REVOLUTION

I N

SOUTH-CAROLINA.

CHAPTER EIGHTH.

Of the reduction of Savannah, the subsequent incursions into South-Carolina from Georgia, and the attack on Savannah by the French and Americans.

HE campaign of feventeen hundred and feventy-eight having passed away without any remarkable military enterprize in the northern states, and the attempts of the British commissioners to induce the Congress to relinquish independence, and their alliance with France, having proved abortive, the commander in chief of the royal army, in New-York, thought proper to turn his arms more imvolution.

mediately against the southern states. To this end a plan of operation was concerted with major-general Prevost, who commanded in East-Florida; and it was intended that Georgia should be invaded both on the north and south side at the same time.

WHILE preparations were making for this conjunct expedition, two bodies of armed men. composed of regulars and refugees, made a very fudden and rapid incursion into the state of Georgia, from the province of East-Florida. One of these parties came in boats through the inland navigation, and the other marched over land by the way of the river Alatamaha. The first demanded the furrender of Sunbury; but, on receiving a spirited refusal, expressed by lieutenantcolonel Mackintosh in these laconick words-' Come and take it,' they left the place, and retired to a neighbouring island. The latter purfued their march towards Savannah. General Screven, with about a hundred militia, repeatedly skirmished with this party in their advance through the country. In one of these engagements he received a wound from a musket ball, in consequence of which he fell from his horse. After he fell feveral of the British came up, and, upbraiding him with the manner in which captain Moore of Brown's rangers had been killed, difcharged their pieces at him. Few men were more esteemed or beloved for their virtues in private life; few officers had done more for their . country country than this gallant citizen, who lost his life in consequence of the wounds received on this occasion.

THE invaders purfued their march till they were within three miles of Ogeechee ferry, atwhich place mr. Savage, with his own flaves, had erected a breastwork to prevent their passing. Colonel Elbert, with about two hundred continentals, took post in the works erected by mr. Savage, and prepared to dispute the passage of the river. These obstacles, together with information that the other party had failed in their expectations of reducing Sunbury, determined them to retreat without attempting to cross. On their return, they laid waste the country for many miles, burnt St. John's church, a considerable number of dwellinghouses, and all the rice and other grain within their reach, and also carried off with them all the negroes, horses, cattle, and plate, that could be removed either by land or water.

It is impossible to tell whether this burning, plundering incursion, introductory to a serious plan of operations, advanced or impeded the British designs. It certainly alarmed the sears of some, and made them more averse from persevering in the war. But on others it produced quite contrary essects. Their revenge and indignation was roused, and they were stimulated to do and suffer every thing rather than submit to such conquerors.

THE citizens of Georgia were foon obliged to encounter a much more formidable force. On the twenty-feventh of November, feventeen hundred and feventy-eight, lieutenant-colonel Campbell, a brave and able officer, with the feventy-first regiment, two battalions of Heffians, four of provincials, and a detachment of the royal artillery, embarked from Sandy-Hook for Georgia, escorted by a small squadron of thips, under the command of commodore Hyde Parker. The fleet arrived on the twenty-third of December at the island of Tybee, near the mouth of the river Savannah, and in a few days after the troops effected a landing. From the landingplace a narrow causeway of fix hundred yards in length, with a ditch on each fide, led through a fwamp. Captain Smith, with a fmall party, was posted at this causeway, to impede the passage of the British; but his force was too inconsiderable to check their progress. They pushed on with fuch vigour that the American party was almost instantly dispersed. The continental army, on which the defence of Georgia rested, had lately returned from a fummer expedition against East-Florida, in which their numbers had fuffered fo great a diminution, that the whole did not exceed fix hundred effective men. General Howe, who commanded the Americans, had taken his station on the main road between the landing-place and the town of Savannah, with the river on his left, and a morals in front, which extended beyond his right flank. The British advanced till they

they were within a few hundred yards of the American army, when lieutenant-colonel Campbell manœuvred so as to cherish an opinion, that he meant to attack on the left. For that purpose he ordered the first battalion of the seventy-first to form on the right of the road, thereby to impress a full idea that he meant to extend his front in that quarter. At the same time a considerable part of the royal army was detached to cross the fwamp above, fo as to get in the rear of the Americans. Fortune had thrown a negro into the hands of lieutenant-colonel Campbell, who knew a private path through the fwamp, by which he promifed to lead the troops without observation or difficulty. At length lieutenant-colonel Campbell, prefuming that the detachment had got effectually round upon the rear of the Americans, fuddenly advanced, and general Howe ordered an immediate retreat. A few minutes delay would have made a retreat impossible, and it was then only practicable in the face of that part of the British army which had effected their paffage through the fwamp. A fmall body of about one hundred militia, of the state of Georgia, had been previously posted in the rear of the barracks near the town of Savannah. This detachment made fome opposition to the British, as they were iffuing from the fwamp, but they were foon compelled to retreat, and their commander, colonel Walton, was wounded and taken prisoner.

THE Americans retreated with precipitation, and in diforder. The British pursued with spirit and rapidity. No victory was ever more complete. Thirty-eight officers, and four hundred and fifteen privates, forty-eight pieces of cannon, twenty-three mortars, the fort with its ammunition and stores, the shipping in the river, a large quantity of provisions, with the capital of Georgia, were all in the space of a few hours in posfession of the conquerors. The British pursued the Americans through the town of Savannah. In the impetuofity of the pursuit, some of the inhabitants of that capital, who had not been in the action, were bayonetted in the streets, several were killed or wounded in their flight, and a large number, finding their escape impracticable without fwimming a deep fwamp, were obliged to fue for quarters. The Americans faved three field-pieces out of four; but, in the difficult passage of the fwamp, many loft their arms. That part of the army which escaped retreated up the river Savannah to Zubly's ferry, and croffed over into South-Carolina.

THE private foldiers who were taken on this occasion, having resolutely resused to enlist in the British service, were crowded on board prisonships. This consinement, and the heat of the weather in the summer of seventeen hundred and seventy-nine, proved satal to such numbers, that, for a considerable time, sour or sive died every day. The continental officers were sent to Sunbury on parole, except the reverend Moses Allen, chaplain of the Georgia brigade, who was denied that privilege. His warm exhortations in the pulpit, and his animated exertions in the field, exposed him to the particular refentment of the British. They fent him with the private foldiers on board the prison-ships. Wearied with a confinement of feveral months in that loathfome place, and feeing no prospect of relief, he determined to attempt the recovery of his liberty by throwing himself into the river, and swimming towards an adjacent island; but he was drowned in the perilous attempt. Notwithstanding his clerical function, he appeared among the foremost in the day of battle, and on all occasions fought the post of danger as the post of honour. The friends of independence admired him for his popular talents-his courage and his many virtues .- The enemies of it could accuse him of nothing more than a vigorous exertion of all his powers in defending what he conscientiously believed to be the rights of his injured country.

AGREEABLY to inftructions general Prevoft had marched from East-Florida into the southern parts of Georgia about the same time that the embarkation took place from New-York. The King's troops, in traversing the desert that separates East-Florida from Georgia, were obliged to live for several days on oysters. After encountering many difficulties, they heard the welcome news of the arrival and success of lieutenant-colonel Campbell. Savannah having fallen, the fort at Sunbury foon followed its example. General Prevost marched to Savannah, and took the command of the combined forces from New-York and St. Augustine. Previous to his arrival, a proclamation had been issued to encourage the inhabitants to come in, and fubmit to the conquerors, with promises of protection on condition, that, 'with their arms, they would ' fupport royal government.' Great numbers fubmitted; but the determined republicans fled up into the western parts of the country, or into the state of South-Carolina. Lieutenant-colonel Campbell acted with great policy in fecuring the fubmission of the inhabitants. Civil government was after fome time re-established, and the lower parts of the state were in peace.

In proportion as the British gained footing in Georgia, the neighbouring states of South and North-Carolina became anxious for their fafety. The continental regiments of North-Carolina were with the grand army under general . Washington. That state, on the first intelligence of an intended embarkation from New-York for the fouthward, generously raised a body of militia about two thousand in number to serve for five monthsput them under the command of the generals Ash and Rutherford, and sent them without delay to the relief of their fouthern neighbours. These reinforcements came forward with so much dispatch, that, had it not been for a delay of ten days near Charleston before they were furnished with with arms, they would have been in time to have joined general Howe prior to the reduction of Savannah. North-Carolina was, at this late period, unable to arm her own militia; but neverthelefs fent them on, expecting that they would be fupplied by their neighbours. South-Carolina, though better provided, was not able to furnish arms for the militia of both states. While the British were in the offing, it was uncertain whether South-Carolina or Georgia was their object. This induced prefident Lowndes and his council to delay the distribution of their scanty stock of publick arms till the defigns of the British became evident. The rapid movements of lieutenantcolonel Campbell put him fo foon in possession of the capital of Georgia; that the North-Carolina militia made their first junction with the American army after their retreat over the river Savannah.

At the request of the delegates from South-Carolina, Congress appointed major-general Lincoln, a native of Massachusetts, to take the command of all their forces to the southward. This officer was greatly respected for his many amiable qualities, and was acknowledged to be one of the first military characters in America. He was second in command in the expedition of seventeen hundred and seventy-seven, when general Burgoyne and his army surrendered to general Gates. A considerable share of the success of that campaign was justly ascribed to his Vol. II.

perseverance and abilities. He brought to the fouthward great reputation, and there, though under many disadvantages, he acquired the farther honour of checking the British conquests, and preserving the state for upwards of sisteen months against a superior enemy. His plans were well formed; but his little army, mostly consisting of militia, was not able to contend with superior numbers, and the discipline of British regular troops. The continentals under his command did not exceed six hundred men, and all the rest of his force was made up of draughts from the inhabitants of the country, changed every second or third month.

Upon advice received of the intentions of the British to invade the fouthern states, president Lowndes, in order to keep as great a force as possible in the country, laid on a general embargo, and prohibited the failing of vessels from any port of the state. This was repeated for two fuccessive periods of thirty days each. By proclamation, dated December 28, 1778, he alfo ordered 'the proprietors of neat cattle, sheep and 6 hogs, on the fea-islands and other parts, immediately exposed to the incursions of the enemy, to remove them off the faid islands or exposed e places, that the British might be prevented from obtaining a supply of provisions.' He also addreffed the legislature in an animated speech, of which the following is a part: 'Our inveterate and obdurate enemy, being foiled in the northern states, and, by the valour and good conduct of the inhabitants, compelled to abandon their hopes of conquest there, have turned their arms more immediately against these southern ftates, in hopes of better fuccess. They are 'now in possession of Savannah, the capital of Georgia, from whence, if not prevented, an easy transition may be made into this country. 'This fituation of danger, gentlemen, calls for your most ferious consideration. Our whole force and strength should be exerted to stop the progress of the enemy. Government ought to be trusted with ample powers to enable it to act vigorously and decisively in the present con-'juncture. The militia-law requires an immediate revifal and amendment, to accommodate it to our present circumstances, and every measure that has a tendency to counteract and defeat the views and defigns of the enemy, should be embraced and adopted with alacrity and dispatch.' These spirited sentiments were re-echoed by the house of representatives, in an address of which the following is a part: 'That our cruel and ambitious enemies should turn their arms against these southern states is a circumstance not unexpected. But this last nefarious struggle of our desponding foes will, we trust, under the affistance of Divine Providence, in the end tend more to shew their impotent malice than the wisdom of their councils or the valour of their arms; for that fame spirit which once animated our countrymen to drive them difgraced from s our our coasts, will again be exerted to effect the like happy consequences. We conceive ourselves bound by all the difference there is between the horrors of slavery, and the blessings of liberty, to use every means in our power, to expel them from our country, and for this purspose to strengthen the hands of government, and to revise the militia-law, so as to facilitate our operations against them.

GENERAL Lincoln established his first post at Purysburgh, a small village on the northern banks of the river Savannah. A large proportion of the militia of the state of South-Carolina was draughted, put under the command of colonel Richardson, and marched for the American headquarters. Their numbers were confiderable, but they had not yet learned the implicit obedience necessary for military operations. Accustomed to activity on their farms, they could not bear the languors of an encampment. Having grown up in habits of freedom and independence on their freeholds, they reluctantly submitted to martial discipline. When ordered on command, they would fome times enquire 'whither they ' were going?' and ' how long they must stay?'

The royal army at Savannah, being reinforced by the junction of the troops from St. Augustine, the British commanders formed a scheme of extending a part of their forces into South-Carolina. To this end major Gardiner, with two hundred hundred men, was detached to take possession of Port-Royal island. Soon after he landed, general Moultrie, at the head of an equal number of men, in which there were only nine regular foldiers, attacked and drove him off the island. This advantage was principally gained by two field-pieces which were well ferved by a party of the Charleston militia artillery, under the command of the captains Heyward and Rutledge. The British lost almost all their officers, and feveral prisoners were taken by a small party of Port-Royal militia, commanded by captain Barnwell. The Americans had eight men killed, and twenty-two wounded. a Among the former lieutenant Benjamin Wilkins was the theme of universal lamentation. His country regretted the fall of a worthy man, and an excellent officer. A numerous young family fustained a loss which to them was irreparable.

This success of the Americans checked the British, and for the present prevented their attempting any enterprize against South-Carolina; but they extended themselves over a great part of Georgia, and established two posts, one at Ebenezer, and the other at Augusta. This last place, being high up in the country, was a good position for awing the western inhabitants, and a convenient place of rendezvous for the friends of royal government. The British having established themselves in the upper country of Georgia, their next object was to strengthen themselves by the addition of the tories. To this end emissaries were employed to encourage them to a general infurrection. They were affured that if they would cross the Savannah river, and add their force to that of the King's army in Augusta, they would have fuch a decided fuperiority as would effectually crush the rebellion, and make a speedy return to their homes practicable on their own terms. Several hundreds of them accordingly embodied, and marched along the western frontiers of South-Carolina. Among those men, thus collected, under the specious denomination of loyalists, were great numbers of the most infamous characters. Their general complexion was that of a plundering banditti, more folicitous for booty than for the honour and interest of their royal mafter. As they marched through the fettlements, they appropriated to their own use every kind of property that they could carry off. Colonel Pickins, on receiving intelligence of their progress and rapine, collected the whig militia of the district of Ninety-Six, and placed captain Anderson at the Cherokee Ford, on Savannah river, to impede their croffing, whilst he went to attack a fort in Georgia, in which were collected fome tories and British. Unable to succeed in this enterprize without letting fire to the fort, which his humanity would not permit him to do, he retreated and marched with all speed to the croffing-place on the river. Here, to his great mortification, he found that captain Anderson

· had been obliged to retreat, and that the tories had made good their passage. Colonel Pickins, with about three hundred men, immediately followed and came up with them near Kettle creek, where an action took place which lasted three quarters of an hour. At length the tories gave way, and were totally routed. Colonel Pickins had nine men killed, and feveral wounded. The royalists had about forty killed, in which number was their leader colonel Boyd, who had been fecretly employed by British authority to collect and head these insurgents. By this action the British were totally disconcerted. The tories were difperfed all over the country. Some ran to North-Carolina, fome wandered not knowing whither. Many went to their homes, and cast themselves on the mercy of the new government. Soon after this defeat and dispersion lieutenant-colonel Campbell retreated from Augusta towards Savannah, and, for the remainder of that season, the whole upper country of both South-Carolina and Georgia enjoyed domestick fecurity.

The infurgents on this occasion were the subjects of the state of South-Carolina, and owed obedience to its laws. They were therefore tried in a regular manner, by a jury, under the direction of the courts of justice, appointed by the republican government. Seventy of them were condemned to die by the laws of the state, enacted since the abolition of royal government; but the sentence of the court was executed only on five five of their principals, and all the rest were pardoned.

This fecond unfuccessful insurrection damped the spirit of the tories. Their plans were ill laid, and worse executed. They had no men of ability capable of giving union to their force. They were disappointed in all their expectations of aid from the royal army, and had the mortification to see a few of their ringleaders executed for treason and rebellion against the state.

As the British extended their posts up the river Savannah on the fouth fide, general Lincoln fixed encampments at Black Swamp, and nearly opposite to Augusta on the north side. From these posts he formed a plan of crossing the river at Augusta and at Zubly's ferry in two divisions, with the view of limiting the British to the sea coast of Georgia. In the execution of this defign general Ash, with sifteen hundred North-Carolina militia, and the remainder of the Georgia continentals, croffed the Savannah river on the 28th of February 1779, and immediately marched down the country as far as Briar creek. At this place, on the fourth day after his croffing the Savannah, he was furprized at three o'clock in the afternoon by lieutenant-colonel Prevost. This detachment of the royal army, having croffed Briar creek, fifteen miles above general Ash's encampment, came unexpectedly on his rear. The American militia completely furprized, were thrown thrown into confusion, and fled at the first fire. Several were killed, and a confiderable number taken. None had any chance of escaping but by croffing the river, in attempting which many were drowned; of those who got over safe, a great part returned home, and never more rejoined the American camp. The few continentals, about fixty, under colonel Elbert, fought with the greatest bravery; but the survivors of them, with their gallant leader, were at last com pelled to furrender themselves prisoners of war. Of this division of the army, the whole that remained and rejoined the American camp, did not exceed four hundred and fifty men. This event deprived general Lincoln of one fourth of his numbers, and opened a communication between the British, the Indians, and the tories of South and North-Carolina. In a few days after, viz. on March 21, 1779, the Congress and Lee, two American gallies, were lost in the river Savannah. in an attempt on a British galley. In going down the river from Purysburgh, on this business, the Congress galley ran ashore within gun-shot of the enemy, and the Lee, after a gallant refistance, unsupported by her comrade, was abandoned.

UNEXPERIENCED in the art of war, the Americans were frequently subject to those reverses of fortune which usually attend young soldiers. Unacquainted with military stratagems, deficient in discipline, and not thoroughly broken to habits of implicit obedience, they were often surprized, Vol. II.

and had to learn, by repeated misfortunes, the necessity of subordination, and the advantages of discipline. Their numbers in the field, to those who are acquainted with European wars, must appear inconfiderable; but fuch is the difference of the state of society and of the population in the old and new world, that, in America, a few hundreds decided objects of equal magnitude with those which in European states would have called into the field many thousands. The prize contended for was nothing lefs than the fovereignty of three millions of people, and five hundred millions of acres of land; b and yet, from the remote fituation of the invading power, and the thin population of the invaded states, this momentous question was materially affected by the confequences of battles in which only a few hundreds engaged.

The feries of disasters which had followed the American arms, fince the landing of the British in Georgia, occasioned, among the inhabitants of South-Carolina, many well-founded apprehensions for their future safety. The assembly of the state, desirous of making a vigorous opposition to the extension of the British conquests, passed a very severe militia-law. Hitherto the penalties for disobedience of orders were inconsiderable, but as the defence of the country, in a great measure, depended on the exertions of its inhabitants, much heavier sines were imposed on those who either neglected to turn out, or who misbehaved or disobeyed orders. Every effort was made to strengthen the continental army. Additional bounties, and greater emoluments were promised as inducements to encourage the recruiting-service. The extent and variety of military operations in the open country pointed out the advantages of cavalry; a regiment of dragoons was therefore ordered to be raised, in which the following appointments took place:

Daniel Horry, colonel.

Hezekiah Maham, major.

John Canterier,

John Hampton,

Benjamin Screven,

Richard Gough,

Thomas Giles,

Ifaac Dubofe,

In this time of general alarm John Rutledge, efquire, by the almost unanimous voice of his countrymen, was called to the chair of government. To him and his council was delegated, by the legislature, power 'to do every thing that 'appeared to him and them necessary for the 'publick good.' In execution of this trust he assembled a body of militia. This corps, kept in constant readiness to march whithersoever publick service might require, was stationed near the centre of the state at Orangeburgh. From this militia camp colonel Simmons was detached with a thousand men to reinforce general Moultrie at Black-Swamp. The original plan of penetrating into Georgia was refumed. With this intention general Lincoln marched with the main army up the Savannah river, that he might give confidence to the country, and lead into Georgia a body of militia encamped in South-Carolina, under the command of general Williamson. fmall force was left at Black-Swamp and Purysburgh for the purpose of defending Carolina, while offensive operations were about to be commenced in Georgia. General Prevost availed himself of the critical time when the American army was one hundred and fifty miles up the Savannah river, and croffed over into Carolina from Abercorn to Purysburgh, with two thoufand four hundred men. In addition to this number of regular troops, a confiderable body of Indians, whose friendship the British had previously secured, were affociated with the royal army on this expedition. Lieutenant-colonel Mackintosh, who commanded a few continentals at Purysburgh, not being able to oppose this force, made a timely retreat. It was part of general Prevost's plan to attack general Moultrie at Black-Swamp, to effect which he made a forced march the first night after he landed on the Carolina fide, but he was about three hours too late. General Moultrie had changed his quarters, and being joined by colonel Mackintosh's party, took post at Tulifinny bridge, in order to prevent the incursion of the British into the state, and to keep between them and its defenceless capital. General Lincoln, on receiving information of these movements, detached colonel Harris, with three hundred of his best light troops, for Charleston: but crossed the river Savannali near Augusta with the main army, and marched for three days down the country towards the capital of Georgia. He was induced to pursue his original intention from an idea, that general Prevost meant nothing more than to divert him from his intended operations in Georgia, by a feint of attempting the capital of South-Carolina, and because his marching down on the fouth fide of the river Savannah, would occasion very little additional delay in repairing to the defence of Charleston. General Prevost proceeded in his march by the main road, near the sea coast, without opposition, as far as Coosawhatchie bridge. Lieutenant-colonel John Laurens, with eighteen continentals and a much larger number of militia, was detached from general Moultrie's camp, to dispute this difficult pass. That gallant officer persevered in this hazardous attempt, till he was wounded, and had lost one half of his continentals. The British fired in security under the cover of houses on the opposite bank, and had the advantage of a field-piece. On this, the first time of their being in danger, the American militia could not be perfuaded to stand their ground. A retreat took place, and was conducted by captain Shubrick, over a long caufeway, in the face of a superior foe.

As the British army advanced into the country they committed many outrages and depredations. The day before the skirmish just mentioned they burnt all the buildings on major Butler's plantation at the Eutaws. The day after they burned the Episcopal church, in prince William's parish, and general Bull's house at Sheldon.

THE position of general Moultrie at Tulifinny was by no means a safe one, for the British might easily have crossed above him, and got in his rear. A general retreat of his whole force towards Charleston was therefore thought advisable. This was conducted with great propriety, though under many disadvantages. General Moultrie had no cavalry to check the advancing foe, and, inflead of receiving reinforcements from the inhabitants as he marched through the country, many of the militia left him, and went home. Their families and property lay directly in the route of the invading army. Several, after providing for their wives and children, rejoined general Moultrie in Charleston; but the greater number sought fecurity by flaying on their plantations. The retreating Americans destroyed all the bridges in their rear, but there was fcarce any other interruption thrown in the way of the British in their march through the country. The absence of the main army under general Lincoln, the retreat of general Moultrie, the plundering and devastations of the invaders, and above all the dread of the royal auxiliaries, the Indian favages, whose conftant stant practice is to murder women and children, diffused a general panick among the inhabitants, and induced many of them to apply to the British for their protection. New-made converts to the royal standard endeavoured to ingratiate themselves with their protectors by representing the capital as an eafy conquest. This flattering prospect induced general Prevost, contrary to his original intention, to pursue his march. Governor Rutledge, with the militia lately encamped at Orangeburgh, had fet out to join general Moultrie at Tulifinny bridge; but, on the fecond day of their march, advice was received of general Moultrie's retreat, and that general Prevost was pushing towards Charleston. This intelligence determined the governor to march with all the force under his command to the defence of the capital.

When general Prevost crossed the Savannah river, Charleston Neck was almost wholly defenceless. An invasion on the land-side, by an army marching through the country, was an event so unexpected, that no proper provision had been made against it. If the British had continued their march with the same rapidity with which it was begun, and attempted to take the town by a coup-de-main, they would probably have succeeded; but they halted two or three days when they had advanced more than half the distance. In this short interval lieutenant-governor Bee and the gentlemen of the council made the greatest exertions to fortify the town on the land-fide. All the houses in the suburbs were burnt. Lines and an abbatis were in a few days carried from Ashley to Cooper rivers. Cannon were mounted at proper intervals across the whole extent of Charleston Neck. Thefe works were planned with great judgment, and executed with uncommon dispatch by lieutenant-colonel De-Cambray. His exertions procured him the thanks of the affembly. He was also honoured with a medal struck on the occasion, expressive of the high estimation in which his services were held by a grateful country. The militia in the vicinity were fummoned to the defence of Charlefton. They generally obeyed as far as was practicable on fo short notice. Publick affairs now appeared in a very critical fituation. General Lincoln was marching unmolested towards the capital of Georgia, apparently evacuated for his reception, while general Prevost was advancing with as little interruption to the capital of South-Carolina. General Moultrie's retreating army, governor Rutledge's militia from Orangeburgh, and colonel Harris's detached light corps, which marched nearly forty miles a day for four days fuccessively, all reached Charleston on the oth and 10th of May. The arrival of fuch seasonable reinforcements gave hopes of a successful defence.

On the 11th nine hundred of the British army, their main body and baggage being left on the fouth side of Ashley river, crossed the ferry, and in a few hours they appeared before the town. On the fame day that they marched down Charleston Neck, the infantry of an American legionary corps croffed Cooper river, and landed in the town. This was commanded by brigadier-general count Pulaski, a Polander of high birth. This illustrious officer had been concerned in a bold enterprize, in favour of liberty in his native country. He with a few men had carried off king Stanislaus from the middle of his capital, though furrounded by a numerous body of guards and a Russian army. The king, after being a prisoner for some time, found means to escape, and soon afterwards declared Pulaski an out-law. Nothing could be more congenial to the fentiments of this generous friend of the rights of mankind than to employ his arms in support of the American states. Influenced by these sentiments, he offered his service to Congress, and was honoured by that body with the rank of a brigadier-general. At this period of the war he had been detached from the northern American army to the aid of the fouthern states, and opportunely arrived when his fervices were most wanted. The men under his command had scarcely arrived two hours, when he led eighty of them out of the lines of Charleston, and slationed them in a valley behind a finall breaftwork, with the view of drawing the British into an ambuscade. General Pulaski advanced a mile beyond his infantry, and joined a small party of regular horse, and mounted militia volunteers, VOL. II. E and and with that force engaged the British cavalry for a short time, and then retreated to his infantry. They, from an eagerness to engage, had quitted their works, and advanced to an eminence in front of their first station. The advantage of the intended ambuscade was by this means loft, and they had to engage a superior number on equal ground. The British foot foon came up, and compelled the Americans to retreat into the town. General Pulaski had several fuccessful personal rencounters with individuals of the British cavalry, and on all occasions discovered the greatest intrepidity. The gallant example of this distinguished partizan, courting danger on every occasion, had a considerable influence in difpelling the general panick, and in introducing military fentiments into the minds of men who had heretofore been peaceable citizens.

MAJOR Benjamin Huger, a distinguished officer, and a gentleman of the most honourable and liberal sentiments, was, while commanding a party without the lines, killed in the night of the 11th, through mistake, by his countrymen.

FORT Johnson, on James island, was blown up with the view of strengthening the garrison in the town, by the addition of the party stationed on the island, and of preventing the British from getting possession of it.

As the royal army was unfurnished for a siege, and had nothing to depend on but the chance of a fudden affault, this was confidently expected. That it might not be done by furprize, tar-barrels were lighted up in front of the works. The defence of the town rested on the exertions of three thousand three hundred men, the greater part of whom were militia wholly unacquainted with military operations. The British at Ashley ferry, and before the lines, were about two thousand four hundred men, but were without cannon or shipping.

IT was prefumed by the garrifon that general Lincoln, with the army under his command, was in close pursuit of general Prevost, but his precife fituation was unknown to every perfon within the lines. To gain time in fuch circumstances was a matter of great consequence. A whole day was therefore fpent in fending or receiving flags. Commissioners from the garrison of Charleston were instructed to propose 'a neutrality dur-'ing the war, between Great-Britain and America, and that the question whether the state ' shall belong to Great-Britain or remain one of the United States, be determined by the treaty of peace between these powers.' This proposition, being made to lieutenant-colonel Prevost, acting as a commissioner in behalf of general Prevolt, he answered, 'that they did not come 'in a legislative capacity.' On a second interview lieutenant-colonel Prevost ended the conference by faying, 'That, as the garrison was in arms, arms, they must furrender prisoners of war. This being refused, preparations were made for fustaining an immediate assault.

GENERAL Prevost, disappointed in his expectation of surprizing the town, and fearing the consequences of an assault on the lines, re-crossed Ashley river, and, to avoid general Lincoln's army, now in his rear, he filed off from the main land to the islands on the sea coast.

WHILE the British were encamped on James island, about seventy or eighty of the Americans were posted nearly opposite to them at the plantation of mr. Mathews, on John's island. On the 20th of May a party of the troops, commanded by general Prevoft, croffed over the narrow river which feparates the two islands, furprized the out fentinel of the Americans, and extorted from him the counterfign. Possessed of this criterion, they advanced in fecurity to the fecond fentinel and bayonetted him before he could give any alarm. Without being difcovered, they then furrounded the house of mr. Mathews, rushed in on the unprepared Americans, and put feveral of them, though they made no refistance, to the bayonet. Among the rest mr. Robert Barnwell, a young gentleman who adorned a very respectable family by his many virtues, good understanding, and sweetness of manners, received no less than seventeen wounds; but he had the good fortune to recover from them them all, and still lives an ornament to his country. The British having completed this business, burned the house of mr. Mathews.

GENERAL Lincoln continued his march for three days in Georgia; but on receiving certain information of the state of affairs in Carolina, he recrossed the Savannah river, and advanced towards general Prevost. Both armies encamped within thirty miles of Charleston, watching each other's motions, till the 20th of June, when an attack was made on part of the British army, intrenched at Stono ferry. Agreeably to a preconcerted plan, a feint was to have been made from James island, with a body of militia from Charleston, at the same time that general Lincoln began the attack from the main; but from mismanagement and a delay in providing boats, the militia from Charleston did not reach their place of destination till several hours after the action. The American army confifted of about twelve hundred men. Only one half of which were continentals. The militia of North and South-Carolina were posted on the right, and the continentals on the left. Colonel Malmedy led a corps of light-infantry on the right, and lieutenant-colonel Henderson on the left. The Virginia militia and the cavalry formed a corps of referve. The British force confisted of fix or feven hundred men. They had three redoubts, with a line of communication, and field-pieces very advantageously posted in the intervals, and the whole whole fecured with an abbatis. That they might be haraffed, or lulled into fecurity, for feveral nights preceding the action, they were alarmed by fmall parties. When the real attack was made, two companies of the feventy-first regiment fallied out to support the pickets. Lieutenantcolonel Henderson ordered his light-infantry to charge them, on which they instantly retreated. Only nine of their number got fafe within their lines. All the men at the British field-pieces, between their redoubts, were either killed or wounded. The attack was continued for an hour and twenty minutes, and the affailants had manifestly the advantage; yet the appearance of a reinforcement, to prevent which the feint from James island was intended, made a retreat necesfary. The whole garrifon fallied out on the retiring Americans; but the light troops, commanded by colonel Malmedy and lieutenant-colonel Henderson, so effectually retarded the British in their pursuit, that the troops commanded by general Lincoln not only retreated with regularity, but brought off their wounded in safety.

THE loss of the Americans on this occasion in killed and wounded was about one hundred and fifty. ^c Among the former was the gallant colonel Roberts, whose superior abilities as an artillery-officer, commanded the approbation of his countrymen, and rendered his early fall the subject of universal regret.

SOON

Soon after this attack the American militia, impatient of absence from their plantations, generally returned to their homes. This was productive of no inconvenience to the fervice; for, about the fame time, the British left the islands in the vicinity of Charleston, retreating from one to another, till they arrived at Port-Royal and Savannah. The fea-coast of South-Carolina, to the fouthward of Charleston, is so chequered with islands, and interfected with creeks and marshes, as to make the movements of an army extremely difficult. The British were much better provided with boats than the Americans, and therefore could retire with expedition and fafety. Various projects were attempted to enable general Lincoln to purfue them. Boats on wheelcarriages, constructed so as to suit the variegated face of the country, were proposed; but before any thing of this fort could be completed, the British had retreated to places of security.

This incursion into South-Carolina, and subfequent retreat, contributed very little to the advancement of the royal cause, but it added much to the wealth of the officers, soldiers and sollowers of the British army, and still more to the distresses of the inhabitants. The forces, under the command of general Prevost, marched through the richest settlements of the state, where there are the sewest white inhabitants in proportion to the number of slaves. The hapless Africans, allured with hopes of freedom, forsook their owners, and repaired in great numbers to the royal army. They endeavoured to recommend themselves to their new masters, by discovering where their owners had concealed their property, and were affifting in carrying it off. All fubordination being destroyed, they became infolent and rapacious, and in some instances exceeded the British in their plunderings and devastations. Collected in great crowds near the royal army, they were feized with the camp-fever, in fuch numbers that they could not be accommodated either with proper lodgings or attendance. The British carried out of the state, it is supposed, about three thousand slaves; many of whom were shipped from Georgia and East-Florida, and fold in the West-Indies; but the inhabitants lost upwards of four thousand, each of whom was worth, on an average, about two hundred and fifty Spanish dollars. When the British retreated, they had accumulated fo much plunder, that they had not the means of removing the whole of it. The vicinity of the American army made them avoid the main land, and go off in great precipitation from one island to another. Many of the horses which they had collected from the inhabitants were lost in ineffectual attempts to transport them over the rivers and marshes. For want of a sufficient number of boats, a confiderable part of the negroes were left behind. They had been fo thoroughly impressed by the British with the expectations of the feverest treatment, and even of certain death from

from their owners, in case of their returning home, that, in order to get off with the retreating army, they would fometimes fasten themfelves to the fides of the boats. To prevent this dangerous practice the fingers of some of them were chopped off, and foldiers were posted with cutlasses and bayonets to oblige them to keep at proper distances. Many of them, labouring under diseases, afraid to return home, forsaken by their new masters, and destitute of the necessaries of life, perished in the woods. Those who got off with the army were collected on Otter island, where the camp-fever continued to rage. Without medicine, attendance, or the comforts proper for the fick, fome hundreds of them expired. Their dead bodies, as they lay exposed in the woods, were devoured by beafts and birds, and to this day the island is strewed with their bones. The British also carried off with them feveral rice-barrels full of plate, and household furniture in large quantities, which they had taken from the inhabitants. They had spread over a confiderable extent of country, and small parties visited almost every house, stripping it of whatever was most valuable, and rifling the inhabitants of their money, rings, jewels, and other personal ornaments. The repositories of the dead were in feveral places broken open, and the grave itself fearched for hidden treasure. What was destroyed by the foldiers was supposed to be of more value than what they carried off. Feather-beds were ripped open for the fake of the Vot. II. ticking.

ticking. Windows, china-ware, looking-glaffes and pictures, were dashed to pieces. Not only the larger domestick animals were cruelly and wantonly shot down, but the licentiousness of the foldiery extended fo far that, in feveral places, nothing within their reach, however small and infignificant, was fuffered to live. For this destruction they could not make the plea of necesfity, for what was thus killed was frequently neither used nor carried off. The gardens which had been improved with great care, and ornamented with many foreign productions, were laid waste, and their nicest curiosities destroyed. The houses of the planters were seldom burnt, but in every other way the destructions and depredations committed by the British were so enormous, that, should the whole be particularly related, they who live at a distance would scarcely believe what could be attested by hundreds of eye-witnesses.

Soon after the affair at Stono, on the 20th of June, the continental forces, under the command of general Lincoln, retired to Sheldon. Both armies remained in their respective encampments till the arrival of a French fleet on the coast roused the whole country to immediate activity.

AFTER the conquest of Grenada, in the summer of 1779, count D'Estaing, with the force under his command, retired to Cape-Francois. Letters from governor Rutledge and monsieur Plombard, the consul of France in Charleston, were received at that place by the victorious French admiral. In all of which a speedy visit to the coast of the American continent was recommended, and by fome of them he was informed that Savannah might be taken by a coupde-main, and that, on his arrival, he would find every thing ready for an affault. This invitation. coinciding with the instructions he had received from the King his mafter, to act in concert with the forces of the United States whenfoever an occasion should present itself, he sailed for the American continent, and arrived early in September with a fleet confisting of twenty fail of the line, two of fifty guns, and eleven frigates. As foon as his arrival on the coast was known, general Lincoln, with the army under his command, marched for Savannah; and orders were iffued for the militia of South-Carolina and Georgia to rendezvous immediately near the fame place. The British were equally diligent in preparing for their defence. Lieutenant-colonel Cruger, who had a finall command at Sunbury, and lieutenant-colonel Maitland, who was in force at Beaufort, were ordered to repair to Savannah. As the French frigates approached the bar, the Fowey and Rose, of twenty guns each, the Keppel and Germain armed vessels, retired towards the town. The battery on Tybee was destroyed. To prevent the French ships from coming too near the town, the Rose and Savannah armed ships, with four transports, were funk in the channel. A boom was laid across it, and several fmall fmall veffels were also funk above the town. The feamen were appointed to the different batteries. The marines were incorporated with the grenadiers of the fixtieth regiment, and great numbers employed both by day and night in firengthening and extending the lines of defence. Count D'Estaing made repeated declarations, that he could not remain more than ten or fifteen days on shore. Nevertheless the fall of Savannah was confidered as infallibly certain. It was generally believed that in a few days the British would be stripped of all their fouthern possessions. Flushed with these romantick hopes, the militia turned out with a readiness that far surpassed their exertions in the preceding campaign. Every aid was given from Charleston by sending small vesfels to affift the French in their landing; but, as the large ships of count D'Estaing could not come near the shore, this was not effected till the 12th of September. On the 16th Savannah was fummoned to furrender to the arms of France. This was urged by the lovalists as an argument of the intentions of the French to conquer for themselves. The true reason was, that the American army had not then come up. It would have been therefore abfurd for a French officer to demand the furrender of a town to an absent commander. The garrifon requested twenty-four hours to consider of an answer. This request was made with a view of gaining time for the detachment at Beaufort, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Maitland, to join the royal army in Savannah

Savannah. An enterprize was undertaken to prevent this junction, but it proved unsuccessful. The pilots would not undertake to conduct to a proper station the frigates destined to intercept the communication. Lieutenant-colonel Maitland availed himself of this circumstance, pushed through by Dawfuskies, dragged his boats through a gut, and joined general Prevost before the time granted for preparing an answer to count D'Estaing's summons had elapsed. The arrival of fuch a reinforcement, and especially of the brave lieutenant-colonel Maitland, determined the garrifon to risk an affault. The French and Americans, who formed a junction the evening after, were therefore reduced to the necessity of ftorming, or of befieging the garrison. The refolution of proceeding by fiege being adopted, the attention of the combined armies was immediately called to the landing of cannon, and the erecting of batteries. The distance of the fleet from the landing-place, together with the want of proper carriages to transport the cannon and stores from Thunderbolt to Savannah, a diftance of five miles, confumed a great deal of time. The works of the town were every day perfecting by the labour of feveral hundred negroes, directed by that able engineer major Moncrieff. On the evening of the 23d the French and Americans broke ground, and on the 24th major Graham, with a small party of the besieged, fallied out on the French troops, but he was foon repulfed. The purfuit was continued fo near to the the British intrenchments, that the French, on their return, were exposed to a heavy fire, by which many of them fell. On the night of the 27th major M'Arthur, with a party of the British pickets, advanced and fired among the befiegers. This was conducted fo artfully as to occasion a firing between the French and American camps. On the 4th of October the befiegers opened with nine mortars, thirty-feven pieces of cannon from the land-fide, and fixteen from the water. These continued to play with fhort intervals for four or five days, but without any confiderable effect. On the 8th, in the morning, major L'Enfant, with five men, marched through a brisk fire from the British lines, and kindled their abbatis; but the dampness of the air, and the moisture of the green wood, prevented the fuccess of this bold undertaking.

Soon after the commencement of the cannonade, general Prevoft folicited for leave to fend the women and children out of the town. This humane request was, from motives of policy, refused. The combined army was so consident of success, that it was suspected a desire of secreting the plunder lately taken from the inhabitants of South-Carolina, was a considerable object covered under the specious veil of humanity. It was also presumed that a resulal would expedite a furrender. The period being long since elapsed which the count had assigned for this expedition, and the engineers informing him, that more time must be spent if he expected to reduce the garrifon by regular approaches, it was determined to make an affault. This measure was forced on count D'Estaing by his marine-officers, who had remonstrated against his continuing to risk so valuable a fleet, in its present unrepaired condition, on fuch a dangerous coast in the hurricane feafon, and at fo great a distance from the shore, that it might be surprized by a British sleet. These remonstrances were enforced by the probability of their being attacked by a British fleet completely repaired, and with their full compliment of men, foldiers and artillery on board, when the ships of his most christian majesty were weakened by the absence of a considerable part of their crews, artillery and officers. In a few days the lines of the befiegers might have been carried into the works of the befieged; but under these critical circumstances no further delay could be admitted. To affault, or to raife the fiege was the only alternative. Prudence would have dictated the latter, but a fense of honour determined to adopt the former. The morning of the 9th of October was fixed upon for the attack. Two feints were made with the country militia; and a real attack on the Spring-Hill battery with three thousand five hundred French troops, fix hundred continentals, and three hundred and fifty of the Charleston militia, led by count D'Estaing and general Lincoln. They marched up to the lines with great boldness; but a heavy and well-directed fire from the batteries, and a crofs-fire from the gallies did execution such as threw the front of the column into confusion. Two standards were nevertheless planted on the British redoubts. Count Pulaski, at the head of two hundred horsemen, was in full gallop, riding into town between the redoubts, with an intention of charging in the rear, when he received a mortal wound. A general retreat of the affailants took place after they had stood the enemy's fire for fifty-five minutes. Count D'Estaing received two wounds; fix hundred and thirty-feven of his troops, and two hundred and fifty-seven continentals, were killed or wounded; of the three hundred and fifty Charlefton militia, who were in the hottest of the fire, fix were wounded, and the intrepid captain Shepherd killed. d General Prevost, lieutenant-colonel Maitland and major Moncrieff, defervedly acquired great reputation by this fuccessful defence. The last of these gentlemen received also a very generous donation from his royal master. There were not ten guns mounted on the lines on the day of the fummons, and in a few days he had upwards of eighty. The force of the garrison was between two and three thousand, of which about one hundred and fifty were militia. Though twelve hundred of the fencible inhabitants of Georgia had submitted and taken oaths to the British government, and though every method was used to bring them within the lines, yet no more than the inconfiderable number just mentioned

tioned could be obtained. The damage fustained by the besieged was trisling, as they fired under cover, and few of the assailants fired at all. The garrison lost no other officer than the gallant captain Taws, who defended his post with the greatest bravery. Immediately after this unsuccessful assault, the militia almost universally went to their homes. Count D'Estaing reimbarked his troops, artillery and baggage, and lest the continent.

Subsequent events foon justified the apprehensions of those who had expressed a desire that the French troops and marines, employed in the siege, might be reimbarked. They were scarcely on board when a violent gale dispersed the whole sleet, and though count D'Estaing had ordered seven ships to repair to Hampton road in the Chesapeak, the marquis De Vaudreuil was the only officer who was able to execute the order.

This visit of the fleet of his most christian majesty to the coast of America, though unsuccessful with regard to the main object intended, was not without its utility to the United States. It in the first instance disconcerted the measures already digested by the British commanders; and the arrival of the marquis De Vaudreuil in the Chesapeak kept them so much in suspence, that they could not, for some time, determine on any plan of operations.

Vol. II. G THE

THE fiege being raised, the continental troops retreated over the river Savannah—a depression of spirits succeeded, much encreased by the preceding elevation. The Georgia exiles, who had arrived from all quarters to reposses themselves of their estates, were a second time obliged to abandon their country, and seek resuge among strangers. The currency depreciated much faster than ever, and the most gloomy apprehensions respecting the southern states generally took possession of the minds of the people.

WHILE the fiege of Savannah was pending, a remarkable enterprize was effected by colonel John White, of the Georgia line. Previous to the arrival of count D'Estaing on the coast of Georgia, captain French, with one hundred and eleven British regulars, had taken post near the river Ogeechee, about twenty-five miles from Savannah. There were also at the same place five British vessels, four of which were armed, the largest with fourteen guns, and the smallest with four, and the whole manned with upwards of forty failors. Captain French, with his regulars, one hundred and thirty stand of arms, the before-mentioned five veffels, with their crews, furrendered on the first of October 1779, to a party of Americans, confisting of colonel White, captain Elholm and three others. By the kindling of a number of fires in different places, the parade of a large encampment, and a variety of other stratagems, captain French was fully impressed pressed with an opinion that nothing but an instant surrender could save his men from being cut to pieces by a greatly superior force. The deception was carried on with so much address, that the whole of the British prisoners were safely conducted by three of the captors for twenty-sive miles through the country to the American post at Sunbury.

Thus ended the campaign of 1779, without any thing decifive on either fide. After one year, in which the British had over-run the state of Georgia for one hundred and fifty miles up the country, and had penetrated as far as the lines of Charleston, they were reduced to their original limits in Savannah. All their schemes of cooperation with the tories had failed, and the spirits of that class of the inhabitants, by repeated difappointments, were thoroughly broken. The arrival of the French fleet protracted the execution of a plan formed for turning the force of the war against the southern states. The want of fuccess in the attack on Savannah induced the British commander in New-York, soon after count D'Estaing's departure, to resume it.

It is the province of an historian to relate what has happened, and not to indulge in fancied conjectures about probable contingencies. Otherwife it might be added, that, if the garrison of Savannah had been assaulted in the first instance, or, if the siege had been continued a fortnight longer, longer, it is most likely that the town would have fallen, and, in consequence thereof, that the war would have terminated without the reduction of Charleston, the over-running of the southern states, and that loss of honour and property which refulted from the breach of publick faith, pledged for the redemption of the continental and state paper currency at par with gold and silver.

CHAPTER

Of the reduction of Charleston, and the operations in the country during the siege.

fleet from the coast of America known and confirmed at New-York, than fir Henry Clinton set on soot a grand expedition against Charleston. The campaigns of 1778 and 1779 to the northward had produced nothing of importance. But he regaled himself with flattering prospects of more easy conquests among the weaker states. The almost uninterrupted march of general Prevost through the richest parts of South-Carolina to the gates of the capital; the conduct of the planters, who on that occasion were more attentive to secure their property by submission than to defend it by resistance; together with the recent successful defence of Savannah—all invited the British arms to the southward.

UNFORTUNATELY for Carolina, the most formidable attack was made on her capital, at a time when she was least able to defend it. In 1776 a vote of her new government stamped a value on her bills of credit, which in 1780 could not be affixed to twenty times as much of the same nominal currency. At this important juncture, when the publick service needed the largest supplies, the paper bills of credit were of the least least value. To a want of money was added a want of men. The militia were exhausted with an uninterrupted continuance of hard duty. The winter, to others a time of repose, had been to them a feafon for most active exertions. The dread of the fmall-pox, which, after feventeen years absence, was known to be in Charleston, discouraged many from repairing to the defence of the capital. The fix continental regiments, on the South-Carolina establishment, in the year 1777, confisted of two thousand four hundred men, but in the year 1780 they were fo much reduced by death, defertion, battles, and the expiration of their terms of fervice, that they did not exceed eight hundred. Government had neither the policy to forgive, nor the courage to punish the numbers who, in the preceding campaign, deferting their country's cause, had repaired for protection to the royal standard of general Prevost. They who stayed at home and fubmitted, generally faved fome part of their property. They who continued with the American army were plundered of every thing that could be carried away, and deprived of the remainder, as far as was possible, by wanton destruction. After events of this kind, it was no easy matter to call forth the militia from their homes to the defence of Charleston. pulse at Savannah, on the 9th of the preceding October, impressed the inhabitants with high ideas of the power of Britain. The impossibility of a retreat from an invested town, created in many many an aversion from lines and ramparts. The presence of fir Henry Clinton, who, as commander in chief, could order what reinforcements he pleased, and who would naturally wish by fomething brilliant to efface the remembrance of his defeat in 1776, concurred with the causes already mentioned to dispirit the country. In this low ebb of affairs, Congress recommended to arm the negroes. Had this measure, from which the inhabitants were generally averse, been adopted, arms were not to be had. The North-Carolina and Virginia continentals, amounting to fifteen hundred men, and also two frigates, a twenty-gun ship, and a sloop of war, were ordered from the northward for the defence of Charleston. This was all the aid that could be expected from Congress. The resolution was nevertheless unanimously taken, in a full house of affembly, to defend the town to the last extremity.

The royal army, destined for the reduction of Charleston, embarked at New-York on the 26th of December 1779. They had a tedious and difficult passage, in which they sustained great damage. This, with their touching at Savannah, made it as late as the 11th of February 1780, before they landed at the distance of thirty miles from Charleston. The assembly, then sitting, immediately broke up, and delegated, 'till ten days after their next session, to the governor John Rutledge, esquire, and such of his council as he could conveniently confult, a power to do every thing necessary for the publick good, except the taking away the life of a citizen without a legal trial.' Invested with this authority, he immediately ordered the militia to rendezvous. Though the necessity was great, few obeyed the prefling call. A proclamation was foon after iffued, ' requiring fuch of the militia as were regularly draughted, and all the inhabitants, and owners of property in the town, to repair to the American standard, and join the garrison immediately, under pain of con-'fiscation.' This severe, though necessary meafure, produced very little effect. These efforts, for strengthening the operating force of the American army from domestick resources, were accompanied with folicitations to the governor of the Havannah to contribute his affiftance in promoting the same defign. Lieutenant-colonel Ternant was dispatched from Charleston, in the month of February, to negotiate this business. He was authorized to promife two thousand men to co-operate with the Spaniards in the reduction of St. Augustine, if they would lend a sufficient force of ships and troops for the defence of Charleston; but the Spanish governor doubted his authority to accede to the proposition. Had fir Henry Clinton pushed immediately for the town, it is probable that he might have poffeffed himself of it in four days after his landing; but that cautious commander adopted the flow method of a regular investiture. At Wappoo, on James

James island, he formed a depot and erected fortifications both on that island and on the main, opposite to the southern and western extremities of the town. On the 29th of March he passed Ashley river, and the third day after broke ground at the distance of eleven hundred yards, and at successive periods erected five batteries on Charleston Neck. The garrison was equally affiduous in preparing for their defence. The works that had been thrown up in the spring of the year 1779, were strengthened and extended. Lines of defence and redoubts were continued across Charleston Neck from Cooper to Ashley river. In front of the lines was a strong abbatis, and a wet ditch picketted on the nearest side. Between the abbatis and the lines deep holes were dug at short distances from each other. The lines were made particularly strong on the right and left, and so constructed as to rake the wet ditch, in almost its whole extent. In the centre a strong citadel was erected. Works were thrown up on all fides of the town where a landing was practicable. Colonel De Laumoy and lieutenant-colonel De Cambray, two French engineers of ability in the fervice of Congress, were indefatigable on this occasion. They were joined a few days before the furrender by brigadier-general Du Portail. The continentals, with the Charleston battalion of artillery, manned the lines in front of the British on the Neck between Ashley and Cooper rivers. The works on South-Bay and other parts of the town, not immedi-VOL. II. H ately

ately exposed to danger, were defended by the militia. The marine force of the state had been increased by converting four schooners into gallies, and by the armed ships Bricole and Truite, which for that purpose had been lately purchased from the French. The inferior numbers of the garrison forbad any attempts to oppose fir Henry Clinton before his landing on the main. Immediately after which lieutenant-colonel John Laurens, with a corps of light-infantry, brifkly attacked his advanced guards. In this skirmish, captain Bowman was killed, major Hyrne and feven privates wounded. Though the lines were no more than field-works, yet fir Henry treated them with the respectful homage of three parallels, and made his advances with the greatest circumspection. From the third to the tenth of April, the first parallel was completed, and immediately after the town was fummoned to furrender. On the 12th the batteries were opened, and an almost incessant fire kept up.

A British fleet, commanded by admiral Arbuthnot, confisting of the Renown of fifty guns, the Romulus and Roebuck each of forty-four, the Richmond, Le Blonde, Raleigh, Virginia, each of thirty-two guns, and the Sandwich armed ship, crossed the bar in front of Rebellion road on the 20th of March, and anchored in Five Fathom Hole. The force opposed to this was the Bricole of forty-four guns, the Providence and Boston, each of thirty-two, the Queen of France

France of twenty-eight, L'Avanture and the Truite, each of twenty-fix, the Ranger and brig General Lincoln, each of twenty, and the brig Notre Dame of fixteen guns. The first object of commodore Whipple, who commanded the American naval force, was to prevent admiral Arbuthnot from croffing the bar; but on the near approach of the British sleet he retreated to fort Moultrie, and in a few days after to Charleston. The crews and guns of all his veffels, except the Ranger, were put on shore to reinforce the batteries. On the ninth of April admiral Arbuthnot weighed anchor at Five Fathom Hole, and taking advantage of a strong foutherly wind, and flowing tide, passed fort Moultrie without stopping to engage it. Colonel Pinckney, who commanded on Sullivan's island, with three hundred men, kept up a brisk and fevere fire on the ships in their passage. Twenty-seven seamen were killed or wounded. The Richmond's fore-topmast was shot away, and the ships in general sustained damage. The Acetus transport ran aground near Haddrell's point. Captain Gadsden, detached with two field-pieces, fired into her with fuch effect, that the crew fet her on fire, and retreated in boats to the other vessels. The royal fleet came to anchor, in about two hours, near the remains of fort Johnston on James island, within long shot of the town batteries. To prevent their running up Cooper river, from which they might have enfiladed the lines, was the next object. With this this intention eleven veffels had been funk in the channel opposite to the Exchange. The Ranger frigate and two gallies were stationed to the northward of it, to co-operate with the batteries on shore, in defending these obstructions, and to attack any armed vessels that might force a passage through Hog-Island channel.

Though the greatest exertions had been made by the gentlemen in power to reinforce the garrison, and to strengthen the lines, yet their endeavours were not seconded by the people. more country militia could be brought into the town, and very few could be perfuaded to embody in the country. Out of a thousand North-Carolina militia, commanded by general Lillington, whose term of service expired while the fiege was pending, no more than three hundred could be perfuaded to remain within the lines, though the government of South-Carolina offered to those who would continue in the garrison very generous encouragement. Seven hundred continentals, commanded by general Woodford, who had marched five hundred miles in twenty-eight days, arrived in Charleston on the tenth of April. This was the only reinforcement the garrison received during the fiege, though the communication between the town and country was open until the middle of April.

THE fire of the besiegers soon discovered itself to be much superior to that of the besieged. The former former had the advantage of twenty-one mortars and royals; the latter only of two. While the lines of approach advanced with fuch rapidity, that the fecond parallel, at the distance of three hundred yards, was completed on the 20th, the lines of the besieged, in many places, sustained great damage. On the 14th the American cavalry, as shall be more particularly hereafter related, was furprized at Monk's Corner, and totally routed. On this event the British immediately extended themselves to the eastward of Cooper river, and took post with two hundred and fifty cavalry and five hundred infantry, in the vicinity of Wappetaw. On the 16th general Lincoln called a council of officers, who were of opinion that the weak state of the garrison made it improper to detach a number fufficient to attack this separate corps. The only practicable route of an evacuation was to the right of the town. To deter general Lincoln from attempting this change of position, the British continued to extend and increase their force in that quarter. On the 20th and 21st a council of officers was again called to deliberate on the important fubject of an evacuation. They were of opinion, that it was unadvisable, because of the opposition made to it by the civil authority and the inhabitants, and because, even if they should succeed in defeating a large body of the enemy ' posted in their way, they had not a sufficiency of boats to cross the Santee before they might be overtaken by the whole British army.' The council of war recommended a capitulation with the befiegers as the most eligible mode of effecting the defired evacuation. In this it was proposed that the fecurity of the inhabitants, and a fafe unmolested retreat for the garrison, with baggage and fieldpieces to the north-east of Charleston, should be granted on the part of fir Henry Clinton, as an equivalent for the quiet possession of the town, its fortifications and dependencies. These terms were instantly rejected, and from that time the dispirited garrison made a languid resistance. The fcarcity of provisions being assigned as one reason for the intended evacuation, every house in town was fearched, but on enquiry it was found that private dwellings were as nearly exhaufted as the publick magazines. Provision had been stored in large quantities to the north-eastward of Charleston, but from the low value of the money, the want of carriages and horses, and the badness of roads, they could not be brought to town before the investiture of it was completed. From the failure of the promifed reinforcements which were expected by the commander of the American army, the communication between the town and country could not be maintained without making fuch detachments as would have endangered the garrison.

THE inferior numbers of the besieged forbad repeated sallies. The only one made during the siege was on the 24th of April, soon after the rejection of the offered terms of capitulation.

This was conducted by lieutenant-colonel Henderson who led out two hundred men, and attacked the advanced working-party of the British, killed feveral, and took eleven prisoners. In this affair captain Moultrie, of the South-Carolina line, was killed. The only plan now left for an evacuation, was to withdraw privately, under cover of the night. A council of war held on the 26th pronounced this measure impracticable with the present numbers of the garrison; but as reinforcements were expected from the country on the rear of the befiegers, a hope was still indulged of fome future favourable moment to effect the wished-for retreat. To forward this defign, and to preferve the communication between the town and country, a breastwork had been erected some days before at Lempriere's, on the east side of Cooper river, and fome heavy cannon mounted on it, but the British having extended their force into its vicinity, this post was foon abandoned. On the night of the same day the British gallies passed under the fire of the southern batteries of Charleston from Wappoo to the Cove, and intercepted all communication between the garrifon and fort Moultrie. The investiture was now completed, and the British army communicated with the fleet on both flanks. Sir Henry Clinton had also about the same time received a reinforcement of three thousand men from New-York. Difficulties pressed hard on every side. To surrender the garrison prisoners of war, appeared to many a difaster of such magnitude as to be nearly nearly equal to any that could take place in attempting the evacuation. To withdraw the re-gular army clandestinely from the town, and leave the citizens to the mercy of an enraged enemy, without giving them the offer of joining in the intended retreat, would have been ungenerous. On the other hand, to have given every citizen his option of retreating with the army or of staying and submitting to the conquerors, would have put it in the power of a difaffected individual, by deferting to the enemy, to bring them on the retreating garrison before they were in their boats. Independent of every difficulty that might have been thrown in the way by the disaffected among the citizens, the evacuation of the town was, in the opinion of almost every military man, absolutely impracticable. While general Lincoln was pressed with these difficulties, the British flag was seen flying on fort Moultrie. After the ships had passed Sullivan's island, colonel Pinckney, with one hundred and fifty of the men under his command, was withdrawn from that post, to reinforce the besieged army in Charleston. The feeble remainder of that garrison, mostly militia, on the 6th of May surrendered, without firing a gun, to captain Hudson of the British navy. On the next day fir Henry Clinton began a correspondence, and renewed At this time all the flesh-prohis former terms. visions of the garrison were not sufficient to furnish rations for the space of a week. There was no prospect either of reinforcements or of supplies

plies from the country. The engineers gave it as their opinion that the lines could not be defended ten days longer, and that they might at any time be carried by affault in ten minutes. The same obstacles in the way of an evacuation still existed with increased force. General Lincoln was disposed to close with the terms offered, as far as they respected his army; but some demur was made in behalf of the citizens. Sir Henry Clinton infifted on their being all prisoners on parole, and would promise nothing farther,than that the town-property of those who were within the lines should not be molested by the British troops. He also evaded any determinate answer to the article which requested leave for those who did not choose to submit to the British government, to fell their estates and leave the province. The royalists in the state having had this indulgence at all times fince the abolition of regal government, it was hoped that on a proper representation of these matters, in a free conference, the generofity of the besiegers would foften their demands. This conference was asked by general Lincoln, without directly refusing what was offered. Contrary to the expectation of the besieged, an answer was returned that hostilities should recommence at eight o'clock. When that hour arrived the most vigorous onset of the befiegers was immediately expected by the garrison. But instead of this neither army fired a gun for fome time. Both feemed to dread the consequences of an affault, and to wish for a VOL. II. continuance continuance of the truce, and a reconsideration of the proposed articles. At nine P. M. firing commenced from the garrison, and was kept up on both fides for feveral hours with unufual brifkness, and did more execution than had taken place in the same length of time since the commencement of the fiege. Shells and carcaffes were thrown incessantly into almost all parts of the town. Several houses were burnt, and many more were with difficulty faved. By this time the British had completed their third parallel. Besides the cannon and mortars which played on the garrison at a distance of less than a hundred yards, rifles were fired by the Hessian jagers with fuch effect, that very few escaped who shewed themselves above the lines. On the 11th the British crossed the wet ditch by sap, and advanced within twenty-five yards of the lines of the befieged. On this day petitions were prefented from a great majority of the inhabitants, and of the country militia, praying general Lincoln to accede to the terms offered by fir Henry Clinton. During the fiege a few fecret friends of royal government fomented and encouraged a mutinous disposition among the citizens, and fuccessfully worked on the fears of the timid. When it was generally known that there was an infufficiency of animal provision in the garrison, and that the town was completely furrounded, these men openly urged the necessity of an immediate furrender. The measure of petitioning received its first and warmest support from the disaffected.

disaffected, to whom all capitulations were equal, as they meant to become British subjects. These had the address to strengthen themselves by the timid, and even by some of the bravest and best citizens, who believed that farther resistance was vain. Under these circumstances general Lincoln found it necessary to assent to the articles as proposed without any conference or explanation. c

This was the first instance in the American war of an attempt to defend a town, and the unsuccessful event, with its consequences, makes it probable, that, if this method had been generally adopted, the independence of America could not have been so easily supported.

MUCH censure was undeservedly cast on general Lincoln for risking his army within the lines. Though the contrary plan was undoubtedly the best in general, yet he had particular reasons to justify his deviation from the example of the illustrious commander in chief of the American army. The reinforcements promised him were fully sufficient for the security of the town. The Congress and the governments of North and South-Carolina gave him ground to count upon nine thousand nine hundred men. From a variety of causes, some of which have been already stated, this paper army, including the militia of both Carolinas, was very little more than one third of that number. As long as an evacuation was practicable he had fuch affurances of support, that he could not attempt it with propriety. The British afterwards took such a position, that in the opinion of good judges, a retreat could not be fuccessfully made. Before the batteries were opened, and for two or three days after, the regular army might have retired from the town; but had the measure been attempted within that period, the most brilliant success would not have prevented the severest censures. After the 16th of April an attempt to withdraw the army would have left the town in the hands of the British at unconditional mercy, and if unfuccefsful might have been productive of worse consequences than a furrender by capitulation. Notwithstanding this unfortunate termination of his command in the fouthern district, great praise is due to general Lincoln for his judicious and spirited conduct in baffling, for three months, the greatly Superior force of fir Henry Clinton and admiral Arbuthnot. Though Charleston and the fouthern army were loft, yet by their long protracted defence, the British plans were not only retarded, but deranged, and North-Carolina, as will hereafter be made evident, was faved for the remainder of the year 1780.

The return of prisoners, transmitted by fir Henry Clinton, on the surrender of Charleston, was very large. It comprehended every adult freeman of the town, between two and three thousand failors, who had been taken from the shipping, shipping, and put into the batteries, and the militia of both Carolinas then in garrison. These fwelled the number to upwards of five thousand, and afforded ample materials for a splendid account of the importance of the conquest; but the real number of the privates of the continental army was nineteen hundred and feventy-seven, and of these five hundred were in the hospitals. The number of captive officers was also great, and out of proportion to the privates-one majorgeneral, fix brigadiers, nine colonels, fourteen lieutenant-colonels, fifteen majors, eighty-four captains and captain-lieutenants, eighty-four lieutenants, thirty-two fecond-lieutenants and enfigns. The commanders of the militia from the country, who were mostly people of the first rank, influenced by a fense of honour, repaired to the defence of the town, though they could not bring with them a number of privates equal to their respective commands. The continental regiments were completely officered, though the adequate number of privates was greatly deficient. These supernumerary regular officers, though without command, were retained in the garrison from an apprehension that their being ordered out would have dispirited the army, and from an expectation that was confidently indulged in the early parts of the fiege, that their fervices would be wanted to command the expected large reinforcements of militia. During the thirty days of the fiege, only twenty American foldiers deserted. The militia and failors were stationed stationed in those batteries, which were not much exposed, and therefore they suffered very little. Of the continentals who manned the lines in front of the befiegers eighty-nine were killed, and one hundred and thirty-eight wounded; among the former were colonel Parker, an officer who had often distinguished himself by his gallantry and good conduct, and captain Peyton, both of the Virginia line, Philip Neyle, aid-de-camp to general Moultrie, captains Mitchel and Templeton, and lieutenant Gilbank. The Charleston militia artillery, who were stationed at the lines, and did equal duty with the continentals, had three men killed, adjutant Warham and feven privates wounded; about twenty of the inhabitants who remained in their houses were killed by random-shot in the town. Upwards of thirty houses were burnt, and many others greatly damaged.

AFTER the British took possession of the town, the arms taken from the army and inhabitants, amounting to five thousand, were lodged in a laboratory, near a large quantity of cartridges, and of loose powder. By the imprudence of the guard, in snapping the guns and pistols, this powder took fire, blew up the house, dispersed the burning fragments of it, which set fire to and destroyed the workhouse, the gaol and the old barracks. The British guard, consisting of sifty men, stationed at this place, was destroyed, and their mangled bodies dashed by the violent explosion explosion against the neighbouring houses in Archdale-Street. Several persons in the vicinity shared the same sate. Many of the fire-arms were loaded. They, with the cartridges going off, sent the instruments of death in all directions. Upwards of a hundred persons lost their lives on this occasion.

In the tedious and difficult winter passage of the royal army from New-York to Charleston, the horses destined to mount the British cavalry were lost. Lieutenant-colonel Tarleton, after he landed, in a little time obtained a fresh supply, and began the career of his victories. Soon after he had procured horses to mount his cavalry, he joined a body of about a thousand men, who had marched through the country from Savannah, under the command of general Patterson. On the 18th of March 1780, a detachment from his corps furprized a party of American militia, about eighty in number, at Saltcatcher bridge, killed and wounded feveral of them, and difperfed the remainder. Five days after lieutenantcolonel Tarleton, with his legion, fell in with another small party of mounted militia, near Ponpon, who immediately retreated. In the purfuit three were killed, one wounded and four taken prisoners. His next rencounter was on the 27th, with lieutenant-colonel Washington, at the head of his regular corps of horse, between the ferry on Ashley river and Rantowle's bridge on Stono. The Americans had the advantage, took feven feven prisoners, and drove back the cavalry of the British legion; but, for want of infantry, durst not pursue them. At the beginning of the fiege general Lincoln ordered the regular cavalry, amounting to three hundred men, to keep the field, and the country militia were ordered to act as infantry in their support. The militia, at this period of the contest, were uncommonly averse from doing their duty, and, on various pretences, refused to attach themselves to the cavalry. This important body of horse, which was intended to cover the country, and keep open a communication between it and the town, was furprized on the 14th of April at Monk's Corner, by a strong party of British, led by lieutenant-colonels Tarleton and Webster. A negro-slave, for a fum of money, conducted the British from Goose creek, in the night, through unfrequented paths. Although the commanding officer of the American cavalry had taken the precaution of having his horses saddled and bridled, and the alarm was given by his videttes, posted at the distance of a mile in front; yet, being entirely unfupported by infantry, the British advanced so rapidly, notwithstanding the opposition of the advanced-guard, that they began their attack on the main body before they could put themselves in a posture of defence. About twenty-five of the Americans were killed or taken. They who escaped were obliged for several days to conceal themselves in the swamps. Upwards of thirty horses were lost, and became a seasonable supply to the British who were but badly mounted. After this catastrophe all armed parties of Americans, for some time, abandoned that part of the state which lies to the southward of Santee.

Soon after this furprize, Colonel Anthony-Walton White arrived, and took the command of the remains of the cavalry. At the head of this corps, mounted a fecond time with great difficulty, he croffed to the fouthward of the Santee, and on the fixth of May 1780, came up with a finall British party at the house of colonel Ball, took them prisoners, and conducted them to Lanneau's ferry. Orders had been given in due feafon by colonel White to proper persons to collect boats, and to affemble a body of infantry at this place, to cover the American cavalry in their recrossing the Santee, but they had not been carried into execution. The zeal of a new fubject, who had lately fubmitted to the royal army, prompted him to give immediate notice to lord Cornwallis of colonel White's fituation. Lieutenant-colonel Tarleton, with a party of his horse, was dispatched to the ferry, and he arrived there in a few minutes after the American cavalry, and instantly charged them with a superior force. From the want of boats and of infantry, a retreat was impracticable, and refistance unavailing. A rout took place. Major Call and feven others escaped on horseback by urging their way through the advancing British cavalry. Lieutenant-colonel Washington, major Jameson, and five or fix VOL. II. privates.

privates, faved themselves by swimming across the Santee. About thirty were killed, wounded or taken. The remainder got off by concealing themselves in the swamps. The British prisoners, who were in a boat crossing the river, being called upon by their friends to come back, rose on their guard, and were released.

AFTER the landing of the British in 1780 depredations, fimilar to those described in the eighth chapter, recommenced. As the reduction of Carolina was then confidently expected, they did not commit fuch wanton wastes as general Prevost's army, but it is hard to tell which exceeded the other in plundering. As the royal army of 1780 was much more numerous, and extended over the country on all fides of Charleston, and had the convenience of a large fleet on the coast to carry off their spoil, they made much greater collections of bulky articles. They possessed themselves in particular of indigo to the value of many thousand dollars. From mistaken policy, the merchants and others had stored the greater part of their commodities without the lines, and very often on or near the water. These collections very generally fell into the hands of the conquerors. The British on this occasion plundered by system, formed a general stock, and appointed commissaries of captures. Spoil collected this way was disposed of for the benefit of the royal army. The quantity brought to market was fo great, that though it fold uncommonly commonly low, yet the dividend of a majorgeneral was upwards of four thousand British guineas. The private plunder of individuals, on their separate account, was often more than their proportion of the publick stock. Over and above what was fold in Carolina, feveral veffels were fent abroad to market, loaded with rich spoil taken from the inhabitants. Upwards of two thousand plundered negroes were shipped off at one embarkation. Several private gentlemen lost, in the invasions of 1779 and 1780, from five hundred to two thousand dollars worth of plate, and other property in proportion. The flaves a fecond time flocked to the British army, and, being crowded together, were vifited by the camp-fever. The fmall-pox, which had not been in the province for feventeen years, broke out among them, and spread very rapidly. From these two diseases, and the impossibility of their being provided with proper accommodations and attendance in the British encampments, great numbers of them died, and were left unburied in the woods. A few instances occurred, in which infants were found in unfrequented retreats, drawing the breasts of their deceased parent some time after life was gone.

CHAPTER TENTH.

Of the navy, trade, paper currency, army, militia, and other miscellaneous matters in South-Carolina, chiefly prior to the reduction of Charleston.

HEN South-Carolina first adopted the idea of defending herfelf against all hoftile attempts to enforce the claims of the British parliament, she had not possession of a single armed vessel. The Tamar, a sloop of eighteen guns, and the Cherokee, an armed veffel of fixteen guns, belonging to the King of Great-Britain, lay in the road and harbour of Charleston, and committed many outrages on private property. To check these depredations was the general wish, but the means of effecting it did not occur to the inhabitants heretofore occupied in the peaceable lines of agriculture and commerce. The offers of fervice, made by fundry fpirited gentlemen, who proposed to board them fword in hand, were uniformly rejected by the popular leaders, who wished to heal rather than widen breaches. Few were acquainted with the nature of gallies, or the method of constructing them. With the means of defence in their hands, and the spirit to use them, the inhabitants of Charleston, partly from inexperience and partly from pacifick intentions, submitted for a confiderable time to many infults from the British veffels in the harbour. At last it was agreed to arm merchantmen. A coasting schooner was fitted out with fixteen guns, to which was given the name of the Defence. The Prosper, a merchant-ship, was mounted with twenty guns; and foon after another coasting schooner, named the Comet, was armed with fixteen guns. Thefe were originally intended for the fecurity of Charleston and the harbour. A galley, called the Beaufort, was built, and three small vessels were converted into gallies, for the protection of the inland navigation. Another coasting schooner was fitted out with ten guns, which was intended for the protection of Georgetown. In the progress of the dispute, after British seizures had induced the continental Congress to authorize reprizals, the Comet, the Defence, and the Beaufort gallies, were converted into brigs, and, cruizing on the high feas, brought in feveral prizes. The marine department, in its first stage, was managed by the council of fafety and the privy-council; but it foon became necessary to put it under the direction of men of more leifure and professional knowledge. The legislature erected a navy-board, and delegated to Edward Blake, Roger Smith, Josiah Smith, George Smith, Edward Darrell, Thomas Corbet, John Edwards, George-Abbott Hall, and Thomas Savage, esquires, ' authority to superintend and direct the building, buying or hiring of all vessels in the publick fervice, and to direct the outfits of the ' fame, and the furnishing them with necessary ordnance, victualling, provisions, and navalftores'ftores—to fill vacancies in the navy or marine—' and to draw warrants on the treasury for the sums ' of money necessary for the purposes aforesaid.' These gentlemen took charge of the above-mentioned publick vessels, and also built a brig of fourteen guns, to which they gave the name of the Hornet. This was the whole of the Carolina navy for the first four years of the war.

In the year 1777 the continental frigate Randolph, captain Biddle, put into Charleston in distress. After being resitted she sailed on a cruize, and in eight days returned with four rich prizes. This encouraged the state to attempt fomething in the fame way with her little marine. The ship General Moultrie, captain Sullivan, the brig Polly, captain Anthony, and brig Fair American, captain Morgan, belonging to private perfons, were taken into the publick fervice on this occasion. They, in conjunction with the continental frigate Randolph, and the state-brig Notre Dame, early in 1778 failed on a cruize. They descried a vessel to the windward of Barbadoes, and engaged her in the night, prefuming that she was a frigate, but she proved to be the Yarmouth, a fixty-four gun ship. After an engagement of seventeen minutes the Randolph blew up, with three hundred and fifteen fouls on board, who all perished excepting four, who, after tossing about for four days on a wreck, were discovered and taken up by a passing vessel. Captain Biddle, who lost his life on this occasion, was prized prized by his country as one of her very best naval officers. Captain Joor, a worthy brave officer of the first South-Carolina regiment, with sifty privates of that corps, acting as marines on board the Randolph, all likewise perished. The other vessels, escaping from the Yarmouth, continued their cruize. The brig Fair American, and ship General Moultrie, took a valuable Guineaman, and the brigs Notre Dame and Polly took sixteen prizes, but only four of them arrived safe in a friendly port.

In 1779, when general Prevost lay near Charleston, several armed vessels brought him supplies from Savannah. To intercept this communication captain Hall, in the brig Notre Dame, captain Tryon, in the brig Beaufort, captain Anthony, in the brig Bellona, and some other private armed vessels, put to sea under the direction of the navy-board. They fell in with seven British vessels near Stono, two of which were taken and brought safe into Charleston; one was blown up, and the rest escaped.

ABOUT the same time fixty grenadiers of the British army, with two field-pieces and musketry, attacked the American schooner Rattlesnake, from the banks of the river Stono. Her gallant commander, captain Frisby, defended himself with the greatest bravery, repulsed the assailants with the loss of their captain, and the greatest part of his men; but finding it impossible to retreat with his vessel, set her on fire, and conducted his wounded men with the rest of his crew, safe through the country, though in posfession of the enemy, to the American camp at Bacon's bridge.

THE great advantages refulting to the state; from their little navy, and the manifold distress fustained by the trade for want of protection, induced the legislature to take methods for purchasing or building three frigates. Had this measure been adopted at the commencement of the war, it is probable that the scheme would have been both practicable and advantageous, but all the plans adopted in the first period of the contest were temporary, and calculated for no other purpose than that of immediate domestick fecurity. In the progress of the war the paper currency lost fo much of its original value, that the means of procuring the frigates could not eafily be commanded. Alexander Gillon, esquire, was appointed commodore, John Joyner, William Robefon, and John M'Queen, efquires, were appointed captains. The commodities of the country were purchased, and shipped on the publick account, and the commodore was authorized to borrow money on the credit of the state. He, with his corps of officers, failed in the year 1778 for Europe, and there exerted the utmost of his abilities in the profecution of the business on which he was fent. Various embarrassiments, from intercepted remittances and other other causes, prevented his completing the object of his mission. He could accomplish nothing more than to purchase, on credit, for the use of the state, a large quantity of clothing and ammunition, and to hire a large frigate from the prince of Luxembourg for the term of three years, on condition of allowing the prince one fourth of the prizes captured while she cruised at the risk and expence of South-Carolina. The frigate engaged by commodore Gillon, on this occasion, was built at Amsterdam, originally on account of the United States, and was of a particular construction, mounting twenty-eight Swedish thirty-fix pounders on one deck, and twelve Swedish twelve-pounders on her forecastle and quarter-deck, being in dimensions equal to a feventy-four gun ship. Two hundred and eighty marines, and fixty-nine feamen, were engaged on behalf of South-Carolina, to man this frigate. These were kept at Dunkirk for several months, until the ship could be got to the Texel. As her great draught of water prevented her from getting over the shoals in any other position than on her broadfide, their being on board would have proved an incumbrance. These men, though fed, paid and clothed with the money of the state of South-Carolina, were fent with other troops from Havre-De-Grace without the knowledge or consent of commodore Gillon, on an expedition against the island of Jersey. So many of them were killed and captured in that unfortunate enterprize, which took place in January 1781, that VOL. II. Τ.

the frigate was disabled from going to sea till the August following. After innumerable difficulties were furmounted she then began to cruize, and in a fhort time captured feveral valuable prizes. Her commander had also the sole direction of the Spanish and American marine forces, which in May 1782 reduced the Bahama islands under the crown of Spain. The fleet, confisting of eighty-two fail, which undertook this enterprize, was conducted by commodore Gillon from the Havannah through the dangerous navigation of the Providence channel. Soon after the termination of this expedition, she arrived in Philadelphia. After being completely repaired, at an immense expence, she put to sea from that port under the command of captain Joyner. On the fecond day after she left the capes of Delaware, she was captured by three British frigates. In this spirited attempt to equip a navy, the expences far exceeded the profits. Including the intercepted remittances, and the clothing and ammunition purchased by commodore Gillon for publick fervice, with the difburfements on account of the frigate, it cost the state of South-Carolina upwards of two hundred thoufand dollars.

Soon after trade between Great-Britain and South-Carolina ceased, a few adventurous individuals began to send vessels to the Dutch and French West-India islands. It was early foreseen that the publick would suffer most for the want of falt. To obviate this inconvenience, eight gentlemen entered into a partnership to purchase fix swift-sailing vessels in Bermuda, to be employed in importing that necessary article. They arrived safe, and for a season supplied the wants of the people. They continued this trade till they were all taken.

COMMERCE foon began to flow in new channels. The old merchants, whose fortunes were eafy, unwilling to risk their capital, generally retired from business. A new set, who had little to lofe, by boldly venturing ferved their country, and rapidly advanced their own interest. Various artifices were used to screen this contraband trade from legal feizure. Some vessels had captains of different nations, and registers of different ports, and were occasionally French, Dutch, English, or American property, as the exigency of the case required. Notwithstanding all this fubtilty many forfeitures were incurred. The increasing demand for imported goods, and the stoppage of all exportation to Great-Britain, put it so much in the power of adventurers to sell imported articles dear, and to purchase country produce cheap, that, in the years 1776 and 1777, the fafe arrival of two vessels would indemnify them for the loss of one. For the encouragement of trade, two infurance-companies opened offices, which greatly forwarded the extension of commerce. A direct trade to France was foon attempted, and French vessels in like manner found found their way into the port of Charleston. This intercourse, in its commencement, proved very unfortunate to the inhabitants of South-Carolina; for out of fixteen vessels, richly laden with the commodities of the country, four only arrived safe. This heavy blow, for a little time, damped the spirit of enterprize, but it soon revived.

THE new-raifed regiments required a supply of many articles, which could not be procured in the United States. It was the good fortune of captain Cochran, who was first employed on this business, to be the only one of three trading on the account of the state, who went and returned fafe. He failed for Nantz, loaded with country produce, which he exchanged to great advantage for fuch articles as were wanted for publick fervice. The Betfy, captain M'Kenzie, and the Hope, captain Hatter, failed foon after captain Cochran, but were both taken. The latter of them had on board a great quantity of foldiers' clothing, two forty-two pounders, and a large fupply of other articles, the lofs of which was feverely felt. The spirit of adventure in the merchants daily increased. A considerable trade, though much inferior to what had been usual in times of peace, was carried on in this manner for the greatest part of the three first years of the contest, when the operations of the British were chiefly confined to the northern states. It received fevere shocks from repeated embargoes, and the growing depreciation of the paper currency. To subserve military operations, the failing of vessels was several times interdicted. Though this was supposed, by the ruling powers, to promote the general cause of America, several of the most discerning citizens thought otherwise. It forely distressed commerce, and prevented the country from obtaining supplies of foreign commodities. It also discouraged strangers from sending their vessels into American ports, as their return, for reasons of state, was so frequently prevented.

THE paper currency, issued by the Congress, retained its value undiminished much longer in South-Carolina than in other parts of the United States. In the latter end of 1776, though the victorious arms of general fir William Howe threatened the subversion of American independence, yet in Carolina there was no fensible depreciation. Men of property had fo generally stepped forward in support of the revolution, that their influence was supposed to be fully equal to the establishment of their new currency, even in a royal house of assembly, if the conquest of the state should restore kingly government. The immense value of the staple commodities of the country, the animation, unanimity and enthusiafm of the people, precluded all fear of its finally finking. When depreciation took place, it originated from causes very different from a distrust of the final fuccess of the revolution. The emisfions of paper currency in 1775 and 1776 were of real advantage to the state of South-Carolina; for the whole money then in circulation was inadequate to the purposes of a medium of trade. For feveral years before the termination of the royal government, from three to five thousand negroes had been annually imported into the province. This caused the greatest part of the gold and filver, procured at foreign markets for the commodities of the country, very foon to centre in Great-Britain. In consequence of disputes between the commons house of assembly, and the King's council, the passing of a tax-bill had been for four years prevented. The emissions of paper currency had been, by royal instructions, for some considerable time wholly prohibited. In this fcarcity of a circulating medium, payments were often made by the transfer of private bonds. Bank-bills, to a confiderable amount, issued on the credit of five gentlemen of large estates, had a currency equal to the precious metals. Certificates, figned by the clerk of the commons house of assembly, and counterfigned by a few of its members, fetting forth that the fums therein specified were due to individuals from the publick, passed currently for money, though they were issued by the fole authority of one branch of the legislature. The ability of the province to pay its debts, and the religious observance of good faith in performing all its engagements, had established a credit superior to the mines of Potofi, and gave currency to every thing stamped with the authority of government. To a people thus circumstanced, whose credit was unstained, and who, though deficient in gold and filver, abounded in real wealth, the paper currency was very acceptable, and greatly facilitated the transfer of property. It fet in immediate motion the late stagnant streams of commerce-invigorated industryand gave a spring to every branch of business. It had an operation on fociety fimilar to what might be expected from a government becoming fuddenly possessed of a large quantity of hidden treasure, and throwing it into circulation for the publick benefit. Instead of the war taking any thing from the people at its commencement, it was the occasion of increasing their possessions, by annexing the fubftantial value of gold and filver to paper of no intrinfick worth.

As hard money was either hoarded up by men of forecast, or shipped off to purchase foreign commodities, and the continental currency was mostly confined to the northern states, till near the beginning of the year 1778, the state emissions did not, for a considerable time, exceed the quantity necessary for circulation. The sums struck by the authority of South-Carolina were as follows:

These sums are in the old provincial currency, at the rate of seven for one, sterling money of Great-Britain. Besides these provincial bills, the different emissions struck by authority of the continental Congress had a currency in South-Carolina, and were by the laws of the state made a legal tender in the payment of debts. The emissions from this source, in the first sive years of the war, amounted in the whole to two hundred millions of dollars.

THE paper currency retained its value undiminished in South-Carolina for eighteen months, viz. from June 1775 to January 1777. At this period commenced a depreciation destructive to credit, ruinous to the monied interest, and greatly detrimental to the fuccess of military operations. The progress of depreciation was scarcely perceivable in the first three months of 1777, and was very flow throughout that whole year. From the commencement of the year 1778, when great quantities of the continental money began to flow into the state, it became much more rapid. The enormous expences of the armies kept up by Congress in the extensive campaigns of 1775, 1776, 1777, in the northern states, required immense supplies of money. This could not be raifed in fufficient quantities either by taxes or loans. The only practicable resource left was emissions of paper currency under an engagement to be redeemed at a future day. The supposed necessity of the case carried these emissions beyond all prudential bounds. The fuccess of general Howe in 1776 and 1777 materially injured the credit of this currency in the middle states. Many interested men, in the neighbourhood of the British operations, judging from their fuccess in reducing New-York, Philadelphia, and a great part of the Jerfies, apprehended the final conquest of America, and therefore began to realize the Congress paper money lest it might fink in their hands. The large quantities of counterfeit bills, which were industriously blended with the true by emissaries from the British garrisons, contributed much to their depreciation.

Vol. II M The

The common people, not able to diftinguish the false from the true bills, began to insure themselves by asking higher prices.

THE fystem of supplying the army, at first adopted by Congress, by allowing commissions on the amount of fums expended by commissaries and quartermasters, threw great temptations in the way of those descriptions of officers to enhance the price of commodities. The neglect of agriculture, and the embarraffments of trade, diminished the articles usually transferred from one to another by the intervention of money, at a time that the rulers of the country employed two printing-presses in multiplying the artificial figns of wealth. These causes of depreciation, operating most forcibly in the northern states. produced a greater and earlier depreciation there than in South-Carolina. Money like water will foon find its level. Adventurous traders, on being informed that the continental paper currency was of most value to the fouthward, repaired thither with large fums of it, and contributed much more to the depreciation in South-Carolina than all the emissions of the state. The Randolph's prizes, which arrived early in 1778, were supposed to bring into South-Carolina half a million of dollars. The depreciation that took place previous to this was comparatively trifling, and naturally refulted from the combined influence of an increase of money, and decrease of goods. From this time forward an artificial depreciation preciation was superadded to the natural. The possessors of the paper money, who either from accident or fagacity, conjectured right about the event, finding that it daily lost part of its value, were perpetually in quest of bargains. As they forefaw that Congress would make further emissions for the supplies of their armies, they concluded that it would be better to purchase any kind of property than to lay up their money. The progressive superabundance of cash produced a daily rife in the price of commodities. The deceitful found of large nominal fums tempted many possessors of real property to sell. The purchasers, if indulged with the usual credit, or if they took the advantage which the delays of the courts of justice allowed, could pay for the whole by the fale of an inconfiderable part. The fanguine, flattering themselves with the delusive hopes of a speedy termination of the war, were often induced to fell lest a sudden peace should at once appreciate the money, in which case it was supposed they would lose the present opportunity of felling to great advantage. From the fame principles they hoarded up the bills of credit in preference to purchasing solid property at a supposed extravagant price. They mistook the diminished value of the money for an increased price of commodities, and therefore concluded that, by buying little, felling much, and retaining their paper currency, they were laying the folid foundations of future permanent wealth. Subsequent events, in opposition to the commonly received received maxims of prudence and economy, fully demonstrated that they, who instantly expended their money, received its full value, while they who laid it up sustained a daily diminution of their capital.

THAT the money should finally fink, or that it should be redeemed by a scale of depreciation, were events neither foreseen nor expected by the bulk of the people. The Congress, and the local legislatures, for the first five years of the war, did not entertain the most distant idea of such a breach of publick faith. The generality of the friends of the revolution, reposing unlimited confidence in the integrity of their rulers, the plighted faith of the government, and the fuccess of the cause of America, amused themselves with the idea, that, in a few years, their paper dollars, under the influence of peace and independence, would be funk by equal taxes, or realized into filver at their nominal value, and that therefore the fellers would ultimately increase their estates in the fame proportion that the currency had depreciated. The plunderings and devastation of the enemy made feveral think that their property would be much fafer when turned into money than when subject to the casualties of war. The disposition to fell was in a great degree proportioned to the confidence in the justice and final fuccess of the revolution, superadded to expectations of a speedy termination of the war. The most fanguine whigs were therefore oftenest duped duped by the fallacious found of high prices. These principles operated so extensively, that the property of the inhabitants, in a confiderable degree, changed its owners. Many opulent persons, of ancient families, were ruined by felling paternal estates for a depreciating paper currency, which, in a few weeks, would not replace half of the real property in exchange for which it was obtained. Many bold adventurers made fortunes in a short time by running in debt beyond their abilities. Prudence ceased to be a virtue, and rashness usurped its place. The warm friends of America, who never despaired of their country, and who cheerfully risked their fortunes in its fupport, lost their property, while the timid, who looked forward to the re-establishment of British government, not only faved their former possessions, but often increased them. In the American revolution for the first time the friends of the fuccessful party were the losers.

THE enthusiasm of the Americans, and their considence in the money, gave the Congress the same advantage in carrying on the war which old countries derive from the anticipation of their permanent funds. It would have been impossible to have kept together an American army for so many years without this paper expedient. Though the bills of credit operated as a partial tax on the monied interest, and ruined many individuals, yet it was productive of great national benefits,

To all the evils of depreciation, those of monopoly were added. West-India and European goods being scarce, a few would secure exclusively to themselves almost the whole present stock of particular articles, and then raise the price of them by offering, at publick sales, much more than was current. In this manner, by throwing away shillings, they gained pounds. By practices of this kind, commodities were sometimes raised to one third more in one quarter of the capital of the state than was current the same moment in another.

To check the evils arising from the mixture of counterfeit bills with the true, and to diminish the quantity of circulating money, the Congress called in the two large emissions of 11th of April 1778 and of May 20th 1777, amounting in the whole to forty millions of dollars. The oftenfible reason for this resolution was, that most of the counterfeits were of these emissions; f but it was also defigned to diminish the superabundance of circulating paper. Great were the expectations formed from this scheme, but it was an additional proof that the worst confequences sometimes flow from the regulations which in theory appear to be founded in wisdom. The currency in South-Carolina received a deadly wound from this

this effort of its friends, which was supposed to be well calculated for its prefervation. The refolutions for calling in these emissions, not being generally known in Charleston for feveral weeks after they had been adopted by the Congress in Philadelphia, the holders of them fent them to South-Carolina to be immediately realized. The new bills, defigned to be given in exchange for these, which were called in, did not arrive for eight months after the old ones ceased to circulate. The possessors of the called-in emissions were fo defirous of expending them, that they would purchase any thing without regarding the price however extravagant. The common people, not understanding the policy of these resolutions, and finding it difficult to diffinguish the true bills of Congress from the counterfeits of general Howe, and the current bills from those that were called in, and also finding that the best of them daily depreciated, were induced to undervalue the whole.

The planters, to indemnify themselves for the advanced prices of foreign goods, in the years 1778 and 1779 adopted the mistaken policy of raising the prices of their produce in some degree correspondent to the prices of imported articles. As the merchants bought foreign goods with rice, indigo and tobacco, they were obliged to sell in proportion to the risk of importation superadded to the prime cost of these articles. The merchant raised on the sale of his goods to make himself whole for the high prices of country produce: the planter, from a similar motive, but not with equal justice, raised his produce on the merchant when he came to purchase his next cargo. The advanced prices of the importer were in the first instance the cause, but in the second the essect of the advanced prices of the planter. From the long continuance of embargoes it frequently happened, that, though a merchant sold his cargo to great advantage, yet the country produce got in return for it, if not immediately purchased, would not replace an equal quantity of goods when exported to a foreign market.

MANY attempts were made to preferve the credit of the currency. State and continental loanoffices were opened, that the necessity of farther emissions might be diminished; and the hearty friends of American independence deposited in them large sums on interest. By a subsequent act of affembly the usual tax on money at interest was remitted on all fums lent to the publick, and the legislature, in the year 1779, offered an interest on money lent to the state of three per cent more than was paid by private perfons. Notwithstanding all these douceurs, the supplies obtained by loans fell fo far short of the publick demands, that farther emissions could not be restrained. When the small quantities of hard money that still remained had begun to be changed for paper-bills at an advance, an act of affembly was passed, prohibiting any person from receiving or demanding for any article a larger fum in paper than in hard money. A law to prevent the ebbing and flowing of the fea would have been no less ineffectual than this attempt of the legislature to alter the nature of things. Gold and filver no longer paffed at par, and contracts were either discharged in paper or not discharged at all. The bills of credit, being a legal tender in all cases, would pay off old debts equally with gold and filver, though for new purchases they were of much less value. The merchants and other monied men, who had out-standing debts contracted before or near the first period of the war, were great losers by the legal tender of the paper currency. For eighteen months they were not allowed to fue for their debts, and were afterwards obliged to accept of depreciated paper in discharge of them at par with gold or filver. This was not the refult of intentional injustice, but forced on the legislature by the necessity of the times. When the means of payment were taken from individuals by publick authority, as has been already stated, forbidding them to export the productions of the foil, it would have been cruel to fuffer them to be fued for money borrowed, and expended in cultivating their plantations. When the refolutions against exportation were repealed, the members of the legislature supposed it would have ruined their new currency, if they had in any case whatever denied it the credit of a legal tender. Besides, it Vol. II. N was was at that time the fixed resolution of Congress, and the different legislatures, to redeem all their paper bills at par with gold or silver.

THE publick was in the condition of a town on fire, when some houses must be blown up to fave the remainder. The liberties of America could not be defended without armies—armies could not be supported without money-money could not be raifed in sufficient quantities otherwife than by emissions. It was supposed effentially necessary to the credit of these emissions, that they should have the fanction of a legal tender in the payment of all debts. This involved the ruin of the monied interest, and put it in the power of individuals to pay their debts with much less than they really owed. This unhappy necessity, to do private injustice for a publick benefit, proved in many respects injurious to the political interests of the state, and the moral character of its inhabitants. It disposed those who were losers by the legal tender, and who preferred their money to the liberties of America, to wish for the re-establishment of British government, and filled others with murmurings and bitter complaints against the ruling powers. The publick spirited, who were sincere in their declarations of devoting life and fortune to support the cause of their country, patiently submitted to the hardships, from a conviction that the cause of liberty required the facrifice. The nature of obligations was fo far changed, that he was reckoned koned the honest man, who, from principle, delayed to pay his debts. Instead of creditors pressing their debtors to a settlement, they frequently avoided to see them, or secreted their obligations. The evils occasioned by depreciation did not terminate with the war. The shutting of the courts of justice, and authorizing men by law to pay their debts with depreciated paper, made the non-performance of contracts so familiar, that some of the inhabitants since the war have been much more careless about the punctual and honourable discharge of their engagements than they ever were before.

Much of the evil occasioned by the legal tender of paper-bills might have been prevented, if the laws respecting it had confined its operation to future contracts. A great deal might have been done at an early period by taxation to fupport the credit of the money. The plate might have been applied to that purpose. But the depreciation not being generally foreseen, no provision was made against the evils and injustice refulting from it. In the first stage of the dispute no American had any idea of its duration. Few had any acquaintance with the philosophy of money, or the subject of finance. And almost all were fanguine in expecting the establishment of their liberties, without fuch long and expenfive facrifices. Had even all these matters been properly attended to, they would only have moderated, but could not have prevented depreciation.

ciation. The United States had no permanent funds to give stability to their paper currency. In the commencement of the war they were without regular governments to enforce the collection of taxes. They were in possession of no resources adequate to the raising of sufficient supplies without large emissions of bills of credit.

WHEN the business of taxation was entered upon by the legislature, it was not carried to a fufficient extent. The planters, who form a majority of the legislature, were, with a few exceptions, very backward in laying on taxes proportioned to the exigencies of the war. They had much to fell, little to buy, and were generally in debt. To them the depreciation was no prejudice. From a mistaken policy they were more anxious to get rid of their private than of their publick debts. When called upon for large fupplies, though it was evident that a little property would pay a large nominal tax, yet they fuffered themselves to be alarmed with great founds, and opposed liberal grants, as if every paper dollar had been a filver one. Some of them could, without one pang of remorfe, pay off old debts with a shilling in the pound, and thereby reduce to beggary the helpless widow, the distressed orphan, and the decrepid old man, who had heretofore lived happily on the annual income of their estates, but were very compassionate to the people of their own class, whom they represented as unable to pay large taxes, though their their produce fold at ten, twenty, or thirty times its usual price before the war. In the first period of the contest, when the prohibited exportation of the productions of the foil diminished their profits, they frequently complained that the cause of their country required larger facrifices from them than from the money-lenders, whose interest was going on without any diminution. On the idea of dividing the burden more equally between them and their creditors, they influenced the legislature to reduce interest from eight to feven per cent; but in the progress of the war, when their produce fold at immenfe nominal prices, and not only the interest but the principal of the money-lender was nearly annihilated, the just schemes of putting all orders in the community on an equal footing, in the distribution of necessary sufferings, were entirely forgotten. 5

It is fcarcely possible that a greater curse can befal a country than such an unsixed value of money. It strikes at every virtuous principle, exterminates the ideas of honour and justice, and turns the attention of people from the sober paths of industry to extravagant adventures and romantick projects. Evils of this kind became intolerable. The legislature at last adopted an expedient, which promised considerable relief. This was to prohibit the purchasing of country produce for any other purpose than domestick consumption or exportation, and to put the buyer in the power of the feller. Several individuals were in the habit of buying far beyond their abilities to pay. Before the fellers could compel payment in the ordinary course of law, a progressive depreciation made it practicable for the buyer to discharge the stipulated nominal sum with one half of its real value. To remedy this abuse special courts were instituted, which were authorifed, in a fummary manner, to compel payment in three days. The good effects of this were immediately felt. Rice fell in its price near a fifth, and in all probability the artificial depreciation would have been wholly remedied had not the arrival of the royal army prevented the full operation of this judicious law. The furrender of Charleston, on the 12th of May 1780, wholly arrested the circulation of the paper currency, and put a great part of the state in posfession of the British, when many contracts for these nominal sums were unperformed, and after many individuals had received payment of old debts in depreciated paper. The honourable James Simpson, intendant-general of the British police, commissioned thirteen gentlemen to enquire into the different stages of depreciation, fo as to afcertain a fixed rule for payment in hard money of out-standing contracts, and to compel those who had fettled with their creditors to make up, by a fecond payment, the difference between the real and nominal value of the currency. The commissioners proceeded on principles of equity, and compared the prices of country produce when the paper currency was in circulation with its prices in the year before the war, and also the rate of exchange between hard money and the paper-bills of credit. From an average of the two they fixed on a table which was as follows, excepting that the fractional parts of the original are omitted.

THE British successes to the southward in 1780, caused the continental money to flow back to the middle states. Its superabundance and incurable depreciation at last forced on the Congress and the feveral legislatures a scale of depreciation, though the face of the bills, the terms of their emission, and every publick act respecting them, gave affurances that they should be ultimately redeemed at the rate of one filver dollar for every paper dollar. In September 1779, the supreme council of the states, in their circular letter, rejected with horror the bare supposition that such a measure should ever be adopted; h yet in fix months after it was done with the acquiescence of a great majority of the people. In other countries fimilar measures have produced popular infurrections, but in the United States of America, though many fuffering individuals complained loudly, it was peaceably adopted. Publick faith was violated, but in the general opinion publick

publick good was promoted. The evils confequent on depreciation had taken place, and the redemption of the bills at par, instead of remedying the distresses of the sufferers, would in many cases have increased them by subjecting their fmall remains of property to exorbitant taxation. The money had in a great measure got out of the hands of the original proprietors, and was in the possession of others who had obtained it at a cheap rate. The fufferers, who were obliged to receive it at par with gold and filver in payment of debts, contracted when there was no depreciation, look up to their country for reimbursement as far as is practicable. It is prefumed, for the honour of the United States, that they will not look in vain.

THE paper currency continued to have a partial circulation for a year after a scale of depreciation was fixed. It gradually diminished in value till the fummer of 1781. By common confent it then ceased to have currency. Like an aged man, expiring by the decays of nature, without a figh or a groan, it gently fell afleep in the hands of its last possessors. It is now remembered with gratitude for the service it has rendered in carrying on the war, and the reimbursement of the holders of it rests with the legislatures, who, as foon as circumstances permit, will doubtless do what justice and the publick good require. The extinction of the paper currency was an event ardently wished for by the enemies, Vol. II. and and dreaded by the friends, of American independence. The failure of its circulation difappointed them both. The war was carried on with the fame vigour afterwards as before, and the people very generally acquiesced in the measure, as justified by necessity.

THE introduction of filver and gold, by channels which were opened about the fame time that the paper currency ceased to circulate, contributed much to diminish the bad effects of its annihilation. A trade was at that period opened with the French and Spanish West-India islands. by which specie was imported into the American continent, and a vent was found for the commodities of the northern and middle states. The French army, which arrived in Rhode-Island, as has been before mentioned, early in the year 1780, put into circulation a great quantity of coined filver; and fubfidies, to a large amount, were, about the same time, granted to the United States by his most christian majesty. It is remarkable that of nine vessels which came from France with money at different periods of the war, no one, while the treasure was on board, fell into the hands of the British.

THE unexpected introduction of fo much gold and filver fuggested to the Congress a new system of finance. The issuing of paper currency, by the authority of government, was discontinued, and the publick engagements were made in specie. All matters relative to the department of the treasury, or of accounts, were put under the direction of the honourable Robert Morris, esquire, who arranged the whole with so much judgment that economy, method and system, foon took the place of extravagance, confusion and irregularity. The personal unfullied credit of the superintendent of sinance was a powerful auxiliary to the government—it facilitated contracts in behalf of the army—and lessened the evils which otherwise would have resulted from the arrested circulation of the paper currency.

In the years 1781, 1782 and 1783, when individuals had loft all confidence in publick bills of credit, notes were fuccessively issued by mr. Morris, figned with his own name, payable at different periods out of the foreign subsidies or domestick revenues of the United States. These notes, though at one time, viz. July 1783, they amounted to five hundred and eighty-one thoufand and fifty-feven dollars, yet, from the wellknown punctuality of their figner, had a currency at a time when the credit of the American governments was at the lowest .ebb. Their circulation enabled mr. Morris to anticipate the publick resources, to the great advantage of the United States. In this crifis of affairs the fervices of the superintendent of finance were as beneficial to the union as were, in any period of the war, the great abilities of the illustrious commander in chief of the armies of the United States. States. When future ages celebrate the names of Washington and Franklin, they will also add that of Morris. The filent operation of his systems of finance, and personal credit, though less visible to the publick eye, were, in the consused state of American affairs, at the commencement of the year 1781, no less essential to the success of the revolution, than the splendid military atchievements of the one, or the successful negotiations of the other.

THE fupplies for publick exigencies in South-Carolina, before the reduction of Charleston, were principally raifed by taxes on lands and negroes. Three contributions of this kind had been levied between the declaration of independence in 1776 and the furrender of the capital in 1780. The first was in the year 1777, and was fixed at nearly one third of a dollar per head on negroes, and as much on every hundred acres of land. Had Carolina and the other states taxed heavily at this period, they would have prevented much of the depreciation; but a fear of alarming the people, and too fanguine hopes of a speedy peace, induced the legislature to begin moderately, more with a view of making an experiment than of raising adequate supplies. The next tax was in 1778, nominally ten times larger than the former, but really at the time of payment worth only about twice as much. In 1779 a tax of twenty paper dollars per head on negroes, and on every hundred acres of land, was levied. This.

This, about the time of payment, was nearly equal to a specie dollar.

THE three regiments which were railed on the Carolina establishment, in June 1775, were enlisted for fix months certain, or three years if required. These short terms of service were fixed upon from the hopes, then every where entertained, that American grievances would be redrefled without proceeding to an eternal feparation. They at first were raised by the authority of the provincial congress, and were enlisted solely for the domestick defence of South-Carolina. A continental army, subject to the orders of the United States in Congress assembled, was an after-thought. When that measure was adopted, the popular leaders in South-Carolina found great difficulty in connecting their provincial troops with the continentals of the other states. To alter the terms of their enlistment could not be done without manifest injustice. To release the common foldiers from their provincial obligations, in order to put them in a capacity to re-enlift as continentals, was a hazardous experiment. The capture of the publick veffels had deprived them of many comforts. This had difgusted many to such a degree, that their re-enlistment as continentals was extremely doubtful. At last the matter was compromised. They who chose it were re-enlisted as continentals for the war, with the farther encouragement of two hundred acres of land for their fervice.

The others still remained under their original provincial obligations. The officers very readily agreed to exchange their provincial for continental commissions, and were in consequence thereof confidered as a part of the army of the United States. The British availed themselves of the short period of enlistment first agreed upon, and did not feriously turn their arms to the fouthward till the expiration of three years had completed the term of fervice of the first and best recruits of the South-Carolina line. To supply these regiments with every comfort, and to keep them full, was the constant study of government; but the capture of the vessels destined to import clothing and other supplies for their use, with the diminished value of the currency, precluded the publick from doing that justice to these brave men which they so highly merited.

Unfavourable reports of the sufferings of the private soldiers greatly obstructed the recruiting service. Many deserted, and they who remained suffered more than any other order of men. Government did all that was possible to support its first recruits, and to increase their number; but they had not the means of carrying into effect their good intentions. Five hundred paper dollars were proposed in 1779 as a bounty, to encourage the recruiting service. Though this was nearly equal to fifty hard dollars, yet so great were the distresses of the military, that few could be perfuaded to enter the regular regiments.

ABOUT the same time a law was passed to take up vagrants and idle diforderly perfons who had no visible method of maintaining themselves, and to make them ferve in fome of the regular regiments, if upon a trial to be held before one juftice and fix freeholders they were found to be of the before-mentioned characters. Over and above the recruits procured by this law, it was generally allowed to have produced falutary confequences, by promoting a spirit of industry in fome idle persons, and by restraining others from disorderly practices, though, in a few instances, it was faid to have been perverted, by the private refentments of partial judges, to the diffress of fome individuals who did not answer the character described in the act.

HAD America seriously intended independence from the beginning, she might, in the first stage of the contest, have easily recruited one hundred thousand men, to serve during the war; but aiming at nothing but a redress of grievances, and slattering herself with the hopes of accomplishing this in a little time, all her schemes were of a temporary nature. At last she was involved in a tedious and expensive war, with one of the greatest powers of Europe, when she was destitute of an army, of hard money, of trade, and of a navy, and had few other means of procuring them than by printers' types.

THE infufficiency of the regular regiments, for the defence of the state, made it necessary to call the militia frequently into the field. This obstructed agriculture, without adding to the operative force of the army in any manner proportioned to its increased numbers. The expences of militia were greater than the pay of regulars. They had a right to charge the publick with the time spent in marching between the camp and their homes. Their private affairs not permitting long absence from their plantations, the men were frequently changed, and of course unacquainted with fervice. When encamped, their high notions of perfonal liberty made them flow to learn that implicit obedience which is necesfary in military operations. They too often indulged in unfoldierly discussions of the propriety of orders issued by their superiors; and would fometimes, especially after defeats, without permission, quit their posts, and return to their plantations. To obtain more effectual fervice from them the legislature in 1778 imposed severe fines for neglect of duty, and for-bad conduct when on duty. As the rich were most concerned in the defence of the state, to prevent them from fetting a bad example, the fine of each delinquent was to be in proportion to the amount of his taxes. The flate was divided into three brigades. Andrew Williamson, Richard Richardfon, and Stephen Bull, esquires, were appointed brigadiers. The men in each brigade were soon after classed into three divisions, which were to take the field in rotation. But in case of an invasion of any part of the state, the whole, to the distance of eighty miles from the place invaded, were liable to be ordered out to its immediate defence.

THE legislature, a little while before the reduction of Charleston, enacted a law, by which delinquents among the militia were fentenced to ferve in one of the regular regiments from four to fixteen months, at the discretion of a courtmartial. To foften these severities trials were instituted, in which the greater number of judges were privates. Individuals were also allowed to exempt themselves from personal service by hiring, at their own expence, a recruit to enter one of the regular regiments. These regulations had only a partial effect. The fervice wanted by the government could not be effectually obtained from men attached to their families and farms, and reluctantly pressed from the field of agriculture to that of battle. After they had suffered from the oppressions of the royal army, they rivalled regular foldiers in discipline, as well as in courage, and by their spirited co-operation with the continental troops, as shall hereafter be related, had a confiderable fhare in recovering the state from the British forces.

Vol. II.

VERY foon after the declaration of independence, the danger of retaining men in the state, who wished to subvert its constitution, suggested to the legislature of South-Carolina the necessity of fecuring itself against those who still abetted royal government, and wished for its re-establishment. A test-oath was therefore framed in 1776; but this was tendered only to those persons who had given some open evidence of their disaffection. The officers of the King, under the late regal constitution, and a few others of suspected characters, having, on requisition, refused to take it, were obliged to leave the state. In the year 1778 the legislature enacted an oath or affirmation of allegiance, to be taken by every adult male, which was in the following words: I, A B, do swear or affirm, that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the state of South-Carolina, and will faithfully fupport, maintain and defend the fame, against George the third, King of Great-Britain, his fuccessors, abettors, and all other enemies and oppofers whatfoever, and will, without delay, discover to the executive authority, or some one justice of the peace in this state, all plots and conspiracies that shall come to my knowledge against the faid state, or any other of the United States of America. 'So help me Gop.' In addition to this, an oath to abjure the King of Great-Britain was required of all officers of the state, both civil and military. They who refused the oath or affirmation above recited were obliged to depart the country; but they had their choice of either leaving their families, or of taking them away. They were also allowed to sell and carry off their estates, or to appoint attornies in their absence to take care of them. The defence of the country, requiring both the personal services and the contribution of its inhabitants, that all might be on an equal footing, the unfold estates of these gentlemen, in common with other absentees, were taxed double; but the idea of confiscation, at this period of the contest, was, by the legislature, uniformly reprobated. Notwithstanding this humane line of conduct, no indulgence with regard to property was given by British authority to the citizens of South-Carolina after the reduction of Charleston. In vain was leave folicited in the capitulation, for those who chose it to fell their estates and leave the country. This was not only refused, but their estates were sequestered, and they deprived of the means of supporting themselves, unless they would submit to a government which many of them had abjured, and all of them had renounced. But of this in the following chapter.

CHAPTER ELEVENTH.

Of the methods taken by the British to keep possession of South-Carolina, and by the Americans to recover it. Of the battle of Camden, and its consequences—hanging the revolted subjects—banishing the prisoners, and sequestration of estates.

TEVER did any people more mistake their true interest than the inhabitants of South-Carolina, in permitting the British to obtain a permanent residence in their country. Exhausted with the satigues, and impoverished by the confequences of a war into which they had been gradually drawn, without any intention originally of pushing it so far, some slattered themselves that the reduction of Charleston would terminate their sufferings; but that event proved to them the commencement of still greater evils.

The capital having furrendered, the next object with the British was to secure the general submission of the inhabitants. To this end they posted garrisons in different parts of the country, and marched with a large body of their troops over the Santee towards that extremity of the state which borders on the most populous settlements of North-Carolina. This caused an immediate retreat of some parties of Americans who had advanced into the upper parts of South-Carolina with the expectation of relieving Charleston.

Among

Among the corps which had come forward with that view there was one confisting of about three hundred continentals, the rear of the Virginia line, commanded by colonel Buford. Lieutenant-colonel Tarleton, with about feven hundred horse and foot, was dispatched in quest of this party. That enterprifing officer, having mounted his infantry, marched one hundred miles in fiftyfour hours, came up with them at the Waxhaws, and demanded their furrender on terms fimilar to those granted to the continentals taken in Charleston. While the flags were passing and repassing on this business, lieutenant-colonel Tarleton kept his men in motion, and when the truce was ended, had nearly furrounded his adverfaries. An action immediately enfued. This took place on the 29th of May, feventeen days after the furrender of Charleston. Colonel Buford's party, having partaken of the general consternation occasioned by the British successes, made a feeble refistance, and foon fued for quarters. A few, notwithstanding, continued to fire. The British cavalry advanced, but were not opposed by the main body of the continentals, who conceived that they were precluded by their fubmiffion from making opposition. On the pretence of this accidental firing of a few, the British legion was directed to charge men who had laid down their arms. In consequence of this order the unrefisting Americans, praying for quarters, were chopped in pieces. Some lost their hands, others their arms, and almost every one was mangled mangled in an inhuman manner. Five out of fix of the whole number of the Americans were. by lieutenant-colonel Tarleton's official account of this bloody scene, i either killed or so badly wounded as to be incapable of being moved from the field of battle, and by the fame account, this took place though they made fuch ineffectual opposition as only to kill five and wound twelve of the British. Lord Cornwallis bestowed on lieutenant-colonel Tarleton the highest encomiums for this enterprize, and recommended him in a special manner to royal favour. k This barbarous maffacre gave a more fanguinary turn to the war. Tarleton's quarters became proverbial, and in the subsequent battles a spirit of revenge gave a keener edge to military refentments.

This total rout of all the continental troops of the fouthern states, which were not made prifoners by the capitulation of Charleston, together with the universal panick occasioned by the surrender of that capital, suspended, for about six weeks, all military opposition to the progress of the British army. In this hour of distress to the friends of independence, the royal commander, by proclamation, denounced the extremity of vengeance against those of the inhabitants who should continue, by force of arms, to oppose the re-establishment of British government. The conquerors did not rest the royal cause exclusively on threats. On the first of June, nineteen days after the furrender of Charleston, sir Henry Clinton and admiral Arbuthnot, in the character of commissioners for restoring peace to the revolted colonies, by proclamation, offered 'to the inhabitants, with a few exceptions, pardon for their e past treasonable offences, and a reinstatement in the possession of all those rights and immu-' nities which they heretofore had enjoyed under a free British government, exempt from taxation, except by their own legislatures.' m These specious offers, together with the imposibility of their fleeing with their families and effects, and the want of an army to which the militia of the state might repair, induced the people in the country to abandon all schemes of farther resistance. The militia to the fouthward of Charlefton fent in a flag to the commanding officer of the royal detachment at Beaufort, and obtained terms fimilar to those granted to the inhabitants of the capital. At Camden the inhabitants met the British with a flag, and negotiated for themfelves. The people of Ninety-Six affembled to deliberate what courfe they should hold in such a difficult conjuncture. Being informed that the British were advancing to that part of the state, they fent a flag to the commanding officer, from whom they learned that fir Henry Clinton had delegated full powers to captain Richard Pearis to treat with them. Articles of capitulation were immediately proposed, and foon after ratified, by which

which they were promifed the same security for their persons and property which British subjects enjoyed. They submitted under a mistaken opinion that, agreeably to an early proclamation of fir Henry Clinton, previous to the furrender of Charleston, they were to be either neutrals or prisoners on parole. A later proclamation of June third 1780, which, as shall soon be related, made a change of allegiance necessary to their being in the King's peace, was kept out of fight. By this manœuvre the King of Great-Britain gained, without their knowledge, a large acceffion of nominal subjects. Excepting the extremities of the state, which border on North-Carolina, the inhabitants who continued in the country generally preferred submission to resistance. The difference between evacuating and defending towns became apparent, and fully proved that the first was the best plan of defence for America.

Though the progress of the British arms was rapid, yet it was far short of what was originally expected. Their schemes had been deranged as to time, and new events made it necessary for them to divide their forces, and to alter their plans. The embarkation of the royal army from New-York, for the reduction of Charleston, had been fixed as early as September 1779, but the unexpected arrival of count D'Estaing, with a French sleet on the coast of Georgia, retarded that event till the 18th of December. This delay, together with the flow method of reducing Charleston by regular approaches, and the defence made by general Lincoln-all concurred to waste away the season which had been allotted for a vigorous winter campaign. It was originally intended that the whole of the forces employed against Charleston should proceed, after the reduction of that capital, to the conquest of the adjacent states. It was prefumed that the militia, by the furrender of their strongest fouthern post, and capture of the whole continental line, from Virginia to Georgia, would be intimidated from opposing a well-appointed and numerous royal army. The most extensive conquests in the fouthern states were considently expected before a northern campaign for 1780 could be opened. As the arrival of one French fleet retarded the British schemes near three months in the latter end of 1779, fo the expectation of another in the spring of the year 1780 made a division of their southern force indispenfibly necessary. Intelligence was received by fir Henry Clinton, about the time of the furrender of Charleston, that a large number of landforces, and a French fleet, confisting of seven fail of the line, and five frigates, commanded by M. De Ternay, was to have failed from France fo early in the year that its arrival on the American coast might be soon expected. This induced the commander in chief of the royal army to re-embark for New-York early in June, with the greatest part of his army. Though the French VOL. II. fleets fleets gained at this time no direct advantages for their American allies, yet they completely deranged the plan of British operations.

On the departure of fir Henry Clinton from Charleston, lord Cornwallis was appointed commander in chief in the fouthern department, with about four thousand men. This force, though far short of what was originally intended for fouthern operations, was deemed fully sufficient for the purpose of extending the British conquests.

The object hitherto pursued by the British commanders, with regard to the inhabitants of South-Carolina, was to induce them to remain peaceably at their homes. To this end they accepted of their submission on very easy terms. All, with a few exceptions, who applied obtained either paroles as prisoners, or protections as British subjects. They who preferred the latter were required to subscribe a declaration of their allegiance to the King of Great-Britain; but in the hurry of business this was frequently omitted, and the privileges of British subjects were freely bestowed on some without any engagements.

THE general fubmission of the inhabitants was followed by an unusual calm. The British believed that the state of South-Carolina was thoroughly conquered; but they soon found that the disguise which fear had imposed subsisted no longer longer than the present danger. Their experience in America had not yet taught them enough of human nature to distinguish a forced submission, in a temporary panick, from a cordial return to their former allegiance. Subsequent events proved, that a country is unsubdued as long as the minds of the people are actuated by an hostile spirit.

ALL military opposition being suspended, the royal commanders, supposing their work in South-Carolina to be completely finished, began to extend their views to the adjacent states. To facilitate their future operations they conceived a scheme of obtaining substantial service from their new subjects. In the profecution of this business their policy foon loft what arms had gained. While fome of the inhabitants were felicitating themselves in having obtained a respite from the calamities of war, they were no less astonished than confounded at a proclamation by which they were called upon to take arms in support of royal government. All paroles given to prisoners, not taken by capitulation, and who were not in confinement at the furrender of Charleston, were declared on the third of June 1780, by the commander in chief of the royal army, ' to be null and void after the twentieth of the fame month, and the holders of them were called upon to refume the character of British subjects, and to take an active part in forwarding military opefrations, or to be confidered and treated as rebels against

'against his majesty's government.' This extraordinary step was taken without any pretence of violation of parole on the part of the prisoners. With this proclamation, and the enrolment of the militia, commenced the declenfion of British authority. Many had applied for paroles and protection, from the fond expectation, that they should be indulged with a residence on their estates, and be at full liberty to profecute their private business. Numbers who, from motives of fear or convenience, had submitted, still retained an affection for their American brethren in the other states, and shuddered at the thought of taking arms against them. Among such it was generally faid, 'if we must fight, let it be on the fide of America, our friends and coun-'trymen.' A great number, confidering themfelves released from their parole by the proclamation, conceived that they had a right to arm against the British; and were induced so to do from the royal menace, that they who did not enrol themselves as British subjects, must expect to be treated as enemies. A much greater number found it convenient to exchange their paroles for protection. To facrifice all, and leave the country, required a degree of fortitude that is the lot of very few. To take protection, and to enrol themselves as militia under the royal standard, were events wholly unexpected when they submitted as prisoners of war. They conceived themselves reduced to a very hard alternative, native, and would often contrast the conduct of the British commanders with the former policy of the state, which gave every man his free choice of joining the Americans or of adhering to the royal cause, with the liberty of removing his family and property. They fubmitted, but their subsequent conduct made it probable that this was done, in many cases, with a secret refervation of breaking the compulfory tie when a proper opportunity should present itself. Had this fevere alternative never been offered, and had the people been indulged in the quiet possession of their property and their domestick ease, it would have been extremely difficult for Congress to have made adequate exertions for rescuing the state out of the hands of the British. But, from a concurrence of causes about this time, there was formed a strong party, disposed to do and suffer much more for the expulfion of their new masters, than they could be persuaded to do six months before, to prevent the country from falling into their hands.

The fituation of the inhabitants of the town was different from that of the country. As they had a right, by the capitulation, to remain at their homes on parole, they were excepted from the alternative offered by the proclamation of the third of June; other methods were therefore used to compel them to become British subjects. Immediately after the surrender of Charleston a sew persons, attached to the British government, prepared an address to the general and admiral, congratulating them on their conquest. o This was figned by two hundred and ten of the inhabitants, the greater part of whom had been in arms against the British during the siege, and among whom were a few who had been leaders in the popular government. In answer to their address they were promised the privileges and protection of British subjects, on subscribing a test of their allegiance, and of their willingness to support the royal cause. These addressers, who thus decidedly took part with the British, immediately made an invidious distinction between subjects and prisoners, and became the instigators of every severity against those who chose to remain on parole. As they had revolted from the cause of America, that they might be kept in countenance, they laboured hard to draw others into the same predicament. To effect this they would often complain to the British rulers, that none had proper encouragement to return ' to their allegiance, while prisoners were suffered 6 to remain with their families, follow their oc-' cupations, and enjoy privileges which, in their opinion, should be monopolized by the friends of royal government.' This example of exchanging paroles for protection, was foon followed by many of their fellow-citizens. of them, who owned estates in the country, had no fecurity by capitulation for any property out of the lines, unless they became subjects. This was a strong inducement to persons so circumstanced to join their conquerors. To oblige them univerfally to return to their allegiance, there was a fuccession of proclamations, each abridging the privileges of prisoners. Subjects were allowed to fue for their debts before the British board of police, but prisoners were denied all benefit of that court. Though they were liable to fuits, they had no fecurity for the payment of their debts but the honour of their debtors. The paroles granted to prisoners, after the furrender of the town, were much more limited than might have been expected. The citizens of the town were restrained from going out of the lines, or on the water, without special permission. This, when applied for, was fometimes wantonly refused, and on other occafions might be obtained for money. Ineffectual attempts were made to obtain more generous limits, but no extension was granted, and they who feemed averse from figning the offered paroles, were informed that, in case of an absolute refusal, they must expect close confinement. These shackles sat very uneasy on free citizens who had heretofore been accustomed to the fullest enjoyment of perfonal liberty; but no relaxation could be obtained on any other condition than that of professing a return to their allegiance. The conquerors, in the most perfect considence of keeping the province, and of extending their conquests, valued themselves much upon their generofity in being willing to receive as British fubjects fubjects the citizens whom they viewed in the light of vanquished rebels. Under the influence of this opinion they laughed at the folly, and refented the ingratitude and impudence of those who chose to remain in the character of prisoners. Such persons met with every discouragement, and at the same time the door of re-admission to the privileges of subjects was thrown wide open. This made fome martyrs, but more hypocrites. A numerous class of people were reduced to the alternative of starving or suing for protection. Those inhabitants of Charleston, who were of the Hebrew nation, and others who were shopkeepers, were, while prisoners, encouraged to make purchases from the British merchants who came with the conquering army, and, after they had contracted large debts of this kind, were precluded by proclamation from felling the goods they had purchased, unless they assumed the name and character of British subjects. P Mechanicks and others were allowed, for fome months after the furrender, to follow their respective occupations, but as they could not compel payment for their services, repeated losses foon convinced them of the prefent convenience of accepting British protection. Great numbers in all communities are wholly indifferent what form of government they live under. They can always turn with the times, and fubmit with facility to the prefent ruling power whatfoever it may be. The low state of American affairs in the the fummer of 1780, induced a belief among many of the inhabitants, that Congress, from necessity, had abandoned the idea of contending for the fouthern states. The resolutions of that body difavowing this imputation, were carefully concealed from the prisoners. 9 Many believing that South-Carolina would finally remain a British province, and being determined to fave their estates under every form of government, concluded that the fooner they fubmitted the lefs they would lofe. The negroes, and other property of individuals, had been feized by the British during the siege. Prisoners on parole had no chance of repoffeshing themselves of any part of this plunder, though subjects were allowed to put in their claim, and were fometimes successful. A party always attached to royal government, though they had conformed to the laws of the state, rejoiced in the revolution, and fincerely returned to their allegiance, but their number was inconfiderable in comparison with the multitude who were obliged by necessity, or induced by convenience, to accept of British protection.

THE inhabitants of the country, for the most part, lay more at the unconditional mercy of the conquerors than the citizens of the capital. Those who refused to give up their paroles, and did not slee out of the country, were generally removed from their families, and confined to some of the islands on the sea-coast, while their property bevot. came the spoil and plunder of a rapacious army. In this trying fituation, the various ruling passions of individuals appeared without difguife. Some men of the largest fortunes, and who had been promoted to exalted stations, both civil and military, relinquished the service of the state for present ease and convenience. A few of this character, who were entirely out of the way of personal danger, and in the full enjoyment of the privileges of freemen, voluntarily returned, and bowed their necks to the conquerors. In direct contradiction to the whole tenor of their past conduct, they attempted to apologize for their inconfistency, by declaring that they had never aimed at independence, and were always averse from an alliance with France. Many whose estates were deeply in debt at the commencement of the war, had extricated themselves by payments made in the depreciated paper-bills of credit. Some of this class reasoned with themselves, that, having got clear of their private debts at a very easy rate, if they could now break with Congress, and support the British in the possession of the province, they should rid themselves of the heavy taxes that must accrue in consequence of the American war. The mischievous effects of negro-flavery were, at this time, abundantly apparent. Several who had lived in ease and affluence from the produce of their lands, cultivated by the labour of flaves, had not fortitude enough to dare to be poor. Sentiments of honour and love of their country, made them wish to preserve a confishency of conduct, by refusing submission to British government, but the impossibility of supporting themselves by their own exertions, counteracted every generous resolution. The conslict of contrary passions, and the distress of the times, drove several to the excessive use of spirituous liquors, which proved the source of many diseases, and very often destroyed life.

THOUGH numbers broke through the folemn ties by which they had voluntarily bound themfelves to support the cause of America, illustrious facrifices were made at the shrine of liberty; feveral fubmitted to a distressing exile, or a more intolerable confinement. The proprietors of some of the best estates in South-Carolina, suffered them to remain in the power and possession of the conquerors, rather than stain their honour by deferting their country. The rich staked their fortunes; but in the humble walks of obscurity were found feveral of the middling and poorer class of citizens who may be truly said to have staked their lives on the cause of America, for they renounced the comforts subservient to health in warm climates, and contented themselves with a fcanty portion of the plainest necessaries of life. in preference to joining the enemies of independence. In this crifis of danger to the liberties of America, the ladies of South-Carolina conducted themselves with more than Spartan magnanimity. They gloried in the appellation of rebel ladies; and, though they withstood repeated folicitations folicitations to grace publick entertainments with their presence, yet they crowded on board prifon-ships, and other places of confinement, to folace their fuffering countrymen. While the conquerors were regaling themselves at concerts and affemblies, they could obtain very few of the fair fex to affociate with them; but no fooner was an American officer introduced as a prisoner, than his company was fought for, and his person treated with every poslible mark of attention and respect. On other occasions the ladies in a great measure retired from the publick eye, wept over the distresses of their country, and gave every proof of the warmest attachment to its suffering cause. In the height of the British conquests, when poverty and ruin seemed the unavoidable portion of every adherent to the independence of America, the ladies in general discovered more firmness than the men. Many of them, like guardian Angels, preserved their husbands from falling in the hour of temptation, when interest and convenience had almost gotten the better of honour and patriotism. Among the numbers who were banished from their families, and whose property was seized by the conquerors, many examples could be produced of ladies cheerfully parting with their fons, husbands and brothers, exhorting them to fortitude and perseverance; and repeatedly entreating them never to fuffer family-attachments to interfere with the duty they owed to their country. When, in the progress of the war, they were also comprehended under a general sentence of banishment, with equal resolution they parted with their native country, and the many endearments of home—followed their husbands into prison-ships and distant lands, where, though they had long been in the habit of giving, they were reduced to the necessity of receiving charity. They renounced the present gratifications of wealth, and the future prospects of fortunes for their growing offspring—adopted every scheme of economy, and, though born in assumence, and habituated to attendance, betook themselves to hard labour.

WHILST the conquerors were indefatigable in their endeavours to strengthen the party for royal government, by the addition of new subjects, the Americans were not inattentive to their interests. During the siege of Charleston, general Lincoln, in the most pressing manner, requested governor Rutledge, with the whole of his council, to go out of town, on the idea that the civil authority of the state would be exerted to much greater advantage in the country than in the befieged metropolis; that an executive authority might be preserved, though the capital should fall; and at the fame time, that the citizens might not conceive themselves deserted, in the day of danger, it was agreed that governor Rutledge, with three of the council, should leave Charleston, and that lieutenant-governor Gadsden, with the other five of that body, should remain remain within the lines. In confequence of this determination, on the twelfth of April 1780, the governor left Charleston, accompanied by the honourable John-Lewis Gervais, Charles Pinckney and Daniel Huger, efquires. Every exertion was made to embody the country militia, and to bring them forward for the relief of the besieged capital. Failing in this, the next object of the governor was to make a stand to the north of the Santee, in which part of the state were a few continentals, and North-Carolina militia. The reduction of the town, with the army enclosed, occasioned such a general panick among the militia, that they could not be perfuaded to fecond his views. Governor Rutledge in a little time retired to the northward, where he was more fuccefsful in his negotiations with North-Carolina, Virginia, and Congress. Soon after, he returned to South-Carolina, and gave vigour, union and force to the inhabitants in their exertions against British government.

During the fiege expresses were sent by general Lincoln to the Congress, and the states of North-Carolina and Virginia, representing the unpromising appearance of affairs in South-Carolina. In consequence of these several requisitions, Congress determined that a considerable detachment from their main army should be immediately marched to the southward. The state of North-Carolina also ordered a large body of their militia to take the field, and to be relieved every three three months. These staming of a second southern army were originally defigned to compel the British to raise the siege of Charleston, but, being too late for that business, they became a respectable check to the extension of their conquests. The near approach of colonel Tarleton to Mecklenburgh county, where he defeated colonel Buford, induced general Rutherford to take the field for the defence of that part of the country. In three days he collected fifteen hundred militia at Charlotte town; but as lieutenant-colonel Tarleton immediately retreated, they returned to their homes. About ten day's after, lord Rawdon fixed a post at the Waxhaws. General Rutherford a fecond time-collected eight hundred of his militia brigade at Charlotte, and foon after his lordship retreated. The brave men, who so willingly turned out for the defence of their country, at this time of difficulty, were reduced to the greatest straits in providing themselves with suitable armour. They employed the fithe and fickle makers to convert iron and steel, where-ever they could be found, into instruments of defence. They had no lead but the finall private flock accidentally in the possession of hunters, and would have been equally destitute of powder, if the remote magazines of South-Carolina had not been removed and lodged in their neighbourhood. The royalists in both Carolinas, confident of British protection, now began to throw off the mask, and were greatly increased by accessions from the multitude.

multitude, who always fide with the strongest. A large body of this kind, on the twenty-fecond of June 1780, embodied in North-Carolina, at Ramfour's, under the command of col. Moore. The greatest part of these had taken the oath of allegiance to the state of North-Carolina, and many of them had done militia duty in the American fervice; but they were induced, on this occasion, by the perfuasion of their leaders, after having taken arms in support of royal government, to attempt a junction with the British troops at some of their out-posts. This premature infurrection, in opposition to the advice of lord Cornwallis, who had recommended to his friends to remain inactive till he had advanced into their fettlements, subjected the royalists to immediate dispersion. Their leaders, as well in North-Carolina as in the fouth state, were for the most part persons of inferior characters, destitute of military or political talents, and wholly deficient in that fagacity which felects the fittest seasons for accomplishing events.

GENERAL Rutherford immediately marched against these insurgents, but was so short of lead that he could arm only three hundred men. Colonel Lock advanced with this armed detachment twenty-five miles ahead to observe the motions of the royalists, whilst the main body halted behind in expectation of a supply of ammunition from the mines of Virginia. Colonel Lock, though so greatly inserior in sorce, was foon reduced to the necessity of attacking or of being attacked. He chose the former. This was executed with great spirit and judgment. Captain Falls, with a party of horse, rushed into the middle of the infurgents, and threw them into confusion. In this skirmish twenty-two of the whig militia were killed or wounded. Among the former were fix of their officers who had been fingled out by rifle-men among the royalists. The brave captain Falls was one of the flain. Colonel Moore made a proposition to colonel Lock to defift from all hostilities for an hour, which, being agreed to by the latter, the former in that time ran off with his whole party. This infurrection was fcarcely quelled, when general Rutherford received information that colonel Brian, of Rowan county, in North-Carolina, had put himself at the head of a body of tories, in order to join the British. He instantly marched to that part of the state, but failed in his object. Colonel Brian marched down the east fide of the Yadkin, and effected a junction with the royal army at Camden.

As the British advanced to the upper country of South-Carolina, a considerable number of the determined friends of independence retreated before them, and took refuge in North-Carolina. In this class was colonel Sumpter, a gentleman who had formerly commanded one of the continental regiments, and who was known to possess a great share of bravery and other military talents.

Vol. II. S In

In a very little time after he had forfaken his home, a detachment of the British turned his wife and family out of doors, burned the house, and every thing that was in it. A party of these exiles from South-Carolina, who had convened in North-Carolina, made choice of colonel Sumpter to be their leader. At the head of this little band of freemen he foon returned to his own state, and took the field against the victorious British. He made this gallant effort at a time when the inhabitants had generally abandoned the idea of supporting their own independence, and when he had every difficulty to encounter. The flate was no longer in a condition to pay, clothe or feed the troops, who had enrolled themfelves under his command. His followers were, in a great measure, unfurnished with arms and ammunition, and they had no magazines from which they might draw a fupply. The iron tools, on the neighbouring farms, was worked up for their use by common blacksmiths into rude weapons of war. They supplied themselves in part with bullets by melting the pewter with which they were furnished by private housekeepers. They fometimes came to battle when they had not three rounds a man, and fome were obliged to keep at a distance, till, by the fall of others, they were supplied with arms. When they proved victorious they were obliged to rifle the dead and wounded of their arms and ammunition to equip them for their next engagement. At the head of these volunteers colonel Sumpter penetrated netrated into South-Carolina, and re-commenced a military opposition to the British, after it had been suspended for about fix weeks. This unlooked-for impediment to the extension of British conquests roused all the passions which disappointed ambition can inspire. The late conquerors, having in their official despatches, afferted 'that the inhabitants from every quarter had repaired to the detachments of the royal army, and to the garrifon of Charleston, to declare their allegiance to the King, and to offer their fervices in arms in support of his governmentthat in many instances they had brought in prifoners, their former oppressors or leaders—and that there were few men in South-Carolina that were not either their prisoners or in arms with them; and now, finding armed parties suddenly appearing in favour of independence, were overwhelmed with aftonishment, and filled with indignation. Their fucceffes had flattered them with hopes of distinguished rank among the conquerors of America; but these unexpected hostilities made them fear, that their names would be enrolled among those who, by pompous details of British victories, and exaggerated pictures of American fufferings, had deceived the people of England into a continued support of an expensive and ruinous war. Forgetting their experience in the northern states, they had believed the submission of the inhabitants to be sincere; making no allowance for that propenfity in human nature which leads mankind, when in the power of others, to frame their intelligence with more attention to what is agreeable than to what is true, the British for some time conceived that they had little to fear on the fouth fide of Virginia. When experience convinced them of the fallacy of their hopes, they were transported with indignation against the inhabitants. taking any share of the blame to themselves for their policy in constraining men to an involuntary fubmission, they charged them with studied duplicity and treachery. Lenient measures were laid afide for those which were dictated by the fpirit of revenge. Nor were opportunities long wanting for the indulgence of this malignant passion. The private foldiers of the royal army, after deferting, had concealed themselves among the inhabitants. Lord Rawdon, whose temper was foured by disappointment, and whose breast was agitated with rage against the new subjects, as well for their unmeaning fubmissions, as for their conniving at a practice fo injurious to the royal interest, on the first of July 1780 addressed the following letter to H. Rugely, major of British militia, near their head-quarters at Camden:

'SIR,

^{&#}x27;So many deferters from this army have passed with impunity through the districts which are under your direction, that I must necessarily suffice the inhabitants to have connived at, if not facilitated their escape. If attachment to their

6 fovereign will not move the country-people to check a crime fo detrimental to his fervice, it 6 must be my care to urge them to their duty as good subjects by using invariable severity towards every one who shall shew so criminal a ' neglect of the publick interest. I am therefore, fir, to request of you that you fignify to all within the limits of your command my firm determination in this case. If any person shall e meet a foldier straggling without a written pass beyond the picquets, and shall not do his ut-6 most to secure him, or shall not spread an alarm for that purpose, or if any person shall give 6 shelter to soldiers straggling as above-mentioned, or shall ferve them as a guide, or shall furnish them with paffes or any other affiftance, the ' persons so offending may assure themselves of rigorous punishment either by whipping, im-' prisonment, or by being sent to serve his majesty in the West-Indies, according as I shall think the degree of criminality may require. I have ' ordered that every foldier who passes the picquets shall submit himself to be examined by 'any of the militia who have any fuspicion of him: if a foldier therefore attempts to escape, ' when ordered by a militiaman to stop, he is ' immediately to be fired upon as a deferter-Single men of the light-horse need not be exa-' mined, as they may often be fent alone upon expresses—nor is any party of infantry with a 6 non-commissioned officer at the head of it to 6 he stopped.

'I WILL give the inhabitants ten guineas for the head of any deferter belonging to the volunteers of Ireland, and five guineas only if they bring him in alive. They shall likewise be rewarded, though not to that amount, for fuch deferters as they may procure belonging to any other regiment.

'I AM confident that you will encourage the country-people to be more active in this respect.

'And am, fir, with much esteem,

your very humble servant,

(figned) RAWDON:

In addition to this exertion of military authority lord Rawdon, on the first rumour of an advancing American army, called on the inhabitants in and near Camden to take up arms against their approaching countrymen, and confined in the common gaol those who refused. In the midst of summer upwards of one hundred and fixty persons were shut up in one prison, and twenty or thirty of them, though citizens of the most respectable characters, were loaded with irons. Mr. James Bradley, mr. Strother, colonel Few, mr. Kershaw, captain Boykin, colonel Alexander, mr. Irvin, colonel Winn, colonel Hunter and captain John Chefnut, were in the number of those who were subjected to these indignities. The last of these gentlemen, though taken in Charleston, and entitled to the security of his person and property by a solemn capitulation, was deprived of a quantity of indigo equal in value to five thousand dollars; and was also chained to the floor for a considerable time on a suspicion of his having violated his parole by corresponding with the Americans, though the charge was supported by no better evidence than the information of one of his slaves.

THE friends of independence having once more taken the field in South-Carolina, a party of the corps, commanded by colonel Sumpter, confisting of one hundred and thirty-three men, on the twelfth of July 1780 engaged at Williams' plantation, in the upper parts of South-Carolina, with a detachment of the British troops and a large body of tories, commanded by captain Huck. They were posted in a lane, both ends of which were entered at the fame time by the Americans. In this unfavourable position they were speedily routed and dispersed. Colonel Ferguson, of the British militia, captain Huck, and feveral others were killed. This was the first advantage gained over the royal forces fince their landing in the beginning of the year. At the very moment this unexpected attack was made, a number of women were on their knees vainly foliciting captain Huck for his mercy in behalf of their families and property. During his command he had diffressed the inhabitants by every species of infult and injury. He had also shocked them with his profanity, having been been often heard to fay, 'that God Almighty was turned rebel; but that if there were twenty Gops on their fide they should all be conquered.' In a very particular manner he displayed his ennity to the Presbyterians, by burning the library and dwellinghouse of their clergyman the rev. mr. Simpson, and all bibles which contained the Scots translation of the pfalms. These proceedings, no less impolitick than impious, inspired the numerous devout people of that district with an unufual animation. A warm love for independence blended itself with a religious fervour-and these two passions reciprocally added strength to each other. The inhabitants of that part of the state generally arranged themselves under the command of colonel Sumpter, and opposed the British with the enthusiasm of men called upon to defend not only their civil liberties but their holy religion. The effects of this ardour were very fenfibly felt. Colonel Sumpter was foon reinforced to the number of fix hundred men. At the head of this party, on the thirtieth of July 1780, he made a spirited, but unfuccefsful attack on the British post at Rocky-Mount. Without delay he marched in quest of other British detachments, and in eight days after fuccessfully attacked one of their posts at the Hanging Rock, in which was a confiderable force of regulars and tories. The prince of Wales's regiment, which defended this place, was nearly annihilated; and a large body of tories, which had advanced from North-Carolina under colonel Brian.

Brian was completely routed and difperfed. The party commanded by colonel Sumpter was fo short of ammunition, that when they began this attack no one of them had more than ten bullets. In the latter part of the action the arms and ammunition which were taken from the British and tories, who fell in the beginning of it, were turned against their associates.

IT had been for fome time known that an American army was marching from the northward for the relief of their fouthern brethren. The panick occasioned by the fall of Charleston was daily abating. The whig militia, on the extremities of the state, formed themselves into fmall parties under leaders of their own choice, and fome times attacked detachments of the British army, but much more frequently those of their own countrymen, who were turning out as a royal militia. These American parties severally acted from the impulse of their own minds. They fet themselves in opposition to the British without the knowledge of each others motions, and without any preconcerted general plan. Colonel Williams, of the district of Ninety-Six, in particular, was indefatigable in collecting and animating the friends of Congress in that fettlement. With these he frequently harrassed the conquerors. On the eighteenth of August 1780, he attacked a confiderable party of British and tories at Mufgrove's mills, on the Enoree river. In this engagement colonel Innis, of the South-Vol. II. T Carolina

Carolina royalists, was wounded, and the whole of his party obliged to retire.

During the fiege of Charleston, fourteen hundred continental troops, confisting of the Delaware and Maryland line, commanded by majorgeneral Baron De-Kalb, were by Congress ordered to the fouthward. They marched from headquarters at Morristown, in New-Jersey, on the fixteenth of April 1780, embarked at the Head of Elk in May, and landed foon after at Peterfburg in Virginia, and from thence proceeded by land through the country towards South-Carolina. Virginia made great and effectual exertions to expedite the movements of this little army, but in North-Carolina little or no preparations were made for supporting the troops or transporting their baggage. The commissiaries and quartermasters complained that the want of cash and of credit, were insuperable obstacles to the discharge of their duty. The American general found it necessary to make large detachments for impressing provisions. Their misapplied violences in many cases distressed the inhabitants, and greatly injured the fervice. The country was thinly inhabited and poorly cultivated. The last year's crop was nearly expended, and the prefent one was not fufficiently ripe. The troops subfifted principally on lean cattle collected in the woods. The officers were fo distressed for the want of flour, that they made use of hair-powder to thicken their foup, but foon found a more favory fubflitute flitute in green corn. Peaches were also used, and became a seasonable supply. The whole army was some times supplied for twenty-sour hours in this way without either meat or slour. The sufferings and the virtue of the American troops on this occasion, are stated in a letter of August sourteenth, 1780, from major-general Baron De-Kalb to Chevalier De La Luzerne, the minister plenipotentiary from his most christian Majesty to the United States, in the following words: 'You may judge of the virtues of our small army from the following fact: we have for several days lived on nothing but peaches, and I have not heard a complaint. There has been no desertion.'

A CONSIDERABLE number of the militia of North-Carolina had taken the field, and had agreed to rendezvous at Anfon courthouse on the twentieth of July, that they might be in readiness to co-operate with the continental army. On the approach of the Americans major M'Arthur, who commanded on the Peedee, called in his detachments, abandoned his post on the Cheraw hill, and marched directly to join the main body of the royal army at Camden. On the day that the British relinquished this part of the country, the inhabitants, distressed by their depredations, and difgusted with their conduct, generally took arms. Lord Nairne, and one hundred and fix British invalids, going down the Peedee, were made prisoners by a party of the Americans, commanded commanded by major Thomas, who had lately been received as loyal subjects. A large boat coming up from George-Town, well stored with necessaries for major M'Arthur's party, was seized for the use of the American army. All the newmade British militia-officers, excepting colonel Mills, were made prisoners by their own men. The retreat of the British from their out-posts to Camden, the rapid advances of an American army, and the impolitick conduct of the conquerors towards their new fubjects, all concurred about this time to produce a general revolt in favour of Congress. For some time past the people were daily growing more and more difsatisfied with the British. Tired of war, they had submitted to their government, with the flattering expectation of bettering their condition; but they foon found that they had fled from the scorching heat of the sun into the consuming blaze of a furnace. The protection they received, as the recompense of their submissions, was wholly inadequate to the purpose of securing their property. When the British first took possession of the country, they considered themselves as having a right to feize on the property of rebels. Their commissaries and quartermasters took provisions, and all other things wanted by the army where-ever they were to be found. Though things taken this way were all charged to the British government, yet very few of the persons from whom they were taken ever received any fatisfaction. After the state had generally fubmitted.

fubmitted, the same practice was continued. The rapacity of the common men, the indigence and avarice of many of the officers, and the gains of the commissaries and quartermasters, all concurred to forbid any check to this lucrative mode of procuring supplies. They found it much more profitable to look on the inhabitants in the light of rebels, whose property was forfeited, than as reclaimed subjects, who were reinstated in the protection of government. When they applied in the latter character to claim their rights, and to remonstrate against British depredations, they much oftener received infults than redrefs. People who had received this kind of treatment, and who believed that allegiance and protection were reciprocal, foon conceived themselves released from their late engagements, and at full liberty to rejoin the Americans.

Though the inhabitants of Charleston had not the same opportunity of shewing their resentment against their conquerors, yet many of the newmade subjects and the prisoners were very soon disgusted with their conduct. Every ungenerous construction was put on an ambiguous capitulation, to the disadvantage of the citizens, and their rights sounded thereon, were, in several instances, most injuriously violated. On the nineteenth day after the surrender, a quartermaster of lieutenant-colonel Tarleton's legion, of the name of Tuck, with a party of dragoons of that corps, called on mr. Samuel Wyly, an inossensive private militiaman, and, on his acknowledging that he went as a volunteer to the defence of Charlefton, put him to death at his own house near Camden, by cutting him in pieces in a most barbarous manner. Though Mr. Wyly produced a certified copy of his parole as an evidence of his being entitled to the protection due to a prifoner taken by capitulation, yet it availed him nothing. Tuck and his party fwore they would not only kill him, but all others who had turned out as volunteers to oppose the British forces. Continental officers were stripped of their property, on the pretence that they were foldiers, and had no right to claim under the character of citizens. The conquerors deprived the inhabitants of their canoes by an illiberal construction of the article which gave them the shipping in the harbour. Many flaves, and a great deal of property, though fecured by the capitulation, were carried off by fir Henry Clinton's army in June 1780, when they failed from Charleston. mediately after the furrender, five hundred negroes were ordered to be put on board the ships for pioneers to the royal forces in New-York. These were taken where-ever they could be found, and no fatisfaction was made to their owners. The common foldiers, from their fufferings and fervices during the fiege, conceived themselves entitled to a licensed plunder of the town. That their murmurings might be foothed, the officers connived at their reimburfing themselves for their fatigues and dangers at the expence of the citizens. Almost every private house had one or more of the officers or privates of the royal army quartered upon them. In providing for their accommodation very little attention was paid to the convenience of families. The infolence and diforderly conduct of persons thus forced upon the citizens, were in many instances intolerable to freemen heretofore accustomed to be masters in their own houses. The greatest address should have been practised towards the inhabitants, if the army meant to fecond the views of the parent-state, in re-uniting the revolted colonies to her government. To induce a people who had tasted of the sweets of independence, to return to the condition of subjests, their minds and affections, as well as their armies, ought to have been conquered. This more delicate and difficult task was rarely attempted. The officers, privates, and followers of the royal army, were generally more intent on amassing fortunes by plunder and rapine, than on promoting a re-union of the differered members of the empire. The general complexion of the officers ferving in the royal army against America, was very different from what had been usual in better times. In former wars dignity, honour and generofity, were invariably annexed to the military character. Though the old officers of the British regiments in America were for the most part gentlemen, and eminently possessed these virtues, yet feveral vacancies, both at the commencement and in the progress of the American war, had been filled up by a new fet greatly inferior in fortune, education and good breeding. Several new corps had been raifed in America, in which commissions had been promised by publick advertisement to any person who would recruit a given number of men. They who possessed most of that low cunning, which is necessary to wheedle the vulgar, were of course most successful in procuring these commissions. From an army abounding with fuch unworthy characters, and stationed among a people whom they hated as rebels, and from the plunder of whom they hoped to make fortunes, it was not reasonable to expect that winning behaviour which was necessary to conciliate the affections of the revolted states. The royal officers, instead of foothing the inhabitants into good humour, by acts of beneficence and generofity, often aggravated intolerable injuries by more intolerable infults; instead of increasing the number of real friends of royal government, they difgusted the few that they found; instead of gaining the affections of the people, their whole conduct tended to alienate them: in one word, they did more to reestablish the independence of the state than could have been effected by the armies of Congress, had the conquerors guided themselves by maxims of found policy. The high-spirited citizens of Carolina could not brook these oppressions and infults; but most ardently wished to rid the country of the infulting oppressors. From motives of this kind, and a prevailing attachment to the caufe cause of their country, many broke through all ties to join the advancing American army, and more most cordially wished them success.

MAJOR-GENERAL Baron De-Kalb commanded the continentals fent from the northward till the twenty-feventh of July, when major-general Gates arrived with the orders of Congress to take the fupreme command. Great were the expectations of the publick from this illustrious officer. The cloud that had for some time overshadowed American affairs began to disperse. Nothing short of the speedy expulsion of the British from the state came up to the wishes and hopes of the friends of independence. A well-timed proclamation from the American general was very generally approved, and greatly influenced the fentiments and conduct of the inhabitants. The continental army formed a junction with the North-Carolina militia at the Cross-Roads, fortyfive miles from Camden, on the tenth of August. The British, on the approach of general Gates, concentred their whole force at Camden. No interruption of the American army was attempted any where but at Lynch's creek, and even this was abandoned upon their making a circuitous march to the right. The retreat of the British, and the extreme scarcity of provisions, induced general Gates to continue his march to Rugeley's mills, about thirteen miles from Camden, in which position he had the prospect of more com-VOL II. fortable fortable supplies from the well-cultivated settlement of Waxhaws. While the American army advanced towards Camden, colonel Sumpter was to the westward of the Wateree, and daily augmenting his corps from the revolting inhabitants who enrolled themselves under his standard. receiving intelligence that an efcort of clothing, ammunition, and other stores for the garrison at Camden, was on the road from Charleston, and that the whole must pass the Wateree ferry under cover of a small redoubt which the British occupied on the fouth fide of the river, he formed a fuccefsful plan for reducing the redoubt, and capturing the convoy. From his position on the fouth fide of the Wateree, the farther hope was indulged of his intercepting the British, whose defeat or retreat was confidently expected on their way from Camden to Charleston. On the fifteenth general Stevens, with a brigade of Virginia militia, joined general Gates. The whole of the American army now amounted to three thousand fix hundred and fixty-three, of which about nine hundred were continental infantry, and feventy cavalry.

The arrival of this force being quite unexpected, lord Cornwallis, bufily employed in forming regulations for the interior police of the country, was distant from the scene of action. No sooner was he informed of the approach of general Gates, than he prepared to join his army at Camden. He arrived, and superfeded lord

Rawdon in command on the fourteenth. His inferior force, confilting of about feventeen hundred infantry and three hundred cavalry, would have justified a retreat; but, considering that no probable event of an action could be more injurious to the royal interest than that measure, he chose to stake his fortune in the field in a contest with the conqueror of Burgoyne. On the night of the fifteenth he marched out with his whole force to attack the American army; and at the fame hour general Gates put his army in motion, with a determination to take an eligible position between Sander's creek and Green-Swamp, about eight miles from Camden. The advanced parties of both armies met about midnight, and a firing commenced. In the skirmish of the night colonel Porterfield, a very gallant officer of the state of Virginia, received a mortal wound. After some time both parties retreated to their main bodies, and the whole lay on their arms. In the morning a fevere and general engagement took place. The American army was formed in the following manner: the fecond Maryland brigade, commanded by brigadier-general Gift, on the right of the line, flanked by a morass; the North-Carolina militia, commanded by major-general Cafwell, in the centre; and the Virginia militia, commanded by brigadier-general Stevens, on the left, flanked by the North-Carolina militia light-infantry and a morafs. The artillery was posted in the interstices of brigades, and on the most advantageous grounds. Majorgeneral general Baron De-Kalb commanded on the right of the line, and brigadier-general Smallwood commanded the first Maryland brigade, which was posted as a corps-de-reserve two or three hundred yards in the rear. In this position the troops remained till dawn of day. As foon as the British appeared about two hundred yards in front of the North-Carolina troops, the artillery was ordered to fire, and brigadier-general Stevens to attack the column which was displayed to the right. That gallant officer advanced with his brigade of militia in excellent order within fifty paces of the enemy, who were also advancing, and then called out to his men, 'my brave fel-'lows, you have bayonets as well as they, we'll ' charge them.' At that moment the British infantry charged with a cheer, and the Virginians, throwing down their arms, retreated with the utmost precipitation. The militia of North-Carolina followed the unworthy example, except a few of general Gregory's brigade, who paufed a very little longer. A part of colonel Dixon's regiment fired two or three rounds, but the greater part of the whole militia fled without firing a fingle shot. This precipitate slight was perhaps occasioned by the following causes: the troops being badly supplied, had for some time fubfilted on fruit scarcely ripe, without any regular rations of flesh, flour or spirituous liquors. The unexpected meeting of the enemy, their lying for fome hours on their arms, with the apprehension of immediate danger, and the horrors of the the night, operating on militia who had never been in action, and whose strength and spirits were depressed by their preceding low regimen, occasioned so general a panick among the raw troops, that they could not stand before bayonets. The whole left wing and centre being gone, the continentals who formed the right wing, and the corps of referve, engaged about the fame time, and gave the British an unexpected check. The fecond brigade, confisting of Maryland and Delaware troops, gained ground, and had taken no less than fifty prisoners. The first brigade being confiderably out-flanked, were obliged to retire; but they rallied again, and with great spirit renewed the fight. This expedient was repeated two or three times. The British directed their whole force against these two devoted corps, and a tremendous fire of musketry was continued on both fides, with great perfeverance and obstinacy. At length lord Cornwallis, observing that there was no cavalry opposed to him, poured in his dragoons and ended the contest. Never did men behave better than the continentals in the whole of this action; but all attempts to rally the militia were ineffectual. Lieutenant-colonel Tarleton's legion charged them as they broke, and purfued them as they were fleeing. Without having it in their power to defend themselves, they fell in great numbers under the legionary fabres.

MAJOR-

MAJOR-GENERAL Baron De-Kalb, an illustrious German, in the service of France, who had generously engaged in the support of the American independence, and who exerted himself with great bravery to prevent the defeat of the day, received eleven wounds, of which, though he received the most particular assistance from the British, he in a short time expired. Congress, fenfible of his exalted merit, ordered a monument to be erected in Annapolis to his memory. t Lieutenant-colonel Du-Buysson, aid-de-camp to Baron De-Kalb, embraced his wounded general, announced his rank and nation to the furrounding foe, and begged that they would spare his life. While he generously exposed himself to fave his friend, he received fundry dangerous wounds, and was taken prisoner. Brigadier-general Rutherford, a valuable officer, of the most extensive influence over the North Carolina militia, furrendered to a party of the British legion, one of whom, after his submission, cut him in feveral places. Of the South-Carolina line, that brave and distinguished officer, major Thomas Pinckney, acting as aid-de-camp to major-general Gates, had his leg shattered by a musket-ball, and fell into the hands of the conquerors.

THE Americans lost eight field-pieces, the whole of their artillery, upwards of two hundred waggons, and the greatest part of their baggage. The loss of the British, in killed and wounded, was about three hundred. The royal army fought with great bravery; but their fuccess was in a great measure owing to the precipitate slight of the militia, and the superiority of their cavalry.

THE militia composed so great a part of the American army, that general Gates, when he faw them leave the field, lost all hopes of victory, and retired in order to rally a fufficient number to cover the retreat of the continentals, but the further the militia fled, the more they were difperfed. Finding nothing could be done, he continued his retreat into North-Carolina, On his way he was foon overtaken by an officer from colonel Sumpter, who reported that the colonel had fully fucceeded in his enterprize against the British post at the ferry, had captured the garrifon, and intercepted the efcort with the stores; but no advantage could be taken of this event, as the fuccefsful party of Americans was on the opposite side of the river. A few of the Virginia militia were halted at Hillsborough, but in a little time their tour of fervice was out, and all who had not deferted were discharged. The North-Carolina militia went different ways, astheir hopes led or their fears drove them. Several of them were intercepted by their countrymen, who, though they had affembled under the pretence of joining general Gates, yet, on hearing of his defeat, became active in pursuing the fugitives from his army. Almost all the American officers were separated from their commands. Every

Every corps was broken in action, and dispersed through the woods. Major Anderson, of the third Maryland regiment, was the only infantryofficer who kept together any number of men. The retreat of the heavy baggage was delayed till the morning of the action, and the greatest part of it fell into the hands of the British, or was plundered in the retreat. The purfuit was rapid for more than twenty miles; even at the distance of forty miles, teams were cut out of the waggons, and numbers promoted their flight on horseback. The road by which they fled was strewed with arms and baggage, which in their hurry and trepidation they had abandoned, and covered with the fick, the wounded and the dead.

On the feventeenth and eighteenth of August brigadiers Smallwood and Gift, and feveral other officers, arrived at Charlotte. At this place also had rendezvoused upwards of one hundred regular infantry of different corps, besides colonel Armand's cavalry and a fmall partizan corps of horse, which took the field, on this occasion, under the command of major Davie. Some provisions having been collected there, proved a most feafonable refreshment. The drooping spirits of the officers began to revive, and hopes were entertained that a respectable force might foon again be affembled from the country militia, and from the addition of colonel Sumpter's victorious detachment. All these prospects were soon obscured.

obscured, by intelligence that arrived on the nineteenth of the complete dispersion of that corps. On hearing of general Gates's defeat, colonel Sumpter began to retreat up the fouth fide of the Wateree, with his prisoners and captured stores. Lord Cornwallis dispatched lieutenant-colonel Tarleton, with his legion and a detachment of infantry, to pursue him. This was done with fo much celerity and address, that he was overtaken on the eighteenth at Fishing Creek. The British horse rode into their camp before they were prepared for defence. The Americans having been for four days without fleep or provisions, were more obedient to the calls of nature than attentive to her first law-self-preservation. Colonel Sumpter had taken every prudent precaution to prevent a surprize, but his videttes were so fatigued, that they neglected their duty. With great difficulty he got a few of them to make a fhort stand, but the greater part of his corps fled to the river or the woods. The British prisoners, about three hundred, were all retaken and conducted to Camden. Colonel Sumpter loft all his artillery, and his whole detachment was either killed, captured, or difperfed. Y horses to carry off their wounded companions. The citizens of that part of the north state were reduced to great difficulties in removing their families and effects. It was expected that every day would bring intelligence of lord Cornwallis pursuing his fugitive enemies. The inhabitants generally meant to slee before the approaching conquerors. The consusion that took place among all orders is more easily conceived than expressed.

Though much censure was cast on general Gates for this unfortunate action, yet, upon a careful examination of every circumstance, his chief fault seems to be his risking a battle. He chose the most advantageous ground, drew up his men to the best advantage, "but to make them sight was beyond his power. It must be consessed the baggage of the army should have been farther in his rear, a place of rendezvous sixed upon in case of a defeat, and the action, if possible, delayed. Orders for the retreat of the baggage, though given in proper time, were not executed. The other matters, from the great probability of success, were not regarded with sufficient attention.

THE loss of Charleston, and the capture of an army within its lines, had reduced American affairs in South-Carolina low; but the complete rout of a fecond army, procured with great difficulty culty for the recovery of the state, sunk them much lower, and filled the friends of independence with fearful anxiety for the suture state of their country.

THE British were unusually elated, and again flattered themselves, that all opposition in South-Carolina was effectually subdued. Though their victory was complete, and there was no army to oppose them, yet the extreme heat of the weather, and sickliness of the season, restrained them for some time from pursuing their conquests. Much was to be done in the interior police of the country. To crush that spirit of opposition to British government, which discovered itself on the approach of an American army, engaged the attention of lord Cornwallis.

By the complete dispersion of the continental forces, the country was in the power of the conquerors. The expectation of aid from the northward was now less probable than immediately after the reduction of Charleston. Several of the revolted subjects had fallen as prisoners into the hands of the British, and the property of others lay at their mercy. This situation of publick affairs pointed out the present moment of triumph, as the most favourable conjuncture for breaking the spirits of those who were attached to the cause of independence. To prevent their future co-operation with the forces of Congress, a severer policy was henceforward adopted.

UNFORTUNATELY

UNFORTUNATELY for the inhabitants this was taken up on grounds which involved thousands in distress, and not a few in the loss of life. The British conceived themselves in possession of the rights of fovereignty over a conquered country, and that therefore the efforts of the citizens to affert their independence were chargeable with the complicated guilt of ingratitude, treason and rebellion. Influenced by these opinions, and transported with indignation against the inhabitants, they violated rights which are held facred between independent hostile nations. In almost every district their progress was marked with blood, and with deeds fo atrocious as reflected difgrace on their arms. Nor were these barbarities perpetrated in a fudden fally of rage, or by officers of low rank. Major Wemys, of the fixty-third regiment of his britannick majesty's army, deliberately hung mr. Adam Cufack in Cheraw district, who had neither taken parole as a prisoner, nor protection as a British subject, though charged with no other crime than refufing to transport some British officers over a ferry, and shooting at them across a river. Lieutenantcolonel Tarleton has been heard to fay, 'he firmly believed that distressing the inhabitants was the most effectual mode of promoting the 'interest of his royal master.' The immediate authors of executions pleaded no less authority than that of earl Cornwallis, for deliberately shedding the blood of their fellow-men. In a few days after the defeat of general Gates, his lordship stained his military fame by the following letter, addressed to the commandant of the British garrison at Ninety-Six:

6 I HAVE given orders that all the inhabitants of this province, who have fubscribed and have taken part in this revolt, should be punished ' with the greatest rigour; and also those who will onot turn out, that they may be imprisoned, and their whole property taken from them or de-'sftroyed. I have likewife ordered, that compenfation should be made out of their estates to the ' persons who have been injured or oppressed by 'them. I have ordered in the most positive manener, that every militiaman, who has borne arms ' with us, and afterwards joined the enemy, shall be immediately hanged. I defire you will take the most vigorous measures to punish the rebels in the district in which you command, and that ' you obey in the strictest manner the directions 'I have given in this letter relative to the inhabi-' tants of this country.

(Signed) 'CORNWALLIS.'

SIMILAR orders were addressed to the commanders of different posts, and executed with the same spirit with which they were dictated. At or near Camden, Samuel Andrews, Richard Tucker, John Miles, Josiah Gayle, Eleazer Smith, with some others whose names are unknown, were taken out of gaol and hung without any ceremony. Some were indulged with a hearing before a court-martial, instituted by lord Cornwallis for the trial of prisoners; but the evidences against them were not examined on oath, and slaves were both permitted and encouraged to accuse their masters. Not only at Camden, but in the other parts of South-Carolina, and at Augusta in Georgia, the same bloody tragedies were acted, and several of the inhabitants fell facrifices to this new mode of warfare.

THE warm zeal of earl Cornwallis, to annex the states of America to the British empire, prompted him to measures not only derogatory to his character, but inconfistent with the claims of humanity. The prisoners on parole had an undoubted right to take arms; for, by proclamation, after the 20th of the preceding June, as has been flated, they were realeased from every engagement to their conquerors. Of those it may be affirmed, that they were murdered in cold blood. The case of those who had taken British protection is fomewhat different. His lordship could allege, in vindication of his severity to them, an appearance of right, but it was of that too rigid kind which hardens into wrong. These men were under the tie of an oath to support American independence; but had been overcome by the temptation of faving their property to make an involuntary submission to the royal conquerors. By a combination of circumstances they were in fuch a fituation that they could not do otherwife, without without risking the support of their families. Experience foon taught them the inefficacy of these protections. These men naturally reasoned thus: 'that, as the contract was first violated on the part of the conquerors, it could not be fo ' highly criminal for them to recede from it.' They had also submitted on the idea, that they should not be called on to fight against the Americans; but finding themselves compelled to take up arms, and under the necessity of violating their engagements either to their countrymen or their conquerors, they chose to adhere to the former. To treat men thus circumstanced with the fanguinary feverity of deferters and traitors might be politick, but the impartial world must regret, that the unavoidable horrors of war should be aggravated by such deliberate effusions of human blood.

AFTER fuch cruel executions, the destruction of property is scarcely deserving of notice. Suffice it therefore only to quote an extract of a letter from governor Rutledge, to the delegates in Congress from South-Carolina, dated on the eighth of December 1780, which was in the following words: 'It is really melancholy to see the desolate condition of mr. Hill's plantation in the New Acquisition: all his sine iron-works, mills, dwellinghouses, buildings of every kind, even his negro-houses, reduced to ashes, and his wife and children in a little log hut. I was shocked to see the ragged shabby condition of our brave and virtuous men, who would not remain in the power of the enemy, but have taken to arms. This, however, is but a faint description of the fufferings of our country; for 'it is beyond a doubt, that the enemy have hanged 6 many of our people, who, from fear and the im-' practicability of removing, had given paroles, and who, from attachment to our fide, had joined it. ' Nay, Tarleton has, fince the action at Black Storks, hung one Johnson, a magistrate of refpectable character. They have also burnt a pro-' digious number of houses, and turned a vast ' many women, formerly of affluent and eafy fortunes, with their children almost naked, into the Tarleton, at the house of the widow of ' general Richardson, exceeded his usual barbarity; for, having dined in her house, he not only burned it after plundering it of every thing it con-' tained, but having driven into the barns a number of cattle, hogs and poultry, he confumed ' them, together with the barn and the corn in it, ' in one general blaze. This was done because he e pretended to believe that the poor old general was with the rebel army; though, had he opened his grave before the door, he might have seen 6 the contrary. Colonel Charles-Cotefworth Pinck-'ney's family, are turned out of his house. ' fhort, the enemy feem determined, if they can, 6 to break every man's spirit; if they cannot, to 'ruin him. Engagements of capitulation and proclamations are no fecurity against their oppresfions and cruelties.'

Notwithstanding the decifive fuperiority of the British arms in the summer of 1780, several of the citizens, respectable for their numbers, but more so for their weight and influence, continued firm to the cause of independence. was no less mortifying to lord Cornwallis than unfriendly to his future schemes, that these remained within the British lines in the character of prisoners. Though they were restrained by their paroles from doing any thing injurious to the interest of his britannick majesty, yet the silent example of men who were revered by their fellow-citizens, had a powerful influence in restraining many from exchanging their paroles as prisoners, for the protection and privileges of British subjects. To remove every bias of this fort, and to enforce a general submission to royal government, lord Cornwallis, foon after his victory at Camden, gave orders to fend out of the province a number of the principal citizens, prisoners on parole in Charleston. On the twentyfeventh of August Christopher Gadsden, esquire, w the lieutenant-governor of the state, most of the civil and militia officers, and fome others of the hearty friends of America, were taken up very early in the morning out of their houses and beds by armed parties, commanded by major Benson and captain M'Mahon, and brought to the Exchange, from whence, when collected together, they were removed on board the Sandwich guardship, and from thence, in a few days, transported VOL. II. to to St. Augustine. The manner in which this order was executed was not less painful to the feelings of gentlemen, than the order itself was injurious to the rights of prisoners, entitled to the benefits of a capitulation. Guards were left at their respective houses. The private papers of fome of them were examined. Reports were immediately circulated to their difadvantage, and every circumstance managed so as to induce a general belief, that they were all apprehended for violating their paroles, and for concerting a scheme for burning the town, and massacreing the loyal subjects. On the very first day of their confinement they remonstrated to lieutenant-colonel Balfour, the commandant of Charleston, afferting their innocence, and challenging their accusers to appear face to face, with their charges against them.

' Charleston, Monday, August 27, 1780.'

To this no answer was directly obtained; but a message from the commandant, delivered officially by major Benson, acknowledged that this extraordinary step had been taken 'from motives of policy.' This relieved the prisoners from the apprehension that they were charged with a violation of their paroles; but though they obtained this private satisfaction, the royal Gazettes, in all parts of the British dominions, represented them as criminals, apprehended for being concerned in the most dishonourable and mischievous practices. On the first of September following general Moultrie remonstrated to lieutenant-colonel Balfour against this proceeding in a letter expressed in the following words:

SIR,

On perufing the paper, of the twenty-ninth of August, of Robertson, M'Donald and Came-ron, published by authority, to my astonishment I find a paragraph to this effect: "The following is a correct list of the persons sent on board the Sandwich yesterday morning," and; underneath, the names of a number of the most respectable gentlemen, inhabitants of this state, most of whose characters I am so well acquainted with that I cannot believe they would be eguilty of any breach of their paroles, or any article of the capitulation, or done any thing to justify fo rigorous a proceeding against them. 'I therefore think it my duty, as the fenior con-' tinental officer, prisoner under the capitulation, to demand a release of those gentlemen, parc ticularly fuch as are entitled to the benefit of that act. This harsh proceeding demands my 's particular attention, and I do therefore, in be-' half of the United States of America, require that they be admitted immediately to return to their paroles, as their being thus hurried on board a prison-ship, and I fear without being heard, is a violation of the ninth article of the capitulation. If this demand cannot be com-' plied with, I am to request that I may have e leave to fend an officer to Congress, to reprefent this grievance, that they may interpose in behalf of these gentlemen in the manner they ' shall think proper.'

THE only notice taken of this letter of general Moultrie was the following:

' Charleston, September 4, 1780.

SIR,

'THE commandant, lieutenant-colonel Balfour, will not return any answer to a letter wrote in such exceptionable and unwarrantable terms as that to him from general Moultrie, dated

dated the first instant, nor will he receive any further application from him on the subject of it.

'By order of the commandant,
'G. Benson, major of brigade.
'To brigadier-general Moultrie.'

THE British endeavoured to justify this removal by alleging the right of the victors to remove prisoners whithersoever they please, without regarding their convenience. Even where the vanguished are taken at unconditional mercy. this is one of those rigid rights of which a generous conqueror would not, but in cases of extreme necessity, avail himself. From officers of liberal minds, the humanity of mordern civilized nations would give the prifoner, though furrendered without any terms, room to hope for every indulgence compatible with the interest of his conqueror. But when men had given up their arms by a folemn capitulation, the case was much stronger. In the surrender of Charleston, the plain intention and spirit of the capitulation. with respect to the citizens, was, on the part of the Americans, to give the British quiet possesfion of the town, fortifications, &c. as an equivalent for their granting the inhabitants their property, and an unmolested residence at their homes, on the condition of an honourable obfervance of parole. This is expressly mentioned in the case of the country militia; and with regard to the citizens of the town, they were promifed mised the same security for their property that the country militia had, and on the fame terms. Hence it was generally conceived, that the right of the citizens of Charleston to reside at their homes, was not only strongly implied, but plainly expressed in the capitulation: but as the article respecting the inhabitants of the town, only promised that they should be prisoners on parole, and did not immediately add in Charleston, the British commanders found a falvo for their honour in removing gentlemen, charged with no breach of the capitulation, from their houses, estates, wives and children, by offering them that parole in St. Augustine, to which they had an acknowledged right in Charleston. Few fuch instances can be produced in the modern history of any civilized nation, with whom it is an established rule to construe capitulations, where ambiguous, in favour of the vanquished. The conquerors, in their great zeal to make subjects, forgot the rights of prisoners. To express, his indignation at this ungenerous treatment, lieutenant-governor Gadsden refused to accept an offered parole in St. Augustine, and, with the greatest fortitude, bore a close confinement in the castle of that place for forty-two weeks, rather than give a fecond one to a power which had plainly violated the engagement contained in the first. The other gentlemen, who renewed their paroles in St. Augustine, had the liberty of the town, but were treated with indignities unsuitable to their former rank and condition.

Though

Though feveral of them had been members of Congress, and had filled some of the most honourable stations in South-Carolina; and though they had all given their paroles on the honour of gentlemen, not to exceed certain prescribed limits; yet, as if no dependence could be placed on these facred ties, they were ordered every day, by lieutenant-colonel Glazier, to appear on the publick parade, and to answer to their names at roll-calling. For upwards of ten months they were fecluded from their wives and families, and durst not correspond with them without subjecting every letter to examination. Destitute of gold and filver, they could scarcely support themselves, and they were less able to provide for their connexions, which were left in want and in the power of their conquerors. Cut off from all communication with their countrymen, they could receive no intelligence of publick affairs but through British channels. In this forlorn situation, they were informed of feveral decifive battles, which were represented as having completely annihilated every prospect of American independence, and they were taught to expect the fate of vanquished rebels. They also heard from high authority, that the blood of the brave but unfortunate Andrè would be required at their hands. They were told that lieutenant-colonel Glazier, commandant of the garrison in St. Augustine, had announced his fixed resolution inflantly to hang up fix of them, if the exasperated Americans should execute their threats of putting ting to death colonel Brown, of the East-Florida rangers. To all these indignities and dangers they submitted, without an application from a single individual of their number for British protection.

From the time that the citizens before mentioned were fent off from Charleston, St Augustine was made use of to frighten prisoners to petition for the privileges of subjects. They who delayed their fubmission were repeatedly threatened with banishment from their families and estates, to the inhospitable shores of that barren country. To convince the inhabitants that the conquerors were feriously resolved to remove from the country all who refused to become subjects, an additional number of about thirty citizens, who still remained prisoners on parole, was shipped off on the fifteenth of November following. * These were treated with more politeness than the first fet. The only charge exhibited against them, as the reason of their exile, was, that 'they discovered no disposition to return to their allegi-'ance, and would, if they could, overturn the British government.' Lord Cornwallis did not stop here, but being determined to use every method to compel the re-establishment of British government, as well by rewarding its friends, as punishing its opposers, his lordship proceeded, very foon after the action of the fixteenth, to the fequestration of all estates belonging to the decided friends of America. y In the execution of this business John Cruden, esquire, was appointed to take possession of the estates of particular persons, designated in warrants issued by earl Cornwallis and lieutenant-colonel Balsour. These were announced to the publick in notifications, of which the following is a specimen:

'In consequence of the powers in me vested,
by the right hon. earl Cornwallis, and warrants received from his lordship and the commandant of Charleston, I do hereby make publick, to all whom it may concern, that I have given the necessary orders for the seizure of the estates, both real and personal, of those persons whose names are under mentioned, excepting fuch property in Charleston as is secured to those who were in the town at the time of the capitulation; and I do hereby strictly prohibit all and every person or persons from attempting to conceal, remove, or in any way injure the faid property, on pain of being punished as aiding and abetting rebellion.

'I Do also forbid the payment of debts due to fuch persons whose names have been before or are hereaster mentioned, and whose estates are now under sequestration; and I am warranted to require, that all and every his majesty's loyal subjects, who may be indebted as aforesaid, do forthwith furnish me with an accurate and exact state of the same; and should any person or persons conceal, or in any respect prove

- backward in delivering to me fuch information, they will be considered in the same light as
- those who may attempt to remove, conceal or
- injure the moveable property, and treated ac-
- cordingly.
- AND, the more effectually to prevent any collusive practices, I do hereby promise to all - those who may make discoveries of the conceal-
- 6 ment of negroes, horses, cattle, plate, house-
- ' hold furniture, books, bonds, deeds, &c. fo
- 'that the property may be fecured, and the de-
- ' linquents punished, a generous reward.
 - Given under my hand.

(Signed)

' John Cruden.'

THE names of persons whose estates were ordered for fequestration were, from time to time, fubjoined.

In the year 1778, when the then recent capture of general Burgoyne's army, and the alliance with France, inspired all ranks of men in Carolina with confidence in the final establishment of their independence, the legislature of that flate gave to all the friends of royal government their free choice, of either joining them or of going where they pleased, with their families and property. In the year 1780, when the British arms had the ascendant, the conquerors gave no alternative, but either to join them, and to fight fight against their countrymen and consciences, or to be banished, under every restriction of prifoners of war. Instead of being allowed to carry their estates with them, they, whose property made it worth while, were stripped of every thing; and all, whether their estates were sequestered or not, were deprived of the privileges of recovering their debts, and of felling or removing their property without the permission of the conquerors. An adherent to independence was now confidered as one who courted exile, poverty and ruin. The temptation was too great to be refisted by those who were attached to their interest and ease. Numbers who formerly professed great zeal in the support of their country. and who continued their adherence to the cause of America after the furrender of Charleston, yielded to these temptations, and became British subjects. To discourage the other states from any further attempts in behalf of Carolina, an address to lord Cornwallis was drawn up, in which the fubscribers 'congratulated him for his ' glorious victory at Camden; and expressed their indignation at Congress for disturbing the citizens of Carolina, who were represented as having broken off from the union, and re-united themselves to the British empire.' Though every method was used to obtain figners to this address, yet no more than one hundred and fixtyfour could be procured. Notwithstanding these discouragements, the genius of America rose fuperior perior to them all. At no time did her fons appear to greater advantage, than when they were depressed by successive misfortunes. They seemed to gain strength from their losses, and, instead of giving way to the pressure of calamities, to oppose them with more determined resolution.

CHAPTER TWELFTH.

Of colonel Ferguson's descat. Lieutenant-colonel Tarleton's descat. Of the retreat of the American army into Virginia. Of their return to North-Carolina. Of the battle of Guilford courthouse. Of lord Cornwallis's march to Wilmington. General Greene's pursuit, and subsequent return to South-Carolina. Of the reduction of fort Watson. Of the battle of Hobkirk's hill near Camden. Of the evacuation of Camden. Of the reduction of fort Motte. Fort Granby. Fort Cornwallis. Of the siege of Ninety-Six. Of the retreat of the American army. Of the battle of Eutaw. The retreat of the British army to the vicinity of Charleston, and the distresses of the American army.

ITHERTO the British arms to the south-ward have been attended with almost uninterrupted success. The royal standards we have seen overspreading all the country, penetrating into every quarter, and triumphing over all opposition. Their defeats at the Hanging-Rock and at Williams's, in the upper parts of South-Carolina, made but little impression on an army grown familiar with victories. Checks indeed they were, but nothing more, and the only checks they had sustained since their landing in the state. The British ministry, by this stattering posture of assairs, were once more intoxicated with with the delusive hopes of subjugating America. New plans were formed, and great expectations indulged of speedily re-uniting the differered members of the empire. The rashness of general Burgoyne, and the languor of fir William Howe, were affigned as the only causes of that shame and disappointment which had already disgraced five fuccessive campaigns. It was now afferted with a confidence bordering on prefumption, that fuch troops as fought at Camden, put under fuch a commander as lord Cornwallis, would foon extirpate rebellion fo effectually as to leave no vestige of it in America. The British ministry and army, by an impious confidence in their own wifdom and prowefs, were duly prepared to give, in their approaching downfal, an useful lesson to the world.

The disaster of the army under general Gates, overspread, at first, the face of American affairs with a dismal gloom. But the day of prosperity to the United States began, as will appear in the sequel, from that moment to dawn. Their prospects brightened up while those of their enemies were obscured by disgrace, broken by defeat, and at last covered with ruin. Elated with their victory, the conquerors grew more insolent and rapacious, while the real friends of independence, thoroughly alarmed at their danger, became resolute and determined. We have seen Sumpter penetrating into South-Carolina, and recommencing a military opposition to British government.

Soon after that event he was promoted by governor Rutledge to the rank of brigadier-general. About the fame time Marion was promoted to the fame rank, and, in the northeastern extremities of the state, successfully prosecuted the same plan. This valuable officer, to whom Carolina is much indebted, had retired from Charleston during the fiege, having most fortunately for his country fractured his leg, which rendered him incapable of commanding his regiment. After the furrender of the metropolis, he retreated to North-Carolina. On the advance of general Gates, he obtained a command of fixteen menwith these he penetrated through the country, and took a position near the Santee. From this station he fallied out, captured a British guard, and rescued a party of continental prisoners, who, having been taken on the fixteenth of August 1780, were on their way from Camden to Charleston. On the defeat of general Gates he was compelled to abandon the state; but after an absence of ten days he returned. Unfurnished with the means of defence, he was obliged to take possession of the saws of the sawmills, and to convert them into horsemens' swords. So much was he distressed for ammunition, that he has engaged when he had not three rounds to each man of his party. At other times he has brought his men into view, though without ammunition, that he might make a shew of numbers to the enemy. For feveral weeks he had under his command only feventy men, all volunteers from the militia. At one time hardships and dangers reduced that number to twenty-five; yet, with this inconsiderable force, he secured himself in the midst of surrounding foes. Various methods were attempted to draw off his followers. Major Wemys burned scores of houses, belonging to the inhabitants living on Peedee, Lynch's creek and Black river, who were supposed to do duty with him, or to be subservient to his views. This measure had a contrary effect from what was expected. Revenge and despair co-operated with patriotifm to make these ruined men keep the field. The devouring flames fent on defenceless habitations by blind rage and brutal policy, increased not only the zeal, but the number of his followers. The impolitick conduct of the British on other occasions gained him frequent reinforcements. On one occasion major Wemys collected some hundreds of the fencible inhabitants, refiding near the Santee, and in an harangue to them fet forth, ' that the British were come to rescue them from tyranny and oppression.' While he amused them with his eloquence, he had a party out who feized all their horses. The enraged countrymen walked home, but soon after many of them repaired to general Marion. For feveral months he and his party were obliged to fleep in the open air, and to shelter themselves in the thick recesses of deep fwamps. From these retreats he fallied out whenever an opportunity of haraffing the enemy or of ferving his country presented itself. This wor-Vor. II. Z thy thy citizen, on every occasion, paid the greatest regard to private property, and restrained his men from every species of plunder. On the whole, he exhibited a rare instance of disinterested patriotism in doing and suffering every thing subservient to the independence of his country.

Opposition to British government was not wholly confined to the parties commanded by general Sumpter and general Marion. It was at no time altogether extinct in the extremities of the state. The inhabitants of that part of South-Carolina, which is called the New Acquifition from the circumstance of its being gained from North-Carolina by a late fettlement of the boundary-lines between the two provinces, never were paroled as prisoners, nor did they take protection as fubjects. From among these people general Sumpter had recruited a confiderable part of his men. After his defeat on the eighteenth of August 1780, several of them repaired to that settlement, and kept in small parties for their own defence. Some of them also joined major Davie, an enterprifing young gentleman who commanded fifty or fixty volunteers, who had equipped themselves as dragoons. This was the only American corps which, at that time, had not been beaten or dispersed. The disposition to revolt, which had been excited on the approach of general Gates's army, was not extinguished by its defeat. By that check the spirit of the people was over-awed, but not fubdued. The feverity with with which revolters who were taken had been treated, induced many others to perfevere, and to feek fafety in fwamps.

EARLY in September 1780 colonel Clark collected a party, and marched through the upper parts of South-Carolina on his way to Georgia. A few joined him in Ninety-Six, but the more prudent discouraged him from his ill-timed enterprize. He, however, profecuted his defign, and made a bold attempt on the British post at Augusta, but was soon obliged to slee out of the country. This premature infurrection paved the way to a much more ferious and general revolt. Colonel Brown, who commanded at Augusta, being relieved from his fears, treated with the utmost severity those of the inhabitants who had joined colonel Clark, or who were supposed to have favoured his defigns. Suspicion began to fpread her baneful poifon. The British, having lost all confidence in their new subjects, confined fome, and threatened others, who were entirely innocent of Clark's infurrection. These severities difgusted the people, and actually brought on that revolt which they were intended to prevent. Some leading men were obliged, in felfdefence, to break with their conquerors, and refume their arms in opposition to them.

From the time of the general fubmission of the inhabitants in the summer of 1780, pains were taken to increase the royal force by the cooperation operation of the yeomanry of the country. Commissions in the militia were given by the British commanders to fuch of the inhabitants as they supposed had influence, and were most firmly attached to their interest. They perfuaded the people to embody by reprefenting to the uninformed that American affairs were entirely ruined, and that farther opposition would only be a prolongation of their distresses, if not their utter ruin. They endeavoured to reconcile those who had families and were advanced in life to the bearing of arms, by confiderations drawn from the necessity of defending their property and of keeping their domesticks in proper subordination. From young men without families more was expected. Whilst lord Cornwallis was restrained from active operations by the excessive heats and unhealthy feafon which followed his victory at Camden, colonel Ferguson, of the seventy-first British regiment, had undertaken personally to visit the settlements of the disaffected to the American cause, and to train their young men for service in the field. With these, at a proper feafon, he was to join the main army, and to co-operate with it in the reduction of North-Carolina. This corps had been chiefly collected from the remote parts of the state, and was induced to continue for some length of time near to the western mountains, with the expectation of intercepting colonel Clark on his retreat from Georgia. Among those who joined colonel Ferguson were a considerable proportion of those licentious centious people who have collected themselves out of all parts of America into these remote countries, and were willing to take the opportunity of the prevailing confusion to carry on their usual depredations. As they marched through the country on the pretence of promoting the fervice of his Britannick majesty, they plundered the whig citizens. Violences of this kind, frequently repeated, induced many persons to consult their own safety by sleeing over the mountains. By fuch lively reprefentations of their fufferings as the diffressed are always ready to give, they communicated an alarm to that hardy race of republicans who live to the westward of the Alleghany. Hitherto these mountaineers had only heard of war at a distance, and had been in peaceable possession of that independence for which their countrymen on the fea-coast were contending. Alarmed for their own fafety by the near approach of colonel Ferguson, and roused by the violences and depredations of his followers, they embodied to check the neighbouring foe. This was done of their own motion, without any requifition from the governments of America, or the officers of the continental army. Being all mounted and unincumbered with baggage, their motions were rapid. Each man fet out with his blanket, knapfack and gun, in quest of colonel Ferguson, in the same manner he was used to pursue the wild beasts of the forest. At night the earth afforded them a bed, and the Heavens a covering: the running stream quenched their thirft.

thirst, while a few cattle, driven in their rear, together with the supplies acquired by their guns, fecured them provision. They foon found out the encampment of colonel Ferguson. This was on an eminence of a circular base, known by the name of King's Mountain, fituated near the confines of North and South-Carolina. Though colonel Campbell had a nominal command over the whole, their enterprize was conducted without regular military subordination, under the direction of the four colonels, Cleveland, Shelby, Sevier and Williams, each of whom respectively led on his own men. It being apprehended that colonel Ferguson was hastening his march down the country to join lord Cornwallis, the Americans selected nine hundred and ten of their best men, and mounted them on their fleetest horses. With this force they came up with colonel Ferguson on the seventh of October 1780. As they approached the royal encampment, it was agreed to divide their force. Some ascended the mountain, while others went round its base in opposite directions. Colonel Cleveland, who led one of the detachments round the mountain, in his progress, discovered an advanced picquet of the royal army. On this occasion he addressed his party in the following plain unvarnished language: ' My brave fellows, we have beat the tories, and we can beat them. They are all cowards. If they had the spirit of men, they would join with their fellow-citizens in supporting the indepen-' dence of their country. When engaged you ' are not to wait for the word of command from me. I will shew you by my example how to 'fight. I can undertake no more. Every man ' must consider himself as an officer, and act from his own judgment. Fire as quick as you can, and ftand your ground as long as you can. When you can do no better, get behind trees or retreat; but I beg of you not to run quite off. If we are repulsed, let us make a point to return and renew the fight. Perhaps we may have better luck in the fecond attempt than the 'first. If any of you are afraid, such have leave to retire, and they are requested immediately 'to take themselves off.' A firing commenced. Some of the Americans were on horseback. others on foot. Some behind trees, and others exposed. None were under the restraints of military discipline, but all were animated with the enthusiasm of liberty. The picquet soon gave way, and were purfued as they retired up the mountain to the main body. Colonel Ferguson, with the greatest bravery, ordered his men to charge. The Americans commanded by colonel Cleveland followed his advice, and, having fired as long as they could with fafety, they retired from the approaching bayonet. They had fcarcely given way when the other detachment, com-manded by colonel Shelby, having completed the circuit of the mountain, opportunely arrived, and from an unexpected quarter poured in a well-directed fire. Colonel Ferguson desisted from the purfuit, and engaged with his new adverfaries.

versaries. The British bayonet was again succefsful, and caused them also to fall back. By this time the party commanded by colonel Campbell had ascended the mountain, and renewed the attack from that eminence. Colonel Ferguson, whose conduct was equal to his courage, prefented a new front, and was again fuccessful; but all his exertions were unavailing. At this moment the men who began the attack, no less obedient to the fecond request of their commander in returning to their posts, than they were to the first in securing themselves by a timely retreat, had rallied and renewed their fire. often as one of the American parties was driven back, another returned to their station. Resistance on the part of colonel Ferguson was in vain; but his unconquerable spirit refused to surrender. After having repulfed a fuccession of adversaries pouring in their fire from new directions, this distinguished officer received a mortal wound. No chance of escape being left, and all prospect of successful resistance being at an end, the second in command fued for quarters. The killed, wounded and taken, exceeded eleven hundred, of which nearly one hundred were regulars. The affailants had the honour of reducing a number superior to their own. The Americans lost comparatively few, but in that number was that distinguished militia-officer, colonel Williams, who has already been mentioned as uncommonly active in heading the whig citizens of the diffrict of Ninety-Six, in the state of South-Carolina. Ten

Ten of these men who had surrendered were hanged by their conquerors. They were provoked to this measure by the severity of the British, who had lately hanged a greater number of Americans at Camden, Ninety-Six and Augusta. They also alleged, that the men who suffered were guilty of crimes for which their lives were forseited by the laws of the land.

This unexpected advantage gave new spirits to the desponding Americans, and in a great degree frustrated a well-concerted scheme for strengthening the British army, by the co-operation of the inhabitants who were disaffected to the cause of America.

IT was fcarcely possible for any event to have happened, in the prefent juncture of affairs, more unfavourable to the views of lord Cornwallis. than this reverse of fortune. The fall of colonel Ferguson, who possessed superior talents as a partizan, was no fmall loss to the royal cause. In addition to the accomplishments of an excellent officer, he was a most exact marksman, and had brought the art of rifle-shooting to an uncommon degree of perfection. He had invented a gun of that kind on a new construction, which is faid to have far exceeded every thing before known. The total rout of the royalists, who had joined colonel Ferguson, operated as a check on their future exertions. The fame timid caution which made them averse from joining their Vol. II. Aa countrymen, countrymen, in opposing the claims of Great-Britain, restrained them from risking any more in support of the royal cause. From this time forward many of them waited events, and reserved themselves till the British army, by their own unaffisted efforts, should gain a decided superiority.

In a few weeks after the general action near Camden, on the fixteenth of August 1780, lord Cornwallis left a small force in that village, and marched with the main army to Charlotte. Whilst they lay there, general Sumner and general Davidson, with a confiderable body of North-Carolina militia, took post in the vicinity, and annoyed their detachments. Major Davie, whose corps was greatly increased by stanch volunteers from the lower country, was particularly fuccessful in intercepting their foragingparties and convoys. Riflemen frequently penetrated near the British camp, and from behind trees took care to make fure of their object, fo that the late conquerors found their fituation very uneafy, being exposed to unseen danger if they attempted to make an excursion of only a few hundred yards from their encampment. The defeat of colonel Ferguson, added to these circumstances, gave a ferious alarm to lord Cornwallis, and made him, while at Charlotte, apprehensive for his own fafety. He therefore retreated, and fixed his next position at Winnsborough. As he retired, the militia took feveral waggons loaded with with stores, and single men often rode up within gun-shot of his army, discharged their pieces, and made their escape.

The panick occasioned by the reduction of Charleston, and the defeat of general Gates, began to wear off. The defeat of colone! Ferguson, and the consequent retreat of lord Cornwallis from Charlotte to Winnsborough, encouraged the American militia to repair to the camps of their respective commanders. The necessity of the times induced them to submit to the stricter discipline of regular soldiers. The legislature of North-Carolina put the militia of their state under the command of general Smallwood, of the continental army.

EARLY in October, major-general Gates detached brigadier-general Morgan from Hillsborough, with three hundred Maryland and Delaware troops, and eighty dragoons, to aid the exertions of the whig citizens of Mecklenburgh and Rowan counties. In an excursion from this detached position, lieutenant-colonel Washington penetrated with a small force to the vicinity of Camden, and, on the fourth of December 1780, appeared before colonel Rugely's. This gentleman, having taken a commission in the British militia, had made a stockade-fort round his house, in which he had collected one hundred and twelve of the men under his command. The appearance of the force, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Washington, produced an immediate surrender of this whole party. A pine log enforced the propriety and necessity of their speedy unresisting submission. This harmless timber, elevated a few feet from the surface of the earth by its branches which stuck in the ground, was moulded by the imagination of the garrison into artillery, completely equipped with all the apparatus of death.

GENERAL Sumpter, foon after the dispersion of his force on the eighteenth of August 1780, as has been before related, collected a corps of volunteers. About thirty of his party re-joined him immediately after that event. In three days more, one hundred of the whig-citizens in the vicinity, on his requisition, rendezvoused at Sugar Creek, and put themselves under his command. With these, and other occasional reinforcements, though for three months there was no continental army in the state, he constantly kept the field in support of American independence. He varied his position from time to time about Enoree, Broad and Tyger rivers, and had frequent skirmishes with his adversaries. Having mounted his followers, he infested the British with frequent incursions, beat up their quarters, intercepted their convoys, and fo haraffed them with fuccessive alarms, that their movements could not be made but with caution and difficulty. On the twelfth of November 1780, he was attacked at Broad river by major Weynis, commanding manding a corps of infantry and dragoons. In this action the British were defeated, and their commanding officer taken prisoner. Though major Weyms had perfonally superintended the execution of mr. Adam Cufack, after ordering him to be hung, and though in his pocket was found a memorandum of feveral houses burned by his command, yet he received every indulgence from his conquerors. On the twentieth of the same month, general Sumpter was attacked at Black Storks, near Tyger river, by lieutenant-colonel Tarleton, at the head of a confiderable party. The action was fevere and obstinate. The killed and wounded of the British was considerable. Among the former were three officers, major Money, lieutenants Gibson and Cope. Americans loft very few, but general Sumpter received a wound, which, for feveral months, interrupted his gallant enterprizes in behalf of the state. His zeal and activity in animating the American militia when they were discouraged by repeated defeats, and the bravery and good conduct he displayed in fundry attacks on the British detachments, procured him the applause of his countrymen, and the thanks of Congress. 22

The continental army which had been collected at Hillsborough, after their dispersion on the fixteenth of August, moved down to Charlotte in the latter end of the year 1780. Congress authorized general Washington to appoint an officer, to take the command in the fouthern district. His excellency nominated major-general Greene, a native of the state of Rhode-Island, to this important trust; and in consequence thereof he arrived in Charlotte the fecond day of December 1780. This illustrious officer was universally acknowledged to possess great military talents, particularly a penetrating judgment, and a decifive enterprising spirit. Great were the difficulties he had to encounter. The principal part of his standing-force consisted of the few continentals who had escaped from the defeat near Camden on the fixteenth of August 1780. On the eighth of December, fix days after general Greene took the command, the returns of the fouthern army were nine hundred and feventy continentals, and one thousand and thirteen militia. The continentals were without pay, and almost without clothing. All sources of supply from Charleston were shut up, and no imported article could be obtained but from a distance of near two hundred miles. Though the American force was finall, yet the procuring of provisions for its support, was a matter of the greatest difficulty. The paper currency was fo depreciated, that it was wholly unequal to the purchase of necessaries for the fuffering foldiers. Specie could not be procured. Though general Greene was authorized to dispose of a few bills, drawn by Congress on their minister at the court of France, on a credit given him by that court, yet, fuch was the situation of the country, that very very little relief could be obtained from this quarter, and the greatest part of the bills were returned unfold. The confusion and disorder which prevailed near the feat of war increased the difficulty of procuring supplies. The government of North-Carolina had adopted an inconvenient system of collecting provisions. The state was divided into little districts, in which commissaries and quartermassers were duly appointed, but not connected with each other under a common head of the department. General Greene's experience in the business of quartermaster enabled him to point out the defects of this arrangement, and to introduce fuch falutary alterations as the publick fervice required. The good effects of this new system, united under one head, were quickly felt. The want of money still remained an insuperable obstacle to the purchasing of provisions. The only resource left for supplying the American army was by impressment. The country had been fo completely ravaged, that all which could be obtained even in that way, in the vicinity of the army, was far short of a sufficiency. To fupply the army, and please the inhabitants, was equally necessary. To feize upon their property, and preserve their kind affections, was a most delicate point, and yet of the utmost moment, as it furnished the army with provisions without impairing the disposition of the inhabitants to co-operate with the continental troops in recovering the country. This grand object called for the united efforts of both. Therefore, that the business of impressment might be conducted in the least offensive manner, it was transferred from the military to the civil officers of the state. This was not only more essectual, but it also prevented two other evils of dangerous consequence—the corruption of the discipline of the army—and, the misapplication of property impressed for the publick service.

WITH an inconfiderable army, miferably provided, general Greene took the field against a superior British regular force, which had marched in triumph two hundred miles from the seacoast, and was slushed with successive victories through a whole campaign. To face an host of difficulties, the American general had the justice of his cause, his own valour and good conduct, a very respectable cavalry, and the Maryland and Delaware continentals who had served upwards of four years, and who, for their numbers, were equal to any troops in the world.

Many of the inhabitants who, from necessity, had submitted to the British government, most cordially wished him good speed; but the unsuccessful attempt of general Gates to recover the country, made the cautious and timid, for some time, very slow in repairing to the standard of liberty.

Soon after general Greene took the command, he divided his force, and fent a respectable detachment, tachment, under general Morgan, to the western extremities of South-Carolina, and marched on the twentieth of December with the main body to Hicks's creek, on the north side of the Peedee, opposite to Cheraw hill. This division of the little American army into two parts, so remote from each other that they could not co-operate, was risking much; but the necessity of the case gave no alternative. The continental army was too inconsiderable to make successful opposition to the superior numbers of lord Cornwallis without the most powerful co-operation of the militia of the country. To give them an opportunity of embodying it was necessary to cover both extremities of the state.

AFTER the general fubmission of the militia in the year 1780, a revolution took place highly favourable to the interests of America. The refidence of the British army, instead of increasing the real friends to royal government, diminished their number, and added new vigour to the opposite party. In the district of Ninety-Six, moderate measures were at first adopted by the British commanders, but the effects of this were frustrated by the royalists. A great part of those who called themselves the King's friends, had been at all times a banditti, to whom rapine and violence were familiar. On the restoration of royal government, these men preferred their claim to its particular notice. The conquerors were fo far imposed on by them, that they promoted VOL. II. Bb fame fome of them who were of the most infamous characters. Men of fuch base minds and mercenary principles, regardless of the capitulation, gratimed their private resentments, and their rage for plunder, to the great distress of the newmade subjects, and the greater injury of the royal interest. Violences of this kind made some men break their engagements to the British, and join the Americans. Their revolt occasioned fuspicions to the prejudice of others who had no intention of following their example. Fears, jealousies and distrust, haunted the minds of the conquerors. All confidence was at an end. Severe measures were next tried, but with a worse effect. Lieutenant-colonel Balfour, an haughty and imperious officer, who commanded in that district, was more calculated, by his infolence and overbearing conduct, to alienate the inhabitants from a government already beloved, than to reconcile them to one which was generally difliked. By an unwarrantable stretch of his authority, he issued a proclamation, by which it was declared, that every man who was not in his house by a certain day, should be subject to ' military execution.' The British had a post in Ninety-Six for thirteen months, during which time the country was filled with rapine, violence and murder. Applications were made daily for redrefs, yet in that whole period there was not a fingle instance wherein punishment was inflicted either on the foldiery or tories. The people foon found that there was no fecurity for their lives, liberties liberties or property, under the military government of British officers, which subjected them to the depredations of a malicious mercenary banditti, falfely calling themselves the friends of royal government. The peaceable citizens were reduced to that uncommon distress, in which they had more to fear from oppression than resistance; they therefore most ardently wished for the appearance of an American force. Under these favourable circumstances general Greene detached general Morgan to take a position in the western extremity of the state. There he arrived on the twenty-fifth of December 1780. On the twenty-ninth he dispatched lieutenantcolonel Washington, with his own regiment, and two hundred militia-horse, commanded by lieutenant-colonel M'Call, to attack a body of tories who were plundering the whig inhabitants. Lieutenant-colonel Washington came up with them on the thirtieth, near Hammond's storehouse, and charged them, on which they all fled without making any refistance. Many were killed or wounded, and about forty taken prisoners.

On the next day lieutenant-colonel Washington detached cornet James Simons, with a command of eleven regulars and twenty-five militia, to pursue the fugitives, and to surprize a fort a few miles distant, in which general Cunningham commanded about one hundred and fifty British militia. This fort, situated seventeen miles from Ninety-Six, was strongly picquetted in every direction; direction; and, besides containing a great deal of plunder taken from the whig inhabitants, was well stored with forage, grain and other provisions for the use of the British army. As foon as the Americans were discovered, general Cunningham and all his men abandoned the fort. Cornet Simons stationed his detachment, and, advancing with a flag, demanded their furrender. General Cunningham requested time to confult his officers, and five minutes were given him for that purpose. In that short space the whole party of tories ran off, and dispersed themselves through the woods. Cornet Simons, after destroying the fort, and all the provisions in it, which he could not carry away, rejoined lieutenant-colonel Washington without any molestation.

THESE fuccesses, the appearance of an American army, a fincere attachment to the cause of independence, and the impolitick conduct of the British, induced several persons to resume their arms, and to act in concert with the detachment of continentals. Lord Cornwallis wished to drive general Morgan from this station, and to deter the inhabitants from joining him. Lieutenantcolonel Tarleton, at the head of a thousand regulars, was ordered to execute this business. The British had two field-pieces, and the superiority of numbers in the proportion of five to four, and particularly of cavalry, in the proportion of three to one. Besides this inequality of force, two thirds of the troops under general Morgan were militia.

militia. With these fair prospects of success lieutenant-colonel Tarleton, on the feventeenth of January 1781, engaged general Morgan, with the expectation of driving him out of the country. General Morgan had obtained early intelligence of Tarleton's force and advances, and drew up his men in two lines. The whole of the fouthern militia, with one hundred and ninety from North-Carolina, under major M'Dowel, were put under the command of colonel Pickens. These formed the first line, and were advanced a few hundred yards before the fecond, with orders to form on the right of the fecond when forced to retire. The fecond line confifted of the light-infantry, under lieutenant-colonel Howard, and a fmall corps of Virginia militia riflemen. Lieutenant-colonel Washington, with his cavalry, and about forty-five militiamen mounted and equipped with fwords, under lieutenant-colonel M'Call, were drawn up at some distance in the rear of the whole. The Americans were formed before the British appeared in fight. Lieutenant-colonel Tarleton halted and formed his men when at the distance of about two hundred and fifty yards from the front line of general Morgan's detachment. As foon as the British had formed they began to advance with a fhout, and poured in an inceffant fire of musketry. Colonel Pickens directed the militia under his command not to fire till the British were within forty or fifty yards. This order, though executed with great firmness and fuccess, was not sufficient to repel the advancing foe. The American militia were obliged to retire, but were foon rallied by their officers. The British advanced rapidly and engaged the fecond line, which, after a most obstinate conflict, was compelled to retreat to the cavalry. In this crifis of the battle lieutenantcolonel Washington made a successful charge upon lieutenant-colonel Tarleton who was cutting down the militia. Lieutenant-colonel Howard, almost at the same moment, rallied the continental troops, and charged with fixed bayonets. The example was instantly followed by the militia. Nothing could exceed the aftonishment and confusion of the British, occasioned by these unexpected charges. Their advance fell back upon their rear, and communicated a panick to the whole. In this moment of confusion lieutenantcolonel Howard called to them 'to lay down their arms,' and promifed them good quarters. Upwards of five hundred accepted the offer, and furrendered. The first battalion of the seventyfirst regiment, and two British light-infantry companies laid down their arms to the American militia. Previous to this general furrender, three hundred of the corps, commanded by lieutenantcolonel Tarleton, had been killed, wounded or Eight hundred stand of arms, two fieldpieces, and thirty-five baggage-waggons, also fell into the hands of the Americans. Lieutenantcolonel Washington pursued the British cavalry for feveral miles, but a great part of them escaped. The Americans had only twelve men killed, and and fixty wounded. General Morgan, whose great abilities were discovered by the judicious disposition of his force, and whose activity was conspicuous through every part of the action, obtained the universal applause of his countrymen. And there never was a commander better supported than he was by the officers and men of his detachment. The glory and importance of this action resounded from one end of the continent to the other. It re-animated the desponding friends of America, and seemed to be like a resurrection from the dead to the southern states.

GENERAL Morgan's good conduct on this memorable day was honoured by Congress with a gold medal. That illustrious affembly, on this occasion, presented also a medal of silver to colonel Washington, another to lieutenant-colonel Howard, a fword to colonel Pickens, a brevet majority to Edward Giles, the general's aid-decamp, and a captaincy to baron Glasback, who had lately joined the light-infantry as a volunteer. bb This action reflected fo much honour on the American arms, that general Morgan transmitted to Congress an official account of the names of the continental officers who shared in the glory thereof. cc The British legion, hitherto triumphant in a variety of skirmishes, on this occasion lost their laurels, though they were supported by the feventh regiment, one battalion of the the seventy-first, and two companies of light-infantry. Lieutenant-colonel Tarleton had hitherto acquired distinguished reputation, but he was greatly indebted for his military fame to good fortune and accident. In all his previous engagements he either had the advantage of surprizing an incautious enemy—of attacking them when panick-struck after recent defeats—or of being opposed to undisciplined militia. He had gathered no laurels by hard fighting against an equal force. His repulse on this occasion did more essential injury to the British interest than was compensated by all his victories.

TARLETON's defeat was the first link, in a grand chain of causes, which finally drew down ruin, both in North and South-Carolina, on the royal interest. The series of victories, which had followed the British arms in the first nine months of the year 1780, had been confidered by the fanguine royalists as decisive with respect to the most fouthern colonies, and had led to the formation of extensive plans for the year 1781. To favour their execution, major-general Leslie, with about three thousand men, was detached from New-York to the Chefapeak. It was expected that this force would not only create a diversion in Virginia, but also intercept any succours that might be fent from the American northern army to the fouthward. The distance between the royal armies in Virginia and South-Carolina was too great for an active co-operation.

Lord Cornwallis therefore ordered general Leslie to proceed without delay from the Chefapeak to Charleston, and to march directly from thence with fifteen hundred men to join the royal army under his own immediate command. To facilitate the intended operations against North-Carolina and Virginia, major Craig, with a detachment of about three hundred men from the garrifon of Charlefton, one frigate, and two floops of war, took possession of Wilmington, in the former state, early in the year 1781, and about the same time the latter was again invaded by a confiderable force from New-York, commanded by general Arnold. This is the fame Arnold who, after diftinguishing himself as an American officer for the first five years of the war, changed sides in the year 1780, and was immediately thereon promoted by the British to the rank of brigadiergeneral.

THE establishment of a British post on Cape Fear river, besides the diversion it afforded, was well calculated to surnish the royal army, while in North-Carolina, with supplies by the easiest and safest conveyance. It was presumed that the invasion of Virginia would confine the attention of its inhabitants to their own domestick defence; and that the two Carolinas, thus unsupported, would be discouraged from persevering in resistance.

LORD Cornwallis, though preparing to extend Vol. II. C c his his conquests northward, was not inattentive to the security of South-Carolina. Besides the force at Charleston, he left a considerable body of troops, under the command of lord Rawdon. These were principally stationed at Camden, from which central situation they might be easily drawn forth to defend the frontiers, or to suppress internal insurrections.

WHILE these arrangements were making, the year 1781 commenced, with the fairest prospects to the friends of British government. The admirers of lord Cornwallis flattered themselves that his victory at Camden was but the dawn of his glory—that his exertions in the approaching campaign would immortalize his name as the conqueror of America. The determined refistance of the inhabitants of North-Carolina, in front of the royal army, was as little thought of as the unconquerable difaffection of the citizens of South-Carolina in its rear. Great dependence was placed on the expected co-operation of the loyalists. Their numbers and zeal for royal government had been represented as so considerable, that North-Carolina was fearcely confidered in any other light than as the road to Virginia. A junction with the forces under general Arnold was expected at fo early a day as to give time for profecuting farther operations against Maryland and Pennfylvania. The fanguine expectations of fome went fo far, as to count upon a junction with the royal army in New-York, and the fubjugation jugation of every state to the fouthward of Hudfon's river, before the close of the campaign. Whilst lord Cornwallis was anticipating, in imagination, a rich harvest of glory, from a rapid fuccession of victories, he received the intelligence, no less unwelcome than unexpected, of the complete overthrow of the detachment led by lieutenant-colonel Tarleton. So contemptible, from their conduct at Camden, was his lordship's opinion of the American militia-so unlimited was his confidence in the courage and abilities of lieutenant-colonel Tarleton, that, of all improbable events, none feemed to him more improbable than that an inferior force, two thirds militia, should gain such a decisive advantage over his favourite hero. This unexpected event led to still more ferious consequences. The royal army was effentially injured in its future movements, for want of the light troops lost on that occasion. Besides, it precipitated the invasion of North-Carolina before the schemes subservient to that grand defign were fully completed. Lord Cornwallis, with the expectation of regaining the prisoners taken on the seventeenth of January at the battle of the Cowpens, and to obliterate the impression made by that engagement, instantly began those marches and countermarches, which, after various conflicts and innumerable hardships, ultimately terminated in the furrender of his whole army.

THE rapid movements of the British, under the

the expectation of retaking their captive fellowfoldiers, induced general Greene immediately to retreat from Hicks's creek, lest, by crossing the upper fources of the Peedee, they should get between him and general Morgan, or intercept his army before it could reach Virginia. Had lord Cornwallis fucceeded in this scheme, he could have interrupted reinforcements and fupplies coming from Virginia, and might have reduced general Greene to the necessity of fighting to a great disadvantage, and without any place of fafety for a retreat. In this critical fituation general Greene rode one hundred and fifty miles through the country to join general Morgan on the Catawba—that, by being in front of lord Cornwallis, he might best direct the motions of both divisions of his army. Major Hyrne had been previously detached to receive the British prisoners, with orders to conduct them to Virginia. Guilford courthouse was fixed upon as the place of rendezvous for the two divisions of the Americans; and general Huger, who commanded the main army, was ordered to retreat thither. To favour an expeditious march the heavy baggage was directed, after filing off from the route which general Huger was to purfue, to make all possible dispatch for Hillsborough, and to pass the Roanoke at Taylor's ferry. This circumstance enabled the army to move with rapidity, and to cross the Dan without the loss of baggage or stores.

THE retreat from the Peedee commenced on the twenty-eighth of January 1781, and was conducted under circumstances requiring the utmost exertions of patience. The Americans underwent hardships almost incredible. Many of them performed this march without shoes over frozen ground, and through flinty roads, which fo gashed their naked feet, that the spouting blood marked every step of their progress. They were some time without meat, often without flour, and always without spirituous liquors. In this extreme feafon alfo, with very little clothing, they were every day reduced to the necessity of fording deep creeks, and of remaining wet without any change of clothes, till the heat of their bodies, and occasional fires in the woods, dried their tattered rags. Their march led them through a barren country, which fearcely afforded necessaries for a few straggling inhabitants. They were also retarded with apparently unfurmountable difficulties from heavy rains, deep creeks, broken bridges, bad roads and poor horses. They submitted to all these difficulties without the lofs of a fingle fentinel by defertion. Lord Cornwallis destroyed his superfluous baggage, and every thing which was not necessary in action, or to the existence of the troops. No waggons were referved, excepting those loaded with hospital-stores, falt, and ammunition, and four empty ones for the use of the sick. The royal army fubmitted to unufual trials and hardships, with a most general and cheerful acquiefcence.

escence. They beheld, without murmuring, their most valuable baggage destroyed, their spirituous liquors staved, when they were entering on a service in which it would be much wanted, and under circumstances which precluded every prospect of suture supply.

THE British had urged the pursuit of general Morgan with fo much rapidity, that they came to the ford of the Catawba on the evening of the fame day that the Americans had croffed. Before the next morning a heavy fall of rain had made it impassable. The Americans, confiding in the protection of Heaven, confidered this event as a special interposition of Providence in favour of their righteous cause. It is certain that if the rifing of the river had taken place a few hours earlier, general Morgan, with his whole detachment, and five hundred prisoners, could have fearcely had any chance of escape. The Americans having effected their paffage before the rain, major Hyrne proceeded with the prisoners, and general Morgan continued on the north banks of the Catawba, to oppose the paffage of the British army. At this crisis general Greene joined general Morgan, and prevented his going over the mountains which was intended, and directed the movements of the detachment lately under his command, so as to favour the scheme of forming a junction at Guilford courthouse with the main army under general Huger.

As foon as the passage of the Catawba was practicable, lord Cornwallis made preparations for croffing. The more effectually to deceive the Americans he made a feint of passing at several different fords; but the real attempt was made very early in the morning of the first of February, at a ford near M'Cowan's, the north banks of which were defended by a guard of militia, under the command of general Davidson. The British marched through the river upwards of five hundred yards wide, and about three feet deep, fustaining the fire from the opposing militia, which they never returned till after landing, they formed on the shore. The early fall of the brave general Davidson dispirited his party, who, feeking fafety in a precipitate flight, left the British to effect their passage without the opposition which was at first expected. The militia; throughout the neighbouring fettlements, who had hitherto only heard of the dangers of war, were totally dispirited. Though general Greene risked himself at a distance from his troops to excite them to arms, yet very few of them could be perfuaded to take or keep the field. A finall party, collected at Torrans's house, about ten miles from the ford, was foon dispersed by lieutenant-colonel Tarleton. All the fords were abandoned, and the whole royal army, with their baggage and artillery, croffed over without any farther opposition.

the pursuing British and the fleeing Americans. The latter retreated as expeditiously as possible, and croffed the Yadkin partly in flats and partly by fording on the fecond and third days of February, and fecured the boats on the north fide. Though lord Cornwallis was close in the rear, yet the want of boats, and the rapid rifing of the river, from preceding rains, made his croffing impossible. This fecond hair-breadth escape was confidered by the Americans as a fresh evidence that their cause was favoured by Heaven. They viewed it in every point of light with pious gratitude, and frequently remarked, that if the rifing of the river had taken place a few hours earlier, it would have put general Morgan's whole detachment in the power of a greatly superior army; if a few hours later, that the passage of it would have been effected by lord Cornwallis, fo as to have enabled him to get between the two divisions of the American army, a circumstance which might have been of fatal consequence to both. That the Americans with their prisoners should, in two successive instances, effect their passage, while the British, whose advance was often in fight of the rear of their retreating enemy, feemed to be providentially restrained, affected the devout people of that fettlement with lively thankfulness to Heaven, which added fresh vigour to their exertions in behalf of their country.

THE British having failed in their scheme of crossing at the trading ford on the Yadkin, were obliged obliged to march to the upper fords which are generally passable. This gave time for the junction of the two divisions of the American army.

WHILE matters were in this fituation between the two main armies, general Marion, though furrounded with enemies, had defended himfelf with a few faithful militia in the fwamps and morasses of the settlements near Charleston, and was frequently fallying out from his hidingplaces, and enterprifing fomething in behalf of his country. Having mounted his followers. their motions were rapid, and their attacks unexpected. With these light troops he intercepted the British convoys of provisions, infested their out-posts, beat up their quarters, and harassed them with fuch frequent alarms, that they were obliged to be always on their guard. On the twenty-ninth of January 1781 he fent two small detachments of militia-dragoons, under the command of major Postell and captain Postell, to cross the Santee. The former destroyed a great quantity of valuable stores at Manigault's ferry; the latter did the fame at another place in the vicinity. Thence he marched to Reithfield near Monk's Corner, where he destroyed fourteen waggons loaded with foldiers' clothing and baggage, befides feveral other valuable stores, and took forty prisoners, chiefly British regulars, and effected the whole without any lofs.

a junction on the feventh of February 1781, near Guilford courthouse. Though this was effected, their whole number was fo much inferior to the British, that general Greene could not, with any propriety, risk an action. In this critical fituation he called a council of officers, who unanimously concurred in opinion, that he ought to retire over the Dan, and to avoid a general action till he was reinforced. Lord Cornwallis, well knowing the inferiority of the American army, conceived hopes, by getting between general Greene and Virginia, to cut off his retreat -intercept his supplies and reinforcements-and oblige him to fight while he was hemmed in by the great rivers in the west, the sea on the east, lord Rawdon in the fouth, and the main royal army in the north. To this end his lordship kept the upper country, where only the rivers are fordable, supposing, from information, that his adversaries, from the want of a sufficient number of flats, could not make good their paffage in the deep water; or, in case of that attempt, he prefumed he would overtake and force general Greene to an action before the American army could cross. In the prosecution of this plan, lord Cornwallis was completely baffled. The advantages refulting from the feafon of the year, and from the face of the country, interfected with rivers and creeks, were fo improved by general Greene as to elude his lordship. The fervices of the light army were never more effentially necessary or conspicuous than on this retreat. To increase its force, the legion, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Lee, was therefore incorporated with it, and the regular battalion of infantry, under the command of lieutenant-colonel Howard, was filled up-The whole, including those two corps, the cavalry commanded by lieutenant-colonel Washington, and a small corps of Virginia riflemen, under major Campbell, amounted to about feven hundred of the flower of the American army. The command of this light corps was given to colonel Williams, commandant of the Maryland line, and deputy adjutant-general of the American army. The manœuvres of this valuable detachment, in feconding the views of general Greene, reflected the greatest honour on its leader, and contributed much to frustrate the schemes of earl Cornwallis. The retreat commenced from Guilford courthouse the tenth of February. The better to avoid a rapid purfuit, the main and light army took different routes. The next day the latter had a rencounter with the van of the British army, in which an officer and fix or feven of lieutenantcolonel Tarleton's legion were made prisoners, and feveral were killed. Frequent skirmishes and the manœuvres which were practifed to miflead lord Cornwallis, with regard to the route that the main army was to purfue, had the defired effect, and gave general Greene time to fend forward his baggage. The defign of the American general, notwithstanding he assumed appearances of confidence, became every day more apparent. Lord Lord Cornwallis grew more ardent, and urged his purfuit with fo much rapidity, that the American light troops were, on the fourteenth, compelled to retire upwards of forty miles. By the most indefatigable exertions general Greene had that day, without any loss or interruption, transported his main army, artillery and baggage into Virginia, by croffing Boyd's and Irwin's ferries on the Dan, and personally waited the arrival of the light troops, all of which he faw fafe over the river that night-fo rapid was the pursuit, and fo narrow the escape, that the van of the British just arrived as the rear of the Americans had croffed. The hardships and difficulties which the royal army had undergone in this rapid march, were exceeded by the mortification that all their toils and exertions were in vain. They conceived it next to impossible that general Greene could escape without receiving a decisive blow; they therefore, with vigour and perseverance, encountered and furmounted distresses and difficulties of which they, who refide in cultivated countries, can form no adequate ideas. After these sufferings, when they fancied themselves within grasp of their object, they discovered that all their hopes were frustrated.

THOUGH lord Cornwallis failed in his main object, yet he confoled himself with the idea that he had driven the rebel army out of the province, and that there was now no force in North-Carolina to prevent the loyal inhabitants from making good their promife of a general rifing in favour of British government. His lordship being in no condition to invade so powerful a state as Virginia, desisted from any farther pursuit of the American army. And in order to encourage the loyalifts, he retired to Hillfborough, and there erected the royal standard, and to it invited, by proclamation, all his friends to repair. dd Some particular causes had operated in North-Carolina very favourably to his lordship's expectations. A few years before the commencement of the American war a large body of men, under the denomination of Regulators, oppressed with the mal-practices of some avaricious individuals, had forcibly opposed the administration of civil government under the officers of the crown. These insurgents, though numerous, being undisciplined, and for the most part without arms, were eafily difperfed by governor Tryon at the head of the incorporated militia of the country. Some of their leaders were killed in action, others were hanged, and all of them were involved in diffress. This large body, having fo recently experienced the power of royal government, never heartily acquiefced in the measures of Congress. They considered them as similar in their origin, and most likely to be so in their consequences, to their own unfortunate schemes of regulation. These dissentients, from the general voice of America, were artfully managed by the roval governors Tryon and

and Martin, and formed into a party for the fupport of British government. There was also a numerous fettlement of Scotch Highlanders in that state, particularly at Cross-Creek, who, in common with a majority of their countrymen elsewhere, were inimical to the cause of America. From these, and other causes which operated on the timid, the felfish and uninformed, the friends of royal government were, at this particular period, more numerous perhaps in North-Carolina than in any other of the states. A fair opportunity was now given for their manifesting to the world, whether they opposed American measures from ignorance, cowardice, interest, or from a virtuous love of the old constitution. To counteract his lordship's scheme of embodying the tories, the American army very fuddenly, on the twenty-third day of the same month, re-crossed the Dan, and immediately after fome light troops, commanded by general Pickens and lieutenantcolonel Lee, were detached in pursuit of lieutenant-colonel Tarleton. This officer, with a confiderable force of cavalry and infantry, had crossed over Haw river to countenance the royalists, and encourage them to an infurrection. lonel Pyles, at the head of three hundred and fifty tories, on their way to join the British, fell in with this light American party, and as he had no fuspicion of their having re-crossed the Dan, miltook them for the detachment commanded by lieutenant-colonel Tarleton. The Americans attacked them, labouring under this mistake, to great great advantage, and cut them down as they were making ardent protestations of loyalty, and afferting, 'that they were the very best friends of the King.' Men of this character much more rarely found mercy than the regular foldiers from Europe. They were confidered by the whig Americans as men, who not only wanted fpirit to defend their natural rights, but who co-operated with foreigners to fix the chains of flavery on themselves' and their countrymen. On this occasion they suffered the extremity of military vengeance. About the same time lieutenant-colonel Tarleton cut down feveral of them as they were coming to join the British army, mistaking them for rebel militia of the country. The recrossing of general Greene induced lord Cornwallis to decamp from Hillsborough, within fix days after the proclamation in which he had called on his friends to rendezvous at that place. His lordfhip continued for many days to manœuvre in that part of the country where colonel Pyles was defeated, that the royalists might have an opportunity to join him; but, to his great mortification, he found nothing, as he expressed it in his official despatches, but 'timid friends or invete-' rate enemies.' The advocates for royal government were fo discouraged by this series of adverse accidents, that they could not be induced to act with confidence. Their fituation over a large extent of country was fo dispersed, that it was not easy to bring them to unite in any common plan. They had not the advantage of a fuperintending fuperintending congress to give fystem, or concert to their schemes. While each party pursued separate measures, all were obliged to submit to the American governments. Considerable numbers of them were on their way to join lord Cornwallis, but being struck with terror at the unexpected return of the American army, and with the unhappy fate of their brethren, they returned home to wait events. Cornwallis found himself no less disappointed in his expectations of great aid from the loyalists in North-Carolina, than he had been in his former schemes of compelling general Greene to an engagement.

THE retreat of the Americans to Virginia at length roused the people of that state from their lethargy. During the three preceding years the Virginians had greatly fallen off from that military ardour and love of their country which distinguished them in the years 1776 and 1777. The first heat of passion being over, they were fond of recurring to their beloved ease, and of resuming their usual habits of life. Their exertions, as well against the invaders within their own limits, as in aid of the distressed southern states, were far below the martial character which they had established in the first years of the war, and still farther short of what the citizens of North and South-Carolina expected from the extensive, opulent and powerful dominion of Virginia. The gains of commerce, and the airy schemes suggested by speculations.

lations, and an unfettled value of money, cooperating with the temporary fecurity which a great part of the state enjoyed, had rendered many of them inattentive to the general cause of America. Danger, brought to their doors, awakened them to a fense of their duty-great numbers of militia turned out, but few of them were armed, and fewer still could be perfuaded to cross into North-Carolina. From the whole a small brigade, consisting of between four or five hundred men, commanded by general Stevens, was all of the reinforcement the American general received while in Virginia, that came with him over the Dan. It was risking much to turn about, and face the British army, with this trifling reinforcement; but fuch was the critical fituation of North-Carolina, that it would have been risking much more to have delayed. The decifive enterprifing general Greene formed the bold refolution of re-croffing, and of manœuvering in the face of a superior foe, till his expected reinforcements should come up. The two armies once more encamped in the vicinity of each other. The respective commanders almost daily changed their position, endeavouring to gain some advantage. During three weeks there was a complete trial of military skill. In the movements on this occasion, native-genius fairly carried the palm from the arts and discipline of regular military education. It was the interest of general Greene to avoid an action till he was reinforced, but at the fame time to keep Vol. II.

the field fo near his antagonist as would prevent his foraging to advantage—and his receiving reinforcements from the tories of North-Carolina. All this was done with an inferior army, till the Americans were reinforced with another brigade of militia from Virginia, commanded by general Lawson, and four hundred regulars raised for eighteen months, besides two brigades of militia from North-Carolina, one commanded by general Butler, the other by general Eaton. The whole of these reinforcements arrived about the eleventh of March. Soon after which the general dissolved the constitution of the light army, with expressions of great obligations to colonel Williams, and the officers and men of that corps, for their good conduct in the late dangerous crifis. Another arrangement then took place. The army marched to Guilford courthouse, and every preparation was made for an engagement. On this occasion general Greene issued the following order: 'The great probability of coming to a ' general action, in a short time, must be a con-6 fideration that will induce every good officer ' and foldier to do his duty; and, if order and ' discipline are maintained, so great confidence has the general in the bravery of his troops, that he flatters himfelf the efforts of his coun-' trymen will be favoured by Heaven, and crowned with fuccefs.' The American general having now a superiority of numbers, especially of cavalry, determined no longer to avoid an action. The fate of both Carolinas was in some degree fufpended pended on the issue of this important engagement. Had the American army been unfuccefsful, as in the preceding battle of Camden, Virginia would have become the fouthern frontier, and roval government would have instantly been re-established in North-Carolina, and greatly strengthened in South-Carolina. Had the British army been routed, the confequences to them would have been much more fatal. Far from their shipping, and destitute of supplies, they would have found it difficult, perhaps impossible, to have made good their retreat. To them a defeat must have been completely ruinous; but as general Greene had fuch a superiority of cavalry as fecured him from almost the possibility of an irretrievable misfortune, his being beaten could be no more than a partial evil. The greatest part of his army confisted of militia, who do all at a fingle effort-are foon difgusted-and find reason for desertion if kept long inactive. He had therefore much more to hope than to fear from a general action. This accordingly took place on the fifteenth of March 1781, near Guilford courthouse.

THE American army confifted of four thoufand four hundred and ninety-one men, of which two thousand seven hundred and sifty-three were militia of North-Carolina and Virginia, one thoufand and sixty from the sirst state, and sixteen hundred and ninety-three from the last—The British of about two thousand four hundred men, chiefly chiefly troops grown veteran in victories. The American army was drawn up in three lines; the front composed of North-Carolina militia, under the command of general Butler and general Eaton; the fecond of Virginia militia, commanded by general Stevens and general Lawson; the third and last of the Maryland and Virginia continentals, amounting to fourteen hundred and ninety rank and file, commanded by general Huger and colonel Williams. Lieutenant-colonel Washington, with his cavalry, and a corps of Delaware light-infantry, and fome riflemen under colonel Lynch, covered the right flank. Lieutenant-colonel Lee, with his legion, and fome riflemen under colonel Campbell, the left. After a brisk cannonade in front, the British advanced in three columns, the Hessians on the right, the guards in the centre, and lieutenant-colonel Webster's brigade on the left, and attacked the front line. This gave way when their adversaries were at the distance of one hundred and forty yards. Some of the North-Carolina militia, who composed this line, fired once, but a great number ran away without firing or being fired upon. All exertions of their officers to rally them were ineffectual. The Virginia militia behaved much better-kept up their fire till they were ordered to retreat, and did great execution. General Stevens had posted forty rislemen at equal distances, twenty paces in the rear of his brigade, with orders to shoot every man who should leave his post. This gallant officer, though he received a wound through the thigh, did not quit the field. He had the address to prevent his brigade from receiving any bad impressions from the retreating North-Carolinians, by giving out that they had orders to retire after discharging their pieces. To cherish this idea he ordered the militia, under his command, to open their files to favour their paffage. The continental troops were last engaged, and Huger fought with great spirit. Towards the close of the action, a charge was made on the British guards by the cavalry of lieutenant-colonel Washington and the Maryland troops, commanded by colonel Gunby and lieutenant-colonel Howard, with fuch execution that the whole corps was nearly annihilated. After a severe conflict of an hour and a half, the discipline of veteran troops carried the point against numbers. General Greene abandoned the field to his rival, still however shewing a good face; he retreated no farther than over the Reedy Fork, a distance of three miles. The Americans lost four fix-pounders which had been in the possession of both armies in different stages of the action. This victory cost the British dear. Their killed and wounded exceeded fix hundred men. The guards lost colonel Stuart, with the captains Schutz, Maynard and Goodriche, besides subalterns. Colonel Webster, an officer of distinguished reputation, died of his wounds, to the great injury of the service, and the universal regret of the royal army. Brigadier-generals O'Hara

O'Hara and Howard, and lieutenant-colonel Tarleton, with feveral other officers, were wounded.

ABOUT three hundred of the continentals and one hundred of the Virginia militia were killed and wounded, among the former was major Anderson, of the Maryland line, a valuable officer, and the fame who behaved fo well in general Gates's defeat. Among the latter were general Huger and general Stevens. The early retreat of the North-Carolinians faved them from much lofs. Though the Americans had fewer killed and wounded than the British, yet their army fustained a greater diminution by the numerous fugitives from the militia, who no more re-joined the camp. Lord Cornwallis fuffered fo feverely, that he was in no condition to improve the advantage he had gained. The British had only the name, the Americans all the good confequences of a victory. General Greene retreated, and lord Cornwallis kept the field; but, notwithstanding, the British interest, in North-Carolina, was ruined by this action. Three days after the battle lord Cornwallis issued a proclamation, fetting forth his complete victory, and calling on all loyal fubjects to stand forth, and take an active part in restoring good order and government; and offering a pardon and protection to all rebels, murderers excepted, who would furrender themfelves on or before the twentieth day of April. ff On the day on which this proclamation was issued, his his lordship left his hospital and seventy-five wounded men with the numerous loyalifts in the vicinity of Guilford, and began a march towards the fea-coast, which had the appearance of a retreat. Thirteen days before the expiration of this act of grace he had reached his shipping at Wilmington, all the upper country remaining in the power of general Greene's army. Amnesties in civil wars, not only shew the greatest generofity, but are productive of the best consequences when they follow great fuccesses, and are issued by the power that has gained a decided fuperiority. The prefent was introduced with a recital to this purpose; but the well-known fituation of the conquerors induced even their friends to believe, that their disposition to receive protection and affiftance from the royalifts of North-Carolina far exceeded their abilities to extend it to them. Much in particular was expected from the numerous Scotch Highlanders, fettled at Cross-Creek, who had uniformly opposed American measures. Lord Cornwallis, though he marched through their fettlements. found the inhabitants, to his great mortification, generally unwilling to give their personal services in the field, and their country poor and unable to afford supplies for his distressed army. General Greene no fooner received authentick information of the movement of lord Cornwallis, than he immediately put his army in motion to follow him. This pursuit was continued as far as Ramfay's mill, on Deep River, with fuch rapidity that the American army arrived foon after the departure of the British. In this march provisions were fo fcarce, that the American foldiers gleaned the flaughter-pens of their adversaries, and fed on the garbage which in common is the destined repast for turkey-buzzards, and other obscene birds. After a delay of near three weeks at Wilmington, the British army marched from that place by a route which left it doubtful, whether their intention was to return to South-Carolina or to proceed to Virginia. Had his lordship adopted the first plan, he might have prolonged the subjection of South-Carolina and Georgia, but his enterprifing spirit could not endure inaction, and he had too much pride to turn back. He was, befides, induced to proceed, from an opinion that folid operations in Virginia would be the most effectual plan for fecuring the royal conquests in South-Carolina, and effecting the submission of North-Carolina.

Lord Cornwallis met with no opposition of consequence in marching from Wilmington to Petersburg. On the twentieth of May he formed a junction with the British forces in Virginia, commanded by major-general Philips and brigadier-general Arnold. Before and after his lordship's arrival, the royal army traversed a great part of that state, plundering the inhabitants, and laying waste the country. 35 At length, in the close of the campaign, his lordship, with the force under his command, was furrounded and captured in York-Town; events which shall be more particularly related in the next chapter. I now follow the progress of the continental army.

BEFORE it was certainly known that lord Cornwallis had determined to proceed to Virginia, the bold resolution of re-commencing military operations in South-Carolina was formed by general Greene. This was one of the times in which more is to be done by a wife plan of operations than by numbers. Had the American army followed his lordship, the fouthern states would have conceived themselves conquered; for their hopes and fears prevailed just as the army marched north or fouth. Though lord Cornwallis marched through North-Carolina to Virginia, yet as the American army returned to South-Carolina the people confidered that movement of his lordship more in the light of a retreat than a conquest. Had general Greene retired before lord Cornwallis, the people would have been difpirited, and many would have joined the royal army. These, with the large reinforcements lord Cornwallis would have received, not only from South-Carolina, but from the Irish troops that arrived in Charleston in a few weeks after his departure from Wilmington, together with his having a fecure retreat into North-Carolina, might have faved his lordship from the catastrophe of York-Town.

IT was no fooner known in South-Carolina that lord Cornwallis had left the state in pursuit of the American army, than general Sumpter, who had just recovered from his wound, collected a force to penetrate into the heart of the country, as well with the defign of distracting the views of the British, as of encouraging the friends of independence. To this end, early in February 1781, he croffed the Congaree, and appeared in force before fort Granby, and destroyed its magazines. Lord Rawdon advanced from Camden for the relief of the post, on which general Sumpter retreated; but immediately appeared before another British post near colonel Thomson's. On the fecond day after this excursion, he attacked and defeated an efcort convoying fome waggons and stores from Charleston to Camden. Thirteen of the British detachment were killed, and fixty-fix were taken prifoners. The captured stores were fent in boats down the Congaree; but on their passage they were re-taken. General Sumpter, with three hundred and fifty horsemen, fwam across the Santee, and proceeded to fort Watfon at Wright's Bluff; but on lord Rawdon's marching from Camden for its relief, he retired to Black River. On his return he was attacked near Camden by major Frazer, at the head of a confiderable force of British regulars and militia. The major lost twenty of his men, and was obliged to retreat. General Sumpter, having by this excursion, satisfied the friends of independence in the centre of the state, that their cause cause was not desperate, retired in safety to the borders of North-Carolina. Hitherto all his enterprizes had been essected by volunteers from the militia; but the long continued services in the field which were required, pointed out the propriety of a more permanent corps. General Sumpter, therefore, in March 1781, with the approbation of general Greene, enlisted three small regiments of regular state-troops, to be employed in constant service for the space of ten months. With these, and the returning continental army, as shall shortly be related, the war re-commenced in South-Carolina with new vigour, and was carried on with more regularity.

GENERAL Greene having determined to return to South-Carolina, he fent orders to general Pickens to collect the militia of his brigade, and to prevent supplies from going to the British garrisons at Ninety-Six and Augusta. Lieutenant-colonel Lee, with his legion, and part of the fecond Maryland brigade, was ordered to advance before the continental troops, to co-operate with general Marion.

ABOUT the time that these preparations were making to renew the war in South-Carolina, seventy-six exiles, who had been compelled to seek refuge with general Marion, on the north side of Santee, re-crossed that river, with the bold design of re-visiting their own settlements. Some of them were from the militia on the sea-cost of Carolina

Carolina to the fouthward of Charleston, and others from Georgia. The first commanded by colonel Harden, the latter by colonel Baker. On their way they fell in with about twenty-five of the royal militia at Four Holes, and captured the whole of them. The privates were paroled, and their officers carried off. As they marched through the country, parties were fent to the houses of the officers of the royal militia, some of whom were taken, and others fled to Charlefton. Colonel Harden had two or three successful skirmishes with detachments of the British, but his capital manœuvre was the furprize of fort Balfour, at Pokataligo. By his address and good management in this enterprize three British colonels of militia, Fenwick, Lechmere, and Relfal, with thirty-two regular dragoons, and fifty-fix privates of the royal militia, furrendered on the twelfth of April 1781, to this handful of returning exiles, without any lofs on their part. Colonel Harden had his party confiderably increased by daily accessions of the people inhabiting the fouthern fea-coast of Carolina. With their aid he profecuted, in that part of the state, the same fuccessful plan of opposition to the British which was begun much earlier in the north-western and north-eastern extremities under the auspices of his gallant co-adjutors Sumpter and Marion.

On the feventh of April general Greene marched, with the main army, from Deep River, in North-Carolina, towards Camden. The British were no less alarmed than surprized when they heard that lieutenant-colonel Lee had penetrated through the country, and in eight days effected a junction with general Marion near the Santee, and that the main body of the Americans encamped on the nineteenth of April before Camden. To fecure the provisions that grow on the fertile banks of the Santee and Congaree rivers, the British had erected a chain of posts in their vicinity. One of the most important of these was on an eminence, known by the name of Wright's Bluff, and called fort Watson. This was closely invested on the fifteenth of April 1781 by about eighty militiamen under general Marion, and by the continentals commanded by lieutenant-colonel Lee. Neither party had any other means of annoyance or defence but mufketry. Though the ground on which the fort stood was an Indian mount, thirty or forty feet high, yet the besiegers, under the direction of colonel Maham, erected, in a few days on an unufual plan, a work much higher. From this eminence the American riflemen fired into the fort with fuch execution, that the besieged durst not shew themselves. On the twenty-third the garrison, confisting of one hundred and fourteen men, commanded by lieutenant M'Kay, furrendered by capitulation.

CAMDEN, before which the main army was encamped, is a village fituated on a plain covered on the fouth and east fides by the Wateree, and a creek which empties itself into that river. On the western and northern by fix strong redoubts. It was defended by lord Rawdon with about nine hundred men. The American army, confifting of about feven hundred continentals, was unequal to the task of carrying this post by storm, or of completely investing it. The general therefore took a good position at Hobkirk's hill, about a mile distant, in expectation of favourable events, and with a view of alluring the garrison out of their lines. Lord Rawdon armed his muficians, drummers, and every thing that could carry a firelock, and with great spirit fallied on the twenty-fifth. An engagement enfued. Victory for fome time very evidently inclined to the fide of the Americans; but, in the progress of the action, the fortune of the day was changed, and the British kept the field. Lieutenant-colonel Washington was ordered to turn the right flank of the British, and to charge in their rear. While he executed this order, he was fo confident of the fuccess of the main army, that he divided his men into finall parties, and made them take fuch positions as he thought most eligible for intercepting the fugitives on their retreat to Camden. At one time he had in his possession upwards of two hundred; but he relinquished the greatest part of them on feeing the American army retreat. On this unexpected reverse of fortune he paroled the officers on the field of battle-collected his men-wheeled round-and made his retreat good, with the loss of three men, and at the same time brought brought off near fifty prisoners. In this action the loss of the Americans in killed, wounded and missing, was about two hundred. Ih The British had one officer killed, and eleven taken prisoners. General Greene retreated, in good order, with his artillery and baggage, to Gun Swamp, about five miles from the place of action. In the evening after this action lieutenant-colonel Washington marched with fifty men of the cavalry within a mile of the British army, and after fending forward a finall party, concealed his principal force in the woods. As foon as the advanced small party was discovered, major Cossin, at the head of about forty of the Irish volunteers, pursued them a considerable distance. After the British party had passed the American cavalry which was concealed, the latter rushed from the woods, and charged them fo brifkly in the rear, that they loft upwards of twenty of their number.

VERY foon after the action on the twenty-fifth of April, general Greene, knowing that the British garrison could not subsist long in Camden without fresh supplies from Charleston or the country, detached a reinforcement to general Marion on the road to Nelson's ferry, and, on the third of May, crossed the Wateree, and took occasionally such positions as would most effectually prevent succours from going into the town from that quarter. On the seventh of May lord Rawdon received a considerable reinforcement by the arrival of the detachment under lieutenantcolonel Watfon. With this increase of force he attempted, on the day following, to compel general Greene to another action, but foon found that this was impracticable. Failing in his defign, he returned to Camden, and on the tenth burned the gaol, mills, many private houses, and a great deal of his own baggage-evacuated the postand retired with his whole army to the fouth of the Santee, leaving about thirty of his own fick and wounded, and as many of the Americans, who, on the twenty-fifth of April, had fallen into his hands. Lord Rawdon discovered as great prudence in this evacuation of Camden as he had shewn bravery in its defence. The fall of fort Watson broke the chain of communication with Charleston, and the positions of the American army intercepted all fupplies from the country. The return of general Greene to the fouthward being unexpected, the stores of the garrison were not provided for a fiege. Lord Rawdon had the honour of faving his men, though he lost the post, the country, and the considence of the tories. He offered every affistance in his power to the friends of British government who would accompany him; but it was a hard alternative to the new-made subjects, to be obliged to abandon their property, or to be left at the mercy of their exasperated countrymen. Several samilies nevertheless accompanied his lordship. These were cruelly neglected after their arrival in Charleston. They built themselves huts without the works. Their

Their fettlement was called Rawdon-Town, which, from its poverty and wretchedness, became a term of reproach. Many women and children, who lived comfortably on their farms near Camden, foon died of want in these their new habitations.

This evacuation animated the friends of Congress, and gave a very general alarm to the British. The former had been called upon for their personal services, to assist in regaining the country, but were disheartened by the repulse of general Greene from before Camden; but, from the moment that lord Rawdon evacuated this place, their numbers daily increased, and the British posts fell in quick fuccession. On the day after the evacuation of Camden, the garrison of Orangeburgh, confisting of seventy British militia, and twelve regulars, furrendered to general Sumpter. The next day fort Motte capitulated. After the furrender of fort Watson, general Marion and lieutenant-colonel Lee crossed the Santee, and moved up to this post, which lies above the Fork on the fouth fide of the Congaree, where they arrived on the eighth of May. The approaches were carried on fo rapidly that a house in the centre of the fort was fet on fire the fourth day after they began the entrenchments, and the garrison, which consisted of one hundred and fixty-five men, commanded by lieutenant M'Pherfon, was compelled, after a brave defence, to furrender at diferetion. On this occasion mrs. VOL. II. Gg

Motte

Motte displayed an eminent example of difinterested patriotism. The British had built their works round her dwellinghouse, on which she removed to a neighbouring hut. When she was informed that firing the house was the easiest mode of reducing the garrison, she presented the beliegers with a quiver of African arrows, to be employed for that purpose. Skewers armed with combustible materials were also used, and with more effect. Success foon crowned these experiments, and her joy was inexpressible that the reduction of the post was expedited, though at the expence of her property. Two days after this furrender, the British evacuated their post at Nelfon's ferry-blew up their fortifications-and destroyed a great part of their stores. The day following, fort Granby, near Friday's ferry, about thirty miles to the westward of fort Motte, furrendered by capitulation. Very advantageous terms were given by the affailants in confequence of information that lord Rawdon was marching to its relief. This was a post of more confequence than the others, and might have been better defended; but the offer of fecurity to the baggage of the garrifon, in which was included an immense quantity of plunder, hastened the furrender. For some time before it had been greatly harasted by colonel Taylor's regiment of militia, and had also been invested by general Sumpter. On the night of the fourteenth of May, lieutenant-colonel Lee erected a battery within fix hundred yards of its out-works, on which

which he mounted a fix-pounder. After the third discharge from this field-piece, major Maxwell capitulated. His force confifted of three hundred and fifty-two men, a great part of whom were royal militia. His works were a parapet round a house, defended by four bastions, a sosse and abbatis, with two pieces of artillery. In these several forts a considerable quantity of valuable stores fell into the possession of the Americans. Lord Rawdon, having retreated towards Charleston by the way of Nelfon's ferry, marched up the Santee to relieve major Maxwell; but, after he had advanced fourteen miles, he met the garrison in the character of prisoners, on which he immediately retired. General Marion, with his brigade of militia, marched to George-Town, and began regular approaches against the British post in that place. On the first night after the Americans had broken ground, their adverfaries evacuated their works, and retreated to Charleston. In a short time after this evacuation one Manson, an inhabitant of the country who had joined the British, appeared in an armed veffel before George-Town, and demanded permission for his men to land. This being refused by a small party of American militia, he fent a few of his men ashore, under cover of his guns, and fet fire to some of the houses next to the water. He then directed his crew to fire at the burning houses, in such a direction as prevented the inhabitants from either extinguishing the flames or removing their property. Forty-two houses, in this this flourishing town, were, on this occasion, reduced to ashes.

In the rapid manner just related the British lost fix posts, and abandoned all the north-eastern extremities of the state. They still retained postession of Ninety-Six in South-Carolina, and Augusta in Georgia; the reduction of these posts was the next object with the Americans.

As the affairs in the upper country, on the Georgia and Carolina fide of the river Savannah, were unconnected with the transactions of that part of the state which adjoins North-Carolina, they now require a particular detail.

AFTER the successes of the royal army, the determined friends of America, in the upper country of Georgia, fled over the mountains, or over the river Savannah, to the more northerly states. Great numbers, both there and on the Carolina fide, submitted to the conquerors. The inhabitants of the latter obtained very generous terms of capitulation, in consequence of which they thought themselves secured in their persons and property; but the rapine, and impolitick conduct of the British in compelling the inhabitants to take up arms against their countrymen, very foon produced a thorough disposition to revolt. As the British collected their force to pursue their intended northern conquests, they left this part of the country with a feeble garrison. Colonel Clark,

Clark, a refugee from Georgia, took advantage of these incidents, and, at the head of a party of exiles, returned to Georgia in September 1780, and laid fiege to Augusta. Lieutenantcolonel Cruger, with a detachment from the British garrison at Ninety-Six, marched to the relief of colonel Brown, commanding in Augusta. By their joint exertions this premature infurrection was foon quelled. Clark was obliged to flee, and those of his adherents, who fell into the hands of colonel Brown, experienced the feverest consequences of their ill-timed enterprize. Opposition, though checked by this want of fucces, was not extinguished. Parties, arming themselves against the British, daily increased in the extremities of the state. This was done in different places, without any concert between the people, and often without any knowledge of each other's motions or intentions. Captain M'Koy collected a few bold adventurers, and took feveral positions on the banks of the Savannah, from which he frequently fallied, and made prize of boats going up the river with supplies for the garrison at Augusta. After some captures of this kind, colonel Brown detached lieutenant Kemp, with twenty-five regulars, and twenty militiamen, to attack him. Captain M'Koy engaged them near Matthew's Bluff, killed the officer and fifteen privates, and dispersed the remainder. Soon after this colonel Brown marched with a hundred Indians and the greatest part of his whole force to drive him from his usual stations. Colonel Harden.

Harden, with some of the adjacent American militia, who had lately revolted from their conquerors, joined M'Koy in this hour of diffress; but their combined force was defeated, and, for a little time, their followers were dispersed. After these advantages the royal conquerors laid waste the settlements on the banks of Savannah river for forty miles up and down, and for feveral miles across the country. They stripped the inhabitants, both men and women, of their clothes-turned them out of doors in the midst of winter-and then fet fire to their houses. Notwithstanding all these severities, captain M'Koy foon returned to his old station, on the banks of the Savannah, and had the address to keep together a party fufficient to intercept fupplies going up the river to the British garrison at Augusta. I now return to trace the progress of the continental army.

AGREEABLY to a plan fettled at Deep River, when the resolution was formed of returning to South-Carolina, general Pickens and colonel Clark, with a body of militia, had for some time continued in the neighbourhood of Augusta. Lieutenant-colonel Lee, the day after the surrender of fort Granby, began his march for that place, and in sour days completed it. Fort Galphin, on the Carolina side of the Savannah river, with seventy men, a field-piece, and valuable stores, were surrendered to a detachment of lieutenant-colonel Lee's legion, under captain Rudolph.

dolph. Lieutenant-colonel Grierson, with some British militia, occupied a separate out-work, dependent on the main fort at Augusta. This post he relinquished, with the view of throwing his force into fort Cornwallis, where colonel Brown commanded. In attempting his retreat he had above thirty of his men killed and wounded, and a greater number taken prisoners; but the colonel, with a few of his followers, were fo fortunate as to escape. There was now but one object, against which the approaches were conducted with great judgment and rapidity, but no advantage could be gained over the vigilant and brave colonel Brown. In the course of the siege several batteries, two of which were within thirty yards of the parapet, were erected, which overlooked the fort. From these eminences the American riflemen shot into the inside of the works with fuccefs. The garrifon buried themselves in a great measure under ground, and obstinately refused to furrender till the necessity was so pressing, that every man, who attempted to fire upon the befiegers, was immediately shot down. On the fifth of June 1781 the fort, with about three hundred men, after a gallant defence, surrendered by capitulation. " The Americans, during the fiege, had about forty killed and wounded; among the former was the brave major Eaton. Lieutenant-colonel Grierfon, who was greatly obnoxious to the Americans, was, after his furrender, by fome unseen marksman, put to death.

A reward of a hundred guineas was offered, but in vain, for the perpetrator of this perfidious deed. Lieutenant-colonel Brown would probably have shared the same sate, had it not been for the generofity of his conquerors, who furnished him with an efcort to the royal garrison in Savannah. Though he had lately hanged thirteen American prisoners, and delivered to the Indians fome of the citizens of the country, who fuffered from their hands all the tortures which favage barbarity has contrived to add poignancy to the pains of death, yet his conquerors, no less generous than brave, faved him from the fate he had fo much reason to expect. On his way to Savannah he had to pass through the inhabitants whose houses he had lately burned, and whose relations he had recently hanged. At Silver-Bluff mrs. M'Koy, having obtained leave of the American officer who commanded his fafe-guard to fpeak with him, addressed him in words to the following effect:

'Colonel Brown, in the late day of your prosperity, I visited your camp, and on my knees implicated for the life of my son, but you were deaf to my entreaties. You hanged him, though a beardless youth, before my face. These eyes have seen him scalped by the savages under your immediate command, and for no better reason than that his name was, M'Koy. As you are now prisoner to the leaders of my country, for the present I lay aside all thoughts of revenge;

revenge; but when you refume your fword, is will go five hundred miles, to demand fatisfaction, at the point of it, for the murder of my fon.

WHILE these operations were carrying on against the small posts, general Greene proceeded with the main army to Ninety-Six. This place, being of much more consequence than the others; was defended by a considerable force. Lieutenant-colonel Cruger commanded in the garrison. He, with the officers and men under his orders, conducted their desence with great bravery and judgment. Major Green, in particular, acquired distinguished reputation by his spirited and judicious conduct in desending the redoubt against which the Americans made their principal efforts.

On the left of the befiegers was a work crected in the form of a star; on the right was a strong flockade-fort, with two block-houses in it. The town, flanked by these two works, was also picquetted in with ftrong picquets, and furrounded with a ditch, and a bank near the height of a common parapet. There were also several slushes in different parts of the town, and all the works communicated with each other by covered ways. On the twenty-third of May 1781, the main body of the American army encamped in a wood within half a mile of Ninety-Six, and, on that night, threw up two flushes within one hundred and fifty yards of the star fort. The next morning the enemy made a fally, and being supported Vot. II. Hh pa

by the artillery and musketry from the parapet of the star redoubt, drove the besiegers from them. The next night two strong block batteries were erected at the distance of three hundred and fifty yards, which were opened in the morning. Another battery twenty feet high, erected within two hundred and twenty yards, was finished in a few days, and foon afterwards another of the fame height was erected within one hundred yards of the main fort. Approaches were gradually carried on at the same time against the redoubt on their left. Colonel Kozinsco, a young gentleman of distinction from Poland, superintended the operations of the besiegers, and, by his affiduity and firmuefs, promoted the bufinefs with fuch expedition, that, though the ground was excessively hard, and the situation extremely unfavourable, on the fourteenth of May a third parallel, within thirty yards of the ditch, was completed, and a rifle-battery, upwards of thirty feet high, erected at the fame distance. On the feventeenth the abbatis was turned, and two trenches and a mine were extended, fo as to be within fix feet of the ditch. Few fieges afford greater instances of perseverance and intrepidity than were exhibited on this occasion by the befiegers and befieged. Riflemen were employed on both fides, who immediately levelled at every person who appeared in fight, and very seldom missed their object. Various success attended the conflicts between the feveral covering parties of the workmen, and those who repeatedly fallied from the garrison. ON

On the third of June, twelve days after the commencement of this fiege, a fleet arrived at Charleston from Ireland, having on board the third, nineteenth and thirtieth regiments of his Britannick majesty, a detachment from the guards, and a confiderable body of recruits, the whole commanded by lieutenant-colonel Gould. Earl Cornwallis had given permission to the commanders of the British forces in South-Carolina, to detain these reinforcements if they conceived that the fervice of his Britannick majesty required it; otherwise they were to be sent forward to join his lordship. On the seventh of June 1781, lord Rawdon marched from Charleston, with these newly arrived troops, for the relief of the garrison at Ninety-Six. Great were the difficulties they had to encounter, in rapidly marching under the rage of a burning fun through the whole extent of South-Carolina; but much greater was their aftonishment at being informed, that their fervices in the field were necessary to oppose the yet unsubdued rebels in the province. They had been amused with hopes, that nothing remained for them to do, but to fit down as fettlers on the forfeited lands of a conquered country.

THE American army had advanced their approaches very near that critical point, after which farther refistance on the part of the garrison would have been temerity. At this interesting moment intelligence was received, that lord Raw-don was near at hand, with a reinforcement of about two thousand men. An American lady, who had lately married an officer then in the British garrison of Ninety-Six, had been bribed by a large fum of money to convey a letter to lieutenant-colonel Cruger with the welcome news of their approach. Attempts had been made to retard their march, but without the defired effect. Their vicinity made it necessary, either to raise the fiege, or attempt the reduction of the place by a coup-de-main. The last was agreed upon, and the necessary dispositions made on the eighteenth of June. Lieutenant-colonel Lee, with his legion infantry, and captain Kirkwood's lightinfantry, made the attack on the right. Lieutenant-colonel Campbell, with the first Maryland and first Virginia regiments, were to have stormed the star redoubt, the ditch of which was eight or nine feet deep, the parapet eleven or twelve feet high, and raifed with fand-bags near three feet more. The forlorn hopes were led on by lieutenants Duval and Sheldon, and were followed by a party with hooks and entrenching-tools to pull down the fand-bags, and reduce the parapet, Had this been effected, the befieged could not have annoyed the affailants without exposing themselves to the American marksmen. The artillery foon made fufficient breaches on the fortified redoubt on the right for the infantry, under the command of lieutenant-colonel Lee, to affault the garrifon. It was therefore abandoned, and they took possession without loss. On the left the utmost utmost exertions of resolution and sortitude were displayed, but failed of success. The parties led on by Duval and Sheldon entered the ditch, and, though galled by an incessant sire, made every effort to get down the sand-bags. Both these gallant officers were wounded, and not more than one in six of their party escaped. The near approach of lord Rawdon, and the uncertainty of sinal success, induced general Greene to raise the siege and to retreat over the Saluda, after having lost about one hundred and sifty men. kk

TRULY distressing was the situation of the American army. When in the grasp of victory, to be obliged to expose themselves to the dangers of an hazardous affault, and afterwards to abandon the fiege. When they were nearly masters of the whole country, to be compelled to retreat to its extremity. After fubduing the greatest part of the force lately opposed to them, to be under the necessity of encountering still greater reinforcements, when their remote fituation precluded them from the hope of receiving a fingle recruit. In this gloomy fituation there were not wanting persons who advised general Greene to leave the state, and retire with his remaining force to Virginia. To arguments and fuggestions of this kind he nobly replied, 'I will recover the coun-' try, or die in the attempt.' This distinguished officer, whose genius was most vigorous in those perilous extremities, when feeble minds abandon themselves themselves to despair, adopted the only resource now left him, of avoiding an engagement till the British force should be divided.

LORD Rawdon, who by rapid marches was very near Ninety-Six at the time of the affault, pursued general Greene as far as the Enoree; but finding it impossible to overtake the light retreating American army, and supposing that they had gone to North-Carolina or Virginia, his lordship consoled himself with the imaginary advantage of having driven the rebels out of the country. On this occasion general Pickens exhibited an illustrious instance of republican virtue. When the retreat was ordered, the general's family and private property was fent off with the baggage of the army. This precaution, though wished for by all, and justified on every principle of prudence, gave an alarm to many who either had not the fame means of transportation, or who could not have attended to it without deferting the American army. To encourage the men to stay in camp, and their families to remain on their plantations, general Pickens ordered his family and property back again to his house within twenty miles of the British garrison. His example faved the country in the vicinity from depopulation, and the army under general Greene from fustaining a great diminution of their numbers, by the defertion of the militia to take care of their families.

THE arrival of the British reinforcement, and the fublequent retreat from Ninety-Six, induced a general apprehension, that the British would foon re-establish the posts they had lost to the fouthward of Santee. The destination of the main army under lord Cornwallis, having been for some time known, the British commanders in South-Carolina had contracted their boundaries to that extent of country which is in a great measure enclosed by the Santee, the Congarec and the Edifto. Within these rivers lord Rawdon intended to confine his future operations, and to canton his forces in the most eligible positions. His lordship, taking it for granted that the Americans had abandoned South-Carolina, refolved, upon his return from pursuing general Greene, to divide his army, with the intention of fixing a detachment at the Congaree; but he foon found that his adverfaries were not disposed to give up the prize for which they had fo long contended. General Greene, on hearing that lord Rawdon had marched with a part of his force to Congaree, faced about to give him battle. Lord Rawdon, no less surprized than alarmed at this unexpected movement of his lately retreating foe, abandoned the Congaree in two days after hisarrival there, and retreated expeditiously to Orangeburgh. In this position he was secured on one fide with a river, and on the other with strong buildings little inferior to redoubts. General Greene pursued-encamped within five miles of this post—and offered him battle. lordship.

lordship, secure in his strong hold, would not venture out, and general Greene was too weak to attack him in his works with any prospect of fuccess. In the course of these movements, on the fecond of July, captain Eggleston, of lieutenant-colonel Lee's legion, fell in with forty-nine British horse, near the Saluda, and took fortyeight of them prisoners. Whilst the American army lay near Orangeburgh, advice was received that lieutenant-colonel Cruger had evacuated Ninety-Six, and was marching, with the troops of that garrison, through the forks of Edisto to join lord Rawdon at Orangeburgh. As the north fork of Edisto is not passable by an army without boats, for thirty miles above or below the British encampments, general Greene could not throw himself between with any prospect of preventing the junction; he therefore retired to the high hills of Santee, and lord Rawdon and lieutenantcolonel Cruger the day after made a junction. The evacuation of Camden having been effected by striking at the posts below it, the same manœuvre was now attempted to induce the British to leave Orangeburgh. With this view, on the day that the main American army retired from before that post, generals Sumpter and Marion, with their brigades, and the legion cavalry, were detached to Monk's Corner and Dorchester. They moved down by different roads, and in three days commenced their operations. Lieutenant-colonel Lee took all the waggons and waggon-horfes belonging to a convoy of provisions. Colonel

Colonel Wade Hampton charged a party of British dragoons within five miles of Charleston. He also took fifty prisoners at Strawberry ferry, and burned four veffels loaded with valuable stores for the British army. General Sumpter appeared before the garrifon at Biggin's church, which confifted of five hundred infantry and upwards of one hundred cavalry. Lieutenant-colonel Coates, who commanded there, after having repulfed the advanced party of general Sumpter, on the next evening, destroyed his stores and retreated towards Charleston. He was closely purfued by lieutenant-colonel Lee with the legion, and lieutenant-colonel Hampton with the state cavalry. The legion came up with them near Shubrick's plantation, took their rear guard, and all their baggage. Captain Armstrong, of Lee's legion, at the head only of five men, charged through a confiderable part of their lines, and escaped with the loss of two men. General Sumpter and general Marion, after some hours, came up with the main body; but by this time the British had secured themselves by taking an advantageous post in a range of houses. An attack was however made, and continued with spirit till upwards of forty were killed or wounded by the fire from the houses. The British lost in these different engagements one hundred and forty prisoners, besides several killed and wounded, all the baggage of the nineteenth regiment, and above one hundred horses and several waggons.

Vol. II. I i Thus

Thus was the war carried on. While the British kept their forces compact, they could not cover the country, and the American general had the precaution to avoid fighting. When they divided their army, their detachments were feparately and successfully attacked. While they were in force in the upper country, light parties of Americans were annoying their small posts in the low country near Charleston. The people soon found that the late conquerors were not able to afford them their promised protection. The spirit of revolt became general, and the British interest daily declined.

Soon after these events lord Rawdon, driven from almost the whole of his posts—bassled in all his schemes—and overwhelmed with vexation, in a fit of revenge, as shall hereafter be more fully related, made an oblation to his waning military same, by executing the brave, the amiable and the worthy colonel Hayne. His lordship, immediately after this execution, sailed for Europe, leaving his brother officers, in South-Carolina, objects of retaliation. In the course of his command, he aggravated the unavoidable calamities of war by many acts of severity, which admit of no other apology than that they were supposed to be useful to the interest of his royal master.

ABOUT the same time that generals Sumpter and Marion were detached to the lower parts of the

the state, the main American army retired to the high hills of Santee, and the British returned to their former station near the junction of the Wateree and the Congaree. General Greene, in a little time, began to concert measures to force them a fecond time from these posts. Though the two armies were within fifteen miles of each other on a right line, yet, as two rivers intervened, and boats could not be procured, the American army was obliged to take a circuit of feventy miles with the view of more conveniently croffing the Wateree and the Congaree. Soon after their croffing these rivers, the continental army was joined by general Pickens, with a party of the Ninety-Six militia, and by the state troops, under the command of lieutenant-colonel Henderfon. General Marion, with his brigade of militia, had been on an expedition towards Ponpon, to co-operate with colonel Harden, in opposing fome detachments of the British who had taken post near Combahee ferry. From this position they had iffued orders to the inhabitants to bring their rice to the neighbouring landings, in order that it might be carried to Charleston. Colonel Harden exerted himself to frustrate their designs; but he foon found it necessary to call to his aid the militia of the other extremity of the state. As the British dispersed themselves over the country on this business, a variety of skirmishes took place, in which they loft upwards of a hundred of their number. On the termination of the expedition, general Marion, with his brigade, joined joined general Greene. The whole American force, thus collected, proceeded the next morning to attack the British army commanded by lieutenant-colonel Stewart. On the approach of the Americans the British had retired from the Congarees about forty miles nearer Charleston, and taken post at the Eutaw Springs. General Greene drew up his little force, confisting of about two thousand men, in two lines. The front consisted of the militia from North and South-Carolina, and was commanded by generals Marion and Pickens, and by colonel De Malmedy. The fecond confifted of the continental troops from North-Carolina, Virginia and Maryland, and was led on by general Sumner, lieutenant-colonel Campbell, and colonel Williams. Lieutenantcolonel Lee, with his legion, covered the right flank; lieutenant-colonel Henderson, with the state-troops, covered the left. Lieutenant-colonel Washington, with his cavalry, and captain Kirkwood, with the Delaware troops, formed a corps of referve. As the Americans advanced to the attack, they fell in with two advanced parties of the British three or four miles ahead of their main army. These, being briskly charged by the legion and state-troops, foon retired. The front line continued to fire and advance on the British till the action became general, and till they, in their turn, were obliged to give way. They were well supported by general Sumner's North-Carolina brigade of continentals, though they had been under discipline only for a few weeks, weeks, and were chiefly composed of militiamen who had been transferred to the continental fervice, to make reparation for their precipitate flight in former actions. In the hottest of the engagement, when great execution was doing on both sides, colonel Williams, and lieutenant-colonel Campbell, with the Maryland and Virginia continentals, were ordered by general Greene to charge with trailed arms. Nothing could furpass the intrepidity of both officers and men on this occasion-They rushed on, in good order, through a heavy cannonade, and a shower of musketry, with fuch unshaken resolution, that they bore down all before them. The state-troops of South-Carolina were deprived of their gallant leader, lieutenant-colonel Henderson, who was wounded very early in the action; but they were nevertheless boldly led on by the second in command, lieutenant-colonel Hampton, to a very spirited and fuccessful charge, in which they took upwards of a hundred prisoners. Lieutenant-colonel Washington brought up the corps-de-reserve on the left, and charged fo briskly with his cavalry, and captain Kirkwood's light-infantry, as gave them no time to rally or form. The British were closely pursued, and upwards of five hundred prisoners were taken. On their retreat they took their posts in a strong brick-house and in impenetrable shrubs and a picquetted garden. From these advantageous positions they renewed the action-Lieutenant-colonel Washington made every possible exertion to dislodge them from the thickets.

thickets, but failed in the attempt-had his horse fhot under him-was wounded and taken prisoner. Four fix-pounders were ordered up before the house from which the British were firing under cover. These pieces finally fell into their hands, and the Americans retired out of the reach of their fire-They left a strong picquet on the field of battle, and retreated to the nearest water in their rear-In the evening of the next day, lieutenant-colonel Stewart destroyed a great quantity of his stores, abandoned the Eutaw, and moved towards Charleston, leaving upwards of seventy of his wounded, and a thousand stand of arms. He was purfued for feveral miles but without effect. Though major M'Arthur, with a large reinforcement, formed a junction with lieutenantcolonel Stewart fourteen miles below the Eutaw, yet the action was not renewed. The fuccess of the American army in the first part of this engagement spread such an alarm, that the British burned their stores at Dorchester, and evacuated their posts near Monk's Corner. The gates of the town were shut, and a number of negroes employed in felling trees across the road on Charleston Neck. The loss of the British amounted to upwards of eleven hundred men. That of the Americans was about five hundred, in which number were fixty officers. " Among the killed of general Greene's army, the brave lieutenantcolonel Campbell, of the Virginia line, was the theme of universal lamentation. While with great firmness he was leading on his brigade to that charge which determined the fate of the day, he received a mortal wound. After his fall he enquired who gave way, and being informed the British were sleeing in all quarters, he added, I die contented,' and immediately expired.

Congress honoured general Greene, for his decifive conduct in this action, with a British standard, and a golden medal; and they also voted their thanks to the different corps and their commanders. mm

AFTER the action at the Eutaws, the Americans retired to their former position on the high hills of Santee, and the British took post in the vicinity of Monk's Corner. While they lay there, a small party of American cavalry, commanded by colonel Maham, took upwards of eighty prisoners within sight of their main army. The British no more acted with their usual vigour. On the slightest appearance of danger, they discovered a disposition to slee scarcely inferior to what was exhibited the year before by the American militia.

Though the army under general Greene was too weak to risk another general action, yet it became necessary, in the close of the year 1781, to move into the lower country, to cover the collection of provisions for subsistence through the winter.

winter. In about two months after the action at Eutaw, the main body of the American army was put in motion under colonel Williams. General Greene, with two hundred horse, and two hundred infantry, advanced by private roads, and appeared near Dorchester so unexpectedly, and with such considence, as induced the British to believe that the whole army was close in his rear. This manœuvre had the intended effect. They abandoned their out-posts, and retired with their whole force to the Quarterhouse on Charleston Neck. By this means all the rice between Edisto and Ashley rivers was saved to the Americans.

THE defence of the country was given up, and the conquerors, who had lately carried their arms to the extremities of the state, seldom aimed at any thing more than to secure themselves in Charleston Neck, and to keep a communication with the sea islands on which they had collected great numbers of cattle.

THOUGH the British made no attempts to preferve permanent posts at a distance from Charleston, after the close of the year 1781, yet they made some excursions with cavalry. These were of too little consequence to merit particular mention, being chiefly directed against some uncovered part of the state, or some detached corps of militia. One of the most important was made in February 1782. While general Marion was attending attending his duty as a member of the legislature at Jacksonborough, his brigade was surprized near the Santee, by a party of British horse, commanded by that spirited and judicious officer lieutenant-colonel Thomson. Major Benson, an American officer highly esteemed by his country, mr. Thomas Broughton, a young gentleman of a respectable family in South-Carolina, with some others, were killed. The remainder of the brigade, then in camp, was for some time dispersed. In a few days the British retired within their lines, and the militia re-assembled.

Though the battle of Eutaw may be confidered as closing the national war in South-Carolina, yet after that period feveral small enterprizes, greatly to the credit of individuals, were fuccessfully executed. The American army felt the elevation of conquerors, while the British, from the recollection of their former prowefs, and the exactness of their discipline, though reduced in their limits, could not bear to be insulted. From among a variety of projects which were undertaken by detached parties of Americans, in the year 1782, the following is selected as meriting particular notice. On the nineteenth of March captain Rudolph, of Lee's legion, and lieutenant Smith, of the Virginia line, with twelve men, captured and burned the British galley Alligator, lying in Ashley river, which mounted twelve guns, befides a variety of fwivels, and was manned with forty-three seamen. The Americans had the address to pass themselves for negroes who were coming to market with poultry. They were therefore permitted to come so near the galley that they boarded her with ease, while their adversaries suspected no danger. Three or four of the British were killed, and twenty-eight were brought off prisoners.

AFTER general Greene moved from the high hills of Santee into the low country near Charlefton, a scene of inactivity succeeded different from the busy operations of the late campaign. He was unable to attempt any thing against the British within their lines; and they declined risking any general action without them.

WHILE the American foldiers lay encamped in this inactive fituation, their tattered rags were fo completely worn out, that feven hundred of them were as naked as they were born, excepting a fmall flip of cloth about their waists; and they were nearly as destitute of meat as of clothing. In this condition they lay for three months within four hours march of the British garrison in Charleston, which contained in it more regular troops than there were continentals in the American army. Though they had abundant reason to complain, yet, while they were every day marching, and almost every week fighting, they were in good health, good spirits, and good humour; but when their enemy was confined within their fortifications, and they were inactive, they became fickly and discontented, and a few began to be mutinous. Their long arrears of pay, the deficiency of their clothing, and their want of many comforts, were forgotten whilst constant action employed their minds and bodies; but when an interruption of hostilities gave them leifure to brood over their calamities, these evils were presented to their imaginations in the most aggravated colours. A plan was ferioufly laid to deliver their gallant and victorious leader into the hands of the British; but the whole design was happily discovered and prevented from being carried into execution. To the honour of the continental army, it may with justice be added, that, notwithstanding the pressure of their many fufferings, the whole number concerned in this plot did not exceed twelve.

In the course of the year 1782, John Mathews, esquire, governor of South-Carolina, concerted measures with some of the citizens in Charleston, who wished to make their peace with their countrymen, for fending out of the British lines necessary clothing for the almost naked continentals. When their diffresses had nearly arrived to that point beyond which human nature can bear no more, mr. Joshua Lockwood, under the direction of governor Mathews, brought out of Charleston a large quantity of the articles which were most needed in the American camp. This feafonable fupply, though much fhort of their due, quieted the minds of the fuffering foldiers.

foldiers. Tranquillity and good order were reflored in the camp, and duty was cheerfully performed. It is impossible to do justice to that invincible fortitude which was displayed by both officers and men in the campaigns of 1780 and 1781. They encountered fatigues which, if particularly related, would appear almost incredible. They had scenes of suffering to bear up under, of which citizens, in the peaceable walks of private life, can form no adequate idea. Without pay, almost without clothing, and often with but a scanty portion of the plainest provisions, they were exposed to the fcorching heat of the day, and the baleful vapours of the night. When finking under the fatigues of repeated fuccessions of forced marches, they were destitute of every comfort suitable to their situation. But to all these accumulated hardships the greatest part of them fubmitted with patience and magnanimity, which reflected honour on human nature, and which was never exceeded by any army in the world.

CHAPTER THIRTEENTH.

Of the board of police, and other British establishments. The animosities between whigs and tories, and the distresses of the inhabitants. The execution of colonel Hayne. The treatment of prisoners. The violation of publick faith with the royalists. Of the assistance given to the Americans by the French army and navy. Of the operations in Virginia in 1781, and the reduction of lord Cornwallis. The re-establishment of civil government. The Jacksonborough assembly. Confiscation of estates. The operations in Georgia, and the evacuation of Savannah. Compacts with the British for security of property. Fall of lieutenant-colonel Laurens. The evacuation of Charleston. Peace.

FTER the reduction of Charleston, on the twelfth of May 1780, followed the establishment of a military government. A commandant was appointed to superintend the affairs of the province. His powers were as undefined as those of the American committees which took place in the early stages of the dispute between Great-Britain and America, while the royal governments were suspended, and before the popular establishments were reduced to system. To soften the rigid and forbidding aspect of this new mode of administration, and as far as possible to temper it with the resemblance of civil authority, a board of police, for the fummary determination of disputes, was instituted. Under the direction of the honourable James Simpson, intendant of the board, a table was drawn up, ascertaining the depreciation of the paper currency at different periods, from which the friends of royal government, who had fustained losses by paper payments, were induced to hope for reimbursement. This measure, though just in itself, was productive of unexpected and ferious confequences, fatal to the reviving fondness for the royal interest. Among the new-made British fubjects, many were found who had been great gainers by the depreciation of the American bills of credit. These, by the proposition of a second payment of their old debts, were filled with aftonishment. From the circumstances of the country, a compliance with it was, to the most opulent, extremely inconvenient, and to multitudes absolutely impracticable. The paper currency, before the reduction of Charleston, had supplanted the use of gold and filver, and banished them from circulation. The ravages of war had defo-lated the country, and deprived the inhabitants of the means of payment. Creditors became clamorous for their long arrears of interest, and debtors had either lost their property or could not exchange it for one half of its value. Many fuits were commenced, and great numbers ruined. The distresses of the reclaimed subjects, within the British lines, were in many instances greater than those of their unsubdued countrymen who had forfaken all in the cause of liberty. After the Americans had recovered possession of a confiderable part of the state, it was presumed that the proceedings of the board of police would be reversed. This redoubled their difficulties. Creditors became more preffing, and at the fame time the doubtfulness of British titles induced a depreciation of real property not far behind that of the American paper currency. Fear and interest had brought many of their new subjects to the British standard; but, in consequence of the plans they adopted, in a little time both these powerful motives of human actions drew in an opposite direction. The Americans pursued a different line of conduct. In every period of the contest they sacrificed the few creditors to the many debtors. The true whigs, who fuffered on this fcore, confoled themselves with the idea that their country's good required it, and that this was the price of their independence. A disposition to fuffer in behalf of the royal interest was not so visible among the professed adherents to British government. That immediate justice might be done to a few, great distress was brought on many, and the cause of his Britannick majesty injured beyond reparation.

SEVERAL commandants were fuccessively appointed to superintend the affairs of the town. Among these lieutenant-colonel Nisbet Balsour had the greatest share of administration. This gentleman, having raised himself in the army by his obsequious devotedness to the humours and pleasures of fir William Howe, displayed, in the exercise of this new office, all the frivolous selfimportance, and all the difgusting infolence, which are natural to little minds when puffed up by fudden elevation, and employed in functions to which their abilities are not equal. By the subversion of every trace of the popular government, without any proper civil establishment in its place, he, with a few coadjutors, assumed and exercifed legislative, judicial and executive powers over citizens in the fame manner as over the common foldiery under their command. A feries of proclamations was issued by his authority, which militated as well against the principles of the British constitution, as those of justice, equity and humanity. For flight offences, and on partial and infufficient information, citizens were confined by his orders, and that often without any trial.

The place allotted for fecuring them, being the middle part of the cellar under the Exchange, was called the Provost. The dampness of this unwholesome spot, together with the want of a fire-place, caused, among the unhappy sufferers, some deaths, and much sickness. Colonel Stark, colonel Beard, captain Moore, and mr. Pritchard, after being put in irons, were brought on soot to Charleston by rapid marches from distant parts of the country. These gentlemen, in conjunction with messirs. Peter Bocquet, Samuel Legaré, Legaré, Jonathan Larrazin, Henry Peronneau' and Daniel Stevens, were shut up in this place of confinement. Two young ladies, of most amiable characters and respectable connexions, on a groundless suspicion of giving intelligence to the Americans, were, for a short time, subjected to the fame indignity. These were crowded together with the fick, labouring under contagious diseases, with negroes, deserters, and women of infamous characters, to the number of fifty-fix, within narrow limits. So little regard was paid to decency, that the calls of nature could not be fatisfied but in the open view of both fexes promiscuously collected in one apartment. The American state-prisoner, and the British felon, shared the same fate. The former, though for the most part charged with nothing more than an active execution of the laws of the state, or having spoken words disrespectful or injurious to the British officers or government, or of corresponding with the Americans, suffered indignities and diffresses in common with those who were accused of crimes tending to subvert the peace and existence of society.

Such was the administration of police by lieutenant-colonel Balfour. His conduct, on the whole, tended greatly to strengthen the whig interest, and to diminish the number of royalists.

It has already been observed, that on the arrival of the British in South-Carolina, the inhabi-Vol. II. L l tants tants were encouraged to stay on their plantations, with the prospect of neutrality, and that, in a little time, these delusive hopes vanished, they being called upon to arm and embody in support of royal government. Instead of drawing off the people gradually from an attachment to their late constitution, which had acquired stability by a duration of four years, the conquerors were fo far mistaken as to suppose that men could instantly be transformed from obstinate revolters to zealous royalists. In a very short time after their fubmission, they were called upon to promise that, by force of arms, they would oppose men who were their friends and neighbours, and by whose fides they had lately fought. In effecting a revolution from the regal to the republican government, a very different policy was purfued. The popular leaders proceeded gradually. The common people were not shocked by any propositions too repugnant to their antient prejudices, or too remote from established opinions. Though the leading-men in the counsels of America were far from being adepts in the maxims of refined policy, yet they were led, by a providential concurrence of circumstances, to carry on their operations in a manner which contributed more to their fuccess than if every step they took had been prescribed by the most consummate art. When they first began to oppose the claims of Great-Britain, they were far from intending that separation which they afterwards effected, and would have trembled with horror at the thoughts of that which at last they gloried in accomplishing. Strange and undefigned consequences followed in the gradual fuccession of causes and effects. In confuting the extravagant opinion of taxation without representation, the Americans were infensibly led to enquire into the nature of civil liberty, and of their connexion with Great-Britain. From a denial of the British right of taxation, the way was opened for an investigation of the restrictions on their commerce, and of the disadvantages of their subordinate station. direct renunciation of the mother-country, in the first instance, would have drawn on the Americans the whole weight of her vengeance, and would probably have difunited the colonists; but as this was far from the thoughts of the popular leaders, they continued to profess, and with fincerity, great respect for their King and his government, till step by step they came to erect the standard of independence. The fentiments of a great majority of the people coincided with the refolutions of their leaders. Nothing was recommended, but what was in unifon with the prevailing opinions. A prudent respect was paid to antient prejudices, and nothing new was imposed till the publick mind was gradually reconciled to its favourable reception. The first popular affemblies conducted their opposition on legal grounds, and in a manner compatible with their allegiance. It was the acknowledged right of the fubjects to meet together, and petition for a redress of their grievances. Their committees and congresses, their resolutions of non-importation and non-exportation contained nothing unconstitutional. The affociation, which was the first band of popular union in South-Carolina, was fanctioned by no other penalty but that of with-holding all intercourfe with those who should refuse to concur with the same measures. The republican government had existed upwards of two years. General Burgoyne's army had been captured, and the alliance with France ratified, before an oath of allegiance to the state of South-Carolina was generally exacted from the inhabitants. During the whole war an abjuration of the King of Great-Britain was required of none but those who were in the publick service, with the exception of crown officers, and a few other fuspected characters.

IT was not only by the violence that was done to the publick fentiments, in arming the inhabitants against their countrymen, that the British rulers injured their interest. The circumstances attending that measure were productive of distress to the new-made subjects, as well as of disservice to the cause of his Britannick majesty. The officers who obtained commissions in the royal militia were, for the most part, men of unpopular character. They had been considered either as timid and luke-warm friends, or disguised enemies, and were objects of contempt to the active spirited whigs. All commissions from the Americans being extinct, the officers who had lately tately acted by their authority were instantly called upon to do duty as privates under men whom they lately commanded, and whom they generally despised. This revolution gave an opportunity for the gratification of private resentments. The British militia-officers persecuted individuals, whom they disliked, with so much severity, that many of them, who would have wished to remain quiet at home, were driven in self-desence to join American parties. After their second revolt, they soon obtained sollowers from among their former friends and connexions who were in the same predicament with themselves.

THE distinction of Whig and Tory took its rise in the year 1775. Both parties in the interior country were then embodied, and were obliged to impress provisions for their respective support. The advocates for Congress prevailing, they paid for articles confumed in their camps; but as no funds were provided for discharging the expences incurred by the royalists, all that was confumed by them was confidered as a robbery. This laid the foundation of a piratical war between whigs and tories, which eventually was productive of great distress, and deluged the country with blood. In the interval between the insurrection, of 1775, and the year 1780, the whigs were occasionally plundered by parties who had attempted infurrections in favour of royal government. But all that was done prior to the furrender of Charleston was trifling when compared to what followed. After that event political hatred raged with uncommon fury, and the calamities of civil war defolated the state. The ties of nature were in several instances dissolved. and that reciprocal good-will and confidence, which hold mankind together in fociety, was in a great degree extinguished. Countrymen, neighbours, friends and brothers, took different fides, and ranged themselves under the opposing standards of the contending factions. In every little precinct, more especially in the interior parts of the flate, King's-men and Congress-men were names of distinction. The passions on both sides were kept in perpetual agitation, and wrought up to a degree of fury which rendered individuals regardless, not only of the laws of war but of the principles of humanity. While the British had the ascendency, their partizans gave full scope to their interested and malicious passions. People of the worst characters emerged from their hiding-places in fwamps-called themselves King's-men-and began to appropriate to their own use whatsoever came in their way. Every act of cruelty and injustice was fanctified, provided the actor called himself a friend to the, King, and the fufferer was denominated a rebel. Of those who were well-disposed to the claims of America, there were few to be found who had not their houses and plantations repeatedly rifled. Under the fanction of fubduing rebellion, private revenge was gratified. Many houses were burned, and many people inhumanly murdered. Numbers

Numbers for a long time were obliged, either entirely to abandon their homes, or to fleep in the woods and fwamps. Rapine, outrage and murder, became fo common, as to interrupt the free intercourse between one place and another. That fecurity and protection, which individuals expect by entering into civil fociety, ceafed almost totally. Matters remained in this fituation for the greatest part of a year after the furrender of Charleston. When general Greene returned to South-Carolina, in the spring of 1781, every thing was reversed. In a few weeks he dispossessed the British of all their posts in the upper country, and the exasperated whigs once more had the fuperiority. On their return to their homes, they generally found starving families and desolate plantations. To reimburse their losses, and to gratify revenge, they, in their turn, began to plunder and to murder. The country was laid waste, and private dwellings frequently stained with the blood of husbands and fathers inhumanly shed in the presence of their wives and children. About this time governor Rutledge returned to South-Carolina, and exerted his great abilities in re-establishing order and security. To this end he issued a proclamation, strictly forbidding all violence and rapine. nn Magistrates were appointed in every part of the state recovered from the British. Civil government was restored. Property was fecured. Confusion and anarchy gave place to order and regular government. The people were happy, and rejoiced in the revolution.

In the close of the year 1781, when the fucceffes of the American army had confined the late conquerors to the vicinity of Charleston, a desperate band of tories adopted the infernal scheme of taking their last revenge, by carrying fire and fword into the fettlements of the whig militia. To this end major William Cunningham, of the British militia, collected a party, and having furnished them with every thing necessary for laying waste the country, fallied from Charleston. He and his affociates concealed themselves till they arrived in the back fettlements, far in the rear of the American army, and there began to plunder, burn and murder. In the unfuspecting hour of fleep and domestick fecurity, they entered the houses of the solitary farmers, and sacrificed to their revenge the obnoxious head of the family. Their cruelties induced fome fmall parties to affociate and arm in felf-defence. Captain Turner and twenty men had, on these principles, taken post in a house, and defended themselves till their ammunition was nearly expended. After which they furrendered on receiving affurances that they should be treated as prisoners of war. Notwithstanding this solemn agreement, captain Turner and his party were put to instant death by Cunningham and the men under his command. Soon after this massacre the fame party of tories attacked a number of the

the American militia, in the district of Ninety-Six, commanded by colonel Hayes, and fet fire to the house in which they had taken shelter. The only alternative left was either to be burned, or to furrender themselves prisoners. The last being preferred, colonel Hayes and captain Daniel Williams were hung at once on the pole of a fodder-stack. This breaking, they both fell, on which major William Cunningham cut them into pieces with his own fword, when, turning upon the others, he continued on them the operations of his favage barbarity, till the powers of nature being exhausted, and his enfeebled limbs refusing to administer any longer to his insatiate fury, he called upon his comrades to complete the dreadful work by killing whichfoever of the prisoners they pleased. They instantly put to death fuch of them as they perfonally disliked. Only two fell in action, but fourteen were deliberately cut to pieces after their furrender. Their names and rank were as follows: colonel Joseph Hayes, captain Daniel Williams, lieutenant Christopher Hardy, lieutenant John Neel, Clement Hancock, Joseph Williams, Joseph Irby, senior, Joseph Irby, junior, John Milven, James Feris, John Cook, Greaf Irby, Benjamin Goodman, Yancy Saxon.

ABOUT the fame time, and under the fame influence, emissaries from the British induced the Cherokee Indians to commence hostilities. Early in the year 1781 general Greene had concluded Vol. II.

a treaty with them, by which they had engaged to observe a neutrality. This was attended with the beneficial effects of faving the frontier fettlements both of North and South-Cardlina from their incursions, while the inhabitants were left at full liberty to concentrate their force against the army under the command of lord Cornwallis. When the co-operation of the Indians could be of the least service to the British forces, they were induced to break through their engagements of neutrality. They, with a number of difguifed whitemen, who called themselves the King's friends, made an incursion into the diftrict of Ninety-Six, massacred some families, and burned feveral houses. General Pickens collected a party of the American militia, and penetrated into the fettlements of the Cherokees. This he accomplished in fourteen days, at the head of three hundred and ninety-four horsemen. In that short space he burned thirteen towns and villages, killed upwards of forty Indians, and took a greater number prisoners. Not one of his party was killed, and only two were wounded. None of the expeditions carried on against the Cherokees had been fo rapid and decifive as the present one. General Pickens did not expend three pounds of ammunition, and yet only three Indians escaped, after having been once seen. On this occasion a new and successful mode of fighting the favages was introduced. Instead of firing, the American militia rufhed forwards on horseback, and charged with drawn swords. This was the fecond time during the American war that the Cherokee Indians had been chastisfed in their own settlements, in consequence of suffering themselves to be excited by British emissaries to commence hostilities against their white neighbours. They again sued for peace, in the most submissive terms, and obtained it, after promising that, instead of listening to the advice of the royalists instigating them to war, they would deliver those of them that visited their settlements, on that errand, to the authority of the state.

In consequence of these civil wars between the whigs and tories—the incursions of the favages-and the other calamities refulting from the operations of the British and American armies, South-Carolina exhibited scenes of distress which were shocking to humanity. The fingle district of Ninety-Six, which is only one of fix districts into which the state of South-Carolina is divided, has been computed, by well-informed perfons refiding therein, to contain within its limits fourteen hundred widows and orplians, made fo by the war. Nor is it wonderful that the country was involved in fuch accumulated distress. The American government was fufpended, and the British conquerors were careless of the civil rights of the inhabitants. They conducted as though interior order and police were scarcely objects of attention. The will of the strongest was the law. Such was the general complexion of those who called themselves royalifts.

ists, that nothing could be expected from them, unrestrained as they were by civil government, but outrages against the peace and order of society. Though among the tories in the lower parts of South-Carolina there were gentlemen of honour, principle and humanity, yet, in the interior and back parts of the state, a great proportion of them was an ignorant unprincipled banditti, to whom idleness, licentiousness, and deeds of violence, were familiar. Horse-thieves and others, whose crimes had exiled them from fociety, attached themselves to parties of the British. Encouraged by their example, and infligated by the love of plunder, they committed the most extensive depredations. Under the cloak of attachment to the old government, they covered the basest and most selfish purposes. The necessity which their indiscriminate plundering imposed on all good men of defending themfelves, did infinitely more damage to the royal cause than was compensated by all the advantages resulting from their friendship. They could fcarcely ever be brought to the field of battle. They fometimes furnished the British army with intelligence and provisions, but on all other accounts their fervices were of very little importance.

When the war was ended, though the pretence of crushing rebellion was no more a cloak to their robberies, the same depredations were continued, not only on the frontiers of South-Carolina Carolina and Georgia, but in East-Florida. Mr. Tonyn, governor of the last-mentioned loyal province, granted a commission to a horse-thief, of the name of McGirth, who, at the head of a party, had for several years harassed the inhabitants of South-Carolina and Georgia. By his frequent incursions he had amassed a large property, which he deposited in the vicinity of St. Augustine. After peace was proclaimed, he carried on the same practices against his former protectors in East-Florida, till they were obliged, in self-defence, to raise the royal militia of the province to oppose him. So dangerous is it to confer offices on men devoid of principle; for villians, when it is their interest, will turn against their employers.

As foon as the American army obtained repossession of the country, the inhabitants, after returning to their former allegiance, resolutely put all to the risk in support of independence. Though the British, in the career of their conquests, had inculcated the necessity and propriety of transferring allegiance from the vanquished to the victor, yet they treated with the utmost severity those unfortunate men, when in their power, who, having once accepted of British protection, acted on these very principles in asterwards re-joining their victorious countrymen.

AMONG the fufferers on this score, the illustrious colonel Hayne stands conspicuous. During the

the fiege of Charleston that gentleman served his country in a corps of militia-horse. After the capitulation, there being no American army in the state, and the prospect of one being both distant and uncertain, no alternative was left but either to abandon his family and property, or to furrender to the conquerors. This hard dilemma, together with well-founded information, that others in fimilar circumstances had been paroled to their plantations, weighed with colonel Hayne fo far as to induce a conclusion, that, instead of waiting to be captured, it would be both more fafe and more honourable to come within the British lines, and surrender himself a voluntary prisoner. He therefore repaired to Charleston, and offered to bind himfelf by the honour of an American officer, to do nothing prejudicial to the British interest till he should be exchanged. Reports which were made of his fuperior abilities and influence, uniformly exerted in the American cause, operated with the conquerors to refuse him a parole, though they were in the habit of daily granting that indulgence to others of the inhabitants. To his great astonishment he was told, ' that he must either become a British subject, or 'fubmit to close confinement.' To be arrested and detained in the capital, was to himfelf not an intolerable evil; but to abandon his family both to the ravages of the fmall-pox, a difeafe then raging in their neighbourhood, and which in a fhort time after proved mortal to his wife and two of his children, and to the infults and depredations for a tender husband and a fond parent. To acknowledge himself the subject of a king whose government he had from principle renounced, was repugnant to his feelings; but without this he was cut off from every prospect of a return to his family. In this embarrashing situation he waited on the author of this history, with a declaration to the following effect: 'If the British would grant me the indulgence which we, in 'the day of our power gave to their adherents, of removing my family and property, I would ' feek an afylum in the remotest corner of the 'United States rather than fubmit to their go-'vernment; but as they allow no other alter-6 native than submission or confinement in the capital, at a distance from my wife and family, 'at a time when they are in the most pressing need of my presence and support, I must for the prefent yield to the demands of the conquerors. 'I request you to bear in mind, that, previous ' to my taking this step, I declare, that it is contrary to my inclination, and forced on me by ' hard necessity. I never will bear arms against 'my country. My new masters can require no ' fervice of me but what is enjoined by the old ' militia-law of the province, which substitutes a fine in lieu of personal service. That I will pay 'as the price of my protection. If my conduct ' should be censured by my countrymen, I beg ' that you would remember this conversation, and bear witness for me, that I do not mean to defert the cause of America.

In this state of dures colonel Hayne subscribed a declaration of his allegiance to the King of Great-Britain, but not without expressly objecting to the clause which required him, 'with his 'arms, to support the royal government.' The commandant of the garrison, brigadier-general Paterson, and James Simpson, esquire, intendant of the British police, assured him, that this would never be required, and added farther, 'that 'when the regular forces could not defend the 'country without the aid of its inhabitants, it 'would be high time for the royal army to quit 'it.'

HAVING fubmitted to their government, he readily obtained permission to return to his family. In violation of the special condition under which he fubscribed the declaration of his allegiance, he was repeatedly called on to take arms against his countrymen, and was finally threatened with close confinement in case of a farther refusal. This open breach of contract, together with the inability of the late conquerors to give him that protection which was promifed as a compensation for his allegiance, the Americans having re-gained that part of the state in which he resided, induced him to confider himself as released from all engagements to the British commanders. The inhabitants of his neighbourhood, who had also revolted, subscribed a petition to general Pickens, praying that colonel Hayne might be appointed to the command of their regiment. Having thus refumed refumed his arms, and the tide of conquest being fairly turned in the short space of thirteen months after the furrender of Charleston, he fent out, in the month of July 1781, a small party to reconnoitre. They penetrated within feven miles of the capital-took general Williamson prisoner, and retreated to the head-quarters of the regiment. This was the fame Williamson, who, having been an active and useful officer in the militia of South-Carolina, from the commencement of the war to the furrender of Charleston in May 1780, became, foon after that event, a British subject. Such was the anxiety of the British commandant to rescue general Williamson, that he ordered out his whole cavalry on that bufinefs. Colonel Hayne unfortunately fell into their hands. Though he had conducted himself peaceably while under the British government, and had injured no man, yet, for having refumed his arms, after accepting British protection, he was, when brought to Charleston, confined in a loathfome provolt. At first he was promised a trial, and had counsel prepared to justify his conduct by the laws of nations and ufages of war; but this was finally refused. Had he been confidered as a British subject, he had an undoubted right to a trial-if as an American officer, to his parole; but in violation of every principle of the constitution, he was ordered for execution by the arbitrary mandate of lord Rawdon and lieutenantcolonel Balfour.

Vol. II. N n THE

The royal lieutenant-governor Bull, and a great number of inhabitants, both loyalists and Americans, interceded for his life. The ladies of Charleston generally signed a petition in his behalf, in which was introduced every delicate sentiment that was likely to operate on the gallantry of officers, or the humanity of men. His children, accompanied by some near relations, were presented on their bended knees, as humble suitors for their father's life. Such powerful intercessions were made in his favour as touched many an unfeeling heart, and drew tears from many an hard eye; but lord Rawdon and lieutenant-colonel Balfour remained inflexible.

AFTER his sate was fixed, he was repeatedly visited by his friends, and conversed on various subjects with the fortitude of a man, a philosopher and a christian. He particularly lamented that, on principles of reciprocal retaliation, his execution would probably be an introduction to the fhedding of much innocent blood. His children, who had loft their other parent, were brought to him in the place of his confinement, and received from his lips the dying advice of an affectionate father. On the last evening of his life he told a friend, 'that he was no more alarmed at the thoughts of death than at any other occurrence which was necessary and unavoidable.' He requested those in whom the supreme power was vested, to accommodate the mode mode of his death to his feelings as an officer; but this was refused.

On the morning of the fatal day, on receiving his fummons to proceed to the place of execution, he delivered the annexed papers to his eldest fon, a youth of about thirteen years of age-Present,' said he, 'these papers pp to mrs. Ed-' wards, with my request that she would forward them to her brother in Congress. You will e next repair to the place of execution-receive 'my body, and fee it decently interred among 'my forefathers.' They took a final leave. The colonel's arms were pinioned, and a guard placed round his person. The procession began from the Exchange, in the forenoon of the fourth of August 1781. The streets were crowded with thousands of anxious spectators. He walked to the place of execution with fuch decent firmness, composure and dignity, as to awaken the compassion of many, and to command respect from all. There was a majesty in his sufferings which rendered him superior to the pangs of death. When the city barrier was past, and the instrument of his catastrophe appeared full in view, a faithful friend by his fide observed to him, 'that he hoped he would exhibit an example of the ' manner in which an American can die.' He answered with the utmost tranquillity, 'I will endeavour to do fo.' He ascended the cart with a firm step and serene aspect. He enquired of the ' the executioner, who was making an attempt to get up to pull the cap over his eyes, what he wanted? Upon being informed of his defign, the colonel replied, 'I will fave you that trouble,' and pulled it over himself. He was afterwards asked, whether he wished to say any thing, to which he answered, 'I will only take leave of 'my friends, and be ready.' He then affectionately shook hands with three gentlemen—recommended his children to their care—and gave the fignal for the cart to move.

Thus fell, in the bloom of life, a brave officer, a worthy citizen, a just and upright man, furnishing an example of heroism in death that extorted a confession from his enemies, 'that, 'though he did not die in a good cause, he must 'at least have acted from a persuasion of its being 'fo.'

Few men stood higher in the estimation of their countrymen than the illustrious man whose exit has been just described. General Greene demanded from the British commanders their reasons for this execution. To which he received a written answer, signed by N. Balfour, acknowledging, 'that it took place by the joint 'order of lord Rawdon and himself, but in confequence of the most express directions from 'lord Cornwallis, to put to death those who 'should be found in arms, after being at their own requests received as subjects, since the 'capitulation' capitulation of Charleston, and the clear conquest of the province in the summer of 1780.

The regular officers of the continental army presented a petition to general Greene, requesting that he would retaliate for the execution of colonel Hayne. By this they voluntarily subjected themselves to all the consequences to which, in case of capture, they would be exposed. General Greene soon after issued a proclamation, threatening to make British officers the objects of retaliation. This encouraged the revolted inhabitants to continue in arms, and effaced every impression that was expected from the fate of colonel Hayne. The British interest gained no permanent advantage, while pity and revenge sharpened the swords of the countrymen and friends of the much beloved sufferer.

Hap this execution taken place four or five months fooner, the policy of the measure, as tending to prevent a revolt, would have been fome apology for it; but after lord Rawdon was driven from almost the whole of his posts in the country, and the people had generally resumed their arms in favour of America, it had more the appearance of the revenge of a disappointed savage, than of the political severity of a conqueror. It was also in express violation of a cartel which had been reciprocally ratified on the feventeenth day of the preceding May. By that it was stipulated, that all the militia prisoners on one side should be exchanged for the same order of men on the other. This was intended to give the inhabitants of the country a liberty of choosing their sides, without involving themselves in the consequences of treason for a transfer of their allegiance.

AFTER the British landed in Carolina in 1780, they confined some of their first prisoners in the vaults with the dead. When their successes had multiplied the number of prisoners, they were crowded on board prison-ships, where they suffered every inconvenience that could result from putrid air, and the want of the comforts of life. This was done not only to those who surrendered at discretion, but also to the private soldiers who were entitled to the benefit of the capitulation of Charleston. General Moultrie remonstrated against this proceeding, in the following letter, addressed to lieutenant-colonel Nisbet Balsour, commandant of Charleston.

'Christ-Church parish, Oct. 16, 1780.

SIR.

^{&#}x27;However my letters may be thought by you to be wrote "in exceptionable and unwarrant-"able terms," yet I cannot be deterred from representing matters of such consequence, as I am now constrained to do, in the strongest manner. Though it is indifferent to me, whether ther I write to you or to the commissary of e prisoners on trifling applications, yet, when 'my duty calls upon me loudly to remonstrate 'against a proceeding of so high a nature as a 'violation of a folemn capitulation, I then think it my duty to make my application as near the ' fountain-head as possible. I therefore, fir, addrefs myfelf to you, to complain of a great breach of the capitulation in fending the con-' tinental foldiers on board prison-ships, (the truth of which I have not the least doubt of) as part of the equivalent, for which the town was de-' livered up to fir Henry Clinton, was, that the continental foldiers should be kept in some contiguous buildings in the town. This appears by the following extract from their excellencies ' fir Henry Clinton and admiral Arbuthnot's letter to major-general Lincoln, of the twelfth of May 1780, antecedent to the furrender.'

" SIR.

"WE have to request you will propose some proper contiguous buildings, in the town, for the residence of the private prisoners of war, not to be on parole; those will be of course fuch as may in discretion be asked."

'THE barracks and some adjacent houses were then proposed and agreed upon, as a proof of which the soldiers have been confined in those buildings from the very instant of the surrender till this present removal, which I do most solemnly protest

'protest against, and complain of to you, sir, as a direct violation of the third article of the capitulation, and demand that the continental foldiers be ordered back to the barracks and other houses in which they were first confined.'

To this remonstrance lieutenant-colonel Balfour returned a verbal answer, 'that he should 'do as he pleased with the prisoners for the good 'of his majesty's service, and not as general 'Moultrie pleased.'

THE condition of these unfortunate men was truly deplorable. They were crowded on board the prison-ships in such numbers that several were obliged to stand up for want of room to lie down. The state of South-Carolina could afford them no supply. Congress could not at that time command hard money for their relies. Wine, and such like comforts, particularly necessary for the sick in southern climates, could not be obtained from the British hospitals.

UPWARDS of eight hundred of these brave men, nearly one third of the whole, exhausted by a variety of sufferings, "expired in the short space of thirteen months' captivity. When the general exchange took place in June 1781, out of nineteen hundred taken at the surrender of Charleston, on the twelsth of May 1780, and several hundreds more taken afterwards at Camden den and at Fishing Creek, on the sixteenth and eighteenth of August of the same year, there were only feven hundred and forty restored to the fervice of their country. It was not by deaths alone that the Americans were deprived of their foldiers. Lord Charles-Greville Montague enlifted five hundred and thirty of them in the British service. His lordship, before the revolution, had been governor of the province of South-Carolina, and had frequently declared himfelf to be warmly attached to the liberties of America. In the early stage of the war he had gone privately to Paris, and offered his fervice to doctor Franklin, to take a command in the army of Congress. The distressed confinental foldiers were induced to accept the offers of lord Charles-Greville Montague in preference to the horrors of a prison-ship, by the specious promise that they should be employed in the West-Indies, and not against their countrymen in the United States. His lordship, after completing his regiment, offered the command of it to brigadiergeneral Moultrie, the fenior officer of the prifoners of war belonging to the continental army. To induce him to accept of this command, and to enter the British service, his lordship wrote him the following letter:

6 March 11, 1781.

SIR,

^{&#}x27;A SINCERE wish to promote what may be to your advantage, induces me now to write. The Vol. II. Oo 'freedom

' freedom with which we have often conversed, makes me hope you will not take amis what I say.

' My own principles respecting the commence-' ment of this unfortunate war are well known 6 to you, of course you can only conceive what 'I mention is out of friendship. You have now ' fought bravely in the cause of your country for many years, and, in my opinion, fulfilled the duty every individual owes it: you have had 'your share of hardships and difficulties; and, if the contest is still to be continued, younger hands should now take the toil from you. You have now a fair opening of quitting that fervice with honour and reputation to yourfelf by go-'ing to Jamaica with me. The world will rea-6 dily attribute it to the known friendship that has fubfifted between us, and, by quitting this coun-' try for a short time, you would avoid any disagreeable converfations, and might return at 'your own leisure to take possession of your estates for yourself and family. The regiment I am going with I am to command, the only ' proof I can give you of my fincerity is, that I will quit that command to you with pleafure, and ferve under you. I earnestly wish I could be the instrument to effect what I propose, as I think it would be a great means towards pro-6 moting that reconciliation we all wish for. A thousand circumstances concur to make this a e proper period for you to embrace: our old acquaintance.

acquaintance, my having been formerly governor in this province, &c. &c. the interest I have with the present commander.

'I GIVE you my honour what I write is entirely unknown to the commandant or to any one else, and so shall your answer be if you favour me with one. Think well of me.

' Yours fincerely,

(Signed) 'CHA. MONTAGUE.
'To brigadier-general Moultrie.'

'Haddrell's Point, March 12, 1781.

'I RECEIVED yours this morning. I thank you for your wish to promote my advantage, but am much surprized at your proposition. I flattered myself I stood in a more favourable light with you. I shall write with the same freedom with which we used to converse, and doubt not you will receive it with the same candour. I have often heard you express your sentiments respecting this unfortunate war, when you thought the Americans injured; but am now assonished to find you taking an active part against them, though not sighting particularly on the continent; yet the seducing their soldiers away, to enlist in the British service, is nearly similar.

6 My lord, you are pleased to compliment me with having fought bravely in my country's cause for many years, and in your opinion ful-6 filled the duty every individual owes to it: but I differ widely with you in thinking that I have discharged my duty to my country, while 'it is still deluged with blood and over-run by the British troops, who exercise the most savage cruelties. When I entered into this con-' test I did it with the most mature deliberation, ' and with a determined resolution to risk my life 6 and fortune in the cause. The hardships I have ' gone through I look back upon with the greatest e pleasure and honour to myseif. I shall continue to go on as I have begun, that my example ' may encourage the youths of America to stand ' forth in defence of their rights and liberties. 'You call upon me now, and tell me I have a fair opening of quitting that fervice with ho-' nour and reputation to myself, by going with 'you to Jamaica. Good Goo! is it possible that ' fuch an idea could arise in the breast of a man 6 of honour. I am forry you should imagine I have fo little regard for my own reputation, as ' to listen to such dishonourable proposals. Would e you wish to have that man, whom you have ho-6 noured with your friendship, to play the traitor? ' furely not. You fay, by quitting this country for a fhort time, I might avoid difagreeable s conversations, and might return at my own leifure and take possession of my estates for myself * and family; but you have forgot to tell me how

'I am to get rid of the feelings of an injured honest heart, and where to hide myself from myself. Could I be guilty of so much baseness, I should hate myself and shun mankind. This would be a fatal exchange from my present situation, with an easy and approving conscience, of having done my duty, and conducted myself as a man of honour.

'My lord, I am forry to observe, that I feel your friendship much abated, or you would not endeavour to prevail upon me to act so base a part. You earnestly wish you could bring it about, as you think it will be the means of bringing about that reconciliation we all wish for. I wish for a reconciliation as much as any man, but only upon honourable terms. The re-possessing my estates, the offer of the command of your regiment, and the honour you propose of serving under me, are paltry considerations to the loss of my reputation. No not the fee-simple of that valuable island of Jamaica should induce me to part with my integrity.

'My lord, as you have made one proposal, give me leave to make another, which will be more honourable to us both. As you have an interest with your commanders, I would have you propose the withdrawing the British troops from the continent of America, allow the independence, and propose a peace. This being done, I will use my interest with my commanders to accept of the terms, and allow Greater Britain a free trade with America.

'My lord, I could make one more proposal; but my situation as a prisoner circumscribes me within certain bounds. I must therefore conclude with allowing you the free liberty to make what use of this you may think proper. Think better of me.

'I am, my lord,
'your lordship's
'most obedient humble servant,
'To lord Charles Montague.'

THE continental officers taken at the furrender of Charleston were confined to Haddrell's Point and the vicinity. Far from their friends, and destitute of hard money, they were reduced to the greatest straits. Such were the difficulties and fevere restrictions imposed on this band of patriots, that many of them, though born in affluence and habituated to attendance, were compelled to do not only the most menial offices for themselves, but could scarcely procure the plainest necessaries of life. During a captivity of thirteen months, they received no more from their country than nine days pay. These hardships were not alleviated by those civilities from their conquerors which among modern refined nations have abated the horrors of war. They were debarred the liberty of fishing for their support, though their great leifure and many wants made it an object not only as an amusement, but as a mean of supplying their necessities. After bearing all these evils with great fortitude, they were informed, in the month of March 1781, by lieutenant-colonel Balfour, that, by positive orders from earl Cornwallis, he was to fend them to some one of the West-India islands. This was fo directly opposed to the letter and spirit of the capitulation of Charleston, that general Moultrie was induced once more to prefer a remonstrance. This address, though supported with manly spirit, and directed by decency, met with little regard. Preparations were made for the execution of the mandate; but a general exchange of prifoners, in the fouthern department, took place in a few weeks, which released the prisoners on both fides from captivity.

The citizens of the town, who adhered to their paroles, were treated with great feverity. Though they were not allowed rations, yet they were debarred from trade, and from exercifing any profession of whatever kind for a competent subsistence. Upon the application of an individual for rations, the town major, Charles Fraser, issued the following order: 'All difficulties with 'regard to provisions ought to have been considered before people entered into rebellion, or, in the course of these twelve months, while 'they have been allowed to walk about on parole. 'All militia prisoners and others on parole, are to keep their paroles and to remain in their 'houses.' The loyal subjects were precluded from employing them in the most fervile labour, by an order of lieutenant-colonel Nisbet Balfour, issued on the twenty-fifth of March 1781, in the following words: 'Whereas divers persons who are ' prisoners on parole, in Charleston, do exercise 'their professions, trades and occupations, and ' avail themselves of the emoluments and advan-6 tages incident thereto, which should be enjoyed by those only who have returned to their allegi-'ance, and are defirous of supporting his majef-'ty's government, which affords them protection. ' For prevention whereof in future, it is ordered, 'that no person, now a prisoner on parole in 'Charleston, shall have the liberty of exercising any profession, trade, mechanick art, business or occupation. And his majesty's subjects are hereby strictly enjoined and required not to ' employ fuch person or persons on any pretence.' By order of the commandant,

'HENRY BARRY, fecretary, and deputy adjutant-general.'

Though by the capitulation of Charleston, in May 1780, the inhabitants were entitled to their paroles, and a residence on their estates with their families; yet in May 1781 upwards of one hundred of them were confined to prison-ships. The conquerors did not undertake to justify this step from any supposed breach of parole. They affected to hold the prisoners in this state of duress as hostages, to secure good treatment for those of the loyalists who had been captured by the Americans. The gentlemen who were confined on this occasion submitted to their fate with great magnanimity. Instead of repining at their situation, they only regretted, 'if it should fall to the lot of any or all of them to be made victims, agreeably to the menaces of lieutenant-colonel Balfour, that their blood could not be disposed of more to the advantage of the glorious cause in which they had engaged.'

Though the property of the prisoners was confessedly secured by the capitulation, as part of the equivalent for the surrender of Charleston, yet they had the mortification to see it repeatedly taken from them without any redress.

As the war was carried on, not to gain a contested point from an independent power, but to annihilate the assumed independence of the state, and to reduce it to its former provincial subjection, the conquerors ridiculed the idea of observing the capitulation with citizens. They confidered that measure as the expedient of a day, only proper at the furrender to prevent the effufion of blood, but no longer fo when their arms were triumphant in the remote extremities of the state. Indulgences shewn to prisoners were viewed as favours derived from the humanity of conquerors, and not as rights founded on a capitu-Vol. II. Pp lation.

lation. Perfons who remained in the character of prisoners, and claimed under that solemn agreement, were confidered as obstinate rebels, who meant to thwart the views of the royal army. While they wished to be regarded as the members of an independent state, they were looked upon as vanquished rebels who owed their lives to British clemency. In this confusion of fentiments, to reconcile contradictory claims required uncommon address. The pride of conquerors, highly estimating their own moderation, and the pride of prisoners, confidering themselves as independent freemen, entitled to respect for their firmness and patriotism, made the former trample on the latter, and the latter despise the former. It would have been more for British honour, either to have refused a capitulation, or to have observed it better. Their capitulating one day with the inhabitants as the members of a distinct nation, and soon after treating them as their own vanquished rebellious subjects, made a confusion in their politicks, and contributed not 'a little to the utter ruin of their cause.

It has been already mentioned, that, in May 1781, a general exchange of prisoners was agreed to, in which the militia on both sides were respectively exchanged for each other. Notwithstanding every difficulty, a considerable number of the inhabitants had perseveringly refused to become British subjects. These being exchanged, were delivered at the American posts in Virginia

ginia and Pennsylvania. Great were the exultations of the suffering friends of independence, at the prospect of their being released from confinement, and restored to activity in their country's cause; but these pleasing prospects were obscured by the distresses brought on their families by this otherwise desirable event. On the twenty-sists of June 1781 the British commandant, lieutenant-colonel Balsour, issued the following order:

'As many persons lately exchanged as prison-'ers of war, and others who have long chose to 'reside in the colonies now in rebellion, have,

- 'notwithstanding such their absence, wives and families still remaining here, the weight of
- which on all accounts it is equally impolitick as
- 'inconsistent should longer be suffered to rest on
- the government established here and the re-
- ' fources of it:
- 'THE commandant is therefore pleased to di-'rect, that all such women, children and others,
- 'as above described, should quit this town and
- ' province on or before the first day of August
- ' next enfuing; of which regulation all fuch per-
- ' fons are hereby ordered to take notice, and to
- ' remove themselves accordingly.'

THE gentlemen who had been, from motives of policy, removed from Charleston to St. Augustine, as has been already related, obtained their release release by this general exchange, and were delivered at the port of Philadelphia. Though their wives and children who had been left in Charlefton were ordered the fame way, and at the fame time, lieutenant-colonel Balfour gave positive orders that they should not be suffered to touch at Charleston. Here commenced a scene of distress. More than a thousand persons were exiled from their homes, and thrown on the charity of strangers for their support. Husbands and wives, parents and children, fome of whom had been for feveral months separated from each other, were not permitted to footh their common distress by being together; but were doomed to have their first interview among strangers in a distant land. In retaliation for this conduct, governor Rutledge ordered the brigadiers of militia to drive, within the British lines, the families of those who adhered to the royal cause. The wives and children of those inhabitants who, to avoid the refentments of their countrymen, had retreated with the retreating British, were compelled to take shelter within their posts. In exchange for their comfortable farms in the country, many of them were reduced in a little time to the necessity of living in clay huts in the vicinity of Charlefton. In this forlorn fituation numbers of them, destitute of the comforts of life, and overwhelmed with diseases, speedily perished. The exiled Americans received generous treatment from fome individuals, and also from the bounty of Congress; but, notwithstanding this liberality, they fuffered fuffered many of the evils which result from a want of friends and a want of money. Several of the persons thus exchanged, and sent to the northern states, were owners of landed property in Charleston. Though by the capitulation they had an undoubted right to dispose of this for their own advantage, yet they were debarred that liberty by the following order, issued on the eleventh of July 1781:

'no person, living under the rebel government,
's shall have liberty, or grant power to others for
's so doing, to let or lease any house within this 'town without a special license for so doing, as 'it is intended to take all such houses as may be 'wanted for the publick service, paying to the 'owners of those secured by the capitulation a 'reasonable rent for the same, as by this means

' government will be enabled to re-instate its

(Signed) 'JAMES FRASER, acting

In consequence of this mandate, the houses of those who adhered to the cause of America were, in violation of publick faith, taken out of their hands, and there was scarce an instance of compensation being allowed them for this seizure of their property.

THE partial re-establishment of British government in South-Carolina was, as has been stated, the fource of accumulated evils to the steady friends of independence; but they were not the only sufferers. The calamities of the years 1780 and 1781 operated extensively. There was scarcely an inhabitant of the state, however obscure in character or remote in fituation, whether he remained firm to one party or changed with the times, who did not in some degree partake of the general distress. The adherents to royal government were often treated by the British conquerors with neglect and contempt-frequently fuffered in their property, and had many grievances unredressed. Their most essential interests were in every stage of the war, and especially at the evacuation of Charleston, and the general treaty of peace, facrificed to political necessity. They had the peculiar misfortune of fuffering from the repeated violation of publick faith fuccessively pledged for their fecurity. Immediately after the furrender of Charleston they were asfured by proclamation, 'that they should meet with effectual countenance, protection and 'fupport.' Notwithstanding these bold promises, general Clinton immediately withdrew the greatest part of the conquering army; and lord Cornwallis, after marching through the state, proceeded to his northern operations with fo great a part of the remainder, as left the country without a fufficient defence. After general Greene returned to the flate, the fame delufion was renewed by proclamation, dated at Monk's Corner on May twenty-fourth, 1781, in which lord Rawdon and lieutenant-colonel Balfour gave 'affurances of every support to the loyal inhabitants, that they would shortly re-instate them in the full and peaceable possession of their property from which they had been driven.' uu But the greatest deception took place in December 1781, and the following months. Though the defence of the country was abandoned, and the royal army durst not risk an action without their lines, yet general Leslie, who had been about that time appointed to command the British troops in Carolina, under all these forbidding circumstances, iffued his proclamation, affuring 'his majesty's ' loyal subjects in the province, that they might rely on speedy and effectual support being given them by the exertions of the forces under his command; and that, in every event and fituation, their interests and security should be considered as inseparably connected with those of 'his majesty's troops.' This proclamation was continued while the legislature of the state, convened at Jacksonborough, was confiscating their property. Such at that time was the reduced state of the fouthern army, and of the finances of America, that great indulgences in favour of British subjects could have been obtained as an equivalent for a voluntary withdrawing of the royal forces. After an act of affembly had banished and beggared the active friends of the old government, government, that event, in a few months, took place without fecuring any one advantage to the deceived royalifts.

The measures that ultimately occasioned the evacuation of Charleston, and a termination of the war, took their rise at a distant period, and were principally effected in the state of Virginia. To understand them in a proper connexion, a review of the exertions of the court of France, in the years 1780 and 1781, in favour of the United States, and of the plans adopted by the British for their subjugation in the same years, together with the general state of American affairs in that period, becomes necessary.

THE fall of Charleston in May 1780, and the complete rout of the American army in the August following, laid the foundation of a vigorous enterprize, which in two years terminated a war that might otherwife have lasted much longer. The British successes to the southward, after they had changed the theatre of the war from north to fouth, gave a ferious alarm to the friends of independence. In the close of the year 1780, the United States appeared to be in nearly the fame fituation as they were at the close of the year 1776. What the battle of Trenton and Princeton effected in the north, in the beginning of the war, bears a strong analogy to the consequences of the battles of King's Mountain and of the Cowpens in the fouth, in its last period; but but with this difference: in the first crisis of American affairs the spirits of the people were high, and the paper currency had credit equal to gold and filver: in the last, the inhabitants of the United States were thoroughly tired of the war, and their bills of credit would fcarcely defray the expence of printing them. In the year 1776 America had no affurance of foreign aid; but in the year 1780 she had the advantage of a connexion with the greatest monarch in Europe, bound by treaty to establish her independence. In the last low state of American affairs Congress looked up to their faithful ally, Louis the fixteenth of France. Lieutenant-colonel John Laurens was appointed their special minister, and ordered to repair to the court of Verfailles, and there to urge the necessity of speedy and effectual fuccour, and, in particular, to folicit for a loan of specie, and a co-operation of a French fleet in attempting some important enterprize against the common enemy. So much address was displayed in accomplishing the object of this mission, that it is hard to tell which we ought to admire most, the gallant officer or the able negotiator.

The unrivalled reputation which lieutenant-colonel Laurens had acquired in the field, feemed, if possible, to be eclipsed by the superior eclat with which he terminated his short but important embassy. Within six months from his departure he returned to America, all the objects of his mission being fully obtained. On his ar-Vol. II. Q q rival rival on the continent, he instantly repaired to Philadelphia, and gave an account of his negotiation. In three days he finished his business with Congress, and immediately after re-joined the American army. Though he was entitled to a generous falary allowed by Congress to their ministers at foreign courts, he declined receiving any thing more than his bare expences. On the application of Congress, in this crisis of their affairs, to their illustrious ally, every thing asked for, and even more, was with great liberality cheerfully granted. His most christian majesty generously gave them a subsidy of six millions of livres, and became their fecurity for ten millions more borrowed for their use in the United Netherlands. A naval co-operation was promifed, and a conjunct expedition against the common foe was projected. It was not only by these liberal grants of money and of ships that the King of France aided his American allies in their hour of distress; in the year 1780, as has been related, five thousand five hundred French troops had landed in Rhode-Island, to co-operate with the armies of Congress. The disposition to support the American revolution was not only prevalent in the court of France, but it animated the body of the French nation. As foon as it was known that a refolution was adopted to fend out troops to the United States, the young French nobility discovered the most ardent zeal to be employed on that fervice. Court favour was fcarcely ever folicited with more earnestness than was

was the honour of ferving under general Washington. The number of applicants was much greater than the publick fervice required. Among those who were on this occasion sent to America, the following illustrious names deserve to be particularly mentioned: the count de Rochambeau, whose good conduct proved the wisdom of the choice by which he was put at the head of the French troops; the baron de Viomenil; the chevalier de Chatelleux, famous as well for his literary as his military talents; the duke de Laval Montmorency; the viscount de Rochambeau; the count de Saintmemes; the viscount de Noailles, who had before made a campaign in America under count d'Estaing; the count de Gustine and the duke de Castries. These two lastnamed officers had quitted the cavalry, in which they were far advanced, to ferve in the infantry, that they might be fent on this favourite fervice. The marquis and the count de Deux Ponts; the prince de Broglio and the count de Segur; the duke de Lauzun, who commanded a legion composed of cavalry and infantry, and who had under his orders the viscount d'Arrot and the count de Dillon.

Notwithstanding this uncommon zeal to ferve in the American war, a whole year elapsed after the arrival of the French troops in Rhode-Island, before a proper opportunity of gratifying their passion for military same presented itself. So great was the impatience of the officers in this state of inactivity, that it became necessary for their commander, count de Rochambeau, to exercife fevere discipline to moderate their impetuofity. A few of them were indulged with the liberty of making excursions from Rhode-Island, but in general they were kept together, to be ready for any enterprize that should offer. Early in the year 1781 fifteen hundred of these French troops were embarked on an expedition for the relief of Virginia. An engagement took place on the fifth of March, near the capes of the Chefapeak, between the British admiral Arbuthnot and the French chef d'escadre d'Estouches. The former having the advantage of one ship more than the latter, frustrated the intended scheme. The fleet of his most christian majesty was obliged to return to Rhode-Island without accomplishing their object. The ardent zeal of the French troops, though checked, was not repressed by this want of success. In a few months full scope was given for the gratification of their fervent desire to render effectual aid to their American allies. Near the fame spot where they failed in their first attempt, they, in conjunction with other troops and ships of their nation and the American army, completed the great enterprize which terminated the war.

THE failure of the project for the relief of Virginia in March 1781, though at that time confidered as disastrous, proved eventually a most fortunate circumstance to the allied arms of France and America; for it encouraged the British to fortify themselves in the Chesapeak, and prepared the way for the great event, shortly to be related, which gave peace to contending nations. The British had fixed on Virginia as the principal theatre of their operations for the year 1781. They had, besides their militia, about ten thousand regular troops in New-York. They were also in possession of Savannah, Charleston, and many strong posts in Carolina and Georgia. To retain their conquests in these last-mentioned states, and to defend themselves in New-York, were the principal objects of the British in the north and south, while their chief active-force was to operate in or near the centre of the consederacy.

As the opposition to the re-establishment of British government in the two Carolinas and Georgia was greatly invigorated by supplies from Virginia, the reduction of that powerful state was confidered as the most effectual method of completing the conquest of the fouthern extremity of the union. The possession of the Chefapeak by the British furnished a convenient harbour for their fleets, and a central point from which they might direct their operations against the middle states. Subservient to this scheme, as well as to that of making a diversion, while the war raged chiefly in South-Carolina, detachments from the royal army had been occasionally fent to Virginia in the latter end of the year 1780 and the beginning of 1781. As the season advanced vanced these were increased. By the junction of lord Cornwallis with the troops commanded by generals Philips and Arnold, an event which took place on the twentieth of May 1781, they became very formidable. After his lordship had marched through South and North-Carolina, he fancied he had subdued these states, and therefore, as has been related, he profecuted his imaginary conquests into Virginia. The forces under the command of general Philips and general Arnold had been, for fome months previous to their junction with lord Cornwallis, marching through that state in the same manner, and with the fame effect, that his lordship had traversed the two Carolinas. Whitherfoever they marched they bore down all opposition; but their conquests were seldom of longer duration than their encampments.

The formidable force, thus collected in Virginia, called for the vigorous exertions of the friends of independence. The defence of that state was at this period of the war principally entrusted to the marquis de la Fayette. The enthusiastick zeal and great services of this distinguished French nobleman, merit a particular detail. At the age of nineteen he espoused the cause of America with all the ardour which the most generous philanthropy could inspire. At a very early period of the war, he determined to embark from his native country for the United States. Before he could complete this intention, intelligence intelligence arrived in Europe, that the American infurgents, reduced to two thousand men, were flying through Jersey before a British force of thirty thousand regulars. This news fo effectually extinguished the little credit which America had in Europe, in the beginning of the year 1777, that the commissioners of Congress at Paris, though they had previously encouraged his project, could not procure a vessel to forward his intentions. Under these circumstances they thought it but honest to diffuade him from the present prosecution of his perilous enterprize. It was in vain they acted fo candid a part. The flame which America had kindled in his breaft could not be extinguished by her misfortunes. 'Hitherto,' faid he, in the true spirit of patriotisin, 'I have only cherished your cause-now I am going to ferve it. The lower it is in the opinion of the people, the greater will be the effect of my departure; and fince you cannot eget a vessel, I shall purchase and fit out one to carry your despatches to Congress and myself to ' America.' He accordingly embarked and arrived in Charleston early in the year 1777. Congress soon conferred on him the rank of majorgeneral. He accepted the appointment, but not without exacting two conditions, which displayed the elevation of his spirit: the one, that he should be permitted to ferve at his own expence; the other, that he should begin his services as a volunteer.

HE was foon appointed to command an irruption into Canada. The plan was to cross the lakes on the ice; the object to feize Montreal and St. Johns. He was now at the age of twenty, and must have keenly experienced the almost irrefiftible allurements of independent command; but his cool judgment, and honest heart, restrained him from indulging a passion for military fame, under circumstances that might have injured the cause which he had so zealously espoused. He found that, in case of his proceeding, the army under his command would be in danger of experiencing a fate fimilar to that of the unfortunate Burgoyne. With a boldness of judgment that would have done honour to the most experienced general, and without advancing beyond Albany, he relinquished the expedition. Soon after he received the thanks of Congress for his prudence.

In the four campaigns which fucceeded the arrival of the marquis de la Fayette in America, he gave repeated proofs of his military talents in the middle and eastern states; but as these operations do not fall within the prescribed limits of this history, I proceed to relate those events which took place under his command in the southern states, and which had an influence on the publick affairs of South-Carolina.

EARLY in the year 1781, while the war raged to the fouthward of Virginia, the marquis de la Fayette

Fayette was detached on an expedition against Portsmouth, but here his active zeal received a check, no less fatal to his hopes than when he was obliged to relinquish the expedition to Canada. The engagement near the capes of the Chesapeak, between the French chef d'escadre d'Estouches and the British admiral Arbuthnot, which took place on the fifth of March, 1781, as has been related, defeated the enterprize. Upon this event he marched back to the Head of Elk, where he received an order from general Washington to return to Virginia, to oppose general Philips, who had joined general Arnold at Portfmouth. Although the troops under his command were in want of almost every thing, he nevertheless proceeded with them to Baltimore. Here he learned that general Philips was urging preparations to embark at Portsmouth, with upwards of three thousand men. With the marquis de la Fayette it was a moment of extreme diffress and embarrassment. In his whole command there was not one pair of shoes; but the love and confidence he had univerfally excited, enabled him to obtain a loan of money which procured him fome necessaries for his troops, and gave renewed vigour to his march. He supposed Richmond to be the object of general Philips, and therefore marched thither with fo great expedition, that he arrived at that place the evening before general Philips. He was joined the first night after his arrival by major-general baron Steuben, with a corps of militia. In this manner was the capital of Virginia, at that time filled with almost all the military stores of the state, saved from the most imminent danger. The British appeared the next morning at Manchester, just opposite to Richmond. The two armies surveyed each other for some time, and then general Philips, apprehending it to be too hazardous to attack the marquis de la Fayette in his strong position, very prudently retired.

Vol. II. Rr tal

Such was the great superiority of numbers by the combination of the forces under general Arnold, general Philips and lord Cornwallis—so fatal to all the southern states would have been the conquest of Virginia—that the marquis de la Fayette had before him a labour of the last consequence, and was pressed on all sides by innumerable difficulties.

In the first moments of the rising tempest, and till he could provide against its utmost rage, he began to retire with his little army, which consisted of about a thousand regulars, two thousand militia, and fixty dragoons. Lord Cornwallis, exulting in the prospect of success, which he thought to be heightened by the youth of his opponent, incautiously wrote to Great-Britain, that the boy could not escape him.' The engagement, however, which was to confirm his promise, was sedulously avoided. Finding it impossible to force an action, he next endeavoured to cut off the communication of the marquis de la Fayette with general Wayne, who, with eight hundred Pennfylvanians, was advancing from the northward. The junction however was effected at Rackoon Ford without loss. The next object of lord Cornwallis was to get possession of the American stores, which, for their greater security, had been removed from Richmond to Albemarle old courthouse above the Point of Fork. While the troops commanded by the marquis de la Fayette and general Wayne were forming a junction, lord Cornwallis had gotten between them and their publick stores. The possession of these was a principal object with both armies. The marquis de la Fayette, by forced marches, got within a few miles of the British army, when they were yet distant two days march from Albemarle old courthouse. Once more the British general considered himself sure of his adverfary. To fave the stores he knew was his defign, but to accomplish that object, his lordship saw no practicable way but by a road in passing which the American army might be attacked to great advantage. It was a critical moment, but the marquis de la Fayette had the good fortune to extricate himself. He opened in the night, by part of his army, a nearer road to Albemarle, which, having been many years difused, was much embarrassed, and, to the astonishment of lord Cornwallis, posted himself in a strong position the next day between the British army and the American stores.

His lordship, finding all his schemes frustrated, fell back to Richmond, whither he was followed by the marquis de la Fayette. The main American army in Virginia was now reinforced by the troops under major-general baron Steuben, and by volunteer corps of Virginia and Maryland gentlemen. And the marquis de la Fayette had the address to impress lord Cornwallis with an idea, that his force was much greater than he actually commanded. His lordship, therefore, retreated to Williamsburg. During this movement, on the twenty-fixth of June 1781, an American light corps, commanded by colonel Butler, attacked the rear of the British army, and killed and wounded one hundred and fixty of them. On the fixth of July following, lord Cornwallis retreated from Williamsburg to James-Town, at which place happened a finart engagement between the British army and the American vanguard, commanded by general Wayne. General Wayne, having advanced with eight hundred men on mistaken information, that the troops opposed to him were only a detached corps, no fooner perceived his error, than he refolutely engaged with the whole British army, conceiving this to be the most eligible mode of extricating himself from his perilous situation. With this view he urged his attack with fuch confidence as impressed his enemy with the idea, that the party under his command was the advance of the American army, which was confequently approaching to fustain him. This bold manœuvre enabled him him to take advantage of the apprehensions it excited, to effect a dangerous retreat with little loss. His lordship soon after retired to Portsmouth, and the marquis de la Fayette chose this moment to give some rest to those troops that had so successfully defended the state from a greatly superior force.

AFTER a feries of manœuvres, which it is not necessary to relate, and in which the British general displayed the boldness of enterprize, and the young marquis the sound judgment of age, blended with the ardour of youth, the former fixed himself and his army in York-Town. The latter, under various pretences, sent the Pennsylvania troops to the south side of James River—collected a force in Gloucester county, and made fundry arrangements subservient to the grand design of the whole campaign.

Though all the movements in Virginia previous to this period were on the defensive, yet, during this time, a well-concerted scheme was carrying on for no less a purpose than the capture of the whole British force in that state. Notwithstanding this had been agreed upon for some time, and many preparatory steps subservient thereto had been taken, yet it had been effectually concealed. Every appearance in the grand American army, under general Washington, was calculated to cherish an opinion, that it was intended to make a vigorous conjunct attack on the British garrison in New-York. The French army was brought forwards from Rhode-Island to American head-quarters. The militia from New-England were called out. A fufficient number of flat-bottomed boats to transport at once five thousand men, were built near Albany, in a short time, by general Schuyler. These were brought down Hudson's river to the neighbourhood of the American army before New-York, though there was no intention of making use of them. Ovens were erected opposite to Staten-Island for the use of the French forces, and every movement made by general Washington which indicated his expectation of a fleet to co-operate with him in reducing the British army under the immediate command of fir Henry Clinton. These manœuvres had their intended operation. The whole attention of the British commanders was employed in fortifying New-York, and in preparing for a fiege. Part of the forces in Virginia was ordered to the defence of that city. While lord Cornwallis with his army in Virginia were in fancied fecurity, flattering themfelves with extensive conquests, general Washington, to the furprize of all who were not in the fecret, fuddenly left his station near New-York, and marched with the flower of his army through the intermediate states to York-Town in Virginia, where the forces under the command of lord Cornwallis were intrenched. The French troops, commanded by count de Rochambeau, at the fame time marched through the fame extent of territory. It feldom if ever happened before, that an army led through a foreign country, at fo confiderable a distance from their own, among a people of different principles, customs, language and religion, behaved with fo much regularity. To the honour of the officers and foldiers of the French army it must be acknowledged, that, in their different marches in the fpace of three years, through various parts of the United States, there never was a complaint brought against them by the citizens. The utmost harmony prevailed both between the allied armies, the troops of his most christian majesty and the inhabitants. Nations long accustomed to the freest social intercourse, could not have been on a more friendly footing than the French and Americans, though a few years before they had been in the habit of reviling, hating and fighting with each other.

General Washington had marched as far as Chester in Pennsylvania, before he received the welcome news of the arrival of the French sleet. Contrary winds had occasioned a delay of a few days longer than was at first agreed upon. On the thirtieth of August count de Grasse arrived in the Chesapeak with twenty-eight ships of the line, and on the next day he landed on the south side of James river three thousand two hundred men. These were commanded by the marquis de St. Simon, and were for the most part from the garrison in Hispaniola. They speedily formed a junction with the marquis de la Fayette. Great was the exultation of this illustrious French nobleman on finding himself reinforced by so many of his countrymen, and that there was so fair a prospect of extensive service to the cause in the support of which he had so zealously engaged.

ADMIRAL Greaves, reinforced by lord Hood, made an attempt, on September fifth, with twenty fail of the line, to relieve lord Cornwallis, but he was soon compelled to retire. Count de Barras, with eight fail of the line, failed from Newport on the twenty-fifth of August, and formed a junction with count de Grasse within the Chefapeak on the fourteenth of September. This was both difficult and dangerous. The British sleet was between the French fleet and the French fquadron. Count de Barras had only eight ships under his command, and the British had nearly three times that number; yet he had the extraordinary good fortune to pass them in the night, and effect a junction without any loss. This gave a decided superiority to the sleet of his most christian majesty.

ALL these movements of the combined forces of France and America were the result of a well-digested plan of operations. The French sleets in the West-Indies and in Rhode-Island, together with the French and American land-forces, not-withstanding the original distance of the parties, both from the scene of action and from each other, other, and the various accidents to which they were liable, coincided in their operations in an extraordinary manner far beyond the reach of military calculation. They all tended to one object, and at one and the fame time, and, what is still more surprizing, that object was neither known nor suspected by the British commanders till the proper season for counteraction was elapsed.

In important military operations the attention is fixed on the movements of armies or of fleets, and mankind never fail to do homage to the able general and the expert admiral. To this they are justly entitled; but as great a tribute is due to the profound statesinan, who, from a more elevated station, furveys and balances the whole fystem of a campaign, and the general safety and welfare of an empire. To foresee the movements of an enemy, and to direct the force of a state towards those points where defence is necesfary, and attacks may be made with advantage, requires the greatest exertions of human abilities. This glory in a particular manner belongs to the marquis de Castries, who at this time directed the marine of France. He had calculated with that precision, which is the distinguishing characteristick of great minds, the naval force which the British could concentre on the coast of the United States, and disposed his own in such a manner as enfured him a fuperiority. These difpositions were made on such principles, that the S fVol. II. French

French fleet, in the Chesapeak, would have been superior to the British without the junction of the squadron which had been stationed at Newport. This junction was nevertheless effected by count de Barras, though he was at liberty to undertake any other expedition. Notwithstanding he was an older officer than count de Grasse, he voluntarily chose to put himself under his command, to make sure of an object, the attainment of which was of such immense consequence to the allied arms of France and America.

LORD Cornwallis conceived himself bound by instructions from fir Henry Clinton, to defend the posts of York and Gloucester. In obedience to these orders, and in the expectation of fuccour from New-York, he prepared for a fiege, by intrenching his army on both fides of York river. The militia of the state of Virginia were called out to fervice, and were commanded by governor Nelson. The French and American troops marched forwards with fuch expedition, that, on the last day of September, they closely invested lord Cornwallis in York-Town; the French extending from the river above the town to a morafs in the centre, where they were met by the Americans who occupied the opposite side from the river to that spot. The post at Gloucefter Point was at the fame time invested by the duke de Lauzun with his legion, and a number of Virginia militia commanded by general Weedon; but the operations on that fide were little more than

than a warm skirmish, in which the duke de Lauzun compelled lieutenant-colonel Tarleton to retire.

THE trenches were opened by the combined armies on the night of the fixth of October, and their attacks were carried on with great vigour. The shells from the besiegers reached the ships in the harbour, and the Charon, of forty-four guns, with some of the transports, were burned. On the night of the eleventh of October they began their second parallel, at the distance of three hundred yards from the works of the besieged.

Lord Cornwallis was foon convinced, that the post which he occupied was incapable of resisting the force opposed to it; but, in the consident expectation of aid from New-York, he declined attempting a retreat, or hazarding an engagement in the open field. His hopes were farther confirmed by a letter from fir Henry Clinton, by which he was informed that relief would fail about the fifth of October. But it so happened, that the delays which necessarily occurred in equipping and resitting the sleets, destined for York-Town, made the fulfilment of this engagement impossible.

Two redoubts, which were advanced about three hundred yards on the left of the British, greatly impeded the progress of the combined armies.

armies. An attack on these was therefore refolved upon. To excite a spirit of emulation. the reduction of one was committed to the French-of the other to the Americans. The latter marched to the affault with unloaded arms. passed the abbatis and palifades, and, attacking on all fides, carried the redoubt in a few minutes. Lieutenant-colonel Laurens, on this occasion. personally took the commanding officer of the redoubt, but faved him from the fate which usually attends those who are taken by storm. Colonel Hamilton, who conducted this successful enterprize with fo much address and intrepidity, and who is no lefs diffinguished for literary than for military talents, in his report of the transaction to the marquis de la Fayette, mentioned, to the honour of his detachment, 'that, 'incapable of imitating examples of barbarity, and forgetting recent provocations, they spared every man that ceased to refist.'

THE French were equally successful on their side. They carried the redoubt committed to them with rapidity, but lost a considerable number of men. These two works, which had here-tofore embarrassed the operations of the besiegers by being included in the second parallel, were made subservient to their ulterior designs.

THE inferior numbers of the garrison made it improper for lord Cornwallis to risk any considerable force in the making of fallies, and the besiegers fiegers had proceeded with fo much regularity and caution, that nothing less than a strong attack could make any impression. On the morning of the fixteenth lieutenant-colonel Abercrombie was ordered to make a fortie, with about three hundred and fifty men. They fucceeded fo far as to force two advanced redoubts, and to spike eleven pieces of cannon, besides killing and wounding a confiderable number of the French troops. Though the officers and foldiers difplayed great bravery in this enterprize, yet their fuccess produced no effential advantage. The cannon, which had been hastily spiked, were foon again rendered fit for service. By this time the works of the befieged were fo far destroyed, that they could fcarcely shew a single gun.

LORD Cornwallis had now no choice left but either to prepare for a furrender, or to make his escape. He determined to attempt the latter, hoping that at least it might retard the fate of his army. Boats were prepared under different pretexts, but with the intention of receiving the troops at ten at night, in order to pass them over to Gloucester Point, from whence a passage to the open country was not altogether hopeless. In the execution of this defign the first embarkation had arrived at Gloucester Point, and a part of the troops were landed, when the weather, which was then moderate and calm, instantly changed to a most violent storm of wind and rain. The boats were all driven down the river, which which not only frustrated the original scheme, but made it impossible to bring back the boats from Gloucester. The royal army, thus weakened and divided, was exposed to increased danger till the next day, when the boats returned and the troops were brought back.

By this time the works of the besieged were fo broken, that they were affailable in many places, and the troops were exhausted by confrant watching and unceasing fatigue. The time in which relief from New-York was promifed had elapsed. Longer resistance could answer no purpose, and might occasion the loss of many valuable lives. Lord Cornwallis therefore, on the feventeenth, wrote a letter to general Washington, requesting a ceffation of arms for twentyfour hours, and that commissioners might be appointed for digesting terms of capitulation. It is remarkable, while lieutenant-colonel Laurens, the officer employed by general Washington on this occasion, was drawing up articles by which a numerous British army became prisoners, that his father was closely confined in the tower of London.

THE posts of York and Gloucester were surrendered on the nineteenth of October. The honour of marching out with colours slying, which had been denied to general Lincoln, on his giving up Charleston, was now resused to earl Cornwallis, and general Lincoln was appointed pointed to receive the submission of the royal army at York-Town precisely in the same way his own had been conducted about eighteen months before. The troops of every kind surrendered prisoners of war exceeded seven thousand men, but the effective men at that time was very little more than half that number. The officers and soldiers retained their baggage and effects, but all visible plundered property was liable to be reclaimed.

LORD Cornwallis endeavoured to obtain permission for the British and German troops to return to their respective countries, under engagements not to serve against France or America; and also an indemnity for those of the inhabitants who had joined him; but he was obliged to consent, that the former should be retained in the governments of Virginia, Pennsylvania and Maryland; and that the latter, whose case lay with the civil authority of the states, should be given up to the unconditional mercy of their countrymen. His lordship, nevertheless, obtained permission for the Bonetta sloop of war to pass unexamined, which gave an opportunity of screening those of the royalists who were most obnoxious to the resentment of the Americans.

The land-forces became prisoners to Congress, but the seamen and ships were assigned to the French admiral. ww

THE British sleet and army, destined for the relief of lord Cornwallis, arrived off the Chefapeak on the twenty-fourth of October; but, on receiving authentick accounts of his surrender, they returned to Sandy-Hook and New-York.

Such was the fate of that general from whose fuccesses in the years 1780 and 1781 the complete and speedy conquest of the southern states had been so confidently expected. No event, during the war, bid fo fair for ruining the independence of America as his complete victory at Camden; but so it happened, that his lordship by that action, and its confequences, became the occasion of rendering that a revolution, which, from his previous fuccefs, was in danger of terminating in a rebellion. The lofs of this army may be confidered as the clofing fcene of the continental war in North-America. From that time forward a new policy influenced the British cabinet, and every thing tended to peace and an acknowledgment of the independence of the states. The re-establishment of British government had been in vain attempted in the north, in the fouth, and in the middle states. The feventh campaign terminated with the furrender of all the British force in Virginia, and the confinement of their army in Carolina to the vicinity of Charleston.

CONGRESS honoured general Washington, count de Rochambeau, count de Grasse, and the officers officers of the different corps, and the men under their command, with their thanks for their fervices in the reduction of lord Cornwallis. They also resolved to erect in York-Town a marble column, adorned with emblems of the alliance between the United States and his most christian Majesty. **

The very important fervices rendered by the engineers and artillery-officers, in this interesting siege, attracted the particular notice of Congress. In the former line brigadier-general Du-Portail was advanced to the rank of major-general. Lieutenant-colonel Gouvion received a brevet of a colonel, and captain Rochesontaine the brevet of a major. In the line of artillery-officers brigadier-general Knox was promoted to the rank of major-general. The circumstances of these promotions were as honourable as the services of these officers had been beneficial.

THE army, under the command of lord Cornwallis, had spread waste and ruin over the face of all the country for four hundred miles on the sea-coast, and for two hundred miles to the westward. Their numbers enabled them to go where they pleased, and their rage for plunder disposed them to take whatever they esteemed most valuable. Their progress was marked with rapine, and they had involved thousands in distress. The reduction of such a commander, and of such an Vol. II.

army, occasioned transports of joy in the breast of every American. The churches resounded with devout acknowledgments to the God of battles. Festivity crowned the social board, while, in grateful commemoration of these signal services, the sparkling wine was freely poured out in ardent wishes for the health and happiness of the illustrious defenders of the rights of human nature. Legislative bodies, executive councils, city corporations, and many private societies, presented congratulatory addresses to general Washington, accompanied with the warmest acknowledgments to count de Rochambeau, count de Grasse, and the other officers in the service of his most christian majesty.

Whilst earl Cornwallis commanded in the fouthern department, he had, in many inflances, violated the capitulation of Charleston. This was considered by many as a sufficient reason to deprive him of some of the benefits to which he was entitled by the capitulation of York-Town. It was therefore moved in Congress by the honourable Arthur Middleton, a delegate from the State of South-Carolina, that, 'in order to pre'vent future controversy upon the subject of exchange, Congress, who represent the feelings as well as the sense of the union, do declare, that lieutenant-general Charles earl Cornwallis ought not to be exchanged by composition, not from any apprehensions of his influence or superior abilities, but because they look upon him

onot in the light of a British general, but a barbarian. In proof of their justice for classing ' him in fo degrading a predicament, they appeal to the impartial history of his conduct during his command in the fouthern and middle states, where his progress may be traced by blood wantonly spilt, by executions unwarranted even by military regulations, and by the indifcrimi-'nate plunder of the property and destruction of the habitations of the widow and the or-6 phan, circumstances difgraceful to the arms of ' any enlightened people, because he has governed himself solely upon the principles of eastern tyranny-has broken the faith of treaty fo-' lemnly pledged in the capitulation of Charleston, by ordering the feizure of the property and e persons of the capitulants, by the confinement of fome on board of prison-ships, the transoportation of others to St. Augustine, and the banishment of their wives and children-because he has authorized and countenanced the enlistment of upwards of five hundred American foldiers into the British service, or rather fuffered them to be compelled by cruelties and hard usage to take arms against their country, and in numberless other instances has infringed every rule of war established among civilized ' nations.' But as his lordship had furrendered by capitulation, a fense of national honour, and delicacy with respect to general Washington, weighed with the fupreme council of the states to refuse their affent to this proposition.

THE fuccesses that had attended the American arms in South-Carolina, in the fummer of 1781, and the arrival of count de Grasse in the Chesapeak, gave fuch flattering prospects to the friends of independence, that it was judged to be a favourable opportunity to detach from the British interest in South-Carolina those of the inhabitants of the state who had joined them in the day of their fuccess. On the twenty-seventh of September 1781, governor Rutledge, therefore, issued a proclamation, offering them pardon on condition of their doing fix months militia duty, with the exception of those who had taken commissions-figned congratulatory addresses on British victories-or who had been otherwife active in support of their government. zz In a few weeks feveral hundreds came out of the British lines, and greatly reinforced the American militia. Several were now as affiduous in framing excuses for their having arranged themselves under the British standard, as they had been the year before to apologize for their involuntary support of rebellion. 'Their wives, their children and their property, made it necessary to make a hew of fubmission to the conquerors—They thought the country was subdued, and that farther refistance was vain-but, notwithstanding, at all times they wished well to American indee pendence.' Such was the alacrity with which they joined their countrymen, that feveral, though excepted by the proclamation, cast themselves on the the publick mercy. They explained their taking British commissions into a benevolent design, of rescuing their neighbours from more severe officers. For their signing addresses of congratulation on British victories, many apologies were offered. Some alleged in their behalf 'the fear of losing their estates—of being resused protection, or of being objects of suspicion.' Others had never read them; but they all agreed, 'that the sentiments contained in these ill-sated addresses, were at no time the language of their hearts.'

THE tranquillity that reigned through every part of the state gave an opportunity of calling an affembly, the meetings of which had been interrupted ever fince the reduction of Charleston. Many of the inhabitants who had never fubmitted to the British, and who had been lately delivered as exchanged in Virginia and Philadelphia, foon found their way back to South-Carolina. In their number were most of the late civil officers of the state, and members of the legislature. These favourable circumstances, in conjunction with the position of the American army within thirty-fix miles of Charleston, pointed out the propriety of convening a legislature. In the close of the year 1781, governor Rutledge, by virtue of the extraordinary power delegated to him before the furrender of Charleston, issued writs for a new election. These were ordered to be held in the usual places where it was practicable, and and in other cases as near as safety and other circumstances would permit. By the same authority it was ordered, that at the election the votes of fuch only should be received as had never taken British protection, or who having taken it, had notwithstanding re-joined their countrymen on or before the twenty-seventh of September 1781. Other persons, though residents, were not confidered as freemen of the state, or entitled to the full privilege of citizen'ship. A general assembly was chosen, and convened in January 1782 at Jacksonborough, a fmall village fituate on Edisto river, about twenty-five miles from the fea and thirty-five from Charleston. The legislative bodies, foon after their meeting, were addressed by governor Rutledge with the following speech:

efquire, governor and commander in chief of

the eighteenth day of January, 1782.

'Honourable gentlemen of the senate,

'Mr. speaker, and gentlemen of the house of representatives,

'SINCE the last meeting of a general assembly, the good people of this state have not only felt the common calamities of war, but, from the wanton and favage manner in which it has been profecuted, they have experienced fuch feverities as

'are unpractifed, and will fearcely be credited by 'civilized nations.

THE enemy, unable to make any impression on the northern states, the number of whose inhabitants, and the strength of whose country, ' had baffled their repeated efforts, turned their views towards the fouthern, which, a difference of circumstances, afforded some expectation of conquering, or at least of greatly distressing. After a long refistance, the reduction of Charleston was effected, by the vast superiority of force with which it had been besieged. The loss of that garrison, as it consisted of the continental troops of Virginia and the Carolinas, and of a 'number of militia, facilitated the enemy's march into the country, and their establishment of ftrong posts in the upper and interior parts of it; and the unfavourable iffue of the action ' near Camden induced them vainly to imagine, that no other army could be collected which they might not easily defeat. The militia, come manded by the brigadiers Sumpter and Marion, whose enterprising spirit and unremitted perseverance under many difficulties are deferving of great applause, haraffed and often defeated ' large parties; but the numbers of those militia were too few to contend effectually with the collected strength of the enemy. Regardless 'therefore of the facred ties of honour, destitute of the feelings of humanity, and deter-' mined to extinguish, if possible, every spark of freedom freedom in this country, they, with the infoelent pride of conquerors, gave unbounded scope to the exercise of their tyrannical disposition, 'infringed their publick engagements, and vio-' lated the most folemn capitulations. Many of our worthiest citizens were, without cause, long and closely confined-fome on board of ' prison-ships, and others in the town and castle of St. Augustine-their properties disposed of at the will and caprice of the enemy, and their families fent to a different and distant part of the continent without the means of support. 'Many who had furrendered as prisoners of war were killed in cold blood-feveral fuffered death in the most ignominious manner, and others were delivered up to favages, and put to tortures under which they expired. Thus the 'lives, liberties and properties of the people were dependent folely on the pleasure of British 6 officers, who deprived them of either or all on the most frivolous pretences. Indians, slaves, and a desperate banditti of the most profligate characters, were careffed and employed by the enemy to execute their infamous purposes. vastation and ruin marked their progress and that of their adherents-nor were their vio-· lences restrained by the charms or influence of beauty and innocence-even the fair fex, whom it is the duty of all, and the pleasure and pride of the brave, to protect—they, and their tender offspring, were victims to the inveterate malice of an unrelenting foe. Neither the tears of mothers, nor the cries of infants, could excite in their breasts pity or compassion. Not only the e peaceful habitations of the widow, the aged and the infirm, but the holy temples of the ' Most High were confumed in flames, kindled by their facrilegious hands. They have tarnished the glory of the British arms, disgraced the profession of a British soldier, and fixed indelible fligmas of rapine, cruelty, perfidy and profaneness, on the British name-But I can now congratulate you, and I do fo most cordially, on the pleasing change of affairs which, under the bleffing of God; the wifdom, prudence, address and bravery of the great and gallant gee neral Greene, and the intrepidity of the officers and men under his command, has been happily effected—a general who is justly entitled, from his many fignal fervices, to honourable and fin-⁶ gular marks of your approbation and gratitude. 'His fuccesses have been more rapid and come plete than the most fanguine could have exe pected. The enemy, compelled to furrender or evacuate every post which they held in the country, frequently defeated and driven from place to place, are obliged to feek refuge under the walls of Charleston, and on islands in its 'vicinity. We have now the full and abfolute opossession of every other part of the state; and the legislative, executive and judicial powers, are in the free exercise of their respective authorities.

Vol. II. U u 'I

· I ALSO most heartily congratulate you on the 'glorious victory obtained by the combined 'forces of America and France over their com-' mon enemy. When the very general who was ' fecond in command at the reduction of Charlef-' ton, and to whose boasted prowess and highly extolled abilities the conquest of no less than three states had been arrogantly committed, was speedily compelled to accept of the same ' mortifying terms which had been imposed on ' that brave but unfortunate garrison, to surren-' der an army of many thousand regulars, and to abandon his wretched followers, whom he had artfully feduced from their allegiance by fpecious promifes of protection, which he could e never have hoped to fulfil, to the justice or ' mercy of their country-On the naval superiority established by the illustrious ally of the 'United States—a superiority in itself so decided, and in its confequences fo extensive, as must ' inevitably foon oblige the enemy to yield to us the only post which they occupy in this state-On the reiterated proofs of the fincerest friendfhip, and on the great fupport which America has received from that powerful monarch—a ' monarch whose magnanimity is univerfally acknowledged and admired, and on whose royal word we may confidently rely for every neces-' fary affiftance-On the perfect harmony which 6 fubfists between France and America-On the 6 stability which her independence has acquired and on the certainty that it is too deeply rooted ever to be shaken; for, animated as they are by national honour, and united by one common interest, it must and will be maintained.

WHAT may be the immediate effects on the British nation, of the events which I have ementioned; of their loss of territory in other parts of the world; and of their well-founded apprehensions from the powers of France, Spain and Holland, it is impossible to foretel. If exe perience can teach wisdom to a haughty and infatuated people, and if they will now be governed by reason, they will have learned that they can have no folid ground of hope to conquer any state in the union; for, though their armies have obtained temporary advantages over our troops, yet the citizens of these states, firmly refolved as they are never to return to 'a domination which, near fix years ago, they ' unanimously and justly renounced, cannot be 'fubdued-and they must now be convinced that it is the height of folly and madness to e perfift in fo ruinous a war. If, however, we iudge as we ought of their future by their past conduct, we may prefume that they will not only endeavour to keep possession of our capital, but make another attempt, howfoever improbable the fuccess of it may appear, to subjugate this country—It is therefore highly incumbent on us to use our most strenuous efforts to frustrate fo fatal a defign. And I earnestly conjure 'you by the duty which you owe, and the facred 6 love

'love which you bear, to your country; by the 'constant remembrance of her bitter sufferings; 'and by the just detestation of British government, which you and your posterity must forever posses, to exert your utmost faculties for that purpose, by raising and equipping, with all possible expedition, a respectable permanent force, and by making ample provision for their 'comfortable subsistence. I am sensible the expence will be great, but a measure so indispensible to the preservation of our freedom, is 'above every pecuniary consideration.

'THE organization of our militia is likewife 'a subject of infinite importance. A clear and concife law, by which the burdens of fervice ' will be equally fustained, and a competent ' number of men brought forth and kept in the ' field when their affistance may be required, is effential to our fecurity, and therefore justly claims your immediate and ferious attention. 'Certain it is, that some of our militia have, 'upon feveral occasions, exhibited instances of ' valour which would have reflected honour on veteran troops. The courage and conduct of ' the generals whom I have mentioned, the cool and determined bravery repeatedly displayed by brigadier Pickens, and indeed the behaviour of e many officers and men in every brigade, are unquestionable testimonies of the truth of this affertion; but fuch behaviour cannot be ex-6 pected from militia in general, without good 6 order order and strict discipline—nor can that order and discipline be established but by a salutary law steadily executed.

· Another important matter for your deliberation, is the conduct of fuch of our citizens 'as voluntarily avowing their allegiance, and even glorying in their professions of loyalty and attachment to his Britannick majesty, have of-' fered their congratulations on the fuccess of his arms, prayed to be embodied as royal militia, ' accepted commissions in his service, and endea-' voured to subvert our constitution and establish his power in its stead-of those who have re-'turned to this state in defiance of a law by ' which fuch return was declared to be a capital offence, and have abetted the British interestand of fuch whose behaviour has been so reprehenfible, that justice and policy forbid their free re-admission to the rights and privileges of citizens.

'The extraordinary lenity of this state has been remarkably conspicuous; other states have thought it just and expedient to appropriate the property of British subjects to the publick use, but we have forborne to take even the profits of the estates of our most implacable enemies. It is with you to determine whether the forfeiture and appropriation of their property should now take place. If such shall be your determination, though many of our firmest friends friends have been reduced, for their inflexible attachment to the cause of their country, from opulence to inconceivable distress, and, if the enemy's will and power had prevailed, would have been doomed to indigence and beggary, yet it will redound to the reputation of this state to provide a becoming support for the families of those whom you may deprive of their property.

'THE value of paper currency became of late 'fo much depreciated, that it was requifite, under 'the powers vested in the executive during the 'recess of the general assembly, to suspend the 'laws by which it was made a tender. You will 'now consider whether it may not be proper to 'repeal those laws, and fix some equitable mode
'for the discharge of debts contracted whilst
'paper money was in circulation.

'In the prefent scarcity of specie it would be difficult, if not impracticable, to levy a tax to any considerable amount towards sinking the publick debt; nor will the creditors of the state expect that such a tax should, at this time, be imposed; but it is just and reasonable, that all unsettled demands should be liquidated, and fatisfactory assurances of payment given to the publick creditors.

'THE interest and honour, the safety and hap'piness of our country, depend so much on the 'result

refult of your deliberations, that I flatter myself you will proceed, in the weighty business before you, with firmness and temper, with vigour, unanimity and dispatch.

'JOHN RUTLEDGE.'

To this speech the following addresses were returned by the two branches of legislature.

- 'The ADDRESS of the honourable the SENATE in answer to the governor's speech.
 - ' May it please your excellency,
- WE beg leave to return your excellency the thanks of this house for your speech.
- 'ANY words that we might adopt would con'vey but a very faint idea of the fatisfaction we 'feel on the perfect re-establishment of the legis'lative, executive and judicial powers in this 'state.
- 'IT is with particular pleasure, that we take the earliest opportunity to present to your excellency our unfeigned thanks for your unwea-
- fried zeal and attention to the real interest of
- this country, and to testify our entire approba-
- tion of the good conduct of the executive fince
- the last meeting of the general assembly.
- WE fee and revere the goodness of Divine Providence in frustrating and disappointing the attempts

* attempts of our enemies to conquer the fouth-* ern states; and we trust, that, by the blessing of * the same Providence, on the valour and intre-* pidity of the free citizens of America, their * attacks and enterprizes will continue to be re-* pelled and defeated.

'WE reflect with pleasure on the steady resolution with which Charleston was defended by a small body of brave men against such a vast fuperiority of force, and we gratefully acknowledge the meritorious conduct and important fervices of the officers and privates of the militia, who stood forth in the hour of danger, and whose coolness, perseverance and ardour, under a complication of difficulties, most justly entitle them to the applause of their country.

WE flatter ourselves that the blood which the enemy has inhumanly spilled, the wanton devaflation which has marked their progress, and the tyrannical system that they have invariably purfued, and which your excellency hath so justly and pathetically described to us, will rouse the good people of this state, and will animate them with a spirit to protect their country, to fave their rights and liberties, and to maintain, at all hazards, their independency.

'IT is with inexpressible pleasure, that we receive your excellency's congratulations upon the great and glorious events of the campaign, on the happy change of affairs, and on the pleafing prospect before us; and we assure your excellency, that we concur most sincerely with you, in acknowledging and applauding the metitorious zeal, and the very important services which have been rendered to this state by the great and gallant general Greene, and the brave and intrepid officers and men under his command, and to whom we shall be happy to give the most honourable and singular testimonies of our approbation and applause.

'WE are truly fensible of the immense advantage which the United States derive from the magnanimous prince their ally: we have the most perfect considence on his royal word, and on the sincerity of his friendship; and we think ourselves much indebted to that illustrious monarch for the great and effectual assistance which he hath been pleased to give the consederated states, and by whose means they have been enabled to humble the pride of Britain, and to establish their independency upon the most permanent basis.

'The importance of the feveral matters which your excellency hath recommended to our confideration is so evident, that we shall proceed to deliberate upon them with all possible dispatch; and we flatter ourselves that our business will

'will be carried on with temper, firmness and unanimity.

' J. L. GERVAIS, president.'

'The ADDRESS of the House of REPRESENTA'TIVES in answer to the governor's speech.

WE, the house of representatives of the state of South-Carolina, in general assembly met, return your excellency our most cordial thanks for your very interesting speech to both houses at the opening of this session, the language of which evidently bespeaks a heart glowing with ardent zeal for the interest and welfare of our common country.

We want words to express our heart-felt exultation on the pleasing reverse in our affairs.
On this spot, but a few months past, a military despotism prevailed, and tyranny, with lawless violence, was desolating our fair possessions; but we now, with extacy, behold a free government re-established, liberty, that greatest of temporal blessings, restored, and every citizen secured in the possession of his property by the sirm barrier of the law of his country.
This auspicious change is in a great degree owing to the prudence, firmness and good conduct of your excellency.

'IF any thing can add to the fublime and refined enjoyment, which must arise from your excellency's own reslections on your persevering, ing, unabated and fuccessful exertions towards rescuing your country from the iron hand of oppression, be pleased, fir, to accept the most fincere and unseigned thanks of your grateful fellow-citizens.

'THE black catalogue which your excellency has given of British barbarities, forms but a fmall part of the whole. Whenever the hifto-'rick page shall be stained with their story, it ' will exhibit a nation devoid of faith; with whom oaths, treaties, and the most folemn compacts were confidered as trifles; who, without scruple or remorfe, had abandoned all regard to humanity, honour, justice and every ennobling fentiment of the human breast. It 'is hardly poslible to conceive any circumstance that could aggravate the atrocious wickedness of their conduct. There is not left a step in the degradation of national character to which they can now descend. The name of a Briton must henceforward be a term of reproach among all nations.

WE should betray a great degree of insensibility, and be wanting in justice to his merit, should we omit this occasion of acknowledging, with the warmest gratitude, our obligations to the great and gallant general Greene. His atchievements in this state, while they rank him with the greatest commanders of ancient or modern date, will engrave his name in indelible characters on the heart of every friend to this country. Our acknowledgments are also due to all the brave officers and men under his ' command, who have fo often fought, bled and conquered for us. The generals Sumpter, Marion and Pickens, with the brave militia under 'their commands, those virtuous citizens who 6 did not despair of the commonwealth in her ' greatest extremity, are deserving of the highest commendation. The friendly, feafonable and effectual aid, recently afforded us by our great and illustrious ally, by means of which the ge-' neral, on whom the British nation seemed most ' to have placed their dependence, has been com-' pelled to furrender the flower of the British ' army to our immortal commander in chief, must ' greatly increase the flame of gratitude which ' had been before kindled in the breast of every American, and which it will not be in the power of time or accident to extinguish. We perfectly concur in fentiment with your excellency, that, from our connexion with this power-'ful and wife monarch, we may expect, with well-grounded confidence, that our independence will be shortly established upon an immovable basis, nor need we harbour a single fear of its diffolution.

^{&#}x27;An union which originated from fuch liberal and generous motives, and which is founded on mutual interest, that best cement of nations, must and will continue. Whether the series of losses, closses, disasters and defeats of the year past, ' will at length recover Britain from her deliri-'um, time only can disclose; but as misfortune hitherto, instead of producing reflection and prudence, has operated to increase her infanity, we agree in opinion with your excellency, that it is probable she will not only endeavour to ' keep possession of our capital, but make another 'attempt to subjugate the country—we shall therefore immediately enter upon the profecution of the measures recommended by your excellency, 'as necessary for its fafety; and being fully fen-'fible how much depends upon the refult of our deliberations, we will endeavour to proceed ' in the weighty business with firmness and tem-' per, with vigour, unanimity and dispatch.

' By order of the house,

By the rotation established, it became necessary to choose a new governor. The suffrages of a majority were in the first instance in favour of the honourable Christopher Gadsden, esquire, who declined the office in a short speech to the following essect: I have served you in a variety of stations for thirty years, and I would now cheerfully make one of a forlorn hope in an assault on the lines of Charleston, if it was probable that, with the certain loss of my life, you would be re-instated in the possession of your capital. What I can do for my country I am willing to do. My sentiments of the American cause cause from the stamp-act downwards have never changed. I am still of opinion that it is the cause of liberty and of human nature. If my acceptance of the office of governor would ferve my country, though my administration would be attended with the loss of personal credit and reputation, I would cheerfully undertake it. The present times require the vigour and activity of the prime of life; but I ' feel the increasing infirmities of old age to such 'a degree, that I am conscious I cannot serve you 'to advantage. I therefore beg for your fakes, ' and for the fake of the publick, that you would 'indulge me with the liberty of declining the 'arduous trust.' He was indulged in his request; but, though he declined the laborious office of governor, he continued to ferve both in the affembly and council, where, notwithstanding the long confinement he had fuffered in the callle of St. Augustine, in violation of the capitulation of Charleston, and the immense loss of his property, he opposed the law, which was brought in on this occasion, for confiscating the estates of the adherents to the British government, and zealously contended that found policy required to forget and forgive.

THE general affembly elected the honourable John Mathews governor, filled up vacancies in the different departments, and re-established civil government in all its branches. They also delegated to the governor or commander in chief the fame extensive powers, with fimilar limitation, which had been entrusted to his predecessor- Of doing all matters and things which were judged expedient and necessary to secure the liberty, ' fafety and happiness of the state.' Hitherto the legislature of the state had given every man the free liberty of choosing his side, and retaining his property; but the conduct of the British, while they had the ascendency in the state, was fo contrary to this humane mode of carrying on war, that on this occasion an opposite line of policy was adopted.

Laws were passed for confiscating the estates, and banishing the persons of the active decided friends of British government, and for amercing the estates of others, as a substitution for their personal services, of which their country had been deprived. Two hundred and thirty-feven persons or estates were included in the first class, and forty-eight in the last. Those whose submisfion appeared to be necessary and unavoidable, and who did not voluntarily aid or abet the government of the conquerors, were generally overlooked. The reasons that induced the assembly to adopt the measure of confiscation are stated by themselves in the preamble to the act which is in the following words: 'Whereas the thirteen British colonies, now the United States of America, were, by an act of the parliament of Great-

' feven hundred and feventy-five, declared to be in rebellion, and out of the protection of the ' British crown; and by the said act not only the ' property of the colonists was declared subject to ' feizure and condemnation, but divers feizures and destruction of their property having been ' made after the nineteenth day of April, anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and se-' venty-five; and before the passing of the said 'act, such seizures and destruction were by the ' faid act declared to be lawful: and whereas the ' good people of these states having not only suffered great losses and damages by captures of ' their property on the sea by the subjects of his Britannick majesty, but by their seizing and carrying off much property taken on the land: ' in consequence of such proceedings of the Bri-' tish crown, and those acting under its authority, the honourable Congress of the United States, after due and mature confideration, authorized the feizing and condemnation of all property found on the fea, and belonging to the fubjects of Great-Britain, and recommended to the fee veral states in which such subjects had property, to confifcate the fame for the publick use; all ' political connexion between Great-Britain and ' the United States having been diffolved by the ' feparation of these states from that kingdom, and their declaring themselves free and inde-' pendent of her: in pursuance of which recomemendation most, if not all, have disposed of fuch property for the publick use. And whereas, 6 notwithstanding onotwithstanding this state has forborne even to sequester the profits arising from the estates of British subjects, the enemy, in violation of the most solemn capitulations and publick engagements, by which the property of individuals was secured to them, seized upon, sequestered and applied to their own use, not only in several instances, the profits of the estates, but in other instances the estates themselves of the good citizens of this state, and have committed the most wanton and wilful waste of property both real and personal, to a very considerable amount.

'AND whereas, from a proclamation of fir Henry Clinton, declaring, that if any person 6 should appear in arms in order to prevent the establishment of his Britannick majesty's goe vernment in this country, fuch perfons should be treated with the utmost severity, and their estates be immediately seized in order to be con-'fiscated: and whereas, from a letter of lord 6 Rawdon to lieutenant-colonel Rugely, declaring, that every militiaman who did not use his utmost endeavours to apprehend deserters, should be ' punished in fuch manner as his lordship should think adequate to fuch offence, by whipping, 'imprisonment, or being sent to serve his Britan-'nick majetty in the West-Indies. From earl 'Cornwallis's letter to lieutenant-colonel Cruger, bearing date the eighteenth of August, one 'thousand seven hundred and eighty, declaring Vol. II. $\mathbf{X} \mathbf{x}$ that

' that he had given orders that all the inhabitants who had fubmitted, and who had taken part ' with their countrymen in the first action near ' Camden, although fuch fubmission was an act of force or necessity, should be punished with ' the greatest rigour—that they should be imprifoned, and their whole property taken from them or destroyed—and that he had ordered, in the most positive manner, that every militiaman who had borne arms on the part of his Britannick majesty, and who had afterwards ' joined his fellow-citizens, although he had been compelled to take up arms against them, should be immediately hanged; and ordering the faid ' lieutenant-colonel Cruger to obey these directions in the district in which he commanded, in the strictest manner. And, from the general tenor of the enemy's conduct in their wilful and wanton waste and destruction of property as aforesaid, committing to a cruel imprisonment, and even hanging, and otherwise putting to death in cold blood and an ignominious manner, many good citizens who had furrendered as prisoners of war, it is evident that it was the fixed determination of the enemy, onotwithstanding their professions to the contraery, to treat this state as a conquered country; and that the inhabitants were to expect the utmost severities, and to hold their lives, liberties and properties, folely at the will of his Britannick majesty's officers.

AND it is therefore inconsistent with publick justice and policy to afford protection any longer to the property of British subjects, and just and reasonable to apply the same towards alleviating and lessening the burdens and expences of the war, which must otherwise fall very heavy on the distressed inhabitants of this state; Be it therefore enacted.

THE execution of these laws, so derogatory to the many bold promises of the British commanders for the security and protection of the property of their adherents, induced general Leslie, who at that time commanded the royal forces in Carolina, to concert measures for their indemnistration. To this end he fent a party to seize the negroes and other effects belonging to the whig-citizens, with the avowed intention of applying it to the relief of the sufferers by the consistation law. After a successful excursion of this kind, he wrote the following letter to general Greene:

'IT was with deep concern I viewed, in the proceedings of your last assembly, acts for amercing the property of some persons, and consistating that of others, whose principles had attached them to the cause of their sovereign. Yet, alarming as the publick resolutions appeared, I was in hopes humanity, as well as policy, would

' would have arrested their execution, and that I should not have been compelled to take mea-' fures for their counteraction, injurious to the country, and therefore painful to me. But when these hopes were disappointed, and I found the effects of the loyal and well-affected removed from their estates, and carried to parts far distant from them, I could no longer remain 'the quiet spectator of their distresses; but, in ' order to induce a juster line of conduct, I have 'employed a part of the force entrusted to my 'charge for their protection, in feizing the ne-' groes of your friends, that restitution may be 'thereby made to fuch of ours as may fuffer under these oppressive and ruinous resolutions. 'This, fir, was the object of the late excursion ' towards Santee, and these principles will greatly ' mark the future operations of this army, unless 'a relinquishment of this assumed right on your ' part should justify less destructive measures on mine.

'To point out to you, or the world, the dif-'tinction between temporary fequestration and 'actual confiscation would be impertinent; but 'it will by no means be so to observe on the op-'posite conduct pursued by each party in carry-'ing into execution these very different measures; 'for whilst you have endeavoured to involve, in 'perpetual ruin, the persons and estates of those 'who have differed from you in political sentiments, I can safely appeal even to those whose 'violent 'violent opposition to the King's government compelled the with-holding from them for a time their possessions in this province, for the great attention which has been invariably paid to their property—the connected state in which it has been preserved—and the liberal allowances that were made to their families, insomuch that, while other estates were running to waste by the distractions of the country, these have greatly thriven at the expence of government.

'Thus far I have deemed it necessary to urge the motives of humanity, policy and example, for your suspension of such rigorous procedures; and should you think a meeting of commissioners on each fide might tend to leffen the devaltations of war, and secure inviolate the pro-'perty of individuals, I shall have a peculiar happiness in embracing proposals that may accomplish such benevolent purposes; but if, notwithstanding this earnest representation, you 6 should still persevere in executing these acts of 'your affembly, I trust this letter will hold me ' justifiable to the world for any measures which enecessity may adopt in counteraction of steps unjust in their principles and personally distress-'ful in their consequences; and that, whilst I only endeavour to fecure to those, who with respectable steadiness have attached themselves to our cause, the full possession of their effects, or, in case of losses, to provide an equitable reflitution

flitution for them, I shall be clearly exculpated from all the horrors and calamities which the

' road you now point out unavoidably leads to.

'I have the honour to be, ' your most obedient and most humble servant, (Signed) 'ALEX. LESLIE.

'To major-general Greene.'

To this letter general Greene returned an immediate answer, 'that he had the honour to command the forces of the United States in 'the fouthern department; but had nothing to 'do with the internal police of any state.' On which lieutenant-general Leslie addressed himself to governor Mathews, and enclosed the letter which had been addressed to general Greene, to which governor Mathews gave the following answer:

· April 12, 1782.

SIR.

'I HAD the honour of receiving your letter of the eighth instant, enclosing one from you to e major-general Greene of the fourth, and his answer to you of the same date.

'THE manner in which you refer to your letter to general Greene, obliges me to view that letter as now addressed to me. I must therefore beg e leave to observe upon it, previous to answering the one immediately addressed to me.

'Your remaining fo flort a time in this state, after the furrender of Charleston, and not returning to it till most of the sequestered estates · had been rescued from the hands of your seques-'trator, has put it out of your power to speak of 6 the management of them in this country from 'your own knowledge, confequently what has been faid by you on that subject must have been from information. The character of general Leslie has always been represented to me in fo favourable a light, that candour forbids me to entertain the most distant idea of his having 'intentionally represented matters so contrary to fact, to answer even the greatest political purposes; but it is evident that he has been most egrofsly imposed on by men in whom he had confided, and that they have betrayed him into an affertion which must injure his feelings whenever he is possessed of a true state of the ma-'nagement of those estates that were put under · fequestration by order of lord Cornwallis.

'I would not, fir, give an hasty answer to your observations on this subject, and thought myself well justified in deviating from the rule of politeness in delaying an answer, that I might have an opportunity of investigating truth. I have taken much pains in my enquiries, the result of which has been the most indubitable proofs, that so far from these sequestered estates having had the greatest attention paid to them —being preserved in a connected state—and greatly

"greatly thriven," most of them, while under the management of your sequestrator, have been very greatly injured; many have been nearly ruined, and others altogether so. What expense the British government has incurred on their account I know not, but, I can with considence affert, the sequestered estates have been very little benesited thereby.

'I WILL now appeal to a fact within your own knowledge. You know that great numbers of the negroes, belonging to these estates, are now within your lines, and lost to their owners. And on sew plantations is a four-sooted animal to be found. How then do you prove that the estates have been preserved in a connected state, when one half of some, two thirds of others, and the whole of a sew of the estates have been deprived of the negroes and stock that were upon them when put under sequestration? How do you prove that these estates have greatly thriven; and that the greatest attention has been paid to them?

As to the liberal allowance made to the families of those persons whose estates were sequestered: this sir, I must be gleave to say you have been as greatly deceived in, as the other parts of your information. So far from the wives and children having been allowed the stipulated sums out of their husbands' and sathers' estates, the truth is, that after much entreaty entreaty, and in many instances very unbecoming treatment, some have obtained trisling sums compared with what they were entitled to, while there have been altogether denied.

On this ground of investigation I am ready to meet you, sir, whenever you think proper, when I will undertake to produce to you the proofs for every thing I have here advanced.

' Your observation on the opposite conduct of each party in carrying into execution the meafures of fequestration and confiscation, so far from being founded in fact, evidently shew the uniform deception into which you have been led. In the common acceptation of the word, it is true, sequestration means no more than a temporary privation of property; but your fequeftrator general, and most of his officers, have construed this word into a very different meaning; and, regardless of the articles of capitula-' tion of Charleston, as well as of the most sacred contracts contained in marriage-settlements, eve-'ry species of property, negroes, plate, house-'hold furniture, horses, carriages, cattle, &c. ' have been indifcriminately torn from their owners by perfons now under your immediate com-6 mand, and have been either fent beyond feas, for the benefit of those who had taken-I had 'almost said plundered them, or now remain within your lines, and in either case lost to their owners.

VOL. II.

'Now, fir, let us for a moment view the conduct of the legislature of this state in their late ' fession. The most facred regard has been paid by them to private contracts, neither marriage-' fettlements nor the faith of individuals have been violated, but left to their full operation. A provision also was made for the families of those whose estates have been confiscated. And ' although the property of British subjects within this state has been confiscated, yet the debts due to them from the citizens of this state have been left untouched. And be affured, fir, whilst I have the honour of holding the rank I now do, it shall be my particular business to fee that this, as well as every other law of the flate, is executed with lenity, fidelity and integrity.

AFTER these observations permit me, sir, to draw your serious attention to a candid and impartial view of the conduct of each party on the operation of your sequestration and our confiscation acts, when I leave you at liberty and at leisure to judge, whether you find any difference between them, and if you do, whether consistation on our part is likely to be productive of more ruinous consequences to those who are affected by it, than sequestration on your part has been to those unfortunate citizens of this state who have selt its effects.

As to the assumption of a right on the part of the state, to treat its citizens according to their demerits, I must beg leave to observe such language is only calculated to irritate, and by no means to accomplish the ends you aim at. And, sir, if you conceive ours to be no more than an assumed right, I have every reason to suppose that no convention that can be entered into in the negotiation that you propose can be looked upon by you as binding, after it has been in the most solemn manner concluded. And, did I not suppose the expression had inadvertently escaped you, I should rest the matter here, and think no more about it. But the opinion I entertain of general Leslie forbids me to imagine him capable of deception.

'You entirely mistake my character when you fuppose me to be intimidated by threats, and thereby deterred from executing the duties of the office with which the state has honoured me. For be assured, sir, the laws of this state trusted to me must and shall be carried into execution —maugre the consequences.

THE powers vested in me by the state are very extensive; but I shall ever be extremely cautious how I exercise them, and when I do I must be convinced that the exercise of my extraordinary powers is calculated to produce fome proportionate benefit to the state.

⁶ I would recommend to you, fir, to confider 6 well

well the consequences before you carry into execution the threats you hold out; for remember the estates reserved by marriage settlements, and the debts due to those who have attached themselves to your cause, as well as the debts due to the subjects of Britain, are in my power, and that I can, in an hour's time, deprive them of every benefit to be derived to them from the benevolent intentions of the legislature of this state. My sensibility would be extremely wounded, should I be reduced to the painful necessity of exercising this power; but it rests with you, fir, whether I do or not. And I shall be as ready as you are to appeal to the world for the rectitude of my conduct.

'Your proposition for suspending the operation of the confiscation act, without offering any equivalent, is inadmissable. If you have any thing serious and solid to propose on this head, I am ready to appoint commissioners on my part to meet those of yours to confer on the business.

'I have the honour to be,
'fir, your most obedient
' and humble servant,

(Signed) 'JOHN MATHEWS. Lieutenant-general Leslie.'

AFTER the reduction of lord Cornwallis was completed, the Pennfylvania line marched to South-Carolina. This increase of force enabled general general Greene to detach a part of his army to Georgia. During the two or three preceding years, that state had suffered, in an eminent degree, the defolations of war. The blood of its citizens had been daily shed by contending parties, under the denomination of whigs and tories. Political hatred raged to fuch a degree, that a Georgia parole, and a thrust with the bayonet, were terms of equal import. A few of the friends of the revolution kept together in the upper country, and exercifed the powers of independent government; and armed parties were frequently making excursions against British detachments. One of the most successful of this kind was on the twenty-third of March 1781, by colonel Clark, commanding a party of Georgia militia, who fell in with major Dunlap near Ninety-Six, at the head of a detachment of British troops. The major and thirty-four of his men were killed, and forty-two taken prisoners.

In January 1782 general Wayne, having previously ordered the Americans at Augusta to join him at Ebenezer, crossed the river Savannah at the Two Sisters ferry, with about a hundred dragoons, under the command of colonel Anthony-Walton White. He was soon after reinforced by three hundred continental infantry, commanded by lieutenant-colonel Posey. The British commander in Savannah, on hearing of this irruption of the Americans, sent orders to the different posts to burn, as far as they could, all the provisions in the country, and then to retire within their works. The margin of the river Savannah, and the islands in the vicinity of it, were soon covered with smoke, and presented to the astonished eye a grand but an awful spectacle. What remained of the last year's crop was so generally destroyed, that the American forces were obliged to depend chiefly on South-Carolina for their support.

THE British garrison at this time consisted of about a thousand regulars, besides a considerable number of militia, and was under the command of brigadier-general Clarke. Notwithstanding this great superiority of force, general Wayne frequently appeared before the British lines, and insulted their picquets. Three different attempts were made to surprize an advanced party of the Americans commanded by lieutenant-colonel Jackson, but none of them succeeded.

ABOUT this time John Martin, esquire, governor of the state of Georgia, came with his council from Augusta to Ebenezer, and re-established American government in the vicinity of the sea-coast. Soon after his arrival he issued a proclamation, offering to every British or Hessian soldier, who should desert from Savannah, two hundred acres of land, and some stock. This had, in a certain degree, the desired essect.

On the twenty-first of May 1782, colonel Brown,

Brown, at the head of a confiderable party, marched out of the garrifon of Savannah, with the apparent intention of attacking the Americans... General Wayne, by a bold manœuvre, got between colonel Brown and the British garrison in Savannah-attacked him at twelve o'clock at night, and routed his whole party. The vanguard of the Americans, confisting of fixty horse and forty infantry, was led on by colonel White of the cavalry, and captain Parker of the infantry, to a spirited charge, in which forty of the men, commanded by colonel Brown, were killed or wounded, about twenty taken prisoners, and the remainder obliged to shelter themselves in the fwamps under cover of the night. This advantage was gained by the liberal use of the fword and bayonet. Orders had been previously given to depend exclusively on these weapons; and that this might be more punctually complied with, the flints were taken out of the muskets of the infantry. Mr. Jonathan Brian, a respectable citizen of the state of Georgia, though nearly eighty years of age, was among the foremost on this occasion, and shewed as much fire and spirit as could be exhibited by a young foldier in the purfuit of military fame. In this fuccessful enterprize the Americans had only five privates killed and two wounded.

On the twenty-fourth of June 1782, a party of Creek Indians, with a British officer, made in the night a spirited attack on general Wayne.

The affailants conducted the enterprize with for much spirit and address, that they got possession of two sield-pieces, which were guarded by a small party in the rear of the Americans. The troops commanded by general Wayne soon rallied and recovered their field-pieces. A smart action ensued, in which they sought on both sides in close quarters with swords and bayonets. Though the Indians, in this unusual mode of engaging, displayed uncommon bravery, yet they were completely routed. Fourteen of their number were killed. Emistession, a samous Indian chief, was among the slain. The Americans carried off a British standard, and a large number of horses.

THE presence of an American force between the upper country and the garrison in Savannah interrupted the communication between the Indians and the British. A party of the former, when on their way to Savannah with a confiderable number of pack-horses, and a great deal of peltry, was taken by general Wayne. Two of their number were detained as hostages, but the remainder was fent home with a friendly talk and provisions. These lenient measures, together with the recent fuccesses of the Americans, had a confiderable influence in detaching the Indians from their British friends. The surrender of lord Cornwallis, the fuccesses of general Greene in South-Carolina, together with the declining state of the royal interest in every part of the United States, operated on the government of Great-Britain

Britain so as to induce a resolution, early in the year 1782, to abandon all offensive operations in America. Under this fanction, on the twenty-second of May 1782, general Leslie proposed to general Greene a cessation of hostilities; but this was declined by the latter for want of instructions from Congress on the subject. Nevertheless, there was nothing of consequence attempted on either side.

In connexion with this fystem of abandoning offensive operations in America, a scheme was adopted of evacuating the weaker British posts in the United States. As it had been the lot of Savannah to be the first southern post which was reduced, in like manner it was the first which was evacuated. When this measure was determined upon, the merchants and others, inhabitants thereof, obtained permission to apply to general Wayne for the fecurity and preservation of their property. To their deputies he replied, 'that, ' should the British garrison eventually effect an evacuation, the persons and properties of such ' inhabitants or others, who choose to remain in Savannah, will be protected by the military, and refigned inviolate into the hands of the ci-'vil authority, which must ultimately decide.' The merchants and inhabitants of Savannah, having fent out a fecond flag, general Wayne, at the defire of the civil authority of the state, fent them for answer, 'that the merchants, not owing 'allegiance to the United States, will be permit-Vol. II. Z 2 ' ted

' ted to remain a reasonable time to dispose of their 'goods and settle their affairs.' Major Habersham, who was charged with this message, pledged himself that they might rely, with the utmost considence, on the terms proposed to them.

On the eleventh of July 1782 the British evacuated the town of Savannah, and the Americans immediately took possession of it. Peace and tranquillity were restored to Georgia, after it had been near four years in the possession of the British. It is supposed, by well-informed persons, that in this space of time, the state lost by the war one thousand of its citizens, besides four thousand slaves.

From the commencement of the year 1782 constant reports were circulated, that the British intended an immediate evacuation of Charleston. The apprehension of this gave a serious alarm to those of the inhabitants who adhered to their interest. There was no part of South-Carolina without the British lines which was not formally in the peace of the state, excepting a settlement on Little Peedee. Major Ganey, at the head of fome loyalists residing near that river, had refused to do militia duty under general Marion, the brigadier of the district. They defended themfelves in the swamps, and from thence frequently fallied to the diftress of the whig inhabitants of the adjacent country. On the twenty-eighth of April 1781 a party of them, commanded by captain tain Jones, furrounded and fet fire to the house of colonel Kolb, a respectable American militia officer. He, after receiving affurances of being treated as a prisoner of war, surrendered. Nevertheless he was put to instant death in the presence of his wife and children. When the British had lost ground in 1781, general Marion made a treaty of neutrality with them. In the fummer of 1782 this was formally renewed. Though the British interest was entirely ruined, and their departure from Charleston soon expected, such was the generosity of the government, that it gave them a full pardon for all treasons committed against the state, the security of their property, and the protection of the laws, on the condition of their delivering up their plunder-abjuring the King of Great-Britain, and demeaning themfelves as peaceable citizens of the state. An alternative was offered to those who disapproved of these articles, to go within the British lines, and to carry off or fell their property. and Thefe lenient measures brought over the disaffected people of the fettlement. Several of them not long after fought bravely under general Marion, and the whole conducted themselves peaceably. Regularity, order and government took place of reciprocal depredations and hostilities.

On the proposed evacuation of Charleston, the merchants who came with the British were in a most disagreeable predicament. They had entered into extensive commercial engagements in the short interval of the British sway. Those of their debtors, who were without the lines, were not fubject to their jurisdiction; those who were within were unable to pay. It was supposed that all transfers of property, by the authority of the board of police, would be null and void on the departure of the British from the state. Environed with difficulties, and threatened with bankruptcy, if they should leave the state along with the garrison, they applied to general Leslie for leave to negotiate for themselves. A deputation of their body waited on governor Mathews, and obtained from him permission to reside in South-Carolina for eighteen months after the evacuation, with the full liberty of disposing of their stock of goods on hand, and of collecting the debts already due to them. This indulgence was extended to a longer term by the legislature at their next meeting, before any information arrived that the preliminary articles of peace were figned.

AFTER the intention of evacuating Charleston had been announced in publick orders, general Leslie wrote to general Greene, offering sull payment for rice and other provisions to be sent into Charleston, and, at the same time, accompanied his request with a threat, that, if it was not granted for money, it should be taken by force without compensation. Every pecuniary consideration operated to induce the acceptance of these these offers. It would have been the means of retaining in the state many thousand pounds in gold and filver, besides saving the country from depredation. But as it was then believed that the British meant to supply themselves largely with provisions, the better to enable them to transfer the war to the French West-India Islands, a sense of honour-of what was due to national character-and to their French allies, forbad an affent to the advantageous offers of general Leslie. Every effort was made by the commander of the American army, and by the governor of the state, to restrain the intercourse between town and country on private account, though the necessities of the American army made a small deviation necessary for the sake of obtaining supplies for publick fervice. General Leslie, finding it impossible to purchase, sent out parties to seize provisions near the different landings, and to bring them by water to Charleston. This was effected in some instances before the Americans could be collected in fufficient force for the defence of their property.

ONE of the most considerable parties ordered on this business was sent to Combahee ferry, where they arrived on the twenty-fifth of August 1782. Brigadier-general Gist, with about three hundred cavalry and infantry, of the continental army, was detached to oppose them. He succeeded so far as to capture one of their schooners, and in a great degree to frustrate their designs. Lieutenant-colonel John Laurens, though he had been confined for feveral days immediately preceding, yet, on hearing of the expedition, role from his bed, and followed general Gist. When the British and American detachments approached within a few miles of each other, lieutenant-colonel Laurens, being in advance with a fmall party of regulars and militia, engaged with a much fuperior force, in expectation of support from the main body in his rear. In the midst of his gallant exertions, this all-accomplished youth received a mortal wound. Nature had adorned him with a profusion of her choicest gifts, to which a wellconducted education had added its most useful as well as its most elegant improvements. Though his fortune and family entitled him to pre-eminence, yet he was the warm friend of republican equality. Generous and liberal, his heart expanded with genuine philanthropy. Zealous for the rights of humanity, he contended that perfonal liberty was the birth-right of every human being, however diversified by country, colour or capacity. His infinuating address, won the hearts of all his acquaintances: his fincerity and virtue, fecured their lasting esteem. Acting from the most honourable principles—uniting the bravery and other talents of a great officer with the knowledge of a complete scholar, and the engaging manners of a well-bred gentleman, he was the idol of his country—the glory of the army—and an ornament of human nature. His abilities thone in the legislature and in the cabinet, as well well as in the field, and were equal to the highest stations. His admiring country, sensible of his rising merit, stood prepared to confer on him her most distinguished honours. Cut down in the midst of all these prospects, he has lest mankind to deplore the calamities of war, which, in the twenty-seventh year of his life, deprived society of so invaluable a citizen.

Throughout the year 1782 the American army acted chiefly on the defensive. A short time before the evacuation, an attempt was made against a British detachment on James-Island. In this unsuccessful enterprize captain Wilmot, a brave and worthy officer of the Maryland line, lost his life. This was the last drop of blood which was shed in the American war.

When the long-expected evacuation of Charlefton really drew nigh, it was apprehended by the inhabitants, that the British army, on its departure, would carry off with them some thousands of negroes which were within their lines. To prevent this, governor Mathews wrote a letter to general Leslie, dated August seventeenth, 1782, in which he informed him, 'that, if the property of the citizens of South-Carolina was carried off from its owners by the British army, he should seize on the debts due to the British merchants—and to the confiscated estates—and the claims on those estates by marriage settlements—which three articles were not included ' in the confiscation act.' This conditional resolution operated as a check on some, so as to restrain their avidity for plunder, and induced general Leslie to propose a negotiation, for securing the property of both parties. The honourable Benjamin Guerard and Edward Rutledge, esquires, were appointed commissioners in behalf of the state, and Alexander Wright and James Johnson, esquires, in behalf of the royalists. After sundry conversations, the commissioners on both sides, on the tenth of October 1782, ratisfied a compact on this subject, of which the following are the principal articles:

'FIRST, That all the flaves of the citizens of South-Carolina, now in the power of the ho'nourable lieutenant-general Leslie, shall be re'stored to their former owners, as far as is prac'ticable, except such slaves as may have rendered
'themselves particularly obnoxious on account 'of their attachment and services to the British 'troops, and such as had specifick promises of freedom.

'THAT the faith of the state is hereby solemnly pledged, that none of the debts due to British merchants, or to persons who have been banished, or whose estates have been confiscated, or property secured by family settlements fairly made, or contracts relative thereto, shall now, or at any time hereaster, be arrested or withheld by the executive authority of the state—that no act of the legislature shall hereafter pass for confiscating or seizing the same in any manner whatever, if it is in the power of the executive to prevent it—and that its whole power and influence, both in its publick and private capacity, shall at all times be exerted for that purpose.

'THAT the fame power shall be allowed for the recovery of the debts and property, hereby protected and secured by the parties or their representatives, in the courts of justice or otherwise, as the citizens of the state may at any time be entitled unto, notwithstanding any act of consiscation or banishment, or any other disability whatever—and that the same may be remitted to whatever part of the world they may think proper, under the same, and no other, regulations than the citizens of the state may be subject to.

'their masters, and attached themselves to the 'British troops; and it will be particularly re'commended to their respective owners to for'give them for the same.

'THAT no violence or infult shall be offered to the persons or houses of the families of such persons as are obliged to leave the state for their Vol. II.

3 A 'adherence

- 'adherence to the British government, when the 'American army shall take possession of the town,
- or at any time afterwards, as far as it is in the
- ' power of those in authority to prevent it.
- 'THAT Edward Blake and Roger-Parker' Saunders, esquires, be permitted to reside in
- 'Charleston, on their parole of honour, to assist
- in the execution of the first article of this compact.

In consequence of this agreement governor Mathews gave a commission and a slag to the honourable Thomas Ferguson and Thomas Waring, esquires, to reside near the British lines, with instructions to receive such negroes as should be delivered from the garrison. Edward Blake and Roger-Parker Saunders, efquires, had also a commission and a slag given them to reside in Charleston, and forward the delivery of the negroes to the gentlemen who were waiting to receive them without the garrison. Governor Mathews requested the citizens of the state to attend for the purpose of receiving their negroes, and earnestly entreated that they would forgive them for having deferted their fervice and joined the British. Great were the expectations of the fuffering inhabitants, that they would foon obtain re-possession of their property; but these delusive hopes were of short duration. Notwithstanding the solemnity with which the compact had been ratified, it was so far evaded as to be in a great measure ineffectual for the end proposed.

EDWARD Blake and Roger-Parker Saunders, esquires, having waited on general Leslie, were permitted to examine the fleet bound to St. Augustine; but were not suffered to examine any veffel that wore the King's pendant. Instead of an examination the word of the commanding officer, to restore all the slaves that were on board, in violation of the compact, was offered as an equivalent. In their fearch of the Augustine fleet, they found and claimed one hundred and thirty-fix negroes. When they attended to receive them on shore, they were surprized to find no more than feventy-three landed for delivery. They then claimed this small residue of the original number to be forwarded to the other commissioners without the lines, but they were informed by general Leslie, that no negroes would be delivered till three foldiers were restored that had been taken by a party of general Greene's army. On that occasion the following letter was written to Edward Blake and Roger-Parker Saunders:

' Head-Quarters, Oct. 18, 1782.

GENTLEMEN,

GENERAL Lessie was much surprized on finding that a large patrole from general Greene's army, two days ago, came down so near our advanced

'advanced post on Charleston Neck, as to carry 'off three soldiers who were a little way in the 'front. At the time this act of hostility was 'committed, mr. Ferguson and another person 'was at Accabee, where I believe they still re-'main, in expectation of receiving the negroes 'to be delivered up, without any sanction but 'that of the agreement entered into.

'I AM directed to observe, that if a line of conduct on the part of general Greene, so disserent from ours, is adopted, that it must of course put an end to the pacifick intentions general Leslie means to follow in regard to this province, during the short time he is to remain in it.

'HE wishes you will inform governor Mathews, that he expects the foldiers taken away will be returned, and that the governor will take proper measures to have this requisition complied with. Until this is done general Leslie must be under the necessity of putting a stop to the farther completion of the agreement.

'I am, gentlemen,
'your most obedient,
'humble fervant,
'J. WEYMS, D. A. General.

6 Roger-P. Saunders and 6 Edward Blake, efquires.'

This letter being forwarded to governor Mathews, he replied to it in a letter to general Leslie, in the following words:

'SIR, 'October 19, 1782.

'I was a few minutes ago favoured with a letter from messirs. Blake and Saunders, enclosing one to them from major Weyms, written by your authority. As I do not like a second-hand correspondence, I therefore address myself immediately to you.

'I ADDRESSED a letter to you this morning, by which you will find, that I was not even then without some apprehensions of an intended evasion of the compact entered into on the tenth 'instant; but on the receipt of major Weyms's eletter, no room was left me for doubt; which obliges me, without giving farther trouble to those engaged in the business, and introducing farther altercation between us, to declare, that 6 I look on that agreement as diffolved, and have ' accordingly ordered my commissioners immediately to quit your lines. But, before I take ' my final leave of you, permit me to make one or two observations on major Weyms's letter, as probably the whole correspondence between " us may one day be brought to publick view.

'On the twelfth instant I wrote to you, to know whether persons going to Accabee, to bring off their negroes when brought there, should

's should be protected from your armed parties; and farther, to permit me to fend a party of 6 militia to guard the negroes remaining unclaimed to some part of the country where they could be supplied with provisions. To this eletter I have received no answer, which has obliged me to use the precaution of giving flags to all persons who have applied to go to Accabee, as I could on no principle look on that ground as neutral until it had been mutu-'ally agreed on as fuch. Indeed I was left to conclude the contrary was intended on your e part, both by your tedious filence, and detachments from your army making excursions as far as Ashley ferry, which was absolutely the ' case the morning of the day that the party from egeneral Greene's army took the foldiers you 6 fo peremptorily demand of me. And, if I am 'rightly informed, hostilities were commenced by your party. But be that as it may, I conceive it of little consequence, as either party had a right to commence hostilities on hostile ground, and between enemies every fpot must be confidered as fuch until mutually agreed upon to be otherwise. Besides, it is a wellknown fact, that there is not a day but some 6 of your armed parties are on that very ground ' which you affect to hold neutral.

WITH regard to messers. Ferguson and Waring remaining at Accabee unmolested: I hold myself under no manner of obligation to you for this forbearance, as I informed you they were there under the fanction of a flag-that they were to remain there for the purpose of ' receiving the negroes fent out by the agents in 'Charleston. They were therefore authorized ' to continue there till you fignified the contrary to them. Flags from you have remained within half a mile of our lines for feveral days, even on private business, without the least molestation 'whatever. Besides, sir, if your reasoning, as far as it applies to those gentlemen, proves any thing, it proves too much, because, on the fame principle, the other two commissioners, being in Charleston, ought to make that neutral ground also, notwithstanding no stipulation for that purpose had been entered into. I never 'interfere with general Greene's military plans, therefore the paragraph which relates to his operations ought to have been addressed to him; 6 but I believe he pays as little regard to threats as I do.

'I have the honour to be (Signed) 'JOHN MATHEWS.

'Lieutenant-general Leslie.'

This was the unfuccessful termination of a benevolent scheme originally calculated for mitigating the calamities of war. Motives of humanity, together with the facred obligation of the provisional articles of peace, prevented the state of South-Carolina from extending their confiscation laws. Instead of adding to the list of the unhappy fufferers on that score, the successive assemblies diminished their number.

THE prospects of gain, from the sale of plundered negroes, were too feducing to be refisted by the officers, privates and followers of the British army. On their departure from Charleston upwards of eight hundred flaves, who had been employed in the engineer department, were shipped off for the West-Indies. It was said and believed, that these were taken by the direction, and fold for the benefit of lieutenant-colonel Moncrieff. The professional abilities of that diftinguished officer cannot be too much applauded, nor his rapacity too much detested. The slaves carried off by the chief engineer were but a small part of the whole taken away at the evacuation, but their number is very inconsiderable when compared with the thousands that were lost from the first to the last of the war. It has been computed by good judges, that, between the years 1775 and 1783, the state of South-Carolina was deprived of negroes to the amount of twenty-five thousand.

THE evacuation, though officially announced by general Leslie on the seventh of August, as a measure soon to be adopted, did not take place till the sourteenth of December 1782. On that and the succeeding days the British went on board their shipping, and the town was entered by governor Mathews, and the American army, without without any confusion or disorder. Those who remained in Charleston felt themselves happy in being delivered from the severities of a garrison life. The exiled citizens experienced fenfations more eafily conceived than expressed, on returning to their houses and estates. To crown their other bleffings provisional articles of peace were foon announced to have been figned at Paris, on the thirtieth of November 1782, by which the King of Great-Britain acknowledged 'the United States of New-Hampshire, Massachusetts, Cone necticut, Rhode-Island, New-York, New-Jerfey, Pennfylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina and Georgia, 6 to be free, fovereign and independent states; that he treated with them as fuch; and, for himfelf, his heirs and fuccessors, relinquished all claim 6 to the government, propriety or territorial rights of the fame.' ccc The patriot exulted in the acknowledged independence of his country. The foldier rejoiced that the toils of war were ended, and the objects of it fully obtained. The farmer redoubled his industry, from the pleasing conviction that the produce of his labour would be fecured to him without any danger from British bayonets or American impress-warrants. Cheerfulness and good humour took possession of minds that, during feven years, had been continually occupied with anxiety and distress. The army was foon after disbanded. Such, at that time, was the fituation of the finances of the United VOL. II. 3 B States, ccc See note LIII.

States, that Congress was scarcely able to difcharge to that virtuous army, which with the price of their blood had fecured their independence, as much of the arrears of many years pay, as was fufficient to defray their expences in returning to their respective habitations. The laurels they had dearly earned, the applause of their countrymen which they had eminently obtained, and the plaudits of their consciences which they honestly possessed, were almost the only rewards they carried home, at the termination of a war in which many had injured their constitutions, and all had diminished their fortunes. Sympathizing with the distresses of their countrymen—sensible of their inability to pay them their stipulated due—and confiding in their justice to make them future retribution, they cheerfully relinquished the uniform of the military for the plain garb of the citizen. The private foldier exchanged his bayonet and firelock for the implements of husbandry, and betook himself to rural occupations. Subalterns, captains, field and general officers returned with pleasure to their ancient civil employments. No man aimed at more than the equal rights of citizenship; and every citizen felt himself free and independent.

A spirit of industry took place. The citizens, instead of repining at their losses, generally set themselves to repair them by diligence and economy. The continental officers who had served in the state, and whose bravery and exertions had rendered them conspicuous, were so well received by the ladies, that feveral of them had their gallantry rewarded by the possession of some of the finest women and greatest fortunes in South-Carolina. The unfortunate adherents to royal government were treated by those in power with moderation and lenity. In conformity to the treaty of peace, and the recommendation of Congress, the legislature permitted the greater part of the exiles to return. These were divided into three classes. Thirty-one were fully restored to their property and citizenship, thirty-three were disqualified from holding any place of trust within the state for the space of seven years, and they, with fixty-two others, were relieved from total confiscation on the condition of their paying twelve per cent on the equitable value of their property. Though the state laboured under an immense load of publick debt, contracted during the war, it generously restored confiscated property in its actual possession, to the amount of four hundred and fifty-fix thousand one hundred and eleven pounds sterling. The blessings of peace were diffused among the people, and nothing is now wanting but the smiles of Heaven, and their own good conduct, to make them a great and a happy republick.

The following note was intended to be referred to from page 51, line 12, but the reference was omitted by mistake.

HAT the American fleet abandoned the defence of the Bar, has been considered by some as a capital error. The reasons that led to this measure, are laid down in the following letter, written, in answer to sundry requisitions of general Lincoln, by the subscribers, the first four of whom were officers of the continental navy, and the remaining five branch pilots of the harbour of Charleston:

To the honourable major-general Lincoln. Charleston, February 27, 1780.

Your's of yesterday we have received, and, after having carefully considered and attended to the several requisitions therein contained, beg leave to return the following answers: at low water there are eleven seet in the channel from the bar to Five Fathom Hole. Five Fathom Hole is three miles from the bar, where you will have three fathoms at low water. They cannot be anchored until they are at that distance from the bar. In the place where the ships can be anchored, the bar cannot be covered or annoyed. Off the north Breaker Head, where the ships can be anchored, to moor them that they may swing in safety, fafety, they will be within one mile and an half of the shore. If any batteries are thrown up to act in conjunction with the ships, and the enemy's force should be superior, so much as to cause a retreat to be necessary, it will be impossible for us to cover or take them off. Our opinion is, that the ships can do the most effectual service for the defence of the town and its security, to act in conjunction with fort Moultrie, which we think will best answer the purpose of the ships being fent here, and confequently, if fo, the views of Congress. Our reasons are, that the channel is so narrow between the fort and the middle ground, that they may be moored fo as to rake the channel, and prevent the enemy's troops being landed to annoy the fort. The enemy, we apprehend, may be prevented from founding and buoying the bar by the brig General Lincoln, the state brig Notre Dame, and other fmall veffels that may be occasionally employed for that purpose. We are, with respect, your honour's most obedient humble fervants,

Copy of the summons sent to major-general Lincoln the tenth of April 1780.

Camp before Charleston, April 10, 1780.

CIR Henry Clinton, K. B. general and commander in chief of his majesty's forces in the colonies lying on the Atlantic, from Nova-Scotia, &c. &c. and vice-admiral Arbuthnot, commander in chief of his majesty's ships, &c. in North-America, &c. &c. regretting the effusion of blood, and the distresses which must now commence, deem it confonant to humanity to warn the town and garrison of Charleston of the havock and defolation with which they are threatened from the formidable force furrounding them by land and fea. An alternative is offered at this hour to the inhabitants of faving their lives and property, contained in the town, or of abiding by the fatal consequences of a cannonade and ftorm.

Should the place, in a fallacious fecurity, or its commander, in a wanton indifference to the fate of its inhabitants, delay the furrender, or should publick stores or shipping be destroyed, the resentment of an exasperated soldiery may intervene; but the same mild and compassionate offer can never be renewed.

THE respective commanders, who hereby summon the town, do not apprehend so fast a part as further resistance will be taken; but rather that the gates will be opened, and themselves received with a degree of considence which will forebode further reconciliation.

H. CLINTON,
M. ARBUTHNOT.

Copy of a letter from major-general Lincoln to general fir Henry Clinton and vice-admiral Arbuthnot; dated Charleston, April 10, 1780.

GENTLEMEN,

I HAVE received your summons of this date. Sixty days have passed since it has been known that your intentions against this town were hostile, in which time has been afforded to abandon it; but duty and inclination point to the propriety of supporting it to the last extremity.

I have the honour to be, &c.

Commanding in the fouth department.

Copy of a letter from sir Henry Clinton to majorgeneral Lincoln, dated camp before Charleston, May 8, 1780.

SIR,

CIRCUMSTANCED as I now am, with respect to the place invested, humanity only can induce me to lay within your reach the terms I had determined should not again be proffered.

THE fall of fort Sullivan, the destruction on the fixth instant of what remained of your cavalry, the critical period to which our approaches against the town have brought us, mark this as the term of your hopes of succour, could you ever have framed any, and as an hour beyond which resistance is temerity.

By this last summons, therefore, I throw to your charge whatever vindictive severity exasperated soldiers may instict on the unhappy people whom you devote, by persevering in a fruitless defence.

I SHALL expect your answer until eight o'clock, when hostilities will commence again, unless the town be surrendered.

I have the honour to be, &c. (Signed) H. CLINTON.

In consequence of this letter, articles of capitulation were proposed by major-general Lincoln, and answered by their excellencies general fir Henry Clinton, knight of the bath, and vice-admiral Arbuthnot; which answers being deemed by general Lincoln to be inadmissible, he proposed that other articles, which he then sent, might be acceded to. Those articles were rejected by fir Henry Clinton and vice-admiral Ar-Vol. II.

buthnot; and on the eleventh of May major-general Lincoln wrote the following letter:

Copy of a letter from major-general Lincoln to general fir Henry Clinton, dated Charleston, May 11, 1780.

SIR.

THE fame motives of humanity which inclined you to propose articles of capitulation to this garrison induced me to offer those I had the honour of fending you on the eighth instant. They then appeared to me fuch as I might proffer and you receive with honour to both parties. Your exceptions to them, as they principally concerned the militia and citizens, I then conceived were fuch as could not be concurred with; but a recent application from those people, wherein they express a willingness to comply with them, and a wish on my part to lessen as much as may be the distresses of war to individuals, lead me now to offer you my acceptance of them.

I have the honour to be, &c.

His excellency fir Henry Clinton.

Copy of a letter from fir Henry Clinton to majorgeneral Lincoln, dated camp before Charleston, May 11, 1780.

SIR,

WHEN you rejected the favourable terms which which were dictated by an earnest desire to prevent the effusion of blood, and interposed articles that were wholly inadmissible, both the admiral and myself were of opinion that the surrender of the town at discretion was the only condition that should afterwards be attended to; but as the motives which then induced them are still prevalent, I now inform you that the terms then offered will still be granted

A copy of the articles shall be sent for your ratisfication as soon as they can be prepared; and immediately after they are exchanged, a detachment of grenadiers will be sent to take possession of the horn work opposite your main gate. Every arrangement which may conduce to good order in occupying the town, shall be settled before noon to-morrow, and at that time your garrison will march out.

I have the honour to be, &c.

(Signed)

H. CLINTON.

SOUTH-CAROLINA.

Articles of capitulation between their excellencies sire. Henry Clinton, knight of the bath, general and commander in chief of his majesty's forces in the several provinces and colonies on the Atlantic, from Nova-Scotia to West-Florida inclusive, Mariot Arbuthnot, esquire, vice-admiral of the Blue, and commander in chief of all his majesty's ships and vessels in North-America, and major-general Benjamin Lincoln, commander in chief in the town and harbour of Charleston.

ARTICLE I. That all acts of hostility and work shall cease between the besiegers and the besieged, until the articles of capitulation shall be agreed on, signed and executed, or collectively rejected.

Answer. All acts of hostility and work shall cease, until the articles of capitulation are finally agreed to or rejected.

ARTICLE II. The town and fortifications shall be surrendered to the commander in chief of the British forces, such as they now sland.

Answer. The town and fortifications, with the shipping at the wharves, artillery, and all other publick stores whatsoever, shall be surrendered in their present state, to the commanders of the investing forces; proper officers shall attend from the respective departments to receive them.

ARTICLE III. The continental troops and failors, with their baggage, shall be conducted to a place to be agreed on, where they will remain prisoners of war until exchanged. While prisoners they shall be supplied with good and wholesome provisions in such quantity as is served out to the troops of his Britannick majesty.

Answer. Granted.

ARTICLE IV. The militia now in garrison shall be permitted to return to their respective homes, and be secured in their persons and property.

Answer. The militia now in garrison shall be permitted to return to their respective homes as prisoners on parole; which parole, as long as they observe, shall secure them from being molested in their property by the British troops.

ARTICLE V. The fick and wounded shall be continued under the care of their own surgeons, and be supplied with medicines, and such necessaries as are allowed to the British hospitals.

Answer. Granted.

ARTICLE VI. The officers of the army and navy shall keep their horses, swords, pistols, and baggage, which shall not be searched, and retain their servants.

Answer. Granted, except with respect to the horses, which will not be allowed to go out of town, but may be disposed of by a person left from each corps for that purpose.

ARTICLE VII. The garrifon shall, at an hour appointed, march out with shouldered arms, drums beating, and colours slying, to a place to be agreed on, where they will pile their arms.

Answer. The whole garrifon shall, at an hour to be appointed, march out of the town to the ground between the works of the place and the canal, where they will deposit their arms. The drums are not to beat a British march, or colours to be uncased.

ARTICLE VIII. That the French conful, his house, papers, and other moveable property, shall be protected and untouched, and a proper time granted to him for retiring to any place that may afterwards be agreed upon between him and the commander in chief of the British forces.

Answer. Agreed, with this restriction, that he is to consider himself as a prisoner on parole.

ARTICLE IX. That the citizens shall be protected in their persons and properties.

Answer. All civil officers, and the citizens who have borne arms during the fiege, must be prisoners prisoners on parole; and, with respect to their property in the city, shall have the same terms as are granted to the militia; and all other persons now in the town, not described in this or any other article, are notwithstanding understood to be prisoners on parole.

ARTICLE X. That a twelvemonth's time be allowed all fuch as do not choose to continue under the British government to dispose of their effects, real and personal, in the state, without any molestation whatever, or to remove such part thereof as they choose, as well as themselves and families; and that, during that time, they or any of them may have it at their option to reside occasionally in town or country.

Answer. The discussion of this article of course cannot possibly be entered into at present.

ARTICLE XI. That the same protection to their persons and properties, and the same time for the removal of their effects, be given to the subjects of France and Spain, as are required for the citizens in the preceding article.

Answer. The subjects of France and Spain shall have the same terms as are granted to the French consul.

ARTICLE XII. That a vessel be permitted to go to Philadelphia with the general's despatches, which are not to be opened.

Answer. Granted; and a proper veffel with a flag will be provided for that purpose.

ALL publick papers and records must be carefully preferved, and faithfully delivered to fuch persons as shall be appointed to receive them.

In Congress, Fanuary 2, 1779.

ESOLVED, that whereas many counterfeits have appeared in circulation, of various denominations, of the emissions of May twentieth, 1777, and April eleventh, 1778, and counterfeits of these emissions have lately been issued by our enemies at New-York, and are found to be spreading and increasing fast in various parts of these United States, whereby individuals are defrauded, prices enhanced, and the credit credit of the paper currency greatly injured; and it is become necessary for the security of individuals; and safety of the publick, that those two emissions should cease to be a circulating medium; and sliould be called in and exchanged, or otherwise provided for as soon as may be, with convenience to the present holders: Therefore,

RESOLVED, That the following bills be taken out of circulation, namely, the whole emissions of May twentieth, 1777, and April eleventh, 1778.

THAT they be brought in for that purpose in the manner hereaster provided, by the first day of June next; and not afterwards redeemable.

THAT they be received for debts and taxes into the continental treasury, and into the state treasuries for continental taxes, until the first day of June next.

THAT they be received until the first day of June next, into the continental loan offices, either on loan, or to be exchanged at the election of the owners, for other bills of the like tenor, to be provided for that purpose.

THAT the bills lodged in the faid offices to be fo exchanged, be there registered, and indented certificates thereof given to the owners by the respective commissioners of the faid offices.

Vol. II.

THAT the commissioners of the loan-offices make returns to the treasury board, immediately after the first day of June next, of the amount of the bills received into their respective offices to be exchanged as aforesaid, and that proper bills to exchange the same be furnished, and ready to be delivered out at their said offices, within sixty days from and after the said first day of June.

THAT the first-mentioned bills, as they are brought into the treasuries and loan-offices, be immediately crossed and struck through with a circular punch of one inch diameter, to be afterwards examined and burned, as Congress shall direct.

Extract from the minutes,

CHA. THOMSON, fecretary.

THESE events, though extraordinary, were not without a precedent in the annals of the province, and ought to caution the people of that country against a legal tender of any paper currency. In the narrative of the proceedings of South-Carolina, in the year 1719, by Francis Yonge, printed in London in 1726, page 8, are found the following words: 'The publick emergencies, in the year 1715, had occasioned the stamping the aforesaid sum of eighty thousand 'pounds opunds in bills of credit, to pay their foldiers and other charges the country was forced to be at; and it was enacted by the affembly they hould be current in all payments between man and man. From whence it followed that those who had money owing them on bond or otherwise before the war, and who must have been paid in gold or filver, or its value, if these bills had not been made current in all payments, lost seven-eighths of their money. These losses sell chiefly on the merchants, and such of the inhabitants of Charleston as were monied men, and, on the contrary, the planters, who were their debtors, were the gainers.'

NOTE VIII. PAGE 96.

Circular letter from the Congress of the United States of America, to their constituents.

Friends and fellow-citizens,

In governments raised on the generous principles of equal liberty, where the rulers of the state are the servants of the people, and not the masters of those from whom they derive authority; it is their duty to inform their fellow-citizens of the state of their affairs, and by evincing the propriety of publick measures, lead them to unite the influence of inclinations, to the force of legal obligation in rendering them successful. This duty ceases not, even in times of the most perfect perfect peace, order and tranquillity, when the fafety of the commonwealth is neither endangered by force of feduction from abroad, or by faction, treachery, or misguided ambition from within. At this feason, therefore, we find ourselves in a particular manner impressed with a sense of it, and can no longer forbear calling your attention to a subject much misrepresented, and respecting which dangerous as well as erroneous opinions have been held and propagated; we mean your finances.

THE ungrateful despotism and inordinate love of domination, which marked the unnatural defigns of the British King and his venal parliament to enslave the people of America, reduced you to the necessity of either afferting your rights by arms, or ingloriously passing under the yoke. You nobly preferred war. Armies were then to be raifed, paid and supplied; money became neceffary for these purposes. Of your own there was but little; and of no nation in the world could you then borrow. The little that was spread among you could be collected only by taxes, and to this end regular governments were essential; of these you were also destitute. So circumstanced, you had no other resource but the natural value and wealth of your fertile country. Bills were iffued on the credit of this bank, and your faith was pledged for their redemption. After a confiderable number of these had circulated, loans were folicited, and offices for the purpose purpose established. Thus a national debt was unavoidably created, and the amount of it is as follows:

Bills emitted and circulating, 59,948,880
Monies borrowed before the first of March, 1778, the interest of which is payable in France, 7,545,196 67-90
Monies borrowed since the first of March, 1778, the interest of which is payable here, 26,188,909

Money due abroad, not exactly known---the balance not having been transmitted, supposed about

For your further fatisfaction we shall order a particular account of the several emissions, with the times limited for their redemption, and also of the several loans, the interest allowed on each, and the terms assigned for their payment, to be prepared and published.

The taxes have as yet brought into the treafury no more than 3,027,560, so that all the monies supplied to Congress by the people of America, amount to no more than 36,761,665 dollars and sixty-seven ninetieths, that being the sum of the loans and taxes received. Judge then of the necessity of emissions, and learn from whom and from whence that necessity arose.

WE are also to inform you, that on the first day of September instant, we resolved, 'that we would on no account whatever emit more bills of credit than to make the whole amount of ' fuch bills two hundred millions of dollars,' and as the fum emitted and in circulation amounted to 159,648,880 dollars, and the fum of forty millions fifty-one thousand one hundred and twenty dollars remained to complete the two hundred millions above-mentioned, we on the third day of September instant, further resolved, 'that we ' would emit fuch part only of the faid fum of 6 40,051,120 dollars as should be absolutely neceffary for publick exigencies before adequate fupplies could otherwise be obtained, relying for fuch supplies on the exertions of the several " flates."

Exclusive of the great and ordinary expences incident to the war, the depreciation of the currency has fo swelled the prices of every necessary article, and, of consequence, made such additions to the usual amount of expenditures, that very considerable supplies must be immediately provided by loans and taxes: and we unanimously declare it to be essential to the welfare of these states, that the taxes already called for, be paid into the continental treasury by the time recommended for that purpose. It is also highly proper that you should extend your views beyond that period, and prepare in season as well for bringing your respective quotas of troops troops into the field early in the next campaign, as for providing the supplies necessary in the course of it. We shall take care to apprize you from time to time of the state of the treasury, and to recommend the proper measures for supplying it. To keep your battalions sull, to encourage loans, and to assess your taxes with prudence, collect them with firmness, and pay them with punctuality, is all that will be requisite on your part. Further ways and means of providing for the publick exigencies, are now under consideration, and will soon be laid before you.

Having thus given you a short and plain state of your debt, and pointed out the necessity of punctuality in furnishing the supplies already required, we shall proceed to make a few remarks on the depreciation of the currency, to which we entreat your attention.

The depreciation of bills of credit is always either natural or artificial, or both. The latter is our case. The moment the sum in circulation exceeded what was necessary as a medium in commerce, it began and continued to depreciate in proportion as the amount of the surplus increased; and that proportion would hold good until the sum emitted should become so great as nearly to equal the value of the capital or stock, on the credit of which the bills were issued. Supposing, therefore, that 30,000,000 was necessary for a circulating medium, and that 160,000,000 had issued.

issued, the natural depreciation is but little more than five to one: but the actual depreciation exceeds that proportion, and that excess is artificial. The natural depreciation is to be removed only by lessening the quantity of money in circulation. It will regain its primitive value whenever it shall be reduced to the sum necessary for a medium of commerce. This is only to be effected by loans and taxes.

THE artificial depreciation is a more ferious fubject, and merits minute investigation. A distrust, however occasioned, entertained by the mass of the people, in the ability or inclination of the United States to redeem their bills, is the cause of it. Let us enquire how far reason will justify a distrust in the ability of the United States.

THE ability of the United States must depend on two things: first, the success of the present revolution, and, secondly, on the sufficiency of the natural wealth, value, and resources of the country.

That the time has been when honest men might, without being chargeable with simidity; have doubted the success of the present revolution, we admit; but that period is passed. The independence of America is now as fixed as sate; and the petulant efforts of Britain to break it down are as vain and fruitless as the raging of the waves which beat against their cliffs. Let those who are still afflicted with these doubts confider the character and condition of our enemies. Let them remember that we are contending against a kingdom crumbling into pieces; a nation without publick virtue; and a people fold to, and betrayed by, their own representatives: against a prince governed by his passions, and a ministry without confidence or wisdom; against armies half paid, and generals half trufted; against a government equal only to plans of plunder, conflagration and murder-a government by the most impious violations of the rights of religion, justice, humanity and mankind, courting the vengeance of Heaven, and revolting from the protection of Providence. Against the fury of these enemies you made successful resistance, when fingle, alone, and friendless, in the days of weakness and infancy, before your 'hands had been taught to war or your fingers to fight.' And can there be any reason to apprehend that the Divine Disposer of human events, after having separated us from the house of bondage, and led us fafe through a fea of blood, towards the land of liberty and promife, will leave the work of our political redemption unfinished, and either permit us to perish in a wilderness of difficulties, or fuffer us to be carried back in chains to that country of oppression, from whose tyranny He hath mercifully delivered us with a stretched-out arm.

In close alliance with one of the most powerful nations in Europe, which has generously made our cause her own; in amity with many others, and enjoying the good-will of all, what danger have we to fear from Britain? Instead of acquiring accessions of territory by conquest, the limits of her empire daily contract; her fleets no longer rule the ocean, nor are her armies invincible by land. How many of her standards, wrested from the hands of her champions, are among your trophies, and have graced the triumphs of your troops? And how great is the number of those, who, sent to bind you in fetters, have become your captives, and receive their lives from your hands? In short, whoever considers that these states are daily increasing in power; that their armies are become veterans; that their governments, founded in freedom, are established; that their fertile country, and their affectionate ally, furnish them with ample supplies; that the Spanish monarch, well prepared for war, with fleets and armies ready for combat, and a treafury overflowing with wealth, has entered the lists against Britain; that the other European nations, often infulted by her pride, and alarmed by the strides of her ambition, have left her to her fate; that Ireland, wearied with her oppressions, is panting for liberty, and even Scotland displeased and uneasy at her edicts-Whoever confiders these things, instead of doubting the issue of the war, will rejoice in the glorious, the fure and certain prospect of success.

This point being established, the next question is, whether the natural wealth, value and resources of the country will be equal to the payment of the debt?

LET us suppose, for the sake of argument, that at the conclusion of the war, the emissions should amount to 200,000,000; that exclusive of fupplies from taxes, which will not be inconfiderable, the loans should amount to 100,000,000; then the whole national debt of the United States would be 300,000,000. There are at present 3,000,000 of inhabitants in the thirteen states; three hundred million of dollars divided among three million of people would give to each person one hundred dollars; and is there an individual in America unable in the course of eighteen or twenty years to pay it again? Suppose the whole debt affessed, as it ought to be, on the inhabitants in proportion to their respective estates, what would then be the share of the poorer people? Perhaps not ten dollars. Besides, as this debt will not be payable immediately, but probably twenty years allotted for it, the number of inhabitants by that time in America, will be far more than double their present amount. It is well known that the inhabitants of this country increased almost in the ratio of compound interest. By natural population they doubled every twenty years, and how great may be the host of emigrants from other countries cannot be afcertained. We have the highest reason to believe the number will be immense. Suppose that only ten thousand should arrive the first year after the war, what will those ten thousand with their families count in twenty years time? Probably double the number. This observation applies with proportionable force to the emigrants of every successive year. Thus you see great part of your debt will be payable not merely by the present number of inhabitants, but by that number swelled and increased by the natural population of the present inhabitants, by multitudes of emigrants daily arriving from other countries, and by the natural population of those successive emigrants, so that every person's share of the debt will be constantly diminishing by others coming in to pay a proportion of it.

THESE are advantages which none but young countries enjoy. The number of inhabitants in every country in Europe, remains nearly the fame from one century to another. No country will produce more people than it can fubfift, and every country, if free and cultivated, will produce as many as it can maintain. Hence we may form fome idea of the future population of these states. Extensive wildernesses, now scarcely known or explored, remain to be cultivated, and vast lakes and rivers, whose waters have for ages rolled in filence and obscurity to the ocean, are yet to hear the din of industry, become subfervient to commerce, and boast delightful villas, gilded spires, and spacious cities rising on their hanks.

Thus much for the number of persons to pay the debt. The next point is their ability. They who enquire how many millions of acres are contained only in the fettled part of North-America, and how much each acre is worth, will acquire very enlarged and yet very adequate ideas of the value of this country. But those who will carry their enquiries further, and learn that we heretofore paid an annual tax to Britain of three millions sterling in the way of trade, and still grew rich; that our commerce was then confined to her; that we were obliged to carry our commodities to her market, and consequently to sell them at her price; that we were compelled to purchase foreign commodities at her stores, and on her terms, and were forbid to establish any manufactories incompatible with her views of gain; that in future the whole world will be open to us, and we shall be at liberty to purchase from those who will fell on the best terms, and to fell to those who will give the best prices; that as this country increases in number of inhabitants and cultivation, the productions of the earth will be proportionably increased, and the riches of the whole proportionably greater: whoever examines the force of these and similar observations, must fmile at the ignorance of those who doubt the ability of the United States to redeem their bills.

LET it also be remembered that paper money is the only kind of money which cannot 'make 'unto

'unto itself wings and fly away.' It remains with us, it will not forfake us, it is always ready and at hand for the purpose of commerce or taxes, and every industrious man can find it. On the contrary, should Britain like Ninevell (and for the same reason) yet find mercy, and escape the storm ready to burst upon her, she will find her national debt in a very different situation. Her territory diminished, her people wasted, her commerce ruined, her monopolies gone, she must provide for the discharge of her immense debt by taxes to be paid in specie, in gold or silver, perhaps now buried in the mines of Mexico or Peru, or still concealed in the brooks and rivulets of Africa or Indostan.

HAVING shewn that there is no reason to doubt the ability of the United States to pay their debt, let us next enquire whether as much can be said for their inclination.

UNDER this head, three things are to be attended to:

- of the United States have been pledged for the redemption of their bills.
- 2d. Whether they have put themselves in a political capacity to redeem them—and,
 - 3d. WHETHER, admitting the two former propositions, positions, there is any reason to apprehend a wanton violation of the publick faith.

rst. It must be evident to every man who reads the journals of Congress, or looks at the face of one of their bills, that Congress have pledged the faith of their constituents for the redemption of them. And it must be equally evident, not only that they had authority to do so, but that their constituents have actually ratified their acts, by receiving their bills, passing laws establishing their currency, and punishing those who counterfeit them. So that it may with truth be said that the people have pledged their faith for the redemption of them, and that not only collectively by their representatives, but individually.

2d. WHETHER the United States have put themselves in a political capacity to redeem their bills, is a question which calls for more full discussion.

Our enemies, as well foreign as domestick, have laboured to raise doubts on this head. They argue that the consederation of the states remains yet to be perfected; that the union may be dissolved; Congress be abolished, and each state resuming its delegated powers, proceed in suture to hold and exercise all the rights of sovereignty appertaining to an independent state. In such an event, say they, the continental bills of credit, created and supported by the union, would die with it. This position being assumed, they next proceed to affert this event to be probable, and in proof of it urge our divisions, our parties, our separate interests, distinct manners, former prejudices, and many other arguments equally plausible and equally fallacious. Examine this matter.

For every purpose essential to the defence of these states in the progress of the present war, and necessary to the attainment of the objects of it, these states now are as fully, legally, and abfolutely confederated, as it is possible for them to be. Read the credentials of the different delegates who composed the Congress in 1774, 1775, and part of 1776. You will find that they established an union for the express purpose of opposing the oppressions of Britain, and obtaining redress of grievances. On the fourth of July, 1776, your representatives in Congress, perceiving that nothing lefs than unconditional fubmiffion would fatisfy our enemies, did, in the name of the people of the Thirteen United Colonies, declare them to be free and independent states; and, ' for the support of that declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, did mutually pledge to each other their ' lives, their fortunes, and their facred honour.' Was ever confederation more formal, more folemn, or explicit; it has been expressly affented to and ratified by every state in the union. Accordingly, cordingly, for the direct support of this declaration, that is for the support of the independence of these states, armies have been raised, and bills of credit emitted, and loans made to pay and supply them. The redemption therefore of these bills, the payment of these debts, and the settlement of the accounts of the several states, for expenditures or services for the common benefit and in this common cause, are among the objects of this confederation, and consequently while all or any of its objects remain unattained, it cannot, so far as it may respect such objects, be dissolved, consistent with the laws of God or man.

But we are perfuaded, and our enemies will find, that our union is not to end here. They are mistaken when they suppose us kept together only by a fense of present danger. It is a fact which they only will dispute, that the people of these states were never so cordially united as at this day. By having been obliged to mix with each other, former prejudices have worn off, and their feveral manners become blended. A fense of common permanent interest, mutual affection, (having been brethren in affliction) the ties of fanguinity daily extending, constant reciprocity of good offices, fimilarity in language, in governments, and therefore in manners, the importance, weight, and splendour of the union, all conspire in forming a strong chain of connexion, which must for-ever bind us together. 3 G Vol. II. The The United Provinces of the Netherlands and the United Cantons of Switzerland became free and independent under circumstances very like our's: their independence has been long established, and yet their confederacies continue in full vigour. What reason can be assigned why our union should be less lasting? or why should the people of these states be supposed less wife than the inhabitants of those? You are not uninformed that a plan for a perpetual confederation has been prepared, and that twelve of the thirteen states have already acceded to it. But enough has been faid to shew that for every purpose of the present war, and all things incident to it, there does at present exist a perfect solemn confederation, and therefore that the states now are and always will be in political capacity to redeem their bills, pay their debts, and fettle their accounts.

3d. WHETHER, admitting the ability and political capacity of the United States to redeem their bills, there is any reason to apprehend a wanton violation of the publick faith?

It is with great regret and reluctance that we can prevail upon ourselves to take the least notice of a question which involves in it a doubt so injurious to the honour and dignity of America.

THE enemy, aware that the strength of America lay in the union of her citizens, and the wisdom wisdom and integrity of those to whom they committed the direction of their affairs, have taken unwearied pains to disunite and alarm the people, to depreciate the abilities and virtue of their rulers, and to impair the confidence reposed in them by their constituents. To this end repeated attempts have been made to draw an abfurd and fanciful line of distinction between the Congress and the people, and to create an opinion and a belief that their interests and views were different and opposed. Hence the ridiculous tales, the invidious infinuations, and the whimfical fuspicions that have been forged and propagated by difguifed emissaries and traitors, in the garb of patriots. Hence has proceeded the notable discovery, that as the Congress made the money they also can destroy it; and that it will exist no longer than they find it convenient to permit it.

It is not furprifing, that in a free country, where the tongues and pens of fuch people are and must be licensed, such political heresies should be inculcated and disfused, but it is really astonishing, that the mind of a single virtuous citizen in America should be influenced by them. It certainly cannot be necessary to remind you, that your representatives here are chosen from among yourselves; that you are, or ought to be acquainted with their several characters; that they are sent here to speak your sentiments, and that it is constantly in your power to remove such as do not. You furely are convinced, that it is no more in their power to annihilate your money than your independence, and that any act of theirs for either of those purposes would be null and void.

WE should pay an ill compliment to the understanding and honour of every true American, were we to adduce many arguments to shew the baseness, or bad policy of violating our national faith, or omitting to purfue the measures necesfary to preserve it. A bankrupt faithless republick would be a novelty in the political world, and appear among reputable nations, like a common proftitute among chafte and respectable matrons. The pride of America revolts from the idea; her citizens know for what purpofes these emissions were made, and have repeatedly plighted their faith for the redemption of them; they are to be found in every man's possession, and every man is interested in their being redeemed; they must, therefore, entertain a high opinion of American credulity, who suppose the people capable of believing, on due reflection, that all America will, against the faith, the honour, and the interest of all America, be ever prevailed upon to countenance, support, or permit fo ruinous, fo difgraceful a measure. We are convinced, that the efforts and arts of our enemies will not be wanting to draw us into this humiliating and contemptible fituation. Impelled by malice, and the fuggestions of chagrin and and disappointment at not being able to bend our necks to their yoke, they will endeavour to force or seduce us to commit this unpardonable sin, in order to subject us to the punishment due to it, and that we may thenceforth be a reproach and a bye-word among the nations. Apprized of these consequences, knowing the value of national character, and impressed with a due sense of the immutable laws of justice and honour, it is impossible that America should think without horror of such an execrable deed.

If then neither our ability or inclination to discharge the publick debt, are justly questionable, let our conduct correspond with this confidence, and let us rescue our credit from its present imputations. Had the attention of America to this object been unremitted, had taxes been feafonably imposed and collected, had proper loans been made, had laws been paffed, and executed for punishing those who maliciously endeavoured to injure the publick credit; had these and many other things equally necessary been done, and had our currency, notwithstanding all these efforts, declined to its present degree of depreciation, our case would indeed have been deplorable. But as these exertions have not been made, we may yet experience the good effects which naturally refult from them. Our former negligences therefore should now animate us with hope, and teach us not to despair of removing by vigilance and application the evils which fupineness and inattention have produced.

IT has been already observed, that in order to prevent the further natural depreciation of our bills, we have resolved to stop the press, and to call upon you for supplies by loans and taxes. You are in capacity to afford them, and are bound by the strongest ties to do it. Leave us not, therefore, without fupplies, nor let in that flood of evils which would follow from fuch neglect. It would be an event most grateful to our enemies, and depend upon it, they will redouble their artifices and industry to compass it. Be therefore upon your guard, and examine well the policy of every measure, and the evidence of every report that may be proposed or mentioned to you before you adopt the one or believe the other. Recollect that it is the price of the liberty, the peace and the fafety of yourselves and posterity, that now is required; -that peace, liberty and fafety, for the attainment and fecurity of which, you have so often and so solemnly declared your readiness to sacrifice your lives and fortunes. The war, though drawing fast to a fuccessful issue, still rages. Disdain to leave the whole business of your defence to your ally. Be mindful that the brightest prospects may be clouded, and that prudence bids us be prepared for every event. Provide, therefore, for continuing your armies in the field till victory and peace shall lead them home, and avoid the reproach of permitting mitting the currency to depreciate in your hands, when, by yielding a part to taxes and loans, the whole might have been appreciated and preserved. Humanity as well as justice makes this demand upon you, the complaints of ruined widows, and the cries of fatherless children, whose whole support has been placed in your hands and melted away, have doubtlefs reached you-take care that they ascend no higher. Rouse, therefore; strive who shall do most for his country; re-kindle that flame of patriotifm, which, at the mention of difgrace and flavery, blazed throughout America, and animated all her citizens. Determine to finish the contest as you began it, honestly and gloriously.-Let it never be faid that America had no fooner become independent, than she became infolvent, or that her infant glories and growing fame were obscured and tarnished by broken contracts and violated faith, in the very hour when all the nations of the earth were admiring, and almost adoring the splendour of her rifing.

By the unanimous order of Congress,

Waxhaws, May 30, 1780.

Have the honour to inform you, that yesterday at three o'clock, P. M. after a march of one hundred and five miles in fifty-four hours, with the corps of cavalry, the infantry of the legion, mounted on horses, and a three-pounder, at Waxhaws, near the line which divides North from South-Carolina, the rebel force, commanded by colonel Busord, consisting of the eleventh Virginia and detachments of other regiments, from the same province, with artillery, and some cavalry, were brought to action.

AFTER the fummons, in which terms similar to those accepted by Charleston were offered and positively rejected, the action commenced in a wood; the attacks were pointed at both slanks; the front and reserve by two hundred and seventy cavalry and infantry blended; and, at the same instant, all were equally victorious, sew of the enemy escaping, except the commanding officer by a precipitate slight on horseback.

It is above my ability to fay any thing in commendation of the bravery and exertion of officers and and men. I leave their merit to your lordship's consideration.

By his excellency sir Henry Clinton, knight of the most honourable order of the bath, general commander in chief of all his majesty's forces within the colonies lying on the Atlantic ocean, from Nova-Scotia to West-Florida inclusive.

PROCLAMATION.

HEREAS, notwithstanding the gracious offers, which have been made to receive to his majesty's peace and protection, with pardon and oblivion for their past offences, all those his deluded and infatuated subjects, who should return to their duty, and a due obedience to the laws; yet there are some wicked and desperate men, who, regardless of the ruin and misery in which the country will be involved, are still endeavouring to support the slame of rebellion, and, under under pretence of authority derived from the late usurped legislatures, are attempting, by enormous fines, grievous imprisonments, and fanguinary punishments, to compel his majesty's faithful and unwilling subjects to take up arms against his authority and government; and it is therefore become necessary, as well for the protection of the loyal fubjects, as to procure the establishment of peace and good government in the country, to prevent, by the terror of example, such enormous offences being committed in future; I have therefore thought fit to iffue this my proclamation to declare, that if any person shall hereafter appear in arms, in order to prevent the establishment of his majesty's government in this country, or shall, under any pretence or authority whatfoever, attempt to compel any other person or perfons to do fo, or who shall hinder or intimidate, or attempt to hinder or intimidate, the King's faithful and loyal fubjects from joining his forces, or otherwise performing those duties their allegiance requires, fuch person or persons so offending shall be treated with that severity so hardened and criminal an obstinacy will deserve, and his or their estates will be immediately seized in order to be confiscated. And for the encouragement of the King's faithful and peaceable fubjects, I do again affure them, that they shall meet with effectual countenance, protection and support; and whenever the situation of the country will permit of the restoration of civil government and peace, they will, by the commissioners appointed pointed by his majesty for that purpose, be restored to the full possession of that liberty in their persons and property, which they had before experienced under the British government. And that so desirable an event may be the more speedily accomplished, I do hereby, in his majesty's name, require and command all persons whatsoever to be aiding and assisting to his forces, whenever they shall be required, in order to extirpate the rebellion, and thereby restore peace and prosperity to this, at present, desolated and distracted country.

PROCLAMATION.

IS majesty having been pleased by his letters patent, under the Great Seal of Great-Britain, to appoint us to be his commissioners, to restore the blessings of peace and liberty to the feveral colonies in rebellion in America, we do hereby make publick his most gracious intentions, and in obedience to his commands, do declare, to fuch of his deluded subjects, as have been perverted from their duty by the factious arts of felf-interested and ambitious men, that they will still be received with mercy and forgiveness, if they immediately return to their allegiance, and a due obedience to those laws and that government which they formerly boasted was their best birthright and noblest inheritance, and upon a due experience of the fincerity of their professions, a full and free pardon will be granted for the treasonable offences which they have heretofore committed, in fuch manner and form as his majesty's commission doth direct. NEVERTHELESS, NEVERTHELESS, it is only to those, who, convinced of their errors, are firmly resolved to return and to support that government under which they were formerly so happy and free, that these gracious offers are once more renewed, and therefore those persons are excepted, who, notwithstanding their present hopeless situation, and regardless of the accumulating pressure of the miseries of the people, which their infatuated conduct must contribute to increase, are nevertheless still so hardened in their guilt, as to endeavour to keep alive the slame of rebellion in this province, which will otherwise soon be reinstated in its former prosperity, security and peace.

Nor can we at present resolve to extend the royal elemency to those who are polluted with the blood of their fellow-citizens, most wantonly and inhumanly shed under the mock forms of justice, because they refused submission to an usurpation, which they abhorred, and would not oppose that government with which they deemed themselves inseparably connected: and in order to give quiet and content to the minds of his majesty's faithful and well-affected subjects, we do again assure them, that they shall have effectual countenance, protection and support, and, as soon as the situation of the province will admit, the inhabitants will be re-instated in the possession of all those rights and immunities which they heretofore enjoyed under a free British government, exempt from taxation, except by their own legislature: and we do hereby call upon all his majesty's faithful subjects, to be aiding with their endeavours, in order that a measure so conducive to their own happiness, and the welfare and prosperity of the province, may be the more speedily and easily attained.

PROCLAMATION.

THEREAS, after the arrival of his majesty's forces under my command in this province in February last, numbers of persons were made prisoners by the army, or voluntarily furrendered themselves as such, and such persons were afterwards difmissed on their respective paroles: and whereas, fince the furrender of Charleston, and the defeats and dispersion of the rebel forces, it is become unnecessary that such paroles should be any longer 'observed; and proper that all persons should take an active part in fettling and fecuring his majesty's government, and delivering the country from that anarchy which for some time past hath prevailed; I do therefore iffue this my proclamation to declare, that all the inhabitants of this province, who are now prisoners upon parole and were not in the military line (those who were in fort Moultrie and Charleston at the times of their capitulation and Vol. II. furrender.

To their excellencies sir Henry Clinton, knight of the bath, general of his majesty's forces, and Mariot Arbuthnot, esquire, vice-admiral of the Blue, his majesty's commissioners to restore peace and good government in the several colonies in rebellion in North-America.

The humble address of divers inhabitants of Charleston.

THE inhabitants of Charleston, by the ar-L ticles of capitulation, are declared prisoners on parole; but we the under-written, having every inducement to return to our allegiance, and ardently hoping speedily to be re-admitted to the character and condition of British subjects, take this opportunity of tendering to your excellencies our warmest congratulations on the restoration of this capital and province to their political connexion with the crown and government of Great-Britain; an event which will add lustre to your excellencies characters, and, we trust, entitle you to the most distinguishing mark of the royal favour. Although the right of taxing America in parliament, excited confiderable ferments in the minds of the people of this province, yet it may, with a religious adherence to truth, be affirmed, that they did not entertain the most distant thought of dissolving the union that so happily subsisted between them and their parent parent country; and when, in the progress of that fatal controversy, the doctrines of independency (which originated in the more northern colonies) made its appearance among us, our nature revolted at the idea, and we look back with the most painful regret on those convulsions that gave existence to a power of subverting a constitution, for which we always had, and ever shall retain, the most profound veneration, and substituting in its stead a rank democracy, which however carefully digested in theory, on being reduced into practice, has exhibited a system of tyrannick domination, only to be found among the uncivilized part of mankind, or in the history of the dark and barbarous ages of antiquity.

We fincerely lament, that after the repeal of those statutes, which gave rise to the troubles in America, the overtures made by his majesty's commissioners, from time to time, were not regarded by our late rulers. To this satal inattention are to be attributed those calamities which have involved our country in a state of misery and ruin, from which, however, we trust, it will soon emerge, by the wisdom and elemency of his majesty's auspicious government, and the influence of prudential laws, adapted to the nature of the evils we labour under; and that the people will be restored to those privileges, in the enjoyment whereof their former felicity consisted.

Animated with these hopes, we entreat your excellencies excellencies interposition in assuring his majesty, that we shall glory in every occasion of manifesting that zeal and affection for his person and government, with which gratitude can inspire a free and joyful people.

A PROCLAMATION.

HEREAS it hath been represented unto me, that some of the inhabitants of this province have endeavoured to dispose of great part of their property, and intended to remove with their effects out of the limits of his majesty's government, whereby the merchants in Great-Britain, and other lawful creditors, may be greatly injured and defrauded of the just debts which are due to them; and, for many other reasons, the same ought not at present to be permitted: I do therefore, by this my proclamation, strictly forbid all persons whatever, from selling or disposing of, or from offering to sale or disposal, any lands, lands, houses or negroes, without having first obtained a license so to do from the commandant of Charleston, who, in fit and reasonable cases, will grant the fame; and all houses, lands or negroes, which shall hereafter be fold or otherwise disposed of, without such license, will be seized and fequestered. And whereas the privileges and advantages incident to the trade and commerce which is carried on in this province, are by law limited to, and ought to be exclusively enjoyed by, his majesty's liege and faithful subjects; yet, nevertheless, persons who are prisoners have prefumed to interfere therein, and have opened shops for the purpose of carrying on trade and commerce in Charleston; all such persons are hereby cautioned against continuing fuch practices, and if, in future, they do not defift therefrom, their goods and merchandize will be feized and forfeited; and all auctioneers and venduemasters, or other persons, are hereby strictly enjoined from carrying on any trade, or felling or disposing of any goods, wares or merchandize, on account of, or for the benefit of fuch perfons, upon pain of having their license taken from them, or being otherwise dealt with, according to the nature of the case. Provided nevertheles, that nothing is hereby to be construed to extend to prevent bakers, butchers, or any handicraft tradesman, manufacturer, or labourer, from exercifing or carrying on their usual and accustomed occupations and employments. And as fundry perfons may clandestinely withdraw themselves from

from this province, to the prejudice of his majesty's fervice, and injury of their lawful creditors, I do hereby, in the most strict manner, prohibit and forbid all masters of transports, or other veffels employed in his majesty's fervice, from receiving on board, or carrying away any perfons whatever, either white or black, except the crew they brought with them, unless they shall receive a written passport or permission from the commandant at Charleston for that purpose. And the more effectually to prevent the same being done in the veffels employed in the trade and commerce of the country, the masters of all such vessels are hereby ordered to comply with the directions specified in two acts of the general affembly of this province, the one entitled, 'An 'act for the entry of veffels;' and the other, 'An ' additional act to an act for the entry of vessels,' upon pain of being profecuted for the penalties inflicted by the faid acts, in case of their neglect or refufal.

HEREAS it has been reported, in order to feduce the states of South-Carolina and Georgia from their allegiance to these United States, that a treaty of peace between America and Great-Britain was about to take place, in which those two states would be ceded to Great-Britain;

RESOLVED unanimously, that the said report is insidious, and utterly void of soundation; that this confederacy is most facredly pledged to support the liberty and independency of every one of its members, and, in a firm reliance on the Divine blessing, will unremittingly persevere in their exertions for the establishment of the same, and for the recovery and preservation of any and every part of these United States, that has been, or may hereafter be invaded or possessed by the common enemy.

By Horatio Gates, efquire, major-general and commander in chief of the army of the United States in the fouthern department of America, &c. &c.

A PROCLAMATION.

THE patriotick exertions of the virtuous citizens of the United States having enabled me, under the protection of Divine Providence, to vindicate the rights of America in this state, and by the approach of a numerous, well-appointed, and formidable army, to compel our late triumphant and infulting foes to retreat from their most advantageous posts, with precipitation and difmay; I have judged it most expedient, at this period of my progress, to give assurances of forgiveness and perfect security to such of the unfortunate citizens of this state, as have been induced by the terror of fanguinary punishments, the menace of confiscation, and all the arbitrary measures of military domination, apparently to acquiesce under the British government, and to make a forced declaration of allegiance and fupport to a tyranny, which the indignant fouls of citizens citizens resolved on freedom, inwardly revolted at, with horror and detestation.

AND in order to afford an opportunity to the real friends of America to testify their affection and attachment to the cause of liberty, an invitation is hereby held out to them to affert that rank among the free and independent citizens of America, in which their former exertions and zeal had defervedly placed them, and to join heartily, when called upon, in refcuing themfelves and their country from an opposition of a government imposed on them by the ruffian hand of conquest. Nevertheless, I cannot at present refolve to extend these offers of pardon and security to fuch, as in the hour of devastation, have exercifed acts of barbarity and depredation on the persons and property of their fellow-citizens; nor to fuch, as being apprized of the fecurity afforded to them by the army under my command, shall be so lost to a sense of honour and the duty they owe to their country, as hereafter to give countenance and support to that enemy, who, but for the difaffection of many of the apoftate fons of America, had long ere this been driven from the continent.

THE inhabitants of this state may rely on the assurance that an army composed of their brethren and fellow-citizens cannot be brought among them with the hostile vices of plunder and depredation. Such triumphs, under the colour lour of protection and fupport, are left to grace the British arms alone: but they may rest satisfied, that the genuine motive which has given energy to the present exertions, is the hope of rescuing them from the iron rod of oppression, and restoring to them those blessings of freedom and independence which it is the duty and interest of the citizens of these United States, jointly and reciprocally, to support and confirm.

A copy of a letter to generals Smallwood and Gift, from the chevalier Du-Buysson.

Charlotte, August 26, 1780.

Dear generals,

AVING received feveral wounds in the action of the fixteenth instant, I was made prisoner with the honourable major-general the Baron

Baron de Kalb, with whom I ferved as aid-decamp and friend, and had an opportunity of attending that great and good officer during the short time he languished with eleven wounds, which proved mortal on the third day.

It is with pleasure I obey the baron's last commands, in presenting his most affectionate compliments to all the officers and men of his division; he expressed the greatest satisfaction in the testimony given by the British army of the bravery of his troops, and he was charmed with the firm opposition they made to superior force, when abandoned by the rest of the army. The gallant behaviour of the Delaware regiment and the companies of artillery attached to the brigades associated him infinite pleasure, and the exemplary conduct of the whole division gave him an endearing sense of the merit of the troops he had the honour to command.

I am, dear generals,
with regard and respect,
your most obedient humble servant,
LE CHEVALIER DU-BUYSSON.

To brigadier-generals Smallwood and Gift.

RESOLVED, that the thanks of Congress be given to the brigadiers Smallwood and Gift, and to the officers and regular troops of Maryland and Delaware; to the different corps of light infantry, under colonel Porterfield and major Armstrong,

Armstrong, and to the cavalry under colonel Armand, for the bravery and good conduct which they displayed in the action of the sixteenth of August last, near Camden, in the state of South-Carolina.

CONGRESS having refumed the confideration of the report of the committee to which general Gates's letter had been referred, for the purpose of decreeing the honours due to the memory of major-general Baron de Kalb, and the other officers and foldiers, it was

RESOLVED, that a monument be erected to the memory of the deceased major general Baron de Kalb, in the town of Annapolis, in the state of Maryland, with the following inscription:

'SACRED to the memory of the Baron de Kalb, knight of the royal order of military merit, brigadier of the armies of France, and major-general in the fervice of the United States of America. Having ferved with honour and reputation for three years, he gave a last and glorious proof of his attachment to the liberties of mankind, and to the cause of America, in the action near Camden, in the state of South-Carolina, where, leading on the regular troops of Maryland and Delaware against superior forces, forces, and animating them by his example to deeds of valour, he was wounded in feveral places, and died the nineteenth of August fol-

6 lowing, in the forty-eighth year of his age. The Congress of the United States of America, in acknowledgment of his zeal, of his fervices, and of his merit, hath erected this monument.'

Camp, at Rugely's, 15th Aug. 1780.

THE fick, the extra artillery stores, the heavy baggage, and such quartermasters stores as are not immediately wanted, to march this evening under a guard to Waxhaws; to this order the general requests the brigadier-generals to see that those under their command pay the most exact and scrupulous obedience.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL Edmonds, with the remaining guns of the park, will take post, and march with the Virginia brigade under general Stevens; he will direct, as any deficiency happens in the artillery affixed to the other brigades, to supply it immediately; his military staffs, and proportion of his officers, with forty of his men, are to attend him and wait his orders.

THE troops will be ready to march precifely at ten o'clock, in the following order, viz. colonel Armand's advance, cavalry commanded by colonel Armand: colonel Porterfield's light infantry on the right flank of colonel Armand's, in Indian file, two hundred yards from the road; major Armstrong's light infantry in the same order as colonel Porterfield's on the left flank of the legion; advance guard of foot, composed of the advanced picquets, first brigade of Maryland, fecond brigade of Maryland, division of North-Carolina, Virginia division; rear-guard volunteers, cavalry on the right and left of the baggage, equally divided; in this order the troops will proceed this night; in case of an attack by the enemy's cavalry in front, the light infantry on each flank will instantly march up, and give, and continue the most galling fire upon the enemy's horse; this will enable colonel Armand's not only to support the enemy's charge, but finally rout them; the colonel will therefore confider the orders to stand the attack of the enemy's cavalry, be their numbers what they may, as positive: general Stevens will immediately order one captain, two lieutenants, one enfign, three ferjeants, one drum, and fixty rank and file, to join colonel Porterfield's infantry; these men are to be taken from the most experienced woodsmen, and men every way fittest for the service.

The general will likewise complete Armstrong's light infantry to their original number, those must be immediately marched to the advanced post of the army. The troops will preserve the profoundest silence on the march, and any soldier who offers to sire, without the command of his officer, must be instantly put to death.

When the ground will admit of it, and the near approach of the enemy renders it necessary, Vol. II. 3 L the the army will, when ordered, march in columns; the artillery at the head of their respective brigades, and the baggage in the rear. The guard of the heavy baggage will be composed of the remaining officers and soldiers of the artillery. One captain, two subalterns, four serjeants, four drums, and fixty rank and file, and no person whatever is to presume to send any other soldier upon that service.

All batmen, waiters, &c. who are foldiers taken from the line, are forthwith to join their respective regiments, and act with their masters, while they are upon duty. The tents of the whole army to be struck at tattoo.

A PROCLAMATION.

HEREAS, notwithstanding the modera-tion of the British government, and his majesty's unparalleled elemency to those of his deluded subjects, who, from a sense of their errors, have returned to their duty and allegiance, there are feveral persons of property in this province, who obstinately persist in their guilty and treasonable practices, and are either in the service or acting under the authority of the rebel Congress; or by abandoning their plantations, to join the enemies of Great-Britain; or by an open avowal of rebellious principles, and other notorious acts, do manifest a wicked and desperate perfeverance, in opposing to the utmost of their power, the re-establishment of his majesty's just and lawful authority: and whereas it is a duty incumbent upon me to take all due precaution to fecure the tranquillity of his majesty's government, and the peace and liberties of his faithful and loyal subjects in this province, and to prevent the wicked defigns of fuch ill-disposed persons, as are above described, from taking effect: and whereas it might be of dangerous confequence to fuffer fuch persons to possels and make use of their estates in this province, thereby furnishing them with the means of carrying on their malicious and traitorous defigns more effectually into execution; and as it likewise appears to me both just and expedient, that the property which they have voluntarily staked in support of rebellion, should now be applied, on our part, to defray a portion of the expences occasioned by the obstinate delinquency of their faction. I have therefore thought fit to iffue this proclamation, to notify to all perfons concerned, that I have ordered the estates, both real and personal, in this province, belonging to the wicked and dangerous traitors above described, to be sequestered; and I have constituted and appointed John Cruden, esquire, to be commissioner to execute the purposes of this proclamation, with full power and authority, on receipt of an order or warrant under my hand, or the hand of the officer commanding the British forces in this province, or of the commandant of Charleston, and not otherwife, to take into his charge, custody and posfession, the estates, both real and personal, of those who have abandoned their plantations, to join the enemies of Great-Britain; and of the estates, both real and personal, not included in the capitulation of Charleston, of those in the fervice, or acting under the authority of the rebel Congress; and of the estates, both real and perfonal, of those persons, who, by an open avowal of rebellious principles, or by other notorious acts, do manifest a wicked and desperate, perseverance in opposing, to the utmost of their, power, the re-establishment of his majesty's just and lawful authority: and the faid commissioner shall, within the term of twenty-one days after execution of every fuch order or warrant above mentioned, by feizure of the estates or property therein described, cause notice thereof to be published in three successive news-papers, that no person concerned may plead ignorance of the fame; and the like term is allowed for the removal of possessions from the premises so seized. And to the end, that this trust of so great importance be duly and faithfully administered for the publick benefit, I do hereby strictly require and enjoin, that the faid commissioners do, in every case of the seizure of property, whether real or, personal, forthwith take upon the spot, if in the country, in prefence of two persons acting either as field officers, or captains of militia under his majesty's government, and, if in town, in prefence of two creditable freeholders, an exact inventory of the property fo feized, which they are hereby required to fign, and it is to be kept and produced by the commissioner, as a voucher on the exhibition of his accounts. And whereas it is dictated by humanity and compassion, that due and reasonable consideration be had for the families of the traitorous offenders, whose property is necessarily become the object of this proclamation, I have authorized and directed the faid commissioner to pay, for the support and maintenance maintenance of families, confisting of a wife and children, one fourth part of the net annual product of the feized estates respectively, and one fixth part where there is a wife and no children, as the case may be; provided they are resident, and continue to be refident, within this province; and the receipts and acquittances of the parties shall be, and are hereby directed to be, considered fufficient vouchers to the faid commissioner at the fettlement of his accounts. And it being highly expedient, that accounts of all personal property, and of the issues and produce of all estates, consisting of land, negroes, cattle, and of every species of property, seized by virtue of this proclamation, be kept in the most clear and distinct manner possible: I do hereby direct, that the faid commissioner do keep particular and separate accounts of all property, real and perfonal, under the names of the persons who were supposed and acknowledged to be the proprietors at the time of feizure: and I do hereby further direct and require the faid commissioner to make up a general account of the expence of management, and of the amount of the fale and disposal of all property whatfoever, that shall come into his hands, which is to be laid before the commandant and board of police of Charleston, every fix months, or oftener, if it shall appear necessary and practicable; and he shall be thereunto required, during fuch time as the faid estates shall remain under sequestration: and the commandant and board of police are hereby directed and required required to inspect the said accounts with all convenient dispatch; and if they appear to them to be just and right, to grant a certificate thereof to the faid commissioner; and the faid commissioner is hereby further required, upon fuch certificate being granted, to pay the balance arifing from the above described estates, into the hands of the paymaster-general of his majesty's forces, or his deputy, to be applied to the purpose beforementioned, or in any other manner that may be directed by his majesty's commissioners for restoring peace to America, or the commander in chief. And I do hereby declare, that any person or persons obstructing or impeding the said commissioner in the execution of his duty, by concealment or removal of any property he may be authorized to feize, or otherwife, shall, on conviction, be punished as aiding and abetting rebellion; and if any person or persons shall make discovery where any effects are concealed, or attempted to be carried away, or shall give any necessary information to the said John Cruden, esquire, so that effects belonging to a person whose estate is sequestered, may be secured, the person or persons giving such information shall be most liberally rewarded: and all officers, civil and military, and all other perfons whatfoever, are strictly enjoined and required to aid and affist the faid John Cruden and his deputies, in the execution of the trust reposed in him. And whereas certain limited orders and powers have been given by me to colonels and commanding officers of militia, in some few of the districts of this province, to feize the horses, cattle, negroes, and provisions of persons concerned in the late revolt, more particularly described in the said orders, and to apply the fame, under certain regulations and restrictions, to the indemnification of the King's loyal and faithful subjects in the respective districts, who had suffered by the depredations of the rebels: and whereas the colonels and commanding officers of militia were, by the faid orders, directed to report to me, at the headquarters of the army, the property they should feize, by virtue of the fame, specifying clearly its nature and value, and the application thereof, towards the relief and indemnity of his majesty's faithful subjects, who have suffered as aforesaid; I do now hereby require and command them, instead of reporting to me their proceedings, as above directed, to transmit to the commandant of Charleston, within the term of fourteen days after the distribution of the property seized, particular accounts of all fuch property feized, and of its application and distribution, in writing, which are to be figned by the colonel or commanding officer of the militia, and by the twelve men of the neighbourhood who condemned the property, and ordered distribution of the same; and that they do transmit exact duplicates of the faid accounts, figned in the manner above directed, at the fame time, to John Cruden, esquire, the commissioner named in this proclamation, to be lodged in his office at Charleston, VOL. II. 3 M to the end that it may appear and be ascertained how the property seized, under the above-recited orders, hath been applied and distributed.

Given under my hand and feal, at head-quarters, in the district of Waxhaws, in the faid province, the fixteenth day of September, anno Domini 1780, and in the twentieth year of his majesty's reign.

CORNWALLIS.

N O T E XXV. PAGE 172.

To the right honourable Charles earl Cornwallis, lieutenant-general of his majesty's forces, &c. &c. &c.

The humble address of divers loyal inhabitants of Charleston.

E, his majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, inhabitants of Charleston, finding ourselves disappointed in the expectation we entertained of your lordship's returning shortly to this capital, whereby we are precluded of personal access to your lordship, take this opportunity, through the intervention of the commandant, of tendering to your lordship our joyful congratulations lations on the total defeat and dispersion of the rebel army, by his majesty's forces under your command.

WHEN we reflect on the desolation and ruin with which this province was threatened by the unrelenting cruelty of a formidable and menacing enemy, we think ourselves fortunate that we had no idea of our danger, until we were effectually relieved from it by the glorious victory obtained by your lordship, wherein the interpofition of a protecting Providence is evident; which inspires us with gratitude to the Supreme Ruler of the universe; and at the same time excites in our minds a due fense of the manifold obligations we have to your lordship, for your distinguished conduct and courage, so eminently conspicuous in the accomplishment of that great event, which has refcued this province from impending destruction, and is no less advantageous to our most gracious fovereign and the British empire, than honourable to your lordship; and which fame will transmit to the latest posterity, with that tribute of praise and admiration your lordship has fo justly merited on this important occation.

ALTHOUGH a prevailing faction subverted our excellent constitution, and established a democratic kind of government in its stead, yet, as that arbitrary system of rule was annihilated by the surrender of this capital, and submission of the country, country, every member of the community had an indubitable right to confult his own happiness; and as the people in general, induced by their predilection and veneration for the old constitution, have made an explicit declaration of their allegiance, and availed themselves of the protection of that government under which they formerly enjoyed the highest degree of civil and political liberty, as well as fecurity in their properties, we cannot but consider the late attempt of Congress to subjugate the freemen of this province to their tyrannical domination, an additional proof of their reftless ambition, and of the wicked machinations of the contemptible remains of that expiring faction, who have fo recently exercised a despotick and lawless sway over us; and we trust that every other hostile experiment, by the goodness of God, and your lordship's vigilance and animated endeavours, will be rendered equally futile.

THAT Heaven, propitious to your lordship's active zeal in the service of your King and country, may crown your future exertions with success, and incline our deluded sister colonies to partake of those blessings of which we have so fair a prospect, are the sincere and ardent wishes, not only of us, but we are persuaded of every other loyal inhabitant of Charleston.

A PROCLAMATION.

THEREAS it has pleased the Divine Providence to prosper the operations of his majefty's arms in driving the rebel army out of this province: and whereas it is his majesty's most gracious wish to rescue his faithful and loyal subjects from the cruel tyranny under which they have groaned for feveral years: I have thought proper to iffue this proclamation to invite all fuch faithful and loyal fubjects to repair, without loss of time, with their arms and ten days provisions, to the royal standard now erected at Hillsborough, where they will meet with the most friendly reception; and I do hereby assure them, that I am ready to concur with them in effectual measures for suppressing the remains of rebellion in this province, and for the re-establishment of good order and constitutional government.

Given under my hand at head-quarters, at Hillsborough, this 20th day of February, in the year of our LORD 1781, and in the 21st year of his majesty's reign.

Page 3, 4. UR hopes of fuccess in offenfive operations were not founded only on the efforts of the corps, under my immediate command, which did not much exceed three thousand men, but principally upon the most positive assurances given by apparent credible deputies and emissaries, that, upon the appearance of a British army in North-Carolina, a great body of inhabitants were ready to joint and co-operate with it, in endeavouring to restore his majesty's government.

PAGE 5. The unexpected failure of our friends rendered the victory at Guilford of little value. I know it has been afferted, or infinuated, that they were not fufficiently tried upon this occafion: but can any dispassionate person believe, that I did not give every encouragement to people of all descriptions to join and affist us, when our own reputation, the safety of the army, and the interests of my country, were so deeply concerned in that junction and affistance? All inducements in my power were made use of without material effect; and every man in my army must have been convinced, that the accounts of our emissaries had greatly exaggerated the number ber of those who had professed friendship for us; as they must have observed, that a very considerable part of them could not be prevailed on to remain with us, or to exert themselves in any form whatever.

This disappointment, and the wants and distresses of the army, compelled me to move to Cross Creek; but meeting there no material part of the promised assistance and support, I was obliged to continue my march to Wilmington.

A letter from the board of loyalists to earl Cornwallis.

MY LORD,

March 5, 1783.

WE, the board of agents for the American loyalists, beg leave to address a few lines to your lordship, with all possible respect, on a subject which we feel ourselves, and those we represent, so deeply interested in, that we cannot remain silent without neglecting the trust reposed in us.

WHILST in reading your lordship's late publication, we entertain the highest admiration of your character, and are conscious that your humanity

manity equals that intrepidity and perseverance, that have marked the whole of your conduct in America, and accompanied your lordship's march through wild extents of North-Carolina into Virginia; we cannot but observe, with extreme regret, some passages that have dropped from your lordship's pen, relative to the conduct of the loyalists in North-Carolina, which, without some explanation, may make impressions never intended by your lordship, to the disadvantage of a body of men, who have facrificed their all, by steadily persevering in their allegiance to their sovereign, and by maintaining, at every risk, and with the utmost constancy and unremitted exertions, his authority and just rights in America.

THE favourable opinion your lordship has so frequently expressed of this body of men will, we hope, be our excuse for troubling your lordship on this occasion.

THE very high esteem so justly entertained of your lordship in this kingdom, gives great weight to every thing coming from you; and we are apprehensive, lest the enclosed extracts from the introduction to your lordship's letters, by being either misunderstood, or maliciously misrepresented, may be detrimental to our intended application to parliament.

PEOPLE in this country are in general ignorant of the state of North-Carolina, its extent, and the scattered scarcity of its inhabitants, and, of course, from that ignorance, are easily led to form hasty opinions of the practicability of things, in their nature impossible.

WE humbly conceive, we have only to suggest these our apprehensions to your lordship's humanity and candour, on which we rely with perfect considence, that they will dictate to your lordship such measures as are best adapted to prevent any possible mischief, which, we are well assured, was never designed on your lordship's part. In this reliance, we have the honour of subscribing ourselves; with the highest respect,

Signed on behalf of the board,

J. WRIGHT, prefident.

GENTLEMEN,

I HAVE received the honour of your letter on the fifth instant, and am extremely concerned to learn, that some expressions in my answer to sir Henry Clinton's narrative, have given pain to a body of men so respectable, and so peculiarly circumstanced, as the unfortunate American loyalists. My services in North-America gave me numberless opportunities to observe the undoubted loyalty of a great body of people; and, I hope, that the whole tenor of my conduct has proved, not only that I was even sensible of their merits, but that, if at any time my friendship and protection has not come up to their expectations, the want of power has been the sole cause of their disappointment.

When I found myself called upon, by fir Henry Clinton's narrative, to publish a vindication of my own conduct during the campaign of 1781, it was as far from my intention, as it would have been cruelly unjust, to convey a doubt of the loyal disposition of a great number of the inhabitants of North-Carolina: convinced of their loyalty, it was with reluctance, even when disappointed, that I complained of their inactivity; as it proceeded from causes which will save them from censure with all generous minds.

North-Carolina being in proportion to its immense extent but thinly inhabited, and our friends being not only much dispersed, but mixed in every district with people of opposite principles, who had possessed themselves of the power of government, their efforts to manifest their loyalty had been made under great disadvantages, and had been attended with many satal consequences, previous to our march into that province. Many had lost their lives, and numbers had long languished in confinement, or had been driven out of the country, in consequence of the rising in the year 1776.

The premature rifing at Ramfour's, colonel Bryan's junction with us in South-Carolina, both directly contrary to my recommendation, and colonel Ferguson's defeat on King's Mountain, in the year 1780, had occasioned the ruin of many families, and had furnished pretexts to exercise cruelties upon individuals, to a degree neither believed nor conceived in this country; those rigours, joined to a long series of former oppressions, had, in my opinion, totally broke the spirits of the greatest number of our friends before our arrival among them.

HOPE of relief naturally induced their emissaries (perhaps not sensible of it) to conceal this from me, and I could only discover it from experience, when I called upon them for assistance. I will freely confess, that I was then convinced that we had been too sanguine on both sides; our expectations had been too high of co-operation and assistance, and our friends had expected too much from the appearance of a British army in the province.

To account for some parts of my own conduct, it was necessary to state this disappointment; but when the situation of these unfortunate people is fairly considered, I am persuaded that I cannot have have excited any emotion but compassion for them, in the breasts of all liberal men. The characters and principles of a great body of loyalists, at present in this country, or with our army in North-America, can be still less affected by misconstructions of any expressions of mine. Many, by gallantly taking arms in the common cause, some, by acting in civil capacities, and others, by abandoning their families and properties in America, have proved their loyalty and attachment to this government beyond all possibility of being controverted; and have, therefore, the best founded claims for compensation, upon the generofity and justice of Britain. I beg leave to affure the board of agents, that I am truly fensible of the high value of the favourable opinion that they have been pleafed to express of my conduct during this calamitous war; and I shall ever lament that my endeavours were so ineffectual to promote the interest of individuals, and the re-union of the British empire.

I HAVE the honour to be, with great respect, gentlemen, your most obedient, and most humble servant,

Cornwallis.

Sir James Wright, bart. president, and the other members of the board of agents for the American loyalists.

A PROCLAMATION.

HEREAS by the bleffing of Almighty God, his majesty's arms have been crowned with fignal fuccess, by the complete victory obtained over the rebel forces on the fifth instant, I have thought proper to issue this proclamation, to call upon all loyal subjects to stand forth, and take an active part in restoring good order and government: and whereas it has been represented to me, that many persons in this province, who have taken a share in this unnatural rebellion, but having experienced the oppression and injustice of the rebel government, and having feen the errors into which they have been deluded by falsehoods and misrepresentations, are fincerely defirous of returning to their duty and allegiance, I do hereby notify and promise to all fuch perfons (murderers excepted) that if they will furrender themselves, with their arms and ammunition, at head-quarters, or to the officer commanding in the diffrict contiguous to their respective places of residence, on or before the twentieth day of April next, they will be permitted to return to their homes, upon giving a military parole; and shall be protected in their persons and properties from all forts of violence from the British troops; and will be restored, as soon as possible, to all the privileges of legal and constitutional government.

Extract of brigadier-general Arnold's letter to sir Henry Clinton.

SIR,

AM extremely forry to inform your excellency, that major-general Philips is reduced fo low by a fever, which feized him on the fecond inftant, that he is incapable of business, and the physicians are not without fears for his safety. In this situation I think it my duty to transmit to your excellency by express a detail of the proceedings of the army under the orders of major-general Philips, since they left Portsmouth, which his indisposition prevented him from doing as he intended.

On the eighteenth of April the light infantry, part

part of the feventy-fixth and eightieth regiments, the queen's rangers, yagers, and American legion, embarked at Portsmouth, and fell down to Hampton road; on the nineteenth, proceeded up James river to Burwell's ferry; on the twentieth lieutenant-colonel Abercrombie, with the light infantry, proceeded up the Chickahomany in boats; lieutenant-colonel Simcoe, with a detachment, to York; lieutenant-colonel Dundas, with another detachment, landed at the mouth of the Chickahomany; and major-general Philips and myfelf landed with part of the army at Williamfburg, where about five hundred militia were posted, who retired upon our approach. The militia at York croffed the river before the arrival of lieutenant-colonel Simcoe, who made a few prisoners, spiked and destroyed some cannon, and next day returned to Williamsburg.

On the twenty-second the troops marched to Chickahomany. We were met on the road, five miles from the mouth of the river, by lieutenant-colonel Dundas, with his detachment: this evening the troops, cavalry, artillery, &c. were reembarked. The next morning we were joined by lieutenant-colonel Abercrombie, with the light infantry, who had been ten or twelve miles up the Chickahomany, and destroyed several armed ships, the state ship-yards, ware-houses, &c. &c.

THE twenty-fourth weighed anchor at eleven o'clock, and run up to City Point, where the troops, &c. were all landed at fix o'clock in the evening.

The twenty-fifth marched at ten o'clock for Petersburg, where we arrived about five o'clock P. M. We were opposed, about one mile from town, by a body of militia, under the orders of brigadier-general Muhlenburgh, supposed to be about one thousand men, who were soon obliged to retire over the bridge, with the loss of near one hundred men killed and wounded, as we have since been informed; our loss only one man killed and ten wounded. The enemy took up the bridge, which prevented our pursuing them.

TWENTY-SIXTH. Destroyed at Petersburg four thousand hogsheads of tobacco, one ship, and a number of small vessels on the stocks and in the river.

TWENTY-SEVENTH. Major-general Philips, with the light-infantry, part of the cavalry of the queen's rangers, and part of the yagers, marched to Chestersield courthouse, where they burned a range of barracks for two thousand men, and three hundred barrels of flour, &c.

THE same day I marched to Osborn's, with the seventy fixth and eightieth regiments, queen's rangers, part of the yagers, and American legion, where we arrived about noon. Finding the enemy had very confiderable force of ships four miles above Osborn's, drawn up in a line to oppose us, I sent a flag to the commodore, proposing to treat with him for the furrender of his fleet, which he refused, with this answer, 'That he was determined to defend it to the last ex-'tremity.' I immediately ordered down two fix and two three-pounders, brass field-pieces, to a bank of the river, nearly level with the water, and within one hundred yards of the Tempest, a twenty-gun state-ship, which began immediately to fire upon us, as did the Renown of twentyfix guns, the Jefferson, a state brigantine of fourteen guns, and feveral other armed ships and brigantines; about two or three hundred militia, on the opposite shore, at the same time kept up a heavy fire of musketry upon us. Notwithstanding which, the fire of the artillery, under the direction of captain Fage and lieutenant Rogers, took fuch place, that the ships were soon obliged to strike their colours, and the militia drove from the opposite shore. Want of boats, and the wind blowing hard, prevented our capturing many of the feamen, who took to their boats, and escaped on shore; but not without first scuttling and setting fire to some of their ships, which could not be faved.

Two ships, three brigantines, five sloops, and two schooners, loaded with tobacco, cordage, flour, &c. fell into our hands.

Four ships, five brigantines, and a number of small vessels, were sunk and burned. On board the whole sleet, none of which escaped, were taken and destroyed about two thousand hogsheads of tobacco, &c. &c. and very fortunately we had not a man killed or wounded this day; but have reason to believe the enemy suffered considerably. About five o'clock P. M. we were joined by major-general Philips, with the light infantry.

TWENTY-EIGHTH. The troops remained at Osborn's, waiting for boats from the fleet; part of them were employed in securing the prizes, and carrying them to Osborn's, as a place of safety.

TWENTY-NINTH. The boats having arrived, the troops were put in motion. Major-general Philips marched with the main body; at the fame time I proceeded up the river, with a detachment in boats, and met him between Cary's mills and Warwick.

THIRTIETH. The troops marched to Manchester, and destroyed twelve hundred hogsheads of tobacco. The marquis de la Fayette having arrived with his army at Richmond, opposite to Manchester, Manchester, the day before, and being joined by the militia drove from Petersburg and Williamsburg, they were spectators of the conflagration, without attempting to molest us. The same evening we returned to Warwick, where we destroyed a magazine of five hundred barrels of flour, and colonel Cary's fine mills were destroyed in burning the magazine of flour. We also burned several warehouses, with one hundred and fifty hogsheads of tobacco, a large ship and a brigantine association, and three vessels on the stocks, a large range of publick rope-walks and storehouses, and some tan and bark-houses full of hides and bark.

MAY first. Marched to Osborn's, and dispatched our prizes and boats down the river; and in the evening marched to Bermuda Hundreds, opposite City Point.

MAY fecond. Embarked the troops, &c. &c.

MAY third. Fell down the river to Westover.

MAY fourth. Proceeded down to Tappahan-nock.

FIFTH and fixth. Part of the fleet fell down to Hog-Island.

SEVENTH. Major-general Philips having received a letter from lord Cornwallis, orders were given for the fleet to return up the river again.

We

We arrived at Brandon about five o'clock, and most of the troops, cavalry, &c. were landed this evening, though it blew a gale of wind.

MAY eighth. Remained at Brandon. Majorgeneral Philips being very ill, and unable to travel on horseback, a post-chaise was procured for him.

May ninth. The light infantry, and part of the queen's rangers, in boats, were ordered, with the Formidable and Spitfire, to proceed to City Point, and land there. The rest of the army were put in motion for Petersburgh, where they arrived late in the night, having marched near thirty miles this day.

On our leaving Bermuda Hundred, and going down the river, the marquis de la Fayette, with his army, moved towards Williamsburg, and by forced marches had crossed the Chickahomany at Long Bridge, when our fleet returned to Brandon, which retrogade motion of ours occasioned him to return as rapidly by forced marches to Osborn's, where he arrived the eighth, and was preparing to cross the river to Petersburg when we arrived there, which was so unexpected, that we surprized and took two majors, one of them aid-de-camp to Baron Steuben, the other to general Smallwood; one captain and three lieutenants of dragoons; two lieutenants of foot, a commissary, and a surgeon: some of these gentlemen arrived only two hours before us, with an intention of collecting the boats for the marquis to cross his army.

On the tenth the marquis made his appearance on the opposite side of the river with a strong escort, and having stayed some time to reconnoitre our army, returned to his camp at Osborn's; and we are this day informed he is marched to Richmond, where it is said Wayne, with the Pennsylvania line, has arrived; this is however uncertain, but he is certainly expected there.

An express passed through this place the day before our arrival here, who lest Halifax on the seventh, and informed, that the advance of lord Cornwallis's arrived there that morning: this report we have from several quarters, and I am inclined to believe it is true. Several expresses have been sent to his lordship, informing him of our being here ready to co-operate with his lordship. We are in anxious expectation of having particular intelligence from him every minute.

As foon as it is reduced to a certainty that lord Cornwallis has croffed the Roanoke, and is on his march for this place, the army will advance one or two days march from hence to meet his lordship, and carry a supply of provisions for his army.

A confiderable magazine of flour and bread has fallen into our hands near this place, and the country abounds with cattle.

Major-general Philips is so weak and low, that it will be some considerable time before he can go through the fatigue of business. In this critical situation, I am happy to have the assistance of so many good and experienced officers with me, commanding corps. If joined by lord Cornwallis, or the reinforcement said to be coming from New-York, we shall be in force to operate as we please in Virginia or Maryland.

I have the honour to be, &c.
(Signed) B. Arnold.

SIR,

I AM directed by the commander in chief to fend you the following account of the operations of the army in Virginia, under the command of lieutenant general the earl Cornwallis, which you will please to publish in your Gazette.

I am, fir, your most obedient servant,

A. DELANCY, Ad. Gen.

To mr. James Rivington.

His lordship, after passing James river, at Westover over, moved to Hanover courthouse, and croffed the South-Annæ: the marquis de la Fayette keeping about twenty miles distant from him. From this place his lordship detached lieutenant-colonels Tarleton and Simcoe, the former of which took some members of the affembly at Charlotte Ville, and destroyed there, and on his return, one thousand stand of good arms, some clothing, and other stores, and between four and five hundred barrels of powder without opposition. Baron Steuben, who commanded about eight hundred twelve months men and militia, retired with great precipitation, from the Point of Fork, before lieutenant-colonel Simcoe, who, after using every operation to attack the rear-guard, destroyed there, and at the places adjacent, about three thousand three hundred stand of arms, (then under repair) some falt, harness, &c. and about one hundred and fifty barrels of powder. His lordship then moved by Richmond, and arrived at Williamsburg on the twenty-fifth of June, having, in addition to the articles already mentioned, destroyed, on this expedition, in different places, above two thousand hogsheads of tobacco, a great number of iron guns, ten brass French twenty-four-pounders, and brought off four thirteen-inch brass mortars, sive brass eightinch howitzers, four long brass nine-pounders, all French, and a confiderable quantity of shot and shells. On the twenty-fixth, as lieutenant-colonel Simcoe was returning with his corps and the yagers, from the destruction of some boats and horfes horses on the Chickahomany, he was attacked by a much superior force of the enemy, who were repulsed with a considerable loss, and three officers, and twenty-eight privates taken prisoners.

On the fixth, information was brought him about noon of the approach of the enemy, and about four in the afternoon attacked his out-posts, but concluded that the enemy would not bring a considerable force within his reach, unless they supposed that nothing was lest but a rear-guard. His lordship took every means to convince them of his weakness, which had the desired effect; for about sun-set, a body of troops with artillery, began to form in front of his camp. He then put the troops under arms, and ordered the army to advance in two lines.

The attack was begun by the first line with great spirit, there being nothing but militia opposed to the light infantry; the action was soon over on the right, but lieutenant-colonel Dundas's brigade, consisting of the forty-third, seventy-sixth and eightieth regiments, which formed the left wing, meeting the Pennsylvania line, and detachment of the marquis de la Fayette's continentals, tinentals, with two four pounders, a fmart action enfued for fome minutes, when the enemy gave way, and abandoned their cannon. The cavalry were ready to purfue, but the darkness of the evening prevented his lordship making use of them.

His lordship commends the spirit and good behaviour of the officers and soldiers of the whole army, but the seventy-sixth and eightieth regiments, on whom the brunt of the action fell, had an opportunity to distinguish themselves particularly; and his lordship says, that lieutenant-colonel Dundas's conduct and gallantry deserve the highest praise. The force of the enemy in the field was about two thousand continentals and militia, and their loss, he believes, between two and three hundred, and that half an hour more day-light would probably have given him the greatest part of the corps.

No. I.

SIR, Augusta, May 31, 1781.

HE usage of war renders it necessary that we present you with an opportunity of avoiding avoiding destruction, which impends your garrison.

WE have deferred our fummons to this late date, to preclude the necessity of much correspondence on the occasion. You see the strength of the investing forces, the progress of our works, and you may inform yourself of the situation of the two armies, by enquiries from captain Armstrong, of the legions, who has the honour to bear this.

We have the honour to be, fir, your most obedient fervants, Andrew Pickens, B. G. Mil. Henry Lee, jun. Lieut. Col. commanding continental troops.

Lieut. Col. Brown.

No. II.

GENTLEMEN,

WHAT progress you have made in your works I am no stranger to. It is my duty and inclination to defend this post to the last extremity.

I have the honour to be, gentlemen, your most obedient, humble fervant,

THOMAS BROWN, Lieut. Col. commanding King's troops at Augusta.

Articles

Articles of capitulation proposed by lieutenant-colonel Brown, and answered by general Pickens and lieutenant-colonel Lee.

ARTICLE I. That all acts of hostilities and works shall cease between the besiegers and besieged, until the articles of capitulation shall be agreed on, signed and executed, or collectively rejected.

Answer. Hostilities shall cease for one hour, other operations to continue.

ARTICLE II. That the fort shall be surrendered to the commanding officer of the American troops, such as it now stands. That the King's troops, three days after signing the articles of capitulation, shall be conducted to Savannah with their baggage, where they will remain prisoners of war until they are exchanged; that proper conveyances shall be provided by the commanding officer of the American troops for that purpose, together with a sufficient quantity of good and wholesome provisions, till their arrival at Savannah.

ANSWER. Inadmissible. The prisoners to surrender field prisoners of war. The officers to be indulged with their paroles; the soldiers to be conducted to such place as the commander in chief shall direct.

ARTICLE III. The militia now in garrison shall Vol. II. 3 Q

Answer. Answered by the second article, the militia making part of the garrison.

ARTICLE IV. The fick and wounded shall be under the care of their own furgeons, and be supplied with fuch medicines and necessaries as are allowed to the British hospitals.—Agreed.

ARTICLE V. The officers of the garrison, and citizens who have borne arms during the siege, shall keep their side arms, pistols and baggage, which shall not be searched, and retain their fervants.

Answer. The officers and citizens who have borne arms during the fiege, shall be permitted their fide arms, private baggage, and servants; their fide arms not to be worn; and the baggage to be searched by a person appointed for that purpose.

ARTICLE VI. The garrison, at an hour appointed, shall march out with shouldered arms and drums beating, to a place to be agreed on, where they will pile their arms.

Answer. Agreed. The judicious and gallant defence made by the garrison, entitles them to every mark of military respect. The fort to be delivered up to captain Rudolph at twelve o'clock, who will take possession with a detachment of the legion infantry.

Article

Answer. Inadmissible.

ARTICLE VIII. That twelve months shall be allowed to all such as do not choose to reside in this country, to dispose of their effects, real and personal, in this province, without any molestation whatever, or to remove to any part thereof, as they may choose, as well themselves as families.

ANSWER. Inadmissible.

ARTICLE IX. That the Indian families now in garrifon shall accompany the King's troops to Savannah, where they will remain prisoners of war, until exchanged for an equal number of prisoners in the Creek or Cherokee nations.

Answer. Answered in the second article.

ARTICLE X. That an express be permitted to go to Savannah, with the commanding officer's despatches, which are not to be opened.

Answer. Agreed.

ARTICL'E XI. Additional. The particular attention of colonel Brown is expected towards the just delivery of all publick stores, monies, &c. and that no loans be permitted to defeat the spirit of this article.

By the United States in Congress assembled, October 29, 1781.

ESOLVED, that the thanks of the United States in Congress assembled, be presented to major-general Greene, for his wife, decisive and magnanimous conduct in the action of the eighth of September last, near the Eutaw Springs, in South-Carolina; in which, with a force inferior in number to that of the enemy, he obtained a most signal victory.

THAT the thanks of the United States in Congress affembled be presented to the officers and men of the Maryland and Virginia brigades, and Delaware battalion of continental troops, for the unparalleled bravery and heroism by them displayed, in advancing to the enemy through an incessant fire, and charging them with an impetuosity and ardour that could not be resisted.

THAT the thanks of the United States in Congress affembled be presented to the officers and men of the legionary corps and artillery, for their intrepid and gallant exertions during the action.

THAT the thanks of the United States in Congress assembled be presented to the brigade of North-Carolina, for their resolution and perseverance in attacking the enemy, and sustaining a superior sire.

That

THAT the thanks of the United States in Congress affembled be presented to the officers and men of the state corps of South-Carolina, for the zeal, activity and sirmness by them exhibited throughout the engagement.

THAT the thanks of the United States in Congress assembled be presented to the officers and men of the militia, who formed the front line in the order of battle, and sustained their post with honour, propriety, and a resolution worthy of men determined to be free.

RESOLVED, that a British standard be presented to major-general Greene, as an honourable testimony of his merit, and a golden medal emblematical of the battle and victory aforesaid.

THAT major-general Greene be defired to prefent the thanks of Congress to captains Pierce and Pendleton, major Hyrne and captain Shubrick, his aids-de-camp, in testimony of their particular activity and good conduct during the whole of the action.

THAT a fword be presented to captain Pierce, who bore the general's despatches, giving an account of the victory, and that the board of war take order herein.

RESOLVED, that the thanks of the United States in Congress affembled be presented to brigadier-general Marion, of the South-Carolina Vol. II. 3 R militia, militia, for his wife, gallant and decided conduct, in defending the liberties of his country, and particularly for his prudent and intrepid attack on a body of the British troops, on the thirtieth day of August last, and for the distinguished part he took in the battle of the eighth of September.

SOUTH-CAROLINA.

By his excellency John Rutledge, esquire, governor and commander in chief of the said state.

A PROCLAMATION.

HEREAS many perfons taking advantage of the late diffurbed and unfettled condition of the state, and hoping in the confusion and disorder occasioned by the calamities of war to escape punishment, have committed the most wanton and rapacious acts of plundering; some under colour of indemnifying themselves for losses which they have sustained; others, under pretence that the persons to whom such property belonged are tories or enemies of the state; and others, from a wicked and inordinate desire of acquiring wealth by any means, however unjustifiable, and from any persons, whether friends or foes: and whereas the publick safety requires that the most effectual measures should be taken for fuppressing such an unwarrantable and pernicious practice, inafmuch as good and faithful fubjects should be secured and protected in the full and free enjoyment of their property, and no man, although criminal, should be despoiled of his estate but by due course of law: I have therefore thought fit to issue this proclamation, strictly forbidding all persons from plundering, taking, or holding the property of others under any pretence, or for any cause whatever; warning persons possessed of such property, of the danger which they will incur by continuing to withhold it, and charging them immediately to restore such property to the owners of it, unless fuch owners are with the enemy; and in that case, to deliver it to the brigadier-general of the district in which it is, as they will answer the contrary at their peril; for speedy and effectual punishment shall be inflicted on the offenders: and I do direct all justices of the peace diligently and faithfully to execute their office, and to use all lawful means that may be necessary for apprehending, fecuring, and bringing to justice fuch persons as are or may be accused of the abovementioned, or any other criminal offence. I do moreover command all military officers of this state to give such aid and affistance to the civil magistrates, as they may require for that purpose: and I do exhort all those who know, or have reafon to believe, where any plundered property is concealed or fecreted, or by whom it is possessed.

to make discovery and give information touching the same to the nearest magistrate, in order that proper steps may be taken for the recovery thereof.

Given under my hand and the Great Seal, at the High Hills of Santee, this fifth day of August, 1781, and in the fixth year of the independence of America.

Ladies' petition for colonel Isaac Hayne.

To the right honourable lord Rawdon, commander in chief of his majesty's forces in South-Carolina, and to colonel Balfour, commandant at Charleston.

My lord and fir,

E should have reason to reproach ourfelves of having omitted a proper occasion of manifesting the tenderness peculiarly characteristick of our sex, if we did not profess ourselves deeply interested and affected by the imminent and shocking doom of the most unfortunate mr. Hayne, and if we did not entreat you in the most earnest manner graciously to avert, prolong or mitigate it. We do not even think, much less do we intend to imply, in the remotest degree, that your fentence is unjust; but we are induced to hope, that every end it proposes may be equally answered, as if carried into execution; for to us it does not appear probable that any whom it is intended to influence and deter from fimilar delinquency, will be encouraged with the hope of impunity, by reason of any favour shewn him, as they must surely reslect that it was owing to certain causes and circumstances that will not apply to them. We presume to make this intercession for him, and to hope that it will not prove fruitless, from the knowledge of your dispositions in particular, as well as from the reflection in general, that humanity is rarely feparable from courage, and that the gallant foldier feels as much reluctance to cause, by deliberate decrees, the infliction of death on men in cold blood, as he does ardour in the day of battle and heat of action to make the enemies of his country perish by the sword. He may rejoice to behold his laurels sprinkled with the blood of armed and refisting adversaries, but will regret to fee them wet with the tears of unhappy orphans, mourning the lofs of a tender, amiable and worthy parent, executed like a vile and infamous felon.

To the praises, that men who have been witnesses and sharers of your dangers and services in the

the field, may found of your military virtues and prowefs, we trust you will give the ladies occafion to add the praises of your milder and softer virtues by furnishing them with a striking proof of your clemency and politeness in the present instance. May the unhappy object of our petition owe to that clemency and politeness, to our prayers and to his own merits in other respects, what you may think him not entitled to if policy and justice were not outweighed in his behalf. To any other men in power than fuch as we conceive you both to be, we should employ on the occasion more ingenuity and art to dress up and enforce the many pathetick and favourable circumstances attending his case, in order to move your passions and engage your favour, but we think this will be needlefs, and is obviated by your own spontaneous feelings, humane considerations and liberal reasonings. Nor shall we dwell on his most excellent character, the outrages and excesses, and perhaps murders prevented by him, to which innocent and unarmed individuals were exposed in an extensive manner; nor shall we here lay any stress on the most grievous shock his numerous and respectable connexions must fustain by his death, aggravated by the mode of it; nor shall we do more than remind you of the complicated diffress and fufferings that must befall his young and promising children, to whom perhaps death would be more comfortable than the state of orphanage they will be left in. All these things we understand have been been already represented, and we are sure will have their due weight with men of your humane and benevolent minds. Many of us have already subscribed to a former petition for him, and hope you will regard our doing it again not as importunity, but earnessness; and we pray most fervently that you will for-ever greatly oblige us by not letting us do it in vain.

We are, my lord and fir, with all respect your very anxious petitioners and humble servants.

To mr. Hayne.

SIR,

I AM ordered by the commandant to acquaint you, you, that instead of a council of general officers, as is mentioned in my letter of this morning, a court of enquiry, composed of four general officers and five captains, will be assembled to-morrow at ten o'clock, in the province hall, for the purpose of determining under what point of view you ought to be considered.

You will immediately be allowed pen, ink and paper; and any perfon that you choose to appoint, will be permitted to accompany you as your council, at the same hour and place.

I am, &c.

C. Fraser, major of the town.

No. III.

To mr. Hayne, in the provost's prison.

MEMORANDUM.

Sunday, 29th July, 1781.

The adjutant of the town will be fo good as to go to colonel Hayne in the provost's prison, and inform him, that, in consequence of the court of enquiry held yesterday, and the preceding evening, on his account, lord Rawdon, and the commandant, lieutenant-colonel Nesbit Balfour, have resolved upon his execution on Tuesday the thirty-first instant, at six o'clock, for having been found under arms, and employed in raising raising a regiment to oppose the British government, though he had become a subject, and had accepted the protection of that government, after the reduction of Charleston.

(Signed)

C. Fraser, major of the town.

My lord, and fir,

On Thursday morning I had the honour of receiving a letter from major Fraser, by which he informed me, 'that a council of general officers ' would be affembled the next day for my trial,' and, on the evening of the fame day, I received another letter from the fame officer, acquainting me, 'that instead of that, a court of enquiry would fit, for the purpose of deciding under ' what point of view I ought to be confidered.'-It was also told, 'that any person whom I should appoint would be permitted to accompany me 'as my counsel.' Having never entertained any other idea of a court of enquiry, nor heard of any other being formed of it, than of its ferving merely to precede a council of war, or some other tribunal for examining the circumstances more fully, excepting in the case of a spy; and Vol. II. 3 S mr.

mr. Jarvis, lieutenant marshal to the provost, not having fucceeded in finding the person whom I named for my counsel, I did not take the pains to fummon any witnesses, though it would have been in my power to have produced many; and I prefented myself before the council without any assistance whatever. When I was before that asfembly, I was farther convinced that I had not been deceived in my conjectures; and I found that the members of it were not fworn, nor the witnesses examined upon oath; and all the members, as well as every other person present, might easily have perceived, by the questions which I asked, and by the whole tenor of my conduct, that I had not the least notion that I was tried or examined upon an affair on which my life and death depended. Neither do I believe that the members themselves had an idea of that fort.

In the case of spies, a court of enquiry is all that can be necessary, because the simple sact, whether the person is, or is not a spy, is all that can be the object of their researches, and his having entered the lines of the enemy's camp, or the garrison, subjects him to military execution. As that accusation neither is, nor ever has been brought against me, I humbly conceive that the information which I received, namely, that the court would make enquiry concerning what point of view I ought to be considered under, could not be taken as a sufficient notice of their having an intention to try me then, but could only be thought thought to fignify that they were to take it into confideration whether I ought to be looked upon as a British subject, or as an American; that in the first case I should undergo a legal and impartial trial; in the second, I should be set at liberty on my parole.

Judge then, my lord, and fir, of the aftonishment I must have been in, when I found that they had drawn me by furprize into a procedure tending to judgment, without knowing it to be fuch, and deprived me of the ability of making a legal defence, which it would have been very easy for me to have done, founded both in law and in fact; when I faw myfelf destitute of the affistance of counsel or of witnesses; and when they abruptly informed me, that after the procedure of that court I had been condemned to die, and that in a very few days. Immediately upon receiving this notice, I fent for the lawyer whom I had originally chosen for my counsel. I here enclose his opinion concerning the legality of the process held against me; and I beg that I may be permitted to refer myself to him. I can asfure you with the utmost truth, that I both had, and have many reasons to urge in my defence, if you will grant me the favour of a regular trial; if not, (which I cannot however suppose from your justice and equity) I earnestly entreat that my execution may be deferred, that I may at least take a last farewell of my children, and prepare myfelf for the dreadful change.

I HOPE that you will return me a speedy answer; and am, with respect, &c.

No. V.

Answer of lord Rawdon and colonel Balfour to my letter of the twenty-ninth of July, and delivered on the thirtieth, at one o'clock, into the hands of the town-major (Fraser.)

'I HAVE to inform you, that your execution is ont ordered in confequence of any sentence from 'a court of enquiry, but by virtue of the autho-'rity with which the commander in chief in South-'Carolina and the commanding officer in Charlefton are invested. And their resolves on this 'fubject are fixed and unchangeable.' I then begged major Fraser that he would seriously entreat the abovefaid officers to grant a respite, that I might have time to fend for my children, and take of them the last farewell. At three o'clock, the town-adjutant (Cooper) brought me for anfwer, that my request was rejected. On Tuesday, July thirty-one, at one in the morning, the deputy provost, (Marshal) brought me information - 'that it was time for me to prepare for death, as he had just received orders to that effect, and 'that I was to leave my apartment at five o'clock.'

In lefs than half an hour major Fraser came in and delivered the following message:

'Colonel Hayne, I am to acquaint you, that in confequence of a petition figned by governor Bull and many more, as also of your prayer of yesterday, and the humane treatment shewn by you to the British prisoners who fell into your hands, you are respited for forty-eight hours.' I thanked the commanding officer for this respite: this gave me an opportunity of seeing my children.

THE major had been gone but a few minutes, when he returned to tell me that he had forgot part of his message: this was, 'that if general Greene should offer to expostulate in my favour, with the commanding officer, from that 'instant the respite would cease, and I should be ordered for immediate execution.

No. VI.

August 1, 1781, three o'clock, A. M. Mr. Cooper, the town-adjutant, came in and read to me the following written message: 'Lord Rawdon' and colonel Balfour have consented to grant to 'mr. Hayne a respite for forty-eight hours.' My answer was, 'that I thanked them.'

No. VII.

Consultation on the case of colonel Hayne, enclosed in his letter to lord Rawdon and colonel Balfour.

Colonel

COLONEL Hayne being detained in the provost's prison, and taken, as it is given out, in arms against his majesty, received from major Fraser, on Thursday night, a notice in these words: 'A court of enquiry, composed of four ftaff-officers and five captains, will affemble to-' morrow, at ten in the morning, in the province hall, in order to determine under what point of s view you ought to be confidered.' The court met at the time appointed, and the prisoner made his appearance. Neither the members nor witnesses were upon oath. The prisoner considering it only as a court of enquiry, which was held previous to a formal trial, did not avail himfelf of the liberty granted him to employ counsel, nor did he produce any witness to ascertain a great number of facts tending to his defence, for which, indeed, he was allowed but a very short time. He was apprized this morning, that the faid lord and colonel, on the rifing of the faid court of enquiry, came to the resolution of having the said Hayne executed on Thursday, July thirtyfirst. Query from the prisoner: 'Are such proceedings authorized by any law, and is the ' subsequent sentence lawful?'

ANSWER.

I. In the notice given you, that the intention was to examine you before a court of enquiry, there is not, even according to the rules of martial law, a fufficient certainty, nor any express accusation accusation which might be the object of the court's enquiry, or of your defence.

II. No enemy can be fentenced to death in confequence of any military article, or any other martial process that I know of, without a previous trial, except spies, who, by the articles of war, are expressly debarred from that right.

III. No fubject whatever can or ought to be deprived of his life, liberty or fortune, unless it be by the unanimous award of his peers, and according to the laws of the country. And, to my knowledge, there is not a law which can authorize a judgment and fentence like that which they have taken upon themselves to pronounce in this affair. It is an invariable rule, established by law, that every man is to be deemed innocent till his guilt is proved; that being found or taken in arms does not argue criminality fo far as to hinder the culprit from making his defence, either by proving a commission, or upon any other ground; and that many of those who had taken up arms have been acquitted upon fuch proofs.

IV. In confideration of the principles above adduced, I am positively of opinion, 'that tak'ing you in the light of an enemy, (not of a 'fpy) the process carried on against you is not 'lawful; but if you are to be considered as a 'subject,

N O T E XLI. PAGE 285.

Extract of a letter from N. Balfour to major-general Greene, dated Charleston, September 3, 1781.

I COME now to that part which has respect to the execution of colonel Hayne, on which head I am to inform you it took place by the joint-order of lord Rawdon and myfelf, in confequence of the most express directions from lord Cornwallis to us, in regard to all those who should be found in arms, after being at their own requests received as subjects, fince the capitulation of Charleston and the clear conquest of the province in the summer of 1780; more especially fuch as should have accepted of commissions, or might distinguish themselves in inducing a revolt of the country. To his lordship therefore, as being answerable for this measure, the appeal will more properly be made, and on fuch appeal I must not doubt, every fit satisfaction will be tendered; but as the threat in your letter is of a nature which may extend its confequences to the most disagreeable and serious lengths, I cannot difmiss this subject without some general remarks, still referring for the particular justification to the opinion opinion and decision of lord Cornwallis, immediately under whom I have the honour to act.

AND first I must conceive, without adverting to the particular cause of dispute between Great-Britain and this country, that, on the subjection of any territory, the inhabitants of it owe allegiance to the conquering power (in the present case a voluntary acknowledgment was given, and confequent protection received;) and that, on any account to recede from it, is justly punishable with death, by whatever law, either civil or military, is then prevalent.

To justify retaliation I am convinced you will agree a parity of circumstances in all respects is required; without such every shadow of justice is removed, and vengeance only points to indiscriminate horrors.

Camp, fouthern army, High Hills of Santee, 20th August, 1781.

THE subscribers, commissioned officers serving in the southern army, beg leave to represent to the honourable major-general Greene, that they are informed not only by current reports, but by official and acknowledged authority, that, contrary to express stipulations in the capitulation of Charleston, signed the twelfth day Vol. II.

of May, 1780, a number of very respectable inhabitants of that town and others were confined on board prison-ships, and fent to St. Augustine, and other places distant from their homes, families and friends. That notwithstanding the general cartel fettled for exchange of prisoners in the fouthern department, and agreed to the third of May last, several officers of militia and other gentlemen, subjects of the United States, have been and still are detained in captivity; that the commanding officer of the British troops in Charleston, regardless of the principles, and even the express tenor of the faid cartel, hath not only prefumed to discriminate between the militia and other subjects of the United States prisoners of war, partially determining who were and who were not objects of exchange, but hath even dared to execute, in the most ignominious manner, colonel Hayne, of the militia of the state of South-Carolina, a gentleman amiable in character, respectable in his connexions, and of eminent abilities: and this violent act, as cruel as it was unnecessary and unjust, we are informed is attempted to be justified by the imputed crime of treason, founded upon the unfortunate fufferer's having, in circumstances peculiarly diftrefling, accepted of what is called a protection from the British government.

Is every inhabitant of this country who, being bound by the tender ties of family-connexions, and fettered by domestick embarrassments, is forced forced to fubmit to the misfortune of falling into the hands of the enemy, must therefore become a fubject of fuch inhuman authority, and if fuch fubjects are liable to be tried by martial law for offences against the said civil government of the British nation, their situation is truly deplorable; but we conceive forms of protection which are granted one day, and retracted, violated, difclaimed or deferted the next, can enjoin no fuch condition or obligation upon perfons who accept We consider the citizens of America as independent of the government of Great-Britain as those of Great-Britain are of the United States. or of any other fovereign power, and think it just the severities and indulgences to prisoners of war ought to be reciprocal. We therefore, with fubmission, beg leave to recommend that a strict enquiry be made into the feveral matters mentioned, and if ascertained, that you will be pleased to retaliate in the most effectual manner by a similar treatment of British subjects which are or may be in your power.

PERMIT us to add, that while we feriously lament the necessity of such a severe expedient, and commiserate the sufferings to which individuals will necessarily be exposed, we are not unmindful that such a measure may, in its consequences, involve our own lives in additional dangers; but we had rather forego temporary distinctions, and commit ourselves to the most desperate situations,

We are, fir, with the greatest regard, and most respectful sentiments of esteem, your most obedient and most humble servants.

The honourable majorgeneral Greene.

NOTE XLIII. PAGE 285. PROCLAMATION.

By NATHANIEL GREENE, efquire, major-general, commanding the American army in the fouthern department.

HEREAS colonel Isaac Hayne, commanding a regiment of militia in the fervice of the United States, was taken prisoner by a party of British troops, and after a rigorous detention in the Provost's prison at Charleston, was condemned and executed on the 4th of this month, in the most cruel and unjustishable manner, in open violation of the cartel agreed upon between the two armies, for the release and exchange of all prisoners of war; and it being no less the duty than the inclination of the army to resent every violence offered to the good citizens of America, to discountenance all those distinctions which they have endeavoured to establish, in making a difference in various orders of men, found under arms for the support of the independence of the United States; and further confidering that these violences are committed with a view of terrifying the good people, and by that means preventing them from acting in conformity with their political interests and private inclinations; and that this method of trying and punishing, in consequence of those distinctions, is no less opposite to the spirit of the British, than it is inclufive of an unwarrantable infringement of all the laws of humanity, and the rights of the free citizens of the United States; from these confiderations I have thought proper to iffue the present proclamation, expressly to declare, 'that it is ' my intention to make reprifals for all fuch in-'human infults, as often as they shall take place.' And whereas the enemy feems willing to expose the small number of the deceived and seduced inhabitants, who are attached to their interests, if they can but find an opportunity of facrificing the great number that have stood forth in defence of our cause; I farther declare, 'that it is my intention to take the officers of the regular forces, ' and not the feduced inhabitants who have joined 'their army, for the objects of my reprifals.'-But while I am determined to refent every infult that may be offered to the United States for having maintained our independence, I cannot but lament the necessity I am under of having recourfe course to measures so extremely wounding to the sentiments of humanity, and so contrary to the liberal principles upon which I wish to conduct the war.

The treatment of the prisoners of war taken by the British in South-Carolina, in the year 1780, is more particularly stated in the two following letters; the first of which was written by doctor Olyphant, director of the American hospitals in the southern department, on the 7th of May 1781, to general Moultrie, in the following words:

the number of fick among our people continues great, especially as this is a healthy season of the year; but when the reasons of it are considered, it is not much to be wondered at. Men sent immediately from a fick hospital on board of prison-ships, and confined to a falt diet, cannot possibly recover their health and visgour. This likewise accounts for the many deaths.

⁶ I AM farther to acquaint you of our convale-⁶ fcents

fcents being discharged before they are thought

'fit by our physicians to be dismissed under such circumstances. This is directed by doctor Hayes,

' the director-general of the British hospitals, who

' is commanded, as he informs me, to do fo by

' the commandant.'

The same subject is more particularly stated in a letter addressed to the author of this history by the honourable Peter Fayssoux, M. D. member of the council of the state of South-Carolina, who served his country during the late war in the character of chief physician to the American hospitals in the southern department, which was in the following words:

' Charleston, March 26, 1785.

SIR,

'In compliance with your request, I now send you some of the most remarkable facts relative to the treatment the American prisoners, the sick in particular, received, during their captivity in Charleston, from the British. The director general having been confined by the British, the immediate charge of the American hospital devolved on me, I can therefore answer for the truth of this account, as every circumstance was within my own knowledge. From the furrender of Charleston to the period of general Gates's defeat, I do not think we had any material cause of complaint,

'THE regulations for the government of the hospital, the supplies of medicine and diet, were in general prescribed by ourselves and acceded to by the British.

'AFTER the defeat of general Gates our fufferings commenced. The British appeared to have adopted a different mode of conduct towards their prisoners, and proceeded from one step to another until they fully displayed themfelves, void of faith, honour or humanity, and capable of the most savage acts of barbarity.

'THE unhappy men who belonged to the mi-'litia, and were taken prisoners on Gates's defeat, 'experienced the first effects of the cruelty of their new system.

THESE men were confined on board of prifon-ships, in numbers by no means proportioned to the fize of the vessels, immediately after a march of one hundred and twenty miles, in the most fickly season of this unhealthy climate.

'These veffels were in general infected with the fmall-pox; very few of the prisoners had gone through that disorder. A representation was made to the British commandant of their situation, and permission was obtained for one of our surgeons to inoculate them—this was the utmost extent of their humanity—the wretched objects were still consined on board of the prisonships,

6 ships, and fed on falt provisions, without the 6 least medical aid, or any proper kind of nourish-6 ment. The effect that naturally followed, was a 6 small-pox with a sever of the putrid type; and 6 to such as survived the small-pox, a putrid dy-6 sentery—and, from these causes, the deaths of at 6 least one hundred and sifty of the unhappy vic-6 tims. Such were the appearances, and such was 6 the termination of the generality of the cases 6 brought to the general hospital after the erupti-6 on of the small-pox—before the eruption, not a 6 single individual was suffered to be brought on 6 shore. If any thing can surpass the above relaction in barbarity, it is the following account:—

'THE continental troops, by the articles of cae pitulation, were to be detained prisoners in some ' place contiguous to Charleston; the barracks were pitched on as the proper place; this was ' agreed to by both parties .- The British, in vio-6 lation of their solemn compact, put these people on board of prison-ships.—Confined in large 4 numbers on board of these vessels, and fed on falt provisions in this climate in the months of October and November, they naturally generated a putrid fever from the human miasma. 'This foon became highly contagious. The fick brought into the general hospital from the pri-' fon-ships, generally died in the course of two or 6 three days, with all the marks of a highly septick state. Application was made to mr. de 6 Rosette, the British commissary of prisoners; the Vol. II. 3 U

'vast increase of the numbers of deaths was pointed out, and he was requested to have proper steps taken to check the progress of a distorder that threatened to destroy the whole of the prisoners.

'In consequence of this application mr. Fisher, our commissary of prisoners, and mr. Fraser, who formerly practifed physick in this country, but then acted as a British deputy commissary, were ordered to inspect the state of the prisoners 'in the vessels. This report confirmed the truth of what had been advanced—this can be proved by a very particular circumstance.-My hopes were very fanguine that fomething would be done for the relief of those unhappy persons, but they were entirely frustrated by a person from whom I did not, and ought not to have ex-' pected it. Dr. John M'Namara Hays, physician to the British army, a person who had been taken by the Americans on the capture of Burgoyne, who had received the politest treatment from the Americans when a prisoner, and who had the generofity to acknowledge the ufage he had met with—this person was ordered to report on the state of the prisoners—to my astoe nishment, I was informed his report was, that the prison-ships were not crouded, perfectly wholesome, and no appearance of infectious dis-6 orders amongst the prisoners.

^{*} I THEN determined to make one more effort for the relief of these unhappy persons -for this purpose I had two of the dead bodies kept in ' the area of the hospital, and, upon doctor Hays's ' daily vifit to our hospital, I marked to him the ' appearances of the subjects, whose bodies were 6 highly tinged with a yellow fuffusion, petechied over the breaft and trunk, with confiderable ecchymofis from extravafated or diffolved blood about the neck, breast and upper extremities. I 'inquired if it was possible a doubt could remain re-' specting the nature of their disorder, and express-'ed my furprise at the report he had made. The ' words of his reply were, 'that the confinement of the prisoners in prison-ships was the great eye-' fore, and there was no help for that, it must be 'done.' The diforder in confequence continued until the cold weather; the number of deaths, ' joined with the number that were compelled by 6 this treatment to inlift with the British, removed in a great measure the cause. Hitherto a number of our prisoners who were tradesmen had been permitted to remain in the barracks, or in the city, where they were employed by the British-about the month of January 1781, they were all confined to the barracks, and there British emissaries were very busy amongst them, to perfuade them to inlift in their new corps. About the fame time a supply of clothing, and 6 fonte money to procure necessaries, arrived from 6 the Congress for the use of the prisoners.

⁶ Mr. Fisher, our commissary, was prevented from distributing the clothing, and the prisonfers were informed it was a deception, for no fupplies had arrived for their use. Their motive was, that by the complicated distress of nakedness and imprisonment, their patience would be exhausted, and inlistment with them would ensure.

'To prevent this, means were found to have feveral bales of the clothing brought to the picquets which inclosed the barracks, and in fight of our foldiers; this measure established the fact.

DISAPPOINTED from this quarter, the British commandant or his ministers determined to obferve no measures but what would accomplish 6 their own purpofes. All the foldiers in the barracks, including the convalescents, were paraded, and harangued by Fraser, the British dee puty commissary, and one Low, a recruiting officer for one of the British corps. The conclusion of the affair was, that fuch as chose to ' inlift with the British should leave the ranks, and 6 the remainder go on board of the prison-ships. A few who had been previously engaged withdrew from the ranks; the large majority that 'sftood firm, after three different folicitations without effect, had this dreadful fentence proonounced by Fraser, that they should be put on board of the prison-ships, where they could 4 not expect any thing more but to perish miserably; and that the rations hitherto allowed for

'the fupport of their wives and children, from that day should be withheld; the consequence of which would be, they must starve in the streets.'

'Glaration—for a few feconds the unhappy victims feemed stupished at the dreadful prospect; a gloomy and universal silence prevailed.—This was followed by a loud huzza for general Washington; death and the prison-ships was the unamimous determination.

'THE hospital at this time was reduced to the greatest distress imaginable—the sick without clothing, covering, or any necessary but one pound of beef and bread—very little sugar, no wine, and rarely a small allowance of rum.

WE had no resources, and the British would only furnish the absolute necessaries of life. The officers of the hospital, on the mildest representation, were threatened and insulted, frequently prohibited from visiting the sick, once I remember for three days.

'IT was fearcely possible for men to support fuch an accumulated load of misery; but when least expected, a relief was administered to us. A subscription for the support of the sick was filled by people of every denomination with amazing rapidity. Several of the ladies of Charleston, laying afide the distinction of whig and tory, were instrumental and assiduous in procuring and preparing every necessary of clothing and proper nourishment for our poor, worn-out and defigording soldiers.

'THUS, fir, I have furnished you with some of the most material occurrences of that unhappy time. I have not exaggerated or written a fin-'gle circumstance from hatred or prejudice. I 6 could furnish you with a long detail of cruelty and diffress exercised on individuals .- Major 6 Bocquet's case, exposed in an open boat for 'twelve hours in a violent fever, with a blifter-'ing plaster on his back, extended at length in the bottom of the boat, then put into the dungeon of the provoft with the vilest felons and ' murderers, left to languish under his complaint until his death feemed morally certain, only re-'leafed from his confinement from the dread of ' a just retaliation—the moment his recovery feemed probable, again hurried back to the provoft, * there to remain until the general exchange re-' leafed him from their power.

'This instance of severity exercised on an individual, whose only crime was a steady attachment to the cause of his country, and a determined resolution to keep facred the solemn oath
he had taken in its cause, would appear as nothing, were I to enumerate the scenes of woe and distress brought on many citizens of this once

once happy country, by British cruelty and unnecessary severity. I am sure every breast would be foftened, even tears would fall from

' British eyes.

'I am, fir, with esteem, yours, &c.
'P. FAYSSOUX.'

Charleston, May 17, 1781.

EVERAL prisoners on parole, having been this day taken up, and sent on board ship, the motives for which are explained in the enclosed copy of a letter to them; I am directed by the commandant to desire you will insert the same in your next paper, for the information of the publick.

I am, gentlemen,
your most obedient servant,
H. BARRY, secretary, and D. A. general.

CENTLEMEN.

Many have been the representations which the outrages committed by the American troops, and their violations of all the humaner principles of war, have have compelled me to make to fuch of their officers as commanded parties in this province: but more particularly have I been obliged to remonstrate against the rigorous treatment, in many cases extending to death, which the loyal militia, when made prisoners, most invariably experience.

These representations, gentlemen, having been grounded on the truest principles of benevolence, and which it behoves each side equally to have advanced, I was as much surprized as I was mortified, to find them in all cases practically disregarded, and in many, wholly neglected. It is therefore become my duty, however irksome to myself, to try how far a more decided line of conduct will prevail, and whether the safety of avowed adherents to their cause, may not induce the American troops to extend a proper elemency to those whose principles arm them in defence of British government.

INDUCED by these motives, I have conceived it an act of expediency to seize on your persons, and retain them as hostages for the good usage of all the loyal militia who are, or may be made prisoners of war, resolving to regulate, in the full extent, your treatment by the measure of theirs, and which my feelings make me hope may hereafter be most lenient.

AND as I have thought it necessary that those persons persons, who some time since were sent from hence to St. Augustine, should, in this respect, be considered in the same point of view as yourselves, I shall send notice there, that they be likewise held as sureties for a future propriety of conduct towards our militia prisoners.

Reasons fo cogent, and which have only the most humane purposes for their objects, will, I doubt not, be considered by every reasonable person as a sufficient justification of this most necessary measure, even in those points where it may militate with the capitulation of Charleston; though indeed the daily infractions of it, by the breach of paroles, would alone well warrant this procedure.

HAVING been thus candid in stating to you the causes for this conduct, I can have no objections to your making any proper use of this letter you may judge to your advantage, and will therefore, should you deem it expedient, grant what slags of truce may be necessary to carry out copies of it to any officer commanding American troops in these parts, and in the mean time the sullest directions will be given, that your present situation be rendered as eligible as the nature of circumstances will admit.

I am, gentlemen,

your most obedient humble fervant, (Signed) N. Balfour.

Vol. II. 2 W Prifon-

Prison-ship, Torbay, Charleston harbour, May 18, 1781.

In conformity to your letter of yesterday, we embrace your offer of forwarding a copy of the same, together with a roll of the prisoners on board this ship, and a letter addressed to majorgeneral Greene, all which are enclosed. We could wish one of our number might be suffered to attend the slag of truce.

We are, fir,

SIR,

YESTERDAY we transmitted to you a letter, enclosing a copy of yours, with a list of one hundred and twenty-nine prisoners of war, confined on board this ship, which we hope is forwarded to major-general Greene, agreeable to your promise, and make no doubt but that your feelings as a gentleman will, upon this occasion, induce you to do every thing in your power to liberate, from a most injurious and disagreeable consinement, those against whom there can exist no charge of dishonour, and whose only crime, if such it can possibly possibly be termed by men of liberal ideas, is an inflexible attachment to what they conceive to be the rights of their country, and who have fcorned to deceive you by unmeaning professions. In justice to ourselves we must say, that if the Americans have at any time fo far divested themselves of that character of humanity and generofity, which have ever distinguished them, we feel ourfelves most fensibly mortified, but are induced, from the generous treatment of colonels Lechmere, Rugely, Fenwicke and Kelfall, and their parties, and from a number of other instances which might be eafily adduced, to believe, that the outrages which you complain of, must be the effect of private resentment (subsissing between British subjects and those who, after having availed themselves of the royal proclamation, have refumed their arms, in opposition to that government) and totally unfanctioned by any American officer, and which we are well convinced they would reprobate and would punish in the most exemplary manner, could the perpetrators of fuch horrid acts be detected.

In a war, circumstanced as the present, there will be some instances of enormities on both sides. We would not wish to particularize, but doubt not there are acts of cruelty frequently committed by the irregulars of your army, and are convinced, that on your part, as well as our own, they are generally to be attributed to an ignorance of the rules of warfare, and a want of discipline;

cipline; but the idea of detaining in close custody as hostages a number of men, fairly taken in arms, and entitled to the benefits of a solemn capitulation, is so repugnant to the laws of war, and the usage of civilized nations, that we apprehend it will rather be the means of increasing its horrors, than answering those purposes of humanity you expect.

As a most strict adherence to the terms of our paroles, and a firm reliance on your honour, have been the only reasons of our being in your power at present, we trust, that upon equitable proposals being made for our exchange by general Greene, no objections will be raised, but every thing done to bring the matter to the most speedy issue.

As you have thought proper to publish your reasons for seizing upon our persons, we request our answer may also be inserted in the next gazette.

We are, fir,

your most obedient humble servants,

Prison-ship, Torbay, Charleston harbour, May 18, 1781.

WE have the honour of enclosing you a copy of a letter from colonel Balfour, commandant of Charleston, which was handed us immediately on our being put on board this ship; the letter, speaking for itself, needs no comment; your wisdom will best dictate the notice it merits. We would just beg leave to observe, that should it fall to the lot of all, or any of us, to be made victims, agreeably to the menaces therein contained, we have only to regret that our blood cannot be disposed of more to the advancement of the glorious cause to which we have adhered. A separate roll of our names attend this letter.

Charleston, June 2.

By the right honourable Francis lord Rawdon, colonel, commanding a corps of his majesty's forces in South-Carolina, &c. and Nesbit Balfour, esq. lieutenant-colonel and commandant of Charleston, &c.

A LTHOUGH attention to the general fecurity of the province has obliged his majesty's troops, for the present, to relinquish some of the upper parts of it, we trust, that it is unnecesfary for us to exhort the loyal inhabitants of those districts to stand firm in their duty and principles; or to caution them against the insidious artifices of an enemy, who must shortly abandon to their fate, those unfortunate people whom they have deluded into revolt. But being well informed, that many perfons, fincerely attached to his majesty's cause, have, notwithstanding, been forced to join the enemy, as the only means of preserving themselves and their families from the savage cruelty of the rebel militia, until escape should be practicable; we defire all such to be consident, that they run no risk of suffering from us, through indiscriminate vengeance; reminding them, that the British government never extends its hand to blood, without the most convincing proofs of intentional guilt.

AND we advise all persons in the above predicament, as likewife those who, from the oppreffions of the enemy, have been obliged to quit their possessions, to take the earliest opportunity of coming in, with their arms, to any post or detachment of the royal army. We give them affurances of every support, and of every endeavour on our part, to mitigate their present sufferings: further declaring to them, that we shall feel ourselves no less bound to reward the fidelity of those who have remained unshaken in their allegiance, than to inflict the punishment due to reiterated perfidy. Nor should we give them this invitation, were we not certain that, in conjunction with the army, daily expecting powerful reinforcement, their exertions will very shortly reinstate them in the full and peaceable possession of that property, which they will thus have only vielded

Given under our hands in camp, at Monk's Corner, the twenty-fourth day of May, 1781, and in the twenty-first year of his majesty's reign. RAWDON, N. BALFOUR.

By order of his lordship and the commandant, H. BARRY, dep. adj. general.

ARTICLE V. Granted.

ARTICLE VI. The general, staff, and other officers not employed as mentioned in the above article, and who choose it, to be permitted to go on parole to Europe, to New-York, or to any other American maritime posts, at present in the possession of the British forces, at their own option, and proper vessels to be granted by the count de Grasse to carry them under slags of truce to New-York, within ten days from this date, if possible; and they to reside in a district, to be agreed upon hereafter, until they embark. The officers of the civil departments of the army and navy to be included in this article; passports to go by land to be granted to those to whom vessels cannot be furnished.

ARTICLE VI. Granted.

ARTICLE VII. Officers to be allowed to keep foldiers as fervants, according to the common practice of the fervice. Servants, not foldiers, are not to be confidered as prisoners; and are to be allowed to attend their masters.

ARTICLE VII. Granted.

ARTICLE VIII. The Bonetta floop of war to be equipped and navigated by its present captain and crew, and lest entirely at the disposal of lord Cornwallis from the hour that the capitulation is figned, to receive an aid-de-camp to carry despatches spatches to sir Henry Clinton, and such soldiers as he may think proper, to be permitted to fail without examination when his despatches are ready; his lordship engaging on his part, that the ship shall be delivered to the order of the count de Grasse, if she escapes the dangers of the seas; that she shall not carry off any publick stores. Any part of the crew that may be desicient on her return, and the soldiers, passengers, to be accounted for on her delivery.

ARTICLE VIII. Granted.

ARTICLE IX. The traders are to preserve their property, and to be allowed three months to dispose of or remove it; and those traders are not to be considered as prisoners of war.

ARTICLE IX. The traders will be allowed to dispose of their effects; the allied army having the right of pre-emption. The traders to be considered as prisoners of war on parole.

ARTICLE X. Natives or inhabitants of different parts of this country, at present in York or Gloucester, are not to be punished on account of having joined the British army.

ARTICLE X. This article cannot be affented to, being altogether of civil resort.

ARTICLE XI. Proper hospitals to be furnished for the fick and wounded; they are to be attended tended by their own furgeons on parole; and they are to be furnished with medicines and stores from the American hospitals.

ARTICLE XI. The hospital stores now in York and Gloucester shall be delivered for the use of the British sick and wounded; passports will be granted for procuring them further supplies from New-York, as occasion may require; and proper hospitals will be furnished for the reception of the sick and wounded of the two divisions.

ARTICLE XII. Waggons to be furnished to carry the baggage of the officers attending the foldiers, and to furgeons, when travelling, on account of the fick, attending the hospitals, at publick expence.

ARTICLE XII. They will be furnished if possible.

ARTICLE XIII. The shipping and boats in the two harbours, with all their stores, guns, tackling and apparel, shall be delivered up in their present state to an officer of the navy appointed to take possession of them, previously unloading the private property, part of which had been on board for security during the siege.

ARTICLE XIII. Granted.

ARTICLE XIV. No article of the capitulation to be infringed on pretext of reprifal; and if there there be any doubtful expressions in it, they are to be interpreted according to the common meaning and acceptations of the words.

NOTE XLVIII. PAGE 329.

By the United States in Congress assembled, October 29, 1781.

RESOLVED, that the thanks of the United States in Congress affembled be presented to his excellency general Washington, for the eminent services which he has rendered to the United States, and particularly for the well-concerted plan against the British garrisons in York and Gloucester; for the vigour, attention, and military skill with which the plan was executed; and for the wisdom and prudence manifested in the capitulation.

THAT

THAT the thanks of the United States in Congress affembled be presented to his excellency the Count de Rochambeau, for the cordiality, zeal, judgment and fortitude, with which he seconded and advanced the progress of the allied army against the British garrison in York.

That the thanks of the United States in Congress affembled be presented to his excellency count de Grasse, for his display of skill and bravery in attacking and defeating the British sleet off the bay of Chesapeak; and for his zeal and alacrity in rendering, with the sleet under his command, the most effectual and distinguished aid and support to the operations of the allied army in Virginia.

THAT the thanks of the United States in Congress assembled be presented to the commanding and other officers of the corps of artillery and engineers of the allied army, who sustained extraordinary satigue and danger, in their animated and gallant approaches to the lines of the enemy.

THAT general Washington be directed to communicate to the other officers and the soldiers under his command the thanks of the United States in Congress assembled, for their conduct and valour on this occasion.

Resolved, that the United States in Congress affembled will cause to be erected at York, in Virginia, Virginia, a marble column, adorned with emblems of the alliance between the United States and his most christian majesty; and inscribed with a succinct narrative of the surrender of earl Cornwallis to his excellency general Washington, commander in chief of the combined forces of America and France, to his excellency the count de Rochambeau, commanding the auxiliary troops of his most christian majesty in America, and his excellency the count de Grasse, commanding in chief the naval army of France in the Chesapeak.

Head-quarters, near York, Oct. 31, 1781.

DO myself the honour of transmitting to your excellency a letter from brigadier-general Du-Portail, in which he explains the motives of an intended application to Congress for permission to go to France, and for the promotion of himself, and other officers of his corps.

I SHOULD conceal fentiments with which I am very strongly impressed, and do injustice to very conspicuous merit, if I did not, upon the present occasion, offer my testimony of the distinguished abilities and fervices both of general Du-Portail and lieutenant-colonel Gouvion; their claim to the particular attention of Congress at this juncture, is founded upon the practice of Europe; a fiege being confidered as the particular province of the corps of engineers, and as entitling them, when attended with a fuccess important in itself and its confequences, to the greatest military rewards. These officers, besides, are supported by a feries of conduct in the line of their department, which makes them not depend merely upon the present circumstances. For these reasons I am induced to recommend general Du-Portail's memorial to Congress for the grades which he specifies, and the leave of absence; the latter being by no means incompatible with the good of the fervice service at the present period, as I am reduced, notwithstanding all my efforts, to the necessity of retiring into winter-quarters.

The fame principles as those above-mentioned forbid me to be filent on the subject of general Knox, who is closely united with general Du-Portail in the merits of the siege, being at the head of the artillery, which is the other principal instrument in conducting attacks, the resources of his genius have supplied on this and many other interesting occasions the defect of means. His distinguished talents and services, equally important and indefatigable, entitle him to the same marks of approbation from Congress as they may be pleased to grant to the chief engineer.

With fentiments of respect and esteem, I have the honour to be your excellency's, &c.

(Signed) GEO. WASHINGTON.

By the United States in Congress assembled, November 16, 1781.

RESOLVED, that brigadier-general Du-Portail, commanding officer of the corps of engineers, in confideration of his meritorious fervices, and particularly of his distinguished conduct in the siege of York, in the state of Virginia, be, and he is hereby promoted to the rank of majorgeneral.

RESOLVED

RESOLVED, that lieutenant-colonel Gouvion, of the corps of engineers, receive the brevet of colonel.

RESOLVED, that captain Rochefontaine, of the corps of engineers, receive the brevet of major.

March 22, 1782.

Brigadier-general Knox, commanding officer of the artillery, being recommended by the commander in chief, by his letter of the thirty-first day of October last, to be appointed a majorgeneral in the army of the United States, on account of his special merit, and particularly for his good conduct at the siege of York-Town, in the state of Virginia;

RESOLVED, that brigadier general Knox be, and he is hereby promoted to the rank of majorgeneral in the line of the army, and that he take rank from the fifteenth day of November last.

By his excellency John Rutledge, efquire, governor and commander in chief of the faid state.

HEREAS the forces of the United States having compelled the troops of his his Britannic majesty to surrender or evacuate the feveral strong posts which they held in the upper and interior fettlements, and retreat to the vicinity of Charleston; and the enemy, being therefore unable to give that protection and fupport which they promifed to their adherents, left many inhabitants of this state, who had taken up arms with them, induced fo to do by their artful representations, to become victims to their injured country; whereupon fuch perfons, to escape or avoid the effects of its just refentment, followed and remain with the British army, or lurk and conceal themselves in secret places: and whereas the commandant of Charleston having fent beyond fea the wives and families, which were in the faid town, of all the avowed friends of America; the feveral brigadiers of militia were ordered, as a retaliation of fuch treatment, to fend the wives and families, within their respective districts, of all persons who had joined or adhered to, and remained with the enemy, into their lines: and whereas it is represented to me, in behalf of the unhappy men who are with the British troops, or fecreting themselves as aforefaid, that they are now convinced, being reduced with their families to great diffress and poverty, that they relied on false and specious engagements, and were flattered with vain expectations and delusive hopes, and that they are therefore anxious, if they may be admitted, to return to their allegiance, and use their utmost exertions to support American independence. On duly weighing and confidering confidering the premifes, I have thought fit, by and with the advice and confent of the privycouncil, to iffue this proclamation, offering, and I do hereby offer, to all persons who have borne arms with the enemy, and who now adhere to or are with them in this state, or are lurking or concealing themselves in secret places in any part of the state, a FULL and FREE PARDON and OBLIVION, for fuch their offence of having borne arms with, or adhered to, the enemy, upon the conditions following; that is to fay, that fuch persons do, and shall, within thirty days after the date hereof, furrender themselves to a brigadier of the militia of this state, and engage to perform constant duty as privates, in the militia, for fix months next enfuing the time of fuch furrender, and that they actually perform fuch duty. And I do further offer to the wives and children of fuch persons, upon their hufbands or parents complying with the condition first above-mentioned, license and permission, to return to their habitations, and to hold and enjoy their property in this state without molestation or interruption. Provided always, that if fuch persons shall desert from the militia service within the time above-limited, their families shall be immediately fent into the enemy's lines, and neither they or their husbands or parents, suffered to return to, or reside in this state. thelefs, I do except, from the pardon hereby offered, and from every benefit of this proclamation, all fuch perfons, as having gone over to.

or joined the enemy, were called upon by me in and by two feveral proclamations, to furrender themselves to a magistrate within forty days after the respective dates of those proclamations, in pursuance of an ordinance, entitled, ' An or-' dinance to prevent perfons withdrawing from the defence of this state, to join the enemies ' thereof:' all fuch as were fent off or obliged to quit the state for refusing to take the oath required of them by law, who have returned to this country; all those who subscribed a congratulatory address, bearing date on or about the fifth day of June, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, to general fir Henry Clinton, and vice-admiral Arbuthnot, or another address, bearing date on or about the nineteenth day of September, one thousand seven hundred and eighty, to lieutenant-general earl Cornwallis; all fuch as hold or have held any commission, civil or military, under the British government, and are now with the enemy; and all those whose conduct has been fo infamous, as that they cannot, confistently with justice or policy, be admitted to partake of the privileges of Americans. Notwithstanding which last-mentioned exception, fuch perfons, if they should be deemed by me, or the governor and commander in chief for the time being, inadmissible to the rights and privileges of subjects, will not be detained as prisoners, but shall have full and free liberty, and a pals or permit to return. At a juncture, when the force of the enemy in this state, though lately lately confiderable, is greatly reduced by the many defeats which they have fuffered, and particularly in the late important action at Eutaw; when they are dispossessed of every post and garrison, except Charleston; when the formidable fleet of his most christian majesty, in Chesapeak bay, and the combined armies of the King of France and of the United States, under the command of his excellency general Washington, in Virginia, afford a well-grounded hope, that, by the joint efforts of their armies, this campaign will be happily terminated, and the British power in every part of the confederate states, foon totally annihilated; it is conceived, that the true and real motive of the offer hereby made, will be acknowledged. It must be allowed to proceed, not from timidity, to which the enemy affect to attribute every act of clemency and mercy on our part, but from a wish to impress, with a fense of their error, and to reclaim misguided subjects, and give them once more an opportunity of becoming valuable members of the community, instead of banishing them, or for-ever cutting them off from it; for even the most disaffected cannot suppose that the brave and determined freemen of this state have any dread of their arms.

WITH the persons to whom pardon is thus offered the choice still remains, either to return to their allegiance, and, with their families, be restored to the favour of their country, and to Vol. II.

their possessions, or to abandon their properties in this state for-ever, and go with their wives and children, whither, for what purpose, on whom to depend, or how to subsist, they know not—most probably to experience, in some strange and distant country, all the miseries and horrors of beggary, sickness and despair—This alternative is now, for the last time, submitted to their judgment—It will never be renewed.

Given under my hand and the great feal, at the High Hills of Santee, this twenty-seventh day of September, in the year of our Lord, one thousand seven hundred and eighty-one, and in the sixth year of the independence of America.

J. RUTLEDGE.

By his excellency's command,
John Sandford Dart, fec'ry.

Articles of treaty between general Marion, in behalf of the state of South-Carolina, and major Ganey, and the inhabitants under his command, which were included in the treaty made the seventeenth day of June, 1781.

ARTICLE I. A JOR Ganey and the men under his command to lay down their arms, as enemies to the state, and are not to resume them again until ordered to do so, in support of the interest of the United States, and of this state in particular.

- II. WE will deliver up all negroes, horses, cattle, and other property that have been taken from this or any other state.
- III. WE will demean ourselves as peaceable citizens of this state, and submit ourselves to be governed by its laws, in the same manner as the rest of the citizens thereof.
- IV. WE do engage to apprehend and deliver up all persons within our district, who shall resuse to accede to these terms, and contumaciously persist in rebellion against this state.
- V. WE will deliver up, as foon as possible, every man who belongs to any regular line in the American service, and every inhabitant of North-Carolina, of this, or any other state, who have joined us since the seventeenth of June 1781, when the former treaty was made, or oblige them to go out of the district, and whenever they return, to take and deliver them into safe custody in any gaol within the state.
- VI. EVERY man is to fign an instrument of writing, professing his allegiance to the United States of America, and the state of South-Carolina in particular; and to abjure his Britannic majesty, his heirs, successors and adherents, and promise promise to oppose all the enemies of the United States, and the state of South-Carolina in particular.

VII. ALL arms, ammunition, and other warlike stores, the property of the British, to be delivered up.

VIII. THE above feven articles being agreed on, they shall have a full pardon for treasons committed by them against the state, and enjoy their property, and be protected by the laws thereof.

IX. Such men who do not choose to accede to these articles, shall have leave to go within the British lines, and to march by the twenty-fifth instant, and be safely conducted with such of their wives and children as may be able to travel, and carry or fell their property, except cattle, fheep and hogs, which they may dispose of, but not carry with them. Such women and children who cannot be removed, may remain until the first day of September next. The officers to keep their pistols and fide-arms; all other arms to be disposed of, and not carried with them. Each field officer and captain to retain one horse, not exceeding twelve in the whole, and no other person to take with him any more horses that may be fit for dragoon fervice within the British lines.

WE have agreed to the before-mentioned nine articles, and have figned the same at Birch's mill, on Peedee, this eighth day of June, 1782.

SIR, Head-quarters, August 13.

HE measure which I lately adopted, of sending a force to collect provisions on the Lower Santee, for the use of this garrison, was a necessary consequence of the conduct your party had thought proper to observe, in the prohibitions which prevented our receiving supplies of the kind from the country.

From the respect which I owe to the sentiments which appear to govern the present conduct of Great-Britain towards America, I should have given a willing preserence to any means, less distressful to the country, by which this necessary purpose might have been obtained; I am equally desirous to forbear the further prosecution of these measures; and am ready to enter with you into any composition to that effect, which may, I think, be established on terms to the mutual advantage of both parties, affording to us a supply to our future necessities, and to you security from further depredation, and a voluntary compensation for what the force of arms has already given us in possession; the success which has attended this enterprize must convince you, that principles of benevolence and humanity are the true motives of a conduct, the moderation of which must appear striking to you.

I HOPE these considerations will induce you to accept a proposal so evidently advantageous to the interests of your own party; and that you will in consequence order rice and other provisions to be sent into town, in quantities proportioned to our demand, which will be considerable, from the necessity of supplying the King's subjects who may think proper to remove from hence to the province of East-Florida.

IF, notwithstanding these offers, you think proper to adhere to your former line of conduct, the necessity which constrains will justify the measures which I shall be forced to take.

I have the honour to be, &c.

ALEX. LESLIE.

To major-general Greene, &c.

N O T E LIII. PAGE 385.

Provisional articles, signed at Paris the thirtieth of November, 1782, by the commissioner of his Britannic majesty, and the commissioners of the United States of America.

Articles agreed upon by and between Richard Ofwald, esquire, the commissioner of his Britannic majesty for treating of peace with the commissioners of the United States of America, in behalf of his said majesty, on the one part; and John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, John Jay and Henry Laurens, four of the said commissioners of the faid states for treating of peace with the commissioner of his faid majesty, on their behalf, on the other part: to be inferted in, and to constitute the treaty of peace proposed to be concluded between the crown of Great-Britain, and the said United States; but which treaty is not to be concluded until terms of a peace shall be agreed upon between Great-Britain and France, and his Britannic majesty shall be ready to conclude such treaty accordingly.

HEREAS reciprocal advantages and mutual convenience are found by experience to form the only permanent foundation of peace and friendship between states; it is agreed to form the articles of the proposed treaty on such principles of liberal equity and reciprocity, as that partial advantages (those feeds of discord) being excluded, fuch a beneficial and fatisfactory intercourse between the two countries may be established, as to promise and secure to both perpetual peace and harmony.

ARTICLE I. His Britannic majesty acknowledges the faid United States, viz. New-Hampshire, Massachusetts-Bay, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New-York, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina and Georgia, to be free, fovereign, and independent states; that he treats with them as fuch; and for himself, his heirs and successors, relinquishes all claims to the government, propriety and territorial rights of the fame, and every part thereof; and that all disputes which might arise in future, on the subject of the boundaries of the said United States may be prevented, it is hereby agreed and declared, that the following are, and shall be their boundaries, viz.

ARTICLE II. From the north-west angle of Nova-Scotia, viz. that angle which is formed by a line drawn due north, from the source of Saint Croix viver to the Highlands, along the said Highlands which divide those rivers that empty themselves into the river Saint Lawrence, from those which fall into the Atlantic ocean, to the north-western-most head of Connecticut river; thence down along the middle of that river to the forty-sifth degree of north latitude; from thence by a line due west on said latitude until it strikes the river Iroquois or Cataraquy; thence along the middle of faid river into lake Ontario; through the middle of faid lake, until it strikes the communication by water between that lake and lake Erie; thence along the middle of faid communication into lake Erie; through the middle of faid lake, until it arrives at the water-communication between that lake and lake Huron; thence along the middle of faid water-communication into the lake Huron; thence through the middle of faid lake to the water-communication between that lake and lake Superior; thence through lake Superior, northward of the ifles Royal and Phelipeaux, to the Long Lake; thence through the middle of faid Long Lake, and the water-communication between it and the Lake of the Woods, to the faid Lake of the Woods; thence through the faid lake to the most north-western point thereof, and from thence on a due west course to the river Mississippi; thence by a line to be drawn along the middle of the faid river Miffiffippi, until it shall intersect the northernmost part of the thirty-first degree of north latitude. - South by a line to be drawn due east from the determination of the line last-mentioned, in the latitude of thirty-one degrees north of the equator, to the middle of the river Apalachicola or Catahouche; thence along the middle thereof to its junction with the Flint river; thence straight to the head of St. Mary's river, and thence down along the middle of St. Mary's river, to the VOL. II. 4 A Atlantic Atlantic ocean. East by a line to be drawn along the middle of the river St. Croix from its mouth in the bay of Fundy to its fource; and from its fource directly north to the aforesaid Highlands, which divide the rivers that fall into the Atlantic ocean, from those which fall into the river St. Lawrence; comprehending all islands within twenty leagues of any part of the shores of the United States, and lying between lines to be drawn due east from the points where the aforefaid boundaries between Nova-Scotia on the one part, and East-Florida on the other, shall respectively touch the bay of Fundy, and the Atlantic ocean; excepting fuch islands as now are, or heretofore have been, within the limits of the faid province of Nova-Scotia.

ARTICLE III. It is agreed, that the people of the United States shall continue to enjoy, unmolested, the right to take sish of every kind on the Grand Bank; and on all other banks of Newfoundland; also in the gulf of St. Lawrence, and at all other places in the sea, where the inhabitants of both countries used at any time heretofore to sish. And also that the inhabitants of the United States shall have liberty to take sish of every kind on such part of the coast of Newfoundland, as British sishermen shall use, but not to dry or cure the same on that island, and also on the coasts, bays, and creeks of all other of his Britannic majesty's dominions in America; and that the American sishermen shall have liberty to dry and cure fish in any of the unsettled bays, harbours, and creeks of Nova-Scotia, Magdalen islands, and Labrador, so long as the same shall remain unsettled; but so soon as the same, or either of them, shall be settled, it shall not be lawful for the said sishermen to dry or cure sish at such settlement, without a previous agreement for that purpose with the inhabitants, proprietors or possessor of the ground.

ARTICLE IV. It is agreed, that creditors on either fide shall meet with no lawful impediment to the recovery of the full value in sterling money of all bonâ fide debts heretofore contracted.

ARTICLE V. It is agreed, that the Congress shall earnestly recommend it to the legislatures of the respective states, to provide for the restitution of all estates, rights and properties, which have been confiscated, belonging to real British subjects: and also of the estates, rights and properties of persons resident in districts in the possession of his majesty's arms, and who have not borne arms against the faid United States: and that persons of any other description shall have free liberty to go to any part or parts of any of the thirteen United States, and therein to remain twelve months unmolested in their endeavours to obtain the restitution of such of their estates, rights and properties, as may have been confifcated: and that Congress shall also earnestly recommend to the feveral states a reconsideration and and revision of all acts or laws regarding the premises, so as to render the said laws or acts perfectly consistent, not only with justice and equity, but with that spirit of conciliation, which, on the return of the blessings of peace, should univerfally prevail.

And that Congress shall also earnestly recommend to the several states, that the estates, rights and properties of such last-mentioned persons shall be restored to them, they refunding to any persons who may be now in possession, the bona side price (where any has been given) which such persons may have paid on purchasing any of the said lands, rights or properties, since the confiscation.

And it is agreed, that all persons who have any interest in confiscated lands, either by debts, marriage settlements or otherwise, shall meet with no lawful impediment in the prosecution of their just rights.

ARTICLE VI. That there shall be no future consistations made, nor any prosecutions commenced against any person or persons, for or by reason of the part which he or they may have taken in the present war, and that no person shall on that account, suffer any future loss or damage, either in his person, liberty or property; and that those who may be in consinement on such charges at the time of the ratification of the treaty treaty in America, shall be immediately set at liberty, and the prosecutions so commenced be discontinued.

ARTICLE VII. There shall be a firm and perpetual peace between his Britannic majesty and the faid states, and between the subjects of the one and the citizens of the other, wherefore all hostilities both by sea and land shall then immediately cease: all prisoners on both sides shall be fet at liberty, and his Britannic majesty shall with all convenient speed, and without causing any destruction, or carrying away any negroes, or other property of the American inhabitants, withdraw all his armies, garrifons and fleets from the faid United States, and from every port, place, and harbour within the same; leaving in all fortifications the American artillery that may be therein: and shall also order and cause all archives, records, deeds and papers belonging to any of the faid states, or their citizens, which in the course of the war may have fallen into the hands of his officers, to be forthwith restored and delivered to the proper states and persons to whom they belong, ARTICLE VIII. The navigation of the river Miffiffippi, from its fource to the ocean, shall for-ever remain free and open to the subjects of Great-Britain, and the citizens of the United States.

ARTICLE IX. In case it should so happen that any place or territory belonging to Great-Britain, or to the United States, should be conquered by the arms of either, from the other, before the arrival of these articles in America, it is agreed that the same shall be restored without difficulty, and without requiring any compensation.
