CHAPTER ONE

I hate travelling. Actually, that's not true. I love being in new places, seeing new sights, trying new dishes, meeting new people. I love writing about new places because, well, it's lucrative. And, more often than not, transport, accommodation, food and tours are included if I can wangle the right gig. As a freelance journalist, who am I to turn down an all expenses paid junket?

But the getting there? Not so much, because it generally involves airports. I hate airports. I'm too much of a control freak to be subjected to such demeaning chaos. Who enjoys queues? The scanners? The over zealous security staff who take themselves much too seriously? And I hate flying even more. Who wants to spend that much time in a glorified tin can that may or may not involve the end of one's life? Yes, I know that — statistically — I have more chance of dying from crossing the road, but at least I can invariably jump out of the way of a moving vehicle in time.

So when Jo Jo Twain — the editor of Wanderlusting Magazine — called to say she needed someone to write a cover story on Singapore's hidden gems and that someone was me, my inner Homer Simpson responded with a Woo hoo! followed closely by a D'oh.

'And we need you there tomorrow,' Jo Jo told me.

'Tomorrow? Really?' Shit. I was going to have to cancel my date with Levi. Gorgeous, chocolate-skinned Levi. It had taken a month for us to be able to synchronise our location and schedules. Tomorrow evening was the only time we were both available and in the same locale, for at least a few months. I groaned internally, and it wasn't with pleasure.

'Yes, really. Do you want the job or not?' I could tell she was annoyed. And then I remembered why I didn't like working for her. She was always so snippy. She probably needed to get laid a lot more than she currently did. Lack of sex affected one's temperament. I knew that from personal experience.

I sighed. 'Of course I do, Jo Jo. It's always been my dream to cover Singapore's hidden gems.' I was hopeful that my light tone covered the sarcasm dripping from my tongue.

She missed it, probably thinking about the next writer she could harangue for the day. I'm sure she had a quota. Piss off five writers per day, or no bonus.

We got down to the business of discussing details. All my transport, accommodation, food and tours were covered. Blah, blah, blah. And then she dropped the clanger.

She'd booked me on the red eye.

Bitch.

CHAPTER TWO

As as I hung up the call from Jo Jo, I dialled Levi's number. He answered straight away. He was never one to be evasive, even on the phone, and that was one of the things I liked about him. He called it as he saw it, and was a man who said what he felt. Rare, in my experience. Whenever we could, given that he lived in one city and I another, we'd arrange a weekend of fucking. Kind of like how we met, but that's a story for another day.

'Hey, gorgeous,' he said. 'What's up?'

'Bad news, I'm afraid,' I said. 'This weekend is out. Gotta got to Singapore for work. Last minute freelance gig for Wanderlusting.'

'You're kidding me!' *

Long flights should always be this exciting;
Younger men are her weakness...

No stranger to travel, forty-something freelance writer Kat Snow found interesting ways to pass the time on long flights, and it usually involved a hot man.

Checking-in didn't bring her the usual upgrade to business class she expected, but Kat did cross paths with young, confident Damon; who made sure their chance encounter wasn't wasted. Twice.

Seated next to silver fox Nathan, Kat discovered he had his own ideas for making time fly in the most; exciting of ways.

And while the mile high club was fun diversion, one man showed Kat that the ground was the best place to be;

Excerpt...

My rationale for heading to the bar was that it might be 6.30AM here, but it was twelve noon somewhere else in the world. It was, therefore, totally acceptable for one to be drinking vodka and soda with a young, attractive man, while waiting for one's flight. Totally acceptable.

The bar was deserted save for a couple of drunk Americans talking loudly about their sexual conquests while they were in Australia. We ordered our drinks and settled into a booth, sitting side by side, almost touching. Damon raised his chin and arched an eyebrow in the direction of the Americans.

‘In my experience, those who talk about it the most are usually the ones that are getting it the least.’

‘In your experience? Do tell,’ I said.

He laughed. ‘Not my style to kiss and tell.’

*‘That’s one of my favourite qualities in a man,’ I said.
‘Of course, there are other qualities I enjoy equally.’*

My hand slipped under the table and brushed his thigh, my touch light as a feather. He responded in kind and slipped his hand between my knees, fingers skimming up my inner thigh. His touch was electric, even through the denim of my boyfriend jeans.
