

International Litigation and Other Dispute Resolution

In a competitive global environment, disputes between enterprises are inevitable. That's concerning for any business, but it can be particularly concerning in an international context, where there may be a risk of less than equitable treatment from a foreign legal system. Cultural differences in how business practices are handled can also drive conflicts. Treaties may regulate how certain matters are handled, but while this mitigates some risks, it often requires that parties defend themselves before unfamiliar administrative bodies.
