

The process I went through was doing more research initially, although I had already written the RAB its a different style of paper and I wanted this to look professional so I had to research many different essays and how to do footnotes and superscripts for this one . I did write to the same audience, my audience was the general public both pro choice and pro life each time. I had to include history to ensure that everyone knew what the argument was about as much as we may assume everyone knows about everything we do, they may not so I informed the audience. I did research more because I was impartial the last paper and this paper I was making it clear I was pro choice and I wanted to have more to strengthen that argument in this essay. My standards were to have a strong thesis, to make my argument clear to readers and to make this essay informative and "readable". I would give my essay a 96, I know how far I dug to get information on the history of abortion to present to my audience. I also worked on my presentation at the critique of my classmate to make my essay more cohesive. Also, I didn't receive the feedback from you I requested with the draft so I was unsure of exactly what to focus on. However, I feel it shows my growth over the semester looking back on my narrative. I would like to incorporate more background info next time.
