- Before I started the subject for this assignment, I knew it was pertaining to the analysis of Stories that used murder as their focal points to push their messages. While writing this piece I encountered the issue of choosing which source to mainly write about, and landed upon Flint's piece of Civil War references because I thought it may help the most with my story in comparison to the other sources I'd chosen. I thought this because it went into the references utilized in O'Connor's story, and would help me better reflect on the story's messages utilizing these contrasts between the Civil War and the story's themes. This piece revealed that I am a detail oriented student and learner who focuses on existentialism behind any given piece more than most anything else. I believe I did my work a bit differently in just maintaining organization and formatting. It may be similar in the order I did it, first doing part 1, the 3 sources and then part 2, the reflection of my chosen source. If I had the chance to do my piece over again, I don't think I would change anything.
