

Marijuana is the most common political topic on everyone's lips lately, and they're not just discussing its potential uses as a powerful medicine. Colorado and Washington recently legalized recreational marijuana usage, and across much of the United States it's possible to get a prescription for some form of medical marijuana. The stores where marijuana can be purchased legally are known as dispensaries, and while there are at least one or two located in virtually every major city, that doesn't mean they're always easy to find when you need one. Now that pot has been legalized or recognized as medicine in much of the United States, for the average person the biggest question tends to be, "Where is there a weed dispensary near me?"

Dispensaries are arguably the greatest aspect of the trend towards legalization of marijuana, and they provide an invaluable service. Not only do they provide a safe, professional atmosphere for the purchase and sale of marijuana, going into a well-run dispensary can be like walking into a candy store. Walls covered in huge quantities of marijuana of every different possible strain, from the humblest herb to the most exotic custom-bred hybrid strains. It's not just the herb itself that's for sale, thanks to creative entrepreneurs who enjoy their own products. Most dispensaries are adding in sections containing edibles, oils, and other products made from marijuana designed for those who don't want to smoke or vape the herb itself.

It's important to remember that as Washington and Colorado start to really adapt to the realities of legalized weed, it will slowly become easier and easier to find a dispensary. The quality will improve everywhere as various businesses compete to create better and better products, and entirely new products we haven't even thought of before will start hitting the shelves as creative business owners try to stand out from the crowd. Unfortunately, it still doesn't necessarily mean that dispensaries will be instantly popping up in every small town across the states that have legalized, and even in large cities it can sometimes be difficult to find a place to replenish your supply.

If you've ever had to wonder, "where can I find a weed dispensary near me?", take heart - they should rapidly become easier to find as new businesses move in to fill the market gap. Starting a dispensary is an extremely attractive prospect for entrepreneurs, and as an industry, marijuana is only going to grow by leaps and bounds across the United States. Colorado is projected to earn over $125 million in tax revenue from marijuana sales alone in 2015, nearly double what they generated in 2014, and the statistics for the industry as a whole are even more impressive. Sales of marijuana and related products totaled over $700 million in 2014, and that's just for a single state. Statistics like that make any smart business owner stand up and take notice, as very few industries have such incredible growth potential. Marijuana dispensaries will be no exception, thanks to the incredible public demand for both medicinal and recreational usage.