In 1938, Jack’s father was appointed ambassador to England. Jack traveled in Europe, watching it edge toward World War II. Finally, he discovered he liked studying governments. He wrote a 150-page term paper about European governments and graduated Harvard with honors.

In 1941, after America entered World War II, Joe joined the Naval reserves. Jack’s bad back would have disqualified him, but he insisted his father persuade the Navy to accept him.

Joe Jr.’s plane exploded during a secret bombing mission. His body was never found. Jack’s father had wanted Joe to become president. But now, his father expected Jack to take Joe’s place.

Jack said, “I can’t just do what I like, and I’m sure now that Joe is dead, I’m going into politics.”
