Arrival

Molly waited at the gate. The instigator of this particular adventure, she was somewhat nervous. She and John had spent an enlightening weekend here six months back and it was he who had suggested she get away for a bit. He was consumed by work, at the office all hours and out of town more days than not, and she was tired, frustrated, and bored. She had expressed all of these things and more with a tantrum that allowed her some reprieve, and the next day he'd arranged her trip. All she needed to do was pick three close friends to accompany her on the retreat.

Pauline was a no brainer. They were the best of best friends, and had shared (almost) everything their whole lives. Pauline had been with her since 8th grade. They'd lived a few houses down from one another and attended all the same schools. They'd shared all the joys and tears of their romantic lives, from their first crushes to their first kisses. They'd lost their virginity within a month of one another, Molly with her then boyfriend, Pauline with a cute guy at a party. Their secret hope was to marry gorgeous twin brothers and be sisters at last. As it happened, they'd not married brothers, but roommates; John and Gary had been living together when Gary met Pauline. It was Pauline who had introduced her to John. Molly had been close lipped about her more recent revelations but wanted to share with her near sister a new closeness.

Elizabeth lived a few doors down from Molly. They'd developed a friendship over long months of near constant proximity. They saw each other nearly every day, either running a few miles through the neighborhood, walking the dogs, at the grocery store, or the gas station. They even used the same gynecologist. They'd started meeting for coffee a few times a week since they were always meeting at the same cafe anyway. They'd shared similar upbringings, both coming from upper middle class families and attending the same sorts of private schools. They'd both married after college and had dreams of starting a family. Where Molly was outwardly the more conservative of the two, though, Elizabeth was much more outgoing and open. Elizabeth was an adventure junkie; she was always looking for the next challenge, whether training for her next triathlon, hiking the Appalachian Trail, white water rafting, skydiving, or zip-lining. She'd had an equally adventurous love life leading up to her marriage, and while she didn't discuss what she and Michael currently enjoyed together, Molly was sure it was much more daring than what, until recently, had been her and John's sex life.

Ann had been a wild card choice. She ran the Soup Kitchen downtown, where Molly volunteered, but they weren't close friends. She was a sweet, soft spoken woman, and was kind and caring to everyone she met. She was the only mother of the group, having two small children, ages 2 and 4. Molly knew that most of Ann's life revolved around her family and her job and figured that if anyone could use a weekend off, it was Ann. She only hoped that her gut was right and that Ann would enjoy this as much as Molly hoped.

The gates were opened and the short break she'd had from the questions she couldn't answer started again in earnest.

"Where are we?"

"How did you find this?"

"What is a 'Toyhouse?'"

"What is a Toyhouse Retreat?"

"Why can't I find this place online?"

"Why can't I find this place on Google Earth?"

"Are you sure about this?"

They'd arrived. Molly was relieved to see the proprietors waiting to receive them. The last time she'd been here, they'd remained away until just before checkout. Even in the short time she'd spent with them though, they'd made an impact. Don was a tall, thin, bespectacled man who somehow managed to be dapper and dorky at the same time. His wife, Renee, was a beauty. Her long wavy red, gold hair framed a heart shaped face that was always quick to smile. Her simple white linen dress hugged her curves in a way that was almost indecent. Molly couldn't help but imagine throwing a bucket of water her way, to see the thin fabric turn translucent and stick to her skin. Would she see the outline of some lacy underthings, or would she be blessed with a vision of hard nipples straining against the too tight dress, a red gold triangle between the thighs. Renee would have to either walk back into the house, the fabric clinging ever closer, or strip right there in front of them. Molly could feel her cheeks getting warmer and that most telling tingle between her legs. Renee would of course have to punish her.

Molly was jolted back to reality with the slamming of a car door. The girls were ready to go inside.

"Welcome, ladies, to the Shady Marquis Bed and Breakfast," Don said, dropping a dramatic bow with a sweeping gesture intended to herd them indoors. "Please come in, leave your cases in the hallway, and join us for tea in the den. You must be tired from your journey, and I'm sure you have questions about your retreat." The girls nodded assent; his tone was hypnotic and demanded attention. They were on their way in before he even finished his sentence. Renee led them into a side parlor; Molly, at the back of the line, blushed in remembrance.

"Ahem," Don quietly intoned while brushed his hand against her back. "You must be Ms. Molly. I believe you were previously here for one of our training camps, correct?" Molly nodded her head, looking behind her to make sure none of her friends could hear. Don seemed to recognize the gesture and quietly laughed, "Don't worry. Renee will take care of your friends. She is an excellent hostess."

"I don't know your companions. You invited them here?" Molly nodded, still speechless in his presence. "Ah! Splendid! Then you will be the leader." Quickly finding words in her shock, she loudly proclaimed "No!" She heard the muted laughter and conversation die in the room behind her and continued more quietly, "Don't you have people here for that?" A few beats later, she heard the activity continue in the parlor. "The last time I was here..."
