One: We find ourselves talking about fairness at the office, with students in the classroom, at family gatherings, and at other social engagements.

All: We confess that our focus is usually upon what is fair for us. The injustice we want to have corrected is one which we perceive pertains to us. We are seldom concerned about the many injustices we choose not to see as we lead our lives.

One: We fail to think about the welfare of the sanitation workers coming down our alleys in the early morning hours.

All: We don’t want to know that they are suffering due to the outsourcing of jobs by our local governments, how they work hard jobs for minimal wages, often without benefits.

One: We stand at the fast food counter and order foods processed by someone living on the margins of society, who is paid little and threatened often to work harder.

All: We face the employee with whom we place our order and see them not as children of God deserving dignity and justice in the work place. Rather we choose not to fully see them at all. We’ve come to accept injustice and unfairness as a norm with which we can live.

One: Forgive us, O God, for we have settled for a system that does not reflect what you intend in your realm. We settle for talking heads who justify our ways of doing business, for political figures whose values are mostly unexamined lest they impact their ambitions. Sadly, we settle for what is convenient to us.

All: Oh God, reshape us and give us a burning within so that simply “settling” will no longer rule our hearts and lives. Let it be, O Holy One, please let it be.
