The New World then developed from a small, successful colonial economy to a small, independent agricultural economy, eventually developing into a very complex industrial economy. During this evolution, the United States developed more complex institutions to match its growth. And while government intervention in the economy was a consistent topic, the scope of those interventions generally increased. The first Native Americans in North America were Native Americans, and they are believed to have traveled to the United States about 20,000 years ago across a land bridge from Asia with the Bering Strait. This indigenous group was mistakenly called an Indian by European explorers, who thought they had reached India when they first landed in the Americas. These indigenous peoples were organized by tribes and, in some cases, tribal unions. Before contacting European explorers and settlers, Native Americans traded with each other and had little contact with people from other continents, including other Native Americans in South America. The economic system they developed was eventually destroyed by the Europeans who settled their land. The Vikings were the first Europeans to discover the United States. However, the event, which took place around 1000 years ago, was largely unnoticed. At the time, much of European society was still based on agriculture and land ownership. Commerce and colonies have not yet assumed the importance of stimulating further exploration and settlement in North America. But in 1492, christopher Columbus, who sailed to Italy under the Spanish flag, set out to find the southwest passage to Asia and discovered the New World. For the next 100 years, English, Spanish, Portuguese, Dutch and French explorers sailed from Europe for the New World, seeking gold, wealth, honor, and glory. The North American wilderness provided some glory and less gold to the early explorers, so most of them returned home without staying. Eventually, the people who settled in North America and drove the early U.S. economy arrived later. In 1607, a British man established the first permanent settlement to become the United States. Settlement, located in the current state of Jamestown, Virginia and marked the beginning of Europe North America. The early colonial U.S. economy was vastly different from that of the settlers of the european countries. It was rich in land and natural resources, but labor was scarce. Through early colonial settlement, homes relied on self-sufficiency on small agricultural farms. This will eventually change as more and more settlers join the colony and the economy begins to grow.
