Crash course world history 2 answers

0h13m where John Green returns to teach world history! This week, we'll talk about the idea of civilisation, some of the traditional hallmarks of so-called civilisation, and why some people choose to live outside the model of civilization. It turns out that not everyone who lives outside what we traditionally think of as a civilized social order is necessarily barbaric! To neutralize any tension you feel, I'll just tell you right now, the Mongols are back. You'll learn about Zambia, Sweden farming, and even a little bit about anarchy! And how the vast, interconnected civilization that included Egypt, the Levant and Sopotamia came to an end. What are you saying? Wasn't there such a culture? Your word against our word. John would argue that through a complex network of trade and intransigents, there was a relatively loose and continuous culture in the region. Why it all fell apart was a mystery. Was it the invasion of the sea people? An earthquake storm? Or just a general collapse, what complex systems are prone to? We'll look at some of these options. As usual with a crash course, we can't come up with a definitive answer, but it sure is a lot of fun to think about. Charles Hapsburg was the Holy Roman Emperor, but he was also king of Spain. And the King of Germany. And the King of Italy and Lord Holland and Count Platin of Burgundy. In short, Charles ran from many of the world during his reign. Charles ruled many countries, and he was also known for encouraging intellectual discourse and even speaking out against slavery, in a limited way. Then why did he see himself as a failure, and why did he lag the empire when he gave up in 1556? Mostly because the Holy Roman Empire didn't work so well. It was huge, and he had no means of raising taxes directly. Plus, it was a pretty crazy time in Europe anyway, and Charles found himself in charge of Empire in t 0h11m search on all LCPS sites or limit search using click buttons below.
