

Learning Activities to Engage Your Audience

Research shows that attention is at its highest when something unexpected is introduced into a learning experience. This could be as simple as humor or a visual aid or as organized as an activity or peer-to-peer interaction.

To best captivate your audience, incorporate any of these learning activities into your presentation. Attendees are bound to walk away with a positive experience and a better comprehension of the information shared.

Simple but effective:

Catch your audience's attention by including a riddle or puzzle that relates to your content.

Peer-to-peer exchange:

When adults are active in their own learning and use the newly delivered information, they are activating neuron connections that will help with comprehension and memory.

Open the floor:

Allow attendees to have a voice and share their thoughts in an engaging fashion. Adults are more likely to ask a question if they feel compelled to participate.

Every great presentation tells a story.

By talking about your experience and inviting the audience to share theirs, you are more likely to hold attention and communicate the value of your content.
