Re: World Bank Loan Made to the Ugandan Government That May Be Financing Ongoing Human Rights Abuses

Dear Senator Coons,

We write on behalf of the New York City Bar Association to bring to your attention a $300 million World Bank loan to the Ugandan government, ostensibly intended to fund COVID-19 relief measures, but which may be financing ongoing human rights abuses committed by the security forces against political opposition candidates and their supporters ahead of the January 2021 presidential and parliamentary elections.

The circumstances of this loan call into question the sufficiency of measures the World Bank has taken in recent years to promote good governance and human rights safeguards in the countries to which it lends. We urge you to raise this matter with the Lantos Human Rights Commission, and the US Senate Foreign Relations Committee and its Subcommittee on Multilateral International Development, Multilateral Institutions, and International Economic, Energy, and Environmental Policy; and the Subcommittee on Africa and Global Health Policy. We also request that you urge the Government Accounting Office to investigate this matter. As the World Bank’s and Uganda’s largest donor, the United States has a responsibility to ensure that World Bank funds do not abet repression and are used in ways consistent with America’s commitment to the promotion of human rights and democracy.

The New York City Bar Association is an independent, non-governmental organization with more than 25,000 members. These members include lawyers, judges, law professors, and government officials from the United States and over 50 countries. Founded in 1870, the Association has a long history of dedication to promoting human rights and the rule of law. The Association’s Cyrus R. Vance Center for International Justice advances global justice by engaging lawyers across borders to support civil society and international human rights bodies. The African Affairs Committee closely monitors, reports on, and responds to legal developments in Africa. And the International Human Rights Committee investigates and reports on human rights conditions around the world.

In May, the World Bank announced a $300 million loan to Uganda, one of Washington’s closest African military and development partners, ostensibly for COVID-19 relief, to assist the government in its capacity to prevent, detect and treat the coronavirus; protect the largely poor and vulnerable population; and support economic recovery. However, it has come to our attention that this closely resembles the amount (1.033 trillion Uganda Shillings) allocated to a supplementary classified expenditure budget by the Uganda government one month prior. In Uganda, classified expenditures go to the security forces, mainly the military and police, as well as to the Office of the President. Such funds are not subject to oversight or even scrutiny by Uganda’s Parliament or donors.

We have reason to believe that some of this classified expenditure money is being used to finance ongoing human rights abuses against the political opposition and the continued militarization of January’s scheduled elections. As you may be aware, widespread demonstrations following the arrest of popular opposition figure Bobi Wine/Robert Kyagulanyi on November 18 were met with indiscriminate shootings by Ugandan security forces that claimed the lives of at least fifty people. Countless others were severely wounded. Many, if not most, of the victims were not even demonstrators but innocent bystanders. No one was harmed by the demonstrators, who bore no weapons. Wine was detained for two days without access to his family, doctors, or counsel. When he was produced in court, he was charged with holding a rally of more than 200 people, in violation of COVID social distancing regulations—something Museveni and other ruling party candidates have been doing with impunity. His campaign events continue to attract huge crowds, and security forces continue to kill and injure his supporters. On November 30, security forces killed five people in the provincial town of Mukono; on December 1, men in police uniform nearly killed Bobi Wine himself. His vehicle was riddled with bullet holes, and his manager Dan Music Oryewot was critically wounded.

safeguards and good governance standards. Uganda is a stalwart US security partner: it is the largest troop contributor to the African Union Mission to Somalia (Amisom), to which the US is a major financial donor and contributor of guards under US command in Iraq. In return, Uganda receives hundreds of millions of dollars in US foreign assistance annually. While much of this goes directly to humanitarian projects and NGOs, US funds also go to the Ugandan Treasury via the World Bank, to which the US is the largest donor.

Uganda, under President Yoweri Museveni, whose National Resistance Army seized power by force 35 years ago, is repressive and violent and has a long track record of suppressing political opposition. Its security forces routinely torture legislators and kill opposition supporters. In 2016, the Ugandan army gunned down over 100 unarmed villagers, including women and small children. Museveni then promoted the commander of that operation. Under Museveni, Ugandan forces have also sparked unprovoked conflicts in neighboring countries, as well as within Uganda itself that have cost millions of lives. Although Uganda has been praised for its assistance to refugees, Museveni’s military has worsened or provoked anew the conflicts in South Sudan and Congo from which most of those refugees have fled.

Museveni will contest the upcoming presidential election (his sixth) on January 14, 2021. His previous elections were marred by state violence against the opposition, voter bribery, and vote-rigging, and this election is shaping up to be the most brutal yet. During the past three years, Bobi Wine has been arrested multiple times and suffered torture. So have other opposition politicians, including Members of Parliament Betty Nambooze and Francis Zaake and many of their supporters. In some cases, their children have been targeted too. Wine’s rallies—and even his musical concerts—were outlawed by Museveni’s regime before the Covid-19 pandemic. The regime has cited the pandemic in breaking up his rallies in recent weeks and arresting him without providing him access to counsel. Several analysts, including Human Rights Watch, believe the invocation of Covid-19 for these actions to be a mere pretext.

The $300 million additional funding for classified expenditures for the security forces was contained in an April 2020 supplementary budget request for parliamentary approval. The Ministry of Finance, Economic Planning, and Development claimed it was necessary for addressing the consequences of COVID-19. However, the request allocates nearly 40 times more money to classified security items than to the health sector for the Covid-19 response, which will receive a mere 104 billion Uganda Shillings ($28 million). It’s worth noting that

39 of Uganda’s 134 districts have no hospital, and there are only 55 ICUs and 411 working ambulances in the entire country of some 43 million people.\textsuperscript{20} A recent investigation of the nation’s largest hospital found that it lacked adequate supplies of oxygen, PPE, and other supplies even to handle Uganda’s relatively low COVID caseload (only about 200 recorded deaths so far).\textsuperscript{21}

Parliament passed the supplementary budget over the objections of some budget committee members. This does not signal popular approval, however. As noted above, the regime routinely bribes and tortures MPs. In August 2018, for example, Bobi Wine was arrested and beaten for days, along with four other MPs and dozens of their supporters, some of whom, including Wine, emerged from detention on crutches. In 2017, Museveni’s Special Forces shattered the spine of opposition MP Betty Nambooze, within the Parliament building itself, in order to end her attempt to block by filibuster a bill enabling Museveni to rule for life.\textsuperscript{22}

Since Uganda’s last election in 2016, the budget for classified expenditures has increased from 441 billion Ugs/$119 million to 3.6 trillion Ugs/$1 billion, a nearly 500% increase in just four years.\textsuperscript{23} Meanwhile, Covid-19 has been devastating for Uganda’s poor. Although the number of deaths attributable to the virus is thus far small, economic growth is expected to slow by half in FY2019/20, and the slide is likely to continue next year.\textsuperscript{24} While an accurate poverty count has not been carried out, anecdotal accounts of hunger, destitution, and suicide are widespread. However, the government is making things worse, not better. When opposition Member of Parliament Francis Zaake attempted to distribute food relief to his hungry constituents, he was arrested and tortured for three days. Twenty-nine years old and previously healthy, he now walks with a cane.\textsuperscript{25}

Commission. This means there will be no money for medicine, fuel for ambulances, or other necessary expenses for health and other sectors.\(^{26}\)

Last spring, USAID donated roughly $10 million to the NGO GiveDirectly to send cash transfers to needy Ugandans, but the government shut the program down, claiming, without evidence, that the group was working with the opposition.\(^ {27}\) The reason for GiveDirectly’s suspension appears to be due to a desire, on the part of the regime, to control all relief funds and thus ensure that opposition voices, especially among the poor, are held to ransom and silenced.

There is a strong likelihood that the World Bank’s new $300 million loan to Uganda will be diverted to what is effectively President Museveni’s slush fund. To the extent that the World Bank is not already investigating or otherwise addressing the likely misuse of these funds, such inaction calls into question the sufficiency of the measures it has undertaken to improve transparency and safeguard human rights. Not only are these funds possibly being used for regime-sponsored election violence, they may also be used for another incursion into neighboring Congo where Museveni’s family has interests in the smuggling of gold and other natural resources.\(^ {28}\)

In 2017, the House Committee on Financial Services heard testimony concerning numerous cases of corruption in World Bank lending, including the diversion of millions of dollars intended for environmental programs in Kenya to ruling party political campaigns and the forced displacement of millions of impoverished people in Asia, Africa and Latin America by World Bank projects.\(^ {29}\) Thus, the possibility that World Bank funds may be misused is a known risk. In light of evidence pointing to the possible or likely abuse of the World Bank’s loan program by the Ugandan government, we are gravely concerned that the World Bank may not be taking the steps necessary to ensure that its loans are not being used to finance the torture and killing of innocent people in that country.

We recognize and admire your long, active expertise in East Africa and your commitment to good governance and the rule of law worldwide. We thus thank you in advance for appreciating the seriousness of the need to assist Ugandans in confronting the COVID-19 pandemic without enabling the Museveni government to use these funds to sponsor election violence and continue its human rights violations in Uganda.
