

A rendering of the proposed Garden Bridge over the Thames.

IN THE WORKS

Lofty Ambitions

New York's High Line has spawned big public green-space ideas worldwide. Here, the top projects to look for—if they happen at all.

GARDEN BRIDGE | London

The project A densely planted pedestrian bridge across the Thames by Thomas Heatherwick, between Temple and the South Bank. The update Construction won't begin until 2016, with a projected opening date of 2018. The verdict Critics wonder if the city really needs a new bridge—but it has momentum behind it.

THE LOWLINE | New York

The project A Kickstarter-funded underground park on the Lower East Side. The update The team has opened a pop-up Lowline Lab (also Kickstarter-backed) to test out the technology for streaming sunlight underground. The opening is slated for 2020. The verdict The transit authority, which controls the space, is on board, but nothing gets built quickly in Manhattan, so it's anyone's guess.

SOTTO IL VIADOTTO | Rome

The project This elevated tramway with workshops and art installations underneath it, 30 minutes outside the city center in Monte Sacro, is part of Renzo Piano's plan to revive Rome's suburbs. The update Funding is still pending, so the timeline is tentative. The verdict Even with the starchitect power behind it, will travelers go to the suburbs?

THE UNDERLINE | Miami

The project A 10-mile walkway under the Metrorail, from the Miami River to Dadeland South Station, in a city known for being dangerous for pedestrians and cyclists. The update Construction is set to go from next fall to 2022. The verdict The city green-lit the project, but the governor is denying funds—expect battles ahead.—STEPHANIE WU

FAB FINDS

Color Connection

CHIC INDIAN PRINTS, BY WAY OF PARIS.

IN JUST A YEAR, Jamini, the accessories and décor store from designer Usha Bora, has become a Parisian insider favorite. Bora's collection trades the typically neutral French palette for lively prints that she turns into cushions, quilts, scarves, shoes, and totes. All products at the 10th Arrondissement store—which also include tree-free notebooks made from elephant or rhino dung—are made by craftsmen in her native Assam, in northeastern India, or in the nearby states of Manipur, West Bengal, and Odisha. This fall, a second Jamini store opened south of Pigalle, adding carpets and perfumed candles; Bora will debut a women's-wear collection in the spring. From $42; jaminidesign.com.

—LINDSEY TRAMUTA

FROM TOP: COURTESY OF ARUP; COURTESY OF JAMINI (3); COURTESY OF JETBLUE

FLIGHT PLAN

JetBlue's premium Mint service—which, among its many perks, offers meals from New York City's Saxon & Parole and Birchbox amenity kits—is expanding this month, with seasonal flights from JFK to Aruba and Barbados. Not planning a trip to the Caribbean? JetBlue is also increasing the frequency of its already popular Mint routes between New York and Los Angeles, with up to five daily flights in each direction.—NIKKI EKSTEIN