad Syracuse University is a poor host because the city of Syracuse certainly doesn't have much to offer the visitor.

When a student has a guest at SU for a weekend, he is not only faced with responsibility for the person's entertainment and gastronomic needs, but also must provide lodging for what we assume will be a weekend stay. And, this can be a big headache if the guest is up for a big weekend.

Collegians at some universities don't have the housing problem. A guest at George Washington University in Washington, D.C., for example, can sleep on a cot provided free by the dormitory in which he or she is staying. Rutgers University, the New Jersey State College, makes it even easier. Rutgers, New Brunswick, moved out a floor of male residents to make room for female guests who were on campus for a big weekend.

The problem can be just as easily solved at Syracuse--and there are a number of alternate solutions.

First, why should female visitors to the campus be subject to University curfew regulations? Certainly in loco parentis, if extended to these non-residents, would be more than a nuisance; it would be an outright insult. A guest should be given better treatment. When will SU provide guest keys for female guests who stay in a dorm or a sorority?

Second, why can't meal tickets be arranged in such a way that the SU student--who doesn't eat all his meals anyway--can use some of his paid-for but uneaten meals for his weekend guest?

And third, and most important, what's stopping the University from converting the existing unoccupied cottages into campus hostels (obviously separate male and female accommodations need be provided) which would house guests--with no curfew--at a fee of $2 per night?

There is, of course, the chance that the more exorbitant of the local coeds might seize upon the chance to evade curfew by staying in the hostels themselves, but it's easy enough to find out who's from SU--or is this too much to ask?

When the Kosher Kitchen was scouting around for a place to move last fall (it has since found a site opposite Chancellor Tolley's walled mansion), it was offered the old Seymour Cottage building. Can't similar sites be found for the opening of campus hostels?

The University can hardly be opposed to the idea. After all, it would be a profit-making venture. The original investment of refurbishing would be minimal; the cottages are already designed for sleeping and would need little more than patches on the holes in the walls, a good paint job, and a bit of decorating. The buildings are not being used now anyway. In a month, the hostels would be making a profit.

Wouldn't it be a boost if unused buildings suddenly began making money for the University and, at the same time, made things much easier for SU students and their weekend guests?

Letters to the editor

Scientists

To the Editor:

I have wondered why the scientists of MIT, Syracuse and other universities could not discuss and study their grievances on a few evenings, or a Saturday, on their own time rather than setting aside March 4 to discuss the subject on their employers' time.

I would have greater respect for their sincerity if they did not seem to be making this event another opportunity to disrupt university life.

Theodore Pierson

ROTC

To the Editor:

I read with no small amount of dismay the letter written by Stuart Levin (March 4) in defense of ROTC programs on campus. It is amazing that any rational student at SU or any other campus, be he in ROTC or not, could in all honesty advocate the arguments presented by Levin, and patently avoid what is perhaps the basic issue in question, that of ROTC's position in the College of Liberal Arts.

In the first place, ROTC does NOT, in fact, "offer a viable alternative to those male students who wish to provide a continuity in their studies from undergraduate to graduate levels." It provides a solution only for those who at the same time wish to enter military service as officers, to serve at least three to four years in active duty, and to sacrifice 15 credits to ROTC

Secondly, I object strongly to Levin's statement, "ROTC provides the nation with leaders rather than followers." I myself entered the ROTC program first semester of my freshman year, and before I was quickly disillusioned, was able to observe what kind of leadership cadets are given. This is limited to absorbing the commands dispatched by one's superior officers and passing them on to the unfortunate cadets of inferior rank.

I feel, therefore, in light of the above criticisms, that any institution diametrically opposed to open and creative discussion and criticism has no place in a college of liberal arts. It is, on the other hand, harmful to the ideals of a liberal education, since it demands the participant to artificially "shut off" his powers of inquiry for a few hours a week and allows him just as artificially to turn them on again for the remainder of the week. I do not deny ROTC a place on campus, for the same reasons I am not opposed to gym or to any extracurricular activity. By all means, ROTC should remain on campus for the sake of those students wishing to pursue its programs, but it should not be academically credited in the College of Liberal Arts.

I agree wholeheartedly with Levin that ROTC does provide valuable programs of financial assistance to talented cadets. This, however, would not be affected by relegating ROTC to separate status at the University.

However, the reason for ROTC's existence is not that it provides undergraduate deferments, nor that it provides access to leadership programs, nor that it provides scholarships, nor that it is free--nor certainly for the completely absurd and fantastic reason that it provides alternatives for history and political science courses! Other programs can provide these things as well.

Peace Prize

To the Editor:

Professor Wolfson, in his reply to Chancellor Tolley's Bar Association address, was too modest.

It is regrettable that Chancellor Tolley did not name those faculty members whom he was indicting. We can all guess. I presume that Bob Wolfson himself would make most lists, along with Tussing and Burkhead; perhaps George Stern and Mike Sawyer qualify as well.

The difference lies in this: I identify a particular group of faculty members as making a great contribution to the continued state of relative tranquillity we have at Syracuse while the Chancellor holds them responsible for the unrest that exists.

We do have faculty members (and administrators) who talk to students, listen to them, understand them without patronizing rebuttal, and initiate actions responsive to student needs. Because these people are here, others of us, who lack the personality to do what they do, have enjoyed good relations with our students. I am grateful.

The Chancellor of the University ought to award them a special Peace Prize.

Erwin Fishman

Editor's note: The following was received in response to the article and seal printed by the Daily Orange in connection with Chancellor Tolley's recent speech.

News reports of Chancellor William P. Tolley's address to the Onondaga County Bar Association on Feb. 22 have quoted the Chancellor as criticizing the Syracuse University "Faculty Senate." Nowhere in his address did the Chancellor refer to the "Faculty Senate" or "University Senate" of Syracuse University, or any other university. Neither do such terms appear in the full text of the address released to the news media a few days after his address. The Chancellor's address was tape recorded at the Hotel Syracuse. Below is a transcript of that portion of the address where it has been alleged that he spoke about the "Faculty Senate:"

"...If I were writing a skit for a faculty show, I would have an artist come in and paint a coat of arms in honor of some of the faculty members I know."

THE BROTHERHOODS of these two fraternities, Zeta Beta Tau and Phi Sigma Delta, may be soon "united" by a merger of their national corporations. (Photo by John Reed)

Fraternities may merge . . .

ZBT, one of the reasons for the merger was the fact that ZBT could pick up much needed strength in the midwest area, a location where Phi Sig is relatively strong and ZBT is non-existent.

Locally, a problem has arisen. Members of ZBT have been told that no one would have rights to their house but themselves, unless they decide otherwise. However, members of the Phi Sig local have been told that they will become brothers of ZBT national, and be entitled to all priviledges presently enjoyed by the local ZBT chapter.

Syracuse is not alone in this problem. There are 25 cases of campus conflicts. According to national representatives of both houses, meetings will be arranged between the conflicting chapters, with their respective executive boards, alumni executive boards and national representatives present.

At SU, several solutions have been proposed. First, either local brotherhood could deactivate and become a local house, with no national affiliation, leaving the other the ZBT name. Another proposal involved the actual merging of brotherhoods, with a certain number from each house living the physical structure.

A final proposal called for a new wing to be added to one of the houses, able to house the new part of the brotherhood. Lack of land, and desire, could stymie this plan.

No final decisions will be made until at least March 29, when both conventions will take place. But it is significant to note that both local chapters involved will be leading the opposition to the merger in their respective conventions.

'The Catholic thing'

Contraceptive crisis capsuled

By MARK MASTERSON

The Catholic church is in a period of crisis over bishops who disagree with their church's teaching on birth control.

The issue was explained last night in Grant Auditorium by Dr. Germain Grisez, professor of philosophy at Georgetown University. Some 90 persons listened to the Catholic layman make his presentation.

The crisis involves some bishops who have issued statements upholding the right of the laiety to follow their own conscience regardless of official teaching. To this Dr. Grisez believes it is formost that Catholics patiently study Pope Paul VI's encyclical "Humanae Vitae" which says contraception is an objective evil.

Grisez pressed the fact that Catholics must base their decisions on faith. "It's not a question of making a choice, it's a question of not having anything else. You are only bound by what the church teaches. The only thing if you're a Catholic is the Catholic thing."

He suggested the situation was created by the Pope's "unprecendented" answer to the problem. While the Pope has made a solemn teaching statement, says Grisez, he has not spoken ex cathedra, "by power of office." He further pointed out that the Pope left room for subjective consideration of the morality of contraception.

The papal encyclical affirms that the life-giving and the love-giving aspects of intercourse cannot be separated. This conclusion was based on the Christian belief that treasures the absolute value of human life, said Grisez. "He was not concerned with giving philosophical proof."

Grisez re-stressed that Catholics are bound by their faith to look at the objective moral side of contraception as presented by the Pope. The subjective aspect was not intended as a loophole, he instructed.

A HAUNTING MOVIE!

Piano, drums concert today

A lecture demonstration on piano and drums by Halim El Dabh, associate professor of music at Howard University and resident composer in its College of Fine Arts, will be given tonight at 8 p.m. in the physics building auditorium. El Dabh's concert is a feature of International Student Week (March 1-9). Admission is $1.

El Dabh's program at Syracuse University will consist of folk music collected from Ethiopia, Niger, Mali, Senegal and Nubia-Egypt; original compositions will African idioms on such instruments as the thumb piano, the talking drum and Derabucca drum He will also play several of his compositions for piano.

Subjects needed for psychological testing. Married female subjects between the ages of 18 and 35 needed for a study related to normal menstrual and reproductive functions. Three sessions are involved and a fee of $30 will be paid.

This study is being conducted at the Upstate Medical Center. If interested, call Mrs. Baum at 473-5775 for information.

'Hours are ours!' frosh coeds sing

By HELENE MACDONALD
Associate Editor

The battle may have been a long and often noisy one, but "liberation" was a quiet event. Freshmen women celebrated their first night of optional hours Saturday and, according to reports from dorm directors and coordinators, the extension of the system went smoothly.

By 4 p.m. Friday, the dean of women's staff had received parental permission, checked academic standing and cleared over 500 freshmen women for optional hours. The list will grow as the staff receives permission letters from more parents.

Proctor

Most living centers simply extended their existing optional hours programs to include freshmen. In Flint and Day, where girls proctor after curfew to let those on optional hours into the dorm, freshmen will proctor with sophomores to learn how the system works.

In Shaw, there was a shortage of keys which the dorm council plans to remedy soon. Other dorms had slight mix-ups with sign-out cards but no serious problems developed.

Dorm councils and head residents had met with freshmen before Saturday to explain eligibility requirements and each living center's optional hours policies and procedures.

Student magazine

Those were 'The Days...'

By RONI ZLOKOWER
Associate Editor

The short month of February is gone, but the "Days of February" remain at SU as the first issue of a new student magazine.

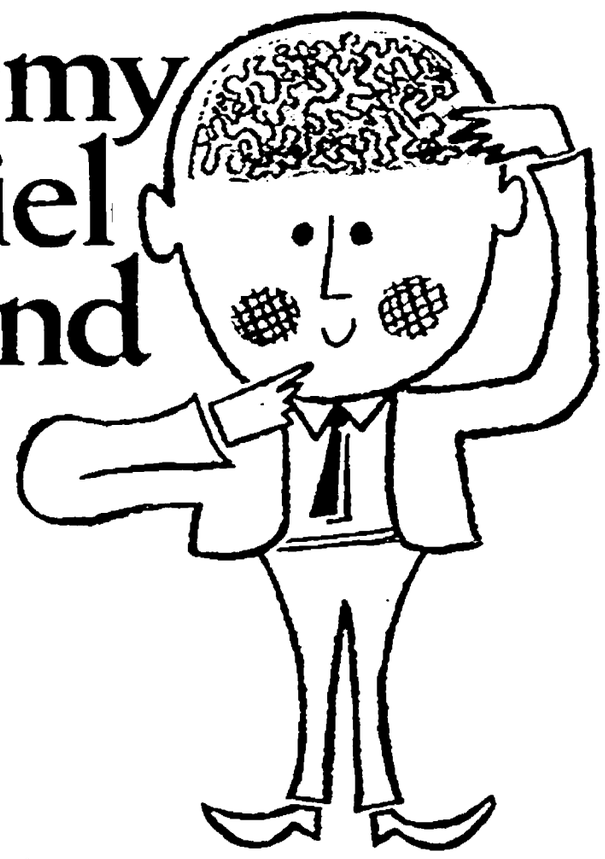
"We hope to become a medium of expression for all Syracuse University creative talents--that doctrine includes all art forms: prose, poetry, art work, photography as well as excellence in the art of publication," wrote editor publisher Robert Meade in his first editorial.

Meade, a sophomore journalism major, first thought of producing the magazine in the fall. "Days of November" was to be the name of the first issue. Lack of financial support from the university or any outside source destroyed the chance of fall publication. Too immersed in his plan to give up, Meade continued to rally student support and gradually built up a small but dedicated student staff.

The target for printing was moved ahead to January but further financial problems pushed the target date into February. The staff solicited students' work through ads in the Daily Orange, through the editor's appeals to journalism classes, and by word of mouth. Business manager, Steve Smith, continually sought advertising revenue and outside donations in an effort to make the magazine pay for itself.

Last week, "Days of February," volume 1, no. 1 appeared under a striking orange cover in campus buildings and dining halls for perusal and consumption by all members of the University.

On the front cover is a superimposed grating photo of a woman, done by graduate student Steve Grossman. Because the magazine is "dedicated to the passing of time," a calendar of February rests on the photograph with a tear drop falling upon it. A poetic saga of the magazine's conception is on the back cover. Contained within is an artistically arranged collection of prose, non-fiction, poetry, photography, ads, and sketches.



The "Days of...." literary magazine, now published independently, as a non profit student organization, differs in many ways from other student magazines put out by SU students. Its editors do not want it to be a "typical literary magazine."

"Our purpose is not to put out a technically perfect literary magazine," they state. Their goal is to make it as human-looking and as eye appealing as possible. Lacking a standard format, the magazine will be artistically arranged according to its content.

The staff is comprised mostly of sophomores, a fact which gives credence to the magazine's future. Editor Meade and business manager Smith encourage anyone who would like to gain experience in magazine work to join the staff. "Contributions to the magazine," they emphasize "can come from anyone at the university."

The next issue is scheduled to appear in early April as "The Days of April." The staff will continue to seek financial support from the University and outside sources.

why would any thinking engineer or scientist even consider an r&d career with the army materiel command

Because he is a thinking engineer or scientist, one who reacts to hard facts, not fuzzy hearsay or misguided myths.

And the incontrovertible fact is that the U.S. Army Materiel Command offers its civilian personnel more immediate responsibility, more creative latitude, more diversity, more room for rapid growth than private industry can.

Right now, for example, U.S. Army Materiel Command has programs under way in 7 highly exciting, challenging and innovative fields. They include aircraft v/stol & helicopters, electronics, missiles, mobility equipment, munitions, tank-automotive, weapons. Also total capability research laboratories.

Each field offers wide areas of activity. You can get involved in R & D. Or Design. Or Quality Assurance and Reliability. Or Procurement and Production. Or Test and Evaluation.

Whatever area you choose...and the choice is up to you...you'll get the strongest backing possible in terms of funding, facilities and highly skilled professionals.

And a career with the U.S. Army Materiel Command is not only satisfying professionally. But financially, too. You get excellent salaries, superior Civil Service benefits, good working climate and a choice of 30 locations. And reassuring job stability.

So, if you have a degree in engineering, mathematics or the physical sciences...and would like to select rather than settle for a career, give a second thought to the U.S. Army Materiel Command. To help make up your mind, send for our "Creative Careers" booklet. And be sure to see our campus interviewer when he visits your college.

'Chilly spy,' buttons up Hillel plans

Hillel will kick off its week-long United Jewish Appeal (UJA) Campaign today to raise funds for UJA projects in Israel and European nations.

"Having been to Israel this past summer," observed Hillel President Arthur Koch, "I've seen first hand how important helping organizations like the UJA really is."

Fund-raising activities will include a movie Saturday night in Gifford Auditorium, "The Spy Who Came in From the Cold." A UJA movie will be screened at the Sunday night supper in Watson Dining Hall at 5:30 p.m.

"Israel Must Live" buttons will be sold at HBC patio throughout the one-week campaign.

Professor Gabriel Cohen, one of Israel's distinguished historians, will lecture on "The Middle East and the Great Powers after the Six-Day War" on Monday, March 10, at 3 p.m. in Grant Auditorium.

Correction

In one of yesterday's articles on SU's research operations, the Syracuse University Research Corporation's budget was inadvertently confused with that of the Syracuse Research Institute.

SU Research Corporation is currently operating on a budget of approximately $6,000,000 for the fiscal year. The most it has ever taken in for one year was $8,000,000.

The figure of $13,254,463 which appeared yesterday is really the 1968 budget of Syracuse University Research Institute, which represents the research activities of the faculty of the University.

Syracuse University Research Corp. (SURC) is a separately chartered, independent, non-profit research organization.

societies, where we could not ethically take our mores of religious beliefs.

"New societies tend to take on our social system with our technology," Hardin pointed out. And this in turn determines the degree of autonomy to which a society may be led, in determining its political, social, and economic values. The ethical course which science is presently taking is to "assume that the future will be like the past," Hardin said, and that it should assume a role as pure science, in the hopes of providing a broad base for technological development.

The topic "Syracuse University and the Department of Defense" was discussed by two speakers, Charles Wayne and Arnold Honig, members of the Syracuse University Research Corporation (SURC). Wayne pointed out that while the organization bears the name of the school, SURC is not legally owned by it. SURC was set up with a charter issued by the Department of Education of New York State, who later empowered the SU Board of Trustees to name the SURC directors. Among others from the school, Dean Galbraith of the School of Engineering was appointed to head the committee. Wayne summed it up by saying, "I can say we are owned by SU--we might as well be."

Wayne continued by pointing out three main areas of interest handled by SURC. The first, and major one, is the area of engineering and physical science, which consumes some 70% of the SURC budget. This area is concerned basically with detection and analysis of "small signals." "We do no manufacturing of any kind,' Wayne emphasized. In addition, a benefit of SURC's independence is objectivity. "We have nothing to gain, nothing to lose, from recommendations. We are advisors."

The second area is the life sciences department, which operates without a defense contract, and deals with environmental health. Such practical functions as analysis and inspection are performed for both SU and Onondaga County by SURC.

The third is a relatively new branch, headed by Stephen K. Bailey, former dean of the Maxwell School. The function of this branch is to "make available teams to study critical social problems," Wayne said. It would handle such things as computer technology in today's society, birth control, and urban affairs. Wayne further stated that out of some 100 contracts, one-third of them are classified, and of some 50 labs, only 2 are restricted.

Honig's contention was, "It is not that basic research produces bad effects--its the way it's done." Having been with SURC for thirteen years, Honig was able to offer some reflections on its development. When the program first began, there was great mobility among the ranks of workers, as well as ample available funds.

Honig also offered a breakdown of the $10 million SURC budget. Seventy-five percent of the budget is regulated by the Federal Government, of which almost half is from the Department of Defense and the National Science Foundation. From the remaining 25%, about 1% comes from business and indsutry, 12% from private concerns, and about 10% from Syracuse University. The remaining 2% is scattered among other organizations.

Greek Peak race slated

Greek Peak's Board of Directors challenges all persons 35 years of age and older to participate in a downhill race to be held at Greek Peak Ski Area at 9:30 a.m. on Sunday, March 8.

The race is similar to the "Beat the Pros" standard race held weekly at Greek Peak. However, a handicap system has been established to allow each competitor an equal opportunity to win regardless of his age.

The best time recorded by any member of the board will be the time to beat. Greek Peak's electronic timer will again be used to insure accurate results.

An entry fee of $1 will be charged. Presentation of awards to persons who beat the time set by the directors will be made following the race and refreshments will be served, compliments of the board.

Interested persons should contact Al Kryger or Jerry Mahar at Greek Peak for more information. Call area code 607-835-3615.

Roundtable topic: social services crisis

Syracuse, like all U.S. cities, faces a serious and urgent dilemma. As the need and demand for social services multiply at an alarming rate, the sources and bases for financing such services are not expanding at an adequate rate or are not being developed and implemented at various levels of government. The speaker at The Thursday Morning Roundtable on March 6, will address himself to two aspects of this situation.

John R. Searles, executive vice president of the Metropolitan Development Association, will speak on "New Industry for New York State - Are Industrial Bonds the Answer?" The meeting will take place in Peck Hall, University College, at 8:30 a.m.

Think selfishly about your own career before you decide on one with Du Pont.

Be selfish. But be honest. You've put in a lot of tough years to get your degree. Your allegiance lies with a professional discipline.

Why, then, must you decide now to plight your trust to a company for life? Don't. Join a company first. If it doesn't advance you within that professional discipline, well, you're not married to it.

Many have found career enrichment at Du Pont. This comes from being handed a ball and being expected to run with it. From working with top people, from growing in a company where the opportunities are always wide open and the projects are often way out.

Many have found professional fulfillment and have built a very full, varied and happy life as "Du Ponters."

Others have found, after working at Du Pont, that their professional interest lay in teaching, in further study or in an industry that offered even wider scope in their particular discipline. All of these men left Du Pont far better qualified professionally than when they came.

So talk to the Du Pont recruiter. If he offers you something, think of it as a professional challenge, not a proposal of marriage.

Social science degree undergoes change

By ROB STRUGATZ

The Doctor of Social Science, a degree pioneered by the Maxwell School, will be undergoing a change according to Roy A. Price, professor of social science and chairman of the D.S.S. program.

By decision of Maxwell faculty members and other involved persons, the degree offered will now be the Ph.D. in social science. Professor Price, in a recent interview, offered an explanation of the background and circumstances leading to the change.

According to Price, graduate education in the United States was adopted from the German universities. The Ph.D. (Doctor of Philosophy), a research-oriented degree, was the culmination of these graduate studies.

However, 20 years ago, Professor Price and his colleagues decided that the Ph.D. degree was too disciplined, that is, the recipient of the degree was trained in only one area of the social sciences, such as economics or sociology, and therefore had a comparatively narrow outlook in his field.

A second feeling was that the student should be trained as a competent teacher for the college level as well as being a research scholar.

As a means to these ends, Professor Price and his committee established the Doctor of Social Science degree, designed to give the graduate student a broad background in different areas, and to train him for teaching. To receive the degree, students had to work in at least three social sciences and take education courses.

After the program was in effect for 13 years, several distinguished educators from throughout the country here were asked to evaluate the program. Opinions were offered by Paul R. Anderson, president of Chatham College in Pittsburg; Philip L. Davidson, Jr., president of the University of Louisville; Chauncy D. Harris, Dean of the Social Science Division at the University of Chicago; Willard L. Thorp, director of the Merrill Center for Economics at Amherst College in Massachusetts; and Goodrich C. White, chancellor of Emory University in Atlanta, Georgia.

Their report stated: "The committee has considered what, if anything, this program contributes to a rethinking of graduate education elsewhere in America. This program has faced some of the most vexing problems in higher education today. It has been a pioneering experiment worthy of continuation and further development."

Seven years later, the D.S.S., as a degree title, is no more. Why? Because, says Professor Price, the Ph.D. is the current recognized degree in graduate education. Holders of the D.S.S., when writing books or applying for grants, must continually explain the status of the degree they hold, while a Ph.D. goes unquestioned.

Professor Price defends the charge by saying it will actually strengthen the degree. The prior requirements of an interdisciplinary structure, flexibility of program, and teacher training will remain, with the added advantage of holding the recognized degree.

There are already 160 alumni around the country holding the D.S.S. degree, including three college presidents and a research professor at the University of Michigan. They may petition Syracuse University, and will be awarded the Ph.D. retroactively.

Seniors depart

Kouwe, Aldrich, Hamblen end cage careers

By FRED KRAVER

As the final buzzer ended Syracuse's 97-89 victory over Colgate Saturday, three seniors closed out their college basketball careers. Bob Kouwe, Dave Aldrich, and Frank Hamblen all saw action in the game so that Orange fans could bid them farewell.

It was a comeback year for Bob Kouwe. After leading the freshman team in scoring three years ago, Kouwe had been hit with a series of misfortunes that halved his sophomore and junior years. Mononucleosis shortened the former, and last year suspension finished him after twelve games.

"The suspension hurt me mentally," he explained. "In my freshman year, I not only had mono, but I had an abscess in my throat, and lost twenty-five pounds. I never really recovered from that." The suspension came as a result of a crackdown in the enforcement of curfew rules.

Kouwe was somewhat disappointed with the team's performance this year. In the beginning, the team was shabby in practice, and after the schedule had the Orange playing ten of the first eleven on the road, there was reason to be pessimistic. However, Kouwe was impressed with the team's potential, and felt that everything would pull itself together. Towards the end of the season, Bob had reason to be optimistic, especially concerning the future of pivotman, Bill Smith.

Playing in the National Invitation Tournament in Madison Square Garden was Kouwe's biggest thrill. A sophomore at the time, he saw Syracuse lose a tough one in the opening round against New Mexico State. "I thought we had a chance to win that one," he said.

Kouwe has a term to make up, since he lost a semester because of mono. He is unsure of his plans, though he hinted at becoming a golfer. He has a scratch handicap.

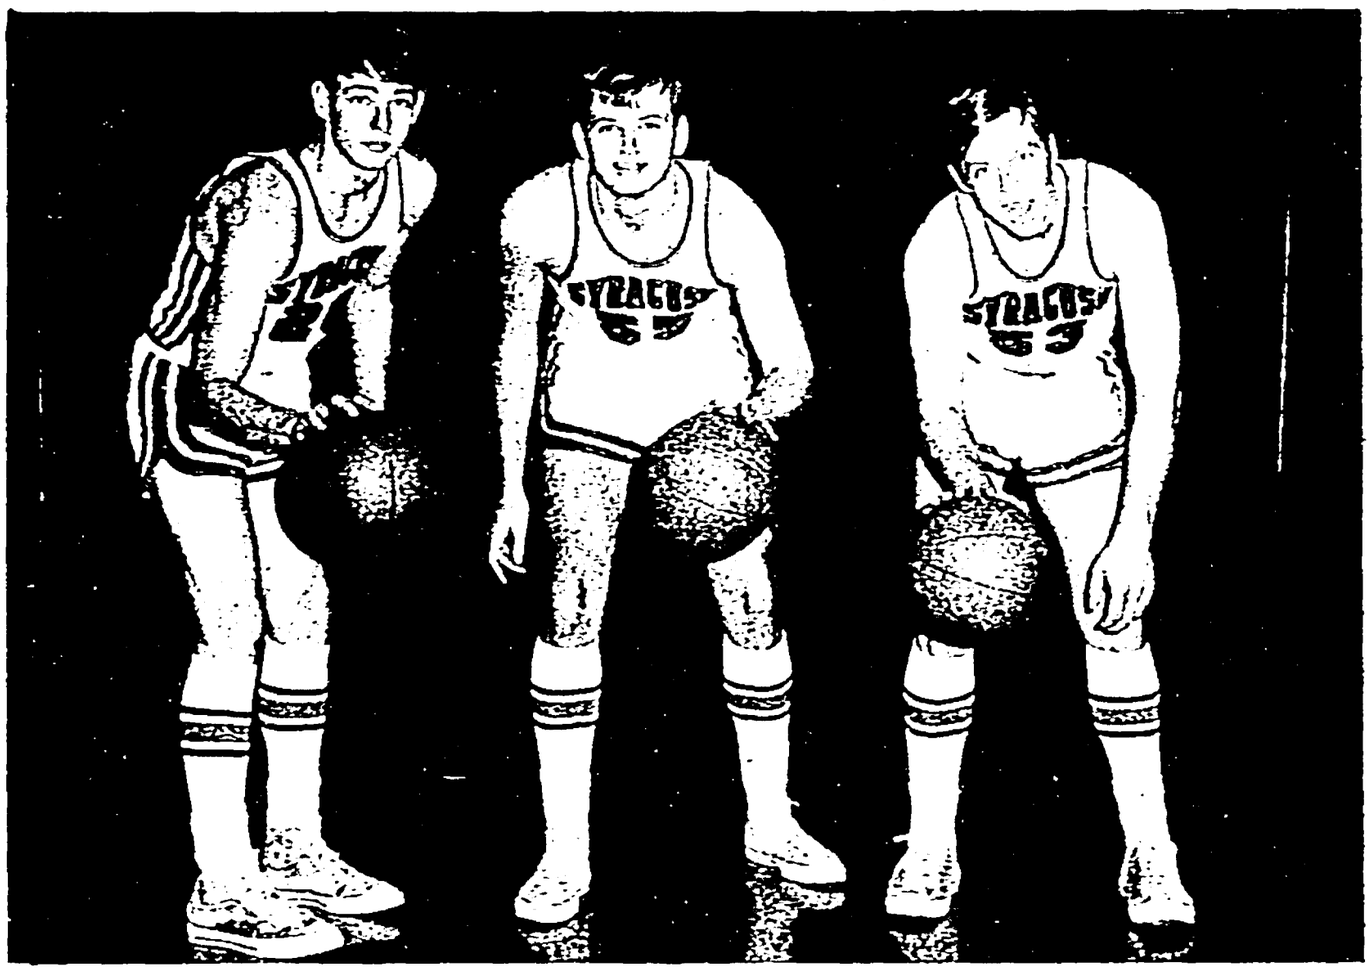
Dave Aldrich had the unfortunate role as understudy during his varsity years. As a sophomore, he watched Rick Dean from the bench, and last year he sat while Wayne Ward controlled the pivot. This year, he was behind Bill Smith and Dave Harmon.

The senior from Andover, New York, had his best game as a soph in the Quaker City Tournament. Dean had been injured, and coach Fred Lewis called on Aldrich to cover Louisville All-American Westley Unseld. Unseld finished with only 13 points.

In comparing coach Lewis to coach Danforth, Aldrich pointed out that "Lewis had more knowledge of the game, but Danforth is gaining experience with every game. Danforth treats the players better."

Aldrich's freshman statistics were 12.1 points per game, and 12.7 rebounds. Dave was not satisfied with the experience he gained as a freshman because "we had our own way. There was little discipline."

In retrospect of the season just ended, Aldrich commented that "the team showed 150% improvement. I really wish we could start the season over again. Having the first ten (of eleven) on the road was tough, but the team really pulled itself together."



Aldrich plans to become a junior executive in a sales management program.

Frank Hamblen saw some glory last season. After scoring only two points in the first ten games, he hit a career high of 20 against Pittsburgh, and was installed as a regular. He finished with a field goal percentage of 56.3, and a free throw percentage of 100 (16 for 16).

Hamblen's finest hour was in the Quaker City Tourney against Louisville, when Frank came off the bench in the second half to hit five for six and a total of 13 points in the second half. His deadliest weapon has always been a very accurate jump shot.

All told, the three departing team members contributed 481 points to the Orangemen's struggle. Kouwe, of course, led the way with 349 markers on 160 field goals and 29 free throws. Hamblen tallied 92 points on 35 shots from the floor and 22 charity tosses while Aldrich hit on 15 field goals and 10 foul shots for 40 points.

And, so, as the sun sets over Syracuse's snowy slopes, and the basketball season becomes a memory, the year 1968-69 will be remembered as one of rebuilding. It was also the final campaign for three fine ball players: Bob Kouwe, Dave Aldrich and Frank Hamblen.

SU skaters pay own way; hold 2nd spot in SIHL

By JOE LAGUARDIA

For those hardy sports fans who care, the Syracuse University hockey club is alive and skating.

The fact that they are alive is amazing because of the funds graciously denied them by the Athletic Department.

Even more surprising, however, is their recent success in the newly formed Syracuse Industrial Hockey League at the State Fair Coliseum. They are currently in second place in the seven team league with a 7-2-0 record.

Monday night they upended previously unbeaten Plante's Restaurant 5-4 with a tough defense and strong forechecking.

Goalie Vic Wehnau, a converted winger who switched to the pads in midseason when the team had no goalie, turned in another fine performance in the nets.

Coach Babe LaRose, who has coached the Syracuse six for the past nine years, calls this group of boys "one of the best bunch I've ever had. They hustle, they care and they want to win."

This accentuates all the more the situation they are in. If they want to play hockey they have to pay-money that is.

The team members must pay all of their expenses. Practice time on the ice costs the team $25 an hour at the Coliseum. Like any other sport, conditioning is of the utmost importance and practice is a necessity. So the players share the cost.

They buy their own equipment and supplies without any financial assist from the University. As one player stated, "We realize the University won't help us financially so we'll have to pay our own expenses. We love hockey and if we have to pay we will. It's as simple as that."

As a member of the Finger Lakes Hockey League, which includes RIT, Hobart, Buffalo State, Canton Tech, Ithaca College and Utica College the team is forced to travel.

On a recent trip to Buffalo the team only suited nine men. LaRose explained this by commenting that "the kids just can't afford it. If we had to stay overnight we would have really been in trouble."

"The fact that the guys stay with it shows their dedication to the sport and despite our financial problems we have some real good talent on the squad."

LaRose is mightly impressed with his captain, George Mechem, a senior from Newton, Mass. The coach says that Mechem is by far the best hockey player in the area.

"He can play with any major team in the country and do a real fine job," commented LaRose.

In fact, the 5'11" center plays for the Syracuse Stars on weekends, a local amateur club.

Mechem is yet uncommitted on his future plans, whether to return to Massachusettes or stay in Syracuse. He has teaching offers in both areas. "I haven't decided but, I would like to stay in this area and continue playing for the Stars," he admitted.

LaRose is very pleased with the play of his freshmen skaters. George Warren, 6'1" defenseman from Freeport, L.I., and Darren Miller, 5'10" center from Ithaca, N.Y. have improved quite a bit with more ice time.

Other freshman on the squad who will return next year to give the club added depth are center Rob Neumeer, left wing Kenny Diamond and goalie Vic Wehnau.

Heir-apparent to Mechem's job of centering the first line is Fred "Boom-Boom" Green, the only Canadian on the squad, who hails from Ontario. Steve Williams will also return next year to anchor the defense.

Mechem, the spark in the club's attack demands 100% from his mates all the time.

"If you want to win you've just got to hustle. All I ask is that they keep hustling. What we lack in talent we make up in hustle and desire."

Tonight the sextet faces Varsity Sports at 10:30 on the Coliseum ice--providing they remember to bring their money for ice time.

Hoop stars honored

Two big names in Syracuse basketball are in the news this week. One, a current star, Bill Smith, while the other is SU grad, Richie Cornwall.

Smith was named to the weekly ECAC all-star team for his fine play against Niagara and Colgate. Smitty scored 46 points in the two contests as well as snatching 31 rebounds.

Cornwall, who starred on the Hill from 1964-67, was tapped for rookie-of-the-year honors in the Eastern Basketball League. He was also named to the all-league second team.

Open hearing

University Senate panel to view reorganization

By FRED TUCCILLO
News Editor

The possibility of students, faculty members and administrators sitting side by side in the University Senate will be one of several things up for discussion today when a committee on the reorganization of the Senate holds an open hearing from 3 to 5 p.m. in B 115 Grant.

Professor Jerry Miner of the Economics Department, a member of the committee, said Wednesday that the hearing is open to all interested members of the university community, from undergraduates to administrators, although the committee's primary interest today will be in getting some "non-Senate" opinions.

"We would consider hearing from anybody with regard to their views on the organization of the Senate and its powers," Miner said.

The committee, chaired by Professor Eric Bardner of the Psychology Department, consists of 10 faculty and administrative members as well as two representatives of the student body--John Diamond, Speaker Pro Tempore of the Student Senate, and Jeff Covner, a student in the Law School.

The committee's recommendations will be presented to the full University Senate March 19. Any plan for change would have to be approved by the Senate at two consecutive meetings in order to be implimented.

The issue of student representation is only one aspect of the committee's deliberations but it is the one expected to bring interested students to today's hearing. Several undergraduate and graduate representatives now sit on Senate committees but some of the proposals being considered would substantially extend that representation.

One such proposal would apportion the University Senate as follows: 50 per cent faculty, 25 per cent administration and 25 per cent student.

"That is only one proposal," Miner cautioned. "And it would be premature to think of it as anything else at this stage."

SYRACUSE'S SECURITY STALWARTS have moved from their 20-year home in a pre-fab to larger quarters in Sims IV Basement. The recent relocation will facilitate improved security through a more unified system of control. The six wood-panelled rooms accomodate such equipment as two-way communication systems for contact with squad cars and patrolmen. Gun closets are employed to store students' registered firearms. A more efficient filing system has also been added, according to a Security spokesman. (Photo by Clemens)

Partial merger with IDC passed by AWS assembly

By HELENE MACDONALD
Associate Editor

The Association of Women Students (AWS) assembly divested itself of its legislative powers last night by passing motions calling for:

- the transfer of AWS's residence function to Inter-Dormitory Council (IDC);

-- the formation of a committee to explore the role of a women's organization on campus;

- the dissolution of the Judicial Advisory Review (JAR), Board the women's court.

AWS president Cindy Bailey summed up the status of the women organization after the assembly action: "It is now either defunct, or on the verge of entering a new dimension of exploring educational and vocational opportunities for women, examining programming specifically for women and a multiplicity of other things designed to meet the needs of women students."

In the past few years, the work of AWS has been residence-oriented and with the advent of freshman optional hours, has no more legislation to effect. Since the beginning of IDC, the two organizations have been trying to fulfill the same functions and by merging, each could avoid duplicating the other's work.

The similiarity between AWS exec and IDC was explained by Peg Johnston, president of IDC. Both groups have parallel committees which could be strengthened by combining the two groups. A women's committee would deal with problems like curfew and a men's committee would handle problems peculiar to men's dorms.

After the residence function was transfered and the new committee formed, Connie Stewart, chief justice of JAR, moved that the women's court be displayed.

"There are so many courts on campus," she said "and this one usually serves only as an advisor to dorm standards boards." The motion was passed with one negative vote, the only dissenting ballot of the evening.

Both Miss Johnston, also coordinator of St. Mary's and Baumgarten stressed that living centers, from cottages and Greek houses to large dorms, are equally represented on IDC and floor presidents receive information through dorm councils.

Miss Johnston called the move "a natural and inevitable evolution in student government.

It can't happen here?

Sixty girls and four men of exclusive Sarah Lawrence College at Bronxville, N.Y. staged a sit-in over a proposed tuition hike yesterday, taking command of the girls' school's administration building.

Classes continued while the protesters sat in, complete with blankets.

'New' image

Goon drive swings open

By LARRY KRAMER
Campus Affairs Editor

The coming of spring has special significance to the SU campus. Traditions Commission is opening the drive for the 1969-70 Goon Squad with floor visitations in all the living centers on Sunday, between 9 a.m. and midnight.

For the first time in recent years, the image of the Goon squad is being changed. Instead of presenting a super-spirited image during their first contact with the class of '73, the new goon squad will attempt to present a mature and helpful approach, with a genuine concern for the freshmen.

ONCE THEY WERE but mere freshmen...
(Photo by Clemens)

Applications for the squad are due by March 21. All applications procedures will be explained at the first pre-goon convocation at Hendricks Chapel, Tuesday March 11 at 6:15 p.m. Although Pep and school spirit will remain as criteria for selection, ability to communicate will also be considered.

No qualifications other than being a freshman or a first year transfer student are prerequisites for Goon Squad.

This past year, 290 sophomores welcomed the class of '72 during orientation week. That total represented an increase over past years. This year, the total will very likely be again increased since the overall size of the incoming class will also be significantly larger than past years.

The meetings on the individual floors on Sunday will also be used to help determine the direction and purpose of the "new" Goon Squad.

Indonesian UN ambassador speaks on Asia here tonight

Dr. H. Roeslan Abdulgani, permanent representative of Indonesia to the United Nations since 1967, will be the featured speaker at this year's International Student Week celebration here. Dr. Abdulgani will talk on "Asia, Africa - The Development Decade" at 8 p.m today in Maxwell Auditorium. Faculty and student participation is planned, and the lecture is open to the public.

Since 1952, Dr. Abdulgani, who was educated in Surabaya, East Java, Indonesia, has held a variety of cabinet-level posts, including the office of Minister of Foreign Affairs in 1956-57 and chairmanship of the National Planning Council during 1966-67.

He was active in the Indonesian Youth Independence Movement during the Dutch colonial period, before World War II, when he was arrested three times for his activities. He was a member of guerilla forces fighting against the return of the Dutch. Later he received awards for distinguished service to the Republic in the struggle for independence.

Both before and after the attempted coup of Oct. 1, 1965, he was accused by the Indonesian Communist Party of being a member of the "General's Council," and had been named as a target for reprisal.

Traditions re-evaluates

It is with pride and highest approval that the Daily Orange notes the statement from Traditions Commission printed on this page. There is no student organization at SU with more potential to purge what it calls the "institutionalized apathy" that characterizes this university than this talented and ambitious Commission.

The Commission's statement comes however, because it has not fulfilled this potential. TC can take pride in the fact that it always has mounted successfully the logistics of the annual Orientation Week. That alone is an accomplishment. But if that O-Week and resulting programs have lost their effectiveness, then they stand only as a logistical feat. We suggest, as does the Commission, that some of this O-Week effectiveness may truly be lost.

O-Week fosters lasting impressions. Unfortunately some of these impressions have perpetuated the rally spirit syndrome that at times has seemed to be the essence of the Commission, Goon Squad and O-Week. Equally alarming are the traditional O-Week cattle drives which herd freshmen from one event to the next and can only strike the frosh as frivolity. They are lacking in inspiration, relevance and approach being insulting. It is from this atmosphere that many frosh and Goons never recover. Spirit should be more meaningful and enduring.

Traditions Commission's statement suggests that it may have appeared exclusive and self-important. At times, it has. It must be remembered though, that in any small group that works together the hard and long hours of TC, comradeship is vital. The Commission's statement suggest that it realizes the need for remaining open and responsive to its surroundings.

The Commisison is concerned about sponsoring a progressive and intelligent Orientation and seeks to make SU student life more meaningful. It has started its work with a self examination and a sincere and important appraisal has resulted.

TC hasn't really been as irrelevant as its own statement might suggest; it just hasn't been putting itself across. Its current desire to present itself more meaningfully to SU should be received with enthusiasm and cooperation. The problem is recognized and the Commission's determination, however idealistic it might seem, is encouraging.

A re-appraisal

Traditions Commission

By David Cohen

Editor's note: The column printed below was written by Traditions Commission sophomore David Cohen as a policy statement and is endorsed by the entire Commission. Because of its significance, the Daily Orange agreed to print the full text of the statement and has offered editorial observations elsewhere on the page.

Traditions Commission is perhaps the least understood of the campus' major organizations. Its work planning the university's orientation program stretches quietly over the course of the spring. At a glance, TC might seem highly exclusive, self-important, and generally frivolous. Furthermore, the program it plans, for all of its many strengths, often appears beside the point. Realizing its faulty image--and the extent to which some of the charges against it are justified--the members of the Commission met last Sunday for an all-day retreat in Lawrinson Penthouse to discuss in depth its goals, its direction, and its over-all effectiveness.

The task of objective self-examination is no easy one. Much of Sunday's nine-hour session was devoted to stripping away illusions about Traditions and its view of itself; more was dedicated to a thorough examination of what an orientation program should do. Within this framework, topics of greater and greater relevance began to make themsleves felt--the extent to which students should and must control their own lives, the role of minority groups in the university community, the new balance of power on campuses all across the nation. Indeed, relevance was the most oft-heard word of the day. "Traditions," said one commission member, "are useful and creative only to the extent that they are up-to-date."

Change will be felt in all aspects of TC's work. The Academic and Cultural Programs, which underwent re-assessment last year, will build upon previous gains to increase the richness and depth of the O-Week schedule. New emphasis will be placed on the diverse cultures that exist within the general student body; black students in particular will receive greater attention and, more important, support. The new moves toward dorm autonomy will be recognized, and employed in the structure of next year's orientation program. The general realization is that the era of the fifties--of the time when college students were uninvolved and more concerned with drinking rallies than with political ones--is happily dead. All antique vestiges must be purged. Perhaps idealistically, but with full awareness, the members of Traditions Commission have begun their own crusade against Syracuse's institutionalized apathy, in an attempt to hit every new freshman with a stimulating and relevant program exciting enough to propel him into a full and involved existence at Syracuse University.

The words are inspiring but can be forgotten as soon as they are spoken. It is part of Traditions's new resolve to see that the new ideas are implemented. In practical terms, one important manifestation of Sunday's meeting will be immediately obvious. The second week of April is the tentative selection date for the new Goon Squad; the all-Freshman convocation is slated for Tuesday, March 11. The commission feels that the kind of goon it has attracted in the past is not necessarily the type it will need in the future. No longer will a goon be like the racoon-coated rallier of a thirties' musical; the new Goon Squad will be spirited in a different way. The stress will be on concerned, active students who care about people--particularly freshmen--and who are willing to work with the commission to open the collective awareness of the class of '73 to the exciting world of possibilities that Syracuse University can become.

Concern, desire, and ability are to be the only criteria for goon membership; no outside influences--such as greek affiliation-- will affect the chances of any freshman applicant. Sunday, March 9, commission members plan to visit freshman floors to bring their new message to the prospective goons. They hope that, by so-doing, they can re-open channels of communication that neglect and misunderstanding have sadly closed, and let the current freshman, as well as the campus-at-large, understand why their pride in being on Traditions Commission is both understandable and justified.

Letters from an assistant professor

(Editor's note: The following is written by an assistant professor of religion at Syracuse University. It is in response to an article printed in the February 21 issue of the Daily Orange entitled "The faculty," which dealt in part with the salaries received by professors.)

To the Editor:

The DO reports that the average compensation of assistant professors at Syracuse University is $12,391. This is correct. But note that this is average compensation, not salary. Compensation includes many attractive benefits, such as the retirement program --if one's base salary is sufficient to allow him to enter it, i.e., the teacher must contribute six per cent each year from his base salary. Compensation also includes fringe benefits that any responsible organization would provide for its employees. The average salary of the ass't. professor is approximately 13 per cent less than average compensation.

The basic problem lies in salary inequities not reported to the DO. The salaries in some departments are well below the University average. The chief reasons for this seem to be a demand in certain fields, so that the "market" is better for teachers to barter in certain specializations than in others; and government support of research in certain areas--physical sciences, biological sciences, sociology, psychology and some languages. Some teachers are thus at the mercy of a market-place mentality, as reflected in the administration's unwillingness to rectify this situation and provide adequate salaries in all those areas of human inquiry that make up a university.

As one of our prominent professors indicated, "The way to get ahead at Syracuse University is to write a book." I am surprised and disappointed that a man as astute as this respected teacher could so easily accomodate himself to the market place mentality and fragmentation of human existence that characterize our society. As he himself has said, the problems of the university reflect the problems of our society. But the university might try to direct the way out of our cultural morass.

The book writing syndrome is vicious for a number of reasons:

(1) It applies pressure on teachers to prostitute themselves, to publish something vacuous or second-rate in order to get ahead. It is based on the conviction that to prove his worth a man must produce, he must show something concrete that enables him to say, "I am valuable."

(2) It places primary value on an activity that removes teachers from their students. Let there be no mistake about it, a teacher's intellectual competence and willingness and ability to communicate with students are not primary factors in his application for promotion. The cliche is true at SU, at least for assistant professors: "publish or perish." How intelligent faculty members and students can sit back and accept this without critical evaluation and protest is astonishing to me.

(3) Writing a book is one primary function of the scholar, but I would offer a comment on developments in our culture. In the future we will be less and less oriented to the medium of the printed word, though hopefully it will never perish in a "brave new world." Emphasis upon the printed word usually goes hand in hand with mastery of data--"facts,"--but the education of the future will probably be more problem-oriented, the human mind being relieved of many mechanical, repetitive activities by the cybernetic revolution. More and more attention will be paid to those fields of study and media which evoke more--or at least a different-- psychic involvement than the printed word. Our business is to "maximize an ecstasy of human awareness," which may or may not have much to do with writing books.

Biology prof active in research, student aid

By JOAN BERKES

Perhaps the key word to Dr. Marvin Druger's personality is activity - and frenzied activity at that. A dual associate professor of Zoology and Science Education, Dr. Druger is involved in research, teaching, and organizing and directing various programs to aid students and other teachers, both in the University and the community.

Born in Brooklyn in 1934, Dr. Druger received his B.S. in biology from Brooklyn College, where he minored in science education. He received his M.A. in zoology from Columbia University, and his PhD. in genetics in 1961, also from Columbia. While there he studied under Th. Dobzhansky, perhaps one of the most important figures in the study of genetics. A National Institute of Health Post-doctoral Fellowship took him to Sidney, Australia, where he did research in genetics with the CSIRO (Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organization). While there he received offers to join the faculties of the University of Michigan and Syracuse University. Fortunately for us, he chose Syracuse, and has been teaching here since 1962.

Dr. Druger's research is concerned with the study of Drosophila, more commonly known as fruit flies. His main area of interest is evolutionary genetics; Drosophila are used as the vehicle for determining how populations adjust to their environments. In his own words, he is exploring the "role of selection in adaptation of populations and individuals to different environments."

Research in his laboratory is currently taking three directions. One, with which Dr. Druger is himself concerned, is the study of how populations adapt to their environments. A second area is the study of how individuals adapt, which is being carried out by a graduate student, Bill Wiesner. The third area of research is that of behavioral genetics, in which another graduate student, Father Andrew Szebenyi, is analyzing the genetics of complex behavioral traits.

Most of Dr. Druger's attention now, however, is being devoted to the development of the general introductory biology course. This course is relatively new in concept and purpose, in that its main emphasis is on individual instruction for the student. He thinks that too often the freshman student is "jammed" into large classroom situations in which they hardly ever come into personal contact with their professors.

DR. MARVIN DRUGER
Biology Department

Dr. Druger feels that the student - faculty relationship should take a personal form, especially in the freshman year. He sees the first year of college as one of the most critical times in a student's life. It is during this year, he says, "that we have to expose the students to really outstanding opportunities and the best people that we have and the best orientation to college, because if we do that properly in the first year, I think that's the kind of impact that will get them going and really help them out a lot in their later careers and life."

The offering of exciting and stimulating opportunities is one of the most important functions of the University, as Dr. Druger sees it. The students are paying the money, and "from this point of fiew the University owes them something; the student should get a faculty commitment towards providing challenging, stimulating, exciting opportunities for the students to learn, but then it is the student's responsibility to take advantage of those opportunities."

Opportunities provided should include, however, the chance for the student to enjoy the learning experience. Dr. Druger observes that "the structure of the colleges and the structure of the teaching situation is such that the student does not really have time to enjoy learning - he's too busy cramming for the next exam or writing the next paper." A dilema arises for the student: he has so much to do that he doesn't dare to be interested in one subject, because "if he is interested, he will have to spend time on it, and he doesn't have the time." Because of this problem, Dr. Druger feels that there should be more cooperation among the people who teach freshman classes, so that a reasonable program of liberal arts can be arranged which will still allow the student to have the time he needs to explore the areas of his interest.

Dr. Druger feels that it is very important to give young

Running?

Students interested in running for executive office for class government of Student Government or for senator at-large should mail or submit applications to Dick Barton, 801 University Avenue. Applications should include name, average, local address and phone number and quantity of experience in student government. Executive office applications are due March 12 and senatorial office applications are due March 18. Questions, call Barton at ext. 2064.

Subjects needed for psychological testing. Married female subjects between the ages of 18 and 35 needed for a study related to normal menstrual and reproductive functions. Three sessions are involved and a fee of $30 will be paid.

This study is being conducted at the Upstate Medical Center. If interested, call Mrs. Baum at 473-5775 for information.

'Zita' succeeds in leaving audience closer to reality of death

By PAUL WILLISTEIN JR.

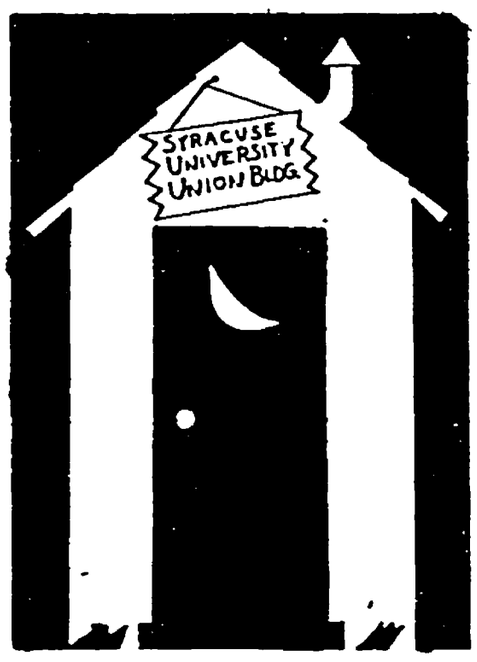
"Zita," despite its technical imperfections, captures a sensitive experience in a young girl's life--the death of a loved one. This week's Film Forum presentation succeeds in leaving one closer to the reality of death.

The story revolves around Annie (Joanna Shimkus) who is very devoted to her aunt (Katina Paxinous, winner of an academy award for a supporting role in "For Whom The Bell Tolls"). A stroke paralyzes the aunt and her suffering becomes unbearable to Annie. One night, Annie leaves the house to escape her aunt's approaching death and preserve the fond memories which she feels will die with her aunt.

Alone in the Paris night, Annie meets a variety of people, all revealing the nature of her love for her aunt. Its basis is her love of her father, who was killed in the Spanish War. Annie cherished him as a renegade hero and her aunt serves as the only link with him.

For those accustomed to Fellini-type photographic--embellishments, the camera work in "Zita" will be dull. At times, the story line is erratic and moves too slowly.

Annie encounters an unbelievable number of people in her flight from her aunt's deathbed. Included are a cat-mugger, a frantic Bible seller, and a prize winning ram that looks like two midgets struggling under a gigantic floor mop. The sequences are intended to be homorous though often low comedy is resorted to. For instance, the film evolves a new stereotype--the "hippie-rapist." Annie is saved from these fearsome creatures by a man who just happens to be walking nearby with his police dog. At three in the morning he sums up his philosophy concerning hippies--"Vietnam is the place for them." And this from a film made in France.



There are other objectionable segments but the film does return finally to Annie's emotional conflict. At her childhood home she recalls a montage of experiences which release her from the bondage of the past. She walks through the door of the house to remember her father apart from her aunt's death.

Good performances are given by Joanna Shimkus and Katina Paxinous. Also, Med Hondo, as the black revolutionist student, contributes much. Jose Marie Flotats as the bass player is disappointing, behaving like and resembling one of the idiotic boys in the "Cowsills" singing group.But for all its flaws, the film is worthwhile and enjoyable.

Two more showings are scheduled, for 7 and 9 p.m. tonight in Gifford Auditorium.

Also in conjunction with SU's International Student Week, Mayor William F. Walsh has proclaimed the period from March 1 through March 9 to be International Student Week in the City of Syracuse and urge all citizens to give special attention to the cause of international friendship and to participate wherever possible in celebration of this. International Student Week, sponsored by Syracuse University with the cooperation of the World Affairs Council.

May Walsh's proclamation noted that "many Syracusans have become friends of foreign students and thereby become acquainted with areas from which they come..."

Other features of International Student Week on this campus include a drum and piano concert at 8 p.m tonight in the physics building auditorium, an international talent show at 8 p.m Saturday in Grant Audirotium and a fashion show in Day Hall Lounge on Sunday at 2 p.m.

The Saturday evening entertainment of song and dance, including a Judo exhibition, will be presented by 12 national groups. Participating groups are Chinese, Japanese, Philippine, French, Ethiopian, African, Egyptian, South Korean, Indian, Pakistani, Ukraninian, Russian and American. Stanley Yin will be master of ceremonies. The entertainment committee is headed by Cynthia Velasquez and Gail vonHahmann. The public is invited and there is no admission charge.

On Sunday from 2-6 p.m. the lounge in Day Hall Mount Olympus, will be transformed into an international bazaar, with booths displaying art objects and artifacts of all nations, fabrics, clothing and food. At 3:30 p.m. adult and child models will show the fashions of 20 countries. Admission is 25 cents.

students the chance to develop their interests, and to find out if their interests are strong enough to make a career of.

"Once you take learning into your own hands, being out of phase with opportunities that are offered doesn't mean as much, because you realize that you're the one who's responsible for your own learning and you're the one who's going to be working at your own capacity to learn as much as you can."

Dr. Druger's biology course is structured just to these ends. Guest lectureres are invited to speak to the students about their particular area of research, telling them what they do and how they go about it. Discussion groups are organized, but are optional; the audio tapes allow the students to learn individually at their own pace. Majors have the chance to work on special projects for more lab experience.

Further activities in which he is concerned include writing a book on genetics for the Science of Life series. It is no wonder that his students consider him one of their favorite professors: his ideas and beliefs have made him one of the few they really know, and his constant involvement and concern for people have made him meaningful to them. As one student stated in a note in the biology suggestion box, "Druger's a gas!"

Schaefer SKI TIPS

BY ROXY

Don't leave your head out in the cold.

Experienced skiers always keep their heads covered on the slopes. And they don't wear those brightly colored caps and hoods just for the sake of fashion. They know that good skiing form begins with a warm head.

You see, your body can lose a great deal of heat through your scalp. And when your body is cold, you begin to lose control over the way your muscles move. So you tend to make mistakes. And the risk of injury is greater.

That's why caps and hoods are more than just fun things to wear. By keeping your head warm, they help you keep your cool.

SG officers gain from LIU forum

By COREY SANDLER

When Student Government President Chuck Hicks delivered his state of the campus address to Student Senate two weeks ago, the emphasis was on the university's role in the community. Hicks examined the issue more closely last weekend as he, SG Treasurer Ross Starek and Lenora Brazell traveled to Long Island University in Brooklyn, New York, to participate in a four-day conference on "The Urban Crisis-University and the Community."

Hicks announced that he planned to submit a list of recommendations drawn from the discussions to the student body at a campus-wide meeting. The date for the proposed forum has not been set.

Mrs. Shirley Chisolm, of New York, the first black Congresswoman, was the keynote speaker at the LIU conference. Topics discussed included health, poverty, youth problems, drug addiction, community power, economic growth, police, consumer fraud, courts and education.

Hicks praised the organization of the conference because residents of the area were invited to participate. "The meeting was very unique and useful in that the community was invited and involved," said Hicks.

The SG President said that SU's delegation gained much information concerning university-neighborhood relations. He felt that the school was not making a serious effort to help the Syracuse community."We saw that the university has a long way to go towards making its vast resources useful to the community," he said.

Buzzard hopeful

Archbold pool slated for N.Y. swim meet

ACTION IN DIVING EVENTS will be just part of the program when the Upstate New York Swim Meet gets underway in the Archbold Pool Friday. Jon Buzzard's SU swimmers will play host to the best from the upstate area. (Photo by Clemens)

By EVAN REGAL

Fresh from their sixth consecutive winning season, the Orange mermen are anxiously awaiting the Upstate New York Swimming Championships to be held this weekend in Archbold Pool.

The time trials for the meet will be at 12:30 both Friday and Saturday afternoons, with the finals to follow at eight o'clock Friday night and 7:30 Saturday night.

Besides the Syracuse swimmers, who only missed an undefeated season by five points, representatives from eleven other upstate colleges will compete. Included are Niagara, St. Bonaventure, Colgate, Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute (RPI), Ithaca, Hobart, Buffalo, Rochester Institute of Technology (RIT), Union, Albany and University of Rochester. One notable absentee is Cornell.

Although Colgate is the defending champion, Orange coach and meet director Jon Buzzard thinks that "we have got a real shot at it. I think we will do better than last year."

Buzzard added that a lot "depends on who Colgate sends. They have another meet the same day." Sports information director Larry Kimball was of the same opinion. "We had the same problem with Colgate last year," he said. "We never know who they are sending until the last minute. Even if they send their full strength, it will be a close meet," Buzzard declared with a smile.

Ross Prossner, a triple winner in last year's championship meet has a good chance of repeating the feat, according to Buzzard. He also listed Tom Skuce (one and three meter diving), Dave Crockenberg (one hundred meter freestyle), Hunter John (one hundred and two hundred meter fly), Larry Shulman (one hundred meter freestyle), Al Comly (one hundred and two hundred meter breaststroke) and Pete Schacht (five hundred meter freestyle) as possible winners.

Shulman best exemplified the team's attitude when he said, "I think we are going to win." Buzzard agreed that the swimmers are up for this meet. "They have decided they want this one," he stated.

The coach went on to explain the quality of this year's team. "This is the first time since I have been here that a team has approached a championship caliber," he said.

Buzzard added, however, "I hope they are up for the Eastern championships. That is where it counts!"

The Orangemen will be up against some stiff competition in the championship meet. Most of it, however, will be supplied by the Colgate unit that defeated Syracuse in a close meet last weekend. The only other Orange defeat occurred early in the season at the hands of Bucknell, a loss largely due to the absence of three regulars who were taking law boards.

Throughout the season the Orange fans have supported the mermen in large numbers. This weekend's event should be no exception. The fans have really been "up" for this year's swimming meets. According to Buzzard, the large crowds have contributed greatly to the team's outstanding attitude and its performance.

An attitude to win and a home pool advantage could be enough for the Orange mermen to gain the championship they want so badly.

Vesp uncertain about varsity future of his yearling cagers

By HOWIE GROOPMAN

Freshman basketball coach Bill Vesp, whose 10-6 Tangerines swept their last four games, surprisingly hesitates when asked to evaluate the varsity chances of his individual players.

Vesp says that there is a tremendous transition between high school and freshman basketball to be made, and that the same transition must be made between the freshman and sophomore college years. For this reason, he is uncertain about which Tangerines might play for the Orangemen in 1969-70.

The most logical choice is leading scorer Greg Kohls, who swished the cords for 20.5 ppg during the just-completed season. However, despite Kohls' scoring punch and consistency, Vesp says he lacks the speed that is so essential for a varsity guard.

Two more varsity possibilities are Paul Piotrowski and Gil Guerrero. Piotrowski, a 6'3" guard, was another factor in the team's success this season. He was second to Kohls in scoring (16.5ppg), and was the leading rebounder on the squad (10.6 per game "Guerrero," says Vesp, "has the most speed and quickness of the three." Tangerine fans witnessed Guerrero's speed at its best when he brought the ball upcourt against the opposition's pressing defense.

Vesp says that Piotrowski must learn to dribble better and "see things." He is quick to add that he rates all three of his leading scorers on the same level.

Ken Gray, a 6'4" forward, was the team's fourth scholarship recipient. His coach says that he is a "good shooter and a pretty good rebounder, but unless he outplays Case, Finney and MacFadden (all upperclassmen), he'll have trouble making it."

Gary Rainbow, fifth starter and fourth leading scorer (10.4ppg), "may come out for the team next year, but since he is a forward, he will lack size," according to Vesp.

Many fans have forgotten to include 6'6" Bob McDaniel when speaking about next season. McDaniel, one of Roy Danforth's frosh sensations last year, has returned to school, and is expected back for the 1969-70 season.

Coach Vesp must be given credit for fashioning a winning record with a team sporting no players taller than 6'4". He attributes most of the six losses to the team's lack of size, and not its defense. "We weren't fired up for those teams, and everyone wants to beat Syracuse," he offered. "We won five out of our first six and all of the last four because we were disciplined and looked for the good shot."

He has not yet lured any future stars to Syracuse, although he is one of the school's biggest touts.

Vesp hopes to recruit one guard and three forwards at least 6'5" each.

He had no qualms about not equalling last year's frosh record of 15-1, since that team had Bill Smith (6'11") and Bill Finney (6'4"). He relished playing a major-college schedule (previously he coached at Utica College and Delhi College), and says, "you couldn't work with a greater guy than Roy Danforth."

If Vesp's affability, past success and desire to win are omens of success, Syracuse could regain national basketball prominence.

RED PARTON, WNYS SPORTSCASTER, spoke at a meeting of the WAER sports staff on Tuesday night. A member of the SU class of '41, Parton has been in broadcasting for 29 years. (WNYS photo)

Radio staff hears Parton

By MIKE WEBER
Sports Editor

Red Parton, the dean of Syracuse sportcasters, was the guest of honor at a meeting of the WAER sports staff Tuesday night. Parton spoke on his life as a sportscaster and then opened the floor for questions.

He discussed several methods he uses in his profession to guide play-by-play plan of attack. One simple, yet rather ingenious device employed by the veteran, is the use of a three-minute egg timer. Parton said that for any sport where the score does not change rapidly, the timer is an invaluable aid in relating the score to the audience at regular intervals.

Parton, who started his career in broadcasting with WOLF in 1940, said that with the expansion of major league sports, the market for qualified sportscasters is also increasing.

A question from the floor concerning the hardest sport to broadcast brought a somewhat surprising response. He said that baseball, since it is one of the slowest moving sports, presents several problems.

"The announcer really has to know his subject," he commented. "He's got to be able to keep the audience happy during pitching changes, between innings and the like. If a guy can do a baseball game well, he can do any sport."

Parton also had some words of advice for the budding broadcasters. He warned them to never give the audience the feeling that they are being talked down to. He suggested they stay away from too many technical terms and in general to be "prepared, accurate and loyal to the sport, your employer and your audience.'

Published Tuesday through Friday during the academic year by students of Syracuse University. Offices located at 200 Brooklea Drive, Fayetteville, N. Y., and 1101 East Adams St., Syracuse, New York. Entered as Second Class matter at the U. S. Post Office, Fayetteville, N. Y. 13066.

SU Centennial

The potential to gain national attention and a considerable boost in prestige now rests with Syracuse University in these early stages of planning for the 1970 Centennial activities. While preliminary Centennial programs began several years ago with the Centennial Scholarships and more recently with the Centennial Medals, the opportunity and the money now exist to present SU to the country as a leading university.

While the suggestions for Centennial programs are numerous, the Daily Orange strongly urges a program that will have national orientation and that will introduce a new and progressive educational activity.

It is a well established fact that there is much that can be done with Centennial funds right here at the University. This is pointed out in the opinion submitted by Cindy Bailey that is printed below. But the money may exist for both.

It seems that had the University been truly concerned about a real student union building, it would have built one years ago. The problem of no UU may be more a question of priorities than of cash. But the chance for a worthy Centennial Celebration comes only once.

The Daily Orange hopes that the Centennial budget will not be squandered on an attempt to blanket central New York or even the entire state with bright flashy publications, and that the scope of the program will not be limited to the "year long Orientation Week" referred to by Miss Bailey.

This is the age of Relevance, and SU's image can prosper from taking heed.

Centennial II

It is a given that this University is in a severe financial crisis, evidenced by the tuition raise, a cut in student expenditure and charging double for some University living center rooms-much less the raw statistics of a projected ½ million defesit. With this in mind, the University is opening the door wide to a seemingly unlimited budget for the next years Centennial celebration.

Considering the meaning of the centennial year-a time for reflecting on the last 100 years and a time for visualizing the next 100 years-it seems appropriate to turn to the "S.U. void" that has existed for 100 years with no immediate solution proposed: the lack of a University Union. This perenial problem seems even ridiculous to bring up again, except to say why bother programming a year-long Orientation Week when the crying student need will not be met nor will students identify with this attempt to celebrate their University's progress. Students should demand that the centennial year funds be contributed to U.U. and that they see the actualization of the beginning of a Union building by the conclusion of 1970. The University cannot pretend to empathize with students when they again demonstrate a complete insensitivity to student needs; and when they pat themselves on the back for building a great university. I think a student mandate for a U.U. may effect what could potentially be the turning point of Syracuse University's long and apathetic history.

Campus candidates

Elections' personalities

By Steve Williams and Bob Zuer

The Syracuse University campus party conventions will nominate candidates for student government in less than two weeks (March 16). The following was overheard in the office of a prominent local public relations man who is handling the campaign of a prospective candidate for Student Government President.

Ringgggg--Ringggg!

"Hello. Oh, hi, Harv. . . .How's my favorite candidate?"

"Press conference? Today? Oh, yea, I almost forgot about that. . .So what's your problem?. . .Maybe you're right; maybe it is about time we started thinking about some issues. Those reporters are never satisfied with just talking to you, they have to bring in those confounded issues and platforms--always trying to complicate things. . .Well, Harv, have you got any issues that are gnawing at your innards--ha! ha!. . .Student run bookstore? Oh, come on now, Harv. There are still some who may remember the last guy who promised that--I mean the electorate is gullible but nobody is that gullible. . . ."

"Greater cooperation between students and administration!?! How reactionary can you get, Harv!. . .Yea, yea--sure that's what you think, Harv, but you've got to put the election above personal feelings. After all, I've got hundreds of people working for your election and they wouldn't appreciate your stabbing them in the back with a statement like that. . ."

"Look, Harv, you'd get killed at the polls! What you need is a good revolutionary type statement. That's what students want up here--change. . .Never mind if it's needed! Tell 'em you're going to change anything--everything--but don't tell them you are going to cooperate with the administration- "Now you're talking Harv! The students will love it. Racism, the military-industrial complex, infiltrate the administration. That's beautiful! . . .What can be done about it? Nothing I hope--at least not until you're elected. . . ."

"Qualifications? What qualifications? They're not important as long as you can win! One thing though, Harv. Do you think you can get through the campaign without your glasses?. . .They make you look too intellectual. . ."

"What party ticket are you going to run on? Why whatever one will take you, kid. You can't be choosy when there's an election at stake, you know. Just find out which party is holding their nominations first, then if you don't get their nomination you can switch parties and try to get on the other ticket--we both know that's been done before. . . ."

"All right, all right. To get the nomination, Harv, don't make any enemies, that's all. Try and get picked as a delegate to one of the conventions--that way you can tell as many other candidates as possible that you'll support them if they'll support you. . .Don't worry about that. If you have to, go ahead and support more than one candidate for the same office. The candidates are chosen by secret ballot anyway so nobody can hollar doublecross. . . ."

"Come on, Harv, don't get cold feet now. Once you're in office you won't have to worry about doing a good job. Chances are you couldn't even if you wanted to. You'll be sitting on so many committees you won't have time to get anything done. The important thing is you'll be able to put down 'Student Government President' on your grad school application--and if you really play your cards right, you can get some influential administrators and faculty members to let you use them as references. You can't start thinking about grad school to soon, Harv. . . ."

Hang in there, Harv. You've got everything going for you--good looks, important friends on campus and no enemies--yet. You're sure to get elected.

Got any gripes? Are there questions to which you can't find the answers? The Daily Orange is starting an "Action" column and invites its readers to submit questions concerning the University. We'll print the questions and answers in a weekly column. Submit your questions to Karen Wiediger, 1101 East Adams St. or call ext. 3755 between 4 and 5 p.m. Monday through Thursday. Names withheld upon request.

Letters to the editor

Grades

(Editor's note: The following is written by an assistant professor of religion at Syracuse University. It is in response to an article printed in the February 21 issue of the Daily Orange entitled "The faculty," which dealt in part with the salaries received by professors.)

The statement of one of our administrators about the grading system represents an acceptance of those values that have hindered our society in this decade: reward and punishment; production that can be easily demonstrated; the conviction that human nature is "materialistic," which is of course reinforced by a system that is based upon such a conviction.

There are alternatives to a grading system and there are ways of evaluating students without grading. Granted, change to a new system would involve all sorts of problems, but that is a decisive argument only if we assume it is improper to ask, "What is education?" and it is impossible to work out the practical problems involved in a change. If one is not willing to grant these two assumptions, then the question remains, "Why the grading system?"

James G. Williams

Traditions

To the Editor:

It is about time Traditions Commission looked at the highly exclusive and self-important image it built for itself.

Being a fellow Goon Show Goon with Cohen this past fall, I grant that he is sincere and means well, but the changes mentioned in his column yesterday are hardly different from the perennial "new ideas" of O—Week. I agree that all "antique vestiges must be purged," but I fail to see how TC and future Goon Squads are going to open any collective awareness to the Class of '73 to the "exciting world of possibilities" that Syracuse University can become.

I certainly hope TC revamps its criteria for Goon selection. Consider one of the questions I was asked in my Goon interview by TC last spring: "What would you do if you had 300 Jiminy Cricket sweatshirts?" Relevance?

As for change to be undertaken in the TC—created Academic and Cultural Programs, I would suggest a forum or perhaps a lecture entitled, "Worth It!–The Story of SU Tuition."

How, oh great TC god up in the sky, does one place emphasis on diverse cultures that exist within the general student body? Cohen said black students in particular will receive greater attention, and more important, support. Support for what? Black power?–fine. But the idea of "greater attention" and "support" I get from Cohen's statement is "Hey man, what's happening?...

If TC wants to tackle the problem of institutionalized apathy, they should tell the frosh immediately where it's at--the "worth-its" of SU, friction-causing administrative policies, food service, etc. Of course TC does a fine job in planning the general O—Week format, but tell the frosh what they'll eventually find out about SU as soon as they get up here.

Two proposals

Senate aim: increased student participation

By BOB DAVIS

Two contrasting proposals for increased student participation in University Senate were discussed yesterday in an open hearing of the committee on reorganization of the Senate.

One proposal called for the institution of a bicameral government modeled after the United States federal government. The other main proposal expressed the need for a unified University Senate made up of students, faculty and administration.

Although the hearing was publicized in advance as a discussion of ideas about increased student participation in the University Senate, only two undergraduates attended the meeting. This prompted John Diamond, the student representative on the panel to comment that this show of "non-support from the students is one of the reasons the election process in Syracuse is inadequate.

One of the students at the meeting, Joe Treple, first brought up the idea of a bicameral government. The Student Senate would make up one house, and the University Senate would make up the other.

John Diamond criticized that idea because the Student Senate is concerned with social matters while the University Senate decides mainly academic problems. He implied that the two bodies could never work together effectively.

Professor Samuel Fetters later replied to Mr. Diamond's argument. He said most of the University Senate policy isn't interesting to the students and bringing in more students would only "make the issue more muddy."

Professor Fetters favors a bicameral legislature. He said that if the students were "only interested in girls and booze, than so be it. The students would bring up the issues they want."

The case for a unified University Senate was first made by the Committee on Students, chaired by Professor Stern. They recommended to the present committee on reorganization that the University Senate be made up of 25 percent student representatives, 25 percent administration representatives, and 50 percent faculty representatives. Most of the committee on reorganization seemed to favor a unified University Senate as the best way to reform the present governmental structure.

Most of the objections to the bicameral plan were based on mistrust of the Student Senate.

Earlier in the meeting, Stephen K. Bailey former Dean of the Maxwell School and a member of the committee, commented on the need for reorganization of the Syracuse hierarchy. He said "there has been inadequate representation of both faculty and students on the decision-making bodies." He said there is a need for constraints and restraints on the administration." Mr. Bailey called the committees' report on reorganization, "a manifesto against government by decree."

Talent, fashions, bazaar highlight end of International Student Week

Last evening's visit and address by Indonesia's UN ambassador was only one highlight of SU's International Student Week, which will continue through the weekend.

Other features include an international talent show at 8 p.m. Saturday in Grant Auditorium and a fashion show in Day Hall Lounge on Sunday.

The Saturday evening entertainment of song and dance, including a Judo exhibition, will be presented by 12 national groups. Participating groups are Chinese, Japanese, Philippine, French, Ethiopian, African, Egyptian, South Korean, Indian, Pakistani, Ukrainian, Russion and American. Stanley Yin will be master of ceremonies. The entertainment committee is headed by Cynthia Velasquez and Gail von Hahmann. Th epublic is invited and there is no admission charge.

On Sunday from 2-6 p.m. the lounge in Day Hall, Mount olympus, will be transformed into an international bazaar, with booths displaying art objects, fabrics, clothing and food of all nations. At 3:30 p.m. adult and child models will exhibit the fashions of 20 countries. Admission is 25 cents.

New York City offering 20 urban fellowships

SU students may apply for an Urban Fellowship for a year of executive service with the government of New York City.

The Alfred P. Sloan Foundation has granted $189,104 for the first two years of the program, which will be the New York City equivalent of the highly successful White House Fellowship program operating for the past four years in the Federal government.

Each of the 20 Urban Fellows selected from throughout the nation this year will be assigned to work with a top level executive in the city as an assistant in the administrative work, problem-solving and research. At the same time, the Urban Fellows will attend seminars on urban problems with leaders of city government, business and cultural life.

Applications may be obtained from Chancellor Tolley's office in the Administration Building. They must be completed before March 30, 1969.

RAILROAD CAREER OPPORTUNITY

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY representative will interview students interested in accounting - internal auditing - marketing - pricing - freight sales - civil and electrical engineering.

Abdulgani:

Underdeveloped nations slip further behind

By BOB ZUER
Associate Editor

The underdeveloped world is economically slipping farther behind developed areas partially because of its own political instability and partially because of an ineffective world-wide aid program according to Indonesia's permanent representative to the United Nations.

Dr. H. Roeslan Abdulgani made the charge last night in Maxwell Auditorium in an address highlighting International Student Week.

"Problems of economy and development cannot be detached from the political problems of Asia and Africa," he said. "But the present foreign aid programs would hlep more if they were multi-lateral rather than bi-lateral."

Dr. Abdulgani suggested channeling aid through international agencies. He contended this would be more beneficial to the underdeveloped nations involved because it would eliminate the "strings" that sometimes go with bi-lateral foreign aid.

"Friendship cannot be bought, and political bribery will not strengthen an economy," he warned.

Dr. Abdulgani termed Asia and Africa a "third world" which has begun development only since World War II. The basic problems for these countries, he said, is attaining political stability while maintaining democratic principles.

A pressing consideration found in the minds of the people, however, is finding a better life in Asia. Dr. Abdulgani said the dramatic changes now occurring in these countries have been affected by economic conditions. If the leaders are unable to provide the people with a better life, they will be replaced, he said.

The aid and technical assistance programs of the 1960's have been at least partially unsuccessful, he said. The 5 percent per year growth rate set by the United Nations for underdeveloped countries proved unattainable during those years, according to Dr. Abdulgani. The growth rate was actually lower during that time than during the period from 1955 to 1960.

Ambassador Abdulgani quoted Paul Hoffman, director of the United Nations Development Program in voicing his hopes for an improved future for the underdeveloped world. He cited 3 encouraging aspects of the world situation. The first is a growing realization among these countries that they have an equal chance for improvement. The second is that poverty has resulted from an "under-utilization" rather than a lack of human and natural resources. The third is that technical assistance is available to speed up development.

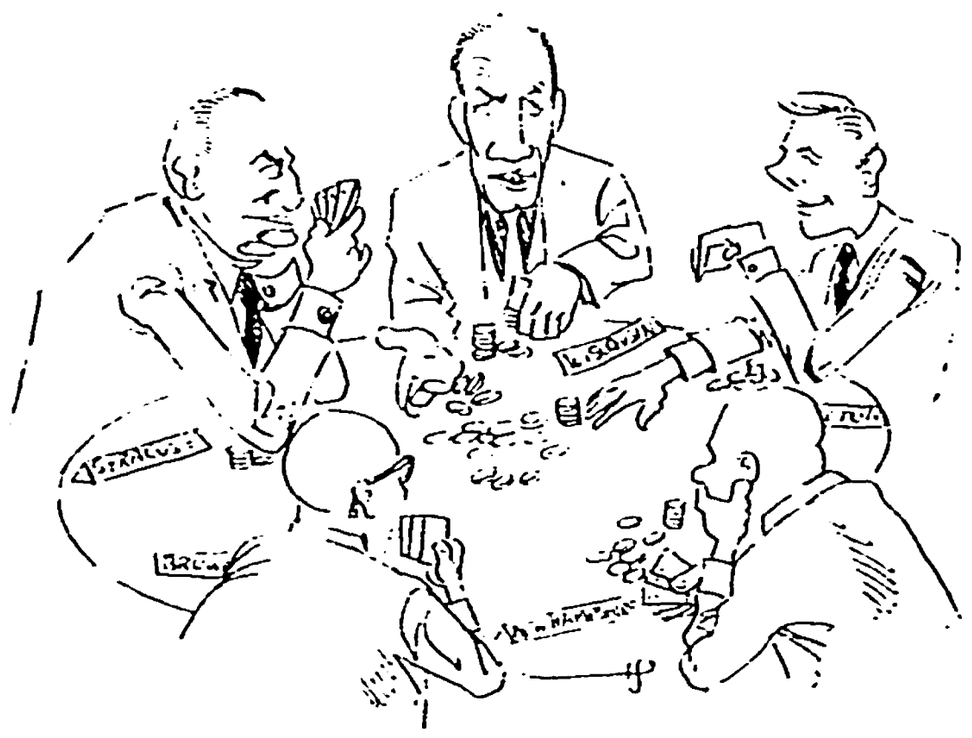
Dr. Abdulgani admitted that his country had one of the weakest economies among these nations even though it is one of the richest in terms of resources. Indonesia has begun her drive toward real economic development by joining the United Nations Economic and Social Council, but an increased flow of aid is still needed, he added.

He acknowledged that the United States had many problems both here and abroad but added he thought more aid could be given. He cited in particular the huge amounts of military spending in Vietnam.

In-tuition?

Don't bet money, honey — you'll need it soon!

EDITOR'S NOTE: Because of its relevance to this campus' situation, the following article is reprinted in full from The Syracuse Herald-Journal of March 5, 1969. Permission has been granted.



That big squeeze on daddy's wallet—the cost of a college education—continues to increase relentlessly.

Not only tuition but room and board and other costs will be higher next fall at many public and private institutions across the country.

Beset by swelling enrollments and faculty demands for more money, some colleges and universities already have announced increases for next year.

Still others, especially state universities, are expected to follow suit, once legislatures wind up their budget sessions this spring or summer.

University of Wisconsin officials, for example, view an increase in tuition as a virtual certainty. "It's going to go up," says an administration spokesman. "I guess there isn't much question about it. The legislature is doing it to us."

"I'll see your tuition and raise you $100 more for room and board."

As a means of paying bigger university bills, Gov. Warren P. Knowles has proposed that undergraduate tuition for out-of-state students be increased by $400 a year to $1,610, and for Wisconsin residents to $410 from $350.

A spokesman for the nation's land-grant colleges and state universities, Edwin M. Crawford, predicts "a substantial number" of other institutions will find themselves taking similar actions. "The biggest pressures," he says, "are growth and an attempt to raise the level of faculty salaries so they can compete with the best private institutions."

A survey by the American Association of University Professors recently found that, on the average, a full professor makes $2,000 more per year at a private institution than in a state institution. When fringe benefits are taken into account, the gap widens to $3,000.

In a number of states legislators use the issue of student revolt as a reason for trimming university budgets, and the universities find the only way to compensate for this is by raising costs to students.

Public institutions that already have announced tuition increases for the fall include the Universities of New Hampshire, Vermont, Illinois, Maryland, Virginia and Miami of Ohio.

Generally the increase hits the out-of-state student hardest. The University of Vermont, for example, approved a $200 tuition increase for non-residents—from $1,800 to $2,000—bringing it in line with New England's fancier private colleges and universities.

The University of New Hampshire is charging $60 more a year for meals and boosting non-resident undergraduate tuition by $200 at its Durham campus and $100 at Plymouth and Keene state colleges.

Among the private institutions which have announced tuition increases are Princeton, John Hopkins, Brown, Rice, T[illegible], Emory, Stanford and Lafayette.

At Lafayette, officials said it was "an absolute necessity if we are to keep our most talented teachers from being drawn away by rapidly expanding public colleges and universities."

Washington seminar

Course brings textbook prose to life

By AUDREY SHEPPARD

Viewed through the pages of The New York Times, the Nixon Administration's early weeks seem something less than exciting; and even the once-explosive issue of American foreign policy has gotten a little dry in newsprint recently. Those two things are the major themes of the 1969 Washington Seminar, a program designed to bring even dull textbook prose to life.

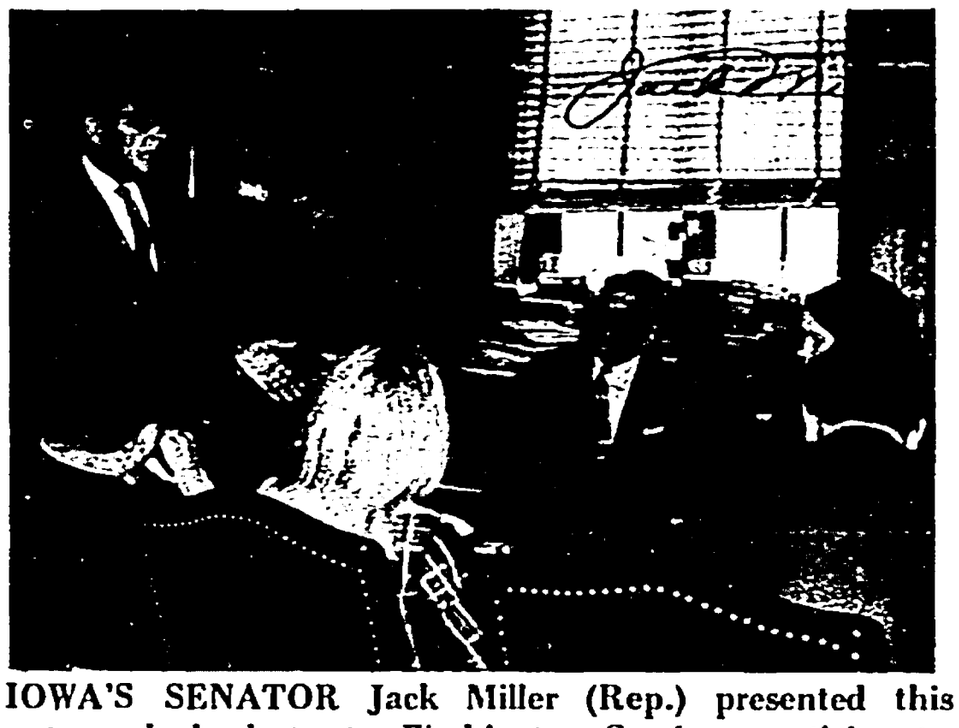
It is virtually impossible to find a seminar veteran who regrets taking the course.

What seminar director Dr. Karl M. Schmidt calls "a unique kind of program," includes interviews with presidential aides, ambassadors, agency executives and senators; visits to both houses of Congress, the Supreme Court and the Central Intelligence Agency.

Even the embassy district hotel where the 40 or so students live is somewhat unique, with important, or at least important-looking people constantly coming and going.

A typical day includes an early morning lecture at the hotel followed by approximately five interviews in various parts of the Captial District.

Speakers spend a few minutes discussion their area of expertise; the question and answer sessions follow.



Over meals--lunch on the run or an almost-as-hectic dinner--students and faculty discuss the issues which have been raised in the day sessions.

Evening work sessions include the writing of logs, careful records of the material covered each day. The drudgery of that chore caused one coed to limit her advice to future seminar students to two words: "Bring No-Doz."

One result of three such active weeks is, inevitably, exhaustion.

"But after a relatively rapid recovery, the virus infects," said Dr. Schmidt.

The "virus" is a heightened interest and participation in politics and public affairs. Past seminar veterans make their presence known when important officials come to town. They become excited about usually dull public affairs and economics courses. They hold internships with Senators and aspire to office themselves.

SU STUDENTS accomodated themselves on the floors of numerous Capitol offices like this during last summer's whirlwind of interview-hopping sessions. This photo was snapped in the office of Michael J. Kirwan, chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

Nixon protestors have day in court

By MITCH LANE

The trial of Larry Alexander and Bruce Augustyniak, two Peace and Freedom Party organizers charged with disorderly conduct and resisting arrest as a result of incidents stemming from the Nixon rally on Oct. 29, opened yesterday with the selection of the jury and the start of prosecution.

Trial Judge Rocco P. Regitano quickly ordered "No shirt sleeves, no chewing gum, no reading newspapers, and no smiling in my courtroom." He grew progressively more irritated during the long series of juror challenges that resulted in 14 jurors being excused from the trial.

Richard Mosher, defense counsel, challenged jurors on issues concerning political leanings, the war in Vietnam, Black Power, Chicago riots, and hippie types. Mosher felt that jurors with strong views on hippies and political activites would be biased concerning any decision the court might render. Mosher held juror after juror disqualified after they made derogatory comments about hippies.

In what must be record time, four jurors were excused in fourteen minutes. At this point, with no potential jurors left, the judge yawned, scratched his chin, looked wearily, out the window, turned back to the court room and asked the Court Clerk "to please go find more jurors--as many as you think necessary."

After a short recess, during which a large group of potential jurors filled the courtroom, the judge appeared gratified to find that the attorneys had agreed on a jury, consisting of five men and one woman who appear to have no definite opinion on some of the most important issues of our times. After swearing in the jury, the happier judge broke his stern countenance and displayed his sage, judgely humor saying to the excused potential jurors "Many are called, but few are chosen."

The court, still enraptured by the judge's humor, settled down to hear the opening statement of Assistant District Attorney Robert Wildridge. Wildridge told the court that he intended to

Tibet Talk Saturday

A 1966 SU graduate and her young Tibetan friend will head the program at Saturday's meeting of the English-Speaking Union in the parish hall of St. Paul's Episcopal Church at 310 Montgomery St.

Miss Bonita Cifaratta will lecture and show a series of slides titled "Himalayan Adventure." Assisting her will be Champa Norzom, an 18-year-old Tibetan girl now studying at Henniger High School, where Miss Cifaratta teaches history.

Champa and Miss Cifaratta met last September at an Indian Hill station in Tibet where the history teacher taught English to refugees.

To help pay the cost of bringing Champa to the United States, Miss Cifaratta appealed to one of her former teachers at Henniger. In two days, faculty members and students raised $600.

At Saturday's meeting, which begins at 8 p.m., Champa will greet the audience in English and repeat the greeting in Tibetan.

Tutors tackling teachers' tasks

By DAVID ROSS

"Besides 30 or 40 agitators, Syracuse students don't bother getting involved in the community." Those who still recite that cliche while waiting for a winning basketball team or worrying about the next big bust, might do better to join the more than 350 students, grads and undergrads, working with neighborhood children in tutorial and recreational programs.

Projection '70, the ambitious project of the centennial class, tutored more than two hundred community children last year. This year the emphasis is on quality rather than quantity. The project has become an accredited course and has drastically cut the number of participants in order to provide what Gene Kane, director of tutor training, called "quality tutoring."

The Projection '70 people work exclusively with children from the experimental Sumner school, located behind Thorndon Park. The school, with a black-to-white ratio of 60/40, is the scene of many university-inspired experiments in education. Projection '70 has trained approximately 65 students to tutor math and reading on an "each one teach one" basis two nights a week.

Though the program is no longer financed by the Junior Class, its directors hope that enough additional funds will be available for expansion by next spring.

According to Kane, the main objective of the project is to "build the skills of the children, and to orient the tutor with the problems of urban education in a program of learning by doing."

A less-publicized program, Education 311, a course taught by Dr. Wilford A. Weber, has probably done more than any similiar course to attune students to the problems of inner-city, education. This semester more than 225 students are involved in tutorial and recreational programs that run the gamut from dramatics and dance in the Sumner School to algebra in Central Technical Vocational High School.

Functioning as a laboratory for the teaching techniques taught in the classroom, Ed 311 gives most of its participants their first exposure to the intricacies of a child-teacher relationship.

Temptations will feature soul sound here

Motown five have diverse personalities

The Temptations

The Temptations, Gordy recordings artists, will appear at the War Memorial next Tuesday, March 11 at 8 p.m. Concert tickets are currently on sale at the box office and at the SU Corner Bookstore.

Following are concise biographic close-ups of The Temps:

Paul Williams is the joker of the group. He is also an ex-football player who is interested in interior decorating. He is one of nine children and his parents wanted him to be a shoe repairman. He plays the guitar and bass and some piano. He was born in Birmingham, Alabama on July 2, 1939, and lived there until he was 19. Paul's hobby is interior decorating.

Dennis Edwards, who was born in Birmingham, Alabama, on Feb. 3, 1943, is the newest member of The Temptations. He was formerly with another Motown group, The Contours. He is single, and his early ambition was to be a top athlete. He loves to play basketball and baseball. His father was a minister, and Dennis, during his teen years, was a member of two gospel groups, The Golden Wonders and The Revelation Wonders. Being musically inclined at an early age, Dennis studied the piano and organ.

Melvin Franklin was born in Montgomery, Alabama on Oct. 12, 1942. He is probably the leader of the group, inasmuch as he is usually the spokesman. He had one year of college at Wayne University. He is a devoted reader of Marvel Comics and thinks Tarzan is the greatest.

Although Otis Williams was born in Texarkana, Texas on Oct. 30, 1941, he was brought to Detroit when he was eight months old. He has lived there ever since. His closest friend is Melvin Franklin and they are like brothers. They started out together in another group.

Eddie Kendricks was born in Birmingham, Alabama on Dec. 17, 1939. He came to Detroit when he was 17 and is the second eldest of five children. Even though he smokes comparatively little, he thinks that it is too much and tries to give it up.

Foreign studies

"It is no longer possible, if indeed it ever was, to call a man properly and liberally educated who has not acquired a deep and meaningful understanding of at least one culture other than his own. The commitments made by this nation, this nation's institutions and international organizations are taking many thousands of Americans abroad where they must live and work with people from different cultural backgrounds and in situations requiring a knowledge of foreign institutions. Also, the requirements of citizenship in a democratic society compelled to play a major and responsible role in a complicated and perilous work call for a citizenry more than ordinarily knowledgeable about the realities of that world.'

This statement comes from a paper compiled by the Foreign Study Program Office of Syracuse University. which operates 11 programs for the graduate and undergraduate students abroad. In the following section these programs are dealt with, from the basic requirements to experiences which students and faculty members have had in the countries.

Syracuse offers study options

By KAREN WIEDIGER

Do you hate Syracuse winters? If so, you no longer have to put up with them -and don't have to transfer to Miami.

Syracuse University offers the undergraduate and some graduate students an option for study in a foreign country, without interrupting a normal degree program.

At this time there are 11 instructional programs conducted abroad. Four are offered in the fall and spring, one in the fall only, one for a full year and the remaining are summer programs.

Italy

The oldest program was begun in 1959 in Italy and is offered in the fall and spring semesters. It is unique in that it enables the American undergraduate who has had no previous study of the Italian language to engage in a full semester of liberal arts work while immersed in the life and culture of Florence.

The academic program is housed in the Villa Gigliucci, a building originally leased and then purchased by the University. The faculty is composed of personnel from SU and Italians appointed as visiting professors or language teachers. The language of instruction, except for courses in Italian language or literature, is English.

Students live in Italian homes in Florence. Each student usually spends the semester as a guest of two different families. Although a fee covering costs is paid to the host family, students are expected to consider themselves as guests of the people, and a willingness to conform to the family's mode of life is required as a basis of the experience of participation in the culture of a foreign country.

At the present time, a maximum of 60 students can be accepted for the program each semester. Each student is required to register for a full academic course load including six semester credits in Italian language or literature. The student then selects three other courses from limited offerings in history, political science, fine arts and philosophy.

At the outset of the Semester in Italy there was some controversy as to the feasibility of taking American students to the country without requiring a language prerequisite. Several years of experience, however, have established the validity of the initial concept.

Colombia

The second oldest program is in Latin America. Three groups have gone to Bogota, Colombia, one each fall, and three have studied in Guatemala.

Since its inauguration, the program has proven to be complicated, challenging and fraught with difficulties. Recognizing the great need to increase, among its students, an understanding of Latin America, the University has been willing to attempt to cope with the many problems inherent in any effort to place students in that area.

Groups have been small, averaging about ten students each fall. The Foreign Studies Office feels this is because the student desirous of obtaining a foreign experience looks to Europe first. Also, social and political conditions in Latin America are unstable, causing some discouragement on the part of students and parents.

With the cooperation of the University of the Andes (Uniandes) part of the academic work is done with a resident chairman from SU and part at the university. The students applying for the program are expected to have completed at least two years of college Spanish and it is the language of instruction. Students take 15 credits including three in advanced Spanish, three taught by the resident chairman and nine in regular courses at Uniandes.

In general, course work at Uniandes is in such fields as anthropology, literature, philosophy, history, cultural history, art history, classics, sociology and economics. A majority of the students who have participated in the program have been Spanish language majors or students majoring in Latin American studies. About one-third of the students, however, have been majoring in fields not directly related to Latin America.

France

The Semester in France was begun in 1963. Although a number of academic programs were already in existence in that country for American students, it was added to SU s foreign studies program because those sponsored by other institutions did not always meet the particular needs of Syracuse students and tended to be limited to those majoring in French.

Operated in cooperation with the University of Poitiers, about 25 students are accepted for the program each semester. It is a goal of the University to make foreign study an option regardless of the major field of study. The program is therefore open to students from all divisions of study if they are able to meet the language requirements.

French is the language of instruction and the students take one course in French civilization, taught by the resident Syracuse professor, and courses in advanced language and French literature. Two academic subjects are taken at the University of Poitiers.

Students are normally limited to work in art history, the humanities, history, philosophy,

Impressions of Italy semester

By DOUGLAS GARR

"People are so similar all over the world. They have their own culture, their own food and their own clothes, but they are people like everyone else."

This was Sarah Bookbinder's reaction in her semester studying abroad in Italy. Miss Bookbinder, along with other Syracuse students lived and studied in Florence from September to January. She received 15 credits towards her degree and took as many credit-hours as students at SU did last fall.

All of the girls spent two months with two different families in Florence. On vacations and weekends they traveled to cities in Italy and countries in Europe. Most of the girls visited Rome, Naples, Milan, Pisa, Venice and Siena.

Miss Bookbinder liked Siena the best because "it was so quaint and dignified. Rome is the center of much of the world's culture, but I didn't feel as much at home there as I did in Florence or Siena."

Norma Bishop, another student who studied in Italy, was most impressed with Venice. "Venice is really very foggy, but different than the other cities. It's not cosmopolitan, but very homey. The people there dress very strangely in an old fashioned atmosphere. Venice can be likened somewhat to New Orleans, of course it's all water and canals, though."

Susan Voelker thought that Florence was an exciting city. She emphasized that Rome was a big tourist attraction and very internationalized. The people of Florence will not adapt to foreign influence as in other cities. She said, "The Florentine's are very proud of their Italian tradition. Romans are very nice and cordial to Americans but Florence had a much warmer atmosphere."

Italian culture

Most of the students took courses that were related to Italian culture. Many took six hours of Italian. There were three hours per week of grammar and five one-hour sessions of conversation. Some of the other courses that the students took were Political Science of Europe, Italian Opera, Florentine Art, Italian Rennaisance History, Rennaisance Art in Italy, and European Government.

Commenting on the education system in Italy, Miss Voelker said, "The universities in Italy are run by the government and that gives them a lot of problems. Only the upper class people get to go to college. The lower and middle class people can't afford it. And the government just doesn't have enough financial aid."

All of the students were especially amazed when they found out how much the Italians get involved with what is happening in the United States. They are especially interested in the war in Vietnam and the American way of life. Miss Bookbinder thought "the Italians are really fascinated by Americans. They think that even the struggling students are capitalists, but they are definitely influenced by us.

"It was amazing to see the Italians glued to the television set during the Apollo launching and the November election," said Miss Bishop.

Miss Voelker felt the Italians were more interested in our government than their own. "They kept up on the news just as we did. They were particularly interested in the Kennedy-Onassis marriage and had definite views on the election. They liked Richard Nixon, probably because he seemed the most conservative of the candidates."

Miss Bishop definitely thought the Italians copied us in many ways. For example, "I asked an Italian friend of mine why the men all wore white socks. He answered, 'because that is what they wear in the United States.' They're just a little behind times."

The girls all found out Italians have definite ideas about American policies. They think all Americans are fairly well off so the tourist cities are out solely for the American dollar.

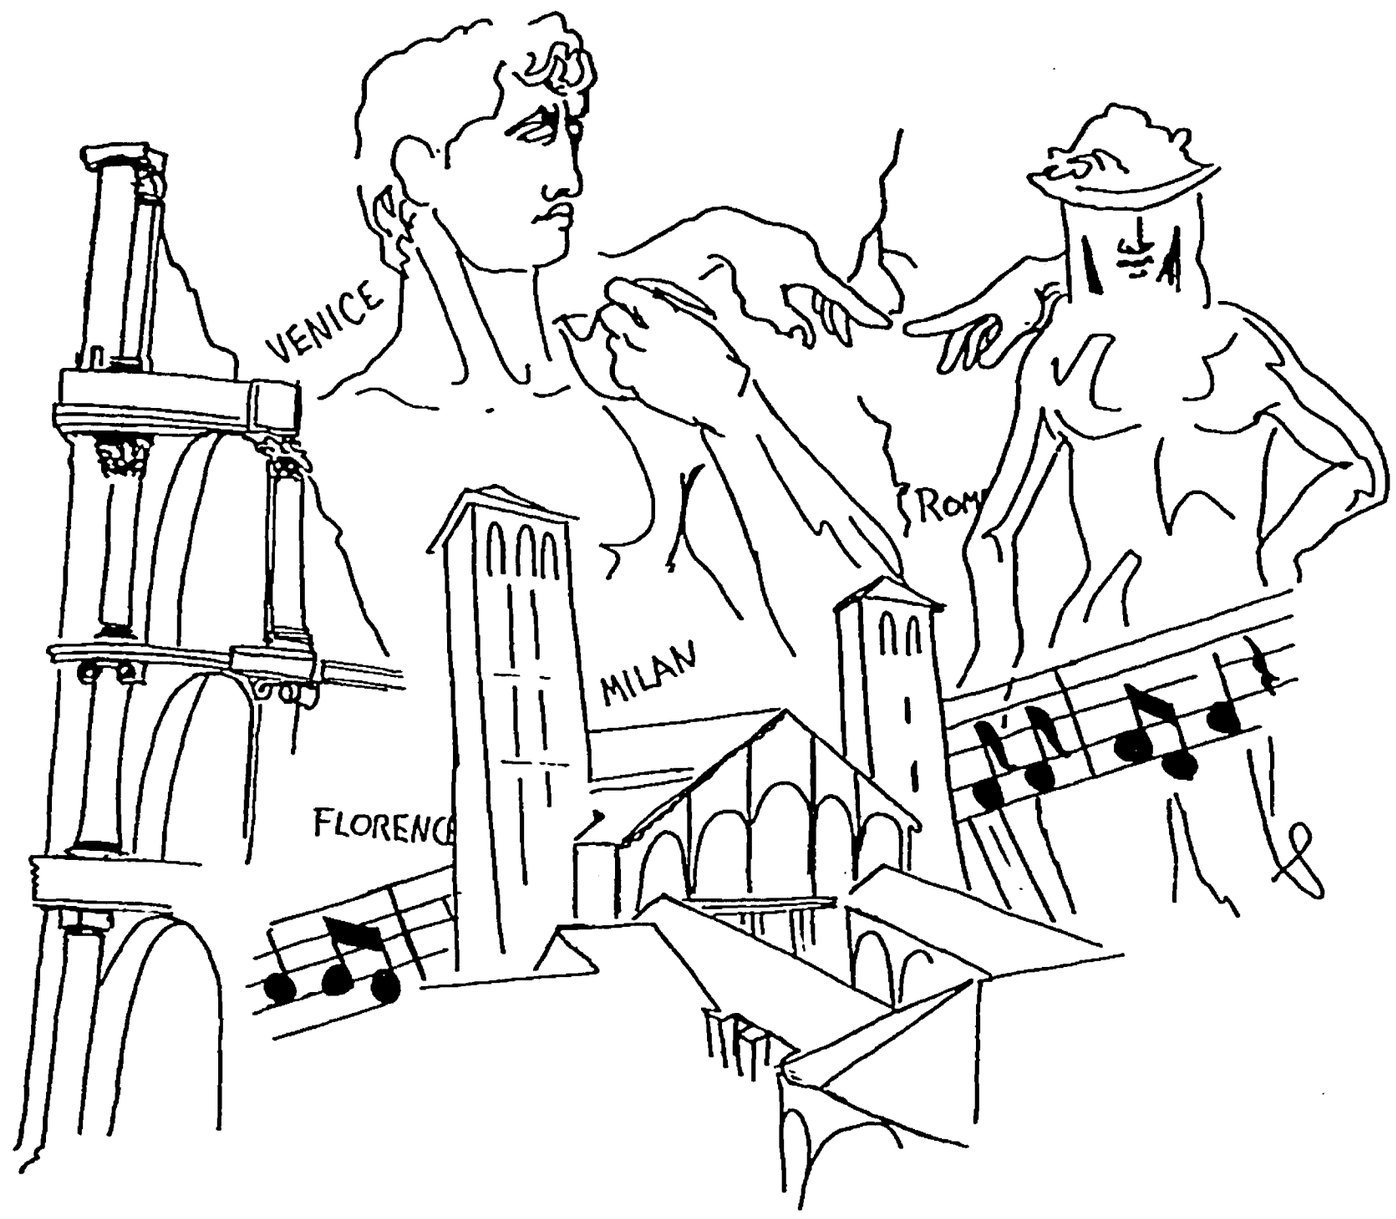
"I would say that most of the Italians are anti-Vietnam. They believe we have no right being there and it just makes us look more militaristic."

Miss Bookbinder feels that although the Italians were involved with American activities they think we are very forward. "Americans, especially our government, are looked upon as imposing people. They don't think we have any business at all in Vietnam."

One of the particular incidents that Miss Bookbinder remembered was when one of the Italians wondered why we had such an intense racial problem in the United States. He mentioned that in "Italy we don't have such a problem." Sarah pointed out that she only saw one Negro in Europe during her four month stay.

The attitude toward foreigners was especially noticed by all of the students. Depending upon what part of Italy they were in, the Italians all reacted to them one way or another.

Miss Bishop thought the people of Florence were generally cordial and easy to get along with. Similiar to many areas of the world, however, they reacted as anyone would expect. "The people we stayed with and those that we knew were very warm to us, but the people we didn't know were hesitant to be more friendly."



Atmosphere

The students also remembered a lot of differences in the physical atmosphere in Italy. During the winter months it got a lot of rain and almost had another flood.

Miss Bishop also felt that the homes were very beautiful and modern although the Italians did not particularly plan as well as Americans. "The first house I stayed in had a very high ceiling so all of the heat rose to the top. Very often I was quite cold."

Miss Bookbinder said the Italians thought us strange in many ways. "Water is very expensive so we had to get used to bathing only twice a week."

Miss Voelker seemed to speak for everyone when she summed up the trip. "It was really a living experience. Not only was there academic learning but also cultural learning as well. Everything we did was related to Italian life. We had guest lecturers who spoke on Michelangelo and Dante and that added to an extremely well organized program. Out of all the schools in Italy, (there are five others), our's was one of the best."

New programs offered

Summers in Europe

Five semester abroad programs take place during the summer through the Foreign Studies Office of Syracuse University. Some of the sessions will be conducted this year for the first time.

The photography department of the School of Journalism is offering a program in Munich, Germnay for students who have had a minimum of one year's instruction in photography. All students who take part in the program will be expected to register for six credits of course work which may be taken at the upper division undergraduate or the graduate level.

Three courses will be offered, including a photographic workshop in advanced photography in which students will work on problems of advertising, illustration, picture stories and color. Another course will be in color photography and the third is research in the field of pictures.

The language of instruction is English and sessions will be held at the Agfa-Gevaert Technikum in Munich, a new modern school with the latest in photographic facilities.

Fred A. Demarest, chairman of the photography department at SU will serve as the resident director of the summer session. Guest faculty members will include members of the staff of the Agfa-Gevaert Technikum.

A new program in Switzerland is being offered in connection with the School of Music. The program, carried out under the name L'Ecole Hindemith, has a format consisting of a course in music history, one in music theory, a performance-oriented course in musical literature and individual coaching in performance.

Each student must take three of the four units mentioned above for a total of six credit hours. No part-time students or auditors will be accepted in the program.

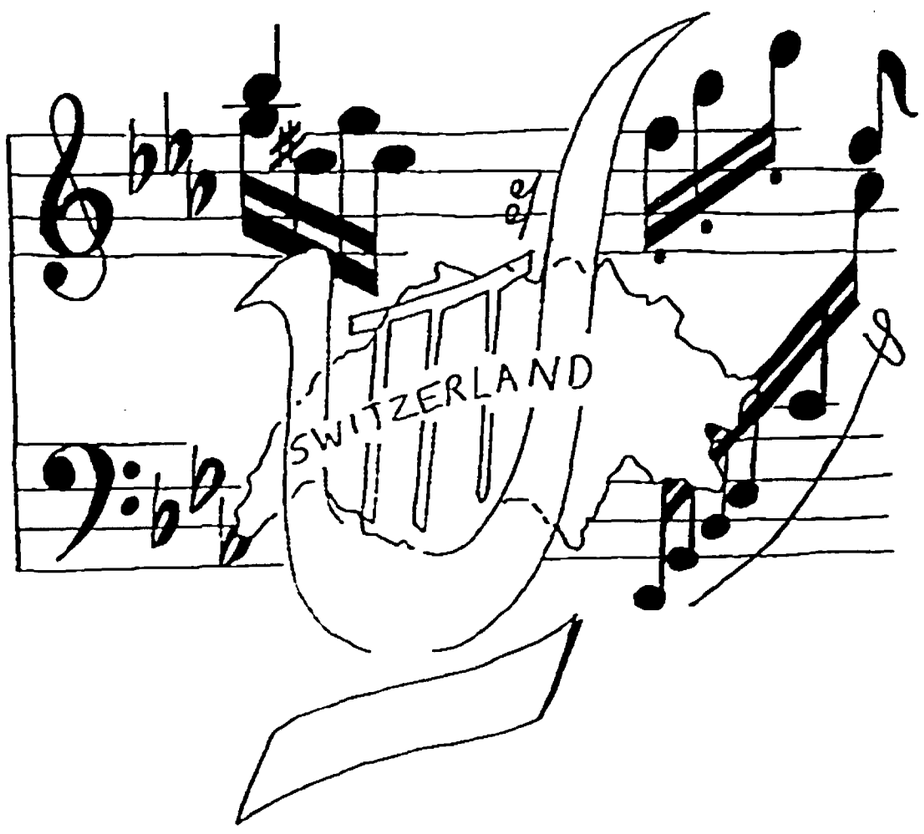
All students and staff members at L'Ecole Hindemith will combine their efforts in collegium-type programs which will be presented publicly in the Vevy area under the ttile "Les Concerts Hindemith."

Don Smithers, assistant progressor of history of music at SU and Howard Boatwright, dean of the School of Music will serve as faculty members for the program. Prominent European musicians or American musicians in Europe will be invited to pay short visits to the school and take part in the instructional and performing phases of the program.

Students will be housed in chalet hotels and private homes which are accessible on foot, bicycle or electric train to the building containing classroom, practice and rehearsal facilities. Meals will normally be taken where the student resides.

One four-credit course in London will be offered by the School of Education in cooperation with the Institute of Education of the University of London. The course title is "International Dimensions of Human Relations: The Process and Skills."

The course is aimed at developing group leadership capabilities. It is intended to facilitate an understanding of roles, group processes, sensitivity to others and to the individual person. Group leadership skills will be strengthened through laboratory testing of behavioral science concepts.



Dr. Harry Randles and Dr. Donald Herring of the School of Education will teach the course.

The course will be offered for upper division undergraduate or graduate credit and no auditors will be registered.

Two summer programs are offered in Florence, Italy. The first is for Italian language and literature and all students register for six credits of course work. Courses are at the undergraduate level and are taught by visiting American and Italian instructors Beginning and intermediate Italian and MOdern Italian Literature are offered.

The second program is given through the School of Art. Students are limited to a maximum of two courses for six semester credits. The classes offered are intermediate drawing, painting and history and research for art.

Students in both programs will be housed in approved boarding houses but they may apply forhousing in a private home. Classes will be held in the Villa Gigliucci, the site of the Syracuse Semester in Italy.

Bogota, Colombia

Life in Latin America: students' point of view

By KAY CHRISTENSEN

The "Athens of South America." Lots of coffee. Pesos. Cosmopolitan city. Spanish. Ruana (poncho). Literature.

This is Bogota, Colombia where ten Syracuse University students spent their fall semester, amid the cultural center of South America. What is it like to live in a strange land with strange customs, a strange language and a strange family?

"You learn to appreciate what you have here," said both Pat Roth, junior, and Judy Wingerd, senior. Having lived with "struggling middle-class" families, as did most of the SU students, the girls experienced new and different ways of living.

Another Culture

Junior Pat Glenn, a psychology major, believes she reaped benefits from the experience in addition to gaining confidence in Spanish. She was exposed to another culture--she saw how other people lived, how they viewed the racial tensions and how their society works. And, perhaps, most important, she, as well as the others, was able to see another country's view of the United States. Such a view can add perspective to an American citizen's thoughts.

Although the SU Colombia program offers rewarding experiences to participants, as every experience in life, not all was roses. In their academic life, for instance, SU girls were not able to win many friendships with their South American counterparts. Most of the North American girls were regarded at a distance by the South American girls-with envy.

Part of this envy is obviously due to the attention American girls receive from Latin males. The South American woman's place is in the home--comparable to the old traditional background of the United States. Because South American boys have no place to discuss their views in the intellectual world, they would open up with much of this "forbidden" discussion with North American girls. Thus, the girls would be able to make many friends among the men, but few among the women.

SU girls soon found, too, that they were the center of attention just because they were from the United States. Even when walking down a street, loud comments came from the men, accompanied by whistles. A few pinches were also common.

Family life

All of the SU students lived with a family which had agreed to sponsor them. Most families included a maid or two. One participant, Pat Roth, had an unusual experience with her family. They had apparently moved from the rural area to an urban environment, but failed to change their ways. Not only cats and a dog, but chickens, ducks and rabbits were common sights around the house.

Although the families had agreed to sponsor an American student, they apparently did not wholeheartedly support the idea of having another person become a family member. It's "big business" for families to accept a foreign student because they receive $70 a month when operating under the program. It is also prestigious for a Colombian family to have a North American living with them.

Judy Wingerd, however, readily beams when speaking of her "family." "Just call me Mama" were the words which greeted her when her South American mother met her. She felt that she had an easy time adjusting to her new "family" because she was so readily accepted by them.

"I didn't break any family unity," said Miss Wingerd, attributing this to her acceptance by the family. She lived with a widow and her daughter, a lady boarder, and a maid.

Although some students became homesick for their good old American culture in their first few weeks, this longing changed as they became a part of their families and a part of the Colombian life.

Academics

Just because the SU students soon became acclimated to their new culture does not mean that their studies ceased, though. All of the SU students attended the University of the Andes, a private institution of 2000 upperclass students. All of the students commuted, so they lacked a campus atmosphere.

Because a basic requirement for participation in the program is to have taken two years of college Spanish, SU students had a smattering of the language before they set foot on the foreign land. A month of intensive Spanish was required, however, to help the students gain a command of the language. The students pointed out that they were subjected to a Spanish lesson daily, just by living in a culture where the communications were carried on in Spanish.

Professor Jaime Ferran, a Spanish instructor at SU, accompanied the ten SU students to Colombia, mostly in an advisory capacity. He taught an "exposure" course, however, for which he invited guest lectures, acquainted students with Bogota's literature, etc.

In addition to the Spanish course and the "exposure" course, students registered for three U. of Andes courses, which varied according to their majors. An average SU load of 15 credit hours was transferred for the semester's work.

View of Americans

With such programs as the SU semester-abroad, Colombians are used to seeing and being exposed to Americans. Their basic image of Americans, said the SU students, is that of rich, morally loose, flashy and under the guise of a superiority complex. They have developed most of their concepts from American movies, and the motion picture, "The Graduate," has recently re-enforced this image.

Politically, Colombians do not think the United States should be pouring foreign aid into their country. They do not, however, resent the fact that Americans are the number one coffee-drinking country in the world. (Colombia's largest export, 66 per cent, and staple product is coffee.)

Thus, such a living experience in another culture gave the participants another outlook on life. They were exposed to a different political system, different economy, different view of Americans, different family life and a different academic system.

"It was an experience I wouldn't have forfeited for anything," is a common reaction of the student who spent a semester in Bogota.

SU professors teach in foreign programs

By ROB STRUGATZ

Members of the Syracuse University faculty, as well as students, have had the opportunity to share in culture-enriching trips abroad in the past several years. Semester programs have been established in Colombia, France, Italy, and Holland, with Professors Jaime Ferran, Willie Melczer, Nicolae Babuts, and Myron Lichtblau of the Romance Language Department, Walter Ullman of the History Department, Theodore C. Denise of the Philosophy Department, and Lillian Mohr and Dean Bernice Wright of the Home Economics Department participating. Four of these faculty members gave their opinions and comments on their various voyages.

Colombia

Professor Ferran spent the 1965 and 1968 fall semesters in Colombia. He stated that these trips were invaluable to the students because they are completely immersed in the Colombian language and culture, living in Colombian homes and working at the University of the Andes, the major institution of higher learning in that South American country.

He could think of no grave disadvantages to the program, with the possible exception that once at the school the American students could not always be assured of getting the best professors. When asked whether he saw any way in which the program could be improved, he said that he felt the students should be given a greater orientation period before leaving on their trips.

Ferran went on to say that he felt most American students were very "Europe-minded," and that the merits of visiting a country such as Colombia instead of, perhaps, Spain, were overlooked. He also explained that the American-Colombian relationship does not stop with these semester trips, and cited an example of a Colombian professor who is now teaching at the University of Iowa, and who made a guest appearance here earlier in the year.

Professor Melczer was another visiter to Colombia, making his trip with a group of students in 1967. He voyaged with ten students, which was a slight increase over the number in Professor Ferran's 1966 group. His trip lasted the standard length of time, from August 10 through December 10. Melczer also stressed the close contact of the students with a "genuine environment," and stated that since most of the contacts at the University were non-Americans, the impact of the language was very great.

Speaking a bit more philosophically than his colleague, Professor Melczer saw no disadvantages to the program because "imperfections are part and parcel of life." He went on to say that Colombia was an ideal place to visit, also citing the pro-Europe attitude of American students.

Italy

Professor Ullman spent his time abroad teaching history in Florence, Italy during the academic year 1966-1967. According to him, the program in Florence is "the oldest and, in many ways, the best known of our overseas programs." It is "academically excellent and in many ways superior to the many other U.S. schools of renown who also have campuses there."

As did the two previous men, Ullman stressed that "one of the greatest advantages of the SU Italy program is the stay of students with Italian families. This enables a more meaningful immersion into things Italian than a dorm situation would permit."

On a lighter note, he added, "The notion that serious overseas study and a good time are mutually exclusive is erroneous." He went on to cite examples such as winery tours and a tour of the pastries of the Piazza del Duomo.

Amsterdam

"The cultural and intellectual life of Amsterdam, coupled with its rare combination of old world beauty and modern European cosmopolitanism makes it an ideal location for an educational experience designed to expand and stimulate the mind and enhance the appreciaiton of the arts." This was a statement made by Bernice Wright, dean of the College of Home Economics, concerning the semester program in Amsterdam Holland.

This program takes place at the Netherlands-American Institute on Museumplein in Amsterdam, which "has, for a number of years been the cultural center of Dutch-American relations." Between twenty and twenty-five students attend the semester there, which is a far larger number than the other programs afford.

The plan provides for students to live with Dutch families to provide an opportunity for immersion in the cultural and family life of the Dutch people. In addition, a program of educational and cultural experiences is arranged for the semester. During the fall term students visited the Historical Costume Museum in the Hague, the Burgerweeshuis, a civil orphanage for children from disturbed homes, the Frans Hal's Museum in Haarlem the Museum of Ethnology and other places of educational interest.

In many of these programs language majors seem to dominate, but the semesters are not limited to them. Especially in the Colombia program, some of the students who attend are or journalism majors.

Holland: 'wooden shoe' like to be there?

By HELENE MACDONALD
Associate Editor

The tulips weren't in bloom when they arrived in Holland last August and they didn't find too many people wearing wooden shoes, but the girls participating in SU's Semester in Amsterdam discovered the real Holland during their four-month semester abroad.

About 16 girls sailed for Holland Aug. 21, 1968 and began learning Dutch while at sea. After landing, they spent a week in a small town learning about Dutch culture and two days in Paris before joining their families.

Each girl lived with a Dutch family which provided her with firsthand knowledge of Dutch life--hospitality, eating and living habits and love for outdoor sports.

Renee Schwadron, a junior who "expected everyone to live in windmills," lived outside Amsterdam in a three-year-old "see through" house with huge plate glass windows and contemporary furnishings. Judy Booser, a senior, stayed with a family who lived in a small apartment in the city of Amsterdam.

The difference in housing reflected the differences in life styles of the families. Miss Schwadron's family took her on weekend trips to various parts of Holland while Miss Boosers family never could get the "right people together at the right time" to tour the countryside.

"My family was unconventional by Dutch standards," Miss Booser recalled. "Everyone painted and wrote short stories and poetry--in Dutch and in English.

The SU group does its studying in the headquarters of the Netherlands-America Institute, an organization similar to the American Field Service. The girls are taught by Dutch professors.

Since the program is mainly sponsored by the College of Home Economics, many courses, such as marriage and family relations, history of the family and cultural aspects of clothing are home ec oriented. Urban sociology, medival intellectual history, history of Dutch painting, contemporary Dutch and Dutch (required) are also offered.

Miss Schwadron, a fabric design major in the art school, liked the curriculum because it allowed her to take elective subjects. Miss Booser, a family relations-child development major, was able to take courses for her major and electives.

Since most of the younger Dutch people learned English in school, the girls experienced little difficulty conversing with people their own age.

Miss Booser's brother spoke "Oxford English," but knew slang like "up tight" which surprised her. "My parents knew little English and I had trouble learning Dutch so we could only communicate on a basic level," she said.

Learning Dutch was no problem for Miss Schwadron and her whole family spoke English well. "We were all self-conscious about speaking each other's language, but we got over that and learned from each other," she added.

Both girls mentioned the hectic traffic situation, a snarl of icy bicycles, motorcycles, small cars and trolleys, better known as trams. "It's dangerous for a pedestrian," Miss Schwadron said.

Bicycles are a way of life in Holland and the girls immediately adopted them as transportation to class and outings. "As soon as I got some confidence," Miss Booser said, "I began to race, just like the Dutch kids, to see how many people I could pass.

"My family was middle class by Dutch terms," she explained. "I was surprised to learn my family owned a car because my brother drove although neither of the parents did. The car is kind of a status symbol in Holland."

Miss Schwadron found the Dutch very warm and friendly toward Americans but Miss Booser's family was quite skeptical about Americans and American policies. She read more about current events while in Holland · to defend U.S. positions.

The Dutch were very interested in the election because of the great influence the United States has on Western European affairs.

During a five-day break in October, the girls were free to travel and many went to London or Germany. When the semester ended just before Christmas, the girls, responsible for getting home on their own, scattered; some immediately returned home while many visited other places such as Germany, Vienna, Italy and France.

"Before we got to Holland, we were warned about culture shock--getting used to a different way of life," Miss Schwadron remembered. "But it happened to me in reverse. Things in Holland were new to me, but I wasn't quite prepared for coming home.

"Just returning to classes was enough," she added, "and seeing uninvolved people and seeing the American way of life in a different light was a culture shock too."

The girls agree that the program should be extended to a whole year. Just as they were beginning to "get in the groove" as Miss Schwadron put it, they had to leave.

"If we stayed longer, it would be harder to leave, Miss Booser admitted, "but I was just gaining some fluency in Dutch and developing some pattern of living when I had to leave."

Somehow what the girls learned form their courses was secondary to what they learned aobut Holland, its people and its culture.

Syracuse offers study options...

English and American literature, sociology and anthropology. For each course in which a student is enrolled there is one hour of tutoring a week in addition to the regularly schedules lectures. The three French courses which are required are SU courses.

A deliberate effort is made to immerse students in the life of France and to enable them to follow a daily routine like that of a typical French student. While in Poitiers, students live either in private homes or student residences.

When dormitory arrangements are made they are usually with French students. The University, however, prefers to place students in private homes, feeling this is the most successful type of cultural immersion.

The program is also open to students from other colleges and universities in the United States. Students have gone to the Semester in France from Vassar, Fairleigh Dickinson, George Washington, Penn State and New York University.

Netherlands

One of the newest semester abroad programs is in the Netherlands. Offered by the College of Home Economics in cooperation with the School of Art and the departments of fine arts, history and sociology, the program was started in 1967.

Courses in Amsterdam are taught in rooms rented by SU. The facilities provide space for classrooms and offices and the building also houses an American library and office of the Netherlands-America Institute. The Institute has cooperated in launching the program and has provided services to the University.

The language of instruction is English and the courses are taught by SU faculty members and visiting Dutch professors. A resident chairman from SU teaches two of the courses and students may take home economics, sociology, art history and the Dutch language. The language course is required but not for degree credit.

Each student lives with a Dutch family, which provides the student with a "point of entry" into the mainstream of life in the country.

Honors Program

Also begun in 1967 was the Honors Year in London, developed by the Honors Council, the College of Liberal Arts and the Foreign Studies Office. The program is made available through cooperation with Bedford College, University of London.

Because of limitations on resources at Bedford, the students must be working either in sociology or philosophy. Four students are selected about mid-way through the academic year preceeding the year in London. This early selection permits an extensive period of orientation which is conducted on the SU campus during the spring semester.

It is hoped SU will seek to make reciprocal arrangements with Bedford, allowing four students to come here while those from SU continue studies in London.

Graduate Program

The last program which is conducted on a semester basis is a fine arts graduate program in Florence, Italy. Recognizing an existing need to prepare more students of art history to work at a high level in that field, and most particularly a need to develop competent graduate students who will become directors and curators of art museums, the experimental graduate overseas program was inaugurated in 1964.

Four students working on advanced degrees at Syracuse are accepted for the program each year. The fall semester is spent on the campus and students take part in special seminars and are required to participate in a special non-credit Italian language program.

The spring term is spent in Florence working under the direction of art professors. During the summer the students engage in a five-week period of independent research.

Each student is awarded a fellowship providing a stipend, tuition, round trip transportation, board and lodging for the spring term and the period of independent research.

Since the fall of 1959, when the first foreign studies program was started, 1,420 students have studied abroad through SU programs and many others have participated in short-term summer programs.

prove that the defendants, indeed, had behaved in a disorderly fashion and were guilty of the charges placed against them. Defense attorney Mosher contended that the arrests were of a political nature and that the defendents were only leading a demonstration.

First witness for the prosecution was Sgt. Ray Cook, a member of the Syracuse Police Dept. Cook claimed that Augustyniak was "elbowing, pushing and shoving his way through the crowd." He claimed that when he attempted to restrain and admonish Augustyniak for jostling little old ladies, Augustyniak replied with obscenity.

Next witness was Patrolman Harold Major another member of the Syracuse Police, who, in addition to reiterating the alleged remark of Augustyniak, further described and demonstrated a classic obscene gesture allegedly directed in his direction by one of the defendants.

Judge Regitano recessed the trial until 10:00 Friday morning when prosecution will conclude its case and defense will begin.

Tutors tackle . . .

Although only half the students taking it plan to become teachers, Dr. Weber said the course often proves valuable to sociology, social work and political science majors. It has been expanded to three sections this semester.

The tutors are completely on their own (with the exception of those receiving aid from the School Volunteer Program at the Sumner School).

"The primary objective is first-hand experience at working extensively with one child," said Dr. Weber. "Another important factor is that it exposes a primarily white middle class group to different cultural and socio-economic backgrounds."

The Big Brother Program is a project of Circle K, a campus service organization affiliated with the Kiwanis Club. Headed by Larry Schulman, this newly-organized group is currently conducting a recruiting campaign.

Their program is geared toward providing after-school and weekend recreation for children in the neighborhoods surrounding the campus. The one-to-one program, originally organized by social workers from the Martin Luther King School (formerly the Croton School), has about twenty student volunteers. Through affiliation with some of the campus' more concerned Greek houses, they hope to attract a larger number of participants.

Circle K secretary Charles Singer pointed out students need not have cars to get involved, since most of the children live within five minutes walking distance of campus. The experience, like that of Projection '70 and Education 311, offer the satisfaction of what Dr. Weber called "finding out where it's at."

Give blood

The Red Cross Bloodmobile will be at Shaw Dormitory Wednesday and Thursday, March 12 and 13, and will be accepting blood donations from 10 a.m. to 3:45 p.m. Donors must be between the ages of 18 and 60 years and weigh at least 110 pounds. Those between 18 and 21 no longer need written parental permission to give blood.

Why Are You A Poor Talker?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports a simple technique of everyday conversation which can pay you real dividends in social and business advancement and works like magic to give you poise, self-confidence and greater popularity.

According to this publisher, many people do not realize how much they could influence others simply by what they say and how they say it. Whether in business, at social functions, or even in casual conversations with new acquaintances there are ways to make a good impression every time you talk.

To acquaint the readers of this paper with the easy-to-follow rules for developing skill in everyday conversation, the publishers have printed full details of their interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "Adventures in Conversation," which will be mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Conversation, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 173-412, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

Engineering and Science at IBM

"You're treated like a professional right from the start."

"The attitude here is, if you're good enough to be hired, you're good enough to be turned loose on a project," says Don Feistamel.

Don earned a B.S.E.E. in 1965. Today, he's an Associate Engineer in systems design and evaluation at IBM. Most of his work consists of determining modifications needed to make complex data processing systems fit the specialized requirements of IBM customers.

Depending on the size of the project, Don works individually or in a small team. He's now working with three other engineers on part of an air traffic control system that will process radar information by computer. Says Don: "There are only general guidelines. The assignment is simply to come up with the optimum system."

Set your own pace

Recently he wrote a simulation program that enables an IBM computer to predict the performance of a data processing system that will track satellites. He handled that project himself. "Nobody stands over my shoulder," Don says. "I pretty much set my own pace."

Don's informal working environment is typical of Engineering and Science at IBM. No matter how large the project, we break it down into units small enough to be handled by one person or a few people.

Don sees a lot of possibilities for the future. He says. "My job requires that I keep up to date with all the latest IBM equipment and systems programs. With that broad an outlook, I can move into almost any technical area at IBM—development, manufacturing, product test, space and defense projects, programming or marketing."

Naked apes on the loose!

By Lew Howell

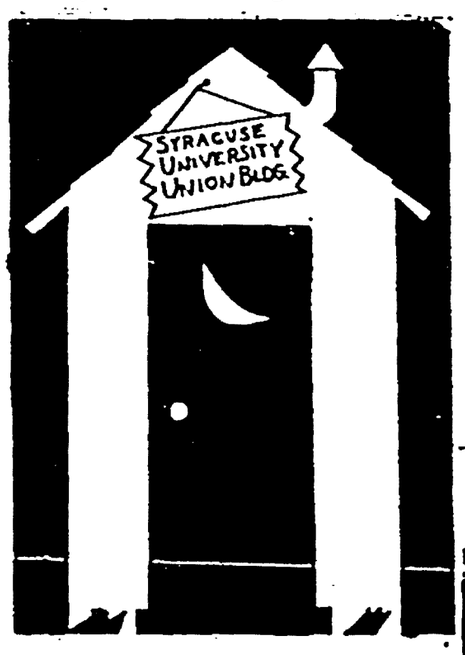
The exaggerated image that we humans have of ourselves occasionally is penetrated by chance happenings, and suddenly we are laughingly aware of how silly we really are. We are usually so pretentious, lauding ourselves on our ability to send men orbiting around the moon and on our great achievements in the arts and sciences.

But all the time there lurks the real man just behind the scientific-artistic facade. Desmond Morris probably describes that real man best as the Naked Ape, an animal with perhaps a little more intelligence than other apes, but certainly not much more (not enough to distinguish him greatly or significantly set him apart.) No, the Naked Ape is still ruled by his passions, by his animal drives, and those drives provide us with the key to his real character.

Let us look for a moment at some recent achievements of the Naked Ape. Wars--Vietnam, Sudan, Biafra, Korea, Middle East--are continually under way, their prupose being to kill as many of the Naked Apes from some different tribe as possible and protect one's territory just like in pre-historic cave days.

Destruction of what cannot be obtained peaceably is another typical characteristic of Naked Ape activity. Witness the course of guerrilla warfare anywhere, campus riots, bombing of small nations by large nations--all out of animal frustration and without any particular direction or possibility of accomplishment.

Sexual activity, of course, is another typical Naked Ape pastime. In fact, the Naked Ape spends much more time in this pursuit than do other apes or other animals, even though it is difficult to place in the "achievement" category. Paricularly the male of the species focuses much of his activity as well as conversation around sexual objectives. This is not be condemned, of course, since this is part of the Naked Ape's nature. There can be difficulties here, however, since it is important for the male to attract the female, and since he can't strut around showing his exquisite plummage as some in the bird kingdom do, he proves his male-hood in other ways. He shows how strong he is, how virile, how much he can drink, how fast he can drive, and he battles other males on the sports field or on the battlefield.



All this Naked Ape activity would be alright except for that little bit of extra intelligence that the human has above the other apes. Unfortunately, he has put that intelligence to work in his usual ape pursuits, most of which have to do with destruction of other Naked Apes or proving superiority over them. His greatest achievement is not in the arts and sciences but in killing other apes.

The Naked Ape has already learned how to destroy the entire planet upon which he lives, but this has not satisfied him. He continues to develop means of destroying it even more easily, all the while thinking only about eliminating that other tribe of apes which he sees as threatening him.

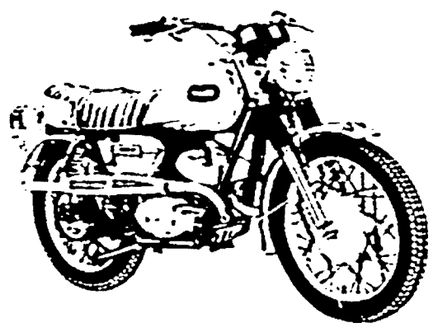
And now the height of Naked Ape achievement: it was disclosed in Washington this week that American tribal warriors have calmly been shipping around by rail enough germ-gas to kill one hundred billion people. What could possibly outdo this Naked Ape accomplishment?

Personally, the dog has always seemed to be more intelligent than the Naked Ape. It seems that dogs hardly ever worry about killing each other.

Tel Aviv prof to lecture here on 'Middle East after War'

Professor Gavriel Cohen of the University of Tel Aviv will lecture on the subject of "The Middle East and the Great Powers after the Six-Day War" on Monday, March 10, at 3 p.m. in Grant Auditorium.

Professor Cohen, one of the most distinguished Israeli historians of Medieval and Modern Palestine, has also been a member of the Israeli Knosset (Parliament) since 1965.



The lecture, which is being sponsored by the Department of History of the Maxwell School, is open to the public.

RESEARCH...

A career with meaning for baccalaureate science majors—

Basic research is an essential function of a University. For many years, The University of Rochester has recognized its obligation to discover as well as disseminate truth, to participate actively in programs aimed at extending man's knowledge.

Important basic research programs are in progress in all divisions of the University. These require inquisitive research assistants from many disciplines, especially biology and chemistry. We offer attractive salaries and benefits, and opportunity for graduate study in off-duty hours with liberal tuition aid.

Our Personnel Representative will be on campus March 17, 1969. Consult your Placement Office for an appointment.

Top UU positions open to applicants

The two top positions in University Union, chairman and vice-chairman, will be open for application this week, according to UU Vice-Chairman Mary Franciosi.

The chairman, chief executive in UU, represents the organization to the university community, chairs Policy Board meetings, and coordinates the programs of all three University Union boards.

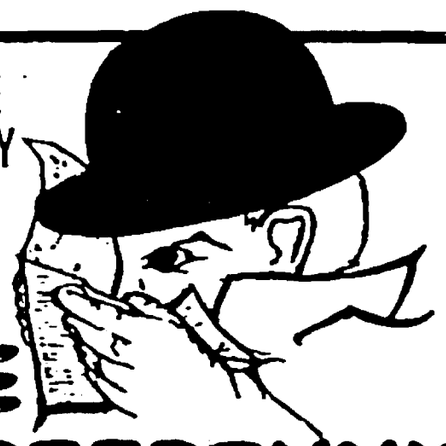
The Policy Board administers the Kimmel Project and determines final UU policy. The Programming Board directs advertising, concerts, films, special events, and The Place. The Development Board manages public relations, fund raising, research and architecture.

The Vice-Chairman arranges meetings, recruits personnel, and acts as the chairman's representative.

"Both jobs call for responsibility and dedication," said Miss Franciosi, "and they are open to any member of the university community--students, faculty members, or administrators. The only requirement is a full semester's experience in UU."

Applications must be two pages or less in length, giving name, address, extension, and ideas about the position and Union. They should be left for Mary Franciosi, Haven Hall, before 5 p.m. Wednesday.

UU's Policy Board will review applications and nominate candidates Wednesday night, and elections will be held at a University Union general meeting next week. The new officers will assume their posts during Spring Weekend.



SU orchestra slates concert this weekend

Professor Louis Krasner, director of the Syracuse University orchestra has scheduled a most intriguing program for the orchestra to perform on next Sunday's regular Crouse College Concert, and he has selected two student soloists to appear with the symphony.

The opening work is scored for trumpet, flutes and strings. The trumpet solo will be played by George Coble. Flutes are Elizabeth Szlek, Mary Jane Maltby, Allan Travis and Suzanne Pyrch.

Next on the program will be the famous "Kindertotenlieder" by Gustav Mahler. This opus was written in 1902 for voice and orchestra and is one of the great compositions of the voice literature. Soloist will Del-Louise Moyer, contralto. Miss Moyer spent last summer in Salzburg, Austria, where she studied at the Mozarteum and also had the opportunity to perform Brahm's "Vier Ernste Gesange" during the Salzburg Music Festival. She is a senior pupil of Professor Ruth Pinnell and upon graduation will study opera at the Lieder in Germany.

Final work on the program will be the C Minor Concerto, opus 37 No. 3 by Beethoven,

Religion scholars to convene here

Scholars in religion from nine schools will speak at the Eastern Regional Conference of the American Academy of Religion at Syracuse University Friday and Saturday (March 7 and 8).

The conference will include four sessions, a dinner and a business meeting. The sessions will be in Maxwell Auditorium.

The four men presenting papers are: Prof. Gerald Sloyan, Temple University, "Current State of the Problem of the Trial of Jesus," 4:30 p.m. Friday; Prof. Van A. Harvey, University of Pennsylvania, "Has the Theology of Hope a Future?" 8 p.m. Friday; Prof. Donald K. Swearer, Oberlin College, "An Approach to 'Real' Inter-religious Dialogue," 9 a.m. Saturday; Prof. Leighton M. McCutchen, Jr., Hartford Seminary Foundation, "Profane Revelation: A contribution from the Psychology of Thinking," 10:30 a.m. Saturday.

After each speaker has presented his paper, a respondent will comment on it. The respondents are Prof. Paul Myer, Colgate Rochester Divinity School; Prof. Frank Dilley, University of Pennsylvania; Prof. Kenneth Morgan, Colgate University, Prof. Agehananda Bharati, Syracuse University, and Tom Rhodes, Lycoming College.

Registration for the conference begins at 3:30 p.m. Friday in the Maxwell Hall foyer. There will be a dinner at 6:15 p.m. Friday at Graham Dining Hall on campus and a business session, with Donald Berry presiding, at noon Saturday.

Danforth's hoopsters rode rocky road

By BOB HERZOG

(ed. note--This is a recap of the season as it really was. Below, the poet laureate of the Orangemen shows us how it might have been)

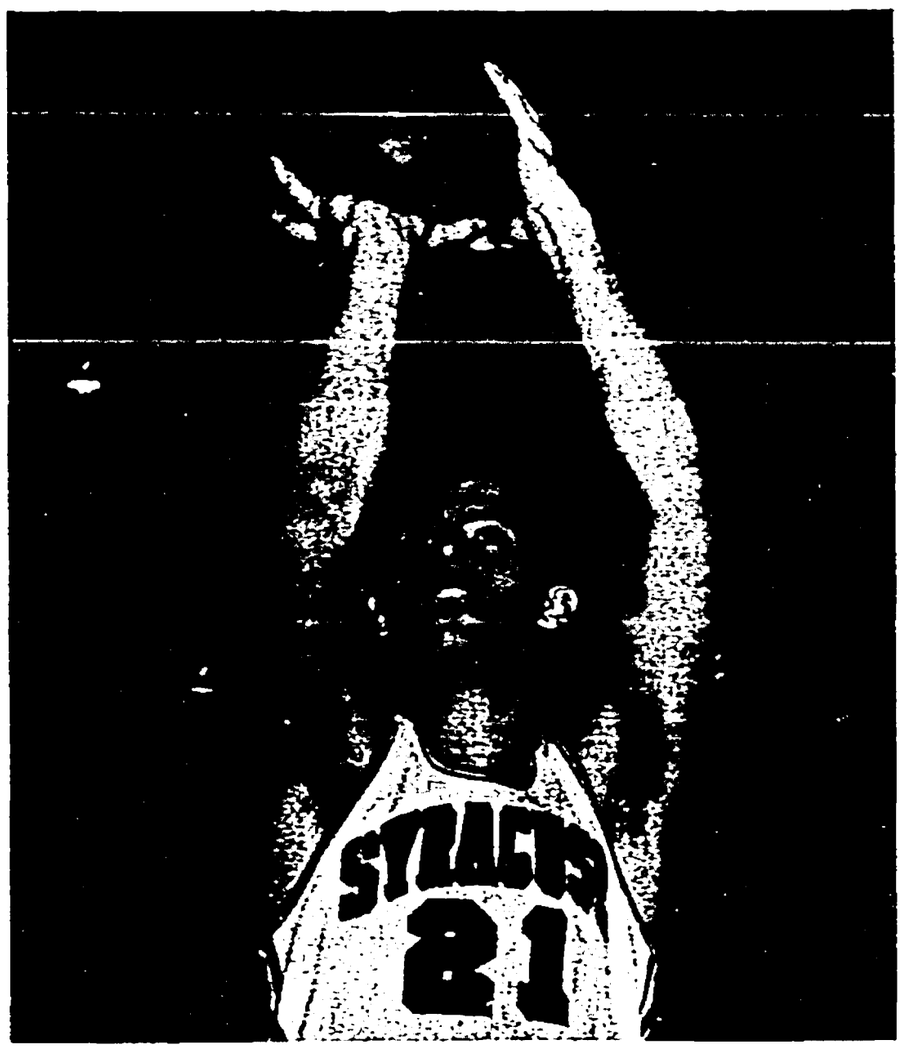
The Syracuse basketball squad finished with a 9-16 record for the 1968-69 campaign. But the won-lost record does not tell the entire season's story.

Coach Roy Danforth, in his first season as varsity mentor, faced many obstacles. Ten of the first eleven games were away, which certainly hurt the Syracuse hoopsters. An overall lack of experience on the squad was a factor in many losses, while Bill Smith, just a sophomore, was in the position of team leader. Gerry McFadden was a transfer student just learning a new system. Bill Finney and Tommy Green were also just sophomores. Juniors Bill Case and John Suder had not been regulars before this year. Senior Bob Kouwe was playing his first full season.

Danforth said, "We simply were an inexperienced club at the start. You can't inherit experience. It comes only with time and by playing." The schedule, inexperience and the fact that Wayne Ward, Bob McDaniel, and Ernie Austin were not available would place a great burden on a veteran coach. So the strain on Danforth was even more extreme.

The Orangemen began the season with five straight losses. A three game winning streak followed, then three straight set backs before defeating Pittsburgh. Then came the low point of the season--a six game losing streak, which included three very tough defeats. After a 86-83 loss to Temple, the Syracuse cagers came alive.

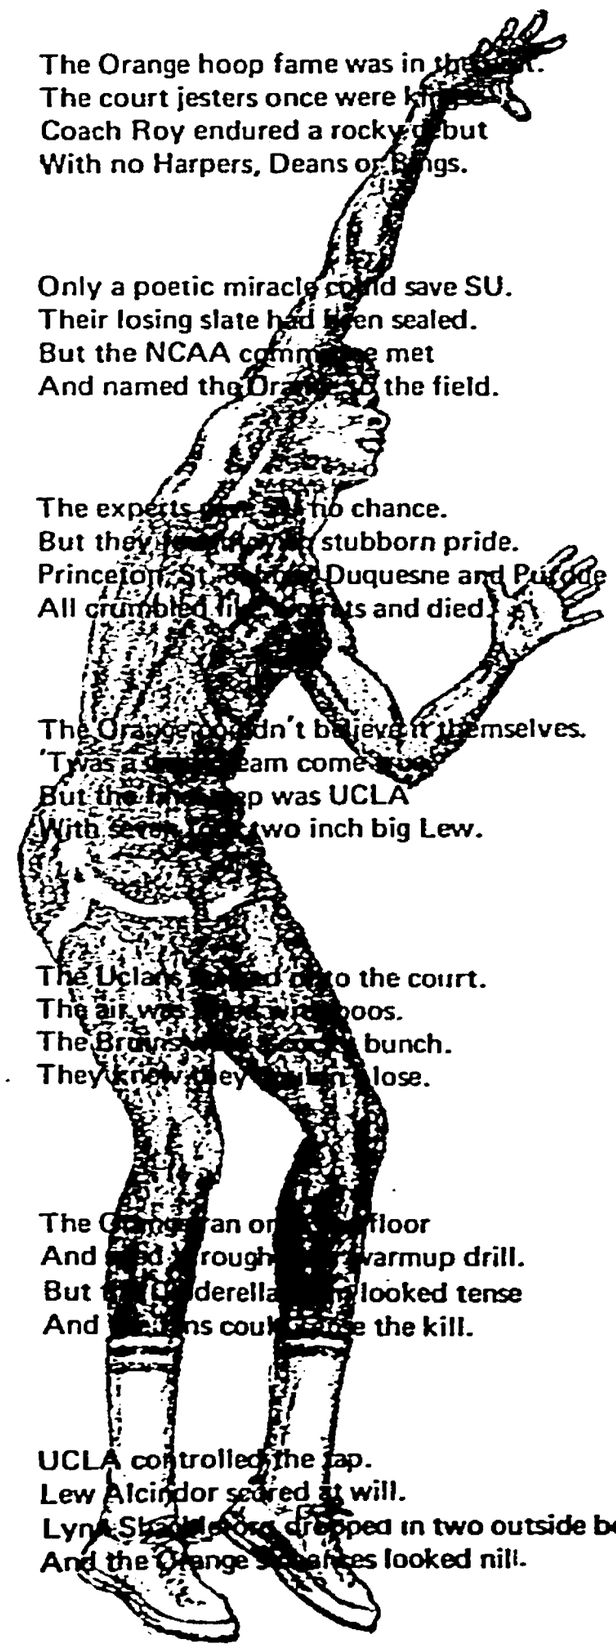
They won five out of the last seven games. One of the losses was to St. John's--a 71-63 dog fight which really shook up Lou Carnesecca's eighth-ranked squad. The other loss was to Calvin Murphy's Niagara, and there's not much anyone can do when the 5'10" court master is hot.



In these last seven games, Bill Smith averaged well over 20 points, and Ernie Austin's return proved to be a contributing factor to the team's success. Austin, while chipping in with 10.7 points a game, became the floor general. His playmaking and ball hawking often led to quick offensive spurts.

Bill Finney, Syracuse's version of Celtic supersub John Havlicek, also got hot. He hit for over 20 twice, and his fine shooting, rebounding and hustling defense were an inspiration to the rest of the squad. Tommy Green, the non-scoring guard, proved his worth with some deft ballhandling and great feeds to the big men.

Looking to next year, Danforth will find his task slightly easier. Bill Smith, Bill Finney and Gerry McFadden gained valuable experience. With Bill Case and Dave Harmon also back, the forward line is solid. Ernie Austin leads the backcourt returnees, along with John Suder and Tommy Green. Some depth at guard might also be provided by frosh Greg Kohls, Paul Piotrowski, and Gil Guerrero.



Another "if" for next year is the possible return of Bob McDaniel. Last year as a freshman, he led the squad in points per game (24.8) and rebounds (258).

The outlook for next year is bright. With only three players being lost to graduation, the Orangemen will not have the problems of inexperience they had this year. The days of Dave Bing and NCAA finals are in the past. But with a solid nucleus of seasoned players back next year, some memories of Orange "Hoop Power" may be stirred.

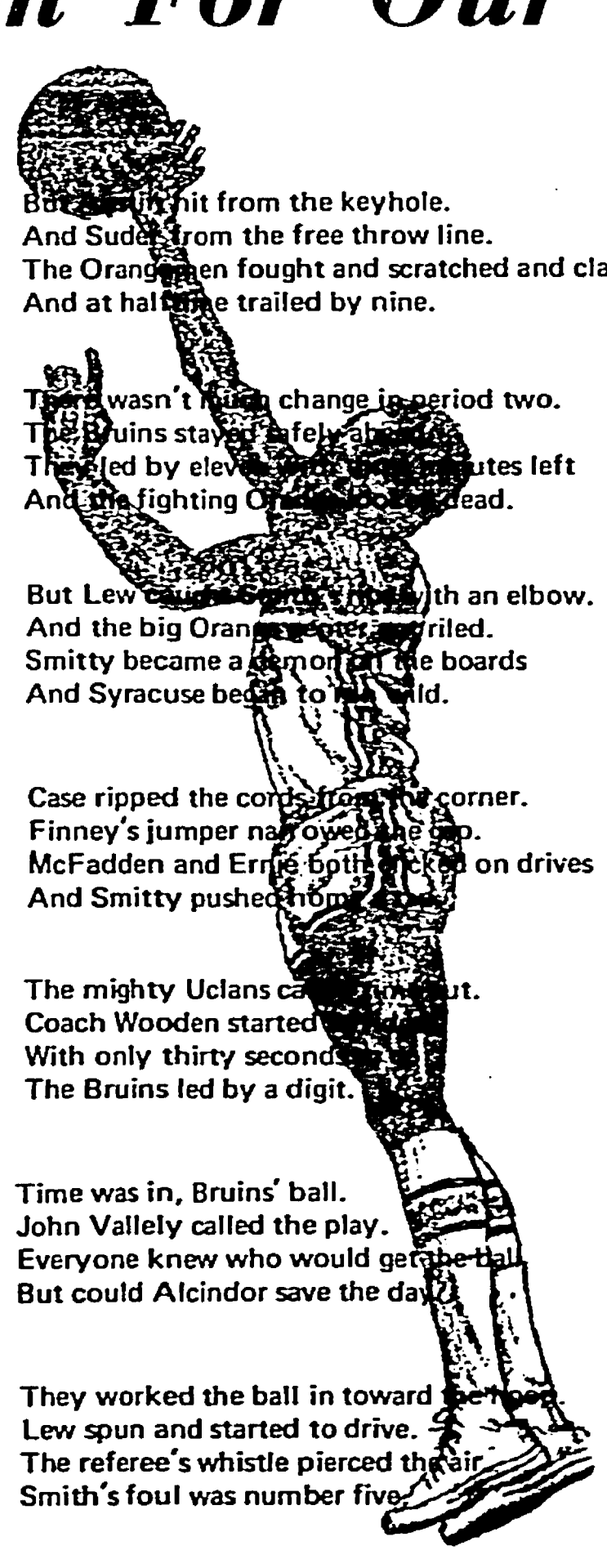
A Dream For Our Team

The Orange hoop fame was in the air.
The court jesters once were kings.
Coach Roy endured a rocky year but
With no Harpers, Deans or Kings.

Only a poetic miracle could save SU.
Their losing slate had been sealed.
But the NCAA committee met
And named the Orange to the field.



The experts gave SU no chance.
But they [illegible] stubborn pride.
Princeton, St. [illegible], Duquesne and Purdue
All crumbled like [illegible] and died.

The Orange couldn't believe it themselves.
'Twas a [illegible] dream come true.
But the final [illegible] was UCLA
With seven foot two inch big Lew.

The Uclans [illegible] to the court.
The air was [illegible] boos.
The Bruins [illegible] bunch.
They knew they [illegible] lose.

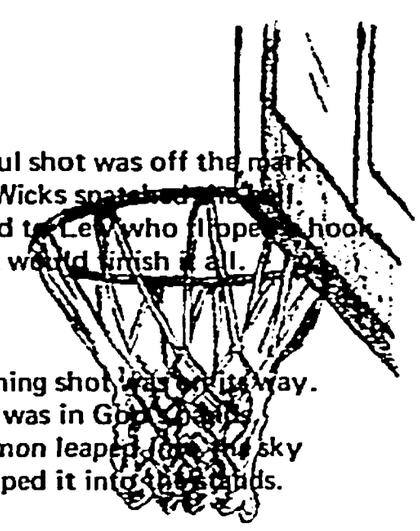
The Orange ran on the floor
And [illegible] through the warmup drill.
But the Cinderella [illegible] looked tense
And the Bruins could sense the kill.

UCLA controlled the tap.
Lew Alcindor soared at will.
Lynn Shackelford dropped in two outside bombs
And the Orange [illegible] looked nill.

But [illegible] hit from the keyhole.
And Suder from the free throw line.
The Orangemen fought and scratched and clawed
And at halftime trailed by nine.

There wasn't much change in period two.
The Bruins stayed safely ahead.
They led by eleven with [illegible] minutes left
And the fighting Orange [illegible] dead.

But Lew caught Sweek's inbounds with an elbow.
And the big Orange center [illegible] riled.
Smitty became a demon on the boards
And Syracuse began to run wild.



Case ripped the cords from the corner.
Finney's jumper narrowed the gap.
McFadden and Ernie both clicked on drives
And Smitty pushed home a [illegible].

The mighty Uclans called time out.
Coach Wooden started to pout.
With only thirty seconds [illegible]
The Bruins led by a digit.

Time was in, Bruins' ball.
John Vallely called the play.
Everyone knew who would get the ball
But could Alcindor save the day?

They worked the ball in toward the hoop.
Lew spun and started to drive.
The referee's whistle pierced the air
Smith's foul was number five.

Into the game Dave Harmon strode.
But hopes dimmed for SU.
'Cause Dave the Rave was six foot four
Ten inches less than Lew.

Lew's foul shot was off the mark.
But Sid Wicks snatched the ball.
He passed to Lew who flipped a hook.
A basket would finish it all.

The winning shot was on its way.
Our fate was in God's hands.
But Harmon leaped from the sky
And slapped it into the stands.

With just eight seconds on the clock
The Bruins would try to stall.
Sweek's inbounds pass went out to Rowe
But Kouwe stole the ball.

The Orangemen had one last chance.
No time to work a play.
They'd have to hustle down the court
And heave a shot and pray.

Kouwe whipped the ball to Harmon.
The time was growing slim.
From thirty feet Dave leaped up high
And lofted a shot toward the rim.

Harm's last ditch jumper beat the clock.
The bleachers shook and roared.
It hit the rim and bounced up high
And caromed off the board.

The pill spun 'round the iron's edge
And still hung up there yet.
Now dear readers you can decide,
Did it fall away, or drop through the net?

Chancellor selected?

Students question trustees' authority

By KAREN WIEDIGER

Dr. John E. Corbally, Ohio State University's vice-president for academic affairs and provost, appears to be the front runner for the position of SU's chancellor.

Three members of SU's board of trustees went to Columbus, Ohio, last winter to discuss the post with Corbally, after a joint meeting of student, faculty and trustee committees. At the meeting, Corbally received a majority of the vote cast, making him the committees' first choice.

Members of the student committee, however, voiced their dissent with the process under which Corbally was chosen. A spokesman for the committee said, 'Since October we have had an agreement and have been under the assumption that the committees had an equal voice in selection of the chancellor."

Each committee had the option to submit a dissenting opinion after the final vote and the students claim Corbally is unacceptable to them because of the process by which he was selected.

"In effect the selection was railroaded through the committees," said a student committee member, "we were told no group would have veto power over the others, but that is basically what occured."

The student continued, "We realize the legal authority for the selection of a chancellor lies with the Board of Trustees but we assumed the members would ratify a majority decision."

Before the meeting Thursday, a vote had been taken in which Corbally received the second highest number of votes, but the first man in that decision was "not acceptable to the trustee committee," according to the students.

Students also expressed discontent because no member of their committee accompanied the trustees when they recently spoke with Corbally. A member of the faculty committee discounted this, and said, "When I left them after the meeting Thursday, I was under the impression a student and a faculty member would go with the trustees to Ohio.

When Corbally was contacted last night, he said, "It is always disappointing to hear you're not the first choice, but there are so many possibilities around. It is very difficult for people to get to know each other in an interview situation.

"The true test of any person is how he works out in the position."

A former student at Ohio State University who is now working for a Columbus newspaper said, "Corbally is probably the fairest person in the administration. When I was on the staff of the student paper there, we knew we could always get a fair deal from him"

She continued, "He seems to get along well with students, knows what is going on, and appears more concerned about students than most of the people in the administration."

Although Corbally has already been formally contacted by SU, the process of chancellor selection is not formally over.

According to SU's bylaws, a full board of trustees meeting must be conducted to elect a new chancellor. No date has been set for the meeting.

Class boycott strikes Architecture School

By FRED TUCCILLO
News Editor

Students of Syracuse University's School of Architecture began a boycott of all architecture classes yesterday as part of an orderly effort to achieve evaluation and improvement of the School's internal structure.

A two-hour, closed meeting of students, faculty members and administrators in the fourth-floor rotunda of Slocum Hall yesterday afternoon ended with the release of a joint statement:

"Representatives of the administration and faculty of Syracuse University met today with students of the School of Architecture and discussed mutual problems."

Administrators attending the session included Jim G. Carleton, dean of student services; Frederick J. Kramer, dean of the College of Liberal Arts, and D. Kenneth Sargent, dean of the School of Architecture.

Seeking to maintain the atmosphere of cooperation apparently created at the meeting as a basis for continuing discussions, students and administrators agreed that no further statements would be released until some definite decisions had been reached.

Though all parties concerned are abiding by the "no further comment" agreement, the Daily Orange has learned that the problems being discussed revolve around the broad question of the quality of education offered to the School's 205 architecture students.

The question was answered in part by a thorough re-evaluation of the structure of the School, during which students rated professors and instructors by responding to a survey, and offered criticisms and suggestions.

The results of this faculty survey are currently posted on the fourth floor of Slocum Hall.

The current boycott is apparently intended to bring together all those involved in the School's problems. As meetings continued Monday night, the primary concern of architecture students appeared to be keeping the improvement of their School entirely an internal matter, achieved through constructive action by all parties involved.

UJB splits over 'grass' decision

By LARRY KRAMER
Campus Affairs Editor

The University Judicial Board (UJB), in a February 26 majority decision, declared an SU student guilty of "conduct unbecoming a student" and sentenced him to suspension for three semesters. The sentence was subsequently suspended.

In the same deliberations, the UJB ruled "not guilty" on the charges of "violation of state law," and "possession of marijuana."

In writing the majority opinion, Chief Justice Paul Snyder questioned whether or not the UJB, in fact, had the right to try the defendant. Snyder described conflicting statues in the judicial code that made the decision to try the student a difficult one. The decision to go ahead with the trial was finally made because the student was already on Disciplinary Probation.

Further controversy was raised during the deliberations of the charge "conduct unbecoming a student." Snyder, in the written opinion, attacked this particular charge, calling it "vague, ambiguous, unclear, abstract, abstruce, general and imprecise.'

Snyder also questioned whether or not "possession of marijuana" was "conduct unbecoming a student." He wrote, "Until the UJB receives scientific proof that marijuana is a dangerous drug, it cannot decide that marijuana is a dangerous drug. Are community relations more important than the medical effects of the drug?'

The decision to declare the student guilty of "conduct unbecoming a student" was made "because he was on disciplinary probation, and should have possessed better judgment than to allow himself to be in a situation which might jeopardize his status as a student."

Running?

Candidates for class and Student Government executive offices must submit petitions to Elections Commissions Chairman Dick Barton at 801 University Ave. by 5 p.m. on Wed., March 12. Petitions must include name, office sought, phone extensions and grade point average of the candidate. All qualified candidates will be accepted.

Petitions for senator-at-large candidates must be submitted to Barton by 5 p.m. on March 18.

Senators debate SCOPE's ideas

By VIC LIVINGSTON

Recommendations for campus political reform outlined by the Senate Committee on Political Equity (SCOPE) in its report to Student Senate a week ago, will be formally proposed at tonight's session.

If passed by Senate, the measures would become part of the new student government constitution which will be submitted to a campus-wide vote in April.

SCOPE, a sub-committee of the Government Structures Committee of Senate formed five months ago to investigate political abuses and recommend reforms, will propose two amendments which were defeated by the Government Structures Committee:

–"The Senate shall establish a uniform equitable, and democratic procedure for the nomination of all candidates of campus political parties."

——"The Senate shall establish a procedure for central public registration in campus political parties."

Both amendments are aimed at establishing general principles for which the Senate would later set down the specifics. The changes would take effect in time for the 1970 campus elections.

The first amendment is aimed at the eventual elimination of allegedly "unrepresentative" nominating procedures and the establishment of the "one-man, one-vote" principle within all campus political parties.

The second amendment is aimed at discouraging "forced" and/or "disinterested" joining of parties "en masse" by fraternity or sorority houses or other living centers and encouraging individual choice in the political system.

No sour grapes

In several weeks, SU will have a new chancellor. He will be a man closely scrutinized by students, faculty and trustees, and he will be chosen from over 200 candidates. Should Mr. Corbally be chosen that way, he will come enjoying high regard by each committee involved in the selection. He was accepted as one of three final choices by each of the committees.

As reported on our news pages today, there is dissention. The students have suggested that they were overridden in the final decision, presumably in the bid to Corbally. They have objected to the procedure used by the trustees and claim that their voice was not heeded.

It is an established fact that the rapport that had been maintained by the entire committee fell apart last week as the final voting approached. A spokesman among the trustees indicated that the fact that final approval would have to come from his fellow trustees had been stressed to the students continually, but on the other hand, the students still claim to have been disfranchised.

While the Daily Orange suggests that the student discontent may have origins that are at least understandable, our perspective suggests that the students have been more influential than they are ready to believe.

It is most important and significant that students were as closely involved in the chancellor's selection as they were here. They had the opportunity to give consideration to some of the greatest names in American education. To have had these students in that position, even in relation to the final decision, is an important foundation for the first steps that the new chancellor will take.

The Daily Orange cautions that students' discontent may exceed the limits of acceptability. Whoever the new man will be, he will of course be anxious to work his way into the mainstream of student thought. It will not be necessary to hold the sword of lack of student unaminity on his selection over his head. His position on the final list of candidates is testimony to the regard given him by students.

The final decision of the trustees will be irreversible, and the Daily Orange hopes that when the official announcement comes, the reaction will not be indignation, but recognition of the great potential for peaceful and meaningful change and adaptation that will exist with a new administration. New ideas, a different point of view and new personnel are the important combination that we will be working with. Let's not mar the atmosphere with sour grapes.

Beyond the fast

The struggle of Biafra

By Andy Rosenblatt

Repulsed by the continuous flow of photographs depecting mass starvation, hundreds of Syracuse University students recently sacrificed their meals as part of a fast, organized to aid the Nigeria-Biafra Relief Mission. To feed a hungry people is certainly a most commendable endeavor whether those efforts are directed to Africa or the sovereign State of South Carolina. But what is really known of the Biafran struggle for independence? Unfortunately the death rattle of the Biafran people is being drowned out by the crackling of gunfire in Vietnam and the sizzling fuse on the Middle East powderkeg. Yet the story of the gallant Biafran freedom fighters must be told, despite the inevitability of their defeat.

Everything goes back to the reality that Nigeria is not a nation, never has been a nation and lacks even the makings of one. The boundaries of Nigeria, as of most African countries, were lines drawn upon incomplete maps, about eighty years ago by gentelmen in the foreign offices of London, Paris, and Berlin. They bore absolutely no relation to the homelands of the races, the migration of the tribes, the terrain of the region, or the events of history.

Since Nigerian independence in 1959, the Southern region has suffered an internal colonialism imposed by the ruling Northerners and the 1966 massacres of the Ibo tribesmen know no equal in either Rhodesia or South Africa. The Biafrans are portrayed as rebels, and rebels--contends the Nigerian Government, with the tacit approval of Britain--must be crushed. Memories being short, few pause to inquire who it is the Biafrans are rebelling against. The legitimate government of the fedreation of Nigeria, we are led to assume. But Nigeria's present rulers are about as legal as Bonnie and Clyde. General Gowon, the present head of the federal forces, seized power by a military coup from his predecessor, another general, who in turn came to power with the assasination of the former prime minister, who was legal. Thus, you have two steps back to reach legality. The rebel Biafrans rebelled against a government of rebels who had taken over from previous rebels.

Is there any solution short of the total military destruction of Biafra? It appears that there is little likelihood the Biafrans would surrender short of that. The scope of the tragedy is saddening. It does not take a seasoned observer to realize that no peaceful settlement is forthcoming from the combatants themselves. Nor can the other African states under the guise of the Organization of African Unity be expected to reach an equitable solution. After all, if the secession of Biafra were to be successful, other African states would be fair game for similar disruptions. There seems no valid reason why Biafra should not have been allowed its freedom from Lagos, just as Lagos was allowed its freedom from London. The Biafrans will fight until they can fight no longer while the United Nations and Britain, together with the United States and most other nations, burrow deeper into the sand and continue to suppose that sweet reason and brotherhood will descend upon the battlefield.

Letters to the editor

Trash

To the Editor:

Recently the city dump petitioned to dump trash on the quad. Rumor has it that they were refused a permit. One unofficial source said that permits are only issued on Saturdays.

It was learned recently that the art object outside HBC was once a biological experiment that no one wants to take credit for. Somehow, for reasons unknown, the creature escaped from the bio-lab and inadvertently fell into a vat of cement. Then due to a series of coincidences, officials, not wishing to offend the non-existent sculptor of this "masterpiece," mounted it on a pedestal. Something was first discovered to be amiss when students noticed that the object kept falling off its stand. University officials commented that it was the biology dept's problem, not theirs.

The problem was finally resolved. The art department agreed to consult an art expert, while the biology department (in coordination with the geology dept.) agreed to take a core sample for a biopsy.

Can it be, the modern artist no longer looks to the people for approval, but rather laughs and tells antagonists they don't know how to appreciate art? It seems that people are too eager to praise art for what it is not. Is there really a compelling drive to enshrine props from some horror movie on this campus?

True, art is a matter of taste, somewhat like food. There is always "someone" in the crowd that thinks the plate he is eating off tastes better than the food that's on it. True or false?

UJB praises

To the Editor:

The University Judicial Board commends the graduating staff of the Daily Orange, particularly Charles Babcock and Evan Richert, for the high quality of the coverage we received during the past year. We appreciate not only the hard work but also the careful thought and dedication of the staff. Such excellence should not be without the recognition it deserves.

The Daily Orange has performed an essential function in the student judicial process by keeping the campus informed of UJB decisions, and by publicizing students' rights to a fair hearing. Without the cooperation of the Daily Orange the UJB would have had no direct communications link with the campus.

Tuition

To the Editor:

As tuition costs rise higher and higher, and as the Financial Aids Committee becomes less and less able to meet the needs of the lower and middle class student, Syracuse University moves further and further from its role as a community of scholars, and closer and closer towards becoming a private upperclass club.

'It's Spring' means it's time for student elections

Spring has come here once again
We close our books and drop our pen.
The sun shines bright on fair Salt City,
And inspires a poet to write a ditty.

Election Day is not far off
What's that I hear, is that a cough?
A dirty look, a nasty sneer, (and you ask)
What will be different from last year?

The parties were lost in hibernation.
For six months steeped in deliberation.
Of who the voters will get to choose,
Of who will win and who will lose.

Where were they when we needed them most?
Of what accomplishments can they boast?
Give me the facts, give me the reasons,
Why were they missing through two of the seasons?

Through fall and winter they played like dead,
While students suffered and stayed unled.
Chuck Hicks tried hard to follow through
But just how much can one man do.

And so now they approach us once again,
Asking for support.
Join C.A.P. or G.I.A., its all the same.
Similar groups with a different name.

We'll get to see the three piece suits,
Miniskirts and knee-high boots.
These appearances are most deceiving,
And you must not be led into believing.

Good government and student responsibility,
Office holding to be based on ability.
Not on alliances of Independents and Greeks.
This is what could happen in a few short weeks.

But the battle lines are clearly drawn,
And allegiances are duly sworn.
And so the results don't give you a scare,
Use all your power, vote if you dare.

And though by yourself you can't stem the tide,
Gather your fellows from every side.
Show the parties that their treatment was shabby.
They can't win elections by just being gabby.

Repudiate the whole bunch,
I gave you the reasons.
And you might have a hunch,
As to the man for all seasons-

Drug decision . . .

The charge of "violation of state law" was dropped because, according to Snyder, "The UJB is not competent, qualified, or informed to decide this charge. Therefore, the UJB refuses to rule or decide on the guilt of the defendant with respect to this charge."

The third charge, "possession of marijuana" was defined as meaning: "knowing ownership and/or knowing control over the substance. Intent is not included in this definition." Snyder continued, "Because the student neither owned nor handled the marijuana, he was not guilty of the charge, by a vote of 4-2, with 2 abstentions."

The latter charge was cause for a "dissenting opinion" paper, by Justice Steve Huttler to be attached to the report. In the paper, Huttler, supported by another justice, Arthur Koch, wrote, "The circumstances, however, clearly show (the defendant) to be guilty of the charge according to this or any other sensible definition."

Huttler sharply criticized the UJB definition of the charge. "The court construes the circumstances to find (the defendant) innocent of violation according to this definition. (The defendant), upon entering the car, was asked if he would like to 'go smoke some pot' by his friend. To this offer he replied, 'sure.' They then proceeded to Thornden Park, chose a comfortable spot, sat down, and (the defendant's) friend filled his pipe with what was identified as marijuana. It was at this point that the police apprehended them

"It is my belief that (the defendant) possessed the marijuana the moment in time when his friend offered to give him some and he accepted. Instead of this, the court relies on the fact that he never held, touched or smoked any of the marijuana. It relies on the fact that at any moment an earthquake might have occurred, and (the defendant) would never have been able to smoke any of the marijuana.

"But this is not the case. No earthquake occurred. No tornado came to blow the grass away. Had the police come two minutes later, (the defendant) would definitely have had smoked the marijuana. This he admits unequivocably."

Committee for Biafran relief states position, future plans

By PAUL WILLISTEIN JR.

In a position statement adopted at its Sunday meeting, the Nigeria/Biafra Relief Committee urged the government to "make a concerted effort to end starvation in Biafra and Nigeria."

To end starvation, the committee asks that the US "insure that food and medical supplies are made immediately available to Biafrans and Nigerians," and "use its influence to bring about a cease fire and persuade the responsible parties to stop the arms flow on both sides."

The Relief Committee had previously maintained a non-political stance due to the widely divergent opinions of its members on the question of Biafran politics. But it was noted that the committee, since it has helped provide food, was "already involved politically."

Much of Sunday's debate concerned the wording of the position statement. The final statement is essentially the same as a petition to President Nixon which the group has been circulating.

It was also reported that, in response to an ad in the Syracuse Herald-Journal, over $1300 has been collected. Most of the money will be forwarded to organizations currently bringing food and medical supplies to the war-torn area.

Current campus money-raising projects include a dance March 21 at Shaw Dining Hall.

Immediate community plans include discussions and fund-raising drives. A panel discussion will be held at 11 a.m., March 25, at Onondaga Community College. Martin Omosule, a Nigerian citizen and Bob Rhodes, an ex-Peace Corps volunteer, will speak, along with a representative of Biafra.

Another discussion, on March 23 at Andrews Memorial Methodist Church, will serve as the kickoff to a new fund-raising drive. The program will begin at 9:30 a.m.

ENGINEERS

A representative from the Jervis B. Webb Company will be on Campus —

March 17, 1969

Graduating Students — Opportunities are excellent for those who desire a career in the Material Handling Industry and are interested in diversification of training in all product areas - from designing to wherever your abilities carry you in this exciting industry.

An equal opportunity Employer.

and
SCIENTISTS

The New Jersey Zinc Company, pioneer of the zinc industry in the United States and now a highly diversified organization, offers the graduate engineer and scientist challenging and rewarding opportunities to participate in, improve and expand its widespread activities.

As an engineer in the Mining Department, you will be involved in the practical application of many of the engineering skills you have studied. You may be specifically concerned with and participate in mine production, minerals beneficiation, electrical, mechanical, or civil engineering in maintaining, operating and expanding our mines located throughout the country in New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Virginia, Tennessee, Colorado, New Mexico and Wisconsin. The Company and all operations are guided by technically trained staffs, such as yourself, where manpower, equipment and materials must be applied to gain maximum production with safety at lowest cost.

As a member of our Manufacturing Department, you will engage in activities concerned with the metallurgical extraction of zinc, lead, cadmium, and spiegeleisen from our mined concentrates, the production of zinc alloys, powders and oxides, the rolling of zinc, the manufacture of anhydrous ammonia, carbon dioxide, sulfuric acid, diammonium phosphate, and titanium dioxide. Our manufacturing plants are in Palmerton, Pennsylvania; Depue, Illinois; and Gloucester City, New Jersey. Many opportunities exist for metallurgical, chemical, mechanical, electrical and civil engineering, design and construction.

In our Research Department at Palmerton, Pa., you will be associating with some of the top research and development men in the country. You will be assigned to one of the six basic divisions: Chemical Research, Metallurgical Research, Minerals Research, New Product Research, Chemical and Metallurgical Development and Products Application. You will have opportunities to engage in research and development in such major areas as geophysical exploration for ore, mineral processing, chemical and metallurgical processing, applications studies for our existing products and diversification into new products.

Joining New Jersey Zinc means joining a strong, well-established organization built and building for long-term operation. It means joining a corporation which is big enough for you to accomplish big things—and to advance progressively—yet of a comfortable size for you to become a well-known person in your own right at any level of the Company.

There are many interesting things happening at NJZ—things which offer challenging, rewarding careers. We would like to talk to you about them and about NJZ's role in your future.

Alums in award contest

Two distinguished graduates of Syracuse University are participating in the 1969 National Book Awards--Joyce Carol Oates, author of "Expensive People," a nominee for the fiction award. amd Jerre Mangione, a judge in the same category.

The best-selling novel, "Expensive People," is one of five books nominated for the $1,000 fiction award. Prizes will be presented March 12 at Lincoln Center, New York, for seven books in various categories judged to be the most distinguished books published in 1968.

Miss Oates was 1960 valedictorian, Phi Beta Kappa, and graduated summa cum laude at Syracuse. She is now associate professor of English at the University of Windsor, Canada. Her books and short stories have won many awards. Last year, her novel, "A Garden of Earthly Delights," was also a nominee for the National Book Award. Last December she won one of the 1968 Mademoiselle Magazine Awards. She was a Guggenheim Fellow for 1967-68, a Knapp Fellow at the University of Wisconsin in 1960-61, and her stories have been anthologized in the "O. Henry Awards" in 1963, 1964, 1965, 1967 and in "Fifty Best American Stories, 1915-1965." She also has been published in "Atlantic Monthly," "Esquire," and "Carleton Miscellany."

Jerre Mangione, who worked his way through Syracuse during the Depression and graduated in 1931, is one of three judges for the fiction award. He is the author of several best-sellers, and his most recent book, published in 1968, "A Passion for Sicilians: The World Around Danilo Dolci," has been reviewed as "beautifully written, utterly absorbing and permeated with the very spirit of Sicily."

CBS veep speaks today

Irwin Segelstein, vice president of programs for the CBS Television Network, will address SU graduate students in radio and television today. Segelstein's appearance is part of the television and radio department's visiting professor series.

Segelstein supervises East Coast nighttime programing and also is in charge of daytime programs, specials and entertainment programs produced abroad for broadcast on CBS. He joined CBS from Benton & Bowles advertising agency, where he had been vice president in charge of programing.

He first went to the agency in 1947 as a member of the radio department. He later became director of film planning, director of television programs, director of programing and then vice president.

The sessions are closed to the public.

SCOPE debate . . .

Senate leaders are split on the issues and a floor fight is expected between the opposing factions.

Lance Wisniewski, chief Senate spokesman for SCOPE, feels that the amendments will greatly curb what he terms corruption and coercion within political parties, abuses he claims exist within the present structure.

"The structure of the Greek house is such that a Greek delegate has more power in relation to concerned people than an independent. With central registration, there is a greater chance that pledges will not be influenced or compelled to join one party over another. When people register at a central location, the chances are greatly increased that the people will think for themselves," Wisniewski said. "Also, many independents have chosen to become excluded because they viewed the irrelevance of student government due to corruption and vandalism" he added.

Wisniewski sees no valid reason for Greek opposition to SCOPE's amendments. "These are the people we don't want to be stifled by the compelling pressures of the fraternal system. There are many good people in the Greek system, and they should not be stifled," he said.

Opposed to SCOPES' proposals is John Ross, Chairman of the Government Structures Committee. Ross believes that both nomination and registration procedures are internal party matters, and should not be subject to legislation. "We of the committee thought that if individuals at a caucus desire to give someone else the privilege of voting for them, that is their right."

Ross said a strong elections commission has the power to eliminate corruption, and has done so in the past by fining parties guilty of infractions.

Conflicting testimony

Jury hands down guilty verdict in case of disorderly conduct at Nixon speech

By MITCH LANE

Following a trial fraught with controversy and contradictions, two Peace and Freedom Party organizers, Larry Alexander and Bruce Augustyniak, were convicted yesterday afternoon in City Criminal Court of disorderly conduct and resisting arrest at a Nixon campaign rally here last October.

Prosecution witnesses were unable to agree whether Augustyniak assualted a policeman, whether the pair were actually placed under arrest at the scene of the disorder and whether the Nixon rally was a public or private gathering.

Witnesses for the defense stood fast claiming that there was no obscenity, no resisting arrest, and no pushing or shoving as claimed by the police.

In addition, reports of obscenity introduced in the trial by police were not listed in the originial affidavits. Defense lawyer, Richard Mosher, raised the disturbing conclusion that the obscenity was "thought up afterwards."

In spite of conflicting testimony from several individuals, some of whom were not involved in the demonstration nor in radical political parties, the testimony of the police was held more credible by the jury when the delivered the guilty verdict.

The testimony conflicted to the point where witnesses for prosecution and defense were unable to ascertain the location of one Sgt. Riley, member of the Syracuse Police Department known well to demonstrators and police alike. Defense claimed that Riley was at the Montgomery Street side of the War Memorial where the incident occurred. They claimed that Sgt. Riley identified the leaders and had them arrested for demonstrating. The police claim that on the night in question Riley was on the State Street side and had nothing to do with the arrests, even though Riley was the police officer acting as the liason between police and Peace and Freedom Party members.

To the apparent satisfaction of the jury, prosecution disposed of the conflicting testimony of defense stating that "Riley wasn't in two places at once." He further shattered the credibility of defense testimony by saying, "Unbelievable testimony is the equivalent of no testimony at all."

Defense attorney Mosher stated that the actions of the police on the night in question were a "fascistic enterprise" and went on to say that hate and bias "pervades the police department."

While charging the jury to begin deliberations, presiding Judge Rocco Regitano reminded them to take into account the credibility of the witness and told them of their right to disregard any testimony they thought untrue.

When the jury returned, after deliberating for one and a half hours, and awarded the guilty verdict, confusion swept the courtroom as counsels for the prosecution and the defense consoled the defendants.

The feelings of observers, upon hearing the verdict, ranged from outrage to poignant sobbing. Judge Regitano discharged the jury with the Court's thanks and added, "It has been very pleasant having you."

Sentencing was delayed until March 19. The two defendants are currently out on bail and plan to appeal.

Give blood

The Red Cross Bloodmobile will be at Shaw Dormitory Wednesday and Thursday, March 12 and 13, and will be accepting blood donations from 10 a.m. to 3:45 p.m. Donors must be between the ages of 18 and 60 years and weigh at least 110 pounds. Those between 18 and 21 no longer need written parental permission to give blood.

Foreign students share customs in song, dance

By ANDRIJ BILYK

The Sing-Kil or bamboo ritual dance may be performed only by the royal princess before her wedding day, according to Philipino Elizabeth Reyes, whose bare nimble feet dared to step between clashing bamboo poles at Grant Auditorium during Saturday's International Talent Night.

"The legend says the princess dances for seven days and seven nights to demonstrate her endurance--worthiness as a wife," Miss Reyes said.

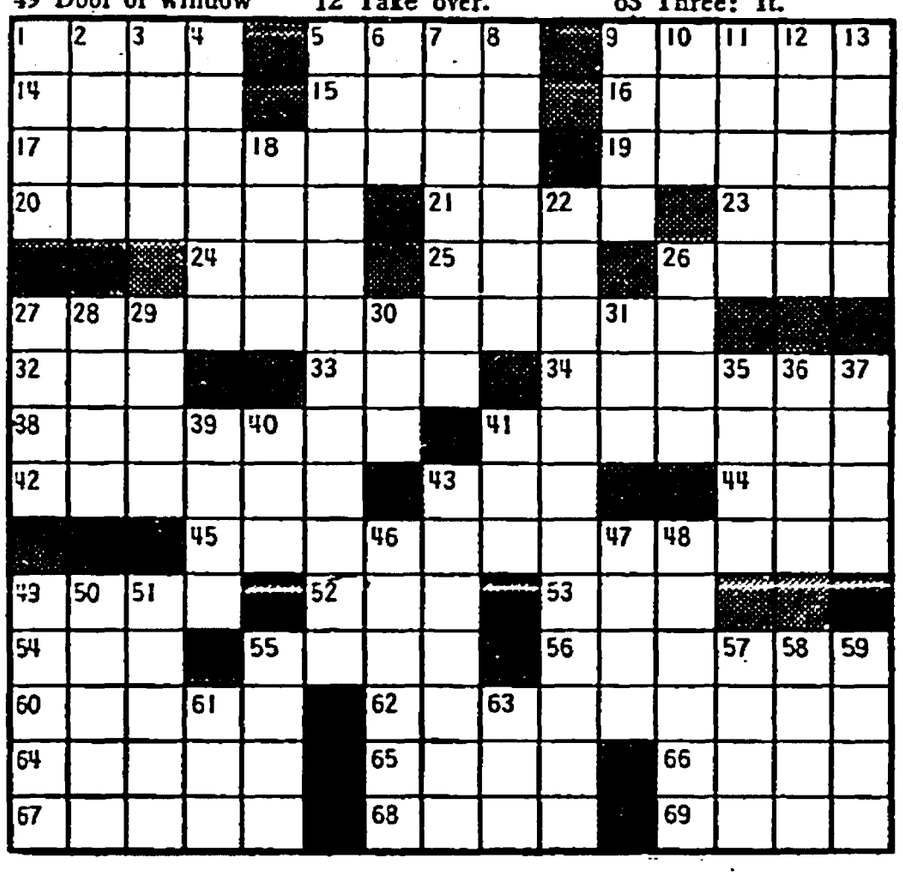
The Ukrainian Cossack dance (Kozachok) won the loudest applause from crowd. Myron Blahy, who once performed in Carnegie Hall, thrilled the audience when, while kicking out sideways from a squat position, he began clapping his hands after touching the floor behind him.

The Ukrainian girls, not to be outdone, pulled their show-off partners back by the ears and dancing, first to the right then to the left, made their way to the front of the stage. Then stomping Zorba-the-Greek style they bowed smiling to the public, using their arms in embracing gestures to imitate the gathering of wheat.

The Japanese Judo exhibition at times portrayed a sadist at work. Every time the smaller participant hit the mat (which was always) he hit it harder and stayed down longer.

And then there were the three students from India, Pakistan and Burma who played various skits such as showing how people from various countries greet each other (N.Y. subway friends passing each other, saying hello, but eyes never moving from the Times) and attempting to charm a snake which always appeared from the wrong direction to bite the charmer.

The African Ibo dance was done with the help of Afro-Americans. It consisted of a series of rhythmic movements to the tune of drums and a clanking bell.



"Let's go to Russia," said Serge Mihailitchenko and with the aid of two accordians, a guitar and a balalaika, off we went. The Russian chorus sang while individual members took turns at folk dancing.

All together, there were 27 acts of 14 countries. To Gail vonHahmann and Cynthia Velasquez go the credits for organizing a cultural program which gave foreign students a chance to share their songs and dances with an American public.

Foreign fashion feature: a study in contrasts

By MARGARET ALLAN

The flavor of international fashions was captured in Day Hall Sunday afternoon as a Nigerian gentleman swathed in yards of a king's embroidered regalia accompanied southern Uganda's female model in a floor-length dress made from "six or seven yards" of cloth secured with scarves.

Models from other countries, notably the Sudan and India, showed wrapped garments, many of which appeared as skirts that reached up over the left shoulder. Some of the models found extra folds of material to be used as a hood or towel.

Thailand showed a couple of gold-trimmed formal dresses. One was a black, two-piece ensemble with a gold braid running diagonally to the left of the mandarin-collared long-sleeved blouse. The other was silk, with a separate fold of matching material draping over the shoulder and trailing down the floor-length back.

Carrying small pearl purses, Japanese women modeled the traditional kimona, while Chinese models favored the close- fitting embroidered silk "chong song," or long dress.

Norway was represented through costume by a model in a floor-length black wool skirt with banded hem and a handmade white embroidered blouse topped by a laced brocade vest outlined in black.

Gold and black grillwork covered the knee-length red sheath of the model posing as an Egyptian peasant, as a black veil enshrouded the modern silver-blue dress of the Iraquian model. A black Palestinian dress was yoked with gold thread and beads, and the matching hat was decorated with threaded gold coins.

The Philippines showed a long, low-cut jumper of light green satin with gold sequins. The simple blouse and wrap worn with the outfit, which was reminiscent of the Apanish Period of the 1800's, were elegant in their simplicity. Also shown was a formal with butterfly sleeves, fitted bodice and a long flare that originated at the back waist. More modern Philippine attire included a white and pink satin, modified floor-length tent dress with butterfly sleeves. Another model showed a similar street- length dress, while her escort wore a tab-buttoned, sheer, embroidered shirt.

Beating the system was a Moroccan model who, except for two small eye slots, was covered with white muslin trimmed with quilted bands of the same color and topped with a small crownpiece. Underneath she revealed a typical Western streetdress which can be worn at home.

Mrs. Vera Eksarchow, a graduate student in Slavic languages was responsible for the ornate attire of the models of Russian nobility. The jewelled dresses were full-length with elaborate headpieces. The attire of Russian peasant girls was modeled by students in full-length, scoop-necked, flowered jumpers over simple cotton blouses. Other models showed that the Russian love of embroidery still influences contemporary fashions.

Those tending the ukranian display at the fair in the north lobby wore white blouses and shirts that were delicately embroidered with bright threads.

Relaxed swimmers romp in NY meet

By FRED KRAVER

One tends to wonder why Colgate did not participate Upper New York State Swimming Championships held Friday and Saturday at Archbold pool. Is it possible that they foresaw a trouncing at the hands of the Syracuse mermen?

The final outcome reveals that it was just as well, for Colgate's sake, that they stayed home. SU amassed 469 points, as the closest competitor, St. Bonaventure, finished with 246. Behind the Bonnies was the University of Rochester (199.5), R.P.I. (140.5), Union (115), R.I.T. (100), Ithaca (77), Niagara (62), and Buffalo (8-that's right, eight points).

Coach Jon Buzzard was not overly ecstatic about the one-sided victory. "We looked very good becuase we had no competition," he claimed. Ironically, Colgate was the team to beat. However, Buzzard was quick to point out that he was pleased with his team's performance. "We weren't at all psyched up for the meet, but despite that, we performed extremely well."

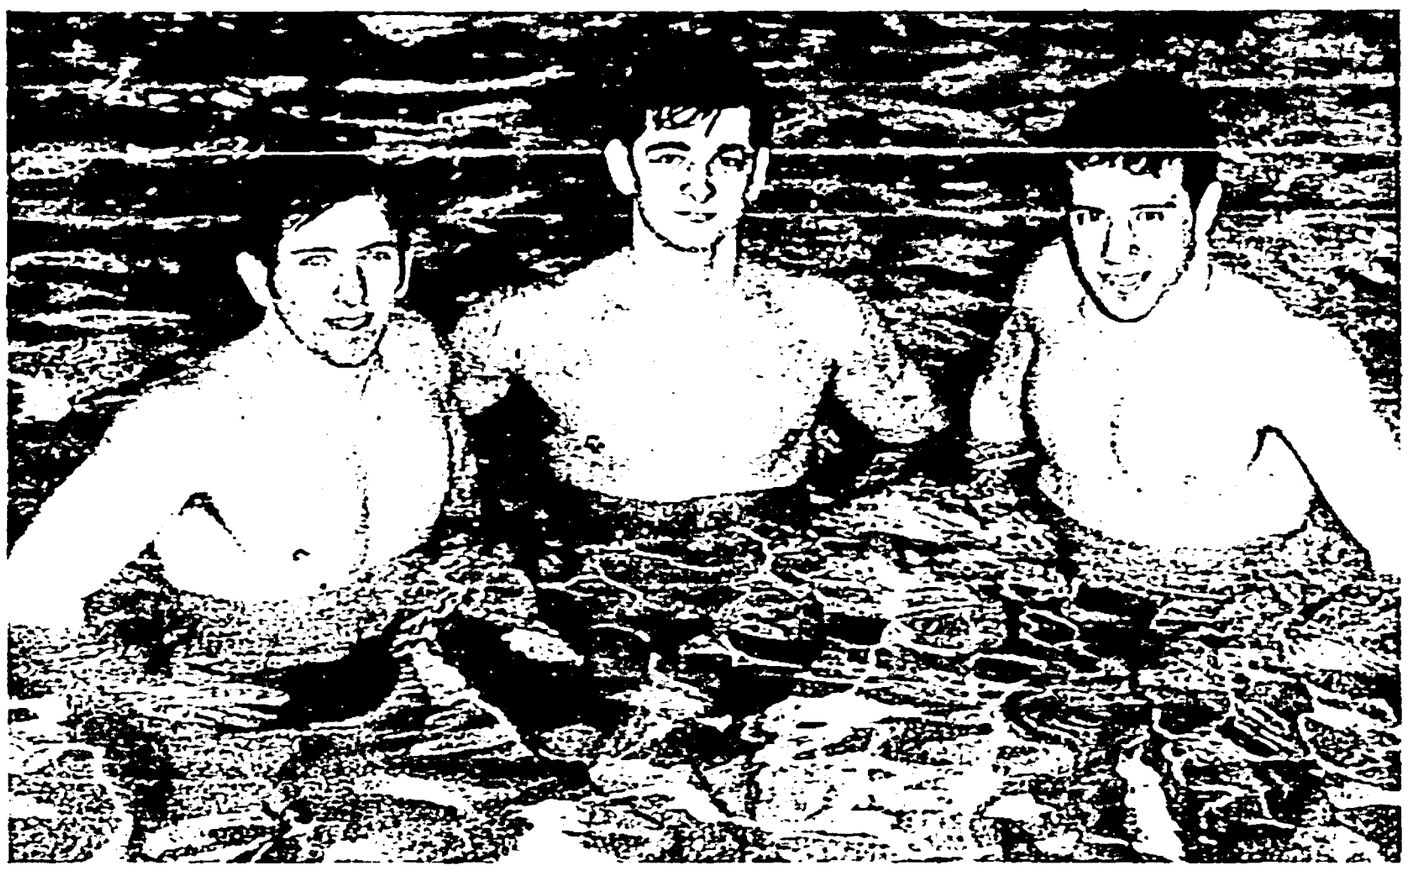
By far, the outstanding performance of the evening was put in by freshman Brian Krause. Krause set new records in the 100-yard freestyle and the 200-yard butterfly Saturday night, and a new mark in the 500 Friday. Buzzard is extremely optimistic about Krause's future.

Among the highlights of the meet was the new record SU set in the 400-yard medley relay. Ross Prossner, Al Comly, Hunter John and Dave Crockenberg combined for a time of 3:44.1. In their individual splits, Comly and John finished with faster times than they ever swam.

The 100-yard freestyle was also a runaway for the Orange. Prossner, Crockenberg, and Larry Shulman completed the sweep.

Team captain Pete Schecht produced two firsts, including a victory in the 500 Friday, and a triumph in the 1650-yard freestyle the next day.

Prossner set a new meet record in the 100-yard backstroke with a clocking of 56.8.



Other Saturday winners were Hunter John in the 100-yard butterfly, and Lloyd Sinnott in the 100-yard breaststroke. Buzzard was quick to praise Sinnott, describing his effort as "a tremendous job."

The Tangerine swimmers were also victorious, finishing with a total of 91 points. Buffalo placed second with 42 points, followed by R.P.I.'s 40.5, Rochester's 37.5, St. Bonaventure's 36, and Union's 28.

Rick Frederiksen added two victories to his Friday performance, with triumphs in the 200-yard freestyle and the 200- yard butterfly.

Returning to the varsity meet, the Orange mermen placed first in six of seven finals, failing only in one-meter diving. Tom Skuce placed second for Syracuse in that event.

The most important meet of the season is this weekend at Yale, known simply as the "Easterns." Buzzard feels that he will have completed an outstanding season if Syracuse finishes in the top ten in the Easterns.

Ball boys aid court play

By ED AGRANOWITZ

The names Tom Fiedman, Matt Murray, Hank Anderson and John Sager are not familiar to even the closest followers of the Syracuse basketball Orangemen.

But these boys are the ones primarily responsible for keeping the action on the court flowing smoothly.

They are the Orange-ballboys, and can be seen at all of the games stationed under either hoop.

The ballboys, ranging in age from 12 to 14, work strictly on a voluntary basis. Their duties include supplying both teams with warmup balls before each half and sweeping the court free of dust at halftime.

But the job is not all hard labor, and has several attractive fringe benefits for the boys. "We have connections," explains Tom Friedman, "We get into all of the games for free."

Another enjoyable aspect of the job is that the boys are able to mingle with their heroes from the Orange team.

Matt Murray's favorites are Bill Finney, Bill Case, and Tommy Green. "Finney has the best jumper and Case has great moves," marvels Matt, "and Tommy Green is the best passer on the team."

John Sager, a part-time starter for the Jamesville DeWitt High School freshman squad, is partial to Dave Harmon. "I like his shot and the way he plays defense," John says, "and he definitely has the most class."

The elder statesman of the ballboy crew is Hank Anderson, who's been at it for five years. Hank was originally hired by former coach, Dr. Fred Lewis and has had the distinction of babysitting for coach Roy Danforth. Hank's biggest thrill to date has been knowing Dave Bing.

The boys often attend team practices and find the players very friendly and eager to give them tips on their game. Sometimes the players will even engage in a light-hearted scrimmage with the boys.

Tom and Matt are teammates in a school league, and take particular pride in their two-on-one challenge matches against some of the Orangemen. "We have a hard time geting rebounds so we work for the good shots," explains Matt. "And sometimes if we're hot we can beat Bob Clary," adds Tom

Although the boys are unanimous in the fact that they want to play high school basketball, their college plans are not as certain. Both Hank and John list Syracuse as a possibility for their choice of school. Matt is a little more definite. "I will go to Syracuse," he says,"but only if I get a basketball scholarship."

Tom has his choice narrowed down even further. He is not interested in Syracuse despite the fact that Orange tennis coach Gary Thorne is hot on his trail (Tom was a semifinalist in the State tennis tournament and a finalist in the Central New York tourney in his age group). "I want to go to an Ivy League school," he says.

But right now, Tom and the boys are all for the Orange. Coach Danforth will be hoping for a reversal of his team's 9-16 record next year with the return of four starters. And perhaps he'll receive the added strength of four returning ballboys.

Cindermen shutout; frosh matmen shine in meets

Saturday proved to be both "V" day and "D' day for SU sports teams. The freshman wrestlers made a fine showing in the West Point Plebe Tournament while the track team met "Disaster."

The frosh matmen saw three team members win awards in the two-day tournament. Jim Schenck pinned three opponents en route to a third place showing at 145 pounds while Dennis Coupe and Rick Russo did him one better by copping the second spots.

Coupe completely dominated his first three bouts before losing a tight 3-2 decision in the finals at 191. Russo won four matches before bowing in the 152 pound title tilt.

Frosh coach Dave Agone said he was "very pleased with the teams showing. They could really help the varsity next year."

Meanwhile, the track team was shut out in the IC4A championships held in New York City. Neither Larry Zuller nor Guy Roberts qualified for the finals.

Zuller's performance in the mile qualifying heat perhaps told the story of the day. He ran a fine race, finishing in 4:11. However, that time placed him fifth, behind such well-known milers as Martin Liquori.

In two other qualifying heats for the mile finale, the winning times were 4:11. and 4:12.5. Had Zuller been placed in the slower heats, he would have won handily and made the finals.

In addition, the third place finisher in the mile finals was clocked in 4:11.4. Had Zuller made the finals and repeated his time, a medal would have returned with him to SU.

Architecture boycott building momentum

By FRED TUCCILLO
News Editor

The School of Architecture's student body president said Tuesday that the school's students would stay away from architecture classes until definite progress toward a more responsive school was made. He then joined a student-faculty meeting aimed at reaching that goal as the students carried their class boycott into its second day.

In an afternoon press conference at Huntington Hall, Paul Scoville, the elected spokesman for the school's 205 students, outlined the general objectives of the boycott and the program of constructive action designed to achieve them.

"Any school of architecture must be responsive to the needs of its students, faculty, university and community," he said, reading from a prepared statement. "To this end, it should operate in a democratic manner, with real and equal decision— making power delegated to students, faculty and administration.

"We feel it fails in this respect," Scoville added.

He called the effort "an expression of students seeking to have more control over their own destinies" and, citing one part of the problem, said: "Up till now the question of whether courses are relevant or not has been decided by one person or a committee headed by him."

Scoville said there was a need to "increase the breadth of the curriculum so that the individual student can find a course of study that suits his particular abilities and interest."

The boycotting students spent the day holding their own classes outside of the school's quarters in Slocum Hall to keep up with work that would be difficult to make up after the boycott, discussing curriculum with faculty members and working on their annual Festival of the Arts project.

Occasionally they would return to Huntington Hall, gathering in small groups to discuss the progress of their attempts at internal improvement of the small, tightly-knit school. Amid the clutter of the work benches and stools in the Architecture Design Room, they discussed the clutter of an over-burdened administration in need of more

Three years ago to the day, SU's School of Architecture was embroiled in another student boycott of classes with several parallels to the dispute prevailing today.

A March 8, 1966 meeting concluded two days of class walk-outs by School of Architecture students whose stated purpose was to "upgrade the image of architecture" at SU.

Vol. 67, No. 78 Syracuse, N. Y., Wednesday, March 12, 1969 10 Cents

In the red

STUDENTS AND FACULTY members responded enthusiastically to past Red Cross blood drives on this campus. The bloodmobile returned today and will be accepting donations between 10 a.m. and 3:45 p.m.

Blood bank overdrawn; new depositors sought

The semiannual University bloodmobile drive begins today at Shaw Dormitory. The Red Cross bloodmobile will be parked at Shaw's loading dock to accept donations between 10 a.m. and 3:45 p.m.

Since 1949, blood drives have been conducted twice yearly on this campus. Two days each in March and October are devoted to the effort.

The SU bloodmobile supports the extensive program of the Syracuse Regional Blood Program which insures the supply of blood needs to some 80 hospitals in 24 counties of New York State.

This region, with its headquarters and laboratories in the Syracuse Chapter of the American Red Cross, is unique in having a truly volunteer program. It is not a credit, reciprocal or commercial arrangement. The blood needs for all who live in the area are taken care of without obligation or charge. The region extends from the Canadian to the Pennsylvania border and east to the Massachusetts line -- one of the nation's largest regions.

Professional staff is supported by volunteer workers and doctors throughout the region.

Donors must be between 18 and 60 years old, while minimum weight is established at 110 pounds. If a prospective donor is slightly under that weight, he can request permission from the bloodmobile's doctor to donate.

Donors are requested to consume some food before donating. Food should be limited to fat-free intake.

Students between 18 and 21 no longer need written parental permission to donate.

Persons wishing to specify donation directed to an individual patient may do so at the University bloodmobile if that patient is a resident of this Red Cross region.

If he does not live in this area, directed donation may be made at the blood center in Midtown Plaza, where facilities are available to make reciprocal arrangements with hospitals outside of this region.

Members of fraternities, sororities and military organizations may register at the bloodmobile to obtain credit for their group.

The bloodmobile will also be parked at Shaw between the same hours on Thursday.

Travel office folds due to losses, abuse

By BETH HILLSON
Associate Editor

After five years of financial struggle, the campus branch of the Syracuse Travel Bureau, Inc. has abruptly closed its doors and retreated to its single remaining office downtown.

It is the second such firm to withdraw from the campus in the last seven years. The first, the Tom Duffy Travel Service, Inc., survived for two years prior to the Syracuse Travel Bureau's establishment.

As of April 15, the small office which has housed the travel bureau on the second floor of the Corner Bookstore will again be vacant.

A January 26 New York Times Magazine article explains a factor contributing to the closing and financial suffering of many agencies country-wide.

The article revealed that domestic travel has become a losing proposition for travel agencies.

The customer does not pay a fee to the travel bureau for a commuter flight. The 5% commission which the agency receives from airlines for transactions on domestic flights represents only a fraction of the cost of booking such flights. Travel agents are trained to set up honeymoon arrangements and vacations. "By our time and experience being engulfed in commuter travel, we are not free to do what we are trained for," explained John M. Bucci, vice-president of the Syracuse Travel Bureau, Inc. "It's like going to a doctor for a band-aid," he added.

The business handled on campus was primarily domestic. Bucci pointed out that students took advantage of the firm's operations to insure a flight home for vacations; some would purchase multiple tickets under other names and never pick them up, thus adding to the bureau's losses.

Several students received tickets from their parents and when they found the reservations were not needed, demanded a refund from the travel bureau. Bucci emphasized that the tickets had not been purchased through them and this too, injured the profit-making element of the agency.

Though Bucci said he had expected a certain amount of domestic travel arrangements from both students and faculty, he also indicated an expectation to handle charter flights and trips abroad which many of the departments at the University have.

"Most departments did comply; we got many of the smaller groups, but where the largest groups were involved, they didn't come to us," he pointed out.

The large and profitable groups for the Bureau--football and band charters and the foreign studies groups--never came through the firm's office.

Though Bucci said he had presented a plan for the football teams travel that "would not cost a cent more," James H. Decker director of athletics for SU turned it down.

"We think we can do a better job on our own," was Decker's comment. "It's specialized work to move an athletic team," he added.

Voting farce in view again

The election notice on our front page yesterday was a meager harbinger of the fun and games and general irrelevance that CAP vs. GIA vs. independents will probably mean again this year. Yes it's election time again and campus politicians are busily balancing their tickets with "face men," Greeks and someone to bring in the vote from the Mount. They will probably succeed.

No one is very anxious to reform the system that we now use to elect our multitude of officers and campus heroes. Everyone talks about using the system just to get elected, and then destroying it. These ideas always run afoul after a new hero gets to flex his muscles, so presumably we've got nothing better to look forward to this year.

It is lamented to the Daily Orange that we do nothing to help the system by giving it little publicity. We will not legitimize the farcical nature of the political game by indiscriminate coverage, nor will we ignore it.

The Daily Orange will endorse candidates, if for no other reason than that someone is going to win. We are looking for a new approach. We are looking for candidates who will do something more in class offices than sponsor weekends. We seek a calm rational voice concerned with education, SU-style.

The candidates have not yet surfaced and at this point we support no one. The Daily Orange owes no allegiance to either existing party or any that may appear. Those who claim otherwise fool no one.

Amid all the hurrah, there are of course some hard-working and talented people. We have spotted some--hopefully there will be others. We hope many will come forward and redeem the system that is "Mickey Mouse" even to its participants.

Letter to the editor

To the Editor:

I have been given a copy of the letter sent you about the condition of the Women's Room.

It has been definitely considered for renovations. In fact, we made preliminary drawings this summer and will detail and estimate this area for inclusion into the next fiscal year budget.

It has been planned as one accommodation eliminating the present raised floor of the original toilet room. This older section is more difficult to maintain and keep looking clean.

There is no reason why there should be water leaks or out-of-order units unless they had not been reported at the time. I am sure that this has been taken care of.

Action

Got any gripes? Are there questions to which you can't find the answers? The Daily Orange invites its readers to submit questions concerning the University. Questions and answers will be printed in a regular column. Submit your questions to Karen Wiediger, 1101 East Adams St. or call ext. 3755 between 4 and 5 p.m. Monday through Thursday. Names will be withheld.

QUESTION: What is the purpose of the general student fee and where does it go?
ANSWER: The general fee was created in the early 1950's, according to Victor J. Colway, comptroller. Prior to that time students in the School of Forestry were paying less for tuition than regular Syracuse University students. Since the forestry students were entitled, as undergraduates, to the same student services typical SU students got, the University felt it only fair to charge all students a general fee.

At this time, all students, including those on full scholarships must pay the student fee, thus insuring that all pay a minimum equal amount for SU student services.

The revenue from the general student fee is put in a tuition account for budgetary purposes, but in part pays for the Daily Orange, student activities, football tickets, infirmary services and the services of the deans of men, women and student services offices.

QUESTION: Is there any way a library book can be recalled from a professor when he has it out for a semester? I tried to get a book, which a professor had out and the Carnegie Library TRIED to get it back, but all it accomplished was that the professor himself offered to lend me the book if I came to his office (in some part of the University I'd never heard of)! I refused to do this and never got the book. (This happened in December, 1967).
ANSWER: The normal procedure in a case like this is for the main library to send a post card to the professor, requesting he return the book. Tha faculty response is excellent and there are very few exceptions when a professor does not return the book.

In instances where a professor does not comply with the written request, Assistant Director Metod Milac personally contacts the professor. Milac, whose office is in Room 208 Main Library asks that students with problems such as this one contact him directly.

QUESTION: Can you minor in ROTC?
ANSWER: The ROTC office isn't sure if you can or can't. In the College of Liberal Arts there is no such thing as a "minor" but students currently enrolled in ROTC programs can take 18 or 19 hours in the program and receive credit towards graduation.

The School of Speech, which requires nine hours as a minor in liberal arts, does not accept ROTC in this category but does give credit towards graduation for courses taken.

Free speech

Change and protest

By Bob Tembeckjian

Ever since this nation was founded, the right of free speech, to criticize as well as praise, has been guaranteed by the First Amendment. And this nation, born in revolutionary protest and anger, was established in the spirit of the protection of civil liberties. And ever since the inception of the United States of America, a sense of freedom has survived in the minds of our country's citizens.

But there can be heard in this country today dissident voices which condemn those who dissent, those who are exercising their constitutional and human right to disagree with their government. There can be heard pleas to "lock up the war objectors, kill all the hippies and put a final end to protest. This country's done all right. Why change?"

But those who resist change are not preserving the tradition of America. Change is natural and protest is inevitable. No amount of empty-headed calls for law and order will alter the fact that there are injustices in this country. And silence will not illuminate them. Nor will passivity solve them. Criticism of our society will end only when its wrongs are righted and when we as citizens decide to examine our problems rather than ignore them.

There are thousands of people who are starving in this country, in Appalachia and elsewhere. Yet progress, if at all existent, is fatally slow. When young children wear rags and save their school-given lunches to share with their families who are often without food and income, there is something painfully wrong with America, "the land of plenty where the streets are paved with gold." And when the fortunate among us do not offer to help those in need, there is something tragically wrong with the American conscience.

There has been a futile, senseless and brutal war in Vietnam for five years which has ravaged the country in which it is fought and has orphaned and crippled the children for whom we supposedly fight--to make their future secure and free. But when the people of this country tire of our effort there because the cost has been financially too high, there is something sickeningly wrong with American morality. For the day America places the value of a paper dollar above a human life--and some would claim that day has already arrived--is the day America ceases to be what our forebearers founded: a place of peace and morality, freedom and conscience.

But there is no rest in America today. For people are killed in the name of peace. The old and young alike condemn each other for their moral standards. Freedom is cursed by many who say we have too much. And consciences seem to be asleep, for while we seek to justify the "morality" of a commitment to war, we neglect the morality of answering the hungry cries of Biafra.

There is in this land today an ugly hatred between races, age groups, and political beliefs. People still discriminate because of race and age, and they still assassinate because of creeds.

But when will this country wake up? When will our people cast away their indifference to what's going on around them? When will men decide they are not powerless in determining the purpose of human existence, that we can help one another rather than trample all over each other's rights?

America will neither be strong nor healthy until it finally begins to accept dissent, learn from criticism, and admit mistakes. The greatest mistake our country or our government can make is to regard itself as infallible, as incapable of error. The courage to speak out, to criticize in the face of opposition--not a complaisant acceptance of things as they are--will save this country from its downward course. For only a nation which can accept valid criticism is strong. Only a nation which encourages differences of opinion will survive. And the only government which is justifiable is one which exists not with concensus but flourishes with dissension; one which has the courage to admit shortcomings and failures rather than hide behind the illusion of joy and happiness; and one which places the value of life above the value of winning a reckless war.

"If we are willing to sacrifice the guaranteed right of one individual for the order of many," wrote Jeffrey Smith of the University of Wisconsin, "then we have missed the entire point of what our country supposedly represents. Of course, one may not like what a dissenter advocates. But if we attempt to define what is politically legal to believe, then the First Amendment becomes meaningless, and so do we as a democratic society. The choice is quite clear, revere our civil liberties and we will flourish. Curse them and we curse ourselves."

Campus guides

Pages and Pages of SU lore . . .

By MELODY HOWARD

Does Syracuse University have many student demonstrations? What's the food like? Are there many fraternity and sorority houses here? Where do you go on a Saturday night? Is the work very hard?

Sound familiar? Chances are, sometime during your junior or senior year in high school you, too, were asking these same questions while visiting Syracuse, and they probably would have been left unanswered had it not been for the SU tour guides, the Orange Pages. This group of 80 "typical students" is responsible for arranging, conducting and generally welcoming all visitors to the Syracuse campus.

In handling the several thousand people that visit here each year, the Orange Pages must somehow try to present the University as truthfully as possible, yet convince people that: no, it is not true that it snows every day from October to May, or, yes, the half-moon shaped building on the hill is really a dormitory. However, there is more to the Orange Pages than soothing anxious parents and encouraging prospective students.

According to their newly-elected president, Jane Hixson, a sophomore art major, several innovations are being planned for the Pages. At the beginning of April, it is hoped that they will be able to initiate "bull sessions" with faculty members and/or deans of the various schools on campus to familiarize the Pages with the requirements and programs of the various schools, and to simultaneously introduce the Pages to the faculty. This, Miss Hixson said, should help improve the present situation in which many of the faculty are not only unfamiliar with the Pages' functions but sometimes do not know that they exist.

A second policy change Miss Hixson hopes to enact is to institute the use of Orange Pages in the admissions office each fall, to perform the clerical work done by the part-time help hired at that time. If this plan is successful, all earnings received by the Pages would be donated to a worthy campus project. However, a lack of space in the admissions office for the Pages is inhibiting the immediate implementation of this program.

Lastly, Miss Hixson stated that they hoped to organize several panels of Orange Pages, to go to high school college nights. This program was developed several years ago but has been inactive for the past few years.

The tours begin during orientation week for the freshmen, to help acquaint them with their new environment, and continue throughout the year until finals week, for visitors to the university. They are held at 10 and 11 a.m. and 1, 2 and 3 p.m., Monday through Friday, and at 10 and 11 on Saturday. Each Page is required to give at least one tour each week to remain active, and it usually amounts to no more than an hour a week.

GUIDING A PROSPECTIVE FRESHMAN around the SU campus is Miss Jane Hixon, president of the Orange Pages. The campus tour guides are aiming to swell their ranks through applications and interviews this Thursday and Friday. (Photo by Forgham)

A campaign for new Pages for next year is being conducted now. Anyone interested can apply by calling Jane Hixson, at extension 3055. Interviews will be this Thursday and Friday, March 13 and 14, in the Administration Building from 9 until 4, and, if necessary, on Saturday, March 15, from 9 until 12. After the interview, if the applicant has been approved by an Orange Page representative, he will be required to have a brief interview with Page adviser, Miss Anne Cunningham, assistant to Lester H. Dye, director of admissions.

To qualify, the student must have at least a 2.5 cumulative average and be in good standing with the University. According to Miss Hixson, "We're looking for someone who can speak well, has some knowledge of the University and a general knowledge of the city. They should be poised and intelligent. What we hope for is a "typical student" of Syracuse University."

Grads plan fund raising for blacks

The Maxwell Graduate Students Association is currently conducting a two-day fund drive to help finance the recruiting of more black graduate students.

The heart of the program is the sending of teams of recruiters to various Black campuses. These recruiters, who would preferably be Black, would recruit graduate students for next fall and establish contacts for future recruiting.

In addition to the recruiting effort, Maxwell grads have scheduled a conference to discuss problems encountered by black graduate students at Maxwell.

For the fund-raising campaign, students will be manning tables in Maxwell lobby today and tomorrow, between 9 a.m. and 4 p.m.

Mass meeting

The second mass protest meeting planned by the Student Government is scheduled for 10 p.m. tonight in Grant Auditorium.

The topics for discussion include visiting hours, dormitory autonomy, and the proposed tuition hike. The tone of the meeting will help formulate student opinion at the upcoming Council of Student Life.

Chuck Hicks, student government president, will speak at tonight's meeting in Grant Auditorium at 10 p.m.

A statement will be distributed explaining why students are objecting to the trustees' role in the process of chancellor selection.

Travel trouble . . .

The Foreign Studies programs, sending groups of 60 to 100 students abroad each semester, also went elsewhere for travel arrangements.

Bucci also cited the Travel Bureau's inadequate office facilities. "There was no room for privacy when working with an account," he explained.

Vice-President and Treasurer F.A. Wingate, instrumental in getting the Syracuse Travel Bureau to open a branch on campus, expressed surprise at the unexpected closing.

"It caught me off guard," Wingate stated. "He (Bucci) gave us no notice, he just said 'as of today we're through,'" he continued.

"I wish he had asked for things instead of taking off," the vice-president emphasized. Asserting that he had made every attempt to comply with the firm's needs.

"I tried to channel all official travel to the Bureau," he continued, "I didn't get their support." He was speaking of the departments which Bucci had seen as less than uniform in their process of budgeting travel expenses,

One dean that does a lot with foreign travel "felt it was an encroachment on his freedom of choice to have to go through the Travel Bureau," Wingate pointed out.

"I called many people and gave them a hard time, but the faculty are individuals," he said. "It's hard to channel all departments into one business."

"We are writing 40 more checks now for travel than we did when the Travel Bureau was here," he complained. Where vouchers had been made out for travel expenses and accumulated over a period of time, this business is now going to many different firms said Wingate.

The Syracuse Travel Bureau moves back to its downtown office where domestic travel will shortly be cut out of its structure completely, Bucci predicts.

As Syracuse University seeks a new means of handling its campus travel business, Wingate indicates continued cooperation on his part to eleviate the problems that drove two succeeding travel bureaus from the campus.

Senate passes amendment for central registration

By COLETTE STALLINGS

After a 50-minute discussion, Student Senate last night approved an amendment to the election article of the UG constitution calling for "central public registration in campus political parties."

Among those opposed to central registration, John Ross, chairman of the Government Structures Committee, said he felt the amendment was intended to protect Greeks from having to register with their houses. "The truth of it is," said Ross, "I don't think that Greeks are any less intelligent than independents, and I don't think that Greeks have any less character than independents. I have enough faith to believe that people aren't going to be coerced into anything they don't want to do."

Speaking out in favor of central registration, Speaker Ed Feldman commented that the parties aren't really concerned with issues. He said that central registration might kill the parties, "but they deserve to be killed if they won't talk about the issues. The parties should be concerned enough to contact every student on campus."

The amendment was approved only after another amendment, proposed by Speaker pro Tempore John Diamond, requiring the Election Commission to register the person and collect the fee was defeated.

A third proposal that students be given the opportunity of registering for political parties at any time during the year in the Dean of Student Service's office was withdrawn by its originator, chairman of the Elections Commission, Dick Barton.

Before passing the amendment prepared by the Senate Committee on Political Equity (SCOPE) that calls for Senate establishment of a "uniform, equitable and democratic procedure for nomination of all candidates of campus political parties," SCOPE spokesman Lance Wisniewski said, "The testimony of all the SCOPE hearings did not show that this has been a fair and equitable system."

Arguing against the amendment, Ross quipped, "Most people who lose think that 'fair' is what they weren't allowed to do; most who won think that 'fair' is what went on."

In a piece of five-minute legislation, Senate approved a proposal made by the Elections Commission that all appeals of its decisions be heard by the University Judicial Board. In the only discussion on the proposal, Elections Commissioner Andrew Winning commented, "It is imperative that appeals are made to some neutral body--but Senate is definitely a political body."

Reporting on an open hearing held with Faculty Senate on having students sit on the Senate, John Diamond said, "After the excellent publicity the hearing had in the Daily Orange, only two students showed up. It was rather hard convincing the Faculty Senate that the students wanted to be on it. It was rather hard to convince myself, as a matter of fact, if I had it to do over again, I wouldn't."

"What makes the Faculty Senate different from this organization," continued Diamond, "is that they work. It's nice to have a title after your name but it's even nicer to go back to your room and say: 'Gee whiz, I did something today.' This is a rather weak plea for support...I'd appreciate some support."

Wash, wet, soak, hunt, squint, wash, soak, wet, cry a little.

Contact lenses were designed to be a convenience. And they are up to a point. They're convenient enough to wear, once you get used to them, but, until recently, you had to use two or more different lens solutions to properly prepare and maintain contacts. You needed two or three different bottles, lens cases, and you went through more than enough daily rituals to make even the most steadfast individuals consider dropping out.

But now caring for your contacts can be as convenient as wearing them. Now there's Lensine, from the makers of Murine. Lensine is the one lens solution designed for complete contact lens care . . . preparing, cleansing, and soaking.

Just a drop or two of Lensine before you insert your lens prepares it for your eye. Lensine makes your contacts, which are made of modern plastics, compatible with your eye. How? Lensine is an "isotonic" solution. That means it's made to blend with the eye's natural fluids. So a simple drop or two coats the lens, forming a sort of comfort zone around it.

Cleaning your contacts with Lensine fights bacteria and foreign deposits that build up during the course of the day. And for overnight soaking, Lensine provides a handy contact canister on the bottom of every bottle. Soaking your contacts in Lensine between wearing periods assures you of proper lens hygiene.

Improper storage between wearings permits the growth of bacteria on your lenses. This is a sure cause of eye irritation and, in some cases, it can endanger your vision. Bacteria cannot grow in Lensine. Lensine is sterile, self-sanitizing, and antiseptic.

Let your contacts be the convenience they were designed to be. The name of the game is Lensine. Lensine, made by the Murine Company, Inc.

Are you cut out for contact sports?

Strikers speak out

Architecture students air gripes, causes

"Some of the faculty is bad. We don't know how bad, but we know they are bad" began an architecture student as he explained his particular problems in the School of Architecture. "The dean is terrible. We want the responsibilities of the dean divided into at least two and perhaps more posts" said another student of the school.

"There are some courses I would like to take, but I can't take them because my advisor made a mistake in advising when I was a freshman and now I have to make up requirements," complained another.

Complaints about the curriculum, advising, faculty, and the dean of the school seem to be uppermost in the minds of striking architecture students.

"Freshmen are the most interested," continued one student, "because they have the most to gain from any changes in faculty and curriculum."

The most important principle is that they don't "want this to get blown out of proportion. We don't want this to become another Columbia." The striking students feel that there are some things good about the school and don't want to abolish the entire system.

Concerning curriculum a student said: "students should be allowed to do what they are interested in." He continued, explaining that the strikers feel that students learn more by doing what they are "interested in."

The strikers feel that their cause might be hurt if everybody involved in the strike makes statemenst. For that reason, they have ruled that students in architecture must refrain from speaking to the media. They believe that anything other than complete solidarity will hurt their chances of negotiating with the administration and faculty.

Students commented further, "We expect that the strike might very well drag on for several weeks. We are prepared for this and intend to continue courses so that we don't fall behind. After all, we are here for an education."

flexibility, more responsiveness and more distribution of power.

The Daily Orange learned that several students had visited the architecture schools at Pratt Institute and Columbia University where similar constructive action has led to the establishment of the kind of responsive structure SU's architecture students seek.

"We want to go about this rationally and in good faith with the Administration and faculty so that our proposals will be treated the same way by them," Scoville said.

Scoville, Gordon Herwitz, Tom Marino, Eric Richert and Dave Souers, "elected mediators" for the students, met with five faculty members after the press conference to begin discussing possible restructuring of the school's hierarchy.

The student-faculty group, created at Monday's joint meeting, is expected to be the center of action at this stage. D. Kenneth Sargent, dean of the School of Architecture, said Tuesday that he would wait for the group's report before commenting and one student said: "We can't come out with more specific proposals until we meet with the faculty. These things should be worked out jointly; we don't expect or want all the power."

Rerun of '66 . . .

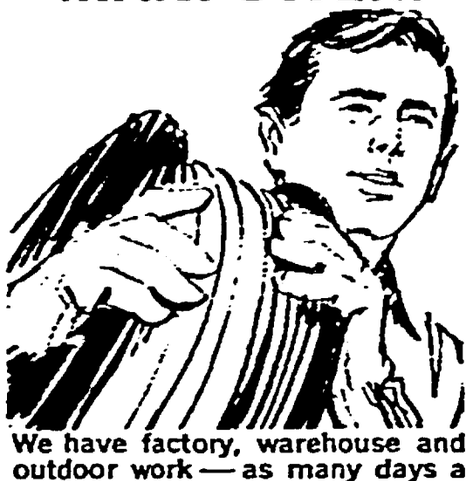
were presented to D. Kenneth Sargent, dean of the School. The March 9 DO reported: "Sargent was cool to the students' suggestions but did not rule them out entirely."

The major proposals were: 1) the hiring of an assistant academic dean, 2) the formation of an effective student-faculty board, 3) the creation of a modular teaching manual, a book containing all the basic information of a course, and 4) the initiation of a code of ethics.



Dean Sargent stated that many of the students' ideas had been "attempted in the past, but haven't been pushed through" due to lack of money. He commented at the time, "There's a lot of sense in many of their proposals. They have started to think and they have done some pretty mature thinking. They are trying hard, and I'm pleased that they are concerned about learning more."

Dubbing themselves "SEED" (Student Educational Environmental Development), the students organized 18 committees to grapple with the points that they had raised.

The striking students asked the faculty to review their suggestions about curriculum changes and course updating and to submit a detailed analysis in three days. Dean Sargent called the request "ridiculous," saying that there was hardly time enough to read the proposals.

Honors program seeking qualified sophomores

Applications are now available in the Honors Program office, 108 Hall of Languages, for interested sophomores who wish to join the program for their junior and senior years. Students may apply to become honors candidates, that is, candidates for a bachelor's degree with honors in their field, up to the beginning of their junior year, but not after that time.

Applications must be completed and filed with the Honors Council before Spring vacation. Business students are eligible to apply.

During the junior and senior years, an honors candidate, having selected a major, will follow the department's requirements for a degree with honors. Each student will follow a program of courses individually planned with the departmental honors advisor to be stimulating and coherent.

This program will allow the honors candidate to pursue his special interests in more than ordinary depth. Courses can be chosen from among seminars, tutorials, research projects, or, if justified, graduate courses. Such training in individual study and research, close contact with the various members of the faculty, will prepare a student for graduate work in the liberal arts and sciences.

A grade point cumulative average of 3.0 is the minimum requirement although various departments may require a higher average.

Demands stated

SDS to present anti-ROTC letter to Tolley

By GREG SMITH

A one-page letter from the Students for a Democratic Society (SDS) demanding an end to ROTC on campus and requesting a public meeting with Chancellor Tolley will be presented to the chancellor this afternoon.

The letter will be delivered to Tolley, or left with his secretary if he is not available, following a 1 p.m. assemblage of SDS members on Hendricks Chapel's steps.

"We demand an end to ROTC on campus, specifically: 1) dropping it as a course, 2) there should be no more ROTC instructors with staff or professorial status, 3) if ROTC is reconstituted as an extra-curricular activity it should receive no special privileges, such as offices, funds, etc.," states the letter. "We feel that any student who would have to leave school because of financial problems resulting from loss of ROTC cadet pay should be awarded University financial aid."

Bob Tomposky, SDS president, commented, "We don't imagine it (ROTC) would be given up very easily." SDS is currently circulating a petition to oust ROTC from its present status. According to Tomposky's estimate, his group has 1,000 signatures thus far. He had no estimate of the ultimate number of signatures, saying, "I'm not sure we'll put much more effort into it."

The note continues, "We also must begin to deal with the problems of military and police research on campus.

"We would like a meeting with you on these demands and questions. We hope that some trustees and faculty leaders would also attend. The meeting would, of course, be open to all concerned members of the University community. Please reply within a week, at most. A failure to reply or a refusal to deal seriously with the questions would upset us greatly."

Tomposky declined to characterize the letter as a threat, stating, "If he's willing to reply there's no problem. But the letter isn't meant as a threat."

Tomposky refused to consider a meeting with a lesser University official.

Charging that, "American universities have followed our society in becoming increasingly militarized," the message asserts, "the universities have always served the interests of the most powerful social groups in the nation, but they have never served in such destructive ways as they do today."

The message goes on to say, "Along with other large American universities, SU performs more direct services for our nation's great institutions, such as millions of dollars worth of Defense Dept. contract research, most of which is classified, forever hidden from most students and faculty. The results of that military research is to make war corporations and some professors more wealthy, and to help the military become better prepared to carry out its assignments of suppressing rebellion at home and abroad and convincing Americans that they are being defended from something horrible."

Candidates for class and Student Government executive offices must submit petitions to Elections Commissions Chairman Dick Barton at 801 University Ave. by 5 p.m. on Wed., March 12. Petitions must include name, office sought, phone extensions and grade point average of the candidate. All qualified candidates will be accepted.

Petitions for senator-at-large candidates must be submitted to Barton by 5 p.m. on March 18.

Tennis outlook hopeful, says optimistic Thorne

By JOE LAGUARDIA

With one of the best squads in recent years, the Syracuse University tennis team hopes to break its slump of six successive losing seasons. "If we stay healthy and the boys I'm counting on stay eligible," admits cautiously optimistic Gary Thorne, SU tennis coach, "we'll be O.K."

Thorne, entering his third campaign on the Hill as tennis coach, hasn't had much to be enthusiastic about in his first two years. In his initial season the team sported an anemic 1-10 won-lost record. Last season the varsity wound up with a somewhat improved 3-8-1 slate.

But, this year there should be marked improvement. "Right now we look 6-10 with a chance for three of those tough matches to go either way. So, we could conceivably end up with a 9-7 mark," conceded Thorne.

The 27-year-old coach, as of yet, doesn't have a definite lineup for the spring tour which begins March 31st at Catholic University.

After the first four weeks of practice Thorne has seniors Marc Pine, John Schwandt, and junior Howie Noble fighting it out on a challenge basis for number one spot. The winner of the head-to-head competition will be number one man, while the other two will vie for the second and third spots on the team.

Singles positions, four through six, are contested among soph Sandy Aronaurer, juniors Peter Frank and Jeff Shankman and senior Don Bredes.

Also working out with the squad will be ineligible Ken Malament, a transfer student from University of Pacific where he was number two man on the varsity last year. He is a sophomore.

The foundations for a bright future are always started at the freshmen level. And, Syracuse, according to Thorne, has one of the strongest frosh array assembled in recent years.

"I really think that the team is strong enough to go undefeated," the coach admitted.

"We have six high school number one players competing for the fifth and sixth singles spot on the frosh squad," he stated.

Among the top frosh that Thorne expects quite a bit from are Pat Mason, Dale Patterson and Jay Jeffers.

With the addition of respectable talent, Thorne has found a change in attitude on the squad. "These kids really have a serious attitude about the game. In fact, during late fall, the kids were calling me up asking me to schedule practice time for them," he stated.

Thorne, like any other coach, is faced with recruitment problems. He has a further hindrance in that he is allowed no scholarships. Among the schools that the team will face; Cornell, Colgate and Pittsburgh give out scholarships. In fact, Pittsburgh has six scholarship players. All that Thorne would say to that was "incredible."

However, he feels that with better talent now coming to Syracuse and an improving record he will be able to sway more prospective athletes to the Hill.

Thorne, named MVP of the Utica College tennis team in 1966, stresses conditioning to his players. "You've got to keep going after the ball and exhaust your opponent," he commented.

Thorne feels that Syracuse will have its toughest time aginst Maryland, who is led by Dave Werchen, ranked in the top twenty in the men's east.

All that stands in SU's way is that nasty work "if." Providing the "ifs" come through, Gary Thorne and his netmen can break that six year dry spell.

SU TENNIS COACH, GARY THORNE feels his squad should make a marked improvement on last year's 3-8-1 slate. The team opens the 1969 season in Washington, D.C. where they face Catholic University.

Wake up, 'pros'

By MIKE WEBER
Sports Editor

With spring drills well underway for both major league and college baseball teams, University of Michigan Athletic Director Bob Canham has issued a warning to major league scouts.

Canham said, "The major leagues are doing a hatchet job on college baseball." His statement was in reaction to the recent signings of three top college players by professional teams. Canham warned the scouts that they are being so shortsighted in their campus hawking, that they are ruining what has been a fine supply source.

Big Ten batting champ, Elliot Maddox, was recently off the campus by the world champion Detriot Tigers, while the Seattle Pilots grabbed pitcher Dave Renkiewicz. Renkiewicz was to have played the major role in the Michigan title hopes this season.

It seems that baseball is doing everything to ruin itself these days. Expansion, more expansion, and so on. This is, of course, depleting the supply of qualified, repeat qualified, major league talent.

So, in the rob Peter to pay Paul way of thinking, the big league scouts are doing everything in their powers to fill the void. They take the top stars from college to plug the gap immediately.

But, how many times has it been said that it takes at least 2-4 years of minor league seasoning to make the professional grade? College athletes who have had the advantage of playing while doing their undergraduate work have succeeded in shortening the time span.

If the current trend in early signings continue, things could look dark. The minor leaguers of today will be promoted more rapidly to fill expansion gaps. The college athletes, with only a year or two of varsity ball behind them, will probably not be ready to make the big jump. The immediate needs may be meet through this procedure, but what about tomorrow?

Looking at the problem strictly from the major league point of view, this practice could be disasterous. With the top level talent gone, what will be left? Mediocre ballplayers who would never have risen above Class "C" ten years ago? Potential major leaguers who were pushed so fast that they never had time to develop and therefore fell by the wayside?

It's all too possible and all too frightening!

SU skaters nearing top

The Syracuse University Hockey Club moved a step closer to first place Monday night as they slipped by the Skaneateles Bruins, 6-4, in a Syracuse Industrial Hockey League game.

The win gave the SU skaters a 9-2 season mark with one regular season encounter left.

Fred Green and Darren Miller both scored two goals apiece to pace the Orange attack. Ken Diamond and Tom Cope each chipped in with a goal.

The hockey club took on Tracy Construction last night at the state fairgrounds. A win would have placed them temporarily in the top spot, pending the outcome of a game involving the current leader, Plante's Restaurant.

The team will have a week off before returning to action in the playoff for the league crown. Game times are 10:30 p.m. at the fairgrounds.

Future bright for linksmen

By JAY PETERFREUND

When spring comes, the poet tells us that a young man's fancy turns to love. But for about twenty Syracuse students, the object of their affections will be a white spheroid, 1.64 inches in diameter and full of dimples. The spheroid is a golf ball and the twenty boys will be vying for the seven starting spots on the SU golf team.

Last year was a disappointing season for the linksmen as they compiled a 1-6 record. The lone victory game against Manhattan College. However, this year will be quite different with a vastly improved record in the offing, according to Coach, Jim Boeheim.

This year the team will be making its first trip South during the spring vacation. The seven probable starters will get a chance to sharpen up their game in a tournament to be played in Cape Coral, Florida. Commenting on this new feature, Boeheim said, "Previously all our opponents have made the trip and it helped them immensely. Now we are trying it, in the hopes of improving ourselves. No doubt we'll see a great change as a result of the trip."

Returning this year as the heavy hitters for the team are Tom Laydon (Jr), and Bob Kouwe (Sr). Boeheim seemed greatly impressed with Kouwe who only recently took up golf, and now has very little trouble coming in around par. Also returning from last year will be: Brad Benjamin (Sr), Jim Riedl (Jr), Frank Beyer (Sr), and John Haber (Jr). Several sophomores will add to the team and give it good depth.

Boeheim, former SU basketball and golf star, stressed that no one has been definitely set in any spot. "The people who play the best golf at tryouts and are most consistent will make the team." He also mentioned that tryouts will begin on Tuesday, April 8 after spring break. These will be on the Drumlins links, the home course.

The team has an added advantage in that most of the matches are at home, while last year they were away. In golf, familiarity with a course is always a plus in the player's favor. Also the schedule makers were kind to the team in that they allowed four days before the first match, while last year there was only one.

The team will also have reasonable intervals in which to practice between matches. SU's opponents are: Penn State (number 1 in the East), Army, Cornell, Colgate, and others. According to Boeheim, they will all be tough to beat. The Eastern Championships will be held at Cornell's University Golf Club, where Bill Orange has always turned in a respectable performance.

This year the Linksmen's first encounter will be a triangular match against Army and Manhattan at West Point on April 12th. On April 23rd the team will meet Cornell at Drumlins, followed by Penn State on the 25th, and Clarkson on the 30th. The team then journeys to Hamilton, N.Y. to play the Red Raiders of Colgate on May 3rd. Back home on May 6th, SU plays St. Lawrence. May 10th will find Bill Orange at Cornell to play in the Eastern Intercollegiate Golf Association match. The team winds up on the road against Rochester on May 14th.

With the advantages of a spring trip to the southland, more practice time between matches and more home course events going for the Orange golfers, the year 1969 could be the ONE.

IT WON'T BE LONG NOW. The Orange crew team which has held workouts from September on, will venture onto Lake Onondaga shortly. During spring vacation, the oarsmen will "celebrate" Easter by spending the time at the lake.

Senate study

Committee grows to examine ROTC

By RONI ZLOKOWER
Associate Editor

The Senate Agenda Committee of the Faculty Senate has been expanded into a fully integrated committee of five faculty members, two administrators, and five students, which will soon begin a study of SU's specific needs concerning military science programs.

Last week, ROTC was placed in an "all-University unit" by the agenda committee upon direction of the Senate to find a new home for ROTC departments recently deprived of their Liberal Arts standing.

The committee will be fact finding at first. It will attempt to examine in some detail other University findings and decisions and to evaluate needs and wishes of the campus community.

By May, according to its chairman, Nelson L. Nemerow, the committee hopes to make its final recommendations to the Senate.

SU's specific needs concerning military science will be the foremost consideration of the group. In a prepared statement, the committee stated that "SU is an individual among the various universities in the US and therefore, we have our own unique goals and interests. We don't intend to play 'follow the leader,' nor do we intend to let any 'grass grow under our feet.'"

The Senate recommended that the committee "undertake the task of delving deeper into important corollary matters such as the value of military education on the SU campus and the subject of justification for academic credit."

Architecture:

Professors meet, consider change

By BOB DAVIS

The faculty of the School of Architecture met Wednesday night to discuss proposals made by the School's striking students. It was the first full faculty meeting since the start of the three-day class boycott.

The Daily Orange learned earlier in the day that "some progress" had been made in afternoon meetings of a student-faculty group. The "mediating" committee, charged with making recommendations for a new administrative structure for the school, consists of students Gordon Hurwitz, Tom Marino, Eric Richert, Paul Scoville and Dave Souers.

The faculty "mediators" are Professor Gale Brooks and Louis Skoler and Associate Professors Kermit J. Lee, David K. Richards and Ralph J. Lee.

D. Kenneth Sargent, dean of the School of Architecture is reserving comment until the student-faculty committee offers its recommendations.

Bob Charron of the publicity committee said that the strike had almost one hundred per cent participation among students of the school. Some faculty members have continued to show up for classes, but they have been met by few students.

EDITOR'S NOTE: The article appearing in yesterday's Daily Orange entitled "Architecture students air gripes, causes" contained individual impressions and feelings of students in the School of Architecture. It did not necessarily represent the majority viewpoints.

The students continued to hold their own classes to try to keep up with the work they might otherwise miss. These classes are student taught.

They also reiterated their resolve to hold out until they are satisfied that the school has a "responsive administrative structure."

The students are seeking more power in the decision-making process of the school. Their main goal is the institution of a "Student-Faculty Board for the initiation/review of school policy."

Possible reforms might include the "Elimination of class structuring to encourage each student to progress" at his own pace. "The expansion of dual degree programs, and the establishment of single degree programs allowing free choice of electives."

But student spokesmen emphasize that such possibilities were only tossed out as topics for discussion. They continued to stress that any specific recommendations for change would have to be worked out by joint student-faculty-administration committees.

Grant talks nets nothing

By RONA KAVEE
Associate Editor

The town meeting held last night is expected to continue in St. Mary's tonight. Student participation is vital to its success.

Because of Daily Orange deadlines, we are unable to bring a complete report of last night's meeting. A summary of the entire proceedings will appear in tomorrow's edition.

About 150 students met in Grant Auditorium last night in an emotional, but unproductive attempt to solve some of the university's long standing problems. Jerry Tatarian, chairman of the University Union made an effort to describe some of the plans formulated for the eventual construction of a union building.

Interrupted by members of the audience who challenged the credability of his plans, Tatarian held that the money and land for the union would be available in a few years.

Student Government President Chuck Hicks defended the Committee on Student Live (CSL) against charges of secrecy leveled against it by Judy Ardito, a freshman.

Miss Ardito vociferously declared that the plans and discussions of the committee were not revealed to students nor was there announcement made of its meeting.

"We are not trying to hide anything," Hicks said. He added that the committee had difficulty resolving certain issues because it "did not know what the students believe in."

The recent election of Dr. John E. Corbally as prime choice for the position of Chancellor came under fire by Ken Ritzenberg, a graduate student who served on the selection committee.

"We operated on the principle that the trustees would honor our decision" Ritzenberg said. He held that Corbally was not the first choice of the student members of the committee and that a second vote was called when the results of the first proved unacceptable to the trustees.

Ritzenberg went on to say that power must lie in the assertion of their rights by the students. Several students declared that the trustees meetings should be opened to students.

Controversy

Symposium debates campus issues

By MITCH LANE

Last night three faculty members and two students met in a symposium to discuss the basic issues raised in Chancellor Tolley's speech before the Onondaga Bar Association. About 150 persons attended the meeting in the auditorium of the Physics Building.

The five primary speakers, Michael O. Sawyer, Eric Lawson, and Salamon Eskinazi from the faculty and Joan Howard and Jeff Portnoy representing the students, discussed pending Senate reorganizations, and the role of the student in the choice of the new chancellor.

Professor Lawson's presentation centered around the conflict between faculty and administrative power. He stated that the university was like a family and that all family members should share the responsibility of running it.

Professor Sawyer presented a comparitively moderate viewpoint. He admitted that the faculty enjoy more equality than anyone else on campus, but added that changes to the system should occur from within. He went on to describe his "utopian" idea of a university, as a place where reasoning, civility, mutual respect, and a spirit of compromise are most important.

As a conclusion to the initial portion of the program, Professor Eskinazi discussed the University Senate proposals concerning the reorganization of university governance. The changes he brought up were the proposed reapportionment, and the inclusion of library representatives in the Senate.

With the conclusion of the five presentations, the floor was opened to students and faculty for a debate of any issues raised in any of the speeches.

The audience, one third of them architecture students, debated current problems facing the university government in particular. Several more boisterous students challenged the faculty members to explain faculty non-interference in governmental structures.

Some of the students voiced the opinion that they had been "betrayed" concerning their promised role in the selection of the new Chancellor. One professor answered that the alleged betrayal was little more than the absence of two of the student members on the day of the final committee vote. He stated that the absence was their own fault, and that the decision had to be made regardless of absences.

One graduate student mentioned that one year ago the administration building was occupied and then summing up the symposium, said mockingly "This is the spring offensive?"

DO breaks for Midterm

The Daily Orange will suspend its normal publications during the Midterm examination period starting this Monday. We will, however, publish a special issue on Tuesday, March 18, to report on the activities and results of the political conventions to be held this weekend.

Regular publication of the Daily Orange will resume on Tuesday, March 26.

Professors and education

Because of the publicity recently given to some of the young creative and more energetic professors at SU, there has been an uproar among the ranks of the traditional old guard. In response to the cry of equal time, we have arranged an interview with Dr. Emile Farnsblither, president of United Professors Approaching Senility (UPAS), in his palatial office atop Hendricks Chapel.

DO: Is it true that your organization is in an uproar about the recent allegations that the University would be more of an educational force if a majority of your ranks would attempt to combine reality with imagination in the preparation of your class lectures?

Dr. Farnsblither: Yes, quite true.

DO: Could you elaborate?

Dr. Farnsblither: In my latest book, "Synergism and the Megalopolis: A Study of Intra-Community Basketball" (University Press, $35.00 with four illustrations, on sale at the bookstore, soon to be published in paperback for distribution to our forces overseas) I stated the aim of the professor in the modern university is to teach and exude that certain charm which belongs to witty old college professors exclusively.

DO: I hadn't noticed earlier but on closer inspection I see that the leather patches on your elbow do put me in a more receptive mood. I can feel the wisdom of your years of experience flowing into my mind. But, to get on with the interview, what about the accusation that many professors lecture straight out of their notes from their latest books.

Dr. Farnsblither: That is totally and unequivically false. Most of my colleagues lecture from the notes of their earlier books. If they read from the notes on their books, the students wouldn't have to buy the revised copy.

DO: To bring this to the personal level Dr. Farnslither...

Dr. Farnsblither: I'd rather not, if you don't mind. You know the old expression "Familiarity breeds contempt." Do you realize that the last time I had a personal conversation with a student he had the audacity to talk to me as if I were his peer. Utter nonsense, utter nonsense!

DO: I wasn't going to ask you about your personal relationships with students, I'm sorry I inferred it. What I wanted was your opinion on the younger generation of professors who seem to relate to their students without talking down to them.

Dr. Farnsblither: Well I've heard a lot about them recently, and liberally speaking I'm completely opposed to them. As a matter of fact, at the last meeting of UPAS the general membership agreed that we would not voluntarily associate with any of them, or give them any aid at all. The way we figured it, we outnumber them, the administration chooses us to head departments, and no radical change in our traditional policies will occur until every last one of us has retired to a life filled with royalty checks and the beautiful memories of the beneficial impact we have had on today's misguided youth.

Observations

It happens every spring

By Dan Schlossberg

Baseball training camps are so full of weirdos and what-nots at this time of year that freak events are often shrugged off by veteran managers with the standard cliche, "It happens every spring."

But seldom, if ever, will there be as great a bureaucratic breakdown between Syracuse University and University College as there was last semester...despite the disclaimer of UC's Student Counsellor Dr. John Simonaitis who says it happens all the time.

What happened was an entire class of undergraduates registered for the graduate section of History 735, History of Science, but no one caught the error at Fall registration and its repercussions are still being felt.

To make matters more confusing, not a single graduate student registered for the course, which was called History 229 under the old numbering system.

The mystery unraveled last week when it was discovered that Dr. William Hotchkiss, who teaches History of Science, turned in only 15 grades for a course that had nearly 40 students present for the final exam. Something wasn't kosher and Registrar Edwin D. Smith and Dr. Simonaitis put their heads together to find out what after students complained of missing grades.

History of Science, customarily taught as a liberal arts course in Syracuse University's History Department, used to be listed as History 132. When the unsuspecting undergraduates noticed the title of History 229, they logically assumed that since the title was the same, someone had erroneously changed the old as well as the new number. And they signed up.

Apparently, the checkers at the History Department station in registration were as confused as the students. Everyone who wanted to take it did and the only person who missed the first class was Prof. Hotchkiss, who had another class from 3 to 5 p.m. on Wednesdays. Besides, the shock might have been too much, even for as stalwart a man as Dr. Hotchkiss.

At that first session, a message arrived from the History Department: report Tuesday night at 7:30 p.m. in Room 207 Maxwell. Still no word that the night session was, indeed, the section the undergrads were looking for or that the night section was under University College administration. SU, for the first time in years, had decided not to list UC courses in the course schedule and that, of course, contributed to the confusion.

By the end of the first Tuesday session, the class and Dr. Hotchkiss had reached an understanding: he personally would re-register the 25 lost souls who signed up for the graduate course and would take care of the paperwork involved, including the preparation of tuition transfer receipts for the UC office.

Unfortunately, Dr. Hotchkiss, though he is a brilliant and a well-liked teacher, isn't much on paperwork. He forgot.

When Dr. Simonaitis was told what happened, he placed a quick phone call to Registrar Smith, who sent down the 25 missing tuition transfer slips and grade cards, which were sent on in turn to Dr. Hotchkiss. When we last looked, all the grades had not been accounted for, two months later.

But Dr. Simonaitis and the Registrar must be commended for their concern and prompt, unified action in a tricky and sticky situation.

They handle this stuff all the time? Perhaps it does happen every spring, but maybe some springs have more bounce than others.

Letters to the editor

To the Editor:

In his recent public pronouncements, Chancellor Tolley has revealed his ideas of the nature of a university. In his speech to the Onondaga County Bar Association, the Chancellor appeared to view the university as a large family which would prosper in peace if only the children would "mind" their benevolent, omniscient, great white father. He attributed the breakdown in family discipline to the misbehavior of some of the older bad kids who were egging the younger kids on to mischief.

In his more recent statement to the Syracuse Herald--American, Chancellor Tolley appears to view the university as an army in which the commander-in-chief is threatened by the betrayal of his junior officers who lead the enlisted men into mutiny.

Both of these views are models of autocratic organizations. It is dismaying to find that the Chancellor misses the point of student demands. It is the university as an autocracy that they are attacking. These "wonderful" children think that they are old enough to more actively determine what is good for themselves, without being scolded or punished for "shaking the boat."

The head of a university is neither a father nor a commanding officer and neither the faculty nor the students are obliged to act in a manner that will protect his job.

To the Editor:

On behalf of the International Student Organization I wish to thank you for the excellent coverage your newspaper gave to International Week, March 1-9.

Your story on [illegible]donesian Ambassador to the UN was especially good, and he was so pleased with it that he took a few copies on with him to the University of Buffalo and back to the UN.

We feel that this has been a very sucessful International Week, with many people attending all of the events, due, in part, to your excellent coverage.

Thank you very much.

Urban planning: little-known program

By CAROL WAGEMAKER

Housed in the basement of the Administration Building the graduate program of urban planning remains unkown to most students on campus.

Founded in 1960, Syracuse's urban planning program is relatively new among the 45 programs in schools throughout the country.

SU's planning program operates under the advisorship of a committee on graduate programs. This interdisciplinary committee is composed of representatives from different areas of study.

About 25 students are enrolled in the two year program, which is closely associated with the School of Architecture and the Maxwell School.

Dr. Robert J. Bartels, chairman of the committee on the planning program explains that the program's unique position helps attract a few students away from the more established urban planning schools.

"The association with Maxwell probably attracts some students who chose Syracuse over Cornell or MIT," said Bartels.

Although the University considers the urban planning program a part of the architectural school in funding, very few of the students have a bachelor's degree in architecture. Instead, they have degrees in political science, economics, engineering, psychology and social science.

Working towards a master's degree in planning, students must complete 60 credit hours. Among the courses given are: principles of municipal planning, principles of regional planning, land use control and problems of metropolitan areas.

The students also work on practical problems, under the advisorship of Dr. Julio San Jose, an associate professor in planning.

According to San Jose, the first year students study processes, learning how to define urban problems and how to go about solving them. Second year students organize their own programs in areas they would like to study.

San Jose makes it clear that he only advises; "Students completely organize their own programs. Sometimes they ask for my help and sometimes they don't."

Last year students in the program were asked to submit a plan for Utica's central business district. Students surveyed the city's existing businesses, economic and social conditions, and then recommended a course of action.

Says Bartels, "The plan was very well received and many of the students working on the plan were given job offers."

This year the second year students are working on a model cities program for Syracuse.

Bartels feels that more money for fellowships is necessary to encourage students. The University has no urban planning fellowships.

Bartels also would like to see the program given more formal status in the school. He says, "At present there is much discussion over whether it should be in the Maxwell School, the Architectural School or on its own somewhere in between."

Carl Stephani is the only research assistant in the program. After attending the University of California, the University of New Mexico, Columbia and Georgetown, he received a degree in social science from Berkeley.

Stephani says that he would like to see the program as a separate department, but to do this it would be necessary to get more money from foundations to attract more students to Syracuse.

Stephani is involved in two major areas of research. The first concerns city government's power to determine that houses and factories be built where utilities are available.

CITY PLANNER OF TOMORROW: a graduate student in SU's urban planning program is shown working out plans for a well-designed, pleasant city of the future. (Photo by Forgham)

The other problem he deals with is whether ghetto dwellers should be dispersed throughout the city or moved to the suburbs.

Of Syracuse's greatly scattered facilities Stephani says, "If you spend an evening in Syracuse, you do not spend it in Syracuse, but in a car. I want to make a city you can spend an evening in."

Peter White received a bachelor's degree in political science from Providence College. After graduating he worked in urban planning for almost four years, but felt most planners failed to look at the whole city and concentrated on projects financed by federal funds.

With only about a third of the students receiving financial aid, many of them really have to struggle to complete the program. But it's all worthwhile, for, according to Bartels, Syracuse's planners are in great demand. He feels that city governments, county governments and even the federal government desperately need planners--"People with a master's degree in planning may start at a salary as high as $9,000."

'The Open Door'

An independent sorority

By TRISH MURRAY

Syracuse University dormitories are not noted for their warm and friendly atmosphere, but Charles Cottage is far removed from the typical SU dorm.

A bright orange front door opens into a comfortable and carefully decorated living room, several cuts above the usual drab cottage mismatch. The aroma of coffee and brownies baking floats through the house.

One resident called TOD House "a sort of cross between a sorority and a cottage. We're unified because of shared experiences, but we respect the separate lives and attitudes of individuals."

Within the group, differences are resolved by direct confrontation and frank discussion. Bi-weekly house meetings become lengthy philosophic discussions of the aims of communal living.

In previous years, the girls have joined in a single philanthropy, working last year at Elmcrest Children's Center. They have since decided that collective participation violates personal rights, but most still do volunteer work.

Members attend church services of a different denomination each weekend, then invite people from the congregation home with them to discuss religious beliefs. For the "Chanamus Party" in December, one living room is set up with a Chanukah menorah, the other with a Christmas tree, and holiday customes of both faiths are observed.

Besides the nightly open-house policy, contacts with the rest of the university community are maintained with student- faculty sherry hours and wine and cheese parties.

TOD House had its beginnings three years ago, when the sisters of Delta Pi sorority decided it would be impossible to achieve their ideals of "truth and understanding through tolerance," "need for individuality and responsibility," and "knowledge through group experience" as a part of the greek system. They disbanded as a sorority and re-formed into TOD House.

New members are still accepted only by invitation, issued to girls who in informal discussions seem compatible with the aims of the house. A membership fee, which varies from about 10 to 35 dollars per semester, pays for the considerable number of parties, banquets and social events held each year.

Unfortunately, the cottage at 400 Walnut Place is one of three which must be razed this spring to make way for library construction. The group will be split up as residents are moved to vacancies in other living centers.

Unlike many episodes of cottage closing, however, Charles' story has a happy ending. The girls have been promised dorm space to continue their unique living experiment next year, probably in Berwald Cottage on College Place. They are already planning to open the door to foreign students, especially those with language difficulties, who might benefit from the friendly cooperation of TOD House.

Professors will scrutinize students' revolt movement

The Faculty Forum, a discussion series sponsored by the freshman class and involving faculty members, students, and administrators, will hold its first program Thursday night at 8 p.m., a discussion of student revolutionary movement by Dr. David Bennett of the Maxwell School and Professor Dale Tussing of the Economics Department.

The Forum, conceived by freshman class president Bob Tembeckjian and Phillip Woodruff, is an effort to make SU students aware of opinions of members of the University community on various topical issues, and to involve them in informative discussion.

"The value of the forum is that it is getting students interested in academic discussion and debate. It gives them a chance to become more familiar with SU faculty members. And maybe they can learn something from it," Tembeckjian said.

The Forum officials have sent letters to other universities in the area, encouraging them to set up similar programs at their schools. Tembeckjian hopes this effort will lead to exchange programs between SU and other institutions involving faculty and administration speakers.

Each participant in the first Forum will be given 30 minutes to speak, and will then mutually discuss the issues aired, entertaining questions from the audience.

Four more Faculty Forum sessions are tentatively planned for this semester.

Meeting tonight

Commuters' missing allies

By COREY SANDLER

Every day, some twenty-five commuting students relax between classes in a comfortable lounge equipped with a television set, radio, and kitchen. Commuting Students Association officers Bonnie Urciuoli and Nancy Trojnar want to know where the 575 other commuters are.

To find out, they've called a special meeting for 7 p.m. today in the Alumni Lounge of the Women's Building. All commuting students have been invited.

SU's only student union, the CSA lounge, is located in 309 Women's Building. Members of the Association are invited to use the kitchen facilities, study, listen to music, or merely pass the time between classes at the lounge, which is open all day.

"A lot of students, who live off-campus, especially freshmen, are forced to wander around between classes or settle for HBC or the Chapel basement," said President Urciuoli. "It seems that most commuters don't know we exist."

The group receives no money from the University. Funds for furnishing the lounge and for stocking the kitchen come from member's dues ($1.50 a year) and from fund-raising activities. A bake sale is planned for the near future.

6 jobs in 6 years is called job hopping?

Not necessarily.
Not at Du Pont.

We have a practice called "planned mobility," a kind of intramural job hopping. It means you don't go into a training program. You go to work—at different growth jobs that broaden you professionally, benefit you personally, and help you find the specific field you want to grow in. Here's how it worked for Jim Davis, an M.E. from the University of Pittsburgh:

"My first assignment was installation of improved polymer transfer systems," says Jim. "Then some research. A patent was issued on my device to apply steam to a running threadline. Next I was a college recruiter. After that I worked on a five-year forecast of the company's engineering needs. Now I'm in a cost reduction group."

For Jim, it added up to six assignments in six years. This may be some kind of a record. But he didn't waste time. Every day of it was solid profit.

Your Du Pont recruiter is a guy a lot like Jim. Ask him about planned mobility. Ask him anything. The coupon will get you some background information before you meet him.

Regent's 'Hatful' deals with drugs

The situation of drugs in college environments was one of the reasons which prompted student director Serhij Bohdan to direct "A Hatful of Rain." The play, which will be showing at the Regent Experimental Theatre March 13-15, deals with the aspects of a drug addict's attempts to communicate his plight.

The play started out as an improvisation at the Actor's Studio, but when author Michael Gazzo realized the potential of his theme, he expanded it into a play. It has since been made into a movie, and last year a T.V. special.

Cast in the role of the addict is John Neville. Veteran student actors Howard Roller and James Malarsky portray his father and brother respectively. Delores DonVito, who starred with the SU Touring Co. this summer, rounds out the Pope family as Johnny's wife.

The other characters are Mother - William Fioravanti; Apples - Ron Nolland; Chuch - Steve Pimsler; and Putski - Cornelia Ownes.

Serhij Bohdan has starred in numerous University productions, including Captive at Large, Only When I Laugh, and Blood Wedding. This is the second play he is directing, the other being a convocation production of The Fourposter.

Tickets may be reserved by calling the Regent Theatre box office, X-3275.

WAER presents radio play

WAER is looking for anyone interested in writing, directing or acting in 50-minute radio plays to be presented sometime before the end of the semester on the Radio Drama Development Project program Sundays at 9 p.m.

Presently, the program consists of taped radio plays produced by the WSBH Radio Drama Development Project in Boston. Now WAER wants to recruit local talent.

"If there is a good response, we might be able to augment the project next year with the emphasis being placed on radio plays written and produced at Syracuse University," said Morris Vishner, producer of the WAER program.

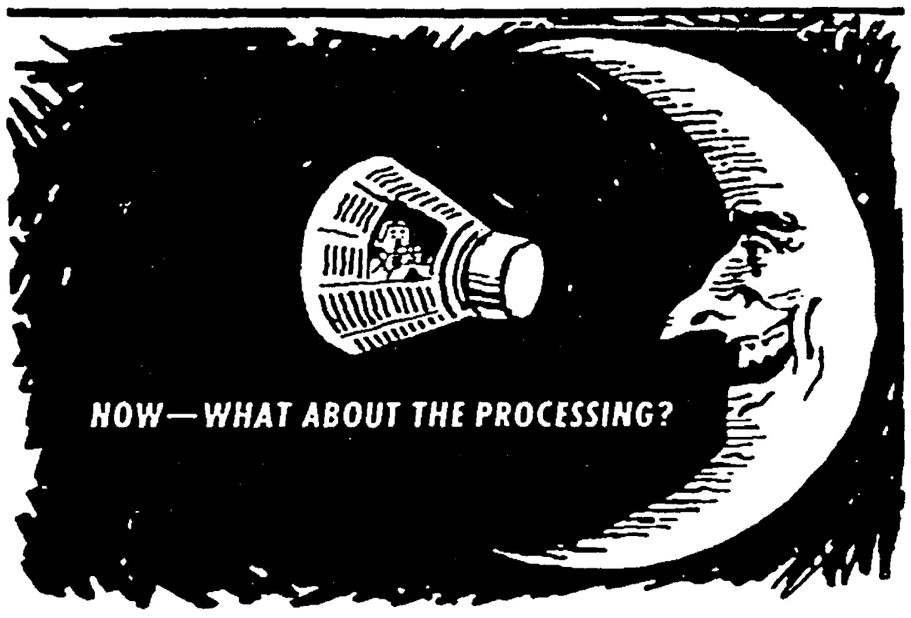
Academic forum

Students to air gripes today

The demand for an informal forum concerning campus problems will be met tonight at "The Academic Happening," at St. Mary's Dorm, beginning at 10 p.m. and lasting as long as participants like.

Mark Snyder, chairman of the happening, defines the purpose of the even to be: "To promote better understanding between the students and faculty by discussing the social and academic problems at SU."

The Student Government-sponsored program will begin with speeches, by certain faculty members and SG President Chuck Hicks, who will outline student dissatisfaction and plans for change.



An informal structure will be maintained, participants splitting-up into discussion groups.

"I want students to really come out and get into this thing," Hicks emphasized. Stressing the fact that all topics of discussion are up to the participants, Hicks suggested that students should feel free to stimulate discussion on any area related to campus life. He also urged students to bring anything from poetry to folk music with them. "I really want them to get involved," Hicks said.

"We're trying to get the whole campus involved and perhaps have programs of this sort frequently." Snyder said, "It's all up to the students and faculty members who participate." Among the members of faculty participating will be Professors Sawyer, Owens, Willie and Baharati. The rest is up to the students themselves.

PFP meets

Peace and Freedom Party is holding a special meeting tonight to discuss a demand that SU VP Bartlett hold an all-campus public meeting on the loss of scholarship bill before the State Assembly and to plan further actions to show campus opposition to this bill. All interested come to HL 207 at 8:00.

Judges set for oratory competition

The White-Denison public speaking competition will be judged this year by professors from the various disciplines.

Dr. Michael O. Sawyer of the political science department, professor of Constitutional Law, has agreed to take part. He expressed his belief that the ability to speak in public is an important attribute, and he feels that all participating students should try for first prize. Dr. Clyde Hardin of the philosophy department echoed Dr. Sawyer's sentiments. This is the first time that either of the two departments has been represented on the judging panel. The third judge will be Dr. C.D. Smith, professor of public address, who brings long experience and expertise in speaking to the competition.

Paul F. Stavis, president of Delta Sigma Rho, which is sponsoring the competition, indicated that all seniors at the University are eligible to participate. This classification includes first year law students who are in their fourth year at Syracuse. In order to participate, students must fill out an application form and submit it to 200 HL by Friday, March 21.

Speeches may be on any topic of the student's choosing, and must be from seven to ten minutes in length. The competition will be held in the Maxwell Founder's Room at 8 p.m. on Wednesday, March 26. First prize is $125. The public is welcome to attend.

WAER

The sounds of the New Musicals of this year will be presented Thursday evening at 6 p.m. on WAER. Jason Squire will host "Hollywood Soundstage" for an hour and twenty minutes of music from films including Finians's Rainbow, Chitty Chitty Bang Bang and Funny Girl.

"Hollywood Soundstage" is the only program in Syracuse devoted exclusively to the presentation of original soundtracks from movies.

Students to spend summer in Africa

Four Syracuse University students will travel to Africa this summer as participants in Operation Crossroads Africa. They are Elaine Tyo, a senior in the College of Liberal Arts; Scott Severance, a senior dually enrolled in the College of Liberal Arts and the School of Architecture; Nadine Walker, a freshman in the College of Liberal Arts; and Cyril Hromnik, a graduate student in East African Studies from Czechslovakia.

Operation Crossroads Africa is a private, volunteer organization founded in 1957 by the Rev. James Robinson, Presbyterian minister and founder-director of Harlem Morningside Community Center. Crossroads is a self-help project in which Canadian, American and African students work together building schools, clinics, roads and market places. In 10 years, Syracuse University has sent 14 students to 14 different African countries.

"Everyone has told me it's going to be a real dirt-under-the-fingernails experience," said Miss Tyo. As a Crossroader, she will be returning to Africa for the second time. She lived in Nigeria with her parents when her father, now an associate professor at the University School of Education and supervisor of motion picture production, was with the United States Agency for International Development. Miss Tyo, who studied at a Paris high school and at the University of Munich, plans to make African Studies a career.

Severance has also studied in Europe. He attended Burocentre in Lausanne, Switzerland. At Syracuse Severance is active in student organizations. He is chairman of the Hendricks Chapel Board, a youth worker at the Onondaga Indian Reservation and is a member of the Chapel Choir.

"I applied to Crossroads for numerous reasons," Miss Walker said, "but I guess the main reason is that I hope to discover more about my African heritage." Miss Walker, an active member of the Student Afro-American Society, will spend the summer in Kenya.

Miss Tyo has been assigned to the Ivory Coast and Hromnik to the Congo. Severance has not yet received a country assignment.

How to make a pass on skis.

Remember: when you overtake and pass another skier, the responsibility of avoiding a collision rests with you. Shouting "Track!" is a poor warning. It alerts the skier in front of you, but gives him no course of action to follow.

The safest method is to call out instructions that leave no room for mistakes. A clear command like "Stay as you are: I'm passing on your left (or right)" eliminates confusion and prevents accidents.

When you're skiing, a little courtesy will go a long way. It'll see you safely to the bottom of the slope

A fan of the cloth

Father Charles leads 'commuter rooters'

By BOB GALLAGHER

By actually joining the Detroit Lions professional football team as a quarterback, author George Plimpton personified the Walter Mitty-type dreams of the athletic sports fan. But who is the hero of the non-participant fan?

Reverend Charles Borgognoni, Chaplain of Saint Thomas More Chapel and dropout quarterback of his neighborhood football team, is a keen observer of SU sports. He is the Plimpton of those fans including alumni and old-timers called "commuter rooters." Their interest in sports is maintained by what they read and hear on the way to work and not by a desire to take an active part in athletics.

Father Charles believes sports provide a valuable foundation for living in society. He said, "Sports mirror life because rules for fair play in sports are also necessary in society. If they aren't problems will result." He also mentioned that the self-discipline of sports is excellent training for life.

Athletics are a good teacher according to Father Charles. "Sports give an athlete a goal which is something everyone needs," he said. "They teach co-operation with others which is needed throughout life."

Father Charles thinks that what ultimately wins the contest is the dedication and spirit a team possesses. "Since talent in college is usually pretty equal, spirit is the key to success," he said. He defines the intangible spirit as "wanting it" and agrees with coach Vince Lombardi who says, "Every time a football player goes out to ply his trade he's got to play from the ground up---from the soles of his feet right up to his head. Every inch of him has to play."

"To see a combination of talent and spirit in a team or ballplayer is tremendously fulfilling," Father Charles said. "I like seeing guys pulling together and giving 100% to win," he concluded.

The asspciaiton between Father Charles and the football team began in the fall of 1963 when he went to coach Schwartzwalder before the Notre Dame game and asked him if he could sit on the bench. Schwartzwalder said yes and he has been on the sidelines for all the games since then. He also goes to practice and makes himself available if they need or want him.

Father just doesn't go along for the fun. He also performs a function for the team before the game. "I give them a brief pep talk and then we say The Lord's Prayer that no one will be hurt when they take the field," he said. "We feel," he continued, "if nothing is bothering your mind, you will think football and be able to produce."

By seeing both the home and the away games, Father Charles has some definite ideas about the home team advantage. He said, "I think playing at home is a definite advantage for the home team and gives them at least a touchdown edge." He concluded, "the fans at Baylor and Penn State make noise incessantly which can be very demoralizing."

Father feels close to all the players but has a few in particular whom he thought were outstanding. "I liked Little, Csonka and Cassata not only because they were great players but also because they were great men." Father is quite definite about what he considers the best game. "UCLA last year was the greatest game. In it, Cassata made UCLA quarterback and Heisman trophy winner, Gary Beban, look like a high school player," he said.

The SU basketball team is also of great interest to Father. "We had a good basketball team this year," he said. "They had a lot going against them, losing important men like Ernie Austin, Bob McDaniel and Wayne Ward, plus a new coach in Roy Danforth. Yet, the kids kept fighting and played their hearts out. I expect great things from the team in the next few years," he added.

"I feel my association with the team is a great privilege and even though I'm not an alum, I have grown to love the team as much as anyone who loves Bill Orange," Father said in summing up his feelings toward the team. His unique association makes him one of the kings of the "commuter rooters."

FATHER CHARLES BORGOGNONI, chaplain and number one fan of SU athletic teams, puts himself in the thick of action during a 1968 football game. A beanie, a loud voice and unwavering enthusiasm characterizes this lover of sports.

Howard is driving force behind SU Intramurals

By JEFF POSSNER
and
RANDY ZIEBERT

For the past twenty-seven years, thousands of students have participated in the Syracuse University Intramural Program. This program is designed to allow for interested students, with average physical capabilities, a time, place and facilities, to participate in organized sporting activities. Since 1942, Milton Howard has made certain, through his incessant efforts, that the intramural program continues to run smoothly.

Since his arrival on the Hill, Howard has been responsible for many changes in the program. When he first began his tenure, all the intramural activities were played in the afternoon. As the university began to schedule more and more afternoon classes, it became necessary for Howard to shift intramurals to the evening.

One of Howard's proudest accomplishments is that since his tenure at Syracuse, he has seen the intramural program double in size, to the point where it now encompasses more than four thousand students.

The intramural program has a variety of twenty-five different activities, giving each student a chance to participate in his favorite sport. These activities range from the conventional land sports, such as baseball and basketball, to the more aquatic sports such as splasketball. Howard tries to initiate new activities every chance he can. Since he's been here, he has been responsible for the introduction of many new games, like table tennis, and splasketball.

To organize, plan and coordinate each one of these twenty five activities, Howard must start working even before the school year begins. With the help of his graduate assistant, Raymond Streit, Howard prints up and distributes intramural program booklets to the intramural representatives of each participating fraternity and living center. These representatives choose which sports they want to enter, and submit a list to Howard. Once Howard gets these lists, he then begins the long laborious process of scheduling.

Howard gives much credit for the intramural program to the efforts of the Intramural Council. This council is composed of fourteen students, nine representing living centers, and five representing fraternities. Howard says, "The council is the backbone of the intramural program, and I am governed by what they decide."

Howard has been involved in the field of recreation and athletics all his life. In high school, he was a better than average high jumper, winning the New York State championships in 1923. He then went on to the University of Illinois, where he received his B.S. degree. From there he attended graduate school at Albany State.

In 1942, Howard came to Syracuse to head the intramural program. In addition, Howard teaches physical education majors, heads the swimming pool in the summer, and is in charge of the Ski Lodge.

Looking back on his life, Howard says that he has few regrets. He could have made more money doing something else, but he wouldn't have enjoyed it half as much.

One thing that irks Howard is that a school the size of Syracuse should have such poor recreational facilities. "The number of handball courts and basketball courts is less than adequate," says Howard.

Howard feels that intramurals play an integral part in a university. "After a week of hard studying, a student needs a place where he can unwind. Intramurals furnish such a place."

Talking about himself, Howard says, "I've been able to stay young by working with and for young people. When I was younger I participated in sports, now I make sure other people have the same opportunity."

Howard has had some fond remembrances. But after twenty seven years as intramural director, he feels that by 1970, he may be ready to retire. Hopefully, by then, Milton Howard will get the recognition he so richly deserves.

DIRECTOR OF INTRAMURALS, MILT HOWARD, sits at his desk in the men's gym. Howard has served in his present capacity for 27 years but feels that "working for and with young people has kept me feeling young." (Photo by Clemens)

Guy Roberts and Larry Zuller will compete in the NCAA track championships tomorrow and Saturday in Detroit. Zuller, coming off the second fastest mile he has ever run (4:11), and Roberts, who will run in the 440 or 600 yard event, will face the top collegiate competitors in the nation.

Meanwhile, the gymnastics and swimming teams will be entered in the Eastern Championships.

The gymnasts have three performers who could pick up some points for SU. George Stalter, only a sophomore, registered six firsts and two seconds in still ring competition during the regular season. In addition, Ernie Santangelo (floor exercise) and Harvey Silverstein (parallel bars) should turn in good efforts.

The swimmers, fresh from their drubbing of upper New York State teams, will enter 16 performers in what will be, by far, their sternest test of the year. Coach Jon Buzzard said, "If we can place among the top 10, we will have completed a most remarkable season."

We'd like your pleas, please

It is the goal of the Daily Orange sports department to not only print what informs the reader, but also to include articles tailored to specific audience interests.

To these ends we welcome any and all suggestions for bettering our existing coverage of SU athletics, as well as any ideas for additional features.

Among ideas in the planning stage is the creation of a weekly sports quiz.

If you have any comments, please address them to Mike Weber, Sports Editor, 1101 East Adams St., or call the office at extension 2129.

Impressions of a mass protest meeting

The revolution which didn't happen

It's 3:30 a.m. Thursday morning and this is being written after sitting in two meetings from 8 p.m. until 12:14 a.m. I'm actually afraid to go to sleep for fear--not of the revolution--but that I'll forget what has happened to this University in the past seven hours.

It's a shame the campus-wide meeting took place as late as it did but that is not the point. The facts are that students don't really care if you raise tuition--just give them something they can say is worth the increase. Either a student union building or some say in the policy and decision-making bodies of the University will satsify them. At the second meeting some of the students would have followed Chuck Hicks, president of Student Government, to the ends of the earth if he had said the time for the revolution was then--but he didn't.

Whether or not the group in Grant Auditorium represented the student body of Syracuse University can't be judged. There were many student leaders and there were students who wanted to know what was going on. Some of the latter voices were quite vocal. They seemed concerned there is no student union building and not too much hope for one in the near future.

Then it was time for the Student Committee to Select a Chancellor to give a report. Some students were willing to use the committee's complaints as the reason for a revolution. But the majority weren't. They came to some sort of an understanding--if you call it that--to invite the new man to come here to meet with students so they can judge for themselves what he is like.

That's all well and good--it's constructive and shows someone there was thinking, not just screaming. Some of the students on the committee continued to say they aren't objecting to the choice as much as to the process by which he was chosen. It is the process which reflects directly upon the power structure of the University and the real role students play.

Some participants in the meeting were still looking for a revolution for that very night. Jeff Portnoy, SG vice-president, (who was not looking for a revolution) suggested the residents of Flint and DellPlain exchange dorms. That would result in parietal hours. Someone said "Let's do it tonight," and Portnoy replied "Why tonight?" He knew it would fail with the small number of people who were willing to move at that time and he suggested they plan something rather than move on the spur of the moment.

Why does a revolution have to come in one night after one meeting? Why does it have to come at all? Ken Ritzenberg, who served on the Student Committee to Select a Chancellor, kept saying there were many issues. He seemed less radical during the meeting than he normally is and wanted the students to find an issue to revolt on if they were going to do anything. He was unsuccessful because no one could find a real reason for a revolution.

I could see several factions forming. There were those who were really interested in why we have no student union building. This group was seated in the same area and did not necessarily represent the feelings of students who were not at the meeting.

During the meeting I decided that people who do not attend the University should not be allowed to speak at mass meetings. They can attend but they should remain silent. I'm not against the peace groups which I believe were there but they have nothing at stake as far as the University goes. They're not students so they don't care what the results are if there is a revolution. They also didn't seem to care who does what or what the cause is.

By this time it was about 11:15 p.m. and a good portion of the students had left the meeting. Those who I saw leaving were mumbling to their friends that nothing was accomplished. They were disgusted with the whole procedure and weren't really interested in the topics or the idea of a revolution. How many students on campus do they represent? I'd say quite a few.

It appears quite obvious to me that there is a group of students who want a revolution because that's the thing to do on college campuses. They don't care what the issue is or what others feel is important. They don't want to know why they are revolting (and they are to me) and they don't seem to want to know.

Going back over some things: At first it appeared as though the union building was the most important thing to an "average" student. The student leaders missed their golden opportunity. I feel the general student population would join a revolution for a union building. They really want one and they don't like the runaround they have been getting.

They care who the new chancellor is but are more concerned that their fellow students said they didn't receive a fair deal on the selection committee. They want to meet trustees and find out what they think and how they act.

The students want to get some of the power of the University. There are some pressing issues at this time which could very easily result in a revolution at Syracuse. The fact that students have no power or real influence on the policy-making committees seems to be one of the issues.

Before the student at Syracuse can become involved in a revolt or whatever develops, he must learn about the University and he's not going to be able to do that by sitting in his room. What would some of the students at that meeting have done with more power? They want to have a revolution or something but at that meeting there weren't enough people who cared about the same topic to be able to stage one. And that's a shame because there are enough issues at hand to unite the students on this campus who at this time really have nothing in common.

There certainly doesn't have to be revolution because there are other ways of solving the things which are wrong. Above all, I hope there won't be a revolution just for the sake of keeping up with other universities across the country.

Letters to the editor

Unlawful acts

To the Editor:

The following letter was sent to Dr. Bartlett on March 6.

Dr. Kenneth G. Bartlett
Vice President and Dean of Public Affairs
207 Administration Building
Syracuse University
Syracuse, New York

Dear Dr. Bartlett:

The Executive Committee of the Syracuse Chapter AAUP has instructed me to communicate to you our opposition to pending legislation to revoke financial aid to University students convicted of unlawful acts committed on University property. Because of dangers to freedom of expression and the right to dissent implicit in such legislation, this sort of remedy to campus unrest does more harm than good. It should be opposed in favor of solutions more in keeping with American traditions of freedom of expression.

Nahmin Horwitz
President, Syracuse Chapter AAUP

Impressions

To the Editor:

The recent article on the "Impressions of Italy Semester" (DO, "Perspective and Close-Up," March 7) contains several misleading generalizations and distortions. One of the more disturbing inaccuracies was expressed in a statement by Susan Voelker concerning the Italian educational system. She stated: "The universities in Italy are run by the government and that gives them a lot of problems. Only the upper class people get to go to college. The lower and middle class people can't afford it. And the government just doesn't have enough financial aid."

The truth of the matter is that Italy has 40 universities with a total enrollment of 425,000 students. It would be naive to assume that most of these students come from upper class families. All but two of the universities are controlled by the state and strive to maintain homogeneous educational standards. Therefore, Italian students attending college are free to enroll at any institution and pay no tuition; the only financial cost involved, other than books, is a nominal fee for registration and final examinations amounting to $125 per school year. Consequently, the cost of a college education falls well within the means of lower and middle class families. Indeed, the vast majority of university students belongs to this income bracket.

Augustus Pallotta
Dept. of Romance Lang.

Change

To the Editor:

It is very frustrating being a student at Syracuse University who actively wants change of policy and power structure. Daily one reads about the changes going on at other schools, but here at SU things just keep going as they were, or when changes do come they arrive at a snail's pace.

It becomes even more frustrating when one realizes that reform can come anytime students desire it, if they will collectively assume the power that is inherently theirs. This fact was illustrated this week by the actions of the architecture students. Using peaceful mass boycott, they showed the administration that their complaints must be considered, for a school can't operate without students.

The example of the architect students can be used to meet other problems. If coeducational dorms were the issue, it would only take action like that seen at Columbia last week to make the change. Recently, American University (ever heard of it?) students were able to abolish their archaic grading system (like ours) with total pass-fail grading. Also they are trying to eliminate course requirements, all by the use of mass participation.

Now the question becomes, how will the students at Syracuse become aroused enough to exert their power.

It seems that first, students must understand that most anything reasonable can be theirs. And if they go about it in the right manner, no heads will be cracked. Peaceful, mass demonstration and boycott will do the trick.

Next, the students must be confronted with the issues. Each must understand what is happening on campus, what reforms can be made to archaic systems, and what reasons are being used to prevent change.

To this task the Daily Orange must apply itself. It has a duty to report more than just what occurred on campus in a given day. It must look for and report to the students what occurs behind the scenes. Ultimately much student opinion can be related to this paper. As many great American papers have done in the past, it must champion reform.

In all, there is no reason that students at Syracuse should gripe about the rules and policies the administration invokes, socially or scholastically, unless they have honestly made an attempt to use the power that is at their disposal. Let's use it.

Students, faculty talk things out at 'Happening'

By MITCH LANE

St. Mary's men's dormitory council last night unanimously recommended dorm autonomy for referendum on Monday. Residents feel the measure will pass easily.

Autonomy for the dorm will mean 24-hour visiting hours, free use of alcohol in the rooms and complete control of the social, cultural and academic activities.

Apparently unconcerned by possible administration opposition, St. Mary's dorm council president Ed Barron said that residents brought up on charges by a representative of the administration, such as an RA, would face such charges in a dorm court.

John Meligeni, chief justice of St. Mary's dorm court, stated that "Dorm court will follow regulations set up by the dorm council."

Chuck Hicks, president of Student Government (SG) asked about his reaction to St. Mary's action replied "Great; if a dorm decided to do it, that's the way you do it. You don't wait for the entire student body. You just do it. And we're going to do it."

Also at St. Mary's last night an Academic Happening occurred in the multi-purpose room of the complex. What started out as a slow moving, irrelevant, shouting match reminescent of the town meeting the night before, turned into an occasion where students and faculty could get together and talk about any subject that interested them.

Mark Snyder, coordinator of the happening, explained that the meeting was unstructured so that students could "discover for themselves what they wanted to do."

What the students wanted to do was unique. Long-haired radicals exchanged ideas with crew-cut ROTC cadets. One student commented "SDS and PFP talked to super-straight students. This has never happened before."

Another satisfied student said "It's about time something started happening around here. It gives me a chance to meet and talk to people I can't usually meet. You know, Sawyer would never go to the Orange."

Still later, some people wandered into the dorm library and started looking through books as if they hadn't seen one in several years and the spirit of learning had just kindled their curiosity.

Learning was everywhere. Faculty members entered into small and large discussions on subjects such as personal fears, campus revolutions, selection of the chancellor, the draft, etc.

"If we only had a union building, it would be like this all the time," another student said.

The symposium featured a cast of three faculty members and two students playing to an audience consisting largely of disenfranchised architecture students. The cast had a lot to say about what was and what could be.

After the five scholarly dissertations were rendered serious business was at hand. Student and faculty compared life at Syracuse to one's colon. They furthered the analogy describing what went in, what happened inside and what came out.

Those brave enough went to the town meeting in Grant Auditorium immediately afterwards.

There students were treated to a shouting match between as many as four or five dissident groups largely interested in furthering their own causes. The meeting was puncutated by outbursts between student leaders, alleged student leaders, students and non-students.

Jeff Portnoy, vice-president of Student Government, suggested an easy solution to the pariental hours situation, have the residents of Flint move to DellPlain and the residents of DellPlain move to Flint. He felt that this could go on as long as necessary to achieve administration compliance.

The Happening concluded a sorry week of campus affairs. With low points being the faculty symposium and the town meeting neither affair generated the enthusiasm organizers hoped for.

EDITOR'S NOTE: in yesterday's Daily Orange the front-page story entitled "Controversy--Symposium debates campus issues" contained a statement, incorrectly attributed to Professor Eric Lawson, which expressed the viewpoint that "the university was like a family."

Professor Lawson, in fact, finds any such characterization of the university "repugnant". His actual viewpoint is that the faculty carries on the most important business of the university and should have powers appropriate to that role and that similiarly, students have certain responsibilities and should have powers appropriate to their role.

The story itself was incorrectly attributed to Daily Orange reporter Mitch Lane.

DAVE VAN RONK will be presented in a concert sponsored by the Syracuse Folk Society next Saturday, March 22, at 8:30 p.m. in Crouse College Auditorium here. Tickets will be on sale in HBC Cloakroom between March 17 and 21 for $2. At the concert, they will cost $2.25.

Folk group plans Van Ronk concert

The Syracuse Folk Society's fourth concert, Saturday evening, March 22, will feature Dave Van Ronk at Crouse College Auditorium. Tickets go on sale next Monday at HBC.

Van Ronk is one of the best known of the folk revival artists, producing nine records in as many years.

A city dweller whose entrance into the folk scene was somewhat belated, Van Ronk spent his early days as a merchant seaman, later holding various jobs, including the enviable position as an eyedot painter in a Mickey Mouse factory. He learned to sing the blues from old records, and encouraged as he went along, he soon started to develop a large following.

He gained early attention for being one of the first white city singers to do the blues of the rural black. His close interpretation of the music brought it to audiences that might not have heard it otherwise. After having cut three albums, Van Ronk started to expand his material, doing one album with a Dixieland Jazz Band one with a jug band, and one with no blues songs at all.

With the rediscovery of several famous country blues singers, who Van Ronk felt did the blues better than himself, he started to turn even further away from strict blues recording, branching into contemporary music, from that of Leonard Cohen, and Joni Mitchell, to that of Kurt Weill, bringing all these different elements into his performing repetoire.

Once best known for his rendition of "Cocaine Blues," Van Ronk has of late shifted attention to his version of "Both Sides Now" which he renamed "Clouds." As with many other songs, the words have been obscured by good arrangements in its many different recorded versions. Van Ronk has taken the strong emotional power that is his from his blues background, giving the song both beauty and strength, and turning it into a performance that has gained underground recognition as the best version going.

By bringing his emotional force into his singing, Van Ronk has been able to bring across the material he uses in a way common to no other performer. Coming here from a past that has made him a special figure in contemporary music, Van Ronk will combine his instrumental ability on guitar, his dry sense of humor, carefully chosen material, and his talent for giving a good performance that combines the qualities of entertainment and truly honest communication, as he appears here next week for the Syracuse Folk Society.

'Hatful' plot 'abounds with confrontations'

By HOWIE MANDEL

The Drama Department's production of Michael Gazzo's "A Hatful of Rain" is a basically effective studio production, marred by a few uneven performances while highlighted by some truly fine acting. Neither the problems of the play nor its successes can be attributed wholly to the actors, however; the 1955 script contains inherent power and several flaws.

At times it seems that a company would have to work harder to present a bad "Hatful" than a good one. Dealing with a marriage about to break up, a pregnant wife's near-relations with her deserving brother-in-law, and an irresponsible father as well as that most frequent topic of student interest, drugs, the show can hardly keep from touching its audience's nerves. Director Serhij Bohdan has solved most of the problems of integrating highly emotional scenes with those necessary to further the story; there is a conscious effort to build up to the highly charged confrontations with which the plot abounds, although the anticlimaxes are not very credible.

To an extent, this is a difficulty with the material, which calls for John Neville, as addict Johnny Pope, to be strung out one moment, and in the next scene to deal with his wife completely naturally. But the incredibility is added to by the unevenness of Neville's performance. At one point, Delores Don Vito, as Johnny's wife, tells him he looks "like Mickey Rooney about to leave Boy's Town for the last time." That is exactly the problem. A junkie shouldn't look sheepish on his way to meet a connection. Neville is good in the heat of argument, and amazingly effective portraying withdrawal symptoms; one is astonished when he walks on for his curtain call, and he certainly deserves applause for his last scene, which obscures the melodramatics of his nostalgic speeches.

James Malarsky has been handed a choice part as Johnny's brother Polo. He has a great drunk entrance, and is able to sustain a character of affability and moral dilemma with considerable success. The audience is with him from the outset, of course; from the first scene they understand he has been neglected by his father in favor of his brother. But Polo's relationship to all the other characters is much more complex than Johnny's, and Malarsky does an admirable job in scenes with the hoods, Johnny, his father, and his sister-in-law.

Miss Don Vito is too arch in a role that calls for a certain idiomatic chattiness. Her dialogue is sprinkled with film allusions and references to her work, but they seem incongruous. Her interpretation exudes too much education, and not enough confusion to make her ambivalent feelings towards Johnny and Polo reasonable.

Howard Roller, as John Pope, Sr., lacks the range to distinguish between jocularity and reminiscence, irritation and outrage. As the pusher, Mother, William Floravanti doesn't have the sinister cool to make him truly threatening; there is more to relish in this role than he seems to find. Ron Nolland provides strong support as one of Mother's henchmen and is much stronger, a disconcerting fact when the power Mother exhibits over him is considered. Steve Pimsler is competent as the other hood, and Cornelia Owens provides some nice comic relief as the dumb brunette.

Bohdan has directed a good production; his work with the actors and stress on realism is apparent in the verbal confrontations which hold the play together. The set is not exactly intimate, but one can expect no more sitting in the steeply-angled Experimental Theater. There is some fine acting in this show, and the subject matter, though not particularly relevant to the college drug situation, provides enough excitement that "Hatful of Rain" deserves being recommended and being seen.

Elmira girls invite guys

A rare opportunity for lonely SU males will present itself between March 16 and 23 as Elmira State College will conduct its first "coed week."

The all-girls college has invited male students from several upstate colleges, including Syracuse, to visit for any length of time between those dates. Room and board will be provided by Elmira State, but transportation must be furnished by visitors.

Visitors may attend classes with their coed hostesses.

Elmira is located approximately 80 miles south of here.

Students wishing to participate in this experience must contact Chuck Hicks, ext. 3569, to register and obtain further details.

Candidates looking for nominations

Campus politicking begins with Sunday's conventions

By LARRY KRAMER
Campus Affairs Editor

Campus political activity will approach its yearly high point Sunday as all the major parties meet for the purpose of nominating candidates for the 34 Student Government Offices up for grabs April 17.

——The Campus Alliance Party (CAP) will convene at 9:30 a.m. at Drumlins.

——The Greek Independent Alliance, (GIA) will convene at 1 p.m. in the Physics Auditorium.

——Newcomers to the scene, the Prohibition Party will convene at 10 p.m. in Men's Co-op number one.

The Peace and Freedom party, running one candidate for senator-at-large, will not hold a convention. Another organization, Students Organized Against Parties (SOAP), has presented a slate for Student Government office.

Amy Trump, President of CAP, and Mark Rosenbaum, Executive Board Member of GIA were available for comment on the official declared candidates for their respective parties. Jay Abrams, presidential candidate on the SOAP slate, declared his candidacy.

Both CAP and GIA revealed that they each had only one officially announced candidate for the position of Student Government President. The CAP contender is Louis Jacobs, a junior who is a social member of Kappa Sigma. GIA leading contender is David Ifshin, a brother of Sigma Nu.

Jacobs, business manager of Maelstrom has served as Campus Affairs Editor of the Daily Orange, student senator, Editor of the Projection '70 Newspaper, and worked on the "Nixon Reception Committee."

Ifshin is the National Student Association campus coordinator at SU as well as chairman of the Undergraduate English Committee. He is the student delegate to the English Advisory Council of the Faculty Senate and was a street organizer in Chicago over the summer.

Abrams, SOAP's candidate, has served as Student Coordinator for Paul O'Dwyer, Student Senate Biafra Committee Chairman, and Representative on the Faculty Political Science Committee.

For the office of Senior Class President, CAP has only one announced candidate, Bob Gladdin, a member of Tau Epsilon Pi. Contending for the GIA nomination will be Ron Horwitz from Zeta Beta Tau, and Morgan Brown of Tau Kappa Epsilon.

In the junior class race, each party claims only one declared candidate. Vying for the CAP nod will be incumbent Lenny Conway. The GIA contender is Rod White of Tau Kappa Epsilon.

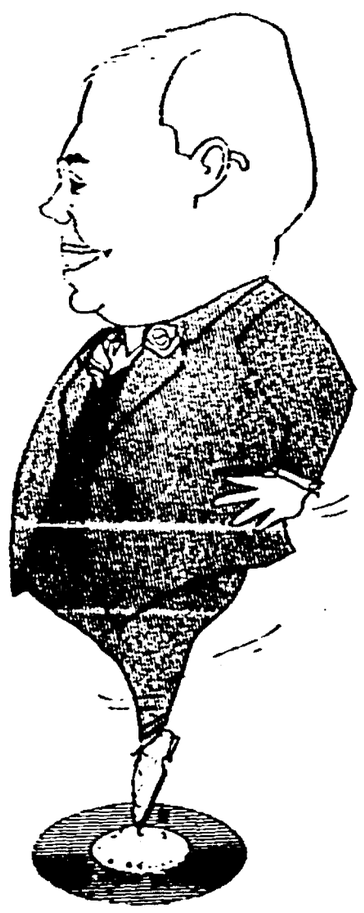
The sophomore class seems to be presenting the most competition. GIA leading contender is Matty Leibowitz, a Zeta Beta Tau pledge, CAP competitors and incumbent Bob Tembeckjian, and independent, and John Brewster, a pledge for Phi Gamma Delta. Howie Lippman a Phi Sigma Delta has also been mentioned as a contender in both parties.

Prohibition Party official Bob Vitello, said the Prohibition Party was an outgrowth of the "Student Committee to Elect Chancellor Tolley Student Government President."

Running?

Attention Potential Candidates:

The Elections Commission has extended the time limit for receiving petitions to 5 p.m. tonight. All petitions for Student Government or class office should contain the name of the individual, his extension, accumulative average, experience in Student Government or class government and his telephone extension.



The deadline for Senators-at-large has not been extended.

Anyone not meeting the qualifications as established by the Student Government Constitution will have to appear personally before the Elections Commission. You will be contacted personnally regarding the time and place.

'Nation can afford military reduction'

By LEW HOWELL

It would be very difficult to come up with an argument which one might call "rational" that would call for anything resembling a dismantling of the American military structure. Political science theorists, in fact, can present a good case for maintaining at least the present American military capability as a stabilizing factor in world politics, its existence alone being a stabilizer even though it may never be used.

As well thought out as a theory might be, however, it is very seldom that mathematical formulation remains convincing while more immediate and seemingly contradictory current events interject themselves between world politics and the individual citizen. And the latter now seems to be the case in the United States.

ABM balance

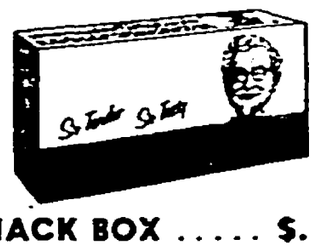
The "world power-balance" theory supposedly manifests itself in the current debates over the necessity of an anti-ballistic missile system. Theoretically the ABMS may provide the U.S. with innumerable benefits. More immediately, though, it seems more a part of a military spending spiral gone wild. We're already spending upwards of $80 billion per year in military costs. Expenses for the ABMS would add at least $7 billion to this, and some Senators have estimated the yearly output as much more.

In America, as is the case everywhere, money means power. $80 billion accounts for a very large chunk of power--power which can be used in many and various ways. It can be used to lobby for more money to be used for more and newer weapons, as in the case of the ABMS. It can be used to sentence peaceful but dissenting soldiers to 15 years in prison, as was the case recently in Presidio, California. It buys friends and coerces domestic enemies so that the military establishment can write "its own budgetary ticket" while the Senate committee trying to investigate hunger has to fight tooth and nail for $100,000.

Balance of Terror

We face a serious problem in dealing with that power. The difficulty is an intricate one since the world of the "balance of terror" is not about to go away. But there is a growing discontent with both increasing military intrusion and infringement in American society and with the neglect of the problems of poverty, urban decay, and racial discrimination.

But that discontent is not enough. The affluent, the suburbian and whites and blacks in unconflicting communities may be more concerned with the "threat" posed by the Russians and Chinese than with the military-caused neglect of domestic development.



Internal Inequalities

Thus, feelings about the military structure and its influence--and subsequently feelings about the ABMS--are predicated on one's contentment with the order of American society and not on a theory of military counter-balance. And any serious analysis of America's internal inequalities and injustices reveals that we are much closer to a domestic boiling point than we are to a major international confrontation.

A "community of scholars?"

Honors program

As is the case with the construction of any academic curriculum, it is inevitable that praise as well as slurs will be hurled against it. Ideally, the College of Liberal Arts Honors Program is geared to motivate and encourage intellectual stimulation and to provide a twenty-four hour, carefully integrated plan for academic, social and cultural pursuit. In reality, members of the program, tend to concentrate on its failures, perhaps in a sincere attempt to improve upon rather than condemn what may be the only structured attempt to take some of the "rah" out of SyRAHuse.

This section attempts to present an explanation of the program's curriculum and purpose but, more than that, an overall perspective of its successes and failures in the eyes of its coordinators and its members, some of whom have shared their views in the following pages.

SU honors curriculum: In, out or doubtful

By ROZ MAZER
Feature Editor

It is hard to come by an honor student who is completely satisfied with the quality of his education at Syracuse. Although the program offers special advantages in registration, housing, advising and curriculum, members of the program level complaints ranging from unchallenging courses to academic overload.

One of the few structured efforts at curriculum innovation at SU, the Honors Program evolved out of the Committee on Special Opportunities formed in 1962. Students complained to the Committee that they weren't given enough opportunity to meet people with similar interests and concerns.

In the minutes of the Committee's meeting in January 1962, it is noted that its purpose is "to pay attention to the ablest students in the college." By October, 1962, an Exploratory Report on honors was circulated recommending that the Honors Program be initiated here.

In October of 1963, a proposal was submitted to establish an Honors Program; it was passed by the University Senate in the spring of 1964. Formal inplementation of the program began with the 1964-65 academic year.

The Honors Program, in its present form, offers a coordinated course of study throughout four years of undergraduate education. Incoming freshman applications are scrutinized by members of the Honors Council on the basis of a series of objective criteria, including college board scores and percentile class rank. Eligible freshmen are chosen by a rotating faculty committee. A folder of the prospective honors students is read by three faculty members who score the student as in, out or doubtful. Depending upon the combination of scores, the student is accepted or rejected.

Dr. Clyde L. Hardin, an associate professor of philosophy, has assumed the directorship of the Honors Program this year. He feels that the program is necessary to fulfill the needs of the best performing students and is anxious to improve and expand upon the program's present structure.

Hardin is delighted with the housing arrangements made for honors students this year. In what must be a classic description, Hardin said, "The fact of the matter is that Watson and the Mount are incredible places to live. Everyone on campus knows this--knows that there's an undisciplined mob that rages through these places."

The St. Mary's complex houses 94 of the 130 freshmen men and women in the Honors Program, 38 sophomores and 20 juniors and seniors. The students are scattered in one-third concentration throughout the men's and women's dorms. In earlier years, when the honors student men were in DellPlain and the women in Shaw in fifty percent concentrations, the students independently petitioned the Honors Council and the Housing Office to continue that arrangement. Says Hardin, "honors students have made it clear under the previous willy-nilly housing arrangements, they didn't have a chance to meet like-minded people with intellectual interests. Most of the students are in St. Mary's this year. One of the results is

What's it all about?

A planned program for 'superior students'

By KAY CHRISTENSEN
Associate Editor

'Wny snould I enroll in the SU Honors Program?" queries a typical SU student. "Just what advantages will it give me for taking an extra load of work?"

The so-called advantages of the Honors Program here are debatable among students. The Honors Program, as stated in a bulletin, "is designed to provide special educational opportunities for those undergraduate students who show promise of genuine academic achievement and who give evidence of an ambition to develop their intellectual abilities to the fullest."

And just what are these special educational opportunities?" Generally, according to program coordinator Mrs. Lillian Kinney, here's a list of the claimed advantages of the Honors Program:

1. honors or advanced courses
2. honors seminars
3. advising system
4. registration procedures
5. extra credit hours
6. special academic needs
7. foreign study
8. recognition
9. housing choice

Honors courses

Students enrolled in the Honors Program must register in two honors or advanced courses each semester plus a one-hour seminar. These classes are usually smaller than ordinary University classes and are taught by senior faculty, according to Mrs. Kinney.

They are designed to be stimulating and challenging courses which delve into their subjects more than regular courses. Probably the best advantage of this idea is the exposure to senior faculty instead of suffering under the guidance of the unknown grad student.

"These courses help develop the student's capabilities so that he can work up to his full potential," commented Mrs. Kinney.

Although such courses are offered to honors students at SU it is probably true that these students must spend a few more nights at home "hitting the books" than the average student. The mere basic requirement of the maintainance of a 3.0 accumulative to remain in the program testifies to this fact.

Advising system

Registration procedures are supposedly easier for the honors student by carrying his "all-powerful" blue card with him. This card, originally designed to open any course to an honors student, has failed to do just that. Because some departments at registration do not honor such a card, it's purpose now reads that it is to open all courses to honors students "when feasible." So, if a course is jam-packed, even an honors student probably won't be able to surmount the barrier.

The thought of pre-registration for honors students has begun to take form under the guidance of Dianne Plucinnik, chairman of the Student Advisory Committee. Students originated the plan for pre-registration and are hoping to implement such a plan soon.

Extra credit hours

Money-wise, the honors program gives the student more of an education for less cost. Under the program, students are allowed to take extra hours, as advised, free of cost. Thus, in a four-year span, an honors student could graduate with 16 extra credit hours free of charge, and possibly more.

And just where does all of the extra money come from with which the college of Liberal Arts offers free courses?

From you and me. Whether we're in the Honors Program or not. The College of Liberal Arts initiated the Honors Program here and its budget is received from the University. Although a non-honors student might want to protest the use of his tuition for "superior" students on campus, it is argued that the program "brings up the academic level of the whole university."

"Directors of honors programs at other institutions agree that such honors programs significantly stimulate the whole student body and faculty and improve the general intellectual climate of a university," reads the Honors Program constitution.

Some services are offered, however, to students and faculty of SU at large. Mrs. Kinney explained that the office more or less operates as a "clearing house" for all students. In other words, anyone desiring information on graduate schools, fellowships, awards, grants, etc., can contact the honors office to find the information. If Mrs. Kinney cannot locate the desired information in her files, she tries to find out where such information can be obtained.

"This personal contact with a wide variety of very interesting students is exhilirating and rewarding," commented Mrs. Kinney.

For a faculty service, the Honors Program compiles and publishes lists of outstanding students in the freshman and senior classes. The frosh list is distributed to advisers and circulated at registration to enable faculty to place these students. The senior list is largely used to help with fellowships, scholarship and grad school information which is available.

Such a nebulous term as "special academic needs" can mean just about anything. Basically, however, the honors program refers to two major points. When special

GUIDING HONORS STUDENTS is the job of Mrs. Lillian Kinney, program coordinator for the Honors Program. She strives for personal contacts with students in order to get a "feedback" on their thoughts and ideas. In, out or doubtful that is is one of the most pleasant living centers on campus, not only because of the physical arrangements but because St. Mary's students don't come around saying they can't study during exam time."

The aspect of the Honors Program that probably receives the most severe and persistent criticism is the College Honors Program (CHP) seminar. In its third year of operation, the program offers to each freshman and sophomore honors student the choice of one of twelve one credit, pass-fail seminars conducted by members of the senior faculty. Most seminars are conducted in an informal manner and are deliberately small to encourage participation. The disappointments aired by many students are that the overly-optimistic student-faculty relationships never develop and that it is truly difficult to put a lot of time into the seminar when carrying five other three-credit courses.

As for the seminar's original purpose, Hardin explains:

"It was created to offer an unusual academic atmosphere. The students, especially freshmen, complained that they had little contact with the regular faculty and saw only graduate students throughout their first two years here. We wanted to give them a chance to explore something freely, outside of the usual curricula bounds."

What Hardin and the Honors Council have found, however is that students rarely spend much time in preparation for the seminars and often prove unresponsive, in some cases, more so than in their regular classes.

Some faculty members connected with the Honors Program have said that the seminar is one of their most boring classes and that some of the students they feel should be in the Honors Program were not invited to join.

Dr. Hardin says that an effort is made each semester to improve and modify the seminar program. Any student who desires to explore a certain topic and who can organize ten other interested students is "guaranteed" a seminar, provided he can get a professor to teach it.

In addition to providing services to its members, the Honors Program furnishes information available to faculty and other students. It compiles and publishes a list of outstanding students in the incoming freshmen class which is distributed to lower division advisors and is circulated at registration to enable faculty to place able students. Information on fellowship opportunities and graduate schools is directed to students placed on a list of outstanding seniors, also circulated by the honors office. Extensive files are maintained in the honors office, room 108 Hall of Languages, with information on scholarships, graduate school catalogues, foreign studies programs, Graduate Record Exams, Law Boards, Medical College Admission Tests. These files are open to all interested students.

Dialogue has been resumed with the College of Business Administration concerning the reinstatement of their Honors Program. The honors office will conduct preliminary screening of high school business applicants, and the final decision on admission to the BA Honors Program will be made by the business faculty. Honors students admitted to this program will be eligible to take honors courses within the College of Liberal Arts.

Dr. Hardin, reflecting upon the progress of the Honors Program thus far and anticipating a more expanded role, says,

"I certainly would not claim that the Honors Program is the only kind of curriculum innovation we should have here; as it is, it is a rather conservative curriculum innovation. It happens to be the only one we have and, so far, it does appear that if anything is going to happen at all around here it's going to happen to the Honors Program until we have adequate alternative arrangements."

DR. CLYDE L. HARDIN, new director of the Honors Program in the College of Liberal Arts sees the program as, "created for the best academically performing students."

Students abandon apathy

Committees formed to improve and expand

By DIANNE PLUCINNIK

"What has the Honors Program done for me? Well, I get into closed courses at registration and I get extra hours free," commented one sophomore honors student at a gripe session this fall. Since then, the question has changed to "What am I doing for the Honors Program?" and the answer is "doing something for myself, the rest of the students and Syracuse University."

After several meetings this fall, the honors students formed a Student Advisory Council of six members to channel their complaints to the Honors Council to get answers and action. With such academic problems as lower division seminars and optional independent study programs settled, four student subcommittees were set up to extend the Honors Program into extracurricular activities, to work with the selection committee for the outstanding liberal arts professor, to survey honors courses and to preregister honors students.

Elaine Ciruzzi, chairman of the committee planning a series of evening presentations to be sponsored by the Honors Program, summed up the purpose of all the committees. "We want to make the Honors Program mean something more than seminars to everyone at Syracuse."

More than seminars

"Our idea is to improve the quality of education outside the classrooms by sponsoring weekly programs which will supplement the classroom learning of all students at the university," she added.

A panel discussion of ROTC on campus will be the first of this series. Representatives from the faculty, CSL, SDS and ROTC will speak in St. Mary's multipurpose room Monday, at 8 p.m. Since St. Mary's houses most of the lower division honors students, all of the student presentations will be held there, usually on Tuesday or Wednesday evenings.

The film, "The Death of God," will be shown the following week with Dr. James Williams, a member of the religion department leading a discussion afterwards.

Miss Ciruzzi also plans on inviting drama students to present skits and creative writing students to read poetry at some of the weekly programs. The presentations will be free and will be open to all students.

"We're trying to make the idea of 'total education' more real," Miss Ciruzzi states. "We want more people to get involved in a 'community of learning' by making learning more informal and interesting."

Faculty award

Another student committee is working to make education more rewarding for the faculty. Felix Botelho, a sophomore in the honors program, heads a committee for the selection of the outstanding liberal arts professor.

"This is a student award," he explains. "We want to give it to a new professor, that is, to someone who hasn't been acknowledged yet."

Students will vote for the professor they consider most deserving, using forms to be printed in the Daily Orange. The professor's name and the course he teaches, plus the student's class year, must be included on each ballot. Slightly more consideration will be given to junior and senior students' nominations.

After the general balloting, the top ten or fifteen professors will be interviewed by the student committee. Students on the committee will also sit in on their classes and question some of their students. The committee has drawn up a list of characteristics which will serve as the final criteria for making the selection.

A faculty committee has also been organized to select the most outstanding professor and the students hope to work with them in determining the award winner. The award will probably consist of a book or a dinner, although its actual form still hasn't been chosen, according to Botelho.

Course survey

While Botelho's committee works to reward the people who are doing things right, a student committee headed by freshman honors student Anita Suisman is surveying all honors courses and sections to see what is going wrong.

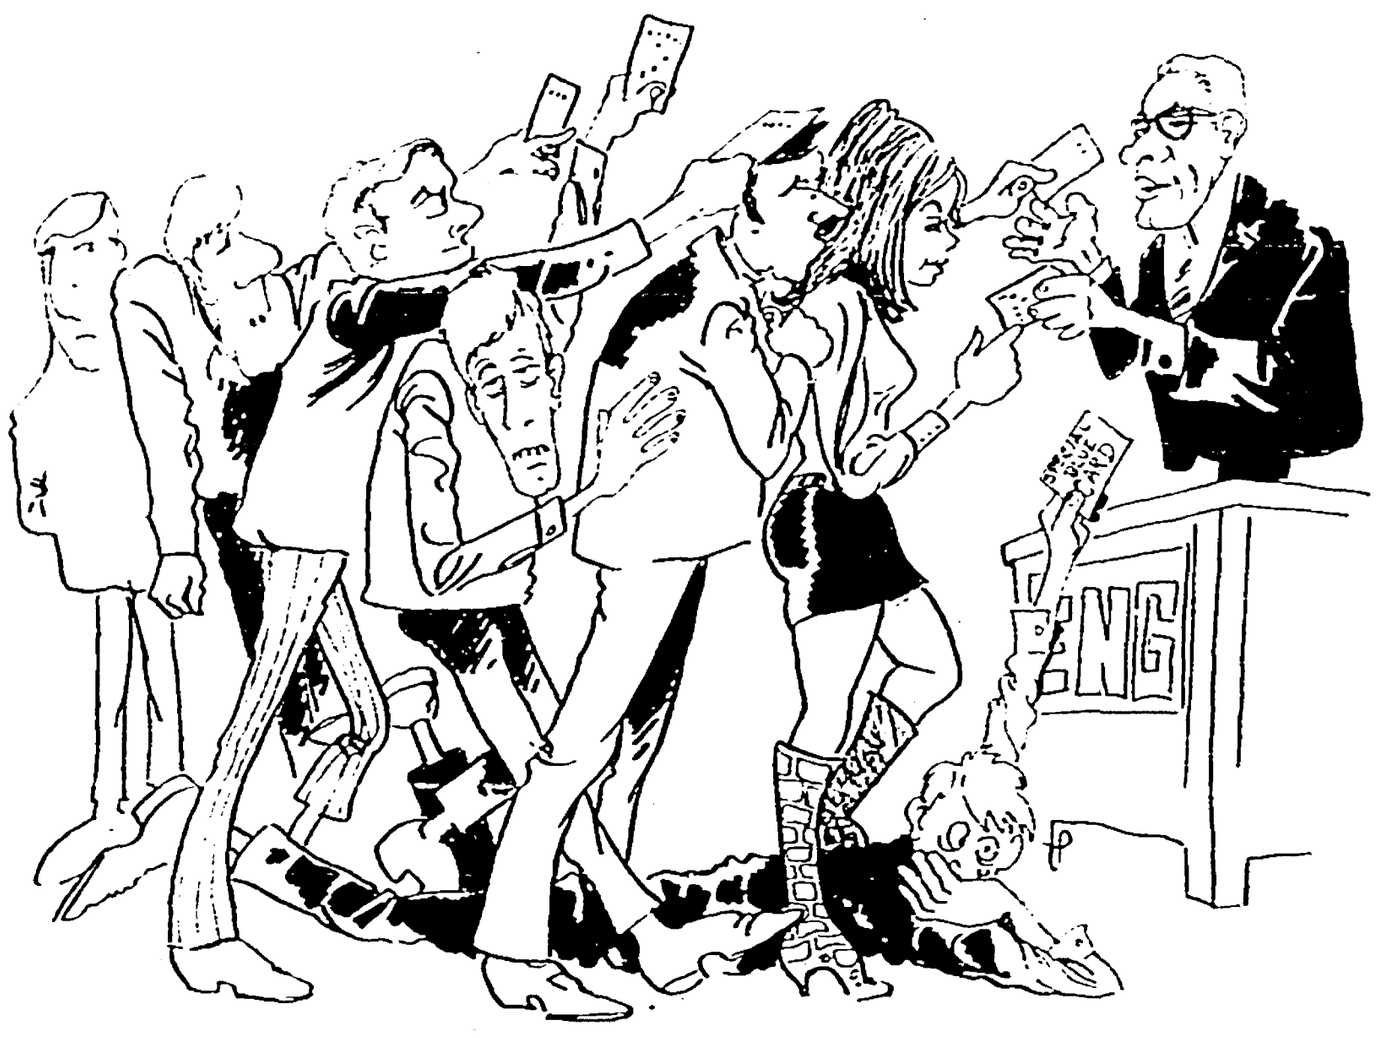
"Everyone makes the same general complaints," Miss Suisman explained. "We want to get down to specifics for every course so something can be done."

The student committee, which will work with a faculty representative from the Honors Council, will begin its survey by gathering the syllabi used in all lower division honors classes.

"We're going to compare honors classes with regular classes as well as look for weak spots and areas which should receive more emphasis," Miss Suisman stated.

The committee will also ask honors professors for criticisms and suggestions and will submit a final list of recommendations to the honors program office and to the department chairmen for each course.

Preregistration, the eternal hope of Syracuse students, is the aim of another committee of honors students. According to the student plans, honors students would be able to preregister for all their courses at the same time and in the same way that department majors preregister.



"The problem is going to each department, finding out how they preregister their majors and getting their permission to preregister honors students," Larry Rudner, a student on the committee, said. Preregistration would then be possible for all honors students except incoming freshmen.

Communications link

An honors student bulletin board has been set up outside the Honors Program Office in the basement of the Hall of Languages to provide a communications link between these committees and the honors students.

Students are represented on the Honors Council by one regular member, with a "rotating seat" available so that a student with a specific concern can also attend a council meeting. Elections for the position of student representative for next year will be held in April.

The Honors Program dedicated itself at its inception to enriching the academic life of its students and the University. This year, the honors students have organized to enrich the program, the university and themselves.

REGISTRATION PRIORITY? Members of SU's Honors Program are given a special blue card which supposedly enables them to register for closed and upper division courses.

Senior thesis: Analysis

By BILL EIMICKE

The senior thesis program looks great on paper. In practice, like so many other efforts to achieve quality educational programs at Sryacuse, it leaves much to be desired. The educational possibilities are limitless, but because of an inadequate advisory system, the program's overbearing demand on the student's time and the inaccessibility of research material, it has proven unsatisfactory as a program designed to encourage independent research in the student's chosen field.

The thesis program is offered by the Honors Council to honors students in the second semester of their junior year. Requirements vary in each department, and it is in the student's department of major study that the amount of credit hours to be awarded is decided (from 3 to 6 hours) and where the manner and scope of the study are agreed upon. From the Honors Council's point of view, decisions on the theses should be negotiated between the student and his department since it is there that the experts in each field are available for guidance and it is from the department that the pressures on the student throughout his research program are exerted.

The goal of the program is to involve the gifted student in first hand research and experimentation toward the production of an original work.

What usually begins as sincere motivation and enthusiasm often turns into frustration and disgust in the actual researching and writing of the thesis. In fact, the thesis program probably discourages more students than it inspires.

Lack of sufficient time to complete the thesis is probably the chief handicap. While attempting this major project, the student is carrying at least twelve other credits. Since the thesis begins in the second semester of the junior year, the twelve other credits usually involve important courses in the student's major field. To do something worthwhile (and if you're going to spend two semesters and a summer vacation on it, it should be) requires a great deal of time.

Another major problem is the system of faculty advisers who are chosen by the students themselves. Most of the advisors are so busy or constantly unavailable that they de-psyche the student from the beginning. Many students also complain that some of the advisors are so indoctrinated with a stringent and doctrinaire outlook on the educational system that they construct a cell-like, unimaginative outline to which the student is forced to conform. Although several instances of successful relationships between honors students and their advisers exist, most relationships are mediocre if not meaningless.

The haphazard condition of Carnegie Library is another impediment to the completion of a thorough thesis. The books are hopelessly our of order, with more than a few books filed on the floor. All the books are constantly being moved around, but no one seems to know where. Usually the material is hidden somewhere in the mysterious annex. Three days later, when the student returns to pick up his prize, he is often told the book is missing at present, but a search will be conducted–maybe.

The library is not the only physical obstacle. Students in the natural sciences inevitably face the Syracuse runaround when they try to borrow equipment. Either the faculty is using it or the University doesn't have it (or the money to purchase it).

After a semester of continual frustration, the student can give up his summer, grind out a "glorified term paper" and collect six hours of "A" credit. A good grade, however, just doesn't justify the ordeal for many students.

Many improvements could be initiated to improve the thesis program which would make it a worthwhile educational adventure for the student and good public relations for the University.

The University could give the honors student his senior year, 30 credits (which are usually electives anyway), to go out on his own and conduct concentrated, sophisticated research. The student could be required to report his progress to his adviser every two weeks and discuss any problems he is having.

Loans could be made available to students who want to go abroad and do original research. They could also be valuable to the student who must work in the summer to return to school in the fall.

The honors program has been one of the few efforts at education at Syracuse, and it need not be condemned so much as improved. The theory of the program is great, but the results have been only mediocre. Too little is being done and what is happening is going too slowly.

Is the grass greener?

Honors programs here and there

By BOB PUTNAM

The attempts of the Honors Council to establish a scholarly oasis in the intellectual desert of Syracuse University have resulted in more progress than might be at first apparent. Considering the length of time it has been in operation, the Syracuse Honors Program compares favorably with those of other colleges and universities.

The essential components of the Syracuse program--honors sections of courses open to all undergraduates, honors seminars and special classes restricted to students in the Honors Program and provision for honors work in the field of concentration--are common to programs throughout the country. At a few universities, the honors concept has evolved further. One development has been the "honors core," a group of courses spanning several disciplines and taken by all students in the Honors Program.

The core program at Georgetown University includes courses in philosophy, literature, languages, and science and is characterized by a reduction in the number of usually required courses, along with a reduction in the actual time spent in the classroom. Like the group requirements at SU, this insures a liberal education; but more than this, it enables the various departments to coordinate the courses. It attempts to deal with the common problem of the liberal education degenerating into bits of knowledge of different fields which remain disconnected in the mind of the student. Such special courses do exist at SU in the philosophy and English departments, but there are none in other fields, and no attempt has been made to coordinate these courses in an interdisciplinary core.

The fullest development of the honors idea has occurred at such schools as Kent State University and the University of Oregon where an Honors College has been established. Just as there is an Art School or a Business School at SU, at these universities there is an Honors College. Honors students have their own classes, their own dormitories, their own student government and often their own library and class buildings. They remain part of the larger university in that they must fulfill its degree requirements and may take part in its activities.

It is apparent that as a school proceeds from honors sections to special courses to a separate college if faces with increasing severity a problem inherent in the honors iddea--the segregation of students identified as superior than their less gifted classmates. This creation of an academic elite has been attacked as harmful to both the other segments of the university and to the development of the honors students themselves.

On the other hand, it can be argued that the atmosphere of the honors enclave spills over into the rest of the campus; and, at least at SU, honors students seem to have been more active in student organizations than the average student. In any case, in deciding how far to go with the Honors Program, the University will have to weigh the advantages of a more tightly-knit community of scholars with the disadvantages of isolation.

These considerations bring us back to the purpose of an Honors Program, which is to create a community of scholars, in which minds are stimulated through interaction with other minds and there is an emphasis on academic achievement. At SU this sense is community is nurtured by a special advising system which emphasizes personal contact between the honors student and a qualified faculty member. It is further aided by the Honors Council office, where honors students struggling with the University bureaucracy can appeal for help. Other measures short of a separate college which might be taken include periodic meetings of all honors students, election of student representatives to curriculum committees, discussion of common problems and meeting with faculty members for discussion and debate of topics of general interest.

Perhaps other minor adjustments can and should be made in the program of the Honors Council. But the determining factors in the quality of Honors Programs are those of the attitude and ability of the people involved. Various course loads and offerings are important only insofar as they contribute to these factors, and programs that are successful at one university may not be successful at another.

While the Syracuse University Honors Program still has much left to do, significant progress has been made. A comparison of the accomplishments here with those elsewhere is difficult, as we can only look at structures, not at the atmosphere that is their aim. Various honors courses have been attacked as not challenging enough to warrant the name, and in some cases this criticism has been justified. But often this conclusion is the result of an implicit comparison with the imagined challange of a Yale or a Harvard, rather than with the corresponding courses at SU. It is perhaps a measure of the success of the Honors Program that the students it attracts are inclined to make such comparisons.

Statistics

In its November 1968 report to the Liberal Arts Faculty, the Honors Program submitted this breakdown of students presently enrolled in the program:

Seniors: Class of 1969 -- In Sept. 1965, 181 students were named on the list of outstanding freshmen (approximately 13 per cent of the incoming class). 234 were named on the list of outstanding sophomores (approximately 20 per cent of the class). These were invited to apply for honors in their field. 67 applied, 51 were accepted. Summer, 1967, five more applied and four were accepted. In Sept. 1967, three withdrew, for a total at that time of 52. In the February screening, one was dropped and two were added. During the spring semester, four withdrew for a total of 49. Summer screening, 1968, five were dropped, five withdrew and three were added, totalling 42. One student moved back from the class of 1968 and one advanced from the class of 1970 for current total of 44.

Juniors: Class of 1970 - 550 freshman applicants were invited. Of these, 350 applied, 170 were selected, 85 came to Syracuse, fall, 1966. Additions to the program to April brought the total to 100. Summer 1967 screening, 79 were continued in the program. Of these, four withdrew and one was advanced to the class of 1969 for a total of 74 in Oct. 1967. In spring screening, 1968, six were dropped, five withdrew and five were added for a total of 68. In March, 1968, 54 of the 68 applied for upper division honors along with 40 students who had not been accepted. Fall, 1968, two transferred, four withdrew, one was admitted and one moved up to the class of 1969. The total was 77 to Nov. 1968.

Sophomores: Class of 1971 -- 425 incoming freshman applicants were invited to apply. Of these, 224 applied, 150 were accepted and 79 came to Syracuse, fall of 1967. Six more were added in Feb. 1968 and one withdrew for a total of 84. In the summer 1968 screening, 18 were dropped, nine withdrew and 23 new applicants were admitted. The Nov. 1968 total was 80.

Freshmen: Class of 1972 -- Under a changed method of screening high school applicants, 5,678 applicants to Syracuse were considered. 1,557 were considered in depth, of which 606 were invited to apply. Of these, 310 applied, 206 were accepted and the total to Nov. 1968 was 130.

What's it all about?...

opportunities are desirable for a superior student, the Honors Council, the governing body of the Honors Program, can operate, in accordance with the appropriate college, under (1) acceleration and (2) unorthodox majors. The Honors Council can provide opportunities for acceleration to an able student; and it can assume responsibility for a small number of highly qualified students with special academic needs which cannot be met within existing major or dual programs.

Honors students are encouraged to take advantage of the SU foreign studies programs (see DO, Friday, March 7), but the Honors Program also offers a select program for its students. Special arrangements make it possible to send sociology or philosophy honors students to Bedford College at the University of London for a year's study. Presently, four juniors are studying there.

Recognition

The final "plum" of the Honors Program lies with graduation day--a degree with the words "with honors" attached. To obtain such status, the honors student must be recommended jointly by his department of study and the Honors Council.

Although no statistical data has been obtainable as yet, it is thought that such a designation surely helps for a basis of admission to graduate schools or the securing of foundations, grants, etc. At the very least, it indicates extra study in one's major field.

Probably the biggest task to accomplish in the honors program is the completion of independent study--an individual research paper or department comprehensive--which is probably equivalent to graduate work. Such work must be completed and accepted by the Honors Council in May of the student's senior year, in order for him to attain honors credit in his degree. Again, the evidence of such an extensive undertaking could be influential when applying to graduate schools.

All members of the Honors Program are entitled to first choice of housing. Since the completion of the St. Mary's dorm site complex, this dormitory has been the prime target for honors housing since it has "desirable" facilities. Its basic advantage is that it has seminar rooms, individual study rooms and areas where the students can hold presentations and discussions.

Admission

Admission to the SU Honors Program is based on a number of criteria--SAT (college board) scores; quantity and quality of high school courses; class rank; recommendations; personal data sheet; and autobiography.

"Every attempt is made to look beyond grades--to evaluate the student's college potential," said Mrs. Kinney.

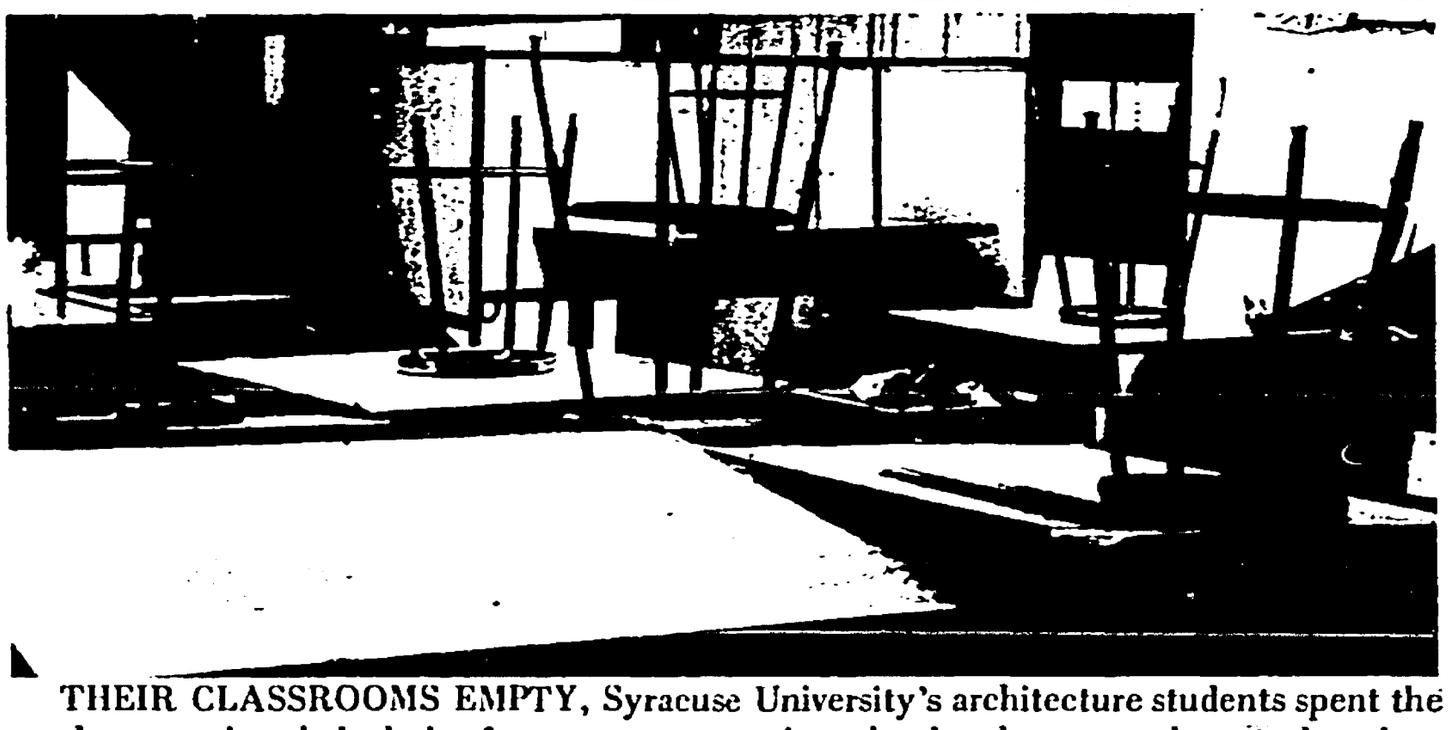
In actuality, there are two honors programs at SU--lower division and upper division. Lower division refers to the freshmen and sophomores; upper division is juniors and seniors. A student can become a member of one program, independent of the other.

The "pick up point" with incoming frosh are those applicants to Syracuse University who score 600 or more on the verbal portion of the SAT exam. Students who have a total of 1250 or more on their combined score of verbal and math of the SAT are also checked.

For the class of 1972, this new wide approach was initiated. All of the applicants to SU were considered--5,678. Of these, 1557 were considered in depth, of which 606 were invited to apply. 310 did so, and 206 were accepted, and 130 actually entered the Honors Program. Including all four classes at SU, there are presently 331 undergraduates enrolled in the Honors Program.

Admission into the upper division honors program is largely based on the same data, but, of course, there is a college record to be considered. Upper division application enables transfer students to apply and enter the program.

The transfer student, however, contrary to the freshmen, has largely remained uninformed about the program unless he investigates it himself when on campus. This year, however, SU has started sending out brochures about the honors program to those who write and ask for applications to SU. Due to this innovation, the program will probably begin to pick up more transfers than in the past.



Architecture:

Strike interrupted for guest lecturer

By FRED TUCCILLO
News Editor

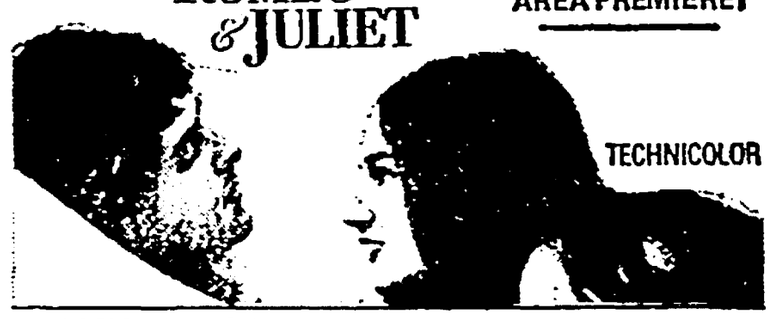
Their weeklong drive for "a more relevant education" stretching into it's fifth day, students of the School of Architecture announced that they will interrupt their boycott of classes tonight to attend a lecture by a noted architect.

By that time students, faculty and administration may have some idea of how much longer the boycott will last and what it's long range outcome will be. The entire faculty of The School of Architecture will meet late this afternoon and some action is expected on a proposal for reshaping the school's administrative structure.

THEIR CLASSROOMS EMPTY, Syracuse University's architecture students spent the week expressing their desire for a more responsive school and a more relevant education. They boycotted regular architecture classes and conducted their own in other campus buildings.

Regardless of what happens at that meeting, most of the school's 205 students are expected to fill the seats of A—1 Newhouse at 8 p.m. to hear architect Huson Jackson of Cert-Jackson in Cambridge, Mass. discuss his work in the Boston area. The lecture was scheduled before the current situation developed.

"The purpose of what we've been doing this week has been to gain a more relevant education," said a student spokesman, explaining the boycott interruption. "We expect that Mr. Jackson's talk will be both valuable and relevant and it would be foolish not to make an exception."



The faculty of the school assembled Wednesday night for their first meeting since the boycott began. They discussed possible changes in administrative structure of the school.

Apparently no decisions were made. The 10-member (five students, five faculty members) student-faculty "mediating" committee was in conference most of Thursday. It's chairman, Professor Gale Brooks had no comment on the group's progress but a student member of the committee said that the second full faculty meeting this afternoon was expected to end with some definite action.

That would seem to indicate some progress in the student-faculty conferences since any specific proposals to be acted upon by the full faculty would first have to be cleared by the joint "mediating" committee.
