You don't even have to have a table or a lot of space for a good game. The best part is that the game allows you to really use your mind and learn! Unlike many of the popular board games, it doesn't rely on moving a piece of play or collecting cards to progress. Scattergories is about exercising your creative thinking skills! The game starts with the roll of a huge daro with 20 different sides (some letters of the alphabet are not on the daro because they are too difficult). Four players have a specific period of time to think of a word that fits each category and start with the rolled letter. Although it sounds really easy, it's harder than you might think. Every word you choose must be unique and creative because if another player chooses the same word first, you don't get points. A good example is that one topic is Animal. If the first letter is D, then dog will be a very common answer. A more unique answer would be a disash or dalmatian because other players are less likely to find these answers. Learning to think quickly and strategically will help you get more points than your friends! Scattergories comes with ten lists, and because the first letter of each word is always different, there's a lot of playability. While the dao introduces a random item with each round, the list order can get repetitive if this is one of your favorite games (speaking for While you're given a lot of category cards, I find it's even more fun when you create your own lists. There are a couple of ways to do it, but my favorite way is to have all down a lot of categories on paper and put them all in a bowl. Then draw 12 categories from the bowl and pull the daro! After the round, draw 12 new categories and start again! If you don't know what makes a good scattergories list, here are some lists of examples to slide those creative juices! The most common problem is scattergories lists because players often discuss whether certain words are acceptable or not. Some good examples are:. if 'red apple' if acceptable for 'R'. 'crystal bowl' for 'C'. if a turtle can be considered a type of transport,. if a specific street name exists somewhere on the globe, and. if burgers can be found in a park. The correct answer depends on how players think. Players won't fight very hard to help one of their competitors get extra points. That's why it's important to play with friends or at least with a group of people who know each other and get along pretty well. It is important to remember Scattergories is a game created for fun and fun, not discussing which words are acceptable and which are not. In some cases, this problem can be solved by appointing an independent arbitrator. Just remember that friends can accept unacceptable words more easily instead of letting things get out of hand. It is important to be graceful if one of your words is not accepted or when another player receives a point even if you thought their word was incorrect. Make sure you're still friends, before and after playing!
