Synopsis: An independent woman from Boston takes a chance and gets engaged to a Nebraskan cowboy farmer, not realizing that he's built a tough shell around his exterior, and is deathly worried that the drought will take his farm. When a crisis comes up she feels it could bring them together but the ice has barely thawed and it's not until a second incident that she feels hope that their relationship might work out after all.

Kate Street squinted out the dusty train window taking in the Nebraska territory. It was beautiful in it's own right, but nothing like Boston. She hadn't even been gone a fortnight and already she missed her home city.

Then again, what she didn't miss were the cold nights unsure of what she would wake up to, the uncertainty of not knowing if she would have food and the worry and anxiety caused by struggling to survive on her own.

It was the main deciding factor in Kate becoming a Mail Order Bride. She wanted security.

Then again, if she were honest, love was part of the equation for her. She hoped and prayed that the man she married would come to love her someday. It was like the stories her mother used to tell her—fairy tales really; the beautiful young woman was always rescued by her prince.

“Can I get you anything else, miss?” The steward stood over her, a pleasant expression on his face.

“No, but how much longer is it until we reach the station?”

The steward consulted his pocket watch and smiled down at her. “About twenty minutes if my timing is right, miss.”

“Thank you.”

He gave a short bow and moved on down the car.

She watched him for a moment then turned her attention back on the scenery outside of the window. The thought of leaving behind everything she had known was exciting at first. It was like an adventure where everything was new. Every sight was fantastic and every experience thrilling. But, as the traveler on such an adventure, Kate was beginning to see that it was also lonely, long, and uncertain.

She bit her lip, tears rushing to her eyes. She would not be afraid.

The few letters that she had exchanged with Mr. Alvin Roper had been pleasant enough. His handwriting was strong though he did seem to get right to the point, not indulging in any frivolous discussion. He'd been more focused on the details, but at the time Kate had seen that as a blessing.

Now though, she wished she'd taken time to ask a few more questions. What was life like in Nebraska? What would she be called on to do at the farm? What were some of Alvin's hobbies? What was the town like?

If she were honest, the questions were endless but she reminded herself that that's what marriage was for—the time to answer those questions within the stability of a home.

Her heart soared at the thought of having her own home -- a roof over head and food on the table. She didn't mind the work that she'd likely have to put in for that to be true. No, she was ready to work hard in order to make their house a home.

The thought of children made her blush, but she hoped that Alvin wanted them as well. To have a house full of the sounds of laughter and imagination had always been her dream.

She wanted to be like her mother had been.

Even during the times that they'd been poorest, her mother had taken the time to cultivate Kate's imagination. Whether it was a fort made of blankets or a ship made from sheets and the washing tub, they had laughed and played together.

That's what she wanted for her children—their children.

The motion of the train began to slow which caused her heartbeat to pick up. The time had come for her to stop dreaming and to live in reality.

It was time to find out who her prince was.

Alvin Roper stood at the train station, his Stetson shading his eyes from the bright sun. Once again he questioned his sanity. He'd been so busy with the functional details that he hadn't really thought through the personal details of bringing a woman into his life—let alone a wife.

He rubbed his jaw, the stubble there surprising him. Had he forgotten to shave that morning? He likely had.

The farm hands had come early to make sure they were prepared for the rain that the clouds on the horizon promised. At least he hoped they promised rain. It had been too long in-between rainstorms and he was beginning to worry about the crops.

Whistling loudly, the steam engine raced up to the station, its cloud of white steam billowing out around it.

Alvin wasn't sure how he'd know what Kate Street looked like. She'd described herself as short with blonde hair but that could characterize any number of women.

He looked up and down the platform until he saw a lone figure standing toward the back of the train. The woman looked left, then right, worrying her lip. Her blonde hair was piled high on top of her head, as was the custom of most women in the city. She wore a dark brown dress, drab from the looks of it, and only had one valise with her.

It had to be Kate.

He swallowed, surprised at his momentary nervousness. He wasn't some young buck out to his first cattle drive. No, he was seasoned and a farmer now.

Sucking in a deep breath, Alvin approached the woman. "Um, hello."

Her eyes widened, taking him in. "Hello?"

"Are you Kate Street from Boston?"

"Yes," she said hesitantly. "And you are?"

"Alvin Roper. You're husband to be. Are you read to go? I've got the pastor waiting for us." He said it as a matter of fact because there was no sense beating around the bush.

He watched as she digested the information, then as her eyes took in his features.

The words of his mother came back to him, chastising him for keeping his hat on while a lady was present. He argued back in his mind with her explaining that his hair looked better covered up anyway.

Finally, she said, "I guess we'd better go then."

"Follow me." He turned his back on her and headed toward the wagon he'd pulled up in the shade.

He felt her eyes burning into the back of him and cursed himself for this foolish venture. He didn't need a wife.

Then again, the long winter days and nights had become lonelier of late. His farm hands were no means of company. It was just that she was so young. She looked to be barely twenty and here he was, nearer to forty than thirty anymore.

He rubbed his jaw again and reminded himself that she'd been in need of this arrangement too. If nothing else he'd get a cook out of the deal. He felt a twinge of guilt at the thought. He wasn't marrying her to be a slave, but he couldn't deny the fact that he'd love some good, homemade food for a chance.

At the wagon he turned around. She was several feet behind him, struggling to catch up while she carried her suitcase. He probably should have offered to help her. *
