It's hard to decide on the right art school when there are so many great options out there. The first thing you need to think about is Would you consider going to another state or another country for college? Or would you rather stay closer to home? From there, you can decide which schools in your choice area appeal to you the most. Are you looking for a city, a suburb, or a rural atmosphere? One factor that distinguishes many of these colleges is the level of specialization throughout the curriculum. For example, the Rhode Island School of Design requires a basic course of study for all freshmen before they are divided into their separate sophomore artistic disciplines. But not all programs are like this: some art schools require you to choose emphasis and start with the learning process right away! Make sure you pay attention to how your title is structured to make sure it fits your goals. It is also important to consider whether each school offers the types of opportunities and facilities you want. If you're more design-driven than art-driven, you can consider a college like Person's. This school has programs focused on the practical application of design thinking to solve problems in the real world. If you're hoping to spend some time studying in the sand in college, you can think of the School of the Art Institute of Chicago, which requires students to complete an off-campus curriculum. The big takeaway is this: fully explore what each school has to offer before making a decision based on first impressions. What do you want from your arts education? Consider the potential connections you will form with faculty and the surrounding artistic community. This type of network can be a huge help down the road. New York schools like Pratt and Parsons have an advantage in this regard because they are located in one of the centers of the art world. All the schools on this list have great things to offer, but if you choose one that appeals very much to your interests and does the specific types of programs you're looking for, you'll have an amazing college experience.
