This story idea came to me on a writer's retreat weekend with some friends. We had challenged each other to write a short story in the course of our retreat. Of course, I didn't quite get it finished over the time of the retreat, but it's ready now. This book is the prelude to the Crossroads Romance series. Emily and Justin are in a predicament. He's engaged to her sister Portia and both have feelings for the other. What started out as an innocent kiss heated up into a hot affair, eventually Justin will have to make up his mind on who to pick, and Emily needs to decide if she is willing to let Justin go to her sister who hasn't been faithful the entire time she's been with Justin. I truly hope you enjoy the story. <http://kandisilvers.com> Chapter One She is really stunning. Justin Monet stole a glance across the large dining room table at his future sister-in-law Emily. Beside her, was her boyfriend Steve. Sitting next to Justin was his future bride and Emily's sister Portia—his future wife. Though lately, he started to wonder if maybe... You can't ditch your fiancée for her sister, its poor taste. It's just not done. You'll look like an ass. Logic reasoned, but did little to comfort him. Emily's dark gaze turned from the conversation Steve and her father were involved in and cast him a sideways glance and a smile. He couldn't control his grin as she turned away. "They make a good couple," Portia commented quietly next to him. "Who?" he asked, focusing on the woman next to him. Her lips curled up at the edges. "Emily and Steve. I hope he marries her." Justin stole another look to where Steve was still in deep conversation with the Carter matriarch. Nope. He just couldn't picture Steve and Emily together long term. Though they'd been together for just over a year the situation seemed off. Or I'm jealous. "I mean they aren't a perfect couple like you and I." He turned to Portia and stared into her bright blue eyes. She was everything a man could want. Only... "I want to make a toast," Audrey Carter announced and stood at the opposite end of the table from her husband. "I'm so glad that Portia was lucky enough to finally meet someone as wonderful as Justin. After being together for three years, and now officially engaged for two months, I'm glad we could come together with Hilary and Ron Monet as one happy family." He darted a glance over to his parents who were focused on Audrey and grinning like fools. The only one at the table not smiling was Emily. She stared in the direction of her mother but her gaze fell somewhere far away and revealed she was lost in thought. "So let's lift our glasses and toast the wonderful couple." Glasses lifted and he turned to Portia and placed a kiss on her lips. "I'd like to say a few words." Steve stood and lifted his glass toward Justin and Portia. "I figured now would be a good time to make the occasion even more joyful." Emily turned to Steve and something unreadable flickered in her dark gaze as she blinked at her boyfriend. "Emily and I have decided to get married." Her dark, long lashes parted wide and surprise registered on her pretty face. Her plump full lips pursed together for a fleeting second then curled into an insincere smile as the congratulations from everyone filtered around them. "Trust Emily to try and compete with me," Portia whispered. Justin darted a glance at his future wife; slightly taken aback by her comment. He wasn't sure why it bothered him. She'd made passing remarks similar in the past. "I don't think it's like that." Her brows furrowed and she cast him an expression as if he were crazy. "Of course it's like that. She's always been jealous of me." He glanced over to where Steve and Emily sat. Her sister had no reason to be jealous. She was tall, curvy in all the right spots, with doe like eyes and long lashes most women would kill for. Her pretty face was framed by dark waves that fell past her shoulders with streaks of deep red and honey highlights. Not to mention she was a brilliant graphics designer and doing well for herself. Steve was again talking to her father and Emily stared at her wine glass as if it were the most fascinating object in the room. Beside him Portia and her mother started rattling on about bridal dresses. He was about to turn away when Emily's gaze met his. This time there was no smile, quite the contrary. Sadness darkened her rich deep brown eyes. He knew why tonight wasn't setting right. There were two things. One, he was jealous of Steve and secondly, Justin realized he was marrying the wrong sister. And there's nothing I can do. Emily had to excuse herself from the table. Dinner was almost over anyway. Steve didn't even take a moment's pause from talking to her father. Her stomach hurt and she was starting to get a tension headache. She couldn't decide what was worse, seeing Portia and Justin together being all—well engaged, or Steve being a complete jerk and making that ridiculous announcement that wasn't even true. I don't want to marry him. Maybe for a whole five minutes at one time, but not now. She knew the reason why and it had everything to do with her sister's fiancé. When she was a teenager, she'd always wished she was more like Portia, who was eighteen months older than her. By the time she was twenty, she knew what she wanted, liked who she was and knew Portia would always be Portia. Beautiful and spoiled to the core. Everything had come easy for her. She paused in front of the mirror in the hallway and realized she was jealous of Portia. Her sister may be beautiful, but she was vain and selfish. Emily took in her appearance in the reflective surface and sighed. She glanced away and wondered if she slipped outside to the garden if anyone would even notice she was gone. Steve wouldn't. His head is too far up dad's ass. Looking back at how things had been recently with the campaign season starting to fire up, she knew where Steve's priorities were. His career and how her father's rich and powerful friends could help him all the way to congress. "Emily!" Portia entered the hall from the dining room and walked toward her. "I'd like a word with you." How I dream of your fiancé? Why yes, Portia, I usually do have my vibrator in my hand. She forced her lips into a smile. "About what?" "I want you to know I totally forgive you for announcing your engagement at my dinner to celebrate me marrying Justin." She blinked and studied her sister. "I didn't announce anything, Steve did." "Right," Portia nodded her head. "Well, I forgive him too. I know how hard it is for you." Emily didn't understand and narrowed her gaze. "How hard what is?" "Having me for a sister. I got the blonde hair, the blue eyes and the petite frame. You ended up with brown hair and eyes. Plus you got stuck with being tall and having to buy jeans with a longer than normal inseam." She patted Emily's knee. "I was the cheerleader, and popular and now I'm marrying Justin who is rich, good-looking and successful. Steve is a great guy, you could have done worse." Her temper kicked up a notch. Emily knew her sister was vain, but tonight Portia was pushing her usually high bar of vanity a few notches closer to the moon. "Steve is a great guy." Just not great enough to spend the rest of my life with. "Oh, I know and he is really amazing in bed, but he doesn't make as much money as Justin or have the same family prestige." Her full lips parted in shock. There were so many things wrong in her sister's single sentence; she didn't even know where to begin. "How do you know he is amazing in bed?" Good yes. Great sometimes. Amazing—not so far. Her sister winced and she scrunched her nose. "I dated him a few times a couple years back." "Right." The single word fell off Emily's tongue and she became even more upset. "You've been with Justin for three years." Portia grinned and glanced at her large engagement ring. "I know." She then met Emily's gaze. "I dated Steve for a brief period when I didn't think Justin was ever going to get serious about me and ask me to marry him. I had to keep possibilities open." She batted her lashes. "Besides, we know I'm never single for long." Because you haven't broken up with one before you start screwing another. She remained quiet since she was in no mood to argue with her sister. She would undoubtedly say something she'd regret. It would be the truth, but that wasn't the point. Portia shrugged. "I'm surprised Steve never told you." "No, it never came up." She was still stunned from the revelation. "I can imagine. Probably for the best. I mean he most likely didn't want you to feel like you were getting hand me downs or feel like you were second best." She didn't know how to respond. Emily was more upset that her sister cheated on Justin than over the fact she slept with Steve first. What the hell is wrong with me? Her stomach hurt. She needed air. "There are my girls. We're going to be having tea and coffee in the living room," her mom announced as she darted a look between her two daughters. "Is everything okay?" "Perfect," Portia replied. "I better find that hunky man of mine." She walked down the hall toward the large living room. Her mother's gaze rested on her and her brows dipped with concern. "Are you feeling okay?" "Fine," she lied. "I just feel a bit warm. I need a bit of air." "Well don't be long; desert will be brought in shortly." Emily nodded and slowly maneuvered toward the back door off the kitchen. She tugged open one of the large French doors and stepped out onto the patio. Inhaling deeply, she hoped the cooler autumn air would cleanse her troubled mind and remove some of the weight settling on her chest. The door opened behind her and she turned to Steven. Right away he pulled her into his arms and grabbed her ass, pulling her toward him. "I've been looking for you." His hands slipped under her skirt and instead of being aroused, her temper, from his stunt earlier, hit full force. Looking over Steve's shoulder, she spotted Justin walking around the corner of the house.
