BBC: Libya 'war crimes' videos shared on social media

An investigation by BBC Arabic has found evidence of alleged war crimes in Libya being widely shared on Facebook and YouTube. The BBC found images and videos on social media of the bodies of fighters and civilians being desecrated by fighters from the self-styled Libyan National Army. The force, led by strongman General Khalifa Haftar, controls a swathe of territory in the east of Libya and is trying to seize the capital, Tripoli. Under international law the desecration of bodies and posting the images online for propaganda is a war crime. The Foreign Office says it takes the allegations extremely seriously and is concerned about the impact the recent violence is having on the civilian population.

2018 UN report:

... Acts that threaten the peace, stability or security of Libya or acts that obstruct or undermine the successful completion of its political transition: Over the reporting period, armed groups further increased their influence over Libyan State institutions, promoting their own political and economic interests. The use of violence to take control of State infrastructure and institutions and threats and attacks against public servants are widespread across the country and are particularly noticeable in Tripoli. Predatory behaviour by armed groups is resulting in the misappropriation of Libyan State funds and the deterioration of institutions and infrastructure. The violent competition to capture the Libyan State is hampering the political transition in the country. 15. Targeted persecutions and serious human rights violations are deepening grievances among some categories of the population and ultimately threatening long - term peace and stability in Libya. The siege of Darnah and the indiscriminate shelling of residential districts have had the greatest impact on civilians and constitute a direct violation of human rights and international humanitarian law. The Panel is verifying video footage of summary executions of men in civilian clothing, allegedly by LNA soldiers, likely to have taken place in Darnah.
