Instrumentation mechanician interview questions and answers

Tell me about you is one of the most common interview questions, but many job seekers draw a blank while trying to come up with a strong answer. While the question may seem simple, it is open, and answering concisely and effectively is difficult. Through practice and preparation, however, you can avoid common mistakes and make a good impression on your potential employer. Chelsea Goodman, president and career elevation expert at Got The Job, says a mistake candidates make when asked about you is donating too much. Most of the time, people are prepared with answers about their strengths and weaknesses, references from previous roles, but when they ask that question, they will start talking about their children or the activities they like to do outside of work, and that's not the point of this question, says Goodman. Instead, stay focused. Here are three points you want to cover when answering this question in an interview. Goodman says his answer should be brief, like an elevator throw. Avoid telling your whole life story. Instead, take a minute to choose the most relevant details about yourself and your professional life. Start by thinking about how your current role has helped you improve your strengths and weaknesses. If you manage a team, describe their responsibilities and include specific examples of initiatives or projects that you oversee on a daily basis. You want to emphasize the experiences that make you qualified for the role, so try to be more selective about the information you share. The impression you make in the first few minutes during your interview will shape how that person thinks, Says Goodman. There are many people who don't get off on the right foot and then have to recover from that, all because they couldn't answer the easiest question, which is not to be a 20-minute spiel about their life. Ideally, the role you are applying for will take your career to the next level. Mention where you see yourself in the future and how, if given the opportunity, the role will set the stage to help you achieve these career goals. Come up with some long-term goals and the length of time you expect to achieve them. You want to find out what you can about a company because it's important to you, Berger says. She suggests that framing your goals in this way shows that this potential relationship can be mutually beneficial. Let's say that the position is looking for a candidate who is willing to work flexible hours instead of a set schedule, or to take on multiple projects at the same time. Mention how and why your situation left you well positioned, and excited, to meet this challenge. The employer wants to know what kind of value you would bring to your company, says Lynn Berger, career advisor and career coach at Lynn Berger in New York The best way to do this is to give specific specific that are related to what the job is. She suggests breaking the job description before the interview, rummaging through each line, and coming up with relevant examples of situations in which you have produced positive results and how these results translate to the role you want to assume. In this case, tell me about what you really mean, tell me why you would be a good fit for this role. Berger says his answers should always be honest but thoughtful: The goal is to adapt their answers truthfully to match what the company is looking for. More from Grow: Along with the standard lading of questions about your background, education and why you want a particular job, an interviewer can cast a challenging or seemingly negative question to assess how you handle it and learn more about yourself. Tell me about a time when you experienced failure at work is usually not designed to trip you. The reality is that most people have already tried a project that didn't work or delivered a job that didn't meet the requirements. Focus on how you recognized, remedied and learned from the situation. Job interviews can be stressful enough without the added angst of answering an interview question deliberately thrown like a curveball. Strange interview questions are meant to catch you off guard, and if you give the wrong answer, it can cost you a job offer. When a hiring manager asks an interview question like if you could be any animal in the zoo, what would you be? don't think about it too much. Many questions like this are meant to see if you can think on your feet or act quickly. Spending a lot of time thinking about an answer, trying to determine what she'll think if you say giraffe instead of tiger, could make you seem undecided. During the preparation for the interview, practice answers to questions like these and be ready to give an answer, along with the reason behind your choice of animals. Sitting in the interview chair, you are obviously interested in working for the company. But if the hiring manager asks what your perfect job is, be prepared to describe a position similar to the one you're interviewing. For example, if you are being interviewed for a sales position and ask you to describe your ideal career, you could say: I enjoyed success in sales, then my ideal job would be a related, say, sales manager or a position in which I can guide other sales employees. In other words, if you're interviewing for a job as a litigation associate, don't confess that you've always wanted to be a restaurant owner. Answers like this can cause the interviewer to commitment to your profession or trade. Virtually everyone has a less favorite aspect of the job, whether it's a specific task or certain people you don't particularly like on your team. When an interviewer asks about their least favorite tasks or step carefully with an answer that will not reflect your desire to be a team player. Also, don't admit that there are items in the job posting that you don't particularly like, because this will probably eliminate you as an enthusiastic candidate. If archiving is your least favorite task, explain that you set aside routine time for it while you decompress from a stressful work day. In this way, the hiring manager sees that you approach even mundane tasks with a professional attitude. In addition to strange interview questions, there are interview techniques that can make you agitated. Stress interviews, for example, are intentionally designed to see how well you handle aggressive questioning. During this type of interview, you may be bombarded with questions from a panel, or a single interviewer may use an unpleasant tone. The best way to succeed in a stress interview is not to lose your composure. It's usually not the perfect answer to the question the interviewer is looking for; the interviewer's goal is to see how well you handle yourself, according to Chrissy Scivicque in a September 2013 U.S. News & World Report article, Keeping Your Cool in a High Stress, High Stakes Interview. As excited as you may be for the big job interview coming up, you're probably nervous too—and we all know it's hard to look at and sound awesome when your heart is beating and your brain is going into fight-or-flight mode. But don't be afraid, because a simple preparation makes a difference. When you enter feeling more confident, you may even find yourself enjoying the conversation. These are some of the most common interview questions for which you will need to be prepared. They are also some of the most complicated to answer. Interview Question 1: Tell me about yourself. Interviewers usually take with this, and even though it should be the easiest answer of all, sometimes it's the hardest. Your mind begins to flip through endless files of information, trying to pick out some relevant facts. Is the interviewer looking for a direct and meaningless answer? Are they looking for something that will impress them? Do they really want to know about your passion for artisancheeses, or should you save it for the second interview? How NOT to answer: Well, my enneagram/myers-briggs type/star sign number is . . . I'm the seventh of nine children... I grew up in Tulsa and i go back there occasionally for a vacation... I'm a bit of a night owl. I seem to be stating the obvious, but you'd be surprised how many people take a blank in the interview and start reciting your autobiography. There is nothing wrong with giving personal details, but at this stage of the they must connect to work somehow. (Of course, if the interviewer asks about your family or hobbies, this is different.) different). to answer: Here's the deal —the hiring manager is trying to get a point not only of who you are as a person, but how genuinely passionate you are about that role. Keep it relevant and let your passion for your field pass. Ready to find your dream job? Let's show you how. Get ready for that question by thinking about how you got where you are today—what led you to follow this career field and this job? Why does this job matter to you? Consider structuring your answer a bit like this: I've loved ___ for as long as I can remember. I really wanted to keep developing my skills in this area, which I did by _____. This eventually led to opportunities to make ___. ___ and _____. Now I want to bring these experiences and knowledge to this company, so I can help as many people as possible. Obviously, that's going to change to fit your story. But as a general rule, try to include details about your past experience in the field and connect it to why you do what you do now and where you want to go from here. Interview Question 2: Why did you leave your last job/ Why do you want to leave your current job? This is one of the most common interview questions (and one of the most likely to stumble candidates). The best practice here is to be honest, but don't go into all the horrible details (unless you're asked for more information). If you left for a reason easily explained how your job was a seasonal position or your family needed to move, great! If it was a more complicated situation, there are some who do and don't. How not to answer: You wouldn't believe how terrible my last boss was. My colleagues were petty and talked about me behind my back. I always had to work late and on weekends, and I got tired of it. My manager yelled at me if I was only five minutes late for work. They really didn't know what they were doing as a company. I never got a chance to lead a meeting. Or a project. Or anything. All of this can be a real reason why you left your job (or were asked to leave). I want you to be honest, but you also have to be careful with the tone and writing of your answer. You should never sound like you're complaining, complaining, or speaking ill of your former boss or colleagues, even if they've made your life miserable. Even if you've been fired, there's a better way to approach the issue. How to respond: The most important thing for the interviewer to know is that no matter what happened, you have learned and grown from it and are actively working to improve change. Try to frame the real reason for coming out within positive statements, explaining what you've learned and how you plan to use this information in the future. For example, if came out because of a bad work environment, you could say something like: I work better in a company culture where everyone is supportive and honest, and unfortunately I that there were some bigger problems within the company that didn't align with my values. But I'm grateful for the experience and i've learned that a healthy company culture is a crucial part of the job search for me. If you were dismissed, you could say something like: I was excited to try a new line of work and thought it would be a good fit for it because of my skills in _____ and my past experience of _____. But when I started the job, I found that I had misunderstood the work requirements and there should have been more communication on the front about the skill level required for this particular job. My manager and I agreed that I was not a good fit, but in the meantime, I have been working on my own communication skills and improving my craft in other areas by doing _____. Regardless of the situation, remember to enter with an attitude of humility and positivity. And never lie about your experiences —for the hiring manager, the truth is just a phone call away. Interview Question 3: What is your greatest weakness/strength? Now comes the embarrassing part where you can feel like you're throwing yourself under the bus or shouting your own praises from the rooftops. With the right approach and the writing, you don't have to do any of those things. Just like the question why you left your job, it's best to be honest and show how you're working to overcome weakness (but there's no need to unpack any emotional baggage). For strength, be modest, but know the value of your skills. How not to answer: I really have no weakness. I was better at research than anyone in my last company. I get angry when people don't get things right the first time. I have time management issues and I always stay behind. I'm a perfectionist. How to answer: When talking about strengths, try not to give generic answers. Everyone will say they are workers and like to do a good job. Instead, find the personal traits and skills gained from the experience that set you apart and make you a valuable asset to the company. Keep the job description in mind for this answer, and try to highlight the strengths you really have to match what they are looking for. Instead of simply naming the force, consider giving an example of a time when you used it in action or a person who pointed that force at you. For example, you could say something like: My former leader told me he didn't know what the team would do without my communication skills and ability to solve problems in difficult situations. In fact, even though I wasn't in a leadership role, he asked me to lead several projects for him. So you come up with humble and confident! To of weaknesses, show that you are self-conscious enough to know where your problem areas are. So explain how you deal with this weakness and and you are working to improve. For example: I'm not great with details. I'm a great thinker and I'm all about action, and that's why I sometimes shine on the small but important things. I have struggled to ask more specific questions and make sure I have all the information before entering a project that I am excited about. Interview Question 4: What salary do you expect to earn? Talking about salary is never really comfortable. No one wants to sell themselves short, but sometimes people are also afraid to name a number that seems ridiculously loud to the interviewer. Some companies may require you to give an exact number or at least an expectation of salary range, so be prepared with some numbers just in case. If they don't, however, you don't have to name a number. This can automatically limit the number you quoted, when the company may be prepared to pay more. Search job search sites like Indeed or Glassdoor to find out what the market value is for that position. So when asked, say something like My expectation is that I would receive market value. Interview Question 5: Of all the candidates, why do you think you should get the job? When it comes to this common interview question, you have to be ready to justify why you are a great fit for the company instead of just listing strengths. It can be intimidating to think of all the other people who are applying for this position and how you may or may not measure yourself to them. Instead of focusing on comparison, focus on what you bring to the table and what kind of value it would create for the company. How not to answer: a. I have a lot of experience. I'm on time. I learn fast. I know you'd do a better job than anyone. You don't want to repeat the list of strengths you told the interviewer earlier, and you also don't want to say something that all other candidates will say—even if it's true. There may be over a thousand people applying for this job who are just as punctual as you are. What makes you different? How to respond: Your strengths can definitely be part of your answer, but they shouldn't be your entire answer. Think of all the checkpoints you'd look for if you were the hiring manager. Is this person a good fit with the company's culture? Do they have a competitive level of experience? Do they care about our mission? Do they go further in their work? Then find a way to play briefly at all these points. Your answer should sum up your passion for the company, how your unique combination of skills and strengths would bring value, how your previous work matched you for this, and any important achievements you've had in your area that would set you apart from others Include any other significant details that show personally invested in this role. This is your time to be bold! Remember, it's important to include specific examples to back up what you say. The interviewer doesn't just want to hear information about you; they want to know why this information makes you the best person for the job. Questions you should never ask in your interview The interviewer won't be the only one asking questions in your interview! Any good hiring manager will ask you if you have any questions, and you should be prepared to ask some. There are some questions, however, that send the wrong message to your interviewer and can seriously hurt your chances of moving forward in the hiring process. Here are some examples: How much sickness/vacation time would I have? If I get all my hours, can my schedule be flexible? Do you check your employees' social media accounts? What's the policy if I'm late? So what exactly does this company do? When could I be promoted from this position? How often do you give increases to your employees? Do you test drugs on all your employees? How many warnings do you give before you fire someone? I hope I don't have to explain why these aren't great questions. Just use common sense and don't ask questions about salary, benefits or anything that makes you sound like a convicted fugitive, and you'll be fine! Appropriate questions to ask the interviewer: What types of people are successful here? How will my performance be measured, and how often can I expect feedback about my work? Do any team members work remotely? (Depending on the position, you may want to wait until the second or third interview to ask this.) How is the company culture and can you give me some examples of how this happens in a typical work week? Does this company offer employees any chance to do additional training or professional development? Questions like these show that you are eager to learn and excited about the opportunity. If you need more tips to stand out in the hiring process, check out my Get Hired Digital Course.
