A Towel for the Mermaid, A Lighthouse for Magic

Cooper stepped into the lighthouse's long dawn shadow and closed the car door behind him carefully. He was early, as he'd planned. He unfolded his heavy towel, spreading it to make sure none of the wet grass would touch the jacket of his tuxedo, and sat down to look out at the water. This was where it had all begun: below the lighthouse, watching the waves. Everything was the same. Everything was different.

The rest of the wedding party came eventually. Sienna was among the last to arrive, but that too was planned. She had to do her hair and make up, and it minimized the chance Cooper would see his bride before the wedding. Some people would have rejected the idea as superstition, but not Cooper, and not Sienna. They were together in part because they were the sort of people who took old ideas and wives tales seriously.

It was obvious to everyone that they should marry at the lighthouse. That was where the land and sea met, after all, and that was where they had met. That was where their completely disparate worlds had clashed in violent confusion, saving both their lives. *

This is a magical tale of unexpected love. It is a story about sudden encounters in faraway places, and how life can change for the better when it seems very dark indeed.
