The character Enoch in my book is a very sarcastic and insensitive character. He regularly talks to other characters with a rude and impolite attitude. In one part of the book a peculiar Gypsy boy wanted to join the group and Enoch replied with a very harsh and insensitive response. "We aren't some traveling circus you can join whenever the notion takes you," We're on a dangerous mission to save our ymbryne, and in no position to play babysitter to a clueless new peculiar!" I think the author wants people to be concerned about Enoch's attitude in the book, as in the first book he wasn't as insensitive and blunt. Perhaps the author is foreshadowing or hinting that Enoch is nervous or upset about something, and is taking it out on other people. I think the author wants you to think that Enoch is having a hard time coping with Miss. Peregrine not changing back, and is very upset and anxious about it.

My book "Holes" is very good. I like how the characters are come alive. The character Stanley has lots of good character traits and he gets along great with some of the other characters. At one point, Stanley finds a special item in his digging that makes the warden of the camp really like him. The warden starts treating him really well and I think this will have a big effect on the rest of the book.
