

Sharing

One day a man was taking his horse and donkey to the market. There was a heavy load on the donkey's back but nothing on the horse's back.

On the way, the donkey said to the horse,

"Please, share my load.
It is very heavy for me."

The horse said,

"Heavy or not, I do not care.
It is your load, and you must carry it yourself. Do not ask me to share it."

The donkey went quiet, so they continued walking silently. After a while, the donkey fell on the road. Its mouth started foaming, so the man removed the load from its back and placed it on the back of the horse.

As they continued their journey, the horse thought,

"I did not share the heavy weight of the donkey. Now I will have to carry it whole all the way to the market."

The horse was exhausted by the time they reached the market and learned that by sharing the burden of others, our burden would also be shared.
