

Paul Doyle:

When a client is accused of a crime, they're concerned, they're scared, and they want somebody who can protect their freedom. I decided I was going to be an attorney early on. I knew that would be my profession. My father's a lawyer. I watched him practice law, saw him help people, and I've always been drawn to that. After law school, I started at a civil firm. I realized that I wouldn't have access to the courtroom and really the battle. From there, I went to the Harris County District Attorney's Office where I was a prosecutor. I was at the Harris County D.A.'s Office for over seven years. I was involved in thousands of cases, hundreds of jury trials, from cases ranging from small level misdemeanors to murder trials. I had the opportunity to be exposed to every type of potential crime somebody could be accused of.

Paul Doyle:

With that experience, I'm able to look at weaknesses in a potential case that can lead to a positive outcome to the benefit of my clients. I love defending people because I have the opportunity to defend good people and get good results. They appreciate me and I get a great level of satisfaction of taking people, sending them back to their families, sending them back to their jobs, writing their names. That's something that I'm passionate about, and I think that's what's driven our success.