Title

Sveen v. Melin: Retroactive application of statute revoking upon divorce spousal life-insurance-beneficiary designations upheld by U.S. Supreme Court

Text

A life insurance policy is a third-party-beneficiary contract. A revocation-upon-divorce statute that applies to a life insurance beneficiary-designation extinguishes the beneficiary’s contract-based intangible personal property rights. In 2018, the U.S. Supreme Court held that it may do so retroactively. See Sveen v. Melin, 584 U.S. ____ (2018) [No. 16-1432]. Why? Because the statute does not substantially impair contractual rights. Justice Gorsuch, the lone dissenter, counters: “The Contracts Clause categorically prohibits states from passing ‘any…Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts.’” Could not the same practical result have been achieved without any impairment of legal contractual obligations and with a lot less fuss had the plaintiffs brought a simple mistake-based unjust-enrichment claim for equitable restitution against the third-party-beneficiary? See, e.g., Restatement of Restitution §22 (1937). Unjust enrichment is taken up generally in §8.15.78 of Loring and Rounds: A Trustee’s Handbook (2018). The section is reproduced in its entirety below.

Appendix

§8.15.78 Unjust Enrichment [from Loring and Rounds: A Trustee’s Handbook (2018)].

In 1997, Gummow, J, a justice of the High Court of Australia, ... signaled in Hill v. Van Erp ... his unhappiness with the exorbitant claims of those who sought to pack down the whole of restitution into a tight unjust enrichment box.1244

Lord Mansfield (William Murray, 1st Earl of Mansfield), via the 1750 English case of Moses v. Macferlan, had injected unjust enrichment doctrine into the English legal tradition.1245 Long before 1937, which was when the United States Supreme Court expressly applied the doctrine in Stone v. White, the doctrine also had been a thread in the fabric of America’s (U.S.) legal tradition.1246

Unjust enrichment can be either an equitable or a legal wrong.1247 Whether in equity or at law, unjust enrichment is the basic principle, on this side of the Atlantic, at least, that underlies the substantive equitable remedy of restitution.1248 Restitution as a remedy for a trustee's unauthorized self-dealing is covered in Section 7.2.3.3 of this handbook. One who is unjustly enriched is unjustifiably enriched, that is to say there is no legal or equitable basis for the enrichment, such as what might be supplied by the law of gifts or the 1244Justice Keith Mason, Chancery Bar Assoc., Inner Temple, What Has Equity to Do with Restitution? Does It Matter? (Nov. 27, 2006).

---

1248Edwin W. Patterson, Book Review, 47 Yale L.J. 1420, 1421 (1938) (reviewing Restatement of Restitution).
law of contracts.1249 “Restitution is accordingly subordinate to contract as an organizing principle of private relationships, and the terms of an enforceable agreement normally displace any claim of unjust enrichment within their reach.”1250 Likewise, absent special facts, gift doctrine trumps considerations of unjust enrichment. Thus the term unjustified enrichment better captures the essence of traditional unjust enrichment doctrine in the Anglo-American legal tradition. It also better approximates the gist of comparable doctrine in the civil law tradition. “One reason is that ‘unjustified enrichment’ makes an approximate translation of both the German ungerechtfertige Bereicherung (BGB §812) and the French enrichissement sans cause.”1251

At law, the concept of unjust enrichment incubated in the corner of the common law we now refer to as quasi contracts or “contracts implied in law,”1252 “That heading includes a wide variety of situations …, as where a person by mistake pays a debt a second time, or is coerced into conferring a benefit upon another, or renders aid to another in an emergency or is wrongfully deprived of his chattels by another who has used them for his own benefit.”1253 The legal remedy is generally limited to the payment of money.1254 In equity, the concept of unjust enrichment evolved as a corollary to both the fiduciary principle and constructive trust jurisprudence.1255 The constructive trust is covered in Section 3.3 of this handbook and in Section 7.2.3.1 of this handbook. By the end of the nineteenth century American legal scholars were busy developing a unified theory of unjust enrichment that straddled and transcended the traditional law/equity divide of the Anglo-American legal tradition.1256 The Restatement of Restitution (1937) is the culmination of those efforts. It purported to sever the concept of restitution for unjust enrichment from its various cultural roots and placed it in its own vane on the shelf of the constructs of the common law as it has been enhanced by Equity: “The task of ‘restatement,’ in this instance, took the form of a radical reconception of an important area of the law that antiquated formal categories had previously obscured, following exactly in this regard the prescriptions of some noted realists.”1257 One such realist was Harvard’s Prof. James Barr Ames.1258

And yet it is also said that the concept of unjustified enrichment is actually of exceedingly ancient origin. In the writings of Sextus Pomponius, a Roman jurist of the mid-second century A.D., appears this maxim: Jure naturae aequum est, neminem cum alterius detrimento et injuria fieri locupletiorerm (“It is a principle of natural justice and equity, that no one should be enriched through loss or injury to another”).1259

The English and the Australians, however, have yet to fully buy into the American idea of a freestanding law of restitution for unjust enrichment.1260 In any case, on this side of the Atlantic there are now few left

---

1249 Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §2, cmts. b (gift) and c (contract).
1250 Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §2 cmt. c.
1251 Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §1, Reporter’s Note. “In the statute law of Louisiana, the source of what is here called a liability in restitution is described as an ‘enrichment without cause.’ La. Civ. Code art. 298. As expressed in Canadian law, a claim in restitution requires that the plaintiff establish an enrichment, a corresponding deprivation, and ‘the absence of any juristic reason … for the enrichment.’ Rathwell v. Rathwell, [1978] 2 S.C.R. 436, 455.” Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §1, Reporter’s Note.
1252 Restatement of Restitution, Part I, Introductory Note.
1253 Restatement of Restitution 1 (General Scope Note).
1254 Restatement of Restitution 1 (General Scope Note).
1256 Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §4 cmt. b.
1258 See generally Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §4, Reporter’s Note.
1259 Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §4 cmt. b. and Reporter’s Note.
who are equipped, by formal legal training at least, to appreciate the boldness of the efforts of the realists, via the Restatement of Restitution (1937), to colonize the “vast terra incognita occupied by the set of legal actions grouped under the impenetrable name of ‘quasi-contract’ and a miscellaneous set of equitable remedies (principally constructive trust)” in that “many American lawyers would be hard pressed even to say what equity is (or was).”

For more on the marginalization of Equity in the curriculum of the American law school, the reader is referred to Section 8.25 of this handbook.

As to unjust enrichment as a principle of substantive liability, all that critical doctrine fell through the cracks years ago with the introduction of the traditional Remedies course into the American law school curriculum. The course was a pedagogical contraption of selected elements of the traditional Damages, Equity, and Restitution required courses. Now even Remedies is elective, or no longer offered at all. It is no wonder that unjust enrichment doctrine is generally a mystery to contemporary American lawyers, and to contemporary law professors even more so. “Much of the substantive law of equity—in particular, the law describing equitable interests in property held by another—suffered the same fate.”

---

1262 Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §1, Reporter’s Note.
1263 Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §1, Reporter’s Note.
1264 Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §1, Reporter’s Note.
1265 Restatement (Third) of Restitution and Unjust Enrichment §1, Reporter’s Note.