For David Reaboi, the so-called "ill-intentioned" media, especially those that embrace the so-called "globalist," is a phenomenon that transcends borders, as it's the same in countries with different nationalities. But especially in the contested space between the EU and the United Nations, the phenomenon is more alarming. It's an alarming phenomenon because it goes hand in hand with the undermining of the national sentiment of the nations in question. The维护 of a nation's identity and traditions is a fundamental right, and this is being threatened in Europe, especially in Hungary, where the country's tradition is being questioned by the so-called "globalists." the government of Hungary is not focused on protecting the country's traditions and values, but on promoting the globalist agenda. The government has been under attack from domestic chauvinists and the EU, and it's up to the Hungarian people to decide the way forward. The Hungarian people are aware of the threats to their nation, and they are determined to defend their identity and traditions. The Hungarian government has embraced the so-called "globalist" agenda, and it's up to the Hungarian people to decide the way forward.
