I can't say what he's thinking but I am pretty sure it has something to do with all the women he has slept with over the years played back in moments and slivers where he did the right thing and all was well.

Imagining the headline and realizing how stupid we are to leave our lives and wives and children and risk death as we venture further and further away from commercial aviation.

And then we realized that the ads for outdoor goods that made us buy the outdoor goods were real after all and the gear didn't make us experts.

My uncle gave me advice on how to make a good picture. He told me to find a barn in the snow. This is better. But he is still mostly right.

I see foxes on the roads at home all the time. So much so I think they might be my spirit animal. Then again I see ticks all the time too so I might need to rethink my criteria.

We show up in the latest camouflage and gore-tex outfits proudly worn through the airport, on the sea plane, and into the hunting lodge. In the morning when it's time to go the guides (the real hunters) are just wearing sweatpants.

The weather got bad and a plane was out of service and the horses were starving so we rode them out. This one took a bad fall backwards into the river. It was like watching your parent fall. It wasn't graceful. It was awkward, painful, and clearly serious.

What's great about this picture is that it is of the ground, which is unexpected. You can show it on the wall or you can be clever and show it on the ground. It is really flexible. That is only one of the reasons it is a great value.
