In a speech to the Hungarian parliament, Orban hammers on the most important theme: nationalism and sovereignty vs globalism.

...the options are clear to the citizens of Hungary. There are two political strategies and visions for the future. Over there is one from the Left... They want to surrender Hungary’s thousand-year-old statehood and join a United States of Europe, while comforting themselves with the notion – in my opinion the delusion... that [autonomous] states will nonetheless survive. But if there’s a common currency, if there’s a common budget and if we assume responsibility for the debts of the Greeks, the Italians and heaven knows who else, then where is our national sovereignty? This is an illusion. So that’s where you are.... the heart of [the Left’s position] is not the preservation of the Hungarian nation’s independence and sovereignty, but something else.
