ADDENDUM TO CONTRACT #1099 BETWEEN WILLIAM HARDISON AND KATHRYN O'CONNOR

1. Both parties will ignore the sparks that ignite between them whenever they are in a room together. 2. They will forget the soul-touching kisses they have already exchanged and never engage in such activities again. 3. If, after all this, either party falls in love with the other party to this contract...well, that is their problem, and this office shall not be held responsible in any way.

Dear Reader,

Silhouette Romance is proud to usher in the year with two exciting new promotions! LOVING THE BOSS is a six-book series, launching this month and ending in June, about office romances leading to happily-ever-afters. In the premiere title, The Boss and the Beauty, by award-winning author Donna Clayton, a prim personal assistant wows her jaded, workaholic boss when she has a Cinderella makeover....

You've asked for more family-centered stories, so we created FAMILY MATTERS, an ongoing promotion with a special flash. The launch title, Family by the Bunch from popular Special Edition author Amy Frazier, pairs a rancher in want of a family with a spirited social worker ..and five adorable orphans.

Also available are more of the authors you love, and the miniseries you've come to cherish. Kia Cochrane's emotional Romance debut, A Rugged Ranchin' Dad, beautifully captures the essence of FABULOUS FATHERS. Star author Judy Christenberry unveils her sibling-connected miniseries LUCKY CHARM SISTERS with Marry Me, Kate, an unforgettable marriage-of-convenience tale. Granted: A Family for Baby is the latest of Carol Grace's BEST-KEPT WISHES miniseries. And COWBOYS TO THE RESCUE, the heartwarming Western saga by rising star Martha Shields, continues with The Million-Dollar Cowboy.

Enjoy this month's offerings, and look forward to more spectacular stories coming each month from Silhouette Romance!

Happy New Year!

JUDY CHRISTENBERRY

has been writing romances for fifteen years because she loves happy endings as much as her readers. She's a bestselling writer for Harlequin American Romance, but she has a long love of traditional romances and is delighted to tell a story that brings those elements to the reader. Judy recently quit teaching French and devotes her time to writing. She hopes readers have as much fun reading her stories as she does writing them. She spends her spare time reading, watching her favorite sports teams and keeping track of her two daughters. Judy's a native Texan, living in Plano, a suburb of Dallas.

Chapter One

"I'd like to see Mr. Hardison," Kate O'Connor announced calmly to the efficient-looking woman behind the large desk. "Do you have an appointment?" They'd certainly reached the sticky part quickly. "No, but I won't take much of his time. I'm here to talk to him about the sponsor program." "Are you with the press?" the secretary asked with a frown, flipping the pages of her calendar. Kate wanted to say yes, but her innate honesty wouldn't let her. "No." "Then why do you want to speak to Mr. Hardison?" "I'd prefer to give my explanation to him," Kate returned, her spine stiffening with resentment at the woman's attitude. Careful, she warned herself. She mustn't let her temper do her in. She needed to subdue it just as she'd subdued her red hair this morning, pinning it into a sedate French roll. "I can give you ten minutes next month." Next month wouldn't do. She was too close to going under. "I need to see him now." "Sorry." The word was accompanied by a superior smile that made control of her temper difficult. Without another word, Kate walked out of the deeply carpeted office. Once the door had closed behind her, she sank against the wall, her shaking knees and aching heart unable to continue. It had been two months since her father's death. Two difficult months. She'd discovered the diner her father had run for years had been losing money the past twelve months and, along with his medical bills, had almost exhausted her father's savings. She'd come up with a plan to keep the diner, but she needed an infusion of capital. Her sister Maggie had offered her savings, even though she didn't want to keep the diner, but Kate couldn't take Maggie's money. A smile lit her face. Pop always said Maggie was a changeling because of her cautiousness. But she was financially solvent, the only one in the family. Their half sister Susan, only recently discovered by Kate and Maggie, was trying to raise two half siblings on her own. She certainly couldn't invest in Kate's idea. Besides, Kate felt it was her job, as oldest in the family, to take care of her sisters. Not the other way around. And she was determined to do so. When she'd turned to the banks, however, they wouldn't offer her much without better collateral. She'd been desperate when an article in the newspaper had caught her attention. The CEO of Hardison Enterprises had begun a sponsoring program for small businesses. Without waiting for second thoughts, she'd dressed in her only business suit, a bright blue, Parisiandesign outfit that showed off her curves, and had come to see Mr. Hardison at once. It turned out she needn't have called at all since she couldn't see him with an appointment until next month. The door behind her opened and she heard the snooty secretary say, "I'll have it for you in fifteen minutes, Mr. Hardison." Then, as the door closed, Kate watched the back of the woman as she hurried down the hall away from her. Leaving the CEO unguarded. I know you always warned me about being impulsive, Pop, but I've got to go for it. She quietly opened the door and slipped back into the outer office. Staring at the door to the forbidden sanctum across the room, she briefly wondered if she had the nerve to just walk in. She grinned. Pop always said she had more nerve than sense. She'd never proved him wrong. It wouldn't happen now. She pushed away from the wall, charged across the room and opened the inner office door. Her first surprise when she caught sight of the man behind the desk was his age. If pressed, she'd guess him to be thirty, give or take a couple of years. Had she gotten the wrong office? This man appeared too young to be the head of Hardison Enterprises. And somehow she hadn't pictured Mr. Hardison as being so...sexy.

Then he stood. His tall, lean frame only increased the intimidation she felt as she looked at him. On a lesser man, she would've called his expression a glare. On him, the look threatened bodily harm to anyone who bothered him.

"Mr. Hardison?" "Who are you?" he snapped.

Bingo. She had the right office. "My name is Kathryn O'Connor. I need to talk to you about the sponsor program." "Are you a reporter?" His voice was harsh.

What was it with these people? Were their lives so exciting that they were constantly pursued by the press? "No. But I—" "Then get out." He sat back down and turned his attention to a pile of papers on his desk.

Kate stood there, wondering what her next move should be. She wasn't about to give up but— "I told you to leave." He didn't even look up.

"Not before I talk to you. I want to be considered for the sponsor program." He covered his handsome face with one hand before looking at her. "That's what you want? Forget it."

"Wait a minute. I'd be a good risk," she protested, moving closer to his desk. "Then go to a bank." He turned his attention back to his paperwork. "They won't loan me enough money."

"Lady, there are no free rides, even for someone who looks like you." His gaze roved over her and she felt her cheeks heat up. "I'm not asking for a free ride," she returned, her voice reflecting her anger at his accusation. *

THE TWELVE-MONTH MARRIAGE

Their marriage was a business agreement, plain and simple. Will Hardison needed a wife to prevent women from chasing his millions. Kate O'Connor needed help so she could build her late father's dream. So they struck a deal; they'd marry for one year, and both of their problems would be solved.

Of course, there would be no touching; or kissing; or making soul-searing love; or giving away hearts. But then came the wedding;!
