History:
The franchise originated in 1882 as a charter member of the now-defunct 19th Century major league called the American Association. The name "Reds" was inspired by a previous, unrelated club called the Cincinnati Red Stockings, recognized as the first openly professional baseball team. The current Reds joined the National League in 1890 after spending its first eight years in the Association. In 1912, Redland Field, built on the city's west side, opened for the Reds. By the late 1910s, the Reds began to come out of the second division. The 1918 team finished fourth, and manager Pat Moran led the Reds to a NL pennant in 1919. The Reds finished ahead of John McGraw's New York Giants, and won the world championship in eight games over the Chicago White Sox. In the remainder of the 1920s and early 1930s, the Reds were generally second division dwellers. By 1931, the team was financially in the red, thanks to the Great Depression, and Redland Field was in a state of disrepair.

Powel Crosley Jr., an electronics magnate with his brother Lewis M. Crosley bought the Reds out of bankruptcy in 1933 and hired Larry McPhail to be the team's General Manager. McPhail began to develop the Reds' minor league system and expanded the Reds' base. The Reds throughout the 1930s became a team of "firsts". Crosley Field (formerly Redland Field) became the host of the first night game in 1935. Johnny Vander Meer became the only pitcher in major league history to throw back-to-back no-hitters in 1938. World War II and age finally caught up with the Reds. Throughout the remainder of the 1940s and the early 1950s, Cincinnati finished mostly in the second division.
