The Carpenter Center for the Visual Arts is pleased to present the solo exhibition Seeping, Rotting, Resting, Weeping by Los Angeles–based artist Candice Lin (b. 1979). Lin creates multisensory environments that combine ceramics, textiles, drawing, video animation, and other art forms. She often investigates the legacies of colonialism by tracing the trade routes and material histories of a range of colonial goods, layering her work with cross-cultural imagery from this research.
Offering a richly tactile and open gathering place, Seeping, Rotting, Resting, Weeping is composed of elements the artist created while sheltering at her home studio during the pandemic. Using visceral and evocative words, the title references the hands-on nature of her art-making—in particular, the process of fermenting indigo plants to make blue dye. Lin has devised a set of experiences, choreographed by participatory sculpture, installation, and video, that take us through rituals of moving our bodies, touching, and gathering in physical proximity. Each work features imagery of anxiety and hope, intimacy and estrangement, and an excess of bodily mutations, hybrid states, transformations, and relationships that combine animal species in ways that are by turn comic, tragic, and cathartic. This softening, and often complete erasure, of interspecies boundaries combined with Lin’s use of materials—such as dyed fabric, carpets, and plaster sculptures designed to be touched—reintroduces and reimagines the ways in which we can be together after nearly two years of isolation and loss. Ultimately, the exhibition encourages us to collectively question our precarious present and future, and to embrace new ways of understanding the world.

Cats abound in the space in forms ranging from ceramic pillows to a video’s animated cat demon. At times grotesque, intriguing, surreal, or mischievous, these feline figures invite us to imagine a world in which humans no longer play a central role and animals or other nonhuman actors reign. Greeting visitors at the gallery entrance is Lin’s video Millifree Work WearyTM Free Video (Qi Gong). In it, an unearthly feline figure moves serenely. The cat demon character—sculpted in clay, then 3D-scanned and animated—is practicing qigong. In this ancient Chinese health practice, a series of slow movements are combined with breathwork and meditation to cultivate the vital energy, or qi, in a person’s body and keep it flowing. As the scene unfolds, text and images from an internet bot appear, much like pop-up ads or spam texts, conflating health and wellness culture, online scams and memes, and a range of environmental issues. Visitors are encouraged to move along with the cat demon.

At the center of the exhibition, Lin has constructed an intricately designed tent that functions as both a temporary shelter and a sacred gathering place. The structure and the objects inside reference elements from a range of sources, both real and imagined. Lin hand-dyed and hand-printed each fabric panel using traditional Japanese techniques. The indigo designs also recall Nigerian adire cloths from the early twentieth century when parts of western Africa were under British colonial rule. These adire cloths combined abstract, geometric, and stylistic representations of nature with imagery of European kings and queens. The figures recall ancient Zhenmushou tomb guardians from the Tang Dynasty (China, 618–906 CE) that were intended to protect the deceased from evil. They also reference an idolatrous devil statue invented by an eighteenth-century European, George Psalmanazar, who claimed to be from Formosa (present-day Taiwan).

Along with Seeping, Rotting, Resting, Weeping is a handmade book, A Journal of the Plague Year (Cat Demon Diary). Bound by the artist, the journal features drawings, fabric samples, and writings that mix materials tests with surreal and sometimes harrowing drawings and writing alongside passages of tender reflection and vulnerability. Visitors may carefully flip through the pages of this book, which contains many of the exhibition’s central themes and imagery.

Lin has also made two sculptures that are “tactile theaters,” experiences of multisensory discovery meant to be shared with a partner. Roughly the size of a café table, two people sit facing each other on either side of each sculpture. Together, they navigate with their hands the crevices and terrains of the surfaces. Embedded in these miniature landscapes are molds of different body parts. In one of the sculptures, Lin has obscured the forms from sight using Verdant Curtain debuted at the 13th Gwangju Biennale, Minds Rising, Spirits Tuning, in 2021 and was made separately from the works in this exhibition. Lin chose to include it in the Carpenter Center’s iteration of Seeping, Rotting, Resting, Weeping. Verdant Curtain’s imagery of animal and plant life flourishing amidst a toxic, human-centered system, grounded in the real political and ecological context of
