

I have actually never done this type of essay before, I have written narratives but never using photos. I have done collages if that counts but with collages there are no words so they do differ.

I am not 100 percent confident that they tell the story. I think they do and I tried to order them in the most cohesive way possible. I ordered the pictures from beginning to end of pregnancy and included a portion of motherhood.

I think it reveals that I'm more than just a student here, just as everyone else has a life outside of here. My life just includes taking care of another human.

I did follow the writing process.

I believe the audience will definitely get the takeaway message which was about growth and change throughout that time in my life and I've included the stages of growth in the photos I chose.

Nothing I feel like the coincide with each other.

Yes I do, I was slightly confused when it came to citing my sources, I would like to work on being able to tell the story better and invoke more emotion, basically I want to know how to make my essays as activating as the ones have seen. I would also like to work on the way I say things, I want it to come off more educated.
