From Our Pastor

Confetti, Snow, Petals, and Mercy

Confetti is a familiar sight on New Year's Eve, especially in places like Times Square. At parties, we toss it into the air. At birthday celebrations, it spills out when a piñata breaks open. I have even watched friends drop balloons down staircases for their children. When something drifts down from above, the moment feels celebratory, as if joy itself is floating around us.

On New Year's Day, a gentle snow covered our church parking lot in Connecticut. It felt like confetti falling just for us. As I stood watching it settle, I was carried back to a moment years ago, when I was ordained as an elder at the 219th Session of the New York Annual Conference. On that day, rose petals fell from above. Members of the cabinet had quietly prepared this surprise for those being ordained.

I still remember that moment vividly. There was the simple joy of receiving something beautiful and unexpected. There was also a sense of wonder about the people who made it happen. What were they feeling as they gathered those petals and let them fall? Care, anticipation, delight—likely all woven together.

There is an old Vacation Bible School song that says, "Mercy is falling." It describes mercy coming down like a gentle rain, covering everyone beneath it. When mercy falls, people do not remain unchanged. They move. They dance. They respond.

Whether it is confetti, snow, rose petals, or mercy itself, something shifts when we allow what is given from above to reach us. Falling things invite celebration not because they are loud or dramatic, but because they are received. And when something is truly received, joy finds its way into our bodies, our gratitude, and our praise.

Seen this way, mercy and grace are not offered reluctantly or at a distance. They flow from a heart shaped by generosity and delight, given with care and shared in love. This, I believe, reflects God's heart toward us as we step into the year 2026
