The Weekly Parsha

Parshas Mishpatim By Rabbi Ben Zion Sobel

"Distance yourself from a false word" (Shemos 23:7)

The Commentators point out that the Torah does not declare here, "Thou shalt not lie," (or something similar, as it does in Vayikra 19:17). Rather, the Torah commands us to distant ourselves from a false word. This is because it is not enough not to say a blatant lie. The Torah wants us to be totally truthful and as far away from falsehood as possible.

In Torasechah Sha'ashuai it is related that a young student asked Harav Shach zt"l if it is ok to let his friends copy from him during a test since they are pressuring him to allow them to do so. Harav Shach responded that they should have studied harder and been better prepared for the examination. Wanting a clear answer, the boy persisted, "and if they did not." Rav Shach answered, "Don't get involved in cheating." The boy accepted the answer but wanted to understand it fully so he asked again; "Does it fall under the category of lying (which is a very stringent prohibition) or merely fooling people (which is likewise forbidden but is not as severe)?"

"It constitutes not being ehrlich (honest; trustworthy)," responded the Rosh Yeshiva. "That is the greatest sin of all!"

I remember when my mother, may she be well, sent me to Yeshivas Chasan Sofer for the first grade. The Friday night of my first week there, my father, may he be well, called me over to him for a father-to-son talk. "You are a yeshiva bachur now," he began solemnly. "Do you know what the greatest sin of the Torah is?" "Not believing in Hashem," I replied. "That is the foundation of Judaism," my father retorted. "But I mean practical sinning. What is the greatest sin a man can commit?" When I replied that I did not know, my father said to me, "To tell a lie. That is the greatest sin of all."

Rav Ya'akov Kaminetsky zt"l, like his namesake, the Patriarch Ya'akov, was outstanding in the trait of Honesty. Many facets of his life were affected by his impeccable love of absolute truth. He would frown on anything that was not completely distant from falsehood. This included many aspects of common behavior.

When my oldest son, Yussie, was almost three years old, I told him that on his birthday I would take him to several tzaddikim (righteous men) for a berachah (blessing). When the big day arrived, he asked me to whom we were going. I said that I had arranged to visit the Rebbes of Satmar, Skulen and Skolia ztvk"l. Being a little brighter than most boys his age, Yussie asked, "Why don't we go to Rabbi Kaminetsky too? He's a big tzaddik!" I agreed, and we went to Reb Ya'akov before leaving Monsey for Brooklyn. I told Reb Ya'akov what my son had said and he found it amusing.

Turning to the birthday boy, Reb Ya'akov asked, "What would you like?" Although he was bright, Yussie couldn't resist answering the question honestly. "A candy," he said. Reb Ya'akov clapped his hands together and exclaimed, "He's right. I should have offered him a candy. The problem is that the Rebbetzin (Rabbi's wife) is not home and I don't know where she keeps them. But I'll go look for one." With that, the venerable sage went into the kitchen to search for a treat for a little boy.

When the Rabbi was out of earshot, I turned to my kid and said, "Hey, is that what we came here for. Didn't you say you wanted a berachah from Rabbi Kaminetsky? If he asks you again what you want, say, 'a berachah.'"

Reb Ya'akov did find a candy and handed it to Yussie. Then he asked him, "What do you want now?" This time, Yussie replied, "a berachah." Reb Ya'akov blessed him, "May you be a lamdan (a deep Torah scholar) and an ortlicher mentsh (ortlich is a difficult word to translate; it is probably best understood in the British connotation of a 'Proper Person')."

Yussie was happy with the berachah and the candy and Reb Ya'akov began to discuss some things with me. Suddenly, Yussie tugged at my coat. I bent down to him and he whispered to me, "Where should I throw the paper wrapping of the candy?" Reb Ya'akov asked me what he had said, and when I told him, his face beamed. "Dos iz (this is) an ortlicher mentsh," he exclaimed happily.

Divine Justice

Parshas Mishpatim teaches us that piety is found not only in our religious rituals and observance, but also in our adherence to the daily laws that govern our lives, both in business and social arenas. The Artscroll Stone Chumash explains, "Although Western man differentiates between Church and State, the Torah knows no such distinction." The Ramban remarks that the civil laws found in our parsha are merely an extension of the Tenth Commandment, the prohibition against coveting. The Sforno agrees, and adds that "the commandment warns one against coveting anything that belongs to his fellow." In our parsha, the Torah now defines what exactly belongs to others, and the halachic ramifications for any violations or damages to another's property. All of the laws of this parsha are part of Hashem's "mishpatim," and fall under the rubric of Divine Justice.

Several years ago I read an amazing mashal for Parshas Mishpatim that is a simple, yet powerful explanation of Hashem's "Divine Justice."

After the Revelation at Har Sinai, Moshe Rabbeinu wanted to better understand the laws of the Torah, so he asked Hashem to show him His Ways of Divine Justice. Hashem agreed and led Moshe to a hill overlooking a well, and instructed him to ascend to the top and look down. Gazing down from above, Moshe saw a man approach the well, and as he reached down to draw his water, his wallet fell out of his pocket and landed on the ground. Unaware, the man finished and walked away, leaving the wallet behind. A few moments later a second man came to the well, and when he reached down to draw his water, he noticed the wallet lying on the ground. He swiftly picked it up, put it in his pocket and quickly ran off. Moments later a third man approached the well, and as he was about to draw his water, the first man returned to retrieve his lost wallet. He asked the third man if he had seen the wallet, to which he truthfully replied that he had not. The two men began to argue, and the first man accused the third man of being a liar and a thief. Before long, a scuffle broke out, and in a fit of rage, the first man beat the third man to death and quickly fled the scene.

A bewildered Moshe Rabbeinu looked up and said, "Master of the Universe, please help me understand. I just witnessed a thief run off with a stolen wallet and then an innocent man was beaten to death – how is this justice?" Hashem responded to Moshe and explained, "The first man that you saw was the thief. From whom did he steal? He stole the wallet of the second man. The third man that you saw was a murderer. Whom did he kill? He murdered the father of the first man." This is Divine Justice. The second man retrieved what was rightfully his, the third man was punished by death for his crime, and the first man inadvertently returned the stolen wallet to its proper owner, and unbeknownst to him, was able to avenge his father's death. Good Shabbos.
